Factors That Do Not Affect Negotiability Certain ambiguities or omissions will not affect the negotiability of an instrument. The UCC provides the following rules for clearing up ambiguous terms:

1. Unless the date of an instrument is necessary to determine a definite time for payment, the fact that an instrument is undated does not affect its negotiability. A typical example is an undated check, which is still negotiable. If a check is not dated, its date is the date of its issue, meaning the date the maker first delivers the check to another person to give that person rights in the check [UCC 3–113(b)].
2. Antedating or postdating an instrument (using a date before or after the actual current date) does not affect the instrument's negotiability [UCC 3–113(a)]. Example 18.16 Crenshaw draws a check on his account at First Bank, payable to Sirah Imports. He postdates the check by fifteen days. Sirah Imports can immediately negotiate the check, and, unless Crenshaw tells First Bank otherwise, the bank can charge the amount of the check to Crenshaw's account [UCC 4–401(c)].
3. Handwritten terms outweigh typewritten and printed terms (preprinted terms on forms, for instance), and typewritten terms outweigh printed terms [UCC 3–114]. Example 18.17 Most checks are preprinted "Pay to the order of" followed by a blank line, indicating an order instrument. In handwriting, Chad inserts in the blank, "Anita Delgado or bearer." The handwritten terms will outweigh the printed form, and the check will be a bearer instrument.

Know This

An instrument that purports to be payable both to order and to bearer contains a contradiction in terms. Such an instrument is a bearer instrument.

4. Words outweigh figures unless the words are ambiguous [UCC 3–114]. This rule is important when the numerical amount and the written amount on a check differ.
Example 18.18 Megan issues a check payable to Reliable Appliance Company. For the amount, she fills in the number "$100" but writes out the words "One thousand and 00/100" dollars. The check is payable in the amount of $1,000.
5. When an instrument does not specify a particular interest rate but simply states "with interest," the interest rate is the judgment rate of interest (a rate of interest fixed by statute that is applied to court judgments) [UCC 3–112(b)].
6. A check is negotiable even if a notation on it states that it is "nonnegotiable" or "not governed by Article 3." Any other instrument, in contrast, can be made nonnegotiable if the maker or drawer conspicuously notes on it that it is "nonnegotiable" or "not governed by Article 3" [UCC 3–104(d)].

18–2 Transfer of Instruments

Once issued, a negotiable instrument can be transferred by assignment or by negotiation. The party receiving the instrument obtains the rights of a holder only if the transfer is by negotiation.

18–2a Transfer by Assignment

Recall that an assignment is a transfer of rights under a contract. Under general contract principles, a transfer by assignment gives the assignee only those rights that the assignor possessed. Any defenses that can be raised against an assignor can normally be raised against the assignee. This same principle applies when a negotiable instrument, such as a promissory note, is transferred by assignment. The transferee is an assignee rather than a holder.

18–2b Transfer by Negotiation

Negotiation The transfer of an instrument in such form that the transferee (the person to whom the instrument is transferred) becomes a holder.

Negotiation is the transfer of an instrument in such a way that the transferee (the person to whom the instrument is transferred) becomes a holder [UCC 3–201(a)]. Under UCC principles, a transfer by negotiation creates a holder who, at the very least, receives the rights of the previous possessor [UCC 3–203(b)].

Unlike an assignment, a transfer by negotiation can make it possible for a holder to receive more rights in the instrument than the prior possessor had [UCC 3–202(b), 3–305, 3–306]. A holder who receives greater rights is known as a holder in due course, a concept we will discuss later in this chapter.

There are two methods of negotiating an instrument so that the receiver becomes a holder. The method used depends on whether the instrument is an order instrument or a bearer instrument.

Focus Question 2
How does the negotiation of order instruments differ from the negotiation of bearer instruments?

Negotiating Order Instruments An order instrument contains the name of a payee capable of indorsing it, as in "Pay to the order of Lloyd Sorenson." If the instrument is an order instrument, it is negotiated by delivery with any necessary indorsements.

Example 18.19 Welpac Corporation issues a payroll check "to the order of Lloyd Sorenson." Sorenson takes the check to the bank, signs his name on the back (an indorsement), gives it to the teller (a delivery), and receives cash. Sorenson has negotiated the check to the bank [UCC 3–201(b)].

Negotiating order instruments requires both delivery and indorsement. If Sorenson had taken the check to the bank and delivered it to the teller without signing it, the transfer would not qualify as a negotiation. In that situation, the transfer would be treated as an assignment, and the bank would become an assignee rather than a holder.

Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Negotiating Bearer Instruments If an instrument is payable to bearer, it is negotiated by delivery—that is, by transfer into another person's possession. Indorsement is not necessary [UCC 3–201(b)]. The use of bearer instruments thus involves more risk through loss or theft than the use of order instruments.

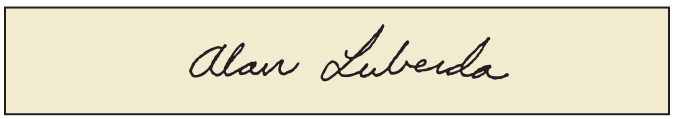
Example 18.20 Richard writes a check "payable to cash" and hands it to Jessie (a delivery). The check is a bearer instrument, which Richard has issued to Jessie. Jessie places the check in her wallet, and the wallet is subsequently stolen. The thief has possession of the check. At this point, the thief has no rights to the check. If the thief "delivers" the check to an innocent third person, however, negotiation will be complete. All rights to the check will be passed absolutely to that third person, and Jessie will lose all rights to recover the proceeds of the check from that person [UCC 3–306]. Of course, Jessie can attempt to recover the amount from the thief if the thief can be found.

18–2c Indorsements

Indorsement A signature placed on an instrument for the purpose of transferring ownership rights in the instrument.

An indorsement is required whenever an order instrument is negotiated. An indorsement is a signature with or without additional words or statements. It is most often written on the back of the instrument itself. If there is no room on the instrument, the indorsement can be on a separate piece of paper that is firmly affixed to the instrument, such as with staples [UCC 3–204(a)].

A person who transfers an instrument by signing (indorsing) it and delivering it to another person is an indorser. The person to whom the check is indorsed and delivered is the indorsee. Example 18.21 Luisa receives a graduation check for $100. She can transfer the check to her mother (or to anyone) by signing it on the back. Luisa is an indorser. If Luisa indorses the check by writing "Pay to Avery Perez," Avery is the indorsee.



There are four main categories of indorsements: blank, special, qualified, and restrictive. Note that a single indorsement may have characteristics of more than one category.

Blank Indorsement An indorsement on an instrument that specifies no indorsee. An order instrument that is indorsed in blank becomes a bearer instrument.

Blank Indorsements A blank indorsement does not specify a particular indorsee and can consist of a mere signature [UCC 3–205(b)]. Example 18.22 A check payable "to the order of Alan Luberda" is indorsed in blank if Alan simply writes his signature on the back of the check. A blank indorsement is shown in Exhibit 18–5.

An order instrument indorsed in blank becomes a bearer instrument and can be negotiated by delivery alone, as already discussed. In other words, a blank indorsement converts an order instrument to a bearer instrument, which anybody can cash.

Exhibit 18–5 A Blank Indorsement

Other Indorsements As mentioned, other types of indorsements include special, qualified, and restrictive indorsements.

- A special indorsement identifies the specific person to whom the indorser intends to make the instrument payable. Words such as "Pay to the order of Rick Clay," followed by the signature of the indorser, create a special indorsement.
- A qualified endorsement disclaims any contractual liability on the indorsement. Thus, an indorser who does not want to be liable on an instrument can write "Pay to Evelyn Ling without recourse."
- A restrictive indorsement requires the indorsee to comply with restrictions, such as "for collection only" or "for deposit" only.

As the use of paper checks has become less common, these types of indorsement have become less important for daily consumer and business transactions in the United States.

18–3 Holder in Due Course (HDC)

Holder in Due Course (HDC)
A holder who acquires a negotiable instrument for value, in good faith, and without notice that the instrument is defective.

Often, whether a holder is entitled to obtain payment will depend on whether the holder is a holder in due course. An ordinary holder obtains only those rights that the transferor had in the instrument and normally is subject to any defenses that could be asserted against the transferor. In contrast, a holder in due course (HDC) takes an instrument free of most of the defenses and claims that could be asserted against the transferor. To become an HDC, a holder must meet certain acquisition requirements.

Example 18.23 Shanna buys a BMW X5 for her business from Heritage Motors in Irvine, California, signing a promissory note for $65,000 as part of the deal. Heritage negotiates the note to Apollo Financial Services, which promises to pay Heritage for it in six months. During the next two months, Shanna has significant problems with the X5 and sues Heritage for breach of contract. She also refuses to make further payments on the note.

Whether Apollo can hold Shanna liable on the note depends on whether it has met the requirements for HDC status. If Apollo has met these requirements and thus has HDC status, it is entitled to payment on the note. If Apollo has not met these requirements, it has the status of an ordinary holder, and Shanna's defense against payment to Heritage will also be effective against Apollo.

18–3a Requirements for HDC Status

Focus Question 3
What are three basic requirements for attaining the status of a holder in due course (HDC)?

The basic requirements for attaining HDC status are set forth in UCC 3–302. A holder of a negotiable instrument is an HDC if that person takes the instrument (1) for value, (2) in good faith, and (3) without notice that it is defective. Next, we examine each of these requirements.

Taking for Value An HDC must have given value for the instrument [UCC 3–302(a)(2)(i)]. A person who receives an instrument as a gift or inherits it has not met the requirement of value. In these situations, the person becomes an ordinary holder and does not possess the rights of an HDC.

Under UCC 3–303(a), a holder takes an instrument for value if the holder has done any of the following:

1. Performed the promise for which the instrument was issued or transferred.
2. Acquired a security interest or other lien in the instrument, excluding a lien obtained by a judicial proceeding.
3. Taken the instrument in payment of, or as security for, a preexisting claim. Example 18.24 Zon owes Dwyer $2,000 on a past-due account. If Zon negotiates a $2,000 note signed by Gordon to Dwyer and Dwyer accepts it to discharge the overdue account balance, Dwyer has given value for the instrument.
4. Given a negotiable instrument as payment for the instrument. Example 18.25 Justin issues a six-month, $5,000 negotiable promissory note to Paige. Paige needs cash and does not want to wait for the maturity date to collect. She negotiates the note to her friend Kristen, who pays her $2,000 in cash and writes her a check—a negotiable instrument—for the balance of $3,000. Kristen has given full value for the note.
5. Given an irrevocable commitment (such as a letter of credit) as payment for the instrument.

Value Is Distinguishable from Consideration. The concept of value in the law of negotiable instruments is not the same as the concept of consideration in the law of contracts. Although a promise to give value in the future is valid consideration to support a contract, it does not constitute sufficient value to make the promisor an HDC. If a person promises to perform or give value in the future, that person is not an HDC.

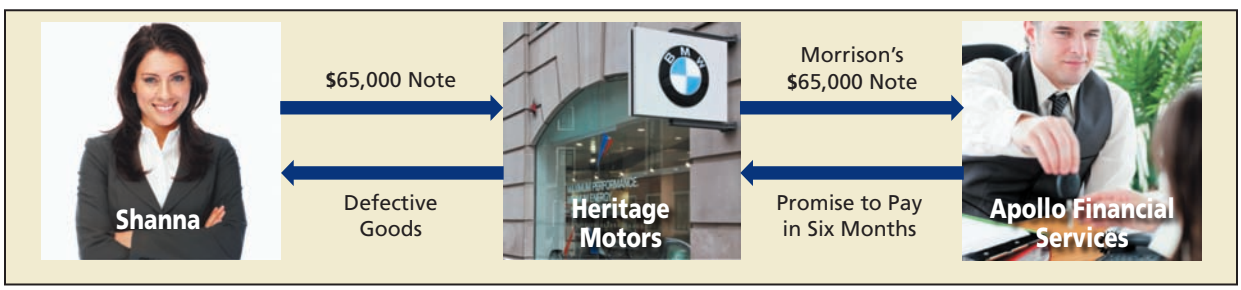
A holder takes an instrument for value only to the extent that the promise has been performed [UCC 3–303(a)(1)]. Let's return to Example 18.23, in which Heritage Motors negotiates Shanna's promissory note to Apollo Financial Services in return for Apollo's promise to pay in six months. In this example, Apollo is not an HDC. At the time of Shanna's breach of contract lawsuit against Heritage, Apollo has not yet paid Heritage for the note. Thus, it did not take the note for value. If Apollo had paid Heritage for the note at the time of transfer (given value), it would be an HDC and could have held Morrison liable on the note. Exhibit 18–6 illustrates these concepts further.

Exceptions. In a few situations, the holder may pay for the instrument but not acquire HDC status. For instance, when the instrument is purchased at a judicial sale, such as a bankruptcy or creditor's sale, the holder will not be an HDC. Similarly, if the instrument is acquired as a result of taking over a trust or an estate (as administrator), or as part of a corporate purchase of assets, the holder will have only the rights of an ordinary holder [UCC 3–302(c)].



Taking in Good Faith To qualify as an HDC, a holder must take the instrument in good faith [UCC 3–302(a)(2)(ii)]. This means that the holder must have acted honestly and observed reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the process of acquiring the instrument [UCC 3–103(a)(4)].

The good faith requirement applies only to the holder. It is immaterial whether the transferor acted in good faith. Thus, even a person who takes a negotiable instrument from a thief may become an HDC if the person acquired the instrument in good faith and honestly had no reason to be suspicious of the transaction.

Spotlight Case Example 18.26 Cassandra Demery worked as a bookkeeper at Freestyle until the owner, Clinton Georg, discovered that she had embezzled more than $200,000. Georg fired Demery and demanded repayment. Demery went to work for her parents' firm, Metro Fixtures, where she had some authority to write checks. Without specific authorization, she wrote a check for $189,000 to Freestyle on Metro's account and deposited it in Freestyle's account. She told Georg that the check was a loan to her from her family.

Exhibit 18–6 Taking for Value

By exchanging defective goods (a defective BMW X5) for a promissory note, Heritage Motors breached its contract with Shanna. Shanna could assert this breach as a defense if Heritage presented the note to her for payment. Heritage exchanged the note for Apollo Financial Services' promise to pay in six months, however. Because Apollo did not take the note for value, it is not a holder in due course. Thus, Shanna can assert against Apollo the defense of Heritage's breach when Apollo submits the note to Shanna for payment. In contrast, if Apollo had taken the note for value, Shanna could not assert that defense and would be liable to pay the note.

When Metro discovered Demery's theft, it filed a suit against Georg and Freestyle. Freestyle argued that it had taken the check in good faith and was an HDC. The Colorado Supreme Court agreed. Demery was the wrongdoer. She had the authority to issue checks for Metro, and Georg had no reason to know that Demery had lied about this check. Therefore, Freestyle was an HDC, and Metro would bear the loss.[10]

Taking without Notice The final requirement for HDC status involves notice [UCC 3–302]. Individuals will not qualify for HDC protection if they are on notice (knows or has reason to know) that the instrument being acquired is defective in any one of the following ways [UCC 3–302(a)]:

1. It is overdue.
2. It has been dishonored.
3. It is part of a series of which at least one instrument has an uncured (uncorrected) default.
4. It contains an unauthorized signature or has been altered.
5. There is a defense against the instrument or a claim to it.
6. The instrument is so irregular or incomplete as to call its authenticity into question.

Typically, disputes involving the status of an HDC involve persons that acquire negotiable instruments from others. Therefore, taking without notice is a matter of whether the holder has reason to know of a defect in the instrument. Sometimes, however, a person who is a party to the instrument claims HDC status. In the following case, the original payee on promissory notes issued to him when he contributed capital to a business that he co-owned claimed to be an HDC.

Jarrell v. Conerly

Court of Appeal of Louisiana Fourth Circuit, 240 So.3d 266, La. Ct. App. 4th Cir. (2018).

Facts Jessie Conerly and Ramon Jarrell signed a letter of intent to enter into a business venture and form a limited liability company, K & M, LLC. They planned to buy land from Marion Clay & Gravel, LLC, and extract and sell the natural resources of sand, gravel, and clay from it. Jarrell would own 48 percent of the company and secure $6.8 million in start-up capital for the purpose of buying out the four members of Marion Clay. Jarrell would also receive 50 percent of the profits, provide oversight, and have access to all records and aspects of the operation. Conerly would own 52 percent of K & M, be responsible for daily operational management and oversight, and receive 50 percent of the profits.

After the letter-of-intent agreement, Jarrell began advancing capital to Conerly. Conerly issued four promissory notes (for the principal amounts of $40,000, $20,000, $22,000, and $22,000) naming Jarrell as the payee. Two years later, Jarrell filed a lawsuit in a Louisiana state court against Conerly for failing to pay the balance due on the notes. Conerly claimed several defenses to the notes, including lack of consideration, but the trial court held that Jarrell was an HDC, which precluded Conerly from asserting these defenses. The trial court granted a partial summary judgment to Jarrell in the amount of $104,000. Conerly appealed.

Issue Was Jarrell, the payee on the promissory notes, an HDC of the notes?

Decision No. The state intermediate appellate court held that Jarrell was not an HDC on the four promissory notes. Therefore, Conerly was entitled to present his legitimate defenses. The court reversed the lower court's summary judgment and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Reason According to the court, although a payee on a promissory note can be an HDC, that status is not automatic. "When the payee deals with the maker through an intermediary . . . and does not have notices of defenses, such an isolated payee may take as a holder in due course." Normally, however, a payee who has had constant, direct, and meaningful contact with the maker will not be an HDC. A payee in this situation will usually have notices of defenses and claims by virtue of the fact that he has dealt directly with the maker.

In this case, Jarrell had direct and meaningful contact with Conerly, and the notes were relating to financing a company that he helped found, worked for, and partially owned. Given Jarrell's status as a payee, and his personal involvement in the formation and operation of the business venture, Jarrell was not a holder in due course. "Because Jarrell is not a holder in due course, the notes are subject to the defenses advanced by Conerly, such as failure of consideration."

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? If Jarrell had simply invested in K & M, but was not a co-owner and did not interact with Conerly, how might this have affected the outcome of this case?

What Constitutes Notice? Under UCC 1–201(25), a person is considered to have notice in the following circumstances:

1. The person has actual knowledge of the defect.
2. The person has received a notice or notification concerning the defect (such as a letter from a bank identifying the serial numbers of stolen bearer instruments).
3. The person has reason to know that a defect exists, given all the facts and circumstances known at the time in question.

The holder must also have received notice "at a time and in a manner that gives a reasonable opportunity to act on it" [UCC 3–302(f)]. A purchaser's knowledge of certain facts, such as insolvency proceedings against the maker or drawer of the instrument, does not constitute notice that the instrument is defective [UCC 3–302(b)].

Overdue Instruments. What constitutes notice that an instrument is overdue depends on whether it is a demand instrument or a time instrument.

A purchaser has notice that a demand instrument is overdue in two situations. One situation occurs when a person takes the instrument knowing that demand already has been made. The other situation occurs when a person takes a demand instrument an unreasonable length of time after its date. For a check, a "reasonable time" is within ninety days after the date of the check. For all other demand instruments, what will be considered a reasonable time depends on the circumstances [UCC 3–304(a)].

Normally, a time instrument is overdue on the day after its due date. Anyone who takes a time instrument after the due date is on notice that it is overdue [UCC 3–304(b)(2)]. Thus, if a promissory note due on May 15 is purchased on May 16, the purchaser is an ordinary holder, not an HDC. If an instrument states that it is "Payable in thirty days," counting begins the day after the instrument is dated. Thus, a note dated December 1 that is payable in thirty days is due by midnight on December 31. If the payment date falls on a Sunday or holiday, the instrument is payable on the next business day.

Dishonored Instruments. To dishonor an instrument is to refuse to pay or accept it. Thus, an instrument is dishonored when the party to whom it is presented refuses to pay it. If a holder knows or has reason to know that an instrument has been dishonored, the holder is on notice and cannot claim HDC status [UCC 3–302(a)(2)]. Thus, a person who takes a check clearly stamped "insufficient funds" is put on notice.

Dishonor To refuse to pay or to accept a negotiable instrument that has been presented in a timely and proper manner.

Conversely, if a person purchasing an instrument does not know and has no reason to know that it has been dishonored, the person is not put on notice and therefore can become an HDC. Example 18.27 Leah holds a demand note dated September 1 issued by Apex, Inc., a local business firm. On September 17, she demands payment, and Apex refuses (that is, dishonors the instrument). On September 22, Leah negotiates the note to Brenner, a purchaser who lives in another state. Brenner does not know, and has no reason to know, that the note has been dishonored. Because Brenner is not put on notice, Brenner can become an HDC.

Notice of Claims or Defenses. A holder who has notice of any claim to the instrument or any defense against it cannot become an HDC [UCC 3–302(a)(2)]. A purchaser has notice if the claims or defenses are apparent on the instrument's face or if the purchaser had reason to know of them from facts surrounding the transaction. Instruments with irregularities and incomplete instruments fall under this rule.

Know This
A difference between the handwriting in the body of a check and the handwriting in the signature does not affect the validity of the check.

Any irregularity on the face of an instrument (such as an obvious forgery or alteration) that calls into question its validity or ownership will bar HDC status. A good forgery of a signature or the careful alteration of an instrument, however, can go undetected by reasonable examination. In that situation, the purchaser can qualify as an HDC.

In addition, a purchaser cannot become an HDC of an instrument so incomplete on its face that an element of negotiability is lacking (for instance, the amount is not filled in) [UCC 3–302(a)(1)]. Minor omissions (such as the omission of the date) are permissible, because these do not call into question the validity of the instrument [UCC 3–113(b)].

18–3b Holder through an HDC

Shelter Principle The principle that the holder of a negotiable instrument who cannot qualify as a holder in due course (HDC), but who derives title through an HDC, acquires the rights of an HDC.

A person who does not qualify as an HDC but who derives title through an HDC can acquire the rights and privileges of an HDC. This rule, which is sometimes called the shelter principle, is set out in UCC 3–203(b). Under this rule, anyone—no matter how far removed from an HDC—who can ultimately trace their title back to an HDC may acquire the rights of an HDC. By extending the benefits of HDC status, the shelter principle promotes the marketability and free transferability of negotiable instruments.

There are some limitations on the shelter principle. A holder who participated in fraud or illegality affecting the instrument cannot take advantage of the shelter principle by repurchasing the instrument from a later HDC [UCC 3–203(b)]. Similarly, a holder who had notice of a claim or defense against an instrument cannot gain the benefits of HDC status by later reacquiring the instrument from an HDC.

18–4 Signature and Warranty Liability

Liability on negotiable instruments can arise either from a person's signature or from the warranties that are implied when the person presents the instrument for negotiation. A person who signs a negotiable instrument is potentially liable for payment of the amount stated on the instrument. Unlike signature liability, warranty liability does not require a signature and extends to both signers and nonsigners.

18–4a Signature Liability

The general rule is that every party, except a qualified indorser,[11] who signs a negotiable instrument is either primarily or secondarily liable for payment of that instrument when it comes due. Signature liability is contractual liability—no person will be held contractually liable for an instrument that the person has not signed.

Primary Liability Primary liability is unconditional. A person who is primarily liable on a negotiable instrument is absolutely required to pay the instrument—unless, of course, that person has a valid defense to payment [UCC 3–305]. Only makers and acceptors of instruments are primarily liable.

The maker of a promissory note unconditionally promises to pay the note. It is the maker's promise to pay that makes the note a negotiable instrument. If the instrument was incomplete when the maker signed it, the maker is obligated to pay it according to its stated terms or according to terms that were agreed on and later filled in to complete the instrument [UCC 3–115, 3–407(a), 3–412].

Example 18.28 Tristan executes a preprinted promissory note to Sharon, without filling in the blank for a due date. If Sharon does not complete the form by adding the date, the note will be payable on demand. If Sharon subsequently fills in a due date that Tristan has authorized, the note is payable on the stated due date. In either situation, Tristan (the maker) is obligated to pay the note. ■

As mentioned earlier, an acceptor is a drawee, such as a bank, that promises to pay an instrument when it is presented for payment. Once a drawee accepts a draft, the drawee is obligated to pay the draft when it is presented for payment [UCC 3–409(a)]. Failure to pay an accepted draft when presented leads to primary signature liability.

Know This

A drawee is the party ordered to pay a draft or check, such as a bank.

Secondary Liability

Drawers and indorsers are secondarily liable. On a negotiable instrument, secondary liability is contingent liability (similar to that of a guarantor in a contract). In other words, a drawer or an indorser will be liable only if the party that is responsible for paying the instrument dishonors it by refusing to pay.

Parties are secondarily liable on a negotiable instrument only if the following events occur:[12]

1. The instrument is properly and timely presented.
2. The instrument is dishonored.
3. Timely notice of dishonor is given to the secondarily liable party.

Proper and Timely Presentment. Presentment occurs when a person presents an instrument either to the party liable on the instrument for payment or to a drawee for acceptance. The holder must present the instrument to the appropriate party in a proper and timely fashion and must give reasonable identification if requested [UCC 3–414(f), 3–415(e), 3–501]. The party to whom the instrument must be presented depends on the type of instrument involved. A note or CD is presented to the maker for payment. A draft is presented to the drawee for acceptance, payment, or both. A check is presented to the drawee for payment [UCC 3–501(a), 3–502(b)].

Presentment can be made by any commercially reasonable means, including oral, written, or electronic communication [UCC 3–501(b)]. Ordinarily, it is effective when received. (If presentment takes place after an established cutoff hour, though, it may be treated as occurring the next business day.)

Timeliness is important for proper presentment [UCC 3–414(f), 3–415(e), 3–501(b)(4)]. Failure to present an instrument on time is the most common reason for improper presentment. If the instrument is payable on demand, the holder should present it for payment or acceptance within a reasonable time. The holder of a domestic check must present that check for payment or collection within thirty days of its date to hold the drawer secondarily liable. With respect to indorsers, the holder must present a check within thirty days after its indorsement to hold the indorser secondarily liable. The time for proper presentment for various types of instruments is shown in Exhibit 18–7.

12. These requirements are necessary for a secondarily liable party to have signature liability on a negotiable instrument, but they are not necessary for a secondarily liable party to have warranty liability.

Exhibit 18–7 Time for Proper Presentment

TYPE OF INSTRUMENT	FOR ACCEPTANCE	FOR PAYMENT
Time	On or before due date.	On due date.
Demand	Within a reasonable time after date of issue or after secondary party becomes liable on the instrument.	Within a reasonable time.
Check	Not applicable.	Within thirty days of its date, to hold drawer secondarily liable. Within thirty days of indorsement, to hold indorser secondarily liable.

Dishonor. As mentioned, an instrument is dishonored when the required acceptance or payment is refused. It is also dishonored when acceptance or payment cannot be obtained within the prescribed time or when the required presentment is excused (as it would be, for instance, if the maker had died) and the instrument is not properly accepted or paid [UCC 3–502(e), 3–504].

In certain situations, a delay in payment or a refusal to pay an instrument will not dishonor the instrument.

1. When presentment is made after an established cutoff hour (not earlier than 2:00 P.M.), a bank can postpone payment until the following business day without dishonoring the instrument [UCC 3–501(b)(4)].
2. When the holder refuses (a) exhibit the instrument, (b) to give reasonable identification, or (c) to sign a receipt for the payment on the instrument, then a bank's refusal to pay does not dishonor the instrument [UCC 3–501(b)(2)].
3. When an instrument is returned because it lacks a proper indorsement, the instrument is not dishonored [UCC 3–501(b)(3)(i)].

Proper Notice of Dishonor. Once an instrument has been dishonored, proper notice must be given to secondary parties (drawers and indorsers) for them to be held liable. Example 18.29 Oscar writes a check on his account at People's Bank payable to Bess. Bess indorses the check in blank and cashes it at Midwest Grocery, which transfers it to People's Bank for payment. If People's Bank refuses to pay it, Midwest must timely notify Bess to hold her liable.

Notice can be given in any reasonable manner, including an oral, written, or electronic communication, as well as notice written or stamped on the instrument itself. A bank must give any necessary notice before its midnight deadline (midnight of the next banking day after receipt). Notice by any party other than a bank must be given within thirty days following the day of dishonor or the day on which the person who is secondarily liable receives notice of dishonor [UCC 3–503].

Unauthorized Signatures Unauthorized signatures arise in two situations:

1. When a person forges another person's name on a negotiable instrument.
2. When an agent who lacks the authority signs an instrument on behalf of a principal.

The General Rule. The general rule is that an unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative and will not bind the person whose name is signed or forged. Example 18.30 Parker finds Dolby's checkbook lying in the street, writes a check to himself, and forges Dolby's signature. Banks normally have a duty to determine whether a person's signature on a check is forged. If a bank fails to determine that Dolby's signature is not genuine and cashes the check for Parker, the bank will generally be liable to Dolby for the amount.

The general rule also may apply to agents' signatures. If an agent lacks the authority to sign the principal's name or has exceeded the authority given by the principal, the signature does not bind the principal but will bind the "unauthorized signer" [UCC 3–403(a)].

Exceptions to the General Rule. There are two exceptions to the general rule that an unauthorized signature will not bind the person whose name is signed:

1. Ratification. When the person whose name is signed ratifies (affirms) the signature, that person will be bound [UCC 3–403(a)]. For instance, a mother may ratify her daughter's forgery of the mother's signature so that the daughter will not be prosecuted. A person can ratify an unauthorized signature either expressly (by affirming the signature) or impliedly (by other conduct, such as keeping any benefits received in the transaction or failing to repudiate the signature).
2. Negligence. When the negligence of the person whose name was forged substantially contributed to the forgery, a court may not allow the person to deny the effectiveness of an unauthorized signature [UCC 3–115, 3–406, 4–401(d)(2)]. For instance, a person who signs a check but leaves blank the amount and payee's name and then leaves the check in a public place may be unable to deny liability for it.

Someone finds a checkbook on the sidewalk, writes a check to himself, and forges the signature of the account holder. Is the bank liable to the true account holder if it cashes the forged check?

Special Rules for Unauthorized Indorsements Generally, when an instrument has a forged or unauthorized indorsement, the burden of loss falls on the first party to take the instrument. The reason for this general rule is that the first party to take an instrument is in the best position to prevent the loss.

Example 18.31 Jen steals a check drawn on Universal Bank that is payable to the order of Inga Leed. Jen indorses the check "Inga Leed" and presents the check to Universal Bank for payment. The bank, without asking Jen for identification, pays the check, and Jen disappears. Inga will not be liable on the check, because her indorsement was forged. The bank will bear the loss, which it might have avoided if it had asked Jen for identification.

This general rule has two important exceptions that cause the loss to fall on the maker or drawer. These exceptions arise when an indorsement is made by an imposter or by a fictitious payee.

Imposter Rule. An imposter is one who, through deception, induces a maker or drawer to issue an instrument in the name of an impersonated payee. If the maker or drawer believes the imposter to be the named payee at the time of issue, the indorsement by the imposter is not treated as unauthorized when the instrument is transferred to an innocent party. This is because the maker or drawer intended the imposter to receive the instrument. In these situations, the unauthorized indorsement of a payee's name can be as effective as if the real payee had signed. The imposter rule provides that an imposter's indorsement will be effective—that is, not a forgery—insofar as the drawer or maker is concerned [UCC 3–404(a)].

Example 18.32 Carol impersonates Donna and induces Edward to write a check payable to the order of Donna. Carol, continuing to impersonate Donna, negotiates the check to First National Bank as payment on her loan there. As the drawer of the check, Edward is liable for its amount to First National.

Fictitious Payee Rule. When a person causes an instrument to be issued to a payee who will have no interest in the instrument, the payee is referred to as a fictitious payee. A fictitious Imposter One who induces a maker or drawer to issue a negotiable instrument in the name of an impersonated payee. Indorsements by imposters are treated as authorized indorsements under UCC Article 3.

Fictitious Payee A payee on a negotiable instrument whom the maker or drawer did not intend to have an interest in the instrument. Indorsements by fictitious payees are treated as authorized indorsements under UCC Article 3.

payee can be a person or firm that does not exist, or it may be an identifiable party that will not acquire any interest in the instrument. Under the UCC's fictitious payee rule, the payee's indorsement is not treated as a forgery, and an innocent holder can hold the maker or drawer liable on the instrument [UCC 3–404(b), 3–405]. Basically, the loss falls on the maker or drawer of the instrument rather than on the third party that accepts it or on the bank that cashes it.

Fictitious payees most often arise in two situations:

1. When a dishonest employee deceives the employer into signing an instrument payable to a party with no right to receive payment on the instrument.
2. When a dishonest employee or agent has the authority to issue an instrument on behalf of the employer and issues a check to a party who has no interest in the instrument.

Case Example 18.33 Braden Furniture Company gave its bookkeeper, Bonnie Manning, general authority to create checks. Over the course of seven years, Manning created more than two hundred unauthorized checks, totaling $470,000, which she deposited in her own account at Union State Bank. Braden Furniture was not a customer of the bank. Most of the checks did not identify a payee (the payee line was left blank). Braden Furniture (the drawer) sued Union State Bank for the loss, claiming that the bank had been negligent in accepting and paying the blank checks. The court, however, held that the fictitious payee rule applied. Therefore, under Alabama's version of the UCC, the loss fell on Braden Furniture, not on Union State Bank.[13]

18–4b Warranty Liability

In addition to signature liability, transferors make certain implied warranties regarding the instruments that they are negotiating. Warranty liability arises even when a transferor does not sign the instrument [UCC 3–416, 3–417].

Warranty liability is particularly important when a holder cannot hold a party liable on a signature, such as when a person delivers a bearer instrument. Unlike secondary signature liability, warranty liability is not subject to the conditions of proper presentment, dishonor, or notice of dishonor.

Warranties fall into two categories: those that arise on the transfer of a negotiable instrument and those that arise on presentment. Both transfer and presentment warranties attempt to shift liability back to a wrongdoer or to the person who dealt face to face with the wrongdoer and thus was in the best position to prevent the wrongdoing.

What is the difference between signature liability and warranty liability?

Transfer Warranties Implied warranties made by any person who transfers an instrument for consideration that the person is entitled to enforce the instrument, the signatures are authentic, it has not been altered, there are no defenses, and the transferor is unaware of any bankruptcy proceedings of parties to the instrument.

Transfer Warranties A person who transfers an instrument for consideration makes the following five transfer warranties to all subsequent transferees and holders who take the instrument in good faith [UCC 3–416]:[14]

1. The transferor is entitled to enforce the instrument.
2. All signatures are authentic and authorized.
3. The instrument has not been altered.

13. Braden Furniture Co. v. Union State Bank, 109 So.3d 625 (Ala. 2012). See also State of Vermont v. Stewart, 176 A.3d 1120 (Vt. 2017).
14. An amendment to UCC 3–416(a) adds a sixth warranty "with respect to a remotely created consumer item," such as an electronic check drawn on a consumer account, that is not created by the payor bank and does not contain the drawer's handwritten signature. Under this amendment, which fifteen states have adopted, a bank that accepts and pays the instrument warrants to the next bank in the collection chain that the consumer authorized the item in that amount.

4. The instrument is not subject to a defense or claim of any party that can be asserted against the transferor.
5. The transferor has no knowledge of any bankruptcy proceedings of the maker, the acceptor, or the drawer of the instrument.

Presentment Warranties A person who presents an instrument for payment or acceptance makes the following presentment warranties to anyone who in good faith pays or accepts the instrument [UCC 3–417(a), 3–417(d)]:

Presentment Warranties Implied warranties made by any person who presents an instrument for payment or acceptance that the person is entitled to enforce the instrument, that the instrument has not been altered, and that the person is unaware of any unauthorized signatures.

1. The person obtaining payment or acceptance is entitled to enforce the instrument or is authorized to obtain payment or acceptance on behalf of a person who is entitled to enforce the instrument. (This is, in effect, a warranty that there are no missing or unauthorized indorsements.)
2. The instrument has not been altered.
3. The person obtaining payment or acceptance has no knowledge that the signature of the issuer of the instrument is unauthorized.[15]

The second and third presentment warranties do not apply to makers, acceptors, and drawers when the presenter is an HDC. It is assumed that drawers or makers will recognize their own signatures and that makers or acceptors will recognize whether an instrument has been materially altered.

Presentment warranties generally protect the person to whom the instrument is presented. They often have the effect of shifting liability back to the party that was in the best position to prevent the wrongdoing.

18–5 Defenses, Limitations, and Discharge

Defenses can bar collection from persons who would otherwise be primarily or secondarily liable on a negotiable instrument. There are two general categories of defenses—universal defenses and personal defenses.

18–5a Universal Defenses

A universal defense (also called a real defense) is valid against all holders, including HDCs and holders who take possession through an HDC. Universal defenses include those described next.

Universal Defense A defense that can be used to avoid payment to all holders of a negotiable instrument, including a holder in due course (HDC) or a holder with the rights of an HDC. It is also called a real defense.

1. Forgery of a signature on the instrument. A forged signature will not bind the person whose name is used. Thus, when an instrument is forged, the person whose name is forged normally has no liability to pay any holder the value of the instrument. If the person whose name is forged ratifies the signature, however, that person may be liable, as discussed earlier.
2. Fraud in the execution. If a person is deceived into signing a negotiable instrument by being told that it is something else, fraud in the execution is committed against the signer [UCC 3–305(a)(1)]. This defense cannot be raised, however, if reasonable inquiry would have revealed the nature and terms of the instrument.

   Example 18.34 Connor, a salesperson, asks Javier, a customer, to sign a paper. Connor says that it is a receipt for goods that Javier is picking up from the store. In fact, it is a promissory note, but Javier is unfamiliar with English and does not realize this. Here, even if the note is negotiated to an HDC, Javier has a valid defense against payment. (Note that the result might be different if Javier was an English speaker and could have read the words saying it was a promissory note.)

15. Amendments to Article 3 of the UCC provide additional protection for "remotely created" consumer items in the context of presentment also [see Amended UCC 3–417(a)(4)].

3. Material alteration. An alteration is material if it changes the obligations of the parties in the instrument in any way. Material alterations include completing an incomplete instrument, adding words or numbers, or making any unauthorized changes that affect the obligation of a party [UCC 3–407(a)]. Making any change in the instrument's amount, date, or rate of interest—even if the change is only 1 percent—is material. It is not a material alteration, however, to correct the maker's address or to change the figures on a check so that they agree with the written amount.

   Material alteration is a complete defense against an ordinary holder, but only a partial defense against an HDC. Thus, an ordinary holder can recover nothing on an instrument that has been materially altered. An HDC can enforce the instrument against the maker or drawer according to its original terms but not for the altered amount.
4. Discharge in bankruptcy. Discharge in bankruptcy is an absolute defense on any instrument regardless of the status of the holder, because the purpose of bankruptcy is to settle all of the insolvent party's debts [UCC 3–305(a)(1)].
5. Minority. Minority, or infancy, is a universal defense only to the extent that state law recognizes it as a defense to a simple contract [UCC 3–305(a)(1)(i)].
6. Illegality, mental incapacity, or extreme duress. When the law declares an instrument to be void because it was issued in connection with illegal conduct, illegality is a universal defense. Similarly, if a court has declared a person who signed the instrument to be mentally incompetent, the instrument is void. If a person was under an immediate threat of force or violence (extreme duress, such as being held at gunpoint), the defense is universal, and the instrument is unenforceable by any holder or HDC [UCC 3–305(a)(1)(ii)].

Personal Defense A defense that can be used to avoid payment to an ordinary holder of a negotiable instrument but not a holder in due course (HDC) or a holder with the rights of an HDC. It is also called a limited defense.

If a person makes a gift to another person by writing a note that says, "I promise to pay you $100,000," is the note enforceable? Why or why not?

18–5b Personal Defenses

A personal defense (sometimes called a limited defense) is used to avoid payment to an ordinary holder of a negotiable instrument. It is not a defense against an HDC or a holder through an HDC. Personal defenses include the following:

1. Breach of contract or breach of warranty. When there is a breach of the underlying contract for which the negotiable instrument was issued, the maker of a note can refuse to pay it, or the drawer of a check can stop payment.
2. Lack or failure of consideration. The absence of consideration may be a successful personal defense in some instances [UCC 3–303(b), 3–305(a)(2)]. Example 18.35 Tara gives Clem, as a gift, a note that states, "I promise to pay you $100,000." Clem accepts the note. Because there is no consideration for Tara's promise, a court will not enforce the promise.
3. Fraud in the inducement (ordinary fraud). A person who issues a negotiable instrument based on false statements by the other party will be able to avoid payment to an ordinary holder of that instrument.
4. Illegality, mental incapacity, or ordinary duress. If the law declares that an instrument is voidable because of illegality, mental incapacity, or ordinary duress, the defense is personal [UCC 3–305(a)(1)(ii)].

Focus Question 5

What four defenses can be used against an ordinary holder that are not effective against an HDC?

18–5c Discharge from Liability

Discharge from liability on an instrument can come from payment, cancellation, or material alteration. The liability of all parties is discharged when the party primarily liable on the instrument pays to the holder the full amount due [UCC 3–602, 3–603]. Payment by any other party (such as an indorser) discharges only the liability of that party and subsequent parties.

Intentional cancellation by the holder discharges the liability of all parties [UCC 3–604]. Intentionally writing "Paid" across the face of an instrument cancels it, as does intentionally tearing it up. If a holder intentionally crosses out a party's signature, that party's liability and the liability of subsequent indorsers who have already indorsed the instrument are discharged.

Materially altering an instrument may discharge the liability of any party affected by the alteration, as previously discussed [UCC 3–407(b)]. An HDC may be able to enforce a materially altered instrument against its maker or drawer according to the instrument's original terms, however.

Discharge of liability can also occur when a holder impairs another party's right of recourse (right to seek reimbursement) on the instrument [UCC 3–605]. This occurs when, for instance, the holder releases, or agrees not to sue, a party against whom the indorser has a right of recourse.

Practice and Review

Robert Durbin, a student, borrowed funds from a bank for his education and signed a promissory note for their repayment. The bank loaned the funds under a federal program designed to assist students at postsecondary institutions. Under this program, repayment ordinarily begins nine to twelve months after the student borrower fails to carry at least one-half of the normal full-time course load. The federal government guarantees that the note will be fully paid. If the student defaults on the payments, the lender presents the current balance—principal, interest, and costs—to the government. When the government pays the balance, it becomes the lender, and the borrower owes the government directly. After Durbin defaulted on his note, the government paid the lender the balance due and took possession of the note. Durbin then refused to pay the government, claiming that the government was not the holder of the note. The government filed a suit in a federal district court against Durbin to collect the amount due. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Was the note that Durbin signed an order to pay or a promise to pay? Explain.
2. Suppose that the note did not state a specific interest rate but instead referred to a statute that established the maximum interest rate for government-guaranteed student loans. Would the note fail to meet the requirements for negotiability in that situation? Why or why not?
3. How does a party who is not named in a negotiable instrument (in this situation, the government) obtain a right to enforce the instrument?
4. Now suppose that the school Durbin attended closed down before he could finish his education. In court, Durbin argues that this resulted in a failure of consideration: he did not get something of value in exchange for his promise to pay. Assuming that the government is a holder of the promissory note, will this argument likely be successful against it? Why or why not?

Chapter Summary: Negotiable Instruments

Formation of Negotiable Instruments

1. Types of negotiable instruments—The UCC specifies four types of negotiable instruments: drafts, checks, promissory notes, and certificates of deposit (CDs). These instruments fall into two basic classifications:
   a. Demand instruments versus time instruments—A demand instrument is payable on demand (when the holder presents it to the maker or drawer). A time instrument is payable at a future date.
   b. Orders to pay versus promises to pay—Checks and drafts are orders to pay. Promissory notes and CDs are promises to pay.
2. Requirements for negotiability—To be negotiable, an instrument must meet the following requirements.
   a. Be in writing—A writing can be on anything that is readily transferable and has a degree of permanence [UCC 3–103(a) (6), (9)].
   b. Be signed by the maker or drawer—The signature can be anyplace on the face of the instrument, can be in any form (including a rubber stamp), can consist of any name (including a trade name), and can be made in a representative capacity [UCC 3–103(a)(3), 3–401(b)].
   c. Be an unconditional promise or order to pay—
      1. A promise must be more than a mere acknowledgment of a debt [UCC 3–103(a)(6), (9)].
      2. Such words as "pay on demand" meet this criterion.
      3. Only unconditional promises or orders can be negotiable [UCC 3–106(a)].
   d. State a fixed amount of money—
      1. An amount is considered a fixed sum if it is ascertainable from the face of the instrument or (for an interest rate) readily determinable by a formula described by the instrument [UCC –104(a), 3–112(b)].
      2. Any medium of exchange recognized as the currency of a government is money [UCC 3–201(24)].
   e. Be payable on demand or at a definite time—
      1. Any instrument that is payable on sight, presentation, or issue, or that does not state any time for payment, is a demand instrument [UCC 3—104(a)(2)].
      2. An instrument is payable at a definite time if it states that it is payable on a stated date, within a fixed period after presentment, or on a date or time readily ascertainable at the time of issue [UCC 3–108(a), (b), (c)].
      3. Acceleration clauses allow a payee or other holder of a time instrument to demand payment of the entire amount due, with interest, if a certain event occurs. Extension clauses allow the date of maturity to be extended into the future [UCC 3-108(b)(iii), (iv)].

	f. Be payable to order or bearer— 1. An order instrument must identify the payee with certainty. 2. An instrument that is not payable to an identified person is payable to bearer [UCC 3–109(a)(3)]. 3. Factors that do not affect negotiability—Certain ambiguities (such as differences between words and figures) or omissions (such as when an instrument is undated) normally will not affect an instrument's negotiability.
Transfer of Instruments	1. Transfer by assignment—A transfer by assignment to an assignee gives the assignee only those rights that the assignor possessed. Any defenses against payment that can be raised against an assignor normally can be raised against the assignee. 2. Transfer by negotiation—An order instrument is negotiated by indorsement and delivery. A bearer instrument is negotiated by delivery only. 3. Indorsements— a. Blank indorsements do not specify a particular indorsee and can consist of a mere signature. b. Special indorsements contain the signature of the indorser and identify the indorsee. c. Qualified indorsements contain language, such as "without recourse," that indicates the indorser is not guaranteeing payment of the instrument. d. Restrictive indorsements, such as "For deposit only," require the indorsee to comply with certain instructions regarding the funds involved, but do not prohibit further negotiation of the instrument.
Holder in Due Course (HDC)	1. Holder—A person in possession of an instrument drawn, issued, or indorsed to that person, to that person's order, to bearer, or in blank. A holder obtains only those rights that the transferor had in the instrument. 2. Holder in due course (HDC)—A holder who, by meeting certain acquisition requirements, takes an instrument free of most defenses and claims to which the transferor was subject. 3. Requirements for HDC status—To be an HDC, a holder must take the instrument: a. For value—A holder can take an instrument for value in five ways: by performing the promise, acquiring a security interest or other lien in the instrument, taking the instrument as payment (or security) for a preexisting obligation, giving the instrument as payment, or giving an irrevocable commitment as payment [UCC 3–303]. b. In good faith—A holder can take an instrument in good faith by acting honestly and observing commercial standards of fair dealing. c. Without notice—To be an HDC, a holder must not be on notice that the instrument is defective because it is overdue, has been dishonored, is part of a series of which at least one instrument has a uncured defect, contains an unauthorized signature or has been altered, has a defense against it or a claim to it, or is so irregular or incomplete as to call its authenticity into question. 4. Shelter principle—A holder who cannot qualify as an HDC has the rights of an HDC if the holder derives title through an HDC, unless the holder engaged in fraud or illegality affecting the instrument [UCC 3–203(b)] or had notice of a claim or defense against the instrument.
Signature and Warranty Liability	Liability on negotiable instruments can arise either from a person's signature or from the warranties that are implied when a person presents the instrument for negotiation. 1. Signature liability—Every party (except a qualified indorser) who signs a negotiable instrument is either primarily (unconditionally) or secondarily liable for payment of the instrument when it comes due. a. Primary liability—Makers and acceptors are primarily liable [UCC 3–115, 3–407, 3–409, 3–412]. b. Secondary liability—Drawers and indorsers are secondarily liable [UCC 3–412, 3–414, 3–415, 3–501, 3–502, 3–503]. Parties are secondarily liable on an instrument only if presentment is proper and timely, the instrument is dishonored, and they received timely notice of dishonor.

	2. Transfer warranties—Any person who transfers an instrument for consideration makes five warranties to subsequent transferees and holders [UCC 3–416]. a. The transferor is entitled to enforce the instrument. b. All signatures are authentic and authorized. c. The instrument has not been altered. d. The instrument is not subject to a defense or claim of any party that can be asserted against the transferor. e. The transferor has no knowledge of any bankruptcy proceedings against the maker, the acceptor, or the drawer of the instrument. 3. Presentment warranties—Any person who presents an instrument for payment or acceptance makes three warranties to any person who in good faith pays or accepts the instrument [UCC 3–417(a), 3–417(d)]. a. The person is entitled to enforce the instrument or is authorized to act on behalf of a person who is so entitled. b. The instrument has not been altered. c. The person has no knowledge that the drawer's signature is unauthorized.
Defenses, Limitations, and Discharge	1. Universal (real) defenses—The following defenses are valid against all holders, including HDCs and holders with the rights of HDCs [UCC 3–305, 3–403, 3–407]: a. Forgery. b. Fraud in the execution. c. Material alteration. d. Discharge in bankruptcy. e. Minority—if the contract is voidable under state law. f. Illegality, mental incapacity, or extreme duress—if the contract is void under state law. 2. Personal (limited) defenses—The following defenses are valid against ordinary holders but not against HDCs or holders with the rights of HDCs [UCC 3–303, 3–305]: a. Breach of contract or breach of warranty. b. Lack or failure of consideration. c. Fraud in the inducement. d. Illegality, mental incapacity, or ordinary duress–if the contract is voidable. 3. Federal limitations on the rights of HDCs—Rule 433 of the Federal Trade Commission limits the rights of HDCs who purchase instruments arising out of consumer transactions. The rule allows a consumer who is a party to such a transaction to bring any defense the consumer has against the seller against a subsequent holder as well, even if the subsequent holder is an HDC. 4. Discharge from liability—All parties to a negotiable instrument will be discharged when the party primarily liable on it pays to the holder the full amount due. Discharge can also occur in other circumstances (if the instrument has been canceled or materially altered, for example) [UCC 3–602 through 3–605].

Issue Spotters

1. Sabrina owes $600 to Yale, who asks Sabrina to sign an instrument for the debt. If written on the instrument by Sabrina, which of the following would prevent its negotiability: "I.O.U. $600," "I promise to pay $600," or an instruction to the bank stating, "I wish you would pay $600 to Yale"? Why? (See Formation of Negotiable Instruments.)
2. Rye signs corporate checks for Suchin Corporation. Rye writes a check payable to U-All Company, even though Suchin does not owe U-All anything. Rye signs the check, forges U-All's indorsement, and cashes the check at Viceroy Bank, the drawee. Does Suchin have any recourse against the bank for the payment? Why or why not? (See Signature and Warranty Liability.)

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

18–1. Negotiable Instruments. Muriel Evans writes the following note on the back of an envelope: "I, Muriel Evans, promise to pay Karen Marvin or bearer $100 on demand." Is this a negotiable instrument? Discuss fully. (See Formation of Negotiable Instruments.)

18–2. Material Alteration. Williams purchased a used car from Stein for $1,000. Williams paid for the car with a check (written in pencil) payable to Stein for $1,000. Stein, through careful erasures and alterations, changed the amount on the check to read $10,000 and negotiated the check to Boz. Boz took the check for value, in good faith, and without notice of the alteration and thus met the Uniform Commercial Code's requirements for the status of a holder in due course. Can Williams successfully raise the universal (real) defense of material alteration to avoid payment on the check? Explain. (See Defenses, Limitations, and Discharge.)

18–3. Indorsements. Angela Brock borrowed $544,000 and signed a note payable to Amerifund Mortgage Services, LLC, to buy a house in Silver Spring, Maryland. The note was indorsed in blank and transferred several times "without recourse" before Brock fell behind on the payments. On behalf of Deutsche Bank National Trust Co., BAC Home Loans Servicing LP initiated foreclosure. Brock filed an action in a Maryland state court to block it, arguing that BAC could not foreclose because Deutsche Bank, not BAC, owned the note. Can BAC enforce the note? Explain. [Deutsche Bank National Trust Co. v. Brock, 63 A.3d 40 (Md. 2013)] (See Transfer of Instruments.)

18–4. Transfer by Negotiation. Thao Thi Duong signed a note in the amount of $200,000 in favor of Country Home Loans, Inc., to obtain a loan to buy a house in Marrero, Louisiana. The note was indorsed "PAY TO THE ORDER OF [blank space] WITHOUT RECOURSE COUNTRY HOME LOANS, INC." Almost five years later, Duong defaulted on the payments. The Federal National Mortgage Association (Fannie Mae) had come into possession of the note. Fannie Mae wanted to foreclose on the house and sell it to recover the balance due. Duong argued that the words "to the order of [blank space]" in the indorsement made the note an incomplete order instrument and that Fannie Mae thus could not enforce it. What is Fannie Mae's best response to this argument? [Federal National Mortgage Association v. Thao Thi Duong, 167 So.3d 920 (La.App. 5 Cir. 2015)] (See Transfer of Instruments.)

18–5. Payable to Order or to Bearer. Thomas Caraccia signed a note and mortgage in favor of VirtualBank to obtain funds to buy property in Palm Beach Gardens, Florida. VirtualBank indorsed the note in blank, making it bearer paper, and transferred possession of the note to Bank of America. Bank of America transferred the note to U.S. Bank, which later gave the note back to Bank of America to collect Caraccia's payments on behalf of U.S. Bank. When Caraccia defaulted on the payments, U.S. Bank filed a suit in a Florida state court against him, seeking to enforce the note and foreclose on the property. Caraccia contended that because the note was indorsed in blank and was not in the physical possession of U.S. Bank, the bank could not enforce it. Could the bank successfully argue that although it did not physically possess the note, it constructively possessed (exercised legal control over) it? Explain. [Caraccia v. U.S. Bank, National Association, 41 Fla.L.Weekly. D476, 185 So.3d 1277 (Dist.Ct.App. 2016)] (See Formation of Negotiable Instruments.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 18–6, go to Appendix E.

18–7. Holder in Due Course. Robert Triffin purchased a dishonored payroll check from Fair Law Financial Services (doing business as United Check Cashing) and filed a complaint against the maker seeking to collect on the check. The check was issued by Extensis Group, LLC, to Maria Pagan in the amount of $610. The face of the check clearly stated "THE FACE OF THIS DOCUMENT HAS A COLORED BACKGROUND NOT A WHITE BACKGROUND." But the check that Triffin introduced into evidence had a white background. The check also stated "THE BACK OF THIS DOCUMENT CONTAINS A UNIQUE IDENTITY BARCODE AND AN ARTIFICIAL WATERMARK—HOLD AT AN ANGLE TO VIEW," but Triffin's check did not have this barcode or watermark. Was Triffin an HDC? Why or why not? [Triffin v. Extensis Group, LLC, 2018 WL 548613 (N.J.Super.Ct.App.Div. 2018)] (See Holder in Due Course.)

18–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Unconditional Promise or Order to Pay. Carlos Pardo signed a note to obtain $627,500 to buy a house in Stamford, Connecticut. The note was secured by a mortgage. Later, Pardo signed a loan modification agreement that increased the balance due. The modification was not referenced in the note. Deutsche Bank National Trust Company came to possess the note. When Pardo defaulted on the payments, Deutsche Bank filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against him to recover the unpaid balance. Pardo maintained that the bank could not enforce the note. He argued that the bank was not a holder because the note was not a negotiable instrument—the loan modification agreement rendered it conditional. [Deutsche Bank National Trust Co. v. Pardo, 170 Conn.App. 642, 155 A.3d 764 (2017)] (See Formation of Negotiable Instruments.)

1. Was it ethical of Deutsche Bank to sue to recover the unpaid balance on Pardo's note? Explain, using the steps of the IDDR approach.
2. Is Pardo correct about the status of the note? Was it ethical to make this argument? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

18–9. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Negotiability. Peter Gowin was an employee of a granite countertop business owned by Joann Stathis. In November 2022, Gowin signed a promissory note agreeing to pay $12,500 in order to become a co-owner of the business. The note was dated January 15, 2022 (ten months before it was signed), and required him to make installment payments starting in February 2022. Stathis told Gowin not to worry about the note and never requested any payments. Gowin continued to work at the business until 2024, when he quit, claiming that he owned half of the business. Stathis argued that Gowin was not a co-owner because he had never paid the $12,500 into the business. (See Formation of Negotiable Instruments.)

1. The first group will argue in favor of Stathis that Gowin did not own any interest in the business.
2. The second group will evaluate the strength of Gowin's argument. Gowin claimed that because compliance with the stated dates was impossible, the note effectively did not state a date for its payment. It therefore was a demand note under UCC 3–108(a). Because no demand for payment had been made, Gowin's obligation to pay had not arisen, and the termination of his ownership interest was improper.
3. The third group will create a list with expanation and examples detailing under what circumstances oral statements by Stathis to Gowin can be enforced or can be used as a defense by Gowin.

19 International and Space Law

Commerce has always crossed national borders, as President Thomas Jefferson noted in the chapter-opening quotation. But technology has fueled dramatic growth in world trade and the emergence of a global business community. Because exchanges of goods, services, and intellectual property on a global level are now routine, students of business law and the legal environment should be familiar with the laws pertaining to international business transactions.

> "The merchant has no country."

> Thomas Jefferson
> 1743–1826
> (Third president of the United States, 1801–1809)

Suppose that Ryan, a popular Olympic snowboarder, starts an outdoor-wear business and begins manufacturing his own snowboarding gear. The business grows, and Ryan's factory is no longer able to keep up with the demand for his products. Ryan is considering opening a manufacturing plant in Vietnam, where labor costs are lower and there are fewer government regulations. Before he decides, he needs to understand the relevant laws. He also needs to know how the business will be taxed when his goods are imported back into the United States or shipped to other nations. This chapter introduces you to some of the legal considerations involved in doing business globally, including the emerging area of space law.

19–1 International Law

Laws affecting the international legal environment of business include both international law and national law. International law can be defined as a body of law—formed as a result of international customs, treaties, and organizations—that governs relations among or between nations. National law is the law of a particular nation, such as Brazil, Germany, Japan, or the United States.

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is the act of state doctrine? In what circumstances is this doctrine applied?
2. Why would a U.S. firm enter into a distribution agreement?
3. What does it mean for the World Trade Organization to grant "normal trade relations status"?
4. What federal law allows U.S. citizens, as well as citizens of foreign nations, to file civil actions in U.S. courts for torts that were committed overseas?
5. What treaty provides a framework for international space law?

International Law Law—based on international customs, organizations, and treaties—that governs relations among nations.

National Law Law that pertains to a particular nation.

The major difference between international law and national law is that a nation's government authorities can enforce its national law. What government, however, can enforce international law? By definition, a nation is a sovereign entity—meaning that there is no higher authority to which that nation must submit.

If a nation violates an international law and persuasive tactics fail, other countries or international organizations have no recourse except to take coercive actions. Coercive actions may include economic sanctions, severance of diplomatic relations, boycotts, and, as a last resort, war against the violating nation. Example 19.1 North Korea has repeatedly conducted tests of nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles in violation of international law. In response, the United States and the European Union (EU) have imposed numerous economic sanctions against North Korea, including an embargo on imports of oil and exports of coal.

How have the United States and other countries reacted to North Korea's lack of regard for international law when it comes to testing nuclear missiles?

In essence, international law is the result of centuries-old attempts to reconcile the need of each country to be the final authority over its own affairs with the desire of nations to benefit economically from trade and harmonious relations with one another. Sovereign nations can, and do, voluntarily agree to be governed in certain respects by international law for the purpose of facilitating international trade and commerce, as well as civilized discourse. As a result, a body of international law has evolved.

19–1a Sources of International Law

Basically, there are three sources of international law: international customs, treaties and international agreements, and international organizations.

International Customs One important source of international law consists of the customs that have evolved among nations in their relations with one another. Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice refers to an international custom as "evidence of a general practice accepted as law." The legal principles and doctrines that you will read about shortly are rooted in international customs and traditions that have evolved over time in the international arena.

Treaty A formal international agreement negotiated between two nations or among several nations.

Treaties and International Agreements Treaties and other explicit agreements between or among foreign nations provide another important source of international law. A treaty is an agreement or contract between two or more nations that must be authorized and ratified by the supreme power of each nation. Under Article II, Section 2, of the U.S. Constitution, the president has the power "by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

A bilateral agreement, as the term implies, is an agreement formed by two nations to govern their commercial exchanges or other relations with one another. A multilateral agreement is formed by several nations. For instance, regional trade associations such as the Andean Common Market (ANCOM), the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), and the European Union (EU) are the result of multilateral trade agreements.

International Organization An organization composed mainly of member nations and usually established by treaty—for instance, the United Nations. More broadly, the term also includes nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), such as the Red Cross.

International Organizations In international law, the term international organization generally refers to an organization that is composed mainly of member nations and usually established by treaty. The United States is a member of more than one hundred bilateral and multilateral organizations, including at least twenty through the United Nations.

Adopt Standards. International organizations adopt resolutions, declarations, and other types of standards that often require nations to behave in a particular manner. The General Assembly of the United Nations, for instance, has adopted numerous nonbinding resolutions and declarations that embody principles of international law. Disputes involving these resolutions and declarations may be brought before the International Court of Justice. That court, however, normally has authority to settle legal disputes only when nations voluntarily submit to its jurisdiction.

Create Uniform Rules. International organizations may also create uniform rules. The United Nations Commission on International Trade Law has made considerable progress in establishing uniformity in international law as it relates to trade. One of the commission's most significant creations to date is the 1980 Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG).

The CISG is similar to Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. It is designed to settle disputes between parties to sales contracts if the parties have not agreed otherwise in their contracts. The CISG governs only sales contracts between trading partners in nations that have ratified the CISG.

19–1b International Principles and Doctrines

Over time, a number of legal principles and doctrines have evolved and have been employed by the courts of various nations to resolve or reduce conflicts that involve a foreign element. The three important legal principles and doctrines discussed next are based primarily on courtesy and respect, and are applied in the interests of maintaining harmonious relations among nations.

The Principle of Comity Under the principle of comity, one nation will defer to and give effect to the laws and judicial decrees of another country, as long as they are consistent with the law and public policy of the accommodating nation. For instance, a U.S. court ordinarily will recognize and enforce a default judgment from an Australian court because the legal procedures in Australia are compatible with those in the United States. Nearly all nations recognize the validity of marriage decrees (at least, those between a man and a woman) issued in another country.

Comity The principle by which one nation defers to and gives effect to the laws and judicial decrees of another nation. This deference is based primarily on respect.

Case Example 19.2 MD Helicopters, Inc., based in Arizona, failed to deliver eight helicopters to the Netherlands (Dutch) National Police Services Agency. The National Police successfully sued MD for breach of contract in Dutch court proceedings. The Netherlands government, representing its police force, then brought a suit in Arizona to compel MD to pay the prescribed damages. The Netherlands based its claim on an Arizona statute that recognizes foreign-country judgments if the relevant laws of that country are "similar" to those of Arizona.

MD countered that no Netherlands law addressed the issues relating to its dispute with the National Police. Rather, only Dutch court decisions did so. A state appeals court rejected this argument, finding that a party seeking damages would follow essentially the same legal procedures in the Netherlands as in Arizona. Therefore, the court ordered MD to pay the National Police nearly $15 million, as determined by the Dutch court.[1]

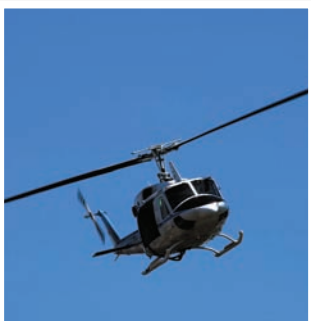

Foto 11/Shutterstock.com

Under what circumstances would an Arizona court order an Arizona helicopter company to pay damages determined by the ruling of a Dutch court?

The Act of State Doctrine The act of state doctrine provides that the judicial branch of one country will not examine the validity of public acts committed by a recognized foreign government within its own territory.

Act of State Doctrine A doctrine providing that the judicial branch of one country will not examine the validity of public acts committed by a recognized foreign government within its own territory.

Case Example 19.3 Under regulations set by the Liquor Control Board of Ontario (LCBO), Brewers Retails, Inc. (BRI), stores were the only establishments in the province of Ontario, Canada, permitted to sell units of beer larger than a six pack. BRI stores were controlled by two large beer companies, Anheuser-Busch and Molson Coors. Mountain Crest, an independent brewer based in Wisconsin, filed a suit, claiming that the six-pack rule violated U.S. anti-monopoly law.

What is the act of state doctrine? In what circumstances is this doctrine applied?

A federal appeals court held that this legal challenge to the six-pack rule was barred by the act of state doctrine. U.S. courts will not rule on the validity of regulatory decisions made by foreign governments. The court did find, however, that Mountain Crest could sue Anheuser-Busch and Molson Coors for illegally conspiring to bring about the LCBO's monopolistic policy, which clearly harmed Mountain Crest's ability to compete in the Ontario beer market.[2]

When a Foreign Government Takes Private Property. The act of state doctrine can have important consequences for individuals and firms doing business with, and investing in, other countries. This doctrine is frequently employed in situations involving expropriation or confiscation.

Expropriation A government's seizure of a privately owned business or personal property for a proper public purpose and with just compensation.

Confiscation A government's taking of a privately owned business or personal property without a proper public purpose or an award of just compensation.

Expropriation occurs when a government seizes a privately owned business or privately owned goods for a proper public purpose and awards just compensation. When a government seizes private property for an illegal purpose or without just compensation, the taking is referred to as a confiscation. The line between these two forms of taking is sometimes blurred because of differing interpretations of what is illegal and what constitutes just compensation.

Example 19.4 Flaherty, Inc., a U.S. company, owns a mine in Brazil. The government of Brazil seizes the mine for public use and claims that the profits that Flaherty realized from the mine in preceding years constitute just compensation. Flaherty disagrees, but the act of state doctrine may prevent the company's recovery in a U.S. court. Note that in a case alleging that a foreign government has wrongfully taken the plaintiff's property, the defendant government has the burden of proving that the taking was an expropriation, not a confiscation.

Doctrine May Immunize a Foreign Government's Actions. When applicable, both the act of state doctrine and the doctrine of sovereign immunity (to be discussed next) tend to shield foreign nations from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts. As a result, firms or individuals who own property overseas generally have little legal protection against government actions in the countries in which they operate.

Sovereign Immunity A doctrine that immunizes foreign nations from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts when certain conditions are satisfied.

Case Example 19.5 In 2017, a federal district court ruled that the United States had jurisdiction over an art theft claim against Germany that dated back to the Nazi regime. The plaintiffs, including Alan Philipp, were descendants of Jewish art dealers in Frankfurt who had owned the Welfenschatz collection of medieval art. The plaintiffs argued that the art dealers had been terrorized by the Nazis and forced to sell the collection in 1935 for much less than its market value. (Adolf Hitler had allegedly discussed in letters how Nazis should take action to "save the Welfenschatz.") Germany claimed that the U.S. court did not have jurisdiction, but the federal judge disagreed. The court was convinced by the plaintiffs that Germany was not entitled to sovereign immunity in this case.[3]

TOBIAS SCHWARZ/Getty Images

In the 1930s, Germany's Nazi regime forced a group of Jewish art dealers to sell a famous collection of medieval art. Years later, was Germany entitled to sovereign immunity when Jewish descendants sued to have the artworks returned?

The Doctrine of Sovereign Immunity

When certain conditions are satisfied, the doctrine of sovereign immunity immunizes foreign nations from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts. In 1976, Congress codified this rule in the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA).[4] The FSIA exclusively governs the circumstances in which an action may be brought in the United States against a foreign nation, including attempts to attach a foreign nation's property. Because the law is jurisdictional in nature, a plaintiff has the burden of showing that a defendant is not entitled to sovereign immunity.

When a Foreign State Will Not Be Immune. Section 1605 of the FSIA sets forth the major exceptions to the jurisdictional immunity of a foreign state. A foreign state is not immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts in the following situations:

1. When the foreign state has waived its immunity either explicitly or by implication.
2. When the foreign state has engaged in commercial activity within the United States or in commercial activity outside the United States that has "a direct effect in the United States."
3. When the foreign state has committed a tort in the United States or has violated certain international laws.
4. When a foreign state that has been designated "a state sponsor of terrorism" is sued under the FSIA for "personal injury or death that was caused by an act of torture" or a related act of terrorism.

The following case involved an action to attach and execute a judgment against the property of a foreign state that had been held liable for the results of acts of terrorism.

Rubin v. Islamic Republic of Iran

Supreme Court of the United States, 583 U.S. __, 138 S.Ct. 816, 200 L.Ed.2d 58 (2018).

Facts Hamas, a terrorist organization sponsored by the Islamic Republic of Iran, carried out three suicide bombings in Jerusalem, causing the deaths of five people and injuring nearly two hundred others. Jenny Rubin and other U.S. citizens who were injured or related to those injured obtained a judgment under Section 1605A of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against Iran for $71.5 million in damages.

To collect on the judgment, the plaintiffs sued Iran in a federal district court under Section 1610(g) of the FSIA. The plaintiffs sought to attach and execute against a collection of ancient art owned by Iran that was being housed at the University of Chicago. The court ruled in the defendant's favor, finding that Section 1610(g) did not deprive the art collection of the immunity typically afforded to the property of a foreign sovereign. The plaintiffs appealed. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed. The plaintiffs petitioned the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Does Section 1610(g) apply only when the property of a foreign state is exempt from immunity as provided under other subsections of the statute?

Decision Yes. The United States Supreme Court concluded that Section 1610(g) does not provide "a freestanding basis for parties holding a judgment under Section 1605A to attach and execute against the property of a foreign state." The Court affirmed the judgment of the federal appellate court.

Reason Section 1610(g) provides, "The property of a foreign state against which a judgment is entered under Section 1605A … is subject to attachment in aid of execution, and execution, upon that judgment as provided in this section." The Court read "as provided in this section" to refer to Section 1610 as a whole. Thus, Section 1610(g) is not "an independent avenue for abrogation [abolition] of immunity." The subsection governs attachment and execution against property that is exempt from immunity only as provided elsewhere in Section 1610. The holder of a judgment must identify a basis under one of its other provisions to attach and execute against relevant property. For example, Section 1610(a) provides that property used for a commercial activity in the United States is not immune from attachment and execution in seven specific circumstances. Section 1610(b), (d), (e), and (f) set out other circumstances in which certain property of a foreign state "shall not be immune."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Is the Court's interpretation of Section 1610(g) consistent with the purpose of the FSIA? Explain.
- Economic What practical lesson might be learned from the decision and result in the Rubin case? Discuss.

Exhibit 19–1 Examples of International Principles and Doctrines

The Principle of Comity	The Act of State Doctrine	The Doctrine of Sovereign Immunity
Nations will defer and give effect to the laws and judicial decrees of other nations when those laws are consistent with their own.	U.S. courts will avoid passing judgment on the validity of public acts committed by a recognized foreign government within its own territory.	Foreign nations are immune from U.S. jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act when certain circumstances are satisfied. Some major exceptions apply.
Example: A U.S. court will most likely uphold the validity of a contract created in England, because England's legal procedures are compatible with those in the United States.	Example: A U.S. gas company files a lawsuit against a Saudi Arabian petroleum company, claiming a price-fixing conspiracy. A U.S. court will dismiss the case under the act of state doctrine because Saudi Arabia controls its own natural resources.	Example: A German governmental agency engages in commercial activity in New York. If a party in New York files a lawsuit against the agency, the foreign state is not immune from U.S. jurisdiction.

Application of the Act. When courts apply the FSIA, questions frequently arise as to whether an entity is a "foreign state" and what constitutes a "commercial activity." Under Section 1603 of the FSIA, a foreign state includes both a political subdivision of a foreign state and an instrumentality of a foreign state. An instrumentality includes any department or agency of any branch of a government.

Section 1603 broadly defines a commercial activity as a regular course of commercial conduct, transaction, or act that is carried out by a foreign state within the United States. Section 1603, however, does not describe the particulars of what constitutes a commercial activity. Thus, the courts are left to decide whether a particular activity is governmental or commercial in nature. (This chapter's Business Law Analysis feature illustrates how courts decide whether an activity is commercial.) See Exhibit 19–1 for a graphic illustration of the three principles of international law discussed.

Business Law Analysis

Sovereign Immunity Claims

Taconic Plastics, Ltd., is a manufacturer incorporated in Ireland with its principal place of business in New York. Taconic enters into a contract with a German firm, Werner Voss Architects and Engineers, which is acting as an agent for the government of Saudi Arabia. The contract calls for Taconic to supply special materials for tents designed to shelter religious pilgrims visiting holy sites in Saudi Arabia. Most of the material is made in, and shipped from, New York. When the German company does not pay Taconic and files for bankruptcy, Taconic sues the government of Saudi Arabia in a U.S. court, seeking to collect $3 million. Is Saudi Arabia entitled to sovereign immunity?

Analysis: Under the doctrine of sovereign immunity, foreign nations are presumed to be immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts unless one of the exceptions in the Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act (FSIA) applies. One of the main exceptions under the FSIA is the commercial activity exception. A government undertaking qualifies as commercial activity when the government acts as a "private player" in the marketplace. Here, the German firm was acting as an agent for Saudi Arabia. The agency relationship allowed Saudi Arabia to "step into the shoes" of a private player—the German construction firm—to complete the tent project.

Result and Reasoning: Based on these facts, Saudi Arabia should not be entitled to sovereign immunity. The government of Saudi Arabia was acting as a private company through its German agent to contract with Taconic in the United States. Also, substantial parts of the contract were performed in the United States because the materials for the tents were made in New York and shipped to Germany. Thus, the U.S. courts should have jurisdiction over this claim against Saudi Arabia.

19–2 Doing Business Internationally

A U.S. domestic firm can engage in international business transactions in a number of ways. The simplest way is for U.S. firms to export their goods and services to markets abroad. Alternatively, a U.S. firm can establish foreign production facilities so as to be closer to the foreign market or markets in which its products are sold.

Export The sale of goods and services by domestic firms to buyers located in other countries.

Ethical Issue

Is it ethical (and legal) to brew "imported" beer brands domestically? One-quarter of the beer sold in the United States is imported. Imported beer typically costs more than domestic beer, but the people who buy and drink it believe that its superior taste justifies the higher price. Many consumers are unaware that beers marketed as imported are often made in the United States. For instance, people think of Beck's beer as German, but for a number of years, Beck's has been brewed in St. Louis, Missouri. Foster's beer ads feature Australian countryside scenes, yet Foster's is brewed in Fort Worth, Texas. Killian's Irish Red is brewed in Colorado, not in Ireland. The Japanese beer Sapporo sold in the United States is actually brewed in Canada.

A number of lawsuits have been filed against the owners of imported beer brands made in the United States for misleading country-of-origin labels. One such suit was filed against Anheuser-Busch Companies, LLC, for mislabeling the origin of Beck's beer. The plaintiffs argued that labels, such as "brewed under the German Purity Law" and "originated in Bremen, German," were misleading because the beer was brewed in the United States. The defendants pointed out that each beer bottle stated that it was a "Product of U.S.A." The case was ultimately settled out of court, and the company gave purchasers a right to apply for up to $50 in refunds.[5] Another case was filed in New York against Sapporo U.S.A., Inc., for misleading labels. A federal district court dismissed that action, however, because the beer label clearly stated it was "Brewed and canned [or bottled] by Sapporo Brewing Company, Guelph, Ontario, Canada."[6]

19–2a Exporting

Exporting can take two forms: direct and indirect. In direct exporting, a U.S. company signs a sales contract with a foreign purchaser that provides for the conditions of shipment and payment for the goods. If sufficient business develops in a foreign country, a U.S. company may set up a specialized marketing organization in that country. This is called indirect exporting and may be accomplished through the use of an agency relationship or a distributorship.

Agency Relationships When a U.S. firm prefers to limit its involvement in an international market, it will typically establish an agency relationship with a foreign firm. The foreign firm then acts as the U.S. firm's agent and can enter into contracts in the foreign location on behalf of the principal (the U.S. company).

Distributorships When a foreign country represents a substantial market, a U.S. firm may wish to appoint a distributor located in that country. The U.S. firm and the distributor enter into a distribution agreement. This is a contract setting out the terms and conditions of the distributorship, such as price, currency of payment, guarantee of supply availability, and method of payment. Disputes concerning distribution agreements may involve jurisdictional or other issues, as well as contract law.

Distribution Agreement
A contract between a seller and a distributor of the seller's products setting out the terms and conditions of the distributorship.

19–2b Manufacturing Abroad

An alternative to direct or indirect exporting is the establishment of foreign manufacturing facilities. The advantages of manufacturing abroad may include lower costs, fewer government regulations, and lower taxes and trade barriers.

Typically, U.S. firms establish manufacturing plants abroad if they believe that doing so will reduce their costs—particularly for labor, shipping, and raw materials. Lower costs will enable the firms to compete more effectively in foreign markets. Japanese manufacturers, such as Canon, Hitachi, and Toyota, have established U.S. plants to avoid import duties that the U.S. Congress may impose on Japanese products entering this country.

Why would a U.S. firm enter into a distribution agreement?

A domestic firm may engage in manufacturing abroad by licensing its technology to an existing foreign company. Alternatively, it may establish overseas subsidiaries or participate in joint ventures.

Licensing A U.S. firm may license a foreign manufacturing company to use its copyrighted, patented, or trademarked intellectual property or trade secrets. A licensing agreement with a foreign-based firm is much the same as any other licensing agreement. Its terms require a payment of royalties on some basis—such as so many cents per unit produced or a certain percentage of profits from units sold in a particular geographic territory. Example 19.6 The Coca-Cola Bottling Company licenses firms worldwide to use (and keep confidential) its secret formula for the syrup used in its soft drink. In return, the foreign firms licensed to make the syrup pay Coca-Cola a percentage of the income earned from the sale of the soft drink.

The firm that receives the license can take advantage of an established reputation for quality. The firm that grants the license receives income from the foreign sales of its products and also establishes a global reputation. Once a firm's trademark is known worldwide, the demand for other products manufactured or sold by that firm may increase. Franchising is a well-known form of licensing.

Subsidiaries A U.S. firm can also expand into a foreign market by establishing a wholly owned subsidiary firm in a foreign country. When a wholly owned subsidiary is established, the parent company, which remains in the United States, retains complete ownership of all the facilities in the foreign country, as well as complete authority and control over all phases of the operation.

Joint Ventures A joint venture provides another method that a U.S. firm can use to expand into international markets. In a joint venture, the U.S. company owns only part of the operation. The rest is owned either by local owners in the foreign country or by another foreign entity. All of the firms involved in a joint venture share responsibilities, as well as profits and liabilities.

19–2c International Dispute Resolution

International contracts frequently include arbitration clauses. By means of such clauses, the parties agree in advance to be bound by the decision of a specified third party in the event of a dispute.

The New York Convention The United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards (often referred to as the New York Convention) assists in the enforcement of arbitration clauses, as do provisions in specific treaties among nations. The New York Convention has 164 parties, including the United States. Over two dozen parties have ratified this treaty.

Under the New York Convention, a U.S. court will compel the parties to arbitrate their dispute if all of the following are true:

1. There is a written (or electronically recorded) agreement to arbitrate the matter.
2. The agreement provides for arbitration in a convention signatory nation.
3. The agreement arises out of a commercial legal relationship.
4. One party to the agreement is not a U.S. citizen. In other words, both parties cannot be U.S. citizens.

Spotlight Case Example 19.7 Juridica Investments, Ltd. (JIL), entered into a financing contract with S&T Oil Equipment & Machinery, Ltd., a U.S. company. The contract was signed and performed in Guernsey, which is a British Crown dependency located in the English Channel. The contract included an arbitration clause. When a dispute arose between the parties, JIL initiated arbitration in Guernsey, and S&T filed a suit in a U.S. court. JIL filed a motion to dismiss in favor of arbitration, which the court granted. S&T appealed.

A federal appellate court affirmed and compelled arbitration under the New York Convention. The court explained that all of the necessary requirements for compelling arbitration had been met.[7]

Effect of Choice-of-Law and Forum-Selection Clauses If an international contract does not include an arbitration clause, litigation may occur. When the contract contains forum-selection and choice-of-law clauses, the lawsuit will be heard by a court in the specified forum and decided according to that forum's law.

As you may recall, a forum-selection clause indicates what court, jurisdiction, or tribunal will decide any disputes arising under the contract. A choice-of-law clause designates the applicable law. Both are useful additions to international contracts.

Forum-Selection Clause
A provision in a contract designating the court, jurisdiction, or tribunal that will decide any disputes arising under the contract.

Choice-of-Law Clause A clause in a contract designating the law (such as the law of a particular state or nation) that will govern the contract.

How did the New York Convention affect S&T Oil's contract with an investment company?

19–3 Regulation of Specific Business Activities

Doing business abroad can affect the economies, foreign policies, domestic policies, and other national interests of the countries involved. For this reason, nations impose laws to restrict or facilitate international business. Controls may also be imposed by international agreements. Here, we discuss how different types of international activities are regulated.

19–3a Investment Protections

Firms that invest in foreign nations face the risk that the foreign government may take possession of the investment property. Expropriation, as already mentioned, occurs when property is taken and the owner is paid just compensation. Expropriation generally does not violate observed principles of international law.

Confiscation occurs when property is taken without compensation (or without adequate compensation). Unlike expropriation, confiscation normally violates international law. Few remedies are available for confiscation of property by a foreign government, however. Claims are often resolved by lump-sum settlements after negotiations between the United States and the taking nation.

Because the possibility of confiscation may deter potential investors, many countries guarantee that foreign investors will be compensated if their property is taken. A guaranty can take the form of statutory laws or provisions in international treaties. As further protection for foreign investments, some countries provide insurance for their citizens' investments abroad.

19–3b Export Controls

The U.S. Constitution provides in Article I, Section 9, that "No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State." Thus, Congress cannot impose export taxes. Congress can, however, use a variety of other methods to restrict or encourage exports, including the following:

Know This
Countries restrict exports for several reasons, including to protect national security, to further foreign policy objectives, and to conserve resources (or raise their prices).

1. Export quotas. Congress sets export quotas on various items, such as grain being sold abroad.
2. Restrictions on technology exports. Under the Export Administration Act,[8] the flow of technologically advanced products and technical data can be restricted.
3. Incentives and subsidies. Incentives and subsidies are used to stimulate some exports and thereby aid domestic businesses. Example 19.8 The Export Trading Company Act[9] encouraged U.S. banks to invest in export trading companies, which are formed when exporting firms join together to export a line of goods. The Export-Import Bank of the United States has provided financial assistance, primarily in the form of credit guaranties given to commercial banks that, in turn, lend funds to U.S. exporting companies. ■

19–3c Import Controls

Import restrictions include strict prohibitions, quotas, and tariffs. Under the Trading with the Enemy Act,[10] for instance, no goods may be imported from nations that have been designated enemies of the United States. Other laws prohibit the importation of illegal drugs and agricultural products that pose dangers to domestic crops or animals. The import of goods that infringe U.S. patents is also prohibited. The International Trade Commission investigates allegations that imported goods infringe U.S. patents. The commission imposes penalties if necessary.

Quota A set limit on the amount of goods that can be imported.

Quotas A limit on the amount of goods that can be imported is known as a quota. At one time, the United States had legal quotas on the number of automobiles that could be imported from Japan. Today, Japan "voluntarily" restricts the number of automobiles exported to the United States. (But Japanese automakers build most cars sold in the United States in U.S. factories.)

Tariffs A tax on imports is called a tariff. A tariff usually is a percentage of the value of the import, but it can be a flat rate per unit (per barrel of oil, for example). Tariffs raise the prices of imported goods. The effect is to cause some consumers to purchase more domestically manufactured goods.

Tariff A tax on imported goods.

Antidumping Duties The United States has specific laws directed at what it sees as unfair international trade practices. Dumping, for instance, is the sale of imported goods at "less than fair value." Fair value is usually based on the price of those goods in the exporting country. Foreign firms that engage in dumping in the United States hope to undersell U.S. businesses to obtain a larger share of the U.S. market. To prevent this, an extra tariff—known as an antidumping duty—may be assessed on the imports. The duty may be retroactive to cover past dumping.

Dumping The sale of goods in a foreign country at a price below the price charged for the same goods in the domestic market.

Two U.S. government agencies are instrumental in imposing antidumping duties: the International Trade Commission (ITC) and the International Trade Administration (ITA). The ITC assesses the effects of dumping on domestic businesses and then makes recommendations to the president concerning temporary import restrictions. The ITA, which is part of the Department of Commerce, decides whether imports were sold at less than fair value. The ITA's determination establishes the amount of antidumping duties, which equals the difference between the price charged in the United States and the price charged in the exporting country.

In the following case, a Chinese producer and importer challenged the ITC's determination that the import of their products into the United States materially injured the domestic industry.

Changzhou Trina Solar Energy Co. v. International Trade Commission

United States Court of Appeals, Federal Circuit, 879 F.3d 1377 (2018).

Facts Changzhou Trina Solar Energy Company, a Chinese firm, makes crystalline silicon photovoltaic (CSPV) cells and related products. Trina Solar (U.S.), Inc., imported Changzhou's CSPV products into the United States. The U.S. Department of Commerce found that the imports were subsidized by the Chinese government and sold in the United States at less than fair value. The International Trade Commission (ITC) determined that the domestic CSPV industry was materially injured by the imports from China. Changzhou and Trina challenged this determination in the U.S. Court of International Trade. The court rejected the challenge and sustained the ITC's determination. Changzhou and Trina appealed this decision to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit.

Issue Was the domestic CSPV industry materially injured by the subsidized, imported products from China?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed the decision of the lower court. The ITC's explanation of how it determined that the imported products unfairly impacted the domestic industry provided substantial evidence to support imposition of antidumping duties.

Reason The ITC studied the different sources of power in the domestic market—their supply, demand, prices, consumption, and market shares. The ITC considered the domestic CSPV industry's business cycles and financial performance, and the impact of local, state, and federal government incentives and regulations. The ITC reviewed a "variety of evidence" and recognized that other factors "may have" contributed to the decline in domestic prices for CSPV products. But the ITC concluded that the effect of the "unfairly priced and subsidized subject imports" on the domestic industry was "more than inconsequential, immaterial, or unimportant." The imports caused a significant drop in domestic prices for the products, leading U.S. producers to lose revenue. As the imports competed directly with the domestic products and undersold them "at significant margins," the U.S. producers lost market share.

Critical Thinking

- Economic How does the Changzhou case illustrate that dumping is an unfair international trade practice? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the ITC had not issued detailed findings supported by a variety of evidence, but had only released a statement that the subject imports seemed to have a negative effect on the domestic industry. Would the result have been different? Explain.

19–3d Minimizing Trade Barriers

Restrictions on imports are also known as trade barriers. The elimination of trade barriers is sometimes seen as essential to the world's economic well-being. Various regional trade agreements and associations work to reduce trade barriers among nations.

Focus Question 3

What does it mean for the World Trade Organization to grant a nation "normal trade relations status"?

The World Trade Organization Most of the world's leading trading nations are members of the World Trade Organization (WTO), which was established in 1995. To minimize trade barriers among nations, each member country is required to grant normal trade relations (NTR) status to other member countries. This means that each member must treat other members at least as well as it treats the country that receives its most favorable treatment with regard to imports or exports.

Normal Trade Relations (NTR) Status A legal trade status granted to member countries of the World Trade Organization. Each member must treat other members at least as well as it treats the country that receives its most favorable treatment with regard to imports or exports.

The European Union (EU) The European Union (EU) arose out the 1957 Treaty of Rome, which created the Common Market, a free trade zone comprising the nations of Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and West Germany. Today, the EU is a single integrated trading unit made up of twenty-seven European nations.

The EU has gone a long way toward creating a new body of law to govern all of the member nations. The EU's council and commission issue regulations, or directives, that define EU law in various areas, such as environmental law, product liability, anticompetitive practices, and corporations. The directives normally are binding on all member countries. Nevertheless, some of the EU's efforts to create uniform laws have been confounded by nationalism. An example is Brexit, which refers to Britain's decision to withdraw from the EU.

The United States–Mexico–Canada Agreement (USMCA) Replacing the North American Free Trade Agreement, the United States–Mexico–Canada Agreement (USMCA) created a regional trading unit consisting of Mexico, Canada, and the United States. The goal of USMCA is to reduce tariffs among these three countries on substantially all goods and to make trade between the three countries as equitable as possible.

USMCA gives the three countries a competitive advantage by retaining tariffs on goods imported from countries outside the USMCA trading unit. Additionally, USMCA requires that 75 percent of automobile components must be manufactured in one of the three countries to qualify for zero tariffs and that 40 to 45 percent of automobile parts must be made by workers who earn at least $16 an hour. The agreement also gives U.S. farmers more access to Canada's dairy market, as well as providing for the free movement of digital products such as music and eBooks between the signatories.

The Central America–Dominican Republic–United States Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA-DR) The Central America–Dominican Republic–United States Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA-DR) was formed by Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and the United States. Its purpose is to reduce tariffs and improve market access among all of the signatory nations. Legislatures in all seven countries have approved the CAFTA-DR, despite significant opposition in certain nations.

The Republic of Korea–United States Free Trade Agreement (KORUS FTA) The United States ratified its first free trade agreement with South Korea in 2011. This agreement, called the Republic of Korea–United States Free Trade Agreement (KORUS FTA), is aimed at eliminating 95 percent of each nation's tariffs on industrial and consumer exports. KORUS was expected to boost U.S. exports and benefit U.S. automakers, farmers, ranchers, and manufacturers. To date, however, exports have not increased as much as predicted, and the agreement is likely to be renegotiated.

19–4 U.S. Laws in a Global Context

The internationalization of business raises questions about the extraterritorial application of a nation's laws—that is, the effect of the country's laws outside its boundaries. To what extent do U.S. domestic laws apply to other nations' businesses? To what extent do U.S. domestic laws apply to U.S. firms doing business abroad? Here, we discuss the extraterritorial application of certain U.S. laws, including antitrust laws, tort laws, and laws prohibiting employment discrimination.

19–4a U.S. Antitrust Laws

U.S. antitrust laws have a wide application. They may subject firms in foreign nations to their provisions, as well as protect foreign consumers and competitors from violations committed by U.S. citizens. Section 1 of the Sherman Act—the most important U.S. antitrust law—provides for the extraterritorial effect of the U.S. antitrust laws.

Any conspiracy that has a substantial effect on U.S. commerce is within the reach of the Sherman Act. The law applies even if the violation occurs outside the United States, and foreign governments as well as businesses can be sued for violations.

Example 19.9 A Tokyo-based auto parts supplier, Furukawa Electric Company, and its executives conspired with competitors in an international price-fixing agreement (an agreement to set prices) that lasted more than ten years. As a result of the conspiracy, automobile manufacturers paid noncompetitive and higher prices for parts in cars sold to U.S. consumers.

Because the conspiracy had a substantial effect on U.S. commerce, the United States had jurisdiction to prosecute the case. Ultimately, Furukawa agreed to plead guilty and pay a $200 million fine. The Furukawa executives from Japan also agreed to serve up to eighteen months in a U.S. prison and to cooperate fully with the ongoing investigation. ■

19–4b International Tort Claims

The international application of tort liability has grown in significance and controversy. An increasing number of U.S. plaintiffs have sued foreign (or U.S.) entities for torts that these entities allegedly committed overseas. Often, these cases involve human rights violations by foreign governments. The Alien Tort Statute (ATS),[11] adopted in 1789, allows even foreign citizens to bring civil suits in U.S. courts for injuries caused by violations of international law or a treaty of the United States.

Since 1980, plaintiffs increasingly used the ATS to bring actions against private companies operating in foreign nations, including Colombia, Egypt, Nigeria, and Saudi Arabia. Critics argued that allowing such suits extended the application of the ATS too far. In 2018, the United States Supreme Court limited the application of the ATS when it ruled that foreign corporations could no longer be defendants in suits brought under the ATS.[12]

In the following Spotlight Case, the United States Supreme Court considered the parameters of the ATS. The question was whether the statute allows U.S. courts to exercise jurisdiction over a cause of action that occurred outside the United States.

Focus Question 4

What federal law allows U.S. citizens, as well as citizens of foreign nations, to file civil actions in U.S. courts for torts that were committed overseas?

Spotlight on International Torts: Case 19.3

Daimler AG v. Bauman

United States Supreme Court, 571 U.S.117, 134 S.Ct. 746, 187 L.Ed.2d 624 (2014).

Facts Barbara Bauman and twenty-one other residents of Argentina filed a suit in a federal district court in California against Daimler AG,[a] a German company. They alleged that Mercedes-Benz (MB) Argentina, a subsidiary of Daimler, had collaborated with state security forces to kidnap, detain, torture, and kill certain MB Argentina workers during Argentina's "dirty war." These workers included the plaintiffs and some of their relatives. Their claims were asserted under the Alien Tort Statute.

Can victims of Argentina's "dirty war" sue a German company in a U.S. court?

Personal jurisdiction was based on the California contacts of Mercedes-Benz USA (MBUSA), a Daimler subsidiary incorporated in Delaware with its principal place of business in New Jersey. MBUSA distributes Daimler-made vehicles to dealerships throughout the United States, including California. The district court dismissed the suit for lack of jurisdiction. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed this ruling. Daimler appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Is there a limit to the authority of a U.S. court to decide a case brought by foreign plaintiffs against a foreign defendant based on events occurring entirely outside of the United States?

Decision Yes. The United States Supreme Court reversed the decision of the appellate court. The federal district court could not exercise jurisdiction over Daimler given the absence of any California connection to the atrocities, perpetrators, or victims described in the complaint.

Reason The Court explained that only a limited set of connections to a state render a defendant subject to jurisdiction there. For a corporation, the "paradigm forum" for the exercise of jurisdiction is the state in which the corporation is "fairly regarded as at home." A corporation may be regarded as at home in the state in which it incorporated and the state in which it has its principal place of business. Both places are unique and easily located. These bases give plaintiffs at least "one clear and certain forum" in which to sue a corporate defendant.

This does not mean that a corporation is subject to jurisdiction only in its state of incorporation or principal place of business. In this case, however, the plaintiffs argued for the exercise of jurisdiction in every state in which a corporation engages in "continuous and systematic" business. That argument went too far, according to the Court. Instead, the appropriate question is whether a corporation's connections with a state are so continuous and systematic as to render it at home there. Here, neither Daimler nor MBUSA was incorporated in California, and neither had its principal place of business there.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment What are the consequences for Daimler of the decision in this case?

19–4c Antidiscrimination Laws

As you probably know, federal laws in the United States prohibit discrimination on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, sexual orientation, gender, age, and disability. These laws, as they affect employment relationships, generally apply extraterritorially.

Thus, U.S. employees working abroad for U.S. employers are protected under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. Similarly, the Americans with Disabilities Act, which requires employers to accommodate the needs of workers with disabilities, applies to U.S. nationals working abroad for U.S. firms.

In addition, the major law regulating employment discrimination—Title VII of the Civil Rights Act—applies extraterritorially to all U.S. employees working for U.S. employers abroad. U.S. employers must abide by U.S. discrimination laws unless to do so would violate

19–5 Space Law

Space law consists of the international and national laws that govern activities in outer space. For the first fifty years of space exploration, national governments conducted most of those activities. Thus, space law was directed primarily at governments and government activities. More recently, private companies have undertaken some space-related activities and broadened access to outer space for the rest of us. Space law, accordingly, faces new challenges.

Space Law Law consisting of the international and national laws that govern activities in outer space.

19–5a International Space Law

International space law consists of international treaties—primarily negotiated by the United Nations (U.N.)—and U.N. resolutions. These sources recognize fundamentally that activities conducted in outer space and the benefits derived from those activities should improve the welfare of all nations and all humanity.

The major space law treaties were concluded by the U.N. Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space (COPUOS). COPUOS also administers the treaties and advises the international community on space policy matters.

Exploration and Exploitation The foundation of international space law is the U.N. Treaty on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, including the Moon and Other Celestial Bodies.[13] This treaty—generally referred to as the Outer Space Treaty—established the framework for later international agreements and U.N. resolutions.

What treaty provides a framework for international space law?

The Outer Space Treaty expresses general principles that have been expanded and applied in subsequent treaties. In Article I and Article II, outer space is declared to be free for exploration and use by all nations. The moon, the planets, asteroids, and other celestial bodies are not subject to appropriation by any single nation.[14] In addition, space objects are to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes. No weapons of mass destruction are permitted in outer space under Article IV.[15]

According to Article VI, each nation is responsible for its activities in outer space, whether they are conducted by the government or by a private entity. In fact, the activities of private entities require authorization and supervision by a government. Article VII imposes on each nation liability for damage caused by its space objects. Article VIII provides that each nation retains jurisdiction and control over its space objects and the personnel on them. Finally, Article IX requires that space exploration be conducted so as to avoid "harmful contamination."[16]

Astronauts and Space Objects The Outer Space Treaty was followed by several other agreements, including the following:

- The Agreement on the Rescue of Astronauts, the Return of Astronauts and the Return of Objects Launched into Outer Space (the Rescue Agreement).[17]

- The Convention on International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects (the Liability Convention).[18]
- The Convention on Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space (the Registration Convention).[19]

The Rescue Agreement expands on Articles V and VIII of the Outer Space Treaty. It provides that each nation will undertake to rescue and assist astronauts in distress and return them to their "launching State." All nations are to assist in recovering space objects that return to earth outside the territory of the launching state.

The Liability Convention elaborates on Article VII of the Outer Space Treaty. This agreement provides that a launching state is absolutely liable for personal injury and property damage caused by its space objects on the surface of the earth or to aircraft in flight. Liability for injury or damage in space is subject to a determination of fault. The convention also prescribes procedures for the settlement of claims for damages.

The Registration Convention provides for the mandatory registration of objects launched into outer space. Each launching state is to maintain a registry of the objects that it launches into space. The intent is to assist in the objects' identification. (See this chapter's Cybersecurity and the Law feature for insights into a problem that was given little consideration at the time of these international agreements.).

Safe Satellites

At the start of the 2020s, about 5,000 human-made satellites orbited the Earth. By the end of the decade, a single aerospace manufacturer—Space X—plans to have launched up to 42,000 satellites. Other companies, including Amazon, Facebook, and OneWeb, have similar plans.

The potential benefits of this vast array include high-speed 5G Internet access to every corner of the planet, improved global navigation systems, and an enhanced ability to monitor meteorological conditions. But space traffic poses potential problems as well, such as high-speed collisions, dead satellites that threaten other spacecraft, and disruption of the work of astronomers. To no one's surprise, the specter of hacking also looms large in the satellite industry's future.

Hacking in Space

According to computer security experts, satellites are particularly susceptible to being hacked. Until recently, satellite engineers have not emphasized cybersecurity in their design and construction plans. To reduce costs, satellite builders often employ less expensive computer components using open-source technology, giving hackers numerous vulnerabilities to exploit. Additionally, a high proportion of satellites already in orbit were launched many years ago, before cybersecurity was a concern. Illegally controlling these defenseless satellites might be as easy as setting up a ground antenna and waiting for one to pass overhead.

Hackers could, for instance, shut down a targeted satellite. Or they could jam the satellite's signals, wreaking havoc on communications and other critical infrastructure systems. Steerable satellites could be hijacked to "attack" other objects, in space or closer to the Earth. Currently, no governmental body in the United States has created cybersecurity guidelines for satellite operations. In this vacuum, it is not clear who would be legally responsible for a security breach in a satellite, nor is there sufficient relevant case law to help American courts determine civil liability for any harm done by a hacked, rogue satellite.

Why is international law better suited for satellite regulation than national law?

Space Debris More than 13,000 human-made items larger than four inches are in orbit around the earth. Most of these objects are no longer under any party's control and are classified as space debris. In 2009, two orbiting satellites collided for the first time. Fragments generated by such collisions are expected to be a significant source of space debris in the future. As noted previously, the Liability Convention sets out principles of liability to apply in instances of injury or damage in space.

The United Nations has endorsed guidelines to reduce space debris.[20] The guidelines, which reflect the current practices of a number of national and international organizations, apply to the planning, design, manufacture, and operational phases of spacecraft. Among other points, the guidelines suggest that systems should be designed not to release debris during normal operations. They also recognize that some objects no longer in operation should be removed from orbit, if this can be accomplished in a controlled manner.

19–5b U.S. Space Law

In the United States, each government agency that operates or authorizes spacecraft is responsible for complying with U.S. law and international treaties. Federal law, state law, and more than half a century of common practices in space-related industries also affect government and private space activities.

Commercial Spaceflight The Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) regulates private spaceports, as well as the launch and reentry of private spacecraft, under the Commercial Space Launch Act.[21] The FAA is working to establish licensing and safety criteria for private spacecraft. Some states, including Florida, New Mexico, Texas, and Virginia, limit the liability of space tourism providers under state tort law. But state legislatures and, ultimately, courts will need to consider other issues in this context, including insurance requirements and the enforceability of liability waivers.

In addition, Congress has passed legislation aimed at encouraging commercial spaceflight companies. The U.S. Commercial Space Launch Competitiveness Act[22] streamlines regulatory processes and promotes safety standards. In addition, the law provides that if a U.S. citizen or company retrieves minerals or other resources from an asteroid or other space location, that person or company owns them.

Exports of Space Technology Currently, under U.S. regulations, all spacecraft are classified as "defense articles." The defense classification restricts the transfer of space technology and related information to any foreign person or nation under the U.S. Department of State's International Traffic in Arms Regulations.[23] This restriction makes it difficult for U.S. space companies to compete in global space markets.

Property Rights to Space Resources Article II of the Outer Space Treaty bans the national appropriation of territory in space. If the United States cannot appropriate territory in space, then it cannot give U.S. citizens title to property associated with this territory. Under U.S. law, the government must have sovereignty over territory before it can confer title to associated property to its citizens.

Article VIII, however, provides that a state party to the treaty retains jurisdiction over objects on its space registry that are launched into space. In addition, Article IX prohibits interference with space activities. In effect, these provisions confer the protections associated with property rights on private space activities.

The U.S. Commercial Space Launch Competitiveness Act changed the law somewhat by granting private citizens property rights over asteroid resources that they obtain from space. The act specifically recognizes that the United States is not attempting to assert an exclusive right to or sovereignty over any celestial body.

Robco, Inc., was a Florida arms dealer. The armed forces of Honduras contracted to purchase weapons from Robco over a six-year period. After the government was replaced and a democracy installed, the Honduran government sought to reduce the size of its military, and its relationship with Robco deteriorated.

Honduras refused to honor the contract by purchasing the inventory of arms, which Robco could sell only at a much lower price. Robco filed a suit in a federal district court in the United States to recover damages for this breach of contract by the government of Honduras. Using the information provided in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Should the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act preclude this lawsuit? Why or why not?
2. Does the act of state doctrine bar Robco from seeking to enforce the contract? Explain.
3. Suppose that before Robco filed its lawsuit, the new government of Honduras enacted a law making it illegal to purchase weapons from foreign arms dealers. What doctrine might lead a U.S. court to dismiss Robco's case in that situation?
4. Now suppose that the U.S. court hears the case and awards damages to Robco, but the government of Honduras has no assets in the United States that can be used to satisfy the judgment. Under which doctrine might Robco be able to collect the damages by asking another nation's court to enforce the U.S. judgment?

The U.S. federal courts are accepting too many lawsuits initiated by foreigners that concern matters not relevant to this country.

Chapter Summary: International and Space Law

International Law	1. Principle of comity—Under this principle, nations give effect to the laws and judicial decrees of other nations, as long as they are consistent with the law and public policy of the accommodating nation. It is based primarily on respect. 2. Act of state doctrine—Under this doctrine, U.S. courts avoid passing judgment on the validity of public acts committed by a recognized foreign government within its own territory. 3. Doctrine of sovereign immunity—When certain conditions are satisfied, foreign nations are immune from U.S. jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. Exceptions are made when a foreign state (a) has waived its immunity either explicitly or by implication, (b) has engaged in commercial activity within the United States or that has a direct effect on the United States, (c) has committed a tort within the United States, or (d) has been designated "a state sponsor of terrorism" and is sued for "personal injury or death" caused by an act of terrorism.
Doing Business Internationally	U.S. domestic firms may engage in international business transactions in several ways, including (1) exporting, which may involve foreign agents or distributors, and (2) manufacturing abroad through licensing arrangements, wholly owned subsidiaries, or joint ventures. International business contracts often include arbitration clauses and forum-selection clauses to reduce the uncertainties associated with dispute resolution. The New York Convention assists in the enforcement of arbitration clauses and requires signatory nations to honor private agreements to arbitrate. If the parties have signed a forum-selection clause, the dispute will be tried (or arbitrated) in the specified forum.
Regulation of Specific Business Activities	In the interests of their economies, foreign policies, domestic policies, and other national priorities, nations impose laws that restrict or facilitate international business. Such laws regulate foreign investments, exporting, and importing. Various regional trade agreements and associations, including the World Trade Organization and the European Union, attempt to minimize trade barriers among nations.
U.S. Laws in a Global Context	1. Antitrust laws—U.S. antitrust laws may be applied beyond the borders of the United States. Any conspiracy that has a substantial effect on commerce within the United States may be subject to the Sherman Act, even if the violation occurs outside the United States. 2. International tort claims—U.S. tort laws may be applied to wrongful acts that take place in foreign jurisdictions under the Alien Tort Statute. This act allows even foreign citizens to bring civil suits in U.S. courts for injuries caused by violations of international law or a treaty of the United States. 3. Antidiscrimination laws—The major U.S. laws prohibiting employment discrimination, including Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, and the Americans with Disabilities Act, cover U.S. employees working abroad for U.S. firms—unless to apply the U.S. laws would violate the laws of the host country.
Space Law	Space law consists of international and national laws that govern activities in outer space. International treaties and resolutions (mostly through the United Nations) cover space exploration and exploitation, astronauts, space objects, and space debris. National laws in the United States deal with commercial space flights (regulated by the Federal Aviation Administration), space technology, and property rights.

1. Café Rojo, Ltd., an Ecuadoran firm, agrees to sell coffee beans to Dark Roast Coffee Company, a U.S. firm. Dark Roast accepts the beans but refuses to pay. Café Rojo sues Dark Roast in an Ecuadoran court and is awarded damages, but Dark Roast's assets are in the United States. Under what circumstances would a U.S. court enforce the judgment of the Ecuadoran court? (See International Law.)
2. Gems International, Ltd., is a foreign firm that has a 12 percent share of the U.S. market for diamonds. To capture a larger share, Gems offers its products at a below-cost discount to U.S. buyers (and inflates the prices in its own country to make up the difference). How can this attempt to undersell U.S. businesses be defeated? (See Regulation of Specific Business Activities.)

19–1. Doing Business Internationally. Macrotech, Inc., develops an innovative computer chip and obtains a patent on it. The firm markets the chip under the trademarked brand name "Flash." Macrotech wants to sell the chip to Nitron, Ltd., in Pacifica, a foreign country. Macrotech is concerned, however, that after an initial purchase Nitron will duplicate the chip, pirate it, and sell the pirated version to computer manufacturers in Pacifica. To avoid this possibility, Macrotech could establish its own manufacturing facility in Pacifica, but it does not want to do this. How can Macrotech, without establishing a manufacturing facility in Pacifica, protect Flash from being pirated by Nitron? (See Doing Business Internationally.)

19–2. Dumping. U.S. pineapple producers alleged that producers of canned pineapple from the Philippines were selling their canned pineapple in the United States for less than its fair market value (dumping). The Philippine producers also exported other products, such as pineapple juice and juice concentrate, which used separate parts of the same pineapple used for the canned pineapple. All these products shared raw material costs, according to the producers' own financial records. To determine fair value and antidumping duties, the plaintiffs argued that a court should calculate the Philippine producers' cost of production and allocate a portion of the shared fruit costs to the canned fruit. The result of this allocation showed that more than 90 percent of the canned fruit sales were below the cost of production. Is this a reasonable approach to determining the production costs and fair market value of canned pineapple in the United States? Why or why not? (See Regulation of Specific Business Activities.)

19–3. Sovereign Immunity. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., designs, makes, and sells helicopters with distinctive and famous trade dress that identifies them as Bell aircraft. Bell also owns the helicopters' design patents. Bell's Model 206 Series includes the Jet Ranger. Thirty-six years after Bell developed the Jet Ranger, the Islamic Republic of Iran began to make and sell counterfeit Model 206 Series helicopters and parts. Iran's counterfeit versions—the Shahed 278 and the Shahed 285—used Bell's trade dress. The Shahed aircraft was promoted at an international air show in Iran to aircraft customers. Bell filed a suit in a U.S. district court against Iran, alleging violations of trademark and patent laws. Is Iran—a foreign nation—exempt in these circumstances from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts? Explain. [Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc. v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 734 F.3d 1175 (C.A.D.C. 2013)] (See International Law.)

19–4. Sovereign Immunity. In 1954, the government of Bolivia began expropriating land from Francisco Loza for public projects, including an international airport. The government directed the payment of compensation in exchange for at least some of his land. But the government never paid the full amount. Decades later, his heirs, Genoveva and Marcel Loza, who were both U.S. citizens, filed a suit in a federal district court in the United States against the government of Bolivia, seeking damages for the taking. Can the court exercise jurisdiction? Explain. [Santivanez v. Estado Plurinacional de Bolivia, 2013 WL 879983 (11th Cir. 2013)] (See International Law.)

19–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Import Controls. The Wind Tower Trade Coalition is an association of domestic manufacturers of utility-scale wind towers. The coalition filed a suit in the U.S. Court of International Trade against the U.S. Department of Commerce. It challenged the Commerce Department's decision to impose only prospective antidumping duties, rather than retrospective (retroactive) duties, on imports of utility-scale wind towers from China and Vietnam. The department had found that the domestic industry had not suffered any "material injury" or "threat of material injury" from such imports and that it would be protected by a prospective assessment. Can an antidumping duty be assessed retrospectively? If so, should it be assessed here? Discuss. [Wind Tower Trade Coalition v. United States, 741 F.3d 89 (Fed. Cir. 2014)] (See Regulation of Specific Business Activities.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 19–5, go to Appendix E.

19–6. The Principle of Comity. Holocaust survivors and the heirs of Holocaust victims filed a suit in a federal district court in the United States against the Hungarian national railway, the Hungarian national bank, and several private Hungarian banks. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had participated in expropriating the property of Hungarian Jews who were victims of the Holocaust. The claims arose from events in Hungary seventy years earlier. The plaintiffs had not exhausted remedies available through Hungarian courts. Indeed, they had not even attempted to seek remedies in Hungarian courts, and they did not provide a legally compelling reason for their failure to do so. The defendants asked the court to dismiss the suit. Does the principle of comity support the defendants' request? Explain. [Fischer v. Magyar Államvasutak Zrt., 777 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 2015)] (See International Law.)

19–7. International Law. For fifty years, the Soviet Union made and sold Stolichnaya vodka. At the time, VVO-SPI, a Soviet state enterprise, licensed the Stolichnaya trademark in the United States. When the Soviet Union collapsed, VVO-SPI was purportedly privatized and fell under the control of Spirits International B.V. (SPI). In 2000, a Russian court held that VVO-SPI had not been validly privatized under Russian law. Thus, ownership of the Stolichnaya mark remained with the Soviet Union's successor, the Russian Federation. The Russian Federation assigned the mark to Federal Treasury Enterprise Sojuzplodoimport, OAO (FTE). FTE then filed a suit in a U.S. federal district court against SPI, asserting unlawful misappropriation and commercial exploitation of the mark in violation of federal law. Is the validity of the assignment of the mark to FTE a question to be determined by the court? Why or why not? [Federal Treasury Enterprise Sojuzplodoimport v. Spirits International B.V., 809 F.3d 737 (2d Cir. 2016)] (See International Law.)

19–8. Import Controls. Goods exported to a foreign country for repair or alteration can qualify for tariff-free or reduced-tariff treatment when they re-enter the United States. But the goods do not qualify for favorable import-duty treatment if, in the foreign country, they are transformed into commercially different goods. Daimler-Chrysler AG Sprinter vans are marketed in the United States as cargo vans. Pleasure-Way Industries, Inc., bought 144 Sprinter vans and exported them to Canada for conversion into motorhomes. This included the installation of fully plumbed and furnished kitchens, bathrooms, and sleeping quarters. After the conversion, Pleasure-Way sought to import the vehicles back into the United States to market the motorhomes under new model names as upscale leisure vehicles at prices double or triple the price for Sprinter vans. Do the converted vans qualify for favorable import-tariff treatment? Discuss. [Pleasure-Way Industries, Inc.v. United States, 878 F.3d 1348 (Fed.Cir. 2018)] (See Regulation of Specific Business Activities.)

19–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Doing Business Internationally. Incorporated under Venezuelan law, a subsidiary of U.S.-based Helmerich & Payne International Drilling Co. supplied oil-drilling rigs to entities that were part of the government of Venezuela. The government fell behind in payment on contracts for the use of the rigs. When the overdue amounts topped $100 million, the government nationalized the rigs and took possession. Helmerich filed a suit in a U.S. federal district court against Venezuela, claiming expropriation of property in violation of international law. Helmerich asserted that the U.S. court had jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA). [Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela v. Helmerich & Payne International Drilling Co., 581 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1312, 197 L.Ed.2d 663(2017)] (See International Law.)

1. Venezuela argued that the FSIA did not apply because Helmerich did not have rights in the rigs, which were the subsidiary's property. Does that fact make Helmerich's claim frivolous and unethical? Explain.
2. Using the IDDR approach, determine whether a company is ethically obligated to become familiar with the political situation before doing business in another country.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

19–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Globalization. Assume that you are manufacturing tablet accessories and that your business is becoming more successful. You are now considering expanding operations into another country. (See Doing Business Internationally.)

1. One group will explore the costs and benefits of advertising internationally on the Internet.
2. Another group will consider whether to take in a partner from a foreign nation and examine the benefits and risks of doing so.
3. A third group will discuss what problems may arise if you want to manufacture in a foreign location.

20 Banking

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What type of check does a bank agree in advance to accept when the check is presented for payment?
2. When may a bank properly dishonor a customer's check without being liable to the customer?
3. What is electronic check presentment, and how does it differ from the traditional check-clearing process?
4. What are the four most common types of electronic fund transfers?
5. What role does artificial intelligence (AI) play in digital lending?

"Money is just what we use to keep tally."

Henry Ford
1863–1947

Many people today use debit cards rather than checks for their retail transactions, and payments are increasingly being made via smartphones, tablets, and other mobile devices. Nonetheless, checks remain an integral part of the U.S. economic system and are the most common type of negotiable instrument. Because checks serve as a substitute for cash, we use them to "keep tally," a phrase used by Henry Ford in the chapter-opening quotation.

Many businesses still use checks to pay bills because they facilitate record keeping. But on some occasions, employers have fallen victim to a dishonest employee who embezzles funds using company checks. For instance, assume that Closetmakers, Inc., hired Carter as a bookkeeper. Carter was responsible for maintaining the company checkbook and reconciling it with the monthly statements from TD Financial Bank. He also wrote checks to pay invoices, which Closetmakers' president, Denise, reviewed and signed, but no other employee checked Carter's work.

By the end of his first full month of employment, Carter had forged six checks, amounting to more than $22,000. By the following year, Carter had forged fifty-nine more checks, totaling more than $475,000. A TD Financial employee became suspicious about an item and notified Closetmakers. Carter left work and did not return. Closetmakers sued TD Financial Bank for reimbursement, alleging that it had been negligent in not detecting the forgeries. The bank argued that it was not liable because Closetmakers had been negligent. Who bears the loss resulting from forged checks is one of the many important topics covered in this chapter.

20–1 Checks and the Bank-Customer Relationship

Articles 3 and 4 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) govern issues relating to checks. Article 4 of the UCC governs bank deposits and collections as well as bank-customer relationships. Article 4 also regulates the relationships of banks with one another as they process checks for payment, and it establishes a framework for deposit and checking agreements between a bank and its customers. A check therefore may fall within the scope of Article 3 as a negotiable instrument and yet be subject to the provisions of Article 4 while in the course of collection. If a conflict between Article 3 and Article 4 arises, Article 4 controls [UCC 4–102(a)].

A check is a special type of draft that is drawn on a bank, ordering the bank to pay a fixed amount of funds on demand [UCC 3–104(f)]. Article 4 defines a bank as "a person engaged in the business of banking, including a savings bank, savings and loan association, credit union or trust company" [UCC 4–105(1)]. If any other institution (such as a brokerage firm) handles a check for payment or for collection, the check is not covered by Article 4.

A person who writes a check is called the drawer. The drawer is a depositor in the bank on which the check is drawn. The person to whom the check is payable is the payee. The bank or financial institution on which the check is drawn is the drawee. Example 20.1 When Anita writes a check from her checking account to pay her college tuition, she is the drawer. Her bank is the drawee, and her college is the payee.

Between the time a check is drawn and the time it reaches the drawee, the effectiveness of the check may be altered in some way. For instance, the account on which the check is drawn may no longer have sufficient funds to pay the check. To avoid such problems, a payee may insist on payment by an instrument that has already been accepted by the drawee, such as a cashier's check or a certified check.

Cashier's Checks Checks usually are three-party instruments, but on certain types of checks, the bank can serve as both the drawer and the drawee. For instance, when a bank draws a check on itself, the check is called a cashier's check and is a negotiable instrument at the moment it is issued (see Exhibit 20–1) [UCC 3–104(g)]. Normally, a cashier's check indicates a specific payee. In effect, with a cashier's check, the bank assumes responsibility for paying the check, thus making the check more readily acceptable as a substitute for cash.

Example 20.2 Kramer needs to pay a moving company $8,000 for moving his household goods to his new home in another state. The moving company requests payment in the form of a cashier's check. Kramer goes to a bank (he need not have an account at the bank) and purchases a cashier's check, payable to the moving company, in the amount of $8,000. Kramer has to pay the bank the $8,000 for the check, plus a small service fee. He then gives the check to the moving company.

Cashier's checks are sometimes used in the business community as the near equivalent of cash. Except in very limited circumstances, the issuing bank must honor its cashier's checks when they are presented for payment. If a bank wrongfully dishonors a cashier's check, a holder can recover from the bank all expenses incurred, interest, and consequential damages [UCC 3–411]. At the same time, banks may be required to verify the validity of a cashier's check to protect itself and its customers against fraud. Case Example 20.3 The victim of an elaborate scam, Roy Elizondo unwittingly deposited a counterfeit cashier's check for nearly $500,000 into his Cadence Bank account. The drawee for the cashier's check was Chase Bank. At Elizondo's request, Cadence then completed a wire transfer of $400,000 from his account to the holder of a Japanese bank account.

After the wire transfer had been completed, Chase dishonored the counterfeit cashier's check. Cadence sued Elizondo to recover the $400,000 overdraft. Elizondo countersued, arguing that Cadence had caused the overdraft by failing to verify that the funds from the counterfeit cashier's check had actually been deposited in his account. Had Cadence done so, Elizondo argued, it would have been alerted to the fraud, and the wire transfer never would have been sent. A Texas appeals court agreed, holding that Cadence Bank, not Elizondo, must bear the financial cost of the wire transfer.[1]

Certified Check A check that has been accepted in writing by the bank on which it is drawn. By certifying (accepting) the check, the bank promises to pay the check at the time it is presented.

Certified Checks

A certified check is a check that has been accepted in writing by the bank on which it is drawn [UCC 3–409(d)]. When a drawee bank certifies a check, it immediately charges the drawer's account with the amount of the check and transfers those funds to its own certified check account. In effect, the bank is agreeing in advance to accept that check when it is presented for payment and to make payment from those funds reserved in its certified check account. Essentially, certification prevents the bank from denying liability. It is a promise that sufficient funds are on deposit and have been set aside to cover the check.

What type of check does a bank agree in advance to accept when the check is presented for payment?

To certify a check, the bank writes or stamps the word certified on the face of the check and typically writes the amount that it will pay.[2] Once a check is certified, the drawer and any prior indorsers are completely discharged from liability on the check [UCC 3–414(c), 3–415(d)]. Only the certifying bank is required to pay the instrument.

Either the drawer or the holder (payee) of a check can request certification. The drawee bank is not required to certify the check, however, and the bank's refusal to certify a check is not a dishonor of the check [UCC 3–409(d)].

20–1b The Bank-Customer Relationship

The bank-customer relationship begins when the customer opens a checking account and deposits funds that the bank will use to pay for checks written by the customer. The customer becomes the signatory, or authorized party, on the account. That is, the customer is the only person from whom the bank should take instructions regarding the account. Essentially, three types of relationships are established at this time between the bank and the customer:

2. If the certification does not state an amount, and the amount is later increased and the instrument negotiated to a holder in due course (HDC), the obligation of the certifying bank is the amount of the instrument when it was taken by the HDC [UCC 3–413(b)].

1. A creditor-debtor relationship is created when, for instance, a customer makes cash deposits into a checking account. When a customer makes a deposit, the customer becomes a creditor, and the bank a debtor, for the amount deposited.
2. An agency relationship arises between the customer and the bank when the customer writes a check. In an agency relationship, one party (an agent) agrees to represent or act for the other party (a principal). In effect, the customer orders the bank to pay the amount on the check. The bank becomes the customer's (principal's) agent and is obligated to honor the customer's request.
3. Finally, a contractual relationship exists when certain rights and duties arise. The contractual rights and duties of the bank and the customer depend on the nature of the transaction. For instance, a bank has specific contractual duties when honoring checks, accepting deposits, and transferring funds.

Case Example 20.4 Royal Arcanum Hospital Association of Kings County, Inc., required all of its corporate checks to be signed by two of three corporate officers. These officers were Frank Vassallo, Joseph Rugilio, and William Herrnkind. The three were also named as signatories on the firm's account with Capital One Bank, but the terms of the account did not include the two-signature requirement.

After Vassallo and Rugilio died, Herrnkind opened a new account in the corporate name that expressly permitted checks to be drawn on it with only his signature. Over the next four years, a series of transactions reduced the balance of the account from nearly $200,000 to zero. Royal Arcanum sued Herrnkind and Capital One in a New York state court to recover the funds. The court dismissed the complaint against Capital One, and Royal Arcanum appealed. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed. Capital One was not liable for the payment of unauthorized withdrawals on the firm's corporate accounts because the contract terms never included a two-signature requirement for the transactions.[3]

Can a customer account require two signatures for any check?

20–2 The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks

When may a bank properly dishonor a customer's check without being liable to the customer?

When a banking institution provides checking services, it agrees to honor the checks written by its customers, with the usual stipulation that the account must have sufficient funds available to pay each check [UCC 4–401(a)]. When a drawee bank wrongfully fails to honor a check, it is liable to its customer for damages resulting from its refusal to pay [UCC 4–402(b)]. The customer does not have to prove that the bank breached its contractual commitment or was negligent.

The customer's agreement with the bank includes a general obligation to keep sufficient funds on deposit to cover all checks written. The customer is liable to the payee or to the holder of a check in a civil suit if a check is dishonored for insufficient funds. If intent to defraud can be proved, the customer can also be subject to criminal prosecution for writing a bad check.

When the bank properly dishonors a check for insufficient funds, it has no liability to the customer. The bank may rightfully refuse payment on a customer's check in other circumstances as well.

20–2a Overdrafts

When the bank receives an item properly payable from its customer's checking account but the account contains insufficient funds to cover the amount of the check, the bank has two options. It can dishonor the item, or it can pay the item and charge the customer's account, thus creating an overdraft. The bank can subtract the amount of the overdraft (plus a service charge) from the customer's next deposit or other customer funds, because a check carries with it an enforceable implied promise to reimburse the bank.

With a joint account, however, the bank cannot hold any joint account owner liable for payment of the overdraft unless that customer signed the check or benefited from its proceeds [UCC 4–401(b)]. Example 20.5 Aaron and Sarah are married and have a joint bank account. Aaron writes a check to pay the electric bill for their apartment. If the check results in an overdraft, both Aaron and Sarah will be liable, because both obviously benefited from having electricity in their apartment.

A bank can expressly agree with a customer to accept overdrafts through an "overdraft protection agreement." If such an agreement is formed, any failure of the bank to honor a check because it would create an overdraft breaches this agreement and is considered a wrongful dishonor [UCC 4–402(a), (b)].

If a bank posts items to a customer's account only once a day, several items of different amounts may accumulate before the posting. Depending on the order in which the items are posted, an overdraft may occur earlier or later in the sequence. If the bank charges its customer a separate fee for honoring each item after an overdraft occurs, the sequencing of items can significantly impact the amount of fees that the customer is charged. At the center of the following case was one bank's decision to switch its sequencing to post items of the highest amount first.

Legg v. West Bank

Supreme Court of Iowa, 873 N.W.2d 763 (2016).

Facts Darla and Jason Legg had a joint checking account with West Bank in Iowa. When they first opened the account, West Bank provided them with a Deposit Account Agreement stating that the bank had an obligation to exercise good faith and ordinary care in connection with each account. Later, without notifying its customers, the bank changed its posting sequence of transactions from low-to-high to high-to-low check amounts. This sequencing change caused eight overdrafts in the Leggs' account, resulting in eight overdraft fees. Had the bank not changed its sequencing order, the Leggs would have been charged only three overdraft fees. The Leggs filed a suit in an Iowa state court against West Bank, claiming in part that the bank had breached its duty to act in good faith. The bank filed a motion for summary judgment, which the court denied. West Bank appealed.

Issue Could West Bank have breached its duty to act in good faith with the Leggs when it changed its sequencing order?

Decision Yes. The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's ruling on the Leggs' good faith claim and remanded the case for further proceedings. The court reversed the decision as to the other claims (which included unjust enrichment and usury), however, finding that they should have been dismissed by summary judgment.

Reason A summary judgment is appropriate when there is no genuine issue of material fact and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. The court recognized that there were fact issues precluding summary judgment on the good faith claim. "The Leggs could reasonably argue that the change in sequencing of . . . transactions, coupled with the lack of notification, violated the reasonable expectations of customers that the bank act in good faith when exercising its discretion to sequence transactions." Thus, the Leggs were entitled to proceed to trial on that claim. The court also concluded that there were no genuine issues of fact on Leggs' other claims, so the lower court should have granted the bank summary judgment on those claims.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that West Bank's Deposit Account Agreement had not included "an obligation to Depositor to exercise good faith and ordinary care in connection with each account." How might the result have been different?

20–2b Postdated Checks

A bank may charge a postdated check against a customer's account unless the customer notifies the bank, in a timely manner, not to pay the check until the stated date. (In fact, a check is usually paid without respect to its date.) The notice of postdating must be given in time to allow the bank to act on the notice before it pays the check. A bank that fails to act on the customer's notice and charges the customer's account before the date on the postdated check may be liable for any damages incurred by the customer [UCC 4–401(c)].

20–2c Stale Checks

Commercial banking practice regards a check that is presented for payment more than six months from its date as a stale check. A bank is not obligated to pay an uncertified check presented more than six months from its date [UCC 4–404].

Stale Check A check, other than a certified check, that is presented for payment more than six months after its date.

When it receives a stale check for payment, the bank has the option of paying or not paying the check. The bank may consult the customer before paying the check. If a bank pays a stale check in good faith without consulting the customer, the bank has the right to charge the customer's account for the amount of the check.

20–2d Stop-Payment Orders

A stop-payment order is an order by a customer to his or her bank not to pay or certify a certain check. Only a customer (or a person authorized to draw on the account) can order the bank not to pay the check when it is presented for payment [UCC 4–403(a)].[4] A customer has no right to stop payment on a check that has been certified or accepted by a bank, however. In addition, the customer-drawer must have a valid legal ground for issuing such an order, or the holder can sue the customer-drawer for payment.

Stop-Payment Order An order by a bank customer to the bank not to pay or certify a certain check.

Reasonable Time and Manner The customer must issue the stop-payment order within a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner to permit the bank to act on it [UCC 4–403(a)]. Although a stop-payment order can be given orally over the phone (in most states), it is binding on the bank for only fourteen calendar days unless confirmed in writing. (Recall that an electronic record, such as a stop-payment order submitted via the bank's website, is a writing.) A written or electronic stop-payment order is effective for six months, at which time it may be renewed [UCC 4–403(b)].

An individual tells his bank to stop payment on a check he wrote to buy a computer. What happens if the bank honors that check?

Bank's Liability for Wrongful Payment If the bank pays the check in spite of a stop-payment order, the bank will be obligated to recredit the customer's account. In addition, if the bank's payment over a stop-payment order causes subsequent checks written on the drawer's account to "bounce" (be returned for nonsufficient funds), the bank will be liable for the resultant costs the drawer incurs. The bank is liable only for the amount of actual damages suffered by the drawer because of the wrongful payment, however [UCC 4–403(c)].

Example 20.6 Mike orders one hundred smartphones from Advanced Communications, Inc., at $100 each. Mike pays in advance with a check for $10,000. Later that day, Advanced Communications tells Mike that it will not deliver the smartphones as arranged. Mike immediately calls the bank and stops payment on the check, which he then confirms in writing. Two days later, in spite of this stop-payment order, the bank inadvertently honors Mike's check to Advanced Communications for the undelivered phones. The bank will be liable to Mike for the full $10,000.

4. Note that the right to stop payment is not limited to checks. It extends to any item payable by any bank. (See Official Comment 3 to UCC 4–403.) Also, any person claiming a legitimate interest in the account of a deceased customer may issue a stop-payment order [UCC 4–405].

The result would be different, however, if Advanced Communications had delivered and Mike had accepted ninety phones. Because Mike would have owed Advanced Communications $9,000 for the goods delivered, Mike's actual loss would be only $1,000. Consequently, the bank would be liable to Mike for only $1,000.

20–2e Incompetence or Death of a Customer

A customer's mental incompetence or death does not automatically revoke a bank's authority to accept, pay, or collect an item. Only after the bank is notified of the customer's incompetence or death and has reasonable time to act on the notice will the bank's authority be ineffective [UCC 4–405]. Without this provision, banks would constantly be required to verify the continued competence and life of their drawers.

Thus, if a bank is unaware that a customer who wrote a check has been declared incompetent or has died, the bank can pay the item without incurring liability [UCC 4–405]. Even when a bank knows of the death of its customer, for ten days after the date of death, it can pay or certify checks drawn on or before the date of death. An exception to this rule is made if a person claiming an interest in the account, such as an heir, orders the bank to stop payment.

20–2f Checks with Forged Drawers' Signatures

When a bank pays a check on which the drawer's signature is forged, generally the bank is liable. A forged signature on a check has no legal effect as the signature of a customer-drawer [UCC 3–403(a)]. A bank may be able to recover at least some of the loss from a customer whose negligence substantially contributed to the forgery, from the forger, or from the holder who cashed the check.

The general rule is that the bank must recredit the customer's account when it pays a check with a forged signature. A bank may contractually shift to the customer the risk of forged checks created electronically or by the use of other nonmanual signatures. For instance, the contract might stipulate that the customer is solely responsible for maintaining security over any signature stamp.

Customer Negligence When the customer's negligence substantially contributed to the forgery, the bank normally will not be obligated to recredit the customer's account for the amount of the check [UCC 3–406].[5] To avoid liability for negligence, a customer must examine monthly bank statements and canceled checks promptly and with reasonable care, and report any forged signatures [UCC 4–406].

In addition, the customer has a duty to make sure there are no unauthorized items—such as unfamiliar purchases or suspicious withdrawals—on the account statement. The failure to examine statements and report forged drawer signatures—or any carelessness by the customer that results in a loss to the bank—makes the customer liable for the loss.

Discovery of a forged drawer's signature and notice to the bank must take place within one year from the date that the statement was made available for inspection. Otherwise, the customer loses the legal right to have the bank recredit the account [UCC 4–406(f)].

Sometimes, the same wrongdoer forges a customer's signature on a series of checks. To recover for all the forged, unauthorized items, the customer must discover and report the first forged check to the bank within thirty calendar days of the receipt of the bank statement. Failure to notify the bank within this period of time discharges the bank's liability for all similar forged checks and unauthorized items that it pays before notification.

At the center of the following case is the effect of these provisions and of an agreement between the bank and its customer concerning the time periods. The unauthorized item in dispute was not a check but a withdrawal of all of the funds in the account.

5. The customer's liability may be reduced, however, by the amount of the loss caused by negligence on the part of the bank [UCC 3–406(b)].

Case 20.2

Horton v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A.

Court of Appeals of Texas, Dallas, 2018 WL 494776 (2018).

Facts Robbie Horton, a paralegal for Stovall & Associates, P.C., opened an individual checking account with JPMorgan Chase Bank (Chase) and provided a signature card. The terms of the account agreement required Horton to notify Chase, in writing, of any unauthorized item within thirty days of when a statement showing the item was mailed or made available. A failure to provide the notice would prevent a claim based on the item. Two months later, Chase received a second signature card purportedly signed by Horton and Kimberly Stovall, an attorney with Stovall & Associates, to convert the account to a joint account.

Less than a year later, the law firm terminated Horton's employment, and on the same day, Stovall withdrew all of the funds in the joint account. Almost two years after the withdrawal, Horton filed a suit in a Texas state court against Chase, alleging breach of contract. Horton asserted that she had not agreed to the withdrawal by Stovall. Chase filed a motion for summary judgment, which the court granted. Horton appealed.

Issue Were Horton's claims barred by the provisions of the account agreement?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the summary judgment of the trial court. The court pointed out that Chase required thirty days' written notice for any errors in its monthly account statements. Horton did not give such notice.

Reason Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), a bank can only charge a customer's account for an item that is authorized by the customer and in accord with any agreement between the customer and the bank. If a bank sends or makes available an account statement that identifies the items paid, a customer must examine the statement and promptly notify the bank of any unauthorized payment. The UCC "absolutely" bars a customer's claim to recover such a payment if the notice is not provided within one year. These obligations can be varied by agreement.

In this case, the account terms required Horton to review each statement and notify Chase, in writing, of any unauthorized items within thirty days of when the statement was mailed or made available. Without this notice, a claim based on such an item was barred. Chase mailed monthly statements to its customers. The bank also made the statements available online, with images of the items drawn on the account. Horton did not notify Chase, in writing, of any errors regarding her account until she filed her petition twenty months later.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Horton claimed that she had not agreed to the conversion of the account or to the withdrawal of the funds. These contentions did not affect the court's decision. Why not?
- Economic Why does the UCC "absolutely" limit the time that a customer has to report an altered check or unauthorized signature?

Bank Negligence In one situation, a bank customer can escape liability, at least in part, for failing to notify the bank of forged checks within the required time period. When the customer can prove that the bank was also negligent—that is, that the bank failed to exercise ordinary care—then the bank, too, will be liable.

Ordinary care means that a bank must observe reasonable banking standards prevalent in its geographical area [UCC3–103]. If the customer can show the bank did not use ordinary care, the loss will be allocated between the bank and the customer on the basis of comparative negligence [UCC 4–406(e)].

Other Parties from Whom the Bank May Recover As noted earlier, a forged signature on a check has no legal effect as the signature of a drawer. Instead, the person who forged the signature is liable [UCC 3–403(a)]. Therefore, when a bank pays a check on which the drawer's signature is forged, the bank has a right to recover from the party who forged the signature (if that person can be found). The bank may also have a right to recover from a party who transferred a check bearing a forged drawer's signature and received payment.

20–2g Checks Bearing Forged Indorsements

A bank that pays a customer's check bearing a forged indorsement must recredit the customer's account or be liable to the customer-drawer for breach of contract. Example 20.7 Simon issues a $500 check "to the order of Antonio." Juan steals the check, forges Antonio's indorsement, and cashes the check. When the check reaches Simon's bank, the bank pays it and debits Simon's account. The bank must recredit the $500 to Simon's account because it failed to carry out Simon's order to pay "to the order of Antonio" [UCC 4–401(a)].

Eventually, the loss usually falls on the first party to take the instrument bearing the forged indorsement because a forged indorsement does not transfer title. Thus, whoever takes an instrument with a forged indorsement cannot become a holder. In Example 20.7, Simon's bank can recover—for breach of warranty—from the bank that cashed the check when Juan presented it [UCC 4–207(a)(2)].

The customer, in any event, has a duty to report forged indorsements promptly. Failure to report forged indorsements within a three-year period after the forged items have been made available to the customer relieves the bank of liability [UCC 4–111].

20–2h Altered Checks

The customer's instruction to the bank is to pay the exact amount on the face of the check to the holder. The bank has a duty to examine each check before making final payment. If the bank fails to detect an alteration, normally it is liable to its customer for the loss because it did not pay as the customer ordered.

The bank's loss is the difference between the original amount of the check and the amount actually paid [UCC 4–401(d)(1)]. Example 20.8 Hailey writes a check for $11 that is altered to $111. Hailey's account will be charged $11 (the amount the customer ordered the bank to pay). The bank normally will be responsible for the $100 difference.

Customer Negligence As in a situation involving a forged drawer's signature, a customer's negligence can shift the loss when payment is made on an altered check (unless the bank was also negligent). For instance, a person may carelessly write a check and leave large gaps in it where additional numbers and words can be inserted. Similarly, a person who signs a check and leaves the dollar amount for someone else to fill in is barred from protesting when the bank unknowingly and in good faith pays whatever amount is shown [UCC 4–401(d)(2)]. Finally, if the bank can trace its loss on successive altered checks to the customer's failure to discover the initial alteration, the bank can reduce its liability for reimbursing the customer's account [UCC 4–406].

In every situation involving a forged drawer's signature or an alteration, a bank must observe reasonable commercial (banking) standards of care in paying on a customer's checks [UCC 4–406(e)]. The customer's negligence can be used as a defense only if the bank has exercised ordinary care.

Other Parties from Whom the Bank May Recover The bank is entitled to recover the amount of loss from the transferor who presented the check for payment. A transferor, by presenting a check for payment, warrants that the check has not been altered.

There are two exceptions to this rule. First, if the bank is also the drawer (as it is on a cashier's check), it cannot recover from the presenting party if the party is a holder in due course (HDC) acting in good faith [UCC 3–417(a)(2), 4–208(a)(2)]. The reason is that an instrument's drawer is in a better position than an HDC to know whether the instrument has been altered.

Second, an HDC who presents a certified check for payment in good faith will not be held liable under warranty principles if the check was altered before the HDC acquired it [UCC 3–417(a)(2), 4–207(a)(2)]. Example 20.9 Jordan draws a check for $500 payable to David.

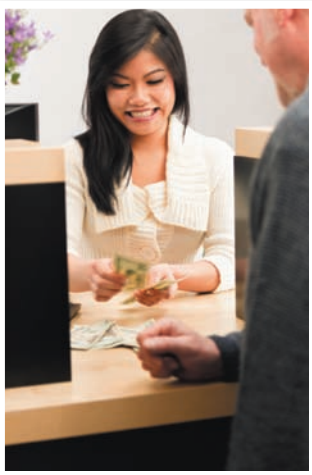
David alters the amount to $5,000. The drawee bank, First National, certifies the check for $5,000. David negotiates the check to Ethan, an HDC. The drawee bank pays Ethan $5,000. On discovering the mistake, the bank cannot recover from Ethan the $4,500 paid by mistake, even though the bank was not in a superior position to detect the alteration. This is in accord with the purpose of certification, which is to obtain the definite obligation of a bank to honor a definite instrument.

20–3 The Bank's Duty to Accept Deposits



A bank has a duty to its customer to accept the customer's deposits of cash and checks. When checks are deposited, the bank must make the funds represented by those checks available within certain time frames. A bank also has a duty to collect payment on any checks payable or indorsed to its customers and deposited by them into their accounts. Cash deposits made in U.S. currency are received into customers' accounts without being subject to further collection procedures.

20–3a Availability Schedule for Deposited Checks

The Expedited Funds Availability Act[6] and Regulation CC[7] (the regulation implementing the act) establish when funds from deposited checks must be made available to the customer. The rules are as follows:

1. Any local check (drawn on a bank in the same area) deposited must be available for withdrawal by check or as cash within one business day from the date of deposit.
2. For nonlocal checks, the funds must be available for withdrawal within not more than five business days.
3. Under the Check Clearing for the 21st Century Act[8] (Check 21, which is the subject of this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature), a bank must credit a customer's account as soon as the bank receives the funds.
4. For cash deposits, wire transfers, and government checks, funds must be available on the next business day.
5. The first $100 of any deposit must be available for cash withdrawal on the opening of the next business day after deposit.

A different availability schedule applies to deposits made at nonproprietary automated teller machines (ATMs). These are ATMs that are not owned or operated by the bank receiving the deposits. Basically, a five-day hold is permitted on all deposits, including cash deposits, made at nonproprietary ATMs. Other exceptions also exist. For instance, a banking institution has eight days to make funds available in new accounts (those open less than thirty days). A bank that places a longer hold on a deposited check than that specified by the rules must notify the customer.

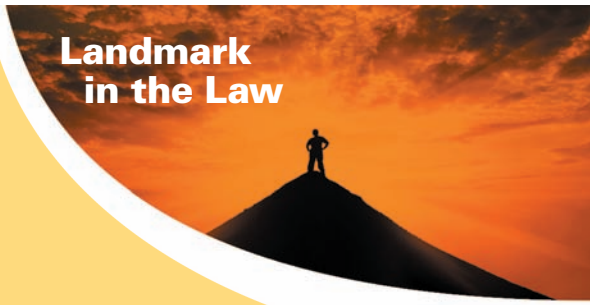
If you deposit a check at your bank that is written on another bank, can you withdraw those funds in cash immediately? Why or why not?



20–3b The Traditional Collection Process

The bank collection process is the process by which a bank that accepts a check for deposit collects the amount from the issuing bank. Usually, deposited checks involve parties that do business at different banks, but sometimes checks are written between customers of the same bank. Either situation is governed by the statutory framework of Article 4 of the UCC.

Check Clearing for the 21st Century Act (Check 21)

In the traditional collection process, paper checks had to be processed manually and physically transported before they could be cleared. Although the UCC allowed banks to use electronic presentment—that is, to transmit check information electronically instead of sending actual paper checks—this method was not widely adopted because it required agreements among individual banks.

Purpose of Check 21 To streamline the costly and time-consuming collection process and improve the overall efficiency of the nation's payment system, Congress passed the Check Clearing for the 21st Century Act (Check 21), which went into effect in 2004. Check 21 changed the collection process by creating a new negotiable instrument called a substitute check. Although the act did not require banks to change their check-collection practices, the creation of substitute checks has facilitated the use of electronic check processing.

Substitute Checks A substitute check is a paper reproduction of the front and back of an original check that contains all of the information required for automated processing. A bank creates substitute checks from digital images of original checks. It can then process the check information electronically or deliver substitute checks to banks that wish to continue receiving paper checks.

The original check can be destroyed after a substitute check is created, helping to prevent the check from being paid twice and reducing expenses. Nevertheless, at least for a while, not all checks will be converted to substitute checks.

Faster Access to Funds The Expedited Funds Availability Act requires the Federal Reserve Board to revise the availability schedule for funds from deposited checks to correspond to reductions in check-processing time. Therefore, as the speed of check processing continues to increase under Check 21, the Federal Reserve Board will reduce the maximum time that a bank can hold funds from deposited checks before making them available to the depositors.

That means, of course, that account holders will have faster access to their deposited funds. But it also means that they will have less float time—the time between when a check is written and when the amount is deducted from the account. Consequently, to avoid overdrafts, account holders need to make sure that funds are available to cover checks when they are written.

Application to Today's World As more financial institutions transfer digital images of checks, the check-processing system becomes more efficient. Customers are increasingly unable to rely on banking float when they are low on funds, so they should make sure that funds are available to cover checks when they are written. Customers cannot opt out of Check 21. Nor can they refuse to accept a substitute check as proof of payment.

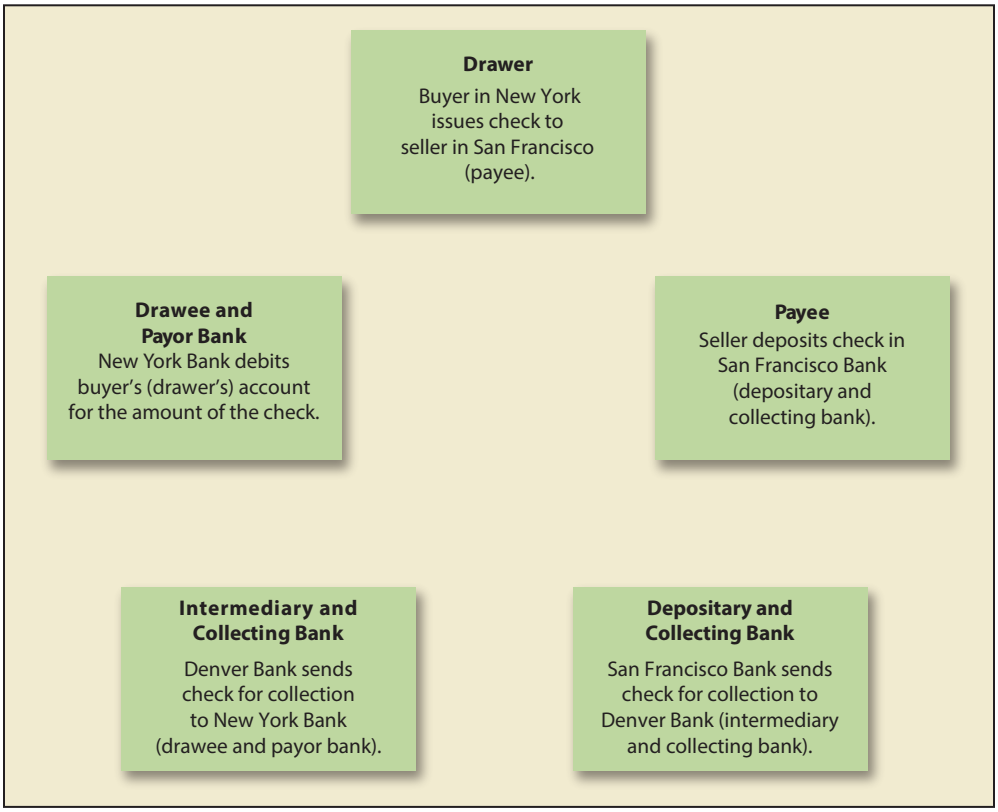
Depositary Bank The first bank to receive a check for payment.

Payor Bank The bank on which a check is drawn (the drawee bank).

Collecting Bank Any bank handling an item for collection, except the payor bank.

Intermediary Bank Any bank to which an item is transferred in the course of collection, except the depositary or payor bank.



Designations of Banks The first bank to receive a check for payment is the depositary bank.[9] For instance, when a person deposits a tax-refund check into a personal checking account at the local bank, that bank is the depositary bank. The bank on which a check is drawn (the drawee bank) is the payor bank. Any bank except the payor bank that handles a check during some phase of the collection process is a collecting bank. Any bank except the payor bank or the depositary bank to which an item is transferred in the course of this collection process is an intermediary bank.

During the collection process, any bank can take on one or more of the various roles of depositary, payor, collecting, and intermediary bank. Example 20.10 A buyer in New York writes a check on her New York bank and sends it to a seller in San Francisco. The seller deposits the check in her San Francisco bank account. The seller's bank is both a depositary bank and a collecting bank. The buyer's bank in New York is the payor bank. As the check travels from San Francisco to New York, any collecting bank handling the item in the collection process (other than the depositary bank and the payor bank) is also called an intermediary bank. Exhibit 20–2 illustrates how various banks function in the collection process in the context of this example. ■

9. All definitions in this section are found in UCC 4–105. The terms depositary and depository have different meanings in the banking context. A depository bank refers to a physical place (a bank or other institution) in which deposits or funds are held or stored.

Exhibit 20–2 The Check-Collection Process

Check Collection Between Customers of the Same Bank An item that is payable by the same bank that receives it (which in this situation is both the depositary bank and the payor bank) is called an "on-us item." Usually, the bank issues a "provisional credit" for on-us items within the same day. If the bank does not dishonor the check by the opening of the second banking day following its receipt, the check is considered paid [UCC 4–215(e)(2)].

Example 20.11 Pam and Jenna have checking accounts at First State Bank. On Monday, Jenna deposits into her checking account a $300 check from Pam. That same day, the bank issues Jenna a provisional (temporary) credit for $300. When the bank opens on Wednesday, Pam's check is considered honored, and Jenna's provisional credit becomes a final payment. ■

Check Collection between Customers of Different Banks Once a depositary bank receives a check payable to another bank, it must arrange to present the check, either directly or through intermediary banks, to the appropriate payor bank. Each bank in the collection chain must pass the check on before midnight of the next banking day following its receipt [UCC 4–202(b)].[10] A "banking day" is any part of a day that the bank is open to carry on substantially all of its banking functions. Thus, if only a bank's drive-through facilities are open, a check deposited on Saturday will not trigger the bank's midnight deadline until the following Monday.

10. A bank may take a "reasonably longer time" in certain circumstances, such as when the bank's computer system is down due to a power failure, but the bank must show that its action is still timely [UCC 4–202(b)].

The UCC permits what is called deferred posting. According to UCC 4–108, "a bank may fix an afternoon hour of 2:00 P.M. or later as a cutoff hour for the handling of money and items and the making of entries on its books." Any checks received after that hour "may be treated as being received at the opening of the next banking day." Thus, if a depositary bank's cutoff hour is 3:00 P.M., a check received by that bank at 4:00 P.M. on Monday will be deferred for posting until Tuesday. In this situation, the bank's deadline will be midnight Wednesday.

When the check reaches the payor bank, that bank is liable for the face amount of the check, unless the payor bank dishonors the check or returns it by midnight on the next banking day following receipt [UCC 4–302].[11]

Federal Reserve System A network of twelve district banks and related branches located around the country and headed by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. Most banks in the United States have Federal Reserve accounts.

Clearinghouse A system or place where banks exchange checks and drafts drawn on each other and settle daily balances.

The Role of the Federal Reserve System

The Federal Reserve System is a network of twelve government banks located around the United States and headed by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. Most banks in the United States have Federal Reserve accounts. The Federal Reserve System acts as a clearinghouse—a system or place where banks exchange checks and drafts drawn on each other and settle daily balances.

Example 20.12 Kathryn of Philadelphia writes a check to Janelle in San Francisco. When Janelle receives the check in the mail, she deposits it in her bank. Her bank then deposits the check in the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, which transfers it to the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia. That Federal Reserve bank then sends the check to Kathryn's bank, which deducts the amount of the check from Kathryn's account.

Electronic Check Presentment

In the past, as mentioned, most checks were processed manually. Today, most checks are processed electronically, as discussed in the Landmark in the Law feature on Check 21. Electronic check presentment can be done on the day of deposit. Check information is encoded, transmitted electronically, and processed by other banks' computers. After encoding a check, a bank may retain it and present only its image or description for payment under an electronic presentment agreement [UCC 4–110].

Focus Question 3

What is electronic check presentment, and how does it differ from the traditional check-clearing process?

A bank that encodes information for electronic presentment warrants to any subsequent bank or payor that the encoded information is correct [UCC 4–209]. Similarly, a bank that retains a check and presents its image or description for payment warrants that the image or description is accurate.

Regulation CC provides that a returned check must be encoded with the routing number of the depositary bank, the amount of the check, and other information. The regulation further states that a check must still be returned within the deadlines required by the UCC.

20–4 Electronic Fund Transfers

Electronic Fund Transfer (EFT) A transfer of funds through the use of an electronic terminal, smartphone, tablet, telephone, or computer.

An electronic fund transfer (EFT) is a transfer of funds through the use of an electronic terminal, smartphone, tablet, computer, or telephone. The law governing EFTs depends on the type of transfer involved. Consumer fund transfers are governed by the Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA).[12] Commercial fund transfers are governed by Article 4A of the UCC.

Although electronic banking offers numerous benefits, it also poses difficulties on occasion. For instance, it is difficult to issue stop-payment orders with electronic banking. Also, fewer records are available to prove or disprove that a transaction took place. The possibilities for tampering with a person's private banking information have increased.

11. A bank may be excused from liability for failing to meet its midnight deadline under certain conditions, such as when there is an electrical outage or equipment failure and the bank has exercised "such diligence as the circumstances require" [UCC 4–109(d)].

12. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1693–1693r. The EFTA amended Title IX of the Consumer Credit Protection Act.

20–4a Types of EFT Systems

Most banks offer EFT services. The following are the most common types of EFT systems used by bank customers:

1. Automated teller machines (ATMs)—The machines are connected online to the bank's computers. A customer inserts a plastic card (called an ATM or debit card) issued by the bank and keys in a personal identification number (PIN) to access accounts and conduct banking transactions.
2. Point-of-sale systems—Online terminals allow consumers to transfer funds to merchants to pay for purchases using a debit card.
3. Direct deposits and withdrawals—Customers can authorize the bank to allow another party, such as the government or an employer, to make direct deposits into their accounts. Similarly, customers can request the bank to make automatic payments to a third party at regular, recurrent intervals from the customer's funds (insurance premiums or loan payments, for instance).
4. Online payment systems—Many financial institutions permit their customers to access the institution's computer system via the Internet and direct a transfer of funds between accounts or pay a particular bill. Payments can be made on a one-time or a recurring basis.

Know This

The EFTA does not provide for the reversal of an electronic transfer of funds once it has occurred.

Focus Question 4

What are the four most common types of electronic fund transfers?

20–4b Consumer Fund Transfers

The Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA) provides a basic framework for the rights, liabilities, and responsibilities of users of EFT systems. Additionally, the act gave the Federal Reserve Board authority to issue rules and regulations to help implement the act's provisions. The Federal Reserve Board's implemental regulation is called Regulation E.

Regulation E A set of rules issued by the Federal Reserve System's Board of Governors to protect users of electronic fund transfer systems.

The EFTA governs financial institutions that offer electronic fund transfers involving consumer accounts. The types of accounts covered include checking accounts, savings accounts, and any other asset accounts established for personal, family, or household purposes.

Disclosure Requirements The EFTA is essentially a disclosure law benefiting consumers. The act requires financial institutions to inform consumers of their rights and responsibilities, including those listed here, with respect to EFT systems.

1. The bank must provide a monthly statement for every month in which there is an electronic transfer of funds. The statement must show the amount and date of the transfer, the names of the retailers or other third parties involved, the location or identification of the terminal, and the fees.
2. If a customer's debit card is lost or stolen and used without permission, the customer will be required to pay no more than $50 if the bank is notified of the loss or theft within two days of learning about it. Otherwise, the liability increases to $500. The customer may be liable for more than $500 if the unauthorized use is not reported within sixty days after it appears on the customer's statement. (If a customer voluntarily gives the debit card to another, who then uses it improperly, the protections just mentioned do not apply.)
3. The customer must discover any error on the monthly statement within sixty days and notify the bank. The bank then has ten days to investigate and must report its conclusions to the customer in writing. If the bank takes longer than ten days, it must return the disputed amount to the customer's account until it finds the error. If there is no error, the customer has to return the disputed funds to the bank.
4. The bank must make receipts available for transactions made through computer terminals, but it is not obligated to do so for telephone transfers.

In the following case, an account holder's daughter initiated hundreds of electronic transfers from her father's accounts to pay her personal bills. He claimed that the transactions were unauthorized. Was the bank liable?

Binns v. Truist Bank

United States Court of Appeals, Third Circuit, __ F.3d __, 2020 WL 1130639 (2020).

Facts Truist Bank's "Customer Agreements" require a customer to promptly notify the bank of any problems with an account. The agreements also limit the bank's liability for transactions by the same unauthorized party if the customer does not notify the bank within sixty days. A customer cannot commence a legal action based on an unauthorized transaction more than one year from the date of the statement containing the transaction. But the bank may waive the time limit for some transactions without losing the right to impose it for others.

James Binns maintained a commercial account and a personal account with Truist Bank. Without Binns's authorization, his daughter Amy used the routing and account numbers for the commercial account to request hundreds of electronic transfers to pay her personal bills. Truist sent Binns monthly statements detailing the account transactions, but he never reconciled the charges.

Four years after his daughter's first transfer from his commercial account, Binns learned that she had also made withdrawals from his personal account. The bank agreed to waive the required notice and provided a refund for those withdrawals. Binns then reconciled the statements for his commercial account and filed a claim in a federal district court against Truist for reimbursement. The court granted a summary judgment in the bank's favor. Binns appealed.

Issue Did the Customer Agreements bar Binns's claim?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit upheld the judgment of the lower court. "The District Court [decided] that the Customer Agreements control, and that they bar Binns's claims. As we agree with the District Court, we will affirm that decision."

Reason The appellate court applied several of the terms in the Customer Agreements to the circumstances in Binns's case. Under those terms, Binns had sixty days from the date of the monthly statement in which his daughter's first unauthorized transaction appeared to file a claim to recover for the entire series of her unauthorized transactions. But Binns did not reconcile his monthly statements or report any unauthorized transactions until four years after the date of the statement that contained the first transaction.

Binns contended that the bank was liable for the unauthorized withdrawals from his commercial account because the bank had permitted his daughter's unauthorized withdrawals from his personal account. He argued that the bank waived the required notice to provide a refund of the withdrawals from the personal account. The court emphasized that the Customer Agreements imposed a duty to investigate on Binns, not the bank, and allowed the bank to waive the notice requirement for some transactions and impose it for others.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment On what fact might a court base a decision that the EFTA does not apply in Binns's situation?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Binns had charged the bank with violations of Article 3 of the UCC, which governs negotiable instruments, defined as signed writings that order or promise payments of money. Article 3 allocates loss from a forged signature or alteration on an instrument according to the exercise of ordinary care by a bank and its customer. Would the result have been different? Explain.

Violations and Damages EFT systems are vulnerable to fraud when someone uses another's card or code or other means to make unauthorized transfers. Unauthorized access to an EFT system constitutes a federal felony, and those convicted may be fined up to $10,000 and sentenced to as long as ten years in prison. Banks must strictly comply with the terms of the EFTA and are liable for any failure to adhere to its provisions.

For a bank's violation of the EFTA, a consumer may recover both actual damages (including attorneys' fees and costs) and punitive damages of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000. Even when a customer has sustained no actual damage, the bank may be liable for legal costs and punitive damages if it fails to follow the proper procedures outlined by the EFTA in regard to error resolution.

Know This
If any part of an electronic fund transfer is covered by the EFTA, the entire transfer is excluded from UCC Article 4A.

20–4c Commercial Fund Transfers

Funds are also transferred electronically "by wire" between commercial parties. In fact, the dollar volume of payments by wire transfer is more than $1 trillion a day—an amount that far exceeds the dollar volume of payments made by other means. The two major wire payment systems are the Federal Reserve's wire transfer network (Fedwire) and the New York Clearing House Interbank Payments Systems (CHIPS).

Commercial wire transfers are governed by Article 4A of the UCC, which has been adopted by most states. Article 4A uses the term funds transfer rather than wire transfer to describe the overall payment transaction. Example 20.13 Jellux, Inc., owes $5 million to Perot Corporation. Instead of sending Perot a check or some other instrument that would enable Perot to obtain payment, Jellux instructs its bank, East Bank, to credit $5 million to Perot's account in West Bank. East Bank debits Jellux's East Bank account and wires $5 million to Perot's West Bank account. In more complex transactions, additional banks would be involved.

20–5 Banking in the Digital Age

Perhaps the most significant trend in banking today is the emergence of fintech. A combination of the words financial and technology, fintech is an umbrella term used to describe financial services that rely on the technological (the Internet, computers, smartphones) rather than the physical (bank branches, cash, paper checks) to meet consumer needs. Fintech provides levels of speed and convenience that have become the expected norm for the banking industry.

20–5a Online and Mobile Banking

Especially for younger consumers, the notion of visiting a bank branch to make a deposit or writing a paper check has become outdated. Instead, about 90 percent of Americans use online and mobile banking on a regular basis.

Online banking gives customers access to their bank accounts on the Internet. Online banking programs enable customers to transfer funds between accounts, receive digital payments, manage investments, track loans, and make numerous other transactions on their computers.

Online Banking Traditional banking services, such as account management and transfers, that are provided on the financial institution's Internet website.

Mobile banking takes this level of fintech one step further, giving customers the ability, through apps, to conduct online banking from smartphones and tablets. In addition to the traditional banking services discussed throughout this chapter, mobile banking apps allow users to scan a fingerprint to access their accounts, place temporary holds on credit cards, and view recurring or unauthorized charges in real time. Mobile banking is also crucial for the spread of open banking, a particularly innovative variety of fintech that is the subject of this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.

Mobile Banking A version of online banking that is carried out with apps on smartphones or tablets.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Open Banking

Online banking consumers demand that their financial data be protected. These customers, so to speak, want banks to place brick walls around their financial information. Open banking takes a wrecking ball to that brick wall—with the customers' consent.

Consumer Benefits

The concept behind open banking is relatively simple: a fintech company shares customer financial data with third parties for the benefit of the customer. Open banking supports the principle that individuals, not banks, own their financial data, and thus individuals should be able to share the data when it benefits them.

Consider MortgageGym, a British fintech company that promises to do the "heavy lifting" for mortgage seekers. First, customers take fifteen minutes to fill out online forms relating to their personal and financial details, as well as their mortgage needs. Then, with the help of another fintech called Experian, MortgageGym obtains the customers' credit rating. Finally, the company does an online search of the United Kingdom's mortgage market. Sixty seconds later, the customers are provided with four of the best mortgage deals available in the country.

Like every other fintech company that provides open banking services in the United Kingdom, MortgageGym operates under the close watch of the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA). Indeed, regulation is a hallmark of open banking worldwide. In the United States, which has yet to embrace the concept, it appears that open banking will be industry driven. As a result, American banks and fintech companies will have to convince consumers not only that open banking adds value to the online banking experience, but also that the financial industry can be trusted not to abuse unfiltered access to its customers' financial data.

Critical Thinking

Why is consumer consent so important to the open banking model?

20–5b Electronic Payment Systems

eBill An electronic version of a paper bill for goods or services that is issued online and can be paid online.

Online and mobile banking facilitate the use of electronic billing. An electronic bill, or eBill, is simply a digital version of a paper bill. eBills contain the same information as paper bills. The difference is that they can be viewed and paid online. Banks now routinely offer fintech services that enable customers to take advantage of this technology.

Such services include electronic bill payment and presentment (EBPP). One type of EBPP is offered directly by companies that provide goods or services to consumers. Another type allows consumers to pay multiple bills electronically through their banks' online banking system.

Paper checks are still used in about half of all payments made between merchants for goods and services. As corporate America becomes more comfortable with cloud computing, these business-to-business (B2B) payments are increasingly becoming digitized. Many fintech companies have made Internet-based payments systems available for B2B bill paying. Typically, these companies charge a monthly subscription cost plus a small per-unit transaction fee and carry out the payment process automatically, without any additional input from the firms involved in the business dealings.

20–5c Artificial Intelligence (AI) and Fintech

Artificial intelligence (AI) refers to a branch of computer science that gives machines the ability to perform tasks that require human-level intelligence. The role of AI in fintech is sure to increase exponentially over the next decade, but its presence is already being felt. Some banks, for instance, have developed AI-based software that gives customers advice on how their spending and saving habits impact short- and long-term financial goals.

Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Digital Lending AI is also a crucial component in digital lending, the use of fintech to originate and renew loans. The AI program is "taught" the parameters of a financial institution's lending practices, such as which factors determine a potential borrower's creditworthiness. Then the program uses a problem-solving platform called an algorithm to determine whether a loan is warranted, and, if so, on what terms.

Banks that have implemented this strategy, mostly in Europe, report that the time taken to process smaller loans has dropped from twenty days to less than ten minutes. Fintech also has the potential to make the lending process more equitable. The digital mortgage lender Better.com reported a 400 percent increase in loans to single, minority women borrowers in the first year it used an algorithm-based lending program.

What role does artificial intelligence (AI) play in digital lending?

Neobanks Increased access to AI is a crucial component in the growth in neobanks, or banks that exist only as digital entities. In practical terms, a neobank is an app that helps customers store and manage their money. These financial institutions offer traditional services such as banking and checking accounts, as well as the array of mobile banking options discussed earlier. Additional benefits include no monthly maintenance fees, fewer surprise charges and overdraft problems, and digital lending. The main drawback of neobanks is that, for now, funds deposited with them are not insured by the federal government.

Neobanks Banks that operate exclusively online without traditional physical branch networks.

Practice and Review

RPM Pizza, Inc., issued a check for $96,000 to Systems Marketing for an advertising campaign. A few days later, RPM decided not to go through with the deal and placed a written stop-payment order on the check. RPM and Systems had no further contact for many months. Three weeks after the stop-payment order expired, however, Toby Rierson, an employee at Systems, cashed the check. Bank One Cambridge, RPM's bank, paid the check with funds from RPM's account. Because the check was more than six months old, it was stale. Thus, according to standard banking procedures as well as Bank One's own policies, the signature on the check should have been specially verified, but it was not. RPM filed a suit in a federal district court against Bank One to recover the amount of the check. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. How long is a written stop-payment order effective? What else could RPM have done to prevent this check from being cashed?
2. What would have happened if RPM had not had a legitimate reason for stopping payment on the check?
3. What are a bank's obligations with respect to stale checks?
4. Would a court be likely to hold the bank liable for the amount of the check because it failed to verify the signature on the check? Why or why not?

Debate This

To reduce fraud, checks that utilize mechanical or electronic signature systems should not be honored.

Chapter Summary: Banking

Checks and the Bank-Customer Relationship

1. Checks—
   a. Cashier's check—A check drawn by a bank on itself (the bank is both the drawer and the drawee) and purchased by a customer. In effect, the bank assumes responsibility for paying the check, thus making the check nearly the equivalent of cash.
   b. Certified check—A check for which the drawee bank certifies in writing that it has set aside funds from the drawer's account to ensure payment of the check on presentation. On certification, the drawer and all prior indorsers are completely discharged from liability on the check.
2. The bank-customer relationship—When a customer opens an account, three types of relationships are established with the bank: a creditor-debtor relationship, an agency relationship, and a contractual relationship.

The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks

Generally, a bank has a duty to honor its customers' checks, provided that the customers have sufficient funds on deposit to cover the checks [UCC 4–401(a)]. The bank is liable to its customers for actual damages proved to be due to wrongful dishonor [UCC 4–402(b)].

1. Overdraft—The bank has a right to charge a customer's account for any item properly payable, even if the charge results in an overdraft [UCC 4–401].
2. Postdated check—The bank may charge a postdated check against a customer's account, unless the customer notifies the bank, in a timely manner, not to pay the check until the stated date [UCC 4–401].
3. Stale check—The bank is not obligated to pay an uncertified check presented more than six months after its date, but the bank may do so in good faith without liability [UCC 4–404].
4. Stop-payment order—The customer (or a person authorized to draw on the account) must make a stop-payment order in time for the bank to have a reasonable opportunity to act. Oral orders are binding for only fourteen days unless they are confirmed in writing. Written or electronic orders are effective for six months unless renewed in writing [UCC 4–403(b)]. The bank is liable for wrongful payment over a timely stop-payment order to the extent that the customer suffers a loss.
5. Incompetence or death of a customer—So long as the bank does not know of the death or incompetence of a customer, the bank can pay an item without liability. Even with knowledge of a customer's death, a bank can honor or certify checks drawn on or before the date of death (in the absence of a stop-payment order) for ten days after the date of death [UCC 4–405].
6. Checks with forged drawers' signatures—The customer has a duty to examine account statements with reasonable care on receipt and to notify the bank promptly of any forged signatures. On a series of forged signatures by the same wrongdoer, examination and report must be made within thirty calendar days of receipt of the first statement containing a forged item [UCC 4–406]. The customer's failure to comply with these rules releases the bank from liability unless the bank failed to exercise ordinary care, in which case liability may be apportioned according to a comparative negligence standard. Regardless of care or lack of care, the customer is barred from holding the bank liable after one year for forged customer signatures.
7. Checks bearing forged indorsements—A bank that pays a customer's check bearing a forged indorsement must recredit the customer's account or be liable to the customer for breach of contract. A customer's failure to report a forged indorsement within a three-year period after the forged items are available to the customer relieves the bank of liability [UCC 4-111].
8. Altered checks—If the bank fails to detect an alteration, normally it is liable to its customer because it did not pay as the customer ordered. Customer negligence can shift the loss.

The Bank's Duty to Accept Deposits	A bank has a duty to accept deposits made by its customers into their accounts. Funds from deposited checks must be made available to customers according to a schedule mandated by the Expedited Funds Availability Act and Regulation CC. A bank also has a duty to collect payment on any checks deposited by its customers. When checks deposited by customers are drawn on other banks, the check-collection process comes into play. 1. Designations of banks—UCC 4–105 provides the following definitions of banks involved in the collection process: a. Depositary bank—The first bank to accept a check for payment. b. Payor bank—The bank on which a check is drawn. c. Collecting bank—Any bank except the payor bank that handles a check during the collection process. d. Intermediary bank—Any bank except the payor bank or the depositary bank to which an item is transferred in the course of the collection process. 2. Check collection between customers of the same bank—A check payable by the depositary bank that receives it is an "on-us item." If the bank does not dishonor the check by the opening of the second banking day following its receipt, the check is considered paid [UCC 4–215(e)(2)]. 3. Check collection between customers of different banks—Each bank in the collection process must pass the check on to the next appropriate bank before midnight of the next banking day following its receipt [UCC 4–108, 4–202(b), 4–302]. 4. The role of the Federal Reserve System—The Federal Reserve System facilitates the check-clearing process by serving as a clearinghouse for checks. 5. Electronic check presentment—Check information may be encoded, transmitted electronically, and processed by other banks' computers. After encoding a check, a bank may retain it and present only its image or description for payment under an electronic presentment agreement [UCC 4-209, 4–110].
Electronic Fund Transfers	1. Types of EFT systems— a. Automated teller machines (ATMs). b. Point-of-sale systems. c. Direct deposits and withdrawals. d. Online payment systems. 2. Consumer fund transfers—Consumer fund transfers are governed by the Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA). The EFTA is basically a disclosure law that sets forth the rights and duties of the bank and the customer with respect to EFT systems. Banks must comply strictly with EFTA requirements. 3. Commercial fund transfers—Article 4A of the UCC, which has been adopted by almost all of the states, governs fund transfers not subject to the EFTA or other federal or state statutes.
Banking in the Digital Age	1. Online and mobile banking— a. Online banking provides traditional banking services to customers on computers. b. Mobile banking apps offer customers the ability to conduct online banking on smartphones and tablets. 2. Electronic payments systems— a. Electronic bills, or eBills, are digital versions of paper bills that can be viewed and paid online. b. Business-to-business (B2B) payments are increasingly being made via electronic means, though paper checks are still common in this segment of the economy. 3. Fintech, a term that refers to a combination of finance and technology, relies on computerized decision making, or artificial intelligence, to: a. Carry out digital lending, in which loan applications are processed by computers rather than bank employees. b. Support neobanks, or banks and other financial institutions that operate wholly online, without any physical branches.

1. Lyn writes a check for $900 to Mac, who indorses the check in blank and transfers it to Jan. She presents the check to Omega Bank, the drawee bank, for payment. Omega does not honor the check. Is Lyn liable to Jan? Could Lyn be subject to criminal prosecution? Why or why not? (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)
2. Herb steals a check from Kay's checkbook, forges Kay's signature, and transfers the check to Will for value. Unaware that the signature is not Kay's, Will presents the check to First State Bank, the drawee. The bank cashes the check. Two weeks later, Kay discovers the forgery and insists that the bank recredit her account. Can the bank refuse to recredit Kay's account? If not, can the bank recover the amount paid to Will? Why or why not? (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

20–1. Forged Checks. Roy Supply, Inc., and R. M. R. Drywall, Inc., had checking accounts at Wells Fargo Bank. Both accounts required all checks to carry two signatures—that of Edward Roy and that of Twila June Moore, both of whom were executive officers of both companies. Between January 2018 and March 2019, the bank honored hundreds of checks on which Roy's signature was forged by Moore. On January 31, 2020, Roy and the two corporations notified the bank of the forgeries and then filed a suit in a California state court against the bank, alleging negligence. Who is liable for the amounts of the forged checks? Why? (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

20–2. Customer Negligence. Gary goes grocery shopping and carelessly leaves his checkbook in his shopping cart. His checkbook, with two blank checks remaining, is stolen by Dolores. On May 5, Dolores forges Gary's name on a check for $100 and cashes the check at Gary's bank, Citizens Bank of Middletown. Gary has not reported the loss of his blank checks to his bank. On June 1, Gary receives his monthly bank statement from Citizens Bank, which includes the forged check, but he does not notice the item, nor does he examine his bank statement. On June 20, Dolores forges Gary's last check. This check is for $1,000 and is cashed at Eastern City Bank, a bank with which Dolores has previously done business. Eastern City Bank puts the check through the collection process, and Citizens Bank honors it. On July 1, on receipt of his bank statement and canceled checks covering June transactions, Gary discovers both forgeries and immediately notifies Citizens Bank. Dolores cannot be found. Gary claims that Citizens Bank must recredit his account for both checks, as his signature was forged. Discuss fully Gary's claim. (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

20–3. Forged Indorsements. Adley Abdulwahab (Wahab) opened an account on behalf of W Financial Group, LLC, with Wells Fargo Bank. Wahab was one of three authorized signers on the account. Five months later, Wahab withdrew $1,701,250 from W Financial's account to buy a cashier's check payable to Lubna Lateef. Wahab visited a different Wells Fargo branch and deposited the check into the account of CA Houston Investment Center, LLC. Wahab was the only authorized signer on this account. Lateef never received or indorsed the check. W Financial filed a suit to recover the amount. Applying the rules for payment on a forged indorsement, who is liable? [Jones v. Wells Fargo Bank, 666 F.3d 955 (5th Cir. 2012)] (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

20–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Consumer Fund Transfers. Stephen Patterson held an account with Suntrust Bank in Alcoa, Tennessee. Juanita Wehrman—with whom Patterson was briefly involved in a romantic relationship—stole his debit card and used it for sixteen months (well beyond the length of their relationship) to make unauthorized purchases in excess of $30,000. When Patterson learned what was happening, he closed his account. The bank refused to reimburse him more than $677.46—the amount of unauthorized transactions that had occurred within sixty days of the transmittal of the bank statement that revealed the first unauthorized transaction. Is the bank's refusal justifiable? Explain. [Patterson v. Suntrust Bank, 2013 WL 139315 (Tenn.App. 2013)] (See Electronic Fund Transfers.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 20–4, go to Appendix E.

20–5. Forged Drawers' Signatures. Victor Nacim had a checking account at Compass Bank. The "Deposit Agreement" required him to report an unauthorized transaction within thirty days of his receipt of the statement on which it appeared to obtain a recredit. When Nacim moved to a new residence, he asked the bank to update the address on his account. Compass continued to mail his statements to his previous address, however, and Nacim did not receive them. In the meantime, Compass officer David Peterson made an unauthorized withdrawal of $34,000 from Nacim's account. A month later, Peterson told Nacim what he had done. The next month, Nacim asked the bank for a recredit. Compass refused on the ground that he reported the withdrawal more than thirty days after the bank mailed the statement on which it appeared—a statement that

Nacim never received. Is Nacim entitled to a recredit? Explain. [Compass Bank v. Nacim, 459 S.W.3d 95 (Tex. App.—El Paso 2015)] (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

20–6. Checks Bearing Forged Indorsements. The law firm of Levy Baldante Finney & Rubenstein, P.C., had a checking account at TD Bank, N.A. The account agreement required notice to the bank of "any problem with a check" within thirty days from when a statement showing the item was mailed. Jack Cohen, a partner at the law firm, stole more than three hundred thousand dollars from the account by fraudulently indorsing twenty-nine checks that had been made payable to clients and other third parties. More than two years after the first item appeared in an account statement, Susan Huffington, the firm's bookkeeper, discovered one of the fraudulently indorsed checks. She reviewed previous statements with images of the back of each check, compiled a list of fraudulently indorsed items, and notified the bank to recredit the account. Is the bank obligated to honor this request? Why or why not? [Levy Baldante Finney & Rubenstein, P.C. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., __ A.3d __, 2018 WL 847756 (Pa.Super. 2018)] (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

20–7. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Unauthorized Items. While working as an executive assistant to David Ducote, Michelle Freytag fraudulently obtained a credit card in Ducote's name from Whitney National Bank in New Orleans, Louisiana. Freytag told Whitney to pay the credit card balances with funds from Ducote's bank account. The bank included a "debit memo" of each payment with the monthly account statements sent to Ducote. But Ducote never contacted the bank about any unauthorized items. Freytag's scheme was not discovered until, more than five years later, the bank contacted Ducote to ask about some of the charges to the credit card. [Ducote v. Whitney National Bank, 212 So.3d 729 (La.App. 5 Cir. 2017)] (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

1. Do bank customers in Ducote's position have an ethical duty to examine their account statements? Discuss.
2. Is the bank ethically obligated to recredit Ducote's account? Explain.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

20–8. Critical Legal Thinking. Under the revised Article 4, a bank is no longer required to include the customer's canceled checks when it sends monthly statements to the customer. A bank may simply itemize the checks (by number, date, and amount). It may provide photocopies of the checks as well but is not required to do so. What implications do these rules have for bank customers in terms of liability for unauthorized signatures and indorsements? (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

20–9. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Death of a Customer. On January 5, Brian drafts a check for $3,000 drawn on Southern Marine Bank and payable to his assistant, Shanta. Brian puts last year's date on the check by mistake. On January 7, before Shanta has had a chance to go to the bank, Brian is killed in an automobile accident. Southern Marine Bank is aware of Brian's death. On January 10, Shanta presents the check to the bank, and the bank honors the check by payment to Shanta. Later, Brian's widow, Joyce, claims that because the bank knew of Brian's death and also because the check was by date over one year old, the bank acted wrongfully when it paid Shanta. Joyce, as executor of Brian's estate and sole heir by his will, demands that Southern Marine Bank recredit Brian's estate for the check paid to Shanta. (See The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks.)

1. The first group will determine whether the bank acted wrongfully by honoring Brian's check and paying Shanta.
2. The second group will assess whether Joyce has a valid claim against Southern Marine Bank for the amount of the check paid to Shanta.
3. The third group will assume that the check Brian drafted was on his business account rather than on his personal account and that he had two partners in the business. Would a business partner be in a better position to force Southern Marine Bank to recredit Brian's account than his widow? Why or why not?

21 Security Interests and Creditors' Rights

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is required to create a security interest?
2. How can a security interest extend to a debtor's newly acquired inventory?
3. If two parties have perfected security interests in the debtor's collateral, which party has priority on default?
4. When is a creditor required to sell or otherwise dispose of the repossessed collateral?
5. What is a suretyship, and how does it differ from a guaranty?

Secured Transaction Any transaction in which the payment of a debt is guaranteed, or secured, by personal property owned by the debtor or in which the debtor has a legal interest.

"I will pay you some, and, as most debtors do, promise you infinitely."

William Shakespeare
(English dramatist and poet)

When buying or leasing goods, debtors frequently pay some portion of the price now and promise to pay the remainder in the future, as William Shakespeare observed in the chapter-opening quotation. Logically, sellers and lenders do not want to risk nonpayment, so they usually will not sell goods or lend funds unless the payment is somehow guaranteed.

Whenever the payment of a debt is guaranteed, or secured, by personal property owned or held by the debtor, the transaction becomes known as a secured transaction. Indeed, business as we know it could not exist without laws permitting and governing secured transactions. When Stone Investments, Ltd., wants to buy a Learjet 75 Liberty for executive travel, it borrows funds from Capital Bank. Capital obtains a security interest in the plane to guarantee that Stone will repay the debt.

Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) governs secured transactions in personal property. Personal property includes accounts, agricultural liens, chattel paper (documents or records evidencing a debt secured by personal property), and fixtures (certain property that is attached to land). Personal property also includes other types of intangible property, such as negotiable instruments and patents. Article 9 does not cover creditor-collection devices such as liens and garnishments.

21–1 Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest

A creditor has two main concerns if the debtor defaults (fails to pay the debt as promised). The first is whether the debt can be satisfied through the possession and (usually) sale of the collateral. The second concern is whether the creditor will have priority over any other creditors or buyers who may have rights in the same collateral. These two concerns are met through the creation and perfection of a security interest.

21–1a Definitions

Before we examine the creation and perfection of security interests, you need to understand the UCC's terminology, which is uniformly used by every state. The following is a brief summary of the UCC's definitions relating to secured transactions.

1. A secured party is any creditor who has a security interest in the debtor's collateral. This creditor can be a seller, a lender, a cosigner, or even a buyer of accounts or chattel paper [UCC 9–102(a)(72)].
2. A debtor is a person who owes payment or other performance of a secured obligation [UCC 9–102(a)(28)].
3. A security interest is the interest in the collateral (such as personal property or fixtures) that secures payment or performance of an obligation [UCC 1–201(37)].
4. A security agreement is an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest [UCC 9–102(a)(73)]. In other words, it is the contract in which a debtor agrees to give a creditor the right to take the debtor's property in the event of default.
5. Collateral is the subject of the security interest [UCC 9–102(a)(12)].
6. A financing statement—referred to as the UCC-1 form—is the instrument normally filed to give public notice to third parties of the secured party's security interest [UCC 9–102(a)(39)].

Together, these basic definitions form the concept under which a debtor-creditor relationship becomes a secured transaction relationship (see Exhibit 21–1).

Defaults Fails to pay a debt when it is due.

Secured Party A creditor who has a security interest in the debtor's collateral, including a seller, lender, cosigner, or buyer of accounts or chattel paper.

Debtor Under Article 9 of the UCC, any party who owes payment or performance of a secured obligation.

Security Interest Any interest in personal property or fixtures that secures payment or performance of an obligation.

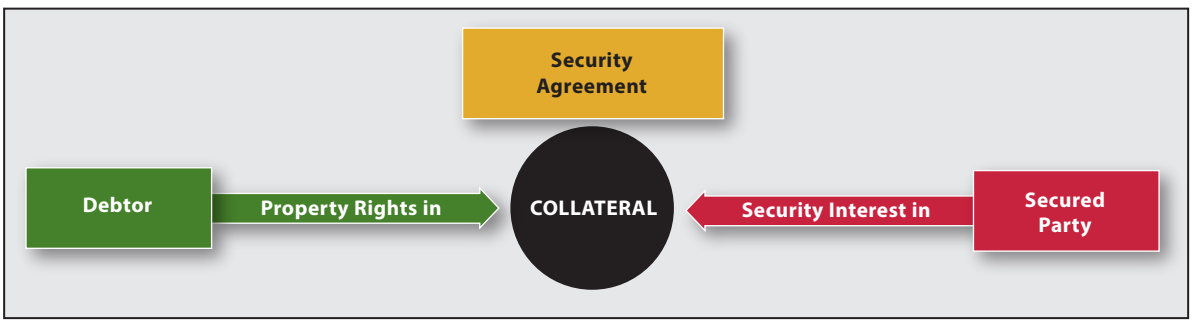
Security Agreement An agreement that creates or provides for a security interest between the debtor and a secured party.

Collateral Under Article 9 of the UCC, the property subject to a security interest.

Financing Statement A document filed by a secured creditor with the appropriate official to give notice to the public of the creditor's security interest in collateral belonging to the debtor named in the statement.

21–1b Requirements to Create a Security Interest

To become a secured party, the creditor must obtain a security interest in the collateral of the debtor. Three requirements must be met for a creditor to have an enforceable security interest:



1. Unless the creditor has possession of the collateral, there must be a written or authenticated security agreement that clearly describes the collateral subject to the security interest and is signed or authenticated by the debtor.
2. The secured party must give something of value to the debtor.
3. The debtor must have "rights" in the collateral.

Focus Question 1

What is required to create a security interest?

Exhibit 21–1 The Secured Transactions Relationship

In a security agreement, a debtor and a creditor agree that the creditor will have a security interest in collateral in which the debtor has rights. In essence, the collateral secures the loan and ensures the creditor of payment should the debtor default.

Attachment In a secured transaction, the process by which a secured creditor's interest "attaches" to the collateral and the creditor's security interest becomes enforceable.

Once these requirements have been met, the creditor's rights are said to attach to the collateral. Attachment gives the creditor an enforceable security interest in the collateral [UCC 9–203].[1]

Example 21.1 To furnish his new office suite, Bryce applies for a credit card at an office supply store. The application contains a clause stating that the store will retain a security interest in the goods that he buys with the card until he has paid for them in full. This application is a written security agreement, which is the first requirement for an enforceable security interest. The goods that Bryce buys with the card are the something of value from the secured party (the second requirement). His ownership interest in those goods is the right that he has in them (the third requirement). Thus, the requirements for an enforceable security interest are met. When Bryce buys something with the card, the store's rights attach to the purchased goods. ■

Written or Authenticated Security Agreement

When the collateral is not in the possession of the secured party, the security agreement must be either written or authenticated. It must also describe the collateral.

Authenticate To sign, execute, or adopt any symbol on an electronic record that verifies the intent to adopt or accept the record.

Here, authenticate means to sign, execute, or adopt any symbol on an electronic record that verifies that the person signing has the intent to adopt or accept the record [UCC 9–102(a)(7)(69)]. Authentication provides for electronic filing (the filing process will be discussed later). See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion of a type of secured transaction that is performed online.

A security agreement must contain a description of the collateral that reasonably identifies it. Generally, such phrases as "all the debtor's personal property" or "all the debtor's assets" would not constitute a sufficient description [UCC 9–108(c)].

If the debtor signs, or otherwise authenticates, a security agreement, does the debtor also have to sign an attached list of the collateral to create a valid security interest? That was the question before the court in the following case.

1. The term attachment has a different meaning in secured transactions than in the context of judicial liens, where it refers to a court-ordered seizure of property.

Spotlight on Wedding Rings: Case 21.1

Royal Jewelers, Inc. v. Light

Supreme Court of North Dakota, 2015 ND 44, 859 N.W.2d 921 921 (2015).

Facts Steven Light bought a $55,050 wedding ring for his wife, Sherri Light, on credit from Royal Jewelers, Inc., a store in Fargo, North Dakota. The receipt granted Royal a security interest in the ring. Later, Royal assigned its interest to GRB Financial Corp. Steven and GRB signed a modification agreement changing the repayment terms. An attached exhibit listed the items pledged as security for the modification, including the ring. Steven did not separately sign the exhibit.

ProArtWork/Getty Images

Who retains a security interest in a wedding ring when the buyer dies?

A year later, Steven died. Royal and GRB filed a suit in a North Dakota state court against Sherri, alleging that GRB had a valid security interest in the ring. Sherri cited UCC 9–203, under which there is an enforceable interest only if "the debtor has authenticated a security agreement that provides a description of the collateral." Sherri argued that the modification agreement did not "properly authenticate" the description of the collateral, including the ring, because Steven had not signed the attached exhibit. The court issued a judgment in GRB's favor. Sherri appealed.

Issue Was GRB's security interest in the ring valid and enforceable?

Decision Yes. The North Dakota Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's judgment.

Reason The court acknowledged that under UCC 9–203, "a security interest is enforceable against the debtor and third parties with respect to the collateral only if . . . the debtor has authenticated a security agreement that provides a description of the collateral." The court explained, however, that under UCC 9–108(2), collateral may be described in a list attached to the security agreement. In fact, several documents may be considered together to comprise a security agreement. Furthermore, "no authority [requires] a debtor to separately sign an exhibit attached to and referenced in a signed security agreement." Here, Steven had granted a valid security interest in the ring. With Steven's knowledge and consent, Royal had assigned the security interest to GRB. Thus, the lower court "did not err in finding GRB Financial had a valid and enforceable security interest in the ring."

Critical Thinking

- Ethical Under the circumstances, is it ethical for GRB to enforce its security interest in the ring to recover the unpaid amount of the price? Discuss.

Secured Party Must Give Value The secured party must give something of value to the debtor. Some examples of value include a binding commitment to extend credit or consideration to support a simple contract [UCC 1–204]. Normally, the value given by a secured party is in the form of a direct loan or a commitment to sell goods on credit.

Debtor Must Have Rights in the Collateral The debtor must have rights in the collateral. That means that the debtor must have some ownership interest or right to obtain possession of the collateral. For instance, a retail seller-debtor can give a secured party a security interest not only in existing inventory owned by the retailer but also in future inventory to be acquired by the retailer. (A common misconception is that the debtor must have title to the collateral to have rights in it, but this is not a requirement.)

Secured Transactions Online

When you buy something online, you typically must use your credit card or make an electronic fund transfer before the goods that you bought are sent to you. If you are buying an expensive item, such as a car, you are not likely to send funds without being assured that you will receive the item in the condition promised. Enter the concept of escrow.

Escrow Accounts

Escrow accounts are commonly used in real estate transactions, but they are also useful for smaller transactions, particularly those done on the Internet. An escrow account involves three parties—the buyer, the seller, and a trusted third party that collects, holds, and disperses funds according to instructions from the buyer and seller. Escrow services are provided by licensed and regulated escrow companies. For instance, if you buy a car on the Internet, you and the seller will agree on an escrow company to which you will send the funds. When you receive the car and are satisfied with it, the escrow company will release the funds to the seller. This is a type of secured transaction.

Escrow.com

One of the best-known online escrow firms is Escrow.com, which has provided escrow services for billions of dollars in secured transactions. All of its escrow services are offered via its website and provided independently by Internet Escrow Services, one of its operating subsidiaries. Escrow.com is particularly useful for transactions that involve an international buyer or seller. It has become the recommended transaction settlement service for Autotrader, Resale Weekly, Cars.com, eBay Motors, and Flippa.com.

Critical Thinking

How could online escrow services reduce Internet fraud?

21–1c Perfecting a Security Interest

Perfection The legal process by which secured parties protect themselves against the claims of third parties who may wish to have their debts satisfied out of the same collateral. It is usually accomplished by filing a financing statement with the appropriate government official.

Perfection is the legal process by which secured parties protect themselves against the claims of third parties who may wish to have their debts satisfied out of the same collateral. Whether a secured party's security interest is perfected or unperfected can have serious consequences for the secured party.

What if a debtor has borrowed from two different creditors, for instance, using the same property as collateral for both loans? If the debtor defaults on both loans, which of the two creditors has first rights to the collateral? In this situation, the creditor with a perfected security interest will prevail.

Perfection usually is accomplished by filing a financing statement. In some circumstances, however, a security interest becomes perfected even though no financing statement is filed.

SimplyCreativePhotography/Getty Images

When a bank finances the purchase of a tractor, how does it perfect its security interest in that tractor?

Perfection by Filing The most common means of perfection is by filing a financing statement with the office of the appropriate government official. A financing statement gives public notice to third parties of the secured party's security interest. The security agreement itself can also be filed to perfect the security interest. The financing statement must provide the names of the debtor and the secured party, and must identify the collateral covered by the financing statement. A uniform financing statement form is used in all states [see UCC 9–521].

Communication of the financing statement to the appropriate filing office, together with the correct filing fee, or the acceptance of the financing statement by the filing officer constitutes a filing [UCC 9–516(a)]. The filing can be accomplished electronically [UCC 9–102(a)(18)]. In fact, most states use electronic filing systems. A financing statement may be filed even before a security agreement is made or a security interest attaches [UCC 9–502(d)].

The Debtor's Name. The UCC requires that a financing statement be filed under the name of the debtor [UCC 9–502(a)(1)]. Filings are indexed by the name of the debtor so that they can be located by subsequent searchers. Slight variations in names normally will not be considered misleading if a search of the filing office's records, using a standard computer search engine routinely used by that office, would disclose the filings [UCC 9–506(c)].[2]

UCC 9–503 sets out some detailed rules for determining when the debtor's name as it appears on a financing statement is sufficient.

1. Corporations. For corporations, which are organizations that have registered with the state, the debtor's name on the financing statement must be "the name of the debtor indicated on the public record of the debtor's jurisdiction of organization" [UCC 9–503(a)(1)].
2. Trusts. If the debtor is a trust or a trustee for property held in trust, the financing statement must disclose this information and provide the trust's name as specified in its official documents [UCC 9–503(a)(3)].
3. Individuals and organizations. For all others, the financing statement must disclose "the individual or organizational name of the debtor" [UCC 9–503(a)(4)(A)]. The word organization includes unincorporated associations, such as clubs, churches, joint ventures, and general partnerships. If an organizational debtor does not have a group name, the names of the individuals in the group must be listed.
4. Trade names. When the debtor's trade name is not the legal name of the business, providing only the trade name in a financing statement is not sufficient for perfection [UCC 9–503(c)]. The financing statement must also include the owner-debtor's actual name. Example 21.2 Pete Hanson is a plumber who does business under the name CareFull Plumbing. Hanson obtains a loan from North Bank to purchase some equipment for his business. For North Bank to perfect its security interest in the equipment, the filed financing statement must include the owner's name, Pete Hanson, rather than just his trade name.

2. If the name listed in the financing statement is so inaccurate that a search using a standard search engine will not disclose the debtor's name, then the financing statement is deemed seriously misleading under UCC 9–506. See also UCC 9–507, which governs the effectiveness of financing statements found to be seriously misleading.

If the debtor's name changes, the financing statement remains effective for collateral the debtor acquired before or within four months after the name change. Unless an amendment to the financing statement is filed within this four-month period, a security interest in collateral acquired by the debtor after the four-month period is unperfected [UCC 9–507(b) and (c)]. A one-page uniform financing statement amendment form is available for filing name changes and for other purposes.

Description of the Collateral. Both the security agreement and the financing statement must describe the collateral in which the secured party has a security interest. The security agreement must describe the collateral because no security interest in goods can exist unless the parties agree on which goods are subject to the security interest.

The financing statement must describe the collateral to provide public notice of the fact that certain goods of the debtor are subject to a security interest. Other parties who might later wish to lend funds to the debtor or buy the collateral can thus learn of the security interest by checking with the office in which a financing statement would be filed. For land-related security interests, a legal description of the realty is also required [UCC 9–502(b)].

Sometimes, the descriptions in the two documents vary. The description in the security agreement must be more precise than the description in the financing statement. The UCC permits broad, general descriptions in the financing statement, such as "all assets" or "all personal property," as long as they are accurate [UCC 9–504].

Example 21.3 A security agreement for a commercial loan to Casey Manufacturing lists all of Casey's equipment subject to the loan by serial number. The financing statement for the equipment simply refers to "all equipment owned or hereafter acquired." (This chapter's Business Law Analysis feature provides an additional illustration.)

Perfecting a Security Interest

Thomas Tille owned M.A.T.T. Equipment Company. To operate the business, Tille borrowed funds from Union Bank. For each loan, Union filed a financing statement that included Tille's signature and address, the bank's address, and a description of the collateral.

The first loan covered all of Tille's equipment, including "any after-acquired property." The second loan covered a truck crane "whether owned now or acquired later." The third loan covered a "Bobcat mini-excavator." Did these financing statements perfect Union's security interests?

Analysis: In most situations, perfection is accomplished by filing a financing statement with the appropriate official. To effectively perfect a security interest, a financing statement must contain (1) the debtor's signature, (2) the debtor's and creditor's addresses, and (3) a description of the collateral by type or item. Under the UCC, the financing statement can contain broad, general descriptions of the collateral, whereas the security agreement must be more precise.

Result and Reasoning: All of Union Bank's financing statements were sufficient to perfect its security interests in Tille's equipment. Each provided the name and address of the debtor (Tille), and the name and address of the secured party (Union Bank). Each also included a description of the collateral covered by the financing statement. For one loan, it was all of Tille's equipment, including after-acquired property; for another, the truck crane; and for the third, a Bobcat mini-excavator. These descriptions were clearly sufficient to put a prospective creditor on notice that the collateral was the subject of a security interest.

Where to File. Normally, a financing statement must be filed centrally in the appropriate state office, such as the office of the secretary of state, in the state where the debtor is located. An exception occurs when the collateral consists of timber to be cut, fixtures, or items to be extracted—such as oil, coal, gas, and minerals [UCC 9–301(3) and (4), 9–502(b)]. In those circumstances, the financing statement is filed in the county where the collateral is located.

Note that the state in which a financing statement should be filed usually depends on the debtor's location, not the location of the collateral (but not for the exception just mentioned) [UCC 9–301]. The debtor's location is determined as follows [UCC 9–307]:

1. For individual debtors, it is the state of the debtor's principal residence.
2. For an organization that is registered with the state, such as a corporation or limited liability company, it is the state in which the organization is registered. Thus, if a debtor is incorporated in Maryland and has its chief executive office in New York, a secured party would file the financing statement in Maryland.
3. For all other entities, it is the state in which the business is located or, if the debtor has more than one office, the place from which the debtor manages its business operations and affairs.

Consequences of an Improper Filing. Improper filing renders the security interest unperfected and reduces the secured party's claim in bankruptcy to that of an unsecured creditor. For instance, if the debtor's name on the financing statement is seriously misleading or if the collateral is not sufficiently described in the financing statement, the filing may not be effective.

Example 21.4 Arthur Mendez Juarez, a strawberry farmer, leases farmland from Morona Fruits, Inc., and borrows funds from Morona for payroll and production expenses. The sublease and other documents set out Juarez's full name, but Juarez generally goes by the name "Mendez" and signs the sublease "Arthur Mendez." To perfect its interests, Morona files financing statements that identify the debtor as "Arthur Mendez."

Later, Juarez contracts to sell strawberries to Frozun Foods, Inc., which advances him funds secured by a financing statement that identifies the debtor as "Arthur Juarez." By the following year, Juarez is unable to pay his debts and owes Morona more than $200,000 and Frozun nearly $50,000. Both Morona and Frozun file a suit against Juarez claiming to have priority under a perfected security interest. In this situation, a properly filed financing statement would identify the debtor's true name (Arthur Juarez). Because a debtor name search for "Arthur Juarez" would not disclose a financing statement in the name of "Arthur Mendez," Morona's financing statement is seriously misleading. Therefore, Frozun's security interest would have priority because its financing statement was recorded properly. ■

Perfection without Filing A few types of security interests can be perfected without filing a financing statement. One occurs when the collateral is transferred into the possession of the secured party. A second occurs when the security interest can be perfected on attachment (without a filing and without having to possess the goods) [UCC 9–309].

The phrase perfected on attachment means that these security interests are automatically perfected at the time of their creation. Two of the more common security interests that are perfected on attachment are a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods (discussed shortly) and an assignment of a beneficial interest in a decedent's estate [UCC 9–309(1), (13)].

Pledge A security device in which personal property is transferred into the possession of the creditor as security for the payment of a debt and retained by the creditor until the debt is paid.

Perfection by Possession. In the past, one of the most common means of obtaining financing was to pledge certain collateral as security for the debt and transfer the collateral into the creditor's possession. When the debt was paid, the collateral was returned to the debtor.

Article 9 of the UCC retained the common law pledge and the principle that the security agreement need not be in writing to be enforceable if the collateral is transferred to the secured party [UCC 9–310, 9–312(b), 9–313].

Certain items, such as stocks, bonds, negotiable instruments, and jewelry, are commonly transferred into the creditor's possession when they are used as collateral for loans. Example 21.5 Sheila needs cash to pay for a medical procedure. She obtains a loan for $4,000 from Trent. As security for the loan, she gives him a promissory note on which she is the payee. Even though the agreement to hold the note as collateral was oral, Trent has a perfected security interest and does not need to file a financing statement. No other creditor of Sheila's can attempt to recover the promissory note from Trent in payment for other debts.

For most collateral, however, possession by the secured party is impractical because it denies the debtor the right to use or derive income from the property to pay off the debt. Example 21.6 Jeb, a farmer, takes out a loan to finance the purchase of a large corn harvester and uses the equipment as collateral. Clearly, the purpose of the purchase would be defeated if Jeb transferred the collateral into the creditor's possession, because he would not be able to use the equipment to harvest his corn.

Perfection by Attachment—The Purchase-Money Security Interest in Consumer Goods. Under the UCC, fourteen types of security interests are perfected automatically at the time they are created [UCC 9–309]. The most common is the purchase-money security interest (PMSI) in consumer goods (items bought primarily for personal, family, or household purposes).

Purchase-Money Security Interest (PMSI) A security interest that arises when a seller or lender extends credit for part or all of the price of goods purchased by a buyer.

A PMSI in consumer goods is created when a person buys goods on credit. The entity that extends the credit and obtains the PMSI can be either the seller (a store, for instance) or a financial institution that lends the buyer the funds with which to purchase the goods [UCC 9–102(a)(2)].

Automatic Perfection. A PMSI in consumer goods is perfected automatically at the time of a credit sale—that is, at the time the PMSI is created. The seller in this situation does not need to do anything more to perfect the security interest. Example 21.7 Jami purchases an LG washer and dryer from West Coast Appliance for $2,500. Unable to pay the entire amount in cash, Jami signs a purchase agreement to pay $1,000 down and $100 per month until the balance, plus interest, is fully paid. West Coast Appliance is to retain a security interest in the appliances until full payment has been made. Because the security interest was created as part of a purchase agreement with a consumer, it is a PMSI, and West Coast Appliance's security interest is automatically perfected.

Iakov Filimonov/Dreamstime.com

If this couple buys a washer/dryer set on credit, is a PMSI automatically perfected?

Exceptions to the Rule of Automatic Perfection. There are two exceptions to the rule of automatic perfection for PMSIs:

1. Certain types of security interests that are subject to other federal or state laws may require additional steps to be perfected [UCC 9–311]. Many jurisdictions, for instance, have certificate-of-title statutes that establish perfection requirements for security interests in certain goods, including automobiles, trailers, boats, mobile homes, and farm tractors.

   Example 21.8 Martin purchases a boat at a Florida dealership. Florida has a certificate-of-title statute. Martin obtains financing for his purchase through General Credit Corporation. General Credit Corporation will need to file a certificate of title with the appropriate state official to perfect the PMSI.
2. PMSIs in nonconsumer goods, such as a business's inventory or livestock, are not automatically perfected [UCC 9–324]. These types of PMSIs will be discussed later in this chapter in the context of priorities.

Perfection and the Classification of Collateral Where or how to perfect a security interest sometimes depends on the classification or definition of the collateral. Collateral is generally divided into two classifications: tangible collateral (collateral that can be seen, felt, and touched) and intangible collateral (collateral that consists of or generates rights). Exhibit 21–2 summarizes the various classifications of collateral and the methods of perfecting a security interest in collateral falling within each of those classifications.[3]

3. There are additional classifications, such as agricultural liens, commercial tort claims, and investment property. For definitions of these types of collateral, see UCC 9–102(a)(5), (a)(13), and (a)(49).

Exhibit 21–2 Selected Types of Collateral and Their Methods of Perfection

TANGIBLE COLLATERAL		METHOD OF PERFECTION
All things that are movable at the time the security interest attaches or that are attached to land, including timber to be cut and growing crops.
1. Consumer Goods [UCC 9–301, 9–303, 9–309(1), 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Goods used or bought primarily for personal, family, or household purposes—for example, household furniture [UCC 9–102(a)(23)].	For purchase-money security interest, attachment (that is, the creation of a security interest) is sufficient. For boats, motor vehicles, and trailers, filing or compliance with a certificate-of-title statute is required. For other consumer goods, general rules of filing or possession apply.
2. Equipment [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Goods bought for or used primarily in business (and not part of inventory or farm products)—for example, a delivery truck [UCC 9–102(a)(33)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
3. Farm Products [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Crops (including aquatic goods), livestock, or supplies produced in a farming operation—for example, ginned cotton, milk, eggs, and maple syrup [UCC 9–102(a)(34)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
4. Inventory [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Goods held by a person for sale or under a contract of service or lease; raw materials held for production and work in progress [UCC 9–102(a)(48)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
INTANGIBLE COLLATERAL		METHOD OF PERFECTION
Nonphysical property that exists only in connection with something else.
1. Chattel Paper [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–312(a), 9–313(a), 9–314(a)]	A writing or electronic record that evidences both a monetary obligation and a security interest in goods and software used in goods—for example, a security agreement [UCC 9–102(a)(11), (a)(31), and (a)(78)].	Filing or possession or control by secured party.
2. Instruments [UCC 9–301, 9–309(4), 9–310(a), 9–312(a) and (e), 9–313(a)]	A negotiable instrument, such as a check, note, certificate of deposit, draft, or other writing that evidences a right to the payment of money and is not a security agreement or lease, but rather is a type that can ordinarily be transferred (after indorsement, if necessary) by delivery [UCC 9–102(a)(47)].	Normally filing or possession. For the sale of promissory notes, perfection can be by attachment (automatically on the creation of the security interest).
3. Accounts [UCC 9–301, 9–309(2) and (5), 9–310(a)]	Any right to receive payment for property (real or personal), including intellectual licensed property, services, insurance policies, and certain other receivables [UCC 9–102(a)(2) and (a)(46)].	Filing required except for certain assignments that can be perfected by attachment (automatically on the creation of the security interest).
4. Deposit Accounts [UCC 9–104, 9–304, 9–312(b), 9–314(a)]	Any demand, time, savings, passbook, or similar account maintained with a bank [UCC 9–102(a)(29)].	Perfection by control, such as when the secured party is the bank in which the account is maintained or when the parties have agreed that the secured party can direct the disposition of funds in a particular account.

Effective Time Duration of Perfection A financing statement is effective for five years from the date of filing [UCC 9–515]. If a continuation statement is filed within six months prior to the expiration date, the effectiveness of the original statement is continued for another five years, starting with the expiration date of the first five-year period [UCC 9–515(d), (e)]. The effectiveness of the statement can be continued in the same manner indefinitely. Any attempt to file a continuation statement outside the six-month window will render the continuation ineffective, however, and the perfection will lapse at the end of the five-year period.

Continuation Statement A statement that, if filed within six months prior to the expiration date of the original financing statement, continues the perfection of the security interest for another five years.

If a financing statement lapses, the security interest that had been perfected by the filing becomes unperfected. A purchaser for value can acquire the collateral as if the security interest had never been perfected [UCC 9–515(c)].

21–2 Scope of a Security Interest

A security interest can cover property in which the debtor has either present or future ownership or possessory rights. Therefore, security agreements can cover not only collateral in the present possession or control of the debtor but also proceeds from the sale of collateral, after-acquired property, and future advances, as discussed next.

21–2a Proceeds

Proceeds are whatever cash or property is received when collateral is sold or disposed of in some other way [UCC 9–102(a)(64)]. A security interest in the collateral gives the secured party a security interest in the proceeds acquired from the sale of that collateral.

Proceeds Under Article 9 of the UCC, whatever is received when collateral is sold or disposed of in some other way.

A security interest in proceeds perfects automatically on the perfection of the secured party's security interest in the original collateral. It remains perfected for twenty days after the debtor receives the proceeds. The parties can agree to extend the twenty-day automatic perfection period in their original security agreement [UCC 9–315(c), (d)]. This is typically done when the collateral is the type that is likely to be sold, such as a retailer's inventory of tablets or smartphones. The UCC also permits a security interest in identifiable cash proceeds to remain perfected after twenty days [UCC 9–315(d)(2)].

21–2b After-Acquired Property

After-acquired property is property that the debtor acquired after the execution of the security agreement. The security agreement may provide for a security interest in after-acquired property, such as a debtor's inventory [UCC 9–204(1)]. Generally, the debtor will purchase new inventory to replace the inventory sold. The secured party wants this newly acquired inventory to be subject to the original security interest. Thus, the after-acquired property clause continues the secured party's claim to any inventory acquired thereafter. (This is not to say that the original security interest will always take priority over the rights of all other creditors with regard to this after-acquired inventory, as will be discussed later.)

After-Acquired Property Property that is acquired by the debtor after the execution of a security agreement.

Example 21.9 Amato buys factory equipment from Bronson on credit, giving as security an interest in all of her equipment—both what she is buying and what she already owns. The security interest with Bronson contains an after-acquired property clause. Six months later, Amato pays cash to another seller of factory equipment for more equipment. Six months after that, Amato goes out of business before she has paid off her debt to Bronson. Bronson has a security interest in all of Amato's equipment, even the equipment bought from the other seller. ■

How can a security interest extend to a debtor's newly acquired inventory?

21–2c Future Advances

Often, a debtor will arrange with a bank to have a continuing line of credit under which the debtor can borrow funds intermittently. Advances against lines of credit can be subject to a properly perfected security interest in certain collateral.

Cross-Collateralization The use of an asset that is not the subject of a loan to collateralize that loan.

The security agreement may provide that any future advances made against that line of credit are also subject to the security interest in that collateral [UCC 9–204(c)]. Future advances do not have to be of the same type or otherwise related to the original advance to benefit from this type of cross-collateralization.[4] Cross-collateralization occurs when an asset that is not the subject of a loan is used to secure that loan.

Example 21.10 Stroh is the owner of a small manufacturing plant with equipment valued at $1 million. He has an immediate need for $50,000 of working capital, so he obtains a loan from Midwestern Bank and signs a security agreement, putting up all of his equipment as security. The bank properly perfects its security interest. The security agreement provides that Stroh can borrow up to $500,000 in the future, using the same equipment as collateral for any future advances. In this situation, Midwestern Bank does not have to execute a new security agreement and perfect a security interest in the collateral each time an advance is made, up to a cumulative total of $500,000. For priority purposes, each advance is perfected as of the date of the original perfection.

Can equipment be used as collateral for future advances?

21–2d The Floating-Lien Concept

A security agreement that provides for a security interest in proceeds, in after-acquired property, or in collateral subject to future advances by the secured party (or in all three) is often characterized as a floating lien. This type of security interest continues in the collateral or proceeds even if the collateral is sold, exchanged, or disposed of in some other way.

Floating Lien A security interest in proceeds, after-acquired property, or collateral (or all three) subject to future advances by the secured party. The security interest is retained even when the collateral changes in character, classification, or location.

A Floating Lien in Inventory Floating liens commonly arise in the financing of inventories. A creditor is not interested in specific pieces of inventory, which are constantly changing, so the lien "floats" from one item to another as the inventory changes.

Example 21.11 Cascade Sports, Inc., an Oregon corporation, operates as a cross-country ski dealer and has a line of credit with Portland First Bank to finance its inventory of cross-country skis. Cascade and Portland First enter into a security agreement that provides for coverage of proceeds, after-acquired inventory, present inventory, and future advances. Portland First perfects its security interest in the inventory by filing centrally with the office of the secretary of state in Oregon.

One day, Cascade sells a new pair of the latest cross-country skis and receives a used pair in trade. That same day, Cascade purchases two new pairs of cross-country skis from a local manufacturer for cash. Later that day, to meet its payroll, Cascade borrows $8,000 from Portland First Bank under the security agreement.

Portland First gets a perfected security interest in the used pair of skis under the proceeds clause and a perfected security interest in the two new pairs of skis under the after-acquired property clause. This collateral, as well as other inventory, secures the new funds advanced to Cascade under the future-advances clause. All of this is accomplished under the original perfected security interest. The various items in the inventory have changed, but Portland First still has a perfected security interest in Cascade's inventory. Hence, it has a floating lien in the inventory.

Know This

Secured creditors—perfected or not—have priority over unsecured creditors.

A Floating Lien in a Shifting Stock of Goods The concept of the floating lien can also apply to a shifting stock of goods. The lien can start with raw materials, follow them as they become finished goods and inventories, and continue as the goods are sold and are turned into accounts receivable, chattel paper, or cash.

21–3 Priorities, Rights, and Duties

When more than one party claims an interest in the same collateral, which has priority? The UCC sets out detailed rules to answer this question. The UCC also defines certain rights and duties of debtors and secured parties.

Focus Question 3

If two parties have perfected security interests in the debtor's collateral, which party has priority on default?

21–3a General Rules of Priority

General rules govern situations in which security interests conflict. If only one of the conflicting security interests has been perfected, then that security interest has priority. When more than one security interest has been perfected, the first security interest to be perfected (or filed) generally has priority over any security interests that are perfected later. If none of the security interests have been perfected, then the first security interest that attaches has priority.

The UCC's rules of priority can be summarized as follows:

1. Perfected security interest versus unsecured creditors and unperfected security interests. When two or more parties have claims to the same collateral, a perfected secured party's interest has priority over the interests of most other parties [UCC 9–322(a)(2)]. This includes priority to the proceeds from a sale of collateral resulting from a bankruptcy (giving the perfected secured party rights that are superior to those of a bankruptcy trustee).
2. Conflicting perfected security interests. When two or more secured parties have perfected security interests in the same collateral, the first to perfect (by filing or taking possession of the collateral) generally has priority [UCC 9–322(a)(1)].
3. Conflicting unperfected security interests. When two conflicting security interests are unperfected, the first to attach (be created) has priority [UCC 9–322(a)(3)]. This is sometimes called the "first-in-time" rule.

Example 21.12 Rick and his wife and son own a dairy farm called Lost Creek Heifers (LCH) that receives multiple loans through Ag Services, Inc. To obtain the loans, Rick executes a $800,000 promissory note and security agreement in favor of Ag Services. The note lists all of LCH's accounts, equipment, farm products, inventory, livestock, and proceeds as collateral. A year later, Rick and his wife separate, and he signs a separation agreement giving her some cash and land.

The following year, Rick buys out his son's interest in LCH by giving him a promissory note for $100,000. The note lists all of LCH's equipment, inventory, livestock, and proceeds as collateral. Rick also sells a herd of dairy cows for $500,000 and gives his former wife a check for $240,000. LCH files for bankruptcy shortly thereafter. A dispute arises over which party (Ag Services, Rick's son, or Rick's former wife) is entitled to the proceeds from the sale of the cows. In this situation, a court will likely find that because Ag Services' security interest in the proceeds was the first in time to attach, Ag Services has first priority to the proceeds. ■

MaxyM/Shutterstock.com

A family dairy farm operation is sold, and a dispute arises over who has priority to part of the proceeds. What are three rules of priority the court will follow?

The following case involved a priority dispute over the inventory of a car dealership that defaulted on its debts to two creditors—a bank that provided the dealership with a line of credit and a member of the dealership's sales staff who provided funds for the dealership to buy vehicles to sell.

Lewis v. Chris Carbine, Inc.

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Fourth Circuit, __ So.3d __, 2020 WL 1056966 (2020).

Facts Chris Carbine, the owner of Chris Carbine, Inc., doing business as Carbine Motor Cars, obtained a line of credit from Whitney Bank. Carbine granted the bank a security interest in the debtor's "present and future" inventory of vehicles and the proceeds from their sale. Whitney perfected its interest.

Later, Carbine entered into a contract with a member of its sales force, Kelly Lewis, who agreed to obtain a personal line of credit with Metairie Bank to provide funds for Carbine to buy vehicles. On the sale of the vehicles, Lewis was to be paid for their cost plus 30 percent of the profit. Carbine bought eight vehicles with funds from Lewis's line of credit and sold two before going out of business and defaulting on its debts.

Lewis filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Carbine, seeking payment for the two vehicles that were sold and transfer of title to the other six. Whitney petitioned to intervene, seeking to enforce its security interest. The court rendered a summary judgment in favor of the bank. Lewis appealed.

Issue Did Whitney's perfected security interest take priority over Lewis's interest in Carbine's property?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. "Whitney is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law."

Reason The appellate court explained that to make a security interest in a debtor's property effective against other creditors, a secured party must perfect the interest by filing a UCC financing statement. The purpose of the filing is to notify the public that the security interest exists and to give it priority over other interests if the debtor defaults. Creditors that do not perfect their interests do not realize these benefits.

In this case, Whitney obtained a security interest in all of Carbine's property, including its inventory, as collateral for an extension of a line of credit, and perfected the interest. Lewis had no security interest in the vehicles bought with his funds. He argued that the vehicles did not fall within Whitney's security interest because the bank did not provide the funding for them. The court stated, "This reasoning is frivolous." The vehicles bought with Lewis's funds were "explicitly for Carbine and offered for sale to the public by Carbine on Carbine premises. . . . Moreover, Whitney's UCC financing statements pertaining to those financial arrangements were in the public record."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment What might Lewis have done to avoid the result in this case? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Lewis had already been reimbursed for the two vehicles that had been sold, and Whitney sought to obtain the funds from Lewis as part of the bank's recovery for Carbine's default on its loan. Would the result have been different? Explain.

21–3b Exceptions to the General Priority Rules

Under some circumstances, on the debtor's default, the perfection of a security interest will not protect a secured party against certain other third parties having claims to the collateral. For instance, the UCC provides that in some situations a PMSI, properly perfected,[5] will prevail over another security interest in after-acquired collateral, even though the other was perfected first. We discuss some significant exceptions to the general rules of priority next.

Buyers in the Ordinary Course of Business Under the UCC, a person who buys "in the ordinary course of business" takes the goods free from any security interest created by the seller even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence [UCC 9–320(a)]. A buyer in the ordinary course of business is a person who in good faith, and without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another in the goods, buys goods in the ordinary course from a person in the business of selling goods of that kind [UCC 1–201(9)].[6] The rationale for this rule is obvious. If buyers could not obtain the goods free and clear of any security interest the merchant had created—for instance, in inventory—the free flow of goods in the marketplace would be hindered.

Example 21.13 Dubbs Auto grants a security interest in its inventory to Heartland Bank for a $300,000 line of credit. Heartland perfects its security interest by filing financing statements with the appropriate state offices. Dubbs uses $9,000 of its credit to buy two used trucks and delivers the certificates of title, which designate Dubbs as the owner, to Heartland.

Later, Dubbs sells one of the trucks to Murdoch and another to Laxton. National City Bank finances both purchases. New certificates of title are issued in the buyers' names, but Heartland receives none of the funds from the sales.

If Heartland sues National City, claiming that its security interest in the vehicles takes priority, it will lose. Because Murdoch and Laxton are buyers in the ordinary course of business, Heartland's security interest in the motor vehicles was extinguished when the vehicles were sold to them. (Dubbs still owes Heartland the $9,000, of course.)

PMSI in Inventory Another important exception to the first-in-time rule has to do with security interests in inventory. (Remember that a PMSI that is not in consumer goods must be perfected.) A perfected PMSI in inventory has priority over a conflicting security interest in the same inventory. To maintain this priority, the holder of the PMSI must notify the holder of the conflicting security interest on or before the time the debtor takes possession of the inventory [UCC 9–324(b)].

Buyers of the Collateral The UCC recognizes that there are certain types of buyers whose interests in purchased goods could conflict with those of a perfected secured party on the debtor's default. These include not only buyers in the ordinary course of business (as just discussed), but also buyers of farm products, chattel paper, instruments, documents, or securities. The UCC sets down special rules of priority for these types of buyers.

21–3c Rights and Duties of Debtors and Creditors

The security agreement itself determines most of the rights and duties of the debtor and the secured party. The UCC, however, imposes some rights and duties that are applicable unless the security agreement states otherwise.

Information Requests At the time of filing, a secured party can furnish a copy of the financing statement and request that the filing officer note the file number, date, and hour of the original filing on the copy [UCC 9–523(a)]. The filing officer must send this copy to the person designated by the secured party.

The filing officer must also give information to a person who is contemplating obtaining a security interest from a prospective debtor [UCC 9–523(c), (d)]. If requested, the filing officer must issue a certificate (for a fee) that provides information on possible perfected financing statements with respect to the named debtor.

Release, Assignment, and Amendment A secured party can release all or part of any collateral described in the financing statement, thereby terminating its security interest in that collateral. The release is recorded by filing a uniform amendment form [UCC 9–512, 9–521(b)].

A secured party can also assign all or part of the security interest to a third party (the assignee). The assignee becomes the secured party of record if the assignment is filed by use of a uniform amendment form [UCC 9–514, 9–521(a)].

6. Note that even though a buyer may know about the existence of a perfected security interest, the buyer must not know that purchasing the goods violates the rights of any third party.

If the debtor and the secured party agree, they can amend the filing—to add or substitute new collateral, for example—by filing a uniform amendment form that indicates the file number of the initial financing statement [UCC 9–512(a)]. The amendment does not extend the time period of perfection, but if new collateral is added, the perfection date (for priority purposes) for the new collateral begins on the date the amendment is filed [UCC 9–512(b), (c)].

Confirmation or Accounting Request by Debtor The debtor may believe that the amount of the unpaid debt or the list of collateral subject to the security interest is inaccurate. The debtor has the right to request a confirmation of the unpaid debt or list of collateral [UCC 9–210]. The debtor is entitled to one request without charge every six months.

The secured party must comply with the debtor's confirmation request by authenticating and sending to the debtor an accounting within fourteen days after the request is received. Otherwise, the secured party will be held liable for any loss suffered by the debtor, plus $500 [UCC 9–210, 9–625(f)].

Termination Statement When the debtor has fully paid the debt, if the secured party perfected the security interest by filing, the debtor is entitled to have a termination statement filed. Such a statement demonstrates to the public that the filed perfected security interest has been terminated [UCC 9–513].

Whenever consumer goods are involved, the secured party must file a termination statement (or, alternatively, a release). The statement must be filed within one month of the final payment or within twenty days of receiving the debtor's demand, whichever is earlier [UCC 9–513(b)]. When the collateral is not consumer goods, the secured party is not required to file or to send a termination statement unless the debtor demands one [UCC 9–513(c)].

21–4 Default

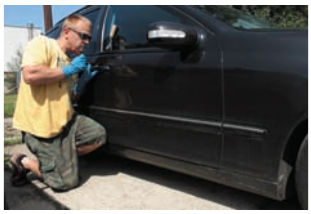
Article 9 defines the rights, duties, and remedies of the secured party and of the debtor on the debtor's default. If the secured party fails to comply with the specified duties, the debtor is afforded particular rights and remedies under the UCC.

21–4a What Constitutes Default?

What constitutes default is not always clear. In fact, Article 9 does not define the term. Instead, the UCC encourages parties to include in their security agreements the standards under which their rights and duties will be measured [UCC 9–601, 9–603]. In so doing, parties can stipulate the conditions that will constitute a default. Often, these critical terms are shaped by creditors in an attempt to provide themselves with the maximum protection possible. The terms must not, however, run counter to the UCC's provisions regarding good faith and unconscionability.

Any breach of the terms of the security agreement can constitute default. Nevertheless, default occurs most commonly when the debtor fails to meet the scheduled payments or becomes bankrupt.

21–4b Basic Remedies



UCC 9–601(a) and (b) set out rights and remedies for secured parties, and these rights and remedies are cumulative [UCC 9–601(c)]. Therefore, a creditor who is unsuccessful in enforcing rights by one method can pursue another method. Generally, a secured party's remedies can be divided into the two basic categories discussed next.

Repossession of the Collateral—The Self-Help Remedy On the debtor's default, a secured party can take peaceful possession of the collateral without the use of judicial process [UCC 9–609(b)]. This provision is often referred to as the "self-help" provision of Article 9.

The UCC does not define peaceful possession. The general rule is that the collateral has been taken peacefully if the secured party can take possession without trespassing, assaulting, or breaking and entering.

On taking possession, the secured party may either retain the collateral for satisfaction of the debt [UCC 9–620] or resell the goods and apply the proceeds toward the debt [UCC 9–610].

This man is not stealing this car. What UCC remedy might he be exercising instead?

Judicial Remedies Alternatively, a secured party can relinquish the security interest and use any judicial remedy available, such as obtaining a judgment on the underlying debt, followed by execution and levy [UCC 9–601(a)]. (Execution is the implementation of a court's decree or judgment. Levy is the legal process of obtaining funds through the seizure and sale of nonexempt property, usually done after a writ of execution has been issued.)

Execution The implementation of a court's decree or judgment.

Levy The legal process of obtaining funds through the seizure and sale of nonexempt property, usually done after a writ of execution has been issued.

21–4c Disposition of Collateral

Once default has occurred and the secured party has obtained possession of the collateral, the secured party can:

1. Retain the collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the debt (subject to limitations, discussed next).
2. Sell, lease, license, or otherwise dispose of the collateral in any commercially reasonable manner, and apply the proceeds toward satisfaction of the debt [UCC 9–602(7), 9–603, 9–610(a), 9–613, 9–620]. Any sale is always subject to procedures established by state law.

Retention of Collateral by the Secured Party Parties are sometimes better off if they do not sell the collateral. Therefore, the UCC generally allows secured parties to choose not to sell. A secured party may retain the collateral unless it consists of consumer goods and the debtor has paid 60 percent or more of the purchase price or loan amount (see the discussion of consumer goods for specifics). The general right to retain the collateral is subject to several limitations.

Notice Requirements. The secured party must notify the debtor of its proposal to retain the collateral. Notice is required unless the debtor has signed a statement renouncing or modifying her or his rights after default [UCC 9–620(a), 9–621]. If the collateral is consumer goods, the secured party does not need to give any other notice. In all other situations, the secured party must also send notice to any other secured party from whom the secured party has received notice of a claim of interest in the collateral.

Objections. The debtor or other party notified of the retention has the right to object. If, within twenty days after the notice is sent, the secured party receives a written objection, the secured party must sell or otherwise dispose of the collateral. If no written objection is received, the secured party may retain the collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the debtor's obligation [UCC 9–620(a), 9–621].

Consumer Goods When the collateral is consumer goods and the debtor has paid 60 percent of the purchase price on a PMSI or the loan amount on a non-PMSI, the secured party cannot retain the goods. Instead, the secured party is required to sell or otherwise dispose of the repossessed collateral within ninety days [UCC 9–620(e), (f)]. Failure to comply opens the secured party to an action for conversion or other liability under UCC 9–625(b) and (c). A secured party will not be liable, however, if the consumer-debtor signed a written statement after default renouncing or modifying the right to demand the sale of the goods [UCC 9–624].

When is a creditor required to sell or otherwise dispose of the repossessed collateral?

Disposition Procedures A secured party who does not choose to retain the collateral or who is required to sell it must follow the disposition procedures prescribed in the UCC. The sale can be public or private. The collateral can be disposed of in its present condition or following any commercially reasonable preparation or processing [UCC 9–610(a)].

Cameron Spencer/Getty Images

Is the sale of collateral at auction a reasonable means of disposing of that collateral?

Notice Requirement. The secured party must notify the debtor and other specified parties in writing ahead of time about the sale or disposition of the collateral. If the collateral is consumer goods, the notice must specify the method of intended disposition. Notification is not required if the collateral is perishable, will decline rapidly in value, or is a type customarily sold on a recognized market [UCC 9–611(b), (c)].

Commercially Reasonable Manner. Every aspect of the method, manner, time, and place of disposition must be commercially reasonable [UCC 9–610(b)]. If the secured party does not dispose of the collateral in a commercially reasonable manner, the price paid for the collateral at the sale may be negatively affected. In that situation, a court can reduce the amount of any deficiency that the debtor owes to the secured party [UCC 9–626(a)(3)].

The issue in the following case was whether the creditor's disposition of the collateral was commercially reasonable.

SunTrust Bank v. Monroe

Court of Appeals of Texas, Fort Worth, 2018 WL 651198 (2018).

Facts Liberty Redevelopment Group, LLC, financed the purchase of an Aston Martin for $233,305.46 with a loan from the dealer, Aston Martin of Dallas. Mark Monroe, a Liberty officer and the owner and operator of Delta Bail Bonds, co-signed for the loan. The dealer assigned the loan to SunTrust Bank. Seven months later, Liberty defaulted on the payments. SunTrust repossessed the car and sold it at auction for $115,000.

The bank filed a suit in a Texas state court against Monroe to recover the deficiency between the auction price and the balance of the loan, plus $38,000 in repossession expenses. Monroe responded that the sale was not made in a commercially reasonable manner. A jury agreed with Monroe and found that he owed SunTrust nothing. The bank appealed.

Issue Did the jury reasonably determine that SunTrust did not dispose of the collateral in a commercially reasonable manner?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment. "Because the jury found that SunTrust did not dispose of the collateral in a commercially reasonable manner, Monroe's liability for a deficiency was limited. . . . The trial court entered a take-nothing judgment. . . . We affirm."

Reason Among the factors that can determine commercial reasonableness are "whether the secured party endeavored to obtain the best price possible; whether the collateral was sold . . . at a propitious [favorable] time; whether the expenses incurred during the sale were reasonable and necessary; . . . what state the collateral was in; and where the sale was conducted." If the sale was at auction, another factor is "whether multiple bids were received."

In this case, Monroe was not informed of the time, date, place, or anything else about the sale. He researched the car's value, which appeared to be between $165,000 and $175,000—much more than the auction price of $115,000. As for the repossession expense, Monroe stated that as a bail bondsman, he had never seen such a high fee. SunTrust did not otherwise show that the sale of the collateral was commercially reasonable. There was no evidence of the vehicle's condition or of an attempt to obtain the best price. And there was no proof that the expenses incurred in the sale were reasonable and necessary.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Is a low price sufficient to establish that a sale of collateral was not made in a commercially reasonable manner? Explain.
- Economic A jury has broad discretion to identify the value of collateral in a commercially reasonable transaction. What evidence might provide a rational basis for this determination?

Distribution of Proceeds from the Disposition Proceeds from the disposition of collateral after default on the underlying debt are distributed in the following order:

1. Reasonable expenses incurred by the secured party in repossessing, storing, and reselling the collateral are paid first.
2. The balance of the debt owed to the secured party is then paid.
3. Other lienholders who have made written or authenticated demands are paid.
4. Any surplus goes to the debtor, unless the collateral consists of accounts, payment intangibles, promissory notes, or chattel paper [UCC 9–608(a); 9–615(a), (e)].

Noncash Proceeds Sometimes the secured party receives noncash proceeds from the disposition of collateral after default. Whenever that occurs, the secured party must make a value determination and apply this value in a commercially reasonable manner [UCC 9–608(a)(3), 9–615(c)].

Deficiency Judgment Often, after proper disposition of the collateral, the secured party has not collected all that the debtor still owes. Unless otherwise agreed, the debtor normally is liable for any deficiency, and the creditor can obtain a deficiency judgment from a court to collect this amount. Practically speaking, though, debtors who have defaulted on a loan rarely have the cash to pay any deficiency.

Deficiency Judgment A judgment against a debtor for the amount of a debt remaining unpaid after the collateral has been repossessed and sold.

Note that if the underlying transaction was a sale of accounts, chattel paper, or promissory notes, the debtor is not liable for any deficiency. Also, the debtor normally is entitled to any surplus from the disposition of these types of collateral [UCC 9–615(e)].

Redemption Rights The debtor or any other secured party can exercise the right of redemption of the collateral. Redemption may occur at any time before the secured party disposes of the collateral, enters into a contract for its disposition, or discharges the debtor's obligation by retaining the collateral. The debtor or other secured party exercises the redemption right by tendering performance of all obligations secured by the collateral and by paying the expenses reasonably incurred by the secured party in retaking and maintaining the collateral [UCC 9–623].

Ethical Issue

How long should a secured party have to seek a deficiency judgment? Because of depreciation, the amount received from the sale of collateral is frequently less than the amount the debtor owes to the secured party. As noted, the secured party can file a suit against the debtor in an attempt to collect the balance due. Article 9 does not contain a statute of limitations provision, so it is not clear how long a secured party has after default to file a deficiency suit against a debtor. If the secured party waits until the debtor becomes solvent again, though, the court may not allow the suit. When creditors have sued debtors for deficiencies owed on repossessed cars, for instance, courts have sometimes applied the four-year limitation period in Article 2 because the transaction was a sale of goods, even though a security interest was involved.[7] Is this fair?

21–5 Other Laws Assisting Creditors

Both the common law and statutory laws other than Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code create rights and remedies for creditors. These remedies are available regardless of whether a creditor is secured or unsecured. Here, we discuss some of these rights and remedies.

21–5a Liens

A lien is an encumbrance on (claim against) property to satisfy a debt or protect a claim for the payment of a debt. Creditors' liens may arise under the common law or under statutory law. Statutory liens include mechanic's liens, whereas artisan's liens were recognized by common law. Judicial liens arise when a creditor attempts to collect on a debt before or after a judgment is entered by a court.

Liens can be useful because a lien creditor generally has priority over an unperfected secured party. In other words, if a creditor obtains a lien before another party perfects a security interest in the same property, the lienholder has priority. If the lien is obtained after another's security interest in the property is perfected, the perfected security interest has priority. Mechanic's and artisan's liens are exceptions to this rule. They normally take priority even over perfected security interests, unless a statute provides otherwise.

Mechanic's Lien Sometimes, a person who has contracted for labor, services, or materials to be furnished for making improvements on real property does not immediately pay for the improvements. When that happens, the creditor can place a mechanic's lien on the property.

Mechanic's Lien A nonpossessory, filed lien on an owner's real estate for labor, services, or materials furnished for making improvements on the realty.

A mechanic's lien creates a special type of debtor-creditor relationship in which the real estate itself becomes security for the debt. If the property owner fails to pay the debt, the lienholder is technically entitled to foreclose on the real estate and sell it. (Foreclosure is the process by which a creditor legally takes a debtor's property to satisfy a debt.) The sale proceeds are then used to pay the debt and the costs of the legal proceedings. The surplus, if any, is paid to the former owner.

In the real world, however, small-amount mechanic's liens are rarely the basis of foreclosure. Rather, these liens simply remain on the books of the state until the property is sold. At closing (when the sale is finalized), the seller agrees to pay all mechanic's liens out of the proceeds of the sale before the seller receives any of the funds. Mechanic's liens for significant amounts, such as when a contractor is owed millions for building an apartment complex, sometimes do lead to foreclosure.[8]

State law governs the procedures that must be followed to create a mechanic's lien. Generally, the lienholder must file a written notice of lien within a specific time period (usually 60 to 120 days) from the last date that labor or materials were provided.

Artisan's Lien When a debtor fails to pay for labor and materials furnished for the repair or improvement of personal property, a creditor can recover payment through an artisan's lien.

Artisan's Lien A possessory lien held by a party who has made improvements and added value to the personal property of another party as security for payment for services performed.

Lienholder Must Retain Possession. In contrast to a mechanic's lien, an artisan's lien is possessory. The lienholder ordinarily must have retained possession of the property and expressly or impliedly agreed to provide the services on a cash, not a credit, basis. The lien remains in existence as long as the lienholder maintains possession of the property, and the lien is terminated once possession is voluntarily surrendered, unless the surrender is only temporary.

Case Example 21.14 Carrollton Exempted Village School District (in Ohio) hired Clean Vehicle Solutions America, LLC (CVSA, based in New York), to convert ten school buses from diesel to compressed natural gas. The contract price was $660,000. The district paid a $400,000 deposit and agreed to pay installments of $26,000 to CVSA after the delivery of each converted bus. After the first two buses were delivered, the district refused to continue the contract, claiming that the conversion made the two buses unsafe to drive.

Both parties filed breach of contract lawsuits. CVSA also asserted an artisan's lien over two other buses that it still had in its possession because it had started converting them to natural gas and had spent $65,000 doing so. Regardless of the outcome of the parties' lawsuit, CVSA had an artisan's lien that gave it a priority claim to those two buses as long as they remained in its possession. The buses acted as security for the district's payment of the amount that CVSA had spent converting them to natural gas.[9]

A dispute over payment arose in a contract to convert school buses to natural gas. For the lien on the buses to remain in effect, what must the lienholder do?

Foreclosure on Personal Property. Modern statutes permit the holder of an artisan's lien to foreclose and sell the property subject to the lien to satisfy payment of the debt. As with a mechanic's lien, the holder of an artisan's lien must give notice to the owner of the property prior to foreclosure and sale. The sale proceeds are used to pay the debt and the costs of the legal proceedings, and the surplus, if any, is paid to the former owner.

Judicial Liens When a debt is past due, a creditor can bring a legal action against the debtor to collect the debt. If the creditor is successful, the court awards the creditor a judgment against the debtor (usually for the amount of the debt plus any interest and legal costs incurred). Frequently, however, the creditor is unable to collect the awarded amount.

To ensure that a judgment will be collectible, the creditor can request that certain nonexempt property of the debtor be seized to satisfy the debt. (Under state or federal statutes, certain property is exempt from attachment by creditors.) A court's order to seize the debtor's property is known as a writ of attachment if it is issued before a judgment. If the order is issued after a judgment, it is referred to as a writ of execution.

Writ of Attachment. In the context of judicial liens, attachment is a court-ordered seizure of property before a judgment is secured for a past-due debt. Attachment rights are created by state statutes. Because attachment is a prejudgment remedy, it occurs at the time a lawsuit is filed or immediately afterward. The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution requires that the debtor be given notice and an opportunity to be heard before property can be seized.

To use attachment, a creditor must comply with the specific state's statutory restrictions and requirements. The creditor must have an enforceable right to payment of the debt under law and must follow certain procedures. Otherwise, the creditor may be liable for damages for wrongful attachment. The typical procedures for attachment are as follows:

1. The creditor files with the court an affidavit (a written statement, made under oath) stating that the debtor has failed to pay. The affidavit must indicate the statutory grounds for seeking attachment.
2. The creditor must post a bond to cover at least the court costs, the value of the property attached, and the value of the loss of use of that property suffered by the debtor.
3. When the court is satisfied that all the requirements have been met, it issues a writ of attachment. The writ directs the sheriff or other officer to seize the debtor's nonexempt property. If the creditor prevails at trial, the seized property can be sold to satisfy the judgment.

Writ of Attachment A court order to seize a debtor's nonexempt property prior to a court's final determination of a creditor's rights to the property.

Writ of Execution A court order directing the sheriff to seize (levy) and sell a debtor's nonexempt real or personal property to satisfy a court's judgment in the creditor's favor.

Writ of Execution. If the creditor wins a judgment against a debtor and the debtor will not or cannot pay the amount due, the creditor can request a writ of execution. A writ of execution is an order that directs the sheriff to seize (levy) and sell any of the debtor's nonexempt real or personal property. The writ applies only to property that is within the court's geographic jurisdiction (usually the county in which the courthouse is located).

The proceeds of the sale are used to pay off the judgment, accrued interest, and the costs of the sale. Any excess is paid to the debtor. The debtor can pay the judgment and redeem the nonexempt property any time before the sale takes place. (Because of exemption laws and bankruptcy laws, many judgments are uncollectible.)

Garnishment A legal process whereby a creditor collects a debt by seizing property of the debtor that is in the hands of a third party.

An order for garnishment permits a creditor to collect a debt by seizing property of the debtor that is being held by a third party. As a result of a garnishment proceeding, for instance, a debtor's employer may be ordered by the court to turn over a portion of the debtor's wages to pay the debt. Many other types of property can be garnished as well, including funds in a bank account, tax refunds, pensions, and trust funds. It is only necessary that the property not be exempt from garnishment and be in the possession of a third party.

Procedures Garnishment can be a prejudgment remedy, requiring a hearing before a court, but it is most often a postjudgment remedy. State law governs garnishment, so the procedure varies.

In some states, the creditor needs to obtain only one order of garnishment, which will then apply continuously to the debtor's wages until the entire debt is paid. In other states, the judgment creditor must go back to court for a separate order of garnishment for each pay period.

Limitations Both federal and state laws limit the amount that can be taken through garnishment proceedings.[10] Federal law provides a framework to protect debtors from suffering unduly when paying judgment debts by setting limits on how much can be garnished per pay period.[11] State laws also provide dollar exemptions, and these amounts are often larger than those provided by federal law. In addition, under federal law, an employer cannot dismiss an employee because the employee's wages are being garnished.

Case Example 21.15 Gwendolyn Berry pleaded guilty to stealing funds from her employers. At sentencing, she was ordered to pay restitution of more than $2 million. To enforce this judgment, the government garnished 50 percent of two investment retirement accounts (IRAs) belonging to Gwendolyn's husband, Michael. A federal appeals court upheld the garnishment, holding that in Texas, where the Berrys lived, a spouse has one-half interest in another spouse's solely managed community property, including IRAs. Therefore, half of Michael's IRA was part of Gwendolyn's garnishable property.

Attempting to reduce the amount of the court order, the Berrys cited a federal law that limits restitution-related garnishments to 25 percent of "weekly earnings." If Michael liquidated his IRA, they argued, that would be same as getting "earnings," and thus the law applied to this case. The court was not convinced, ruling that the definition of earnings—"compensation paid or payable for personable services"—could not be stretched to include cashed-in investments.[12]

10. Some states (for example, Texas) do not permit garnishment of wages by private parties except under a child-support order.

11. For instance, the federal Consumer Credit Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. Sections 1601–1693r, provides that a debtor can retain either 75 percent of disposable earnings per week or a sum equivalent to thirty hours of work paid at federal minimum-wage rates, whichever is greater.

21–5c Creditors' Composition Agreements

Creditors may contract with debtors for discharge of the debtors' liquidated debts (debts that are definite, or fixed, in amount) on payment of a sum less than that owed. These agreements are called creditors' composition agreements, or simply composition agreements, and usually are held to be enforceable.

Creditors' Composition Agreements Contracts between debtors and creditors in which the creditors agree to discharge the debts on the debtors' payment of a sum less than the amount actually owed.

21–5d Suretyship and Guaranty

When a third person promises to pay a debt owed by another in the event that the debtor does not pay, either a suretyship or a guaranty relationship is created. Exhibit 21–3 illustrates these relationships. The third person's income and assets become the security for the debt owed.

Suretyship and guaranty provide creditors with the right to seek payment from the third party if the primary debtor defaults on her or his obligations. At common law, there were significant differences in the liability of a surety and a guarantor, as discussed in the following subsections. Today, however, the distinctions outlined here have been abolished in some states.

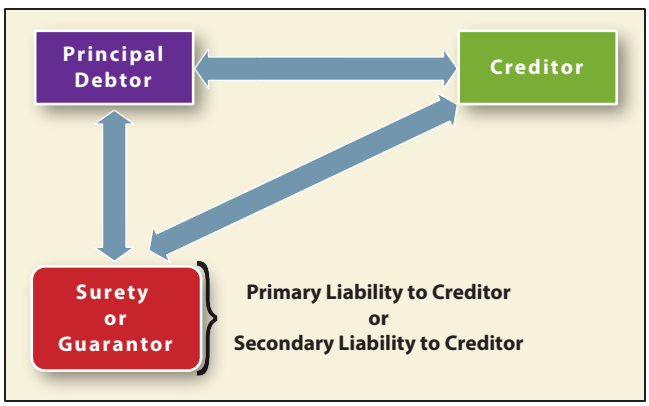
What is a suretyship, and how does it differ from a guaranty?

Surety A contract of strict suretyship is a promise made by a third person to be responsible for the debtor's obligation. It is an express contract between the surety (the third party) and the creditor. The surety in the strictest sense is primarily liable for the debt of the principal. The creditor need not exhaust all legal remedies against the principal debtor before holding the surety responsible for payment. The creditor can demand payment from the surety from the moment the debt is due.

Suretyship A promise made by a third party to be responsible for a debtor's obligation.



Surety A third party who agrees to be primarily responsible for the debt of another.

Example 21.15 Roberto wants to borrow from the bank to buy a used car. Because Roberto is still in college, the bank will not lend him the funds unless his father, José, who has dealt with the bank before, will cosign the note (add his signature to the note, thereby becoming a surety and thus jointly liable for payment of the debt). When José cosigns the note, he becomes primarily liable to the bank. On the note's due date, the bank can seek payment from either Roberto or José, or both jointly. ■

Guaranty With a suretyship arrangement, the surety is primarily liable for the debtor's obligation. With a guaranty arrangement, the guarantor—the third person making the guaranty—is secondarily liable. The guarantor can be required to pay the obligation only after the principal debtor defaults, and default usually takes place only after the creditor has made an attempt to collect from the debtor.

Guarantor A third party who agrees to be secondarily liable for the debt of another (the debtor) only after the principal debtor defaults.

Case Example 21.16 Staff members at Altercare, a nursing home, told resident Connie Turner that her insurance company was covering all costs related to her stay. After Turner left Altercare, however, the nursing home sued to recover an unpaid bill of nearly $8,000. The trial court found that, because the assurances on which she had relied were untrue, Turner did not owe Altercare any repayment. Altercare then tried to recover the costs from Victoria Cox, Turner's granddaughter, who had signed several forms as guarantor of Turner's financial obligations to Altercare. An Ohio appeals court blocked this maneuver, holding that a guarantor could not be held responsible for debts that the debtor was not legally required to pay.[13]

Actions That Release the Surety and Guarantor Basically, the same actions will release a surety or a guarantor from an obligation. In general, the following rules apply to both sureties and guarantors, but for simplicity, we refer just to sureties:

1. Material modification. Making any material modification to the terms of the original contract without the surety's consent will discharge the surety's obligation. The extent to which the surety is discharged depends on whether the surety was compensated and the amount of the loss suffered as a result of the modification. For instance, a father who receives no consideration in return for acting as a surety on his daughter's loan will be completely discharged if the loan contract is modified without his consent.
2. Surrender of property. If a creditor surrenders the collateral to the debtor or impairs the collateral without the surety's consent, these acts can reduce the obligation of the surety. If the creditor's actions reduce the value of the property used as collateral, the surety is released to the extent of any loss suffered.
3. Payment or tender of payment. Naturally, any payment of the principal obligation by the debtor or by another person on the debtor's behalf will discharge the surety from the obligation. Even if the creditor refused to accept payment of the principal debt when it was tendered, the obligation of the surety can be discharged (if the creditor knew about the suretyship).

Blend_Images/DigitalVision/Getty Images

Many parents are sureties for their children's student loans. If the student loan is materially modified without the parents' knowledge, can the parents' obligation be completely discharged?

Defenses of the Surety and the Guarantor Generally, the surety (or guarantor) can also assert any of the defenses available to the principal debtor to avoid liability on the obligation to the creditor. A few exceptions do exist, however. The surety cannot assert the principal debtor's incapacity or bankruptcy as a defense. Nor can the surety assert the statute of limitations as a defense.

Obviously, a surety (or guarantor) may also have her or his own defenses. For instance, the surety can assert her or his own incapacity or bankruptcy as a defense. Furthermore, if the creditor fraudulently induced the surety to guarantee the debt of the debtor, the surety can assert fraud as a defense. In most states, the creditor has a legal duty to inform the surety, before the formation of the suretyship contract, of material facts known by the creditor that would substantially increase the surety's risk. Failure to so inform may constitute fraud and render the suretyship obligation voidable.

Rights of the Surety and the Guarantor Usually, when the surety (or guarantor) pays the debt owed to the creditor, the surety (or guarantor) is entitled to certain rights.

Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Right of Subrogation. The surety has the legal right of subrogation, which means that any right the creditor had against the debtor now becomes the right of the surety. Included are creditor rights in bankruptcy, rights to collateral possessed by the creditor, and rights to judgments secured by the creditor. In short, the surety stands in the shoes of the creditor and may pursue any remedies that were available to the creditor against the debtor.

Right of Subrogation The right of a party to stand in the place of another, giving the substituted party the same legal rights that the original party had.

The Right of Reimbursement. The surety has a right of reimbursement from the debtor. Basically, the surety is entitled to receive from the debtor all outlays made on behalf of the suretyship arrangement. Such outlays can include expenses incurred as well as the actual amount of the debt paid to the creditor.

Right of Reimbursement The right of a party to be repaid for costs, expenses, or losses incurred on behalf of another.

The Right of Contribution. When two or more sureties are involved in a suretyship agreement, each is called a co-surety. A co-surety who pays more than that co-surety's proportionate share on a debtor's default is entitled to recover the excess amount from the other co-sureties. This is the right of contribution. Generally, a co-surety's liability either is determined by agreement between the co-sureties or, in the absence of an agreement, is specified in the suretyship contract itself.

Co-Surety A party who assumes liability jointly with another surety for the payment of a debtor's obligation under a suretyship arrangement.

Right of Contribution The right of a co-surety who pays more than a proportionate share on a debtor's default to recover the excess paid from other co-sureties.

Example 21.17 Two co-sureties—Yasser and Itzhak—are obligated under a suretyship contract to guarantee the debt of Jules. Itzhak's maximum liability is $15,000, and Yasser's is $10,000. Jules owes $10,000 and is in default. Itzhak pays the creditor the entire $10,000.

In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, Itzhak can recover $4,000 from Yasser. The amount of the debt that Yasser agreed to cover is divided by the total amount that Itzhak and Yasser together agreed to cover. The result is multiplied by the amount of the default, yielding the amount that Yasser owes: ($10,000 ÷ $25,000) × $10,000 = $4,000. ■

Paul Barton owned a small property-management company, doing business as Brighton Homes. In October, Barton went on a spending spree. First, he bought a Bose surround-sound system for his home from KDM Electronics. The next day, he purchased a Wilderness Systems kayak from Outdoor Outfitters, and the day after that he bought a new Toyota 4-Runner financed through Bridgeport Auto. Two weeks later, Barton purchased six new iMac computers for his office, also from KDM Electronics. Barton bought all of these items under installment sales contracts. Six months later, Barton's property-management business was failing. He could not make the payments due on any of these purchases and thus defaulted on the loans. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. For which of Barton's purchases (the surround-sound system, the kayak, the 4-Runner, and the six iMacs) would the creditor need to file a financing statement to perfect its security interest?
2. Suppose that Barton's contract for the office computers mentioned only the name Brighton Homes. What would be the consequences if KDM Electronics filed a financing statement that listed only Brighton Homes as the debtor's name?
3. Which of these purchases would qualify as a PMSI in consumer goods?
4. Suppose that after KDM Electronics repossesses the surround-sound system, it decides to keep the system rather than sell it. Can KDM do this under Article 9? Why or why not?

Debate This

A financing statement that does not have the debtor's exact name should still be effective because creditors should always be protected when debtors default.

Chapter Summary: Security Interests and Creditors' Rights

Creating a Security Interest	1. Unless the creditor has possession of the collateral, there must be a written or authenticated security agreement that clearly describes the collateral subject to the security interest and is signed or authenticated by the debtor. 2. The secured party must give value to the debtor. 3. The debtor must have rights in the collateral.
Perfecting a Security Interest	1. Perfection by filing—The most common method of perfection is by filing a financing statement containing the names of the secured party and the debtor and identifying the collateral covered by the financing statement. The financing statement must be filed under the name of the debtor. Trade names normally are not sufficient. 2. Perfection without filing— a. By possession—The debtor can transfer possession of the collateral to the secured party. A pledge is an example of this type of transfer. b. By attachment—Some types of security interests are perfected automatically when they are created. The most common is the purchase-money security interest (PMSI) in consumer goods. 3. Classification of collateral—The classification of collateral determines how and where a security interest is perfected (see Exhibit 21–2).
Scope of a Security Interest	A security agreement can cover the following types of property: 1. Collateral in the present possession or control of the debtor. 2. Proceeds from a sale, exchange, or disposition of secured collateral. 3. After-acquired property—A security agreement may provide that property acquired after execution of the agreement will also be secured by the agreement. This provision is often included in security agreements covering a debtor's inventory. 4. Future advances—A security agreement may provide that any future advances made against a line of credit will be subject to the initial security interest in the same collateral. 5. The floating-lien concept—This type of security interest continues in the collateral or proceeds even if the collateral changes in character, classification, or location.
Priorities	1. General rules— a. Perfected security interest versus unsecured creditors and unperfected security interests—A perfected secured party's interest has priority over the interests of most other parties. b. Conflicting perfected security interests—When two or more secured parties have perfected security interests in the same collateral, the first to perfect generally has priority [UCC 9–322(a)(1)]. c. Conflicting unperfected security interests—When two conflicting security interests are unperfected, the first to attach (be created) has priority [UCC 9–322(a)(3)].

	2. Exceptions— a. In some instances, a PMSI, properly perfected, will prevail over another security interest in after-acquired collateral, even though the other was perfected first. b. A buyer of goods in the ordinary course of the seller's business prevails over a secured party's security interest, even if the security interest is perfected and even if the buyer knows of its existence [UCC 9–320(a)]. c. A perfected PMSI in inventory has priority over a conflicting security interest in the same inventory. d. Exceptions also exist for buyers of farm products, chattel paper, instruments, documents, or securities.
Rights and Duties	1. Information request—On request by the filing party, the filing officer must send a statement listing the file number, the date, and the hour of the filing of the financing statement to the person making the request. 2. Release, assignment, and amendment—A secured party may (a) release part or all of the collateral described in a filed financing statement, thus ending the creditor's security interest, or (b) assign part or all of the security interest to another party. If the debtor and the secured party agree, they can also amend the filed statement. 3. Confirmation or accounting request by debtor—If the debtor requests a confirmation of the unpaid debt or a list of the collateral, the secured party must send the debtor an authenticated accounting within fourteen days. 4. Termination statement—When a debt is paid, the secured party generally must file a termination statement. If the financing statement covers consumer goods, the termination statement must be filed by the secured party within one month after the debt is paid or within twenty days of receiving the debtor's demand, whichever is earlier.
Default	Parties can stipulate the conditions that will constitute a default, so long as they do not run counter to the UCC's provisions regarding good faith and unconscionability. Default occurs most commonly when the debtor fails to meet scheduled payments or becomes bankrupt. 1. Basic Remedies—The secured party's remedies are the self-help remedy (repossession of the collateral) and judicial remedies (such as obtaining a judgment on the underlying debt, followed by execution and levy). 2. Disposition of collateral—On the debtor's default, and once the secured party has possession of the collateral, the secured party may do either of the following: a. Retain the collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the debt (subject to limitations). b. Sell, lease, license, or otherwise dispose of the collateral in any commercially reasonable manner and apply the proceeds toward satisfaction of the debt [UCC 9–602(7), 9–603, 9–610(a), 9–613, 9–620]. Any sale is subject to procedures established by state law.
Other Laws Assisting Creditors	1. Mechanic's lien—A nonpossessory, filed lien on an owner's real estate for labor, services, or materials furnished for making improvements on the realty. 2. Artisan's lien—A possessory lien on an owner's personal property for labor performed or value added. 3. Judicial liens— a. Writ of attachment—A court order to seize a debtor's nonexempt property prior to a court's final determination of a creditor's rights to the property. Attachment is available only if the creditor complies with the applicable state statutes. b. Writ of execution—A court order directing the sheriff to seize (levy) and sell a debtor's non-exempt real or personal property to satisfy a court's judgment in the creditor's favor. 4. Garnishment—A collection remedy that allows a creditor to collect a debt by seizing property of the debtor that is being held by a third party. 5. Creditors' composition agreements—Contracts between debtors and creditors in which the creditors agree to discharge the debts on the debtors' payment of a sum less than the amount actually owed. 6. Suretyships and guaranty—Arrangements by which, under contract, a third person agrees to be primarily or secondarily liable for the debt owed by the principal debtor. A creditor can turn to this third person for satisfaction of the debt.

1. Liberty Bank loans Michelle $5,000 to buy a car, which is used as collateral to secure the loan. After repaying less than 50 percent of the loan, Michelle defaults. Liberty could repossess and keep the car, but the bank does not want it. What are the alternatives? (See Priorities, Rights, and Duties.)
2. Jorge contracts with Midwest Roofing to fix his roof. Jorge pays half of the contract price in advance. Midwest completes the job, but Jorge refuses to pay the rest of the price. What can Midwest do? (See Other Laws Assisting Creditors.)

21–1. Priority Disputes. Redford is a seller of electric generators. He purchases a large quantity of generators from a manufacturer, Mallon Corp., by making a down payment and signing an agreement to pay the balance over a period of time. The agreement gives Mallon Corp. a security interest in the generators and the proceeds. Mallon Corp. properly files a financing statement on its security interest. Redford receives the generators and immediately sells one of them to Garfield on an installment contract with payment to be made in twelve equal installments. At the time of the sale, Garfield knows of Mallon's security interest. Two months later, Redford goes into default on his payments to Mallon. Discuss Mallon's rights against purchaser Garfield in this situation. (See Priorities, Rights, and Duties.)

21–2. Perfection. Marsh has a prize horse named Arabian Knight. In need of working capital, Marsh borrows $5,000 from Mendez, who takes possession of Arabian Knight as security for the loan. No written agreement is signed. Discuss whether, in the absence of a written agreement, Mendez has a security interest in Arabian Knight. If Mendez does have a security interest, is it a perfected security interest? Explain. (See Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest.)

21–3. Guaranty. Timothy Martinez, owner of Koenig & Vits, Inc. (K&V), guaranteed K&V's debt to Community Bank & Trust. The guaranty stated that the bank was not required to seek payment of the debt from any other source before enforcing the guaranty. K&V defaulted. Through a Wisconsin state court, the bank sought payment of $536,739.40, plus interest at the contract rate of 7.5 percent, from Martinez. Martinez argued that the bank could not enforce his guaranty while other funds were available to satisfy K&V's debt. For instance, the debt might be paid out of the proceeds of a sale of corporate assets. Is this an effective defense to a guaranty? Why or why not? [Community Bank & Trust v. Koenig & Vits, Inc., 346 Wis.2d 279 (Wis.App. 2013)] (See Other Laws Assisting Creditors.)

21–4. Liens. Daniel and Katherine Balk asked Jirak Construction, LLC, to remodel their farmhouse in Lawler, Iowa. Jirak provided the Balks with an initial estimate of $45,975 for the cost. Over the course of the work, the Balks made significant changes to the plan. Jirak agreed to the changes and regularly advised the Balks about the increasing costs. In mid-project, Jirak provided an itemized breakdown at their request. The Balks paid Jirak $67,000 but refused to pay more. Jirak claimed that they still owed $55,000 in labor and materials. Jirak filed a suit in an Iowa state court against the Balks to collect. Which of the liens discussed in this chapter would be most useful to Jirak in its attempt to collect? How does that type of lien work? Is the court likely to enforce it in this case? Explain. [Jirak Construction, LLC v. Balk, 863 N.W.2d 35 (Iowa App. 2015)] (See Other Laws Assisting Creditors.)

21–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Perfection of a Security Interest. G&K Farms, a North Dakota partnership, operated a farm in Texas. G&K was insured under the Supplemental Revenue Assistance Payments Program (SURE), through which the federal government provides financial assistance for crop losses caused by natural disasters. PHI Financial Services, Inc., loaned G&K $6.6 million. PHI filed a financing statement that described the collateral as the debtor's interest in "Government Payments." The document did not refer to the farm's crops. G&K defaulted on the loan. Later, G&K received a SURE payment for crop losses and transferred some of the funds to its law firm, Johnston Law Office, P.C., in payment for services. PHI brought an action against Johnston to recover those funds as partial payment on its loan to G&K. Johnston argued that PHI did not have a perfected security interest in the SURE payment because the financing statement did not identify the crops. Was the description of the collateral in the financing statement sufficient? Why or why not? [PHI Financial Services, Inc. v. Johnston Law Office, P.C., 2016 ND 20, 874 N.W.2d 910 (2016)] (See Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 21–5, go to Appendix E.

21–6. Laws Assisting Creditors. Grand Harbour Condominium Owners Association, Inc., obtained a judgment in an Ohio state court against Gene and Nancy Grogg for $45,458.86. To satisfy the judgment, Grand Harbour filed a notice of garnishment with the court, seeking funds held by the Groggs in various banks.

The Groggs disputed Grand Harbour's right to garnish the funds. They claimed that the funds were exempt Social Security and pension proceeds, but they offered no proof of this claim. The banks responded by depositing $23,911.97 with the court. These funds were delivered to Grand Harbour. Later, the Groggs filed a petition for bankruptcy in a federal bankruptcy court. After they were granted a discharge, they filed a "motion to return funds to debtors" but provided no evidence that their debt to Grand Harbour had been included in the discharge. What is Grand Harbour's best argument in response to the Groggs' motion? [Grand Harbour Condominium Owners Association, Inc. v. Grogg, 2016 -Ohio- 1386 (Ohio Ct.App. 2016)] (See Other Laws Assisting Creditors.)

21–7. Disposition of Collateral. Dustin Mosely financed the purchase of two cars with a loan from Show-Me Credit Union (SMCU). When Mosely stopped making payments on the loan, SMCU notified him that it intended to repossess the cars and dispose of them at a "private or public" sale. After the sale, the creditor filed a suit in a Missouri state court to recover the difference between the sale price and the outstanding debt. Mosely counterclaimed that SMCU had failed to give proper notice before repossessing the vehicles. Public and private sales of collateral are significantly different methods of disposition. Did SMCU's failure to specify the type of sale, either public or private, at which the creditor would dispose of the collateral violate the UCC's notice requirement? Explain. [Show-Me Credit Union v. Mosely, 541 S.W.3d 28 (Mo.App.E.D. 2018)] (See Default.)

21–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Defenses of the Guarantor. Woodsmill Park Limited Partnership borrowed $6.2 million secured by real property in Chicago, Illinois. Bill and Brian Bruce and Matthew O'Malley signed guaranties to meet Woodsmill's obligation on the loan. Woodsmill defaulted on the payments. Northbrook Bank & Trust Company filed an action in an Illinois state court against Woodsmill and the Bruces to foreclose on the property. The defendants agreed to resolve the claim in exchange for a deed in lieu of foreclosure and a promise to pay the difference between the value of the property and the unpaid amount of the loan. The parties stipulated, "Nothing in this Agreement shall release or reduce O'Malley's obligations under O'Malley's Guaranty." [Northbrook Bank & Trust Co. v. Matthew O'Malley, 2017 IL App (1st) 160438-U (2017)] (See Other Laws Assisting Creditors.)

1. What is the effect on O'Malley's guaranty of the agreement between Northbrook, Woodsmill, and the Bruces? Explain.
2. Using the IDDR approach, evaluate the ethics of Northbrook, Woodsmill, and the Bruces in agreeing to the stipulation concerning O'Malley.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

21–9. Business Law Writing. Write a few sentences describing the circumstances in which a creditor would resort to each of the following remedies when trying to collect on debt. (See Other Laws Assisting Creditors.)

1. Mechanic's lien
2. Artisan's lien
3. Writ of attachment

21–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Validity of a Security Interest. Nick Sabol, doing business in the recording industry as Sound Farm Productions, applied to Morton Community Bank for a $58,000 loan to expand his business. Besides the loan application, Sabol signed a promissory note that referred to the bank's rights in "any collateral." Sabol also signed a letter authorizing Morton Community Bank to execute, file, and record all financing statements, amendments, and other documents required by Article 9 to establish a security interest. Sabol did not sign any other documents, including the financing statement, which contained a description of the collateral. Two years later, without having repaid the loan, Sabol filed for bankruptcy. The bank claimed a security interest in Sabol's sound equipment. (See Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest.)

1. The first group will list all the requirements of an enforceable security interest and explain why each of these elements is necessary.
2. The second group will determine if Morton Community Bank had a valid security interest.
3. The third group will discuss whether a bank should be able to execute financing statements on a debtor's behalf without the debtor being present or signing them. Are there are any drawbacks to this practice?

22 Bankruptcy

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What are the two main goals of bankruptcy?
2. In a Chapter 7 bankruptcy, what happens if a court finds that there was "substantial abuse"? How is the means test used?
3. In a Chapter 11 reorganization, what is the role of the debtor in possession?
4. How does a Chapter 13 bankruptcy differ from bankruptcy under Chapter 7 and Chapter 11?

"Capitalism without bankruptcy is like Christianity without hell."

Frank Borman
1928–present
(U.S. astronaut and businessman)

Many people and businesses in today's economy are struggling to pay their monthly bills. In the old days, debtors were punished and sometimes sent to jail for failing to pay their debts. Today, the law provides debtors with numerous options, including bankruptcy—a last resort in resolving debtor-creditor problems.

As implied by the chapter-opening quotation, bankruptcy is an essential aspect of our capitalistic society. Individuals and businesses in our nation have great opportunities for financial success but may also encounter financial difficulties. For instance, many retail chains (Barney's New York, Forever 21, Sugarfina) have filed for bankruptcy in recent years, in part due to the increase in online shopping. (See this chapter's Business Web Log feature for further discussion.) Therefore, every businessperson should have some understanding of the bankruptcy process.

22–1 The Bankruptcy Code

Bankruptcy relief is provided under federal law. Nevertheless, state laws on property, secured transactions, liens, and judgments also play a role in federal bankruptcy proceedings.

Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution gave Congress the power to establish "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." Federal

Online Competition, Bankruptcy, and the "Retail Apocalypse"

"The department store is online now," proclaims investment guru Warren Buffet. To the extent that this statement is true, Amazon.com deserves a good deal of the credit—or blame. That Internet technology company has shown a generation of American consumers that is easier, and often cheaper, to shop from home online than it is to visit a brick-and-mortar store. As a result, Amazon is now, among other triumphs, the nation's largest apparel retailer.

Amazon's ascendency helped bring about a "retail apocalypse" in the United States that has seen thousands of retail stores close and hundreds of retail companies file for bankruptcy. To highlight one casualty, the Payless shoe store chain had more than four thousand stores in thirty countries when it first filed for bankruptcy. As part of these proceedings, the Kansas-based company closed nearly seven hundred stores and eliminated about $435 million in debt.

Two years later, still saddled with $470 million in debt, Payless filed for bankruptcy again. This time, management shuttered all remaining stores in the United States and Canada, vowing to strengthen the company's online and international operations. North American consumers now have only one place to buy Payless shoes: on Amazon.com.

Key Point

Any hope for relief from the retail apocalypse ended with the coronavirus pandemic. This public health emergency caused nearly every "nonessential" retail business in the country to close some or all of its physical stores for months, leading to a wave of bankruptcy filings. As consumers became even more accustomed to shopping online, those companies that survived, including retail giants such as Costco and Walmart, were forced to significantly expand their Internet sales capabilities.

bankruptcy legislation was first enacted in 1898 and since then has undergone several modifications, most recently in the Bankruptcy Reform Act.[1] Federal bankruptcy laws are called the Bankruptcy Code or, more simply, the Code.

22–1a Goals of Bankruptcy Law

Bankruptcy law in the United States has two main goals:

1. To protect a debtor by providing a fresh start without creditors' claims.
2. To ensure equitable treatment of creditors who are competing for a debtor's assets.

Thus, the law attempts to balance the rights of the debtor and the creditors.

Although the twin goals of bankruptcy remained the same, the balance between them shifted somewhat after the reform legislation. Because of its significance for creditors and debtors alike, we present the Bankruptcy Reform Act as this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature.

Focus Question 1

What are the two main goals of bankruptcy?

22–1b Bankruptcy Courts

Bankruptcy proceedings are held in federal bankruptcy courts, which are under the authority of U.S. district courts. Rulings by bankruptcy courts can be appealed to the district courts.

A bankruptcy court can conduct a jury trial if the appropriate district court has authorized it and the parties to the bankruptcy consent. Bankruptcy courts follow the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure rather than the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Bankruptcy court judges are appointed for terms of fourteen years.

Know This

Congress regulates the jurisdiction of the federal courts within the limits set by the U.S. Constitution. Congress can expand or reduce the number of federal courts at any time.

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act

When Congress enacted the first Bankruptcy Reform Act in 1978, many claimed that the law made it too easy for debtors to file for bankruptcy protection. The 2005 Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act (BAPCPA) was passed, in part, in response to businesses' concerns about the rise in personal bankruptcy filings.

From 1978 to 2005, personal bankruptcy filings increased dramatically. Various business groups—including credit-card companies, retailers, and banks—claimed that the bankruptcy process was being abused and that reform was necessary.

More Repayment Plans, Fewer Liquidation Bankruptcies One of the major goals of the BAPCPA is to require consumers to pay as many of their debts as they possibly can instead of having those debts fully discharged in bankruptcy. Before the reforms, the vast majority of bankruptcies were filed under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, which permits debtors, with some exceptions, to have all of their debts discharged in bankruptcy. Only about 20 percent of personal bankruptcies were filed under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code.

As you will read later in this chapter, Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code requires the debtor to establish a repayment plan and pay off as many of debts as possible over a maximum period of five years. Under the BAPCPA, more debtors have to file for bankruptcy under Chapter 13.

Other Significant Provisions of the Act The BAPCPA also made a number of other changes. One important provision involves the homestead exemption. Before the passage of the act, some states allowed debtors petitioning for bankruptcy to exempt all of the equity (the market value minus the outstanding mortgage owed) in their homes during bankruptcy proceedings. The act leaves these exemptions in place but puts some limits on their use.

Another BAPCPA provision gives child-support obligations priority over other debts and allows enforcement agencies to continue efforts to collect child-support payments.

Application to Today's World Under the 2005 bankruptcy reforms, fewer debtors are allowed to have their debts discharged in Chapter 7 liquidation proceedings. At the same time, the act makes it more difficult for debtors to obtain a "fresh start" financially—one of the major goals of bankruptcy law in the United States. Today, more debtors are forced to file under Chapter 13.

Additionally, the bankruptcy process has become more time consuming and costly because it requires more extensive documentation and certification. These changes in the law have left many Americans unable to obtain relief from their debts.

22–1c Types of Bankruptcy Relief

The Bankruptcy Code is contained in Title 11 of the United States Code (U.S.C.) and has eight "chapters." Chapters 1, 3, and 5 of the Code include general definitions and provisions governing case administration and procedures, creditors, the debtor, and the estate. These three chapters of the Code normally apply to all types of bankruptcies.

Four chapters of the Code set forth the most important types of relief that debtors can seek.

1. Chapter 7 provides for liquidation proceedings—that is, the selling of all nonexempt assets and the distribution of the proceeds to the debtor's creditors.
2. Chapter 11 governs reorganizations.
3. Chapter 12 (for family farmers and family fishermen) and Chapter 13 (for individuals) provide for adjustment of the debts of parties with regular income.[2]

2. There are no Chapters 2, 4, 6, 8, or 10 in Title 11. Such "gaps" are not uncommon in the United States Code. They occur because, when a statute is enacted, chapter numbers (or other subdivisional unit numbers) are sometimes reserved for future use. (A gap may also appear if a law has been repealed.)

Note that a debtor (except for a municipality) need not be insolvent[3] to file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code. Anyone obligated to a creditor can declare bankruptcy.

22–1d Special Treatment of Consumer-Debtors

A consumer-debtor is a debtor whose debts result primarily from the purchase of goods for personal, family, or household use. The Bankruptcy Code requires that the clerk of the court give all consumer-debtors written notice of the general purpose, benefits, and costs of each chapter of bankruptcy under which they may proceed. In addition, the clerk must provide consumer-debtors with information on the types of services available from credit counseling agencies. Consumer-debtors are also required to confirm the accuracy of certain information filed with the court (their attorney must do so if they are represented).

Consumer-Debtor One whose debts result primarily from the purchase of goods for personal, family, or household use.

22–2 Chapter 7—Liquidation

Liquidation under Chapter 7 is the most familiar type of bankruptcy proceeding and is often referred to as an ordinary, or straight, bankruptcy. Put simply, a debtor in a liquidation bankruptcy turns all assets over to a bankruptcy trustee, a person appointed by the court to manage the debtor's funds. The trustee sells the nonexempt assets and distributes the proceeds to creditors. With certain exceptions, the remaining debts are then discharged (extinguished), and the debtor is relieved of the obligation to pay the debts.

Any "person"—defined as including individuals, partnerships, and corporations[4]—may be a debtor under Chapter 7. Railroads, insurance companies, banks, savings and loan associations, investment companies licensed by the U.S. Small Business Administration, and credit unions cannot be Chapter 7 debtors. Other chapters of the Code or other federal or state statutes apply to them. A husband and wife may file jointly for bankruptcy under a single petition.

A straight bankruptcy may be commenced by the filing of either a voluntary or an involuntary petition in bankruptcy—the document that is filed with a bankruptcy court to initiate bankruptcy proceedings. If a debtor files the petition, then it is a voluntary bankruptcy. If one or more creditors file a petition to force the debtor into bankruptcy, then it is an involuntary bankruptcy.

Liquidation The sale of the nonexempt assets of a debtor and the distribution of the funds received to creditors.

Bankruptcy Trustee A person appointed by the court to manage the debtor's funds.

Discharged Extinguished. A discharge in bankruptcy terminates the debtor's obligation to pay debts.

Petition in Bankruptcy The document that is filed with a bankruptcy court to initiate bankruptcy proceedings.

22–2a Voluntary Bankruptcy

To bring a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, a debtor files official forms designated for that purpose in the bankruptcy court. The law now requires that before debtors can file a petition, they must receive credit counseling from an approved nonprofit agency. Debtors filing a Chapter 7 petition must thus include a certificate proving that they have received individual or group counseling from an approved agency within the last 180 days (roughly six months).

A consumer-debtor who is filing a voluntary petition must confirm the accuracy of the petition's contents. The debtor must also state in the petition, at the time of filing, that he or she understands the relief available under other chapters of the Code and has chosen to proceed under Chapter 7.

Attorneys representing consumer-debtors must file an affidavit stating that they have informed the debtors of the relief available under each chapter of the Code. In addition, the attorneys must reasonably attempt to verify the accuracy of the consumer-debtors' petitions and schedules (described next). Failure to do so is considered perjury.

3. The inability to pay debts as they come due is known as equitable insolvency. A balance-sheet insolvency, which exists when a debtor's liabilities exceed assets, is not the test. Thus, it is possible for debtors to petition voluntarily for bankruptcy even though their assets far exceed their liabilities. This situation may occur when a debtor's cash-flow problems become severe.

4. The definition of corporation includes unincorporated companies and associations. It also covers labor unions.

Chapter 7 Schedules The voluntary petition contains the following schedules:

1. A list of both secured and unsecured creditors, their addresses, and the amount of debt owed to each.
2. A statement of the financial affairs of the debtor.
3. A list of all property owned by the debtor, including property claimed by the debtor to be exempt.
4. A list of current income and expenses.
5. A certificate of credit counseling (as mentioned previously).
6. Proof of payments received from employers within sixty days prior to the filing of the petition.
7. A statement of the amount of monthly income, itemized to show how the amount is calculated.
8. A copy of the debtor's federal income tax return for the most recent year ending immediately before the filing of the petition.

The official forms must be completed accurately, sworn to under oath, and signed by the debtor. To conceal assets or knowingly supply false information on these schedules is a crime under the bankruptcy laws.

With the exception of tax returns, failure to file the required schedules within forty-five days after the filing of the petition (unless an extension is granted) will result in an automatic dismissal of the petition. The debtor has up to seven days before the date of the first creditors' meeting to provide a copy of the most recent tax returns to the trustee.

Tax Returns during Bankruptcy A debtor may be required to file a tax return at the end of each tax year while the case is pending and to provide a copy to the court. A request for a copy of the debtor's tax return may be made by the court or the U.S. Trustee—a government official who performs administrative tasks that a bankruptcy judge would otherwise have to perform. In addition, any party in interest (a party, such as a creditor, who has a valid interest in the outcome of the proceedings) may make this request. Debtors may also be required to file tax returns during Chapter 11 and 13 bankruptcies.

U.S. Trustee A government official who performs administrative tasks that a bankruptcy judge would otherwise have to perform.

Focus Question 2

In a Chapter 7 bankruptcy, what happens if a court finds that there was "substantial abuse"? How is the means test used?

Substantial Abuse and the Means Test A bankruptcy court can dismiss a Chapter 7 petition if the use of Chapter 7 constitutes a "substantial abuse" of bankruptcy law. The revised Code provides a means test to determine a debtor's eligibility for Chapter 7.

The purpose of the test is to keep higher-income people from abusing the bankruptcy process by filing for Chapter 7, as was thought to have happened in the past. The test forces more people to file for Chapter 13 bankruptcy rather than have their debts discharged under Chapter 7.

The Basic Formula. Debtors wishing to file for bankruptcy must complete the means test to determine whether they qualify for Chapter 7. A debtor's average monthly income in recent months is compared with the median income in the geographic area in which the person lives. (The U.S. Trustee Program provides these data at its website, www.justice.gov/ust.) If the debtor's income is below the median income, the debtor usually is allowed to file for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, as there is no presumption of bankruptcy abuse.

Applying the Means Test to Future Disposable Income. If the debtor's income is above the median income, then further calculations must be made. The goal is to determine whether the person will have sufficient disposable income in the future to repay at least some unsecured debts. As a basis for the calculations, it is presumed that the debtor's recent monthly income will continue for the next sixty months. Disposable income is then calculated by subtracting living expenses and interest payments on secured debt, such as mortgage payments, from monthly income.

Living expenses are the amounts allowed under formulas used by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). The IRS allowances include modest allocations for food, clothing, housing, utilities, transportation (including car payments), health care, and other necessities. (The U.S. Trustee Program's website also provides these amounts.) The allowances do not include expenditures for items such as cell phones and cable television service.

Can the Debtor Afford to Pay Unsecured Debts? Once future disposable income has been estimated, that amount is used to determine whether the debtor will have income that could be applied to unsecured debts. The court may also consider the debtor's bad faith or other circumstances indicating abuse.

Case Example 22.1 John and Sarah Buoy filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy. For the past three months, John had worked as a supervisor for JB Hunt and had a gross monthly income of $4,900. Sarah was a registered nurse with $6,761 a month in gross income. They had five children. They owed secured debts of $34,321 on a Subaru Impreza and a BMW 328i, on which they intended to continue making loan payments (this is called reaffirmation, as will be discussed later). They owed $123,000 on a mortgage and $19,000 in student loans, and their unsecured debts were $4,900.

An auditor for the U.S. Trustee Program reviewed the Buoys' Chapter 7 schedule and concluded that the family's gross income figures were understated. Because of a mistake in the math, the Buoys had miscalculated their biweekly income by approximately $800 a month (or nearly $650 after taxes). The debtors claimed that they had incurred additional expenses after the petition, including orthodontic braces and another car. Even with those expenses, however, the court found that they would have an additional $400 a month in future disposable income and would receive sizeable tax refunds. In these circumstances, the court concluded that the Buoys could afford to pay their debts and dismissed the Chapter 7 petition for substantial abuse.[5]

How does family size affect the calculation and application of the means test?

Additional Grounds for Dismissal As noted, a debtor's voluntary petition for Chapter 7 relief may be dismissed for substantial abuse or for failure to provide the necessary documents (such as schedules and tax returns) within the specified time. In addition, a motion to dismiss a Chapter 7 filing may be granted in two other situations.

1. If the debtor has been convicted of a violent crime or a drug-trafficking offense, the victim can file a motion to dismiss the voluntary petition.[6]
2. If the debtor fails to pay postpetition domestic-support obligations (which include child and spousal support), the court may dismiss the petition.

Order for Relief If the voluntary petition for bankruptcy is found to be proper, the filing of the petition will itself constitute an order for relief. (An order for relief is the court's grant of assistance to a debtor.) Once a consumer-debtor's voluntary petition has been filed, the clerk of the court (or other appointee) must give the trustee and creditors notice of the order for relief by mail not more than twenty days after the entry of the order.

Order for Relief A court's grant of assistance to a debtor in bankruptcy that relieves the debtor of the immediate obligation to pay debts.

5. In re Buoy, 2017 WL 3194755 (N.D. Ohio 2017).
6. Note that the court may not dismiss a case on this ground if the debtor's bankruptcy is necessary to satisfy a claim for a domestic-support obligation.

22–2b Involuntary Bankruptcy

An involuntary bankruptcy occurs when the debtor's creditors force the debtor into bankruptcy proceedings. An involuntary petition cannot be filed against a charitable institution or a farmer (an individual or business that receives more than 50 percent of its gross income from farming operations).

An involuntary petition should not be used as an everyday debt-collection device. The Code provides penalties for the filing of frivolous (unjustified) petitions against debtors. If the court dismisses an involuntary petition, the petitioning creditors may be required to pay the costs and attorneys' fees incurred by the debtor in defending against the petition. If the petition was filed in bad faith, damages can be awarded for injury to the debtor's reputation. Punitive damages may also be awarded.

Requirements For an involuntary action to be filed, the following requirements must be met:

1. If the debtor has twelve or more creditors, three or more of those creditors having unsecured claims totaling at least $16,750 must join in the petition.
2. If the debtor has fewer than twelve creditors, one or more creditors having a claim of $16,750 or more may file.[7]

Order for Relief If the debtor challenges the involuntary petition, a hearing will be held. The bankruptcy court will enter an order for relief if it finds either of the following:

1. The debtor generally is not paying debts as they become due.
2. A general receiver, assignee, or custodian took possession of, or was appointed to take charge of, substantially all of the debtor's property within 120 days before the filing of the involuntary petition.

If the court grants an order for relief, the debtor will be required to supply the same information in the bankruptcy schedules as in a voluntary bankruptcy.

22–2c Automatic Stay

Automatic Stay In bankruptcy proceedings, the suspension of almost all litigation and other actions by creditors against the debtor or the debtor's property. The stay is effective the moment the debtor files a petition in bankruptcy.

The moment a petition, either voluntary or involuntary, is filed, an automatic stay, or suspension, of almost all actions by creditors against the debtor or the debtor's property normally goes into effect. Until the bankruptcy proceeding is closed or dismissed, the automatic stay prohibits a creditor from taking any act to collect, assess, or recover a claim against the debtor that arose before the filing of the petition.

If the debtor had two or more bankruptcy petitions dismissed during the prior year, the Code presumes bad faith. In such a situation, the automatic stay does not go into effect until the court determines that the petition was filed in good faith.

If a creditor knowingly violates the automatic stay (a willful violation), any injured party, including the debtor, is entitled to recover actual damages, costs, and attorneys' fees and may be entitled to punitive damages as well. Example 22.2 Richard Anderson and his wife file for bankruptcy. One of the debts listed on their Chapter 7 schedule is a Kohl's credit card with a balance of $630. Even after it is notified of the bankruptcy, Recovery Management Systems Corporation (RMSC), a debt collection service, continues to send letters to Richard Anderson in an attempt to collect the balance on the card. In this situation, RMSC is willfully violating the automatic stay. The Andersons are entitled to seek actual damages, costs, attorneys' fees, and even punitive damages for RMSC's conduct. ■ (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for further clarification.)

Violations of the Automatic Stay

Michelle Gholston leased a Chevy Impala from EZ Auto Van Rentals. On November 8, Gholston filed for bankruptcy. On November 21, the bankruptcy court notified EZ Auto of Gholston's bankruptcy and the imposition of an automatic stay. Nevertheless, because Gholston had fallen behind on her payments, EZ Auto repossessed the vehicle on November 28.

Gholston's attorney reminded EZ Auto that it could not take this action because of the automatic stay, but the company failed to return the car. As a result of the car's repossession, Gholston suffered damages that included emotional distress, lost wages, attorneys' fees, and car rental expenses. Can Gholston recover from EZ Auto?

Analysis: A debtor may be entitled to recover damages if a creditor knowingly or willfully violates the automatic stay. The test is whether EZ Auto knew about Gholston's bankruptcy at the time it repossessed her car. The bankruptcy court and the debtor's attorney had, in fact, notified EZ Auto about the bankruptcy and the automatic stay a week before the car was repossessed.

Result and Reasoning: Gholston can recover damages because EZ Auto willfully violated the automatic stay. EZ Auto repossessed the car even though it had received notice of the automatic stay from the bankruptcy court. In addition, EZ Auto refused to return the car even after Gholston's attorney had reminded it of the stay. Thus, EZ Auto knew about the automatic stay and violated it willfully. Because Gholston suffered direct damages as a result, she can recover from EZ Auto. She may also be awarded punitive damages for EZ Auto's wrongful conduct.

The Adequate Protection Doctrine Underlying the Code's automatic-stay provision for a secured creditor is a concept known as adequate protection. The adequate protection doctrine, among other things, protects secured creditors from losing the value of their security interests as a result of the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court can provide adequate protection by requiring the debtor or trustee to make periodic cash payments or a one-time cash payment. If the stay may cause the value of the property to decrease, the court can also require the debtor or trustee to provide additional collateral or replacement liens.

Adequate Protection Doctrine A doctrine that protects secured creditors from losing the value of their security interests (because the collateral depreciates, for instance) as a result of an automatic stay in a bankruptcy proceeding.

Exceptions to the Automatic Stay The Code provides the following exceptions to the automatic stay:

1. Collection efforts can continue for domestic-support obligations, which include any debt owed to or recoverable by a spouse, a former spouse, a child of the debtor, that child's parent or guardian, or a governmental unit.
2. Proceedings against the debtor related to divorce, child custody or visitation, domestic violence, and support enforcement are not stayed.
3. Investigations by a securities regulatory agency can continue.
4. Certain statutory liens for property taxes are not stayed.

If a collection agency knowingly repossesses a car when there is an automatic stay in effect, what can a debtor do?

Requests for Relief from the Automatic Stay A secured creditor or other party in interest can petition the bankruptcy court for relief from the automatic stay. If a creditor or other party requests relief from the stay, the stay will automatically terminate sixty days after the request, unless the court grants an extension or the parties agree otherwise. The automatic stay on secured property terminates forty-five days after the creditors' meeting unless the debtor redeems or reaffirms certain debts. (Creditors' meetings and reaffirmation will be discussed later in this chapter.)

22–2d Estate in Bankruptcy

Estate in Bankruptcy All of the property owned by a person, including real estate and personal property.

On the commencement of a liquidation proceeding under Chapter 7, an estate in bankruptcy is created. The estate consists of all the debtor's interests in property currently held, wherever located. The estate in bankruptcy includes all of the following:

1. Community property (property jointly owned by a husband and wife in certain states).
2. Property transferred in a transaction voidable by the trustee.
3. Proceeds and profits from the property of the estate.

Certain after-acquired property to which a debtor becomes entitled within 180 days after filing may also become part of the estate. Such after-acquired property includes gifts, inheritances, property settlements (from divorce), and life insurance death proceeds. Generally, though, the filing of a bankruptcy petition fixes a dividing line. Property acquired prior to the filing of the petition becomes property of the estate, and property acquired after the filing of the petition, except as just noted, remains the debtor's.

22–2e The Bankruptcy Trustee

Promptly after the order for relief has been entered, a trustee is appointed. The basic duty of the trustee is to collect the debtor's available estate and reduce it to cash for distribution, preserving the interests of both the debtor and the unsecured creditors. This requires that the trustee be accountable for administering the debtor's estate.

To enable the trustee to accomplish this duty, the Code gives the trustee certain powers. These powers must be exercised within two years after the order for relief has been entered.

Review for Substantial Abuse The trustee is required to review promptly all materials filed by the debtor to determine if there is substantial abuse. Within ten days after the first meeting of the creditors, the trustee must file a statement as to whether the case is presumed to be an abuse under the means test. The trustee must provide all creditors with a copy of this statement.

When there is a presumption of abuse, the trustee must either file a motion to dismiss the petition (or convert it to a Chapter 13 proceeding) or file a statement explaining why a motion would not be appropriate. If the debtor owes a domestic-support obligation (such as child support), the trustee must provide written notice of the bankruptcy to the claim holder (a former spouse, for instance).

Trustee's Powers The trustee has the power to require persons holding the debtor's property at the time the petition is filed to deliver the property to the trustee.[8] To enable the trustee to implement this power, the Code provides that the trustee has rights equivalent to those of certain other parties, such as a creditor who has a judicial lien. This power of a trustee, which is equivalent to that of a lien creditor, is known as the strong-arm power.

In addition, the trustee has specific powers of avoidance. They enable the trustee to set aside (avoid or cancel) a sale or other transfer of the debtor's property and take the property back for the debtor's estate. These powers apply to voidable rights available to the debtor, preferences, and fraudulent transfers by the debtor (as discussed in more detail next). The trustee can also avoid certain statutory liens.

The debtor shares most of the trustee's avoidance powers. Thus, if the trustee does not take action to enforce one of these rights, the debtor in a liquidation bankruptcy can enforce it.

8. Usually, the trustee takes constructive, rather than actual, possession of the debtor's property. For instance, to obtain possession of a business's inventory, a trustee might change the locks on the doors and hire a security guard.

Voidable Rights A trustee steps into the shoes of the debtor. Thus, any reason that a debtor can use to obtain the return of property can be used by the trustee as well. The grounds for recovery include fraud, duress, incapacity, and mutual mistake.

Example 22.3 Ben sells his RV trailer to Inga. Inga gives Ben a check, knowing that she has insufficient funds in her bank account to cover the check. Inga has committed fraud. Ben has the right to avoid that transfer and recover the RV trailer from Inga. If Ben files for bankruptcy relief under Chapter 7, the trustee can exercise the same right to recover the RV trailer from Inga, and the RV trailer becomes part of the debtor's estate.

turtix/Shutterstock.com

Just before filing Chapter 7 bankruptcy, a debtor sells his RV trailer, but the buyer's check is no good. What, if anything, can the trustee do to recover the RV trailer on the debtor's estate's behalf?

Preferences A debtor is not permitted to make a property transfer or a payment that favors—or gives a preference to—one creditor over others. The trustee is allowed to recover payments made both voluntarily and involuntarily to one creditor in preference over another.

To have made a recoverable preferential payment, an insolvent debtor generally must have transferred property for a preexisting debt during the ninety days before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. The transfer must have given the creditor more than the creditor would have received as a result of the bankruptcy proceedings. The Code presumes that the debtor is insolvent during the ninety-day period before filing a petition.

If a preferred creditor (one who has received a preferential transfer from the debtor) has sold the property to an innocent third party, the trustee cannot recover the property from the innocent party. The trustee can generally force the preferred creditor to pay the value of the property, however.

Preference In bankruptcy proceedings, a property transfer or payment made by the debtor that favors one creditor over others.

Preferred Creditor In the context of bankruptcy, a creditor who has received a preferential transfer from a debtor.

Insider In bankruptcy proceedings, any individual, partnership, or corporation with a close personal or business relation with the debtor.

Preferences to Insiders. Sometimes, a creditor receiving a preference is an insider. An insider is any individual (such as a relative or partner), partnership, or corporation with a close relationship with the debtor. In this situation, the avoidance power of the trustee is extended to transfers made within one year before filing. (If the transfer was fraudulent, as will be discussed shortly, the trustee can avoid transfers made within two years before filing.) However, the trustee must prove that the debtor was insolvent at the time the earlier transfer occurred.

Transfers That Do Not Constitute Preferences. Not all transfers are preferences. To be a preference, the transfer must be made in exchange for something other than current consideration. Most courts do not consider a debtor's payment for services rendered within fifteen days prior to the payment to be a preference. If a creditor receives payment in the ordinary course of business, such as payment of last month's cell phone bill, the trustee in bankruptcy cannot recover the payment. In contrast, a transfer for a preexisting debt, such as a year-old landscaping bill, would be a recoverable preference.

Case Example 22.4 David Tidd operated a business performing small home repairs as well as house-building projects. Tidd and his son regularly purchased supplies for his business on credit from S.W. Collins. Eventually, Tidd filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy. Within ninety days preceding his petition, Tidd had made four payments for materials to S.W. Collins, totaling $46,000. The trustee filed a motion seeking to avoid this transfer as a preference. The court, however, concluded that the transfer was a substantially contemporaneous exchange of value (current consideration) and not a preference. The payments were made in the ordinary course of business. Therefore, the court found in Tidd's favor and denied the trustee's motion.[9]

Know This

Usually, when property is recovered as a preference, the trustee sells it and distributes the proceeds to the debtor's creditors.

In addition, the Code permits a consumer-debtor to transfer any property to a creditor up to a total value of $6,825 without the transfer constituting a preference. Payments of domestic-support debts do not constitute a preference. Neither do payments required under a plan created by an approved credit-counseling agency.

Fraudulent Transfers A trustee can avoid fraudulent transfers or obligations if (1) they were made within two years of the filing of the petition or (2) they were made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor. Case Example 22.5 David Dearmond was a real estate developer who owned interests in two development companies—Briartowne, LLC, and Hillside, LLC. He also owned one-third of Bluffs of Sevier County, LLC, which operated Bluff's Bar & Grill. When Briartowne defaulted on a $623,499 promissory note, SmartBank filed an action against Briartowne, Dearmond, and others.

Five months later, Dearmond sold Boyds Creek Market and Garage, a property he had paid $400,000 for the previous year, to his fiancée, Patricia Harper, for $90,000. Two days after that, Dearmond created two irrevocable trust agreements and transferred all of his interest in Hillside and Bluffs of Sevier County into those trusts. The trusts named Harper as the primary beneficiary. Although SmartBank obtained a judgment against Dearmond (and the other owners of Briartowne), it was unable to collect from these assets.

A year and a half later, Dearmond filed a petition for bankruptcy. The trustee filed a motion seeking to avoid the fraudulent transfers made to benefit Harper. Harper claimed that Dearmond had given her the interest in Hillside as a wedding present. The court concluded that the transfers should be set aside because they were made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor. Therefore, the trusts no longer owned the properties. The court entered judgment for the trustee in an amount equivalent to the value of the fraudulent transfers.[10]

22–2f Exemptions

An individual debtor is entitled to exempt certain property from the bankruptcy under federal or state exemption schemes.

Federal Exemptions The Bankruptcy Code exempts the following property up to a specified dollar amount that changes automatically every three years:

1. A portion of equity in the debtor's home (not to exceed $170,350[11] under the federal homestead exemption, even if state law would permit a higher amount).
2. Motor vehicles, up to a certain value (usually just one vehicle).
3. Reasonably necessary clothing, household goods and furnishings, and household appliances (the aggregate value not to exceed a specified amount).
4. Jewelry, up to a specified value.
5. Tools of the debtor's trade or profession, up to a specified value.
6. A portion of unpaid but earned wages.
7. Pensions.
8. Public benefits, including public assistance (welfare), Social Security, and unemployment compensation, accumulated in a bank account.
9. Damages awarded for personal injury up to a specified amount.

Property that is not exempt under federal law includes bank accounts, cash, family heirlooms, collections of stamps and coins, second cars, and vacation homes.

State Exemptions Individual states have the power to pass legislation precluding debtors from using the federal exemptions within the state. A majority of the states have done this. In those states, debtors may use only state, not federal, exemptions. In the rest of the states, an individual debtor (or a husband and wife filing jointly) may choose either the exemptions provided under state law or the federal exemptions.

Limitations on the Homestead Exemption Probably the most familiar real property exemption is the homestead exemption, the purpose of which is to ensure that the debtor will retain some form of shelter. Each state permits the debtor to retain the family home, either in its entirety or up to a specified dollar amount. The Bankruptcy Code limits the amount that can be claimed in bankruptcy under the homestead exemption of any state, however. In general, if the debtor acquired the home within three years and four months preceding the date of filing, the maximum equity exempted is $170,350, even if state law would permit a higher amount.

Homestead Exemption A law permitting a debtor to retain the family home, either in its entirety or up to a specified dollar amount, free from the claims of unsecured creditors or trustees in bankruptcy.

In addition, the state homestead exemption is available only if the debtor has lived in the state for two years before filing the petition. A debtor who has violated securities law, been convicted of a felony, or engaged in certain other intentional misconduct may not be permitted to claim the homestead exemption at all.

How does the homestead exemption help debtors who go into bankruptcy?

22–2g Creditors' Meeting and Claims

Within a reasonable time after the order of relief has been granted (not more than forty days), the trustee must call a meeting of the creditors listed in the schedules filed by the debtor. The bankruptcy judge does not attend this meeting, but the debtor must attend and submit to an examination under oath. At the meeting, the trustee ensures that the debtor is aware of the potential consequences of bankruptcy and the possibility of filing under a different chapter of the Code.

To be entitled to receive a portion of the debtor's estate, each creditor normally files a proof of claim with the bankruptcy court clerk within ninety days of the creditors' meeting. The proof of claim lists the creditor's name and address, as well as the amount that the creditor asserts is owed to the creditor by the debtor.

When the debtor has no assets—called a "no-asset case"—creditors are notified of the debtor's petition for bankruptcy but are instructed not to file a claim. In no-asset cases, the unsecured creditors will receive no payment, and most, if not all, of these debts will be discharged.

22–2h Distribution of Property

The Code provides specific rules for the distribution of the debtor's property to secured and unsecured creditors. If any amount remains after the priority classes of creditors have been satisfied, it is turned over to the debtor.

Distribution to Secured Creditors Secured creditors have priority. The Code requires that consumer-debtors file a statement of intention with respect to the secured collateral. They can choose to pay off the debt and redeem the collateral, claim that it is exempt, reaffirm the debt and continue making payments, or surrender the property to the secured party.

If the collateral is surrendered to the secured party, the secured creditor can either (1) accept the collateral in full satisfaction of the debt or (2) sell the collateral and use the proceeds to pay off the debt. Thus, the secured party has priority over unsecured parties as to the proceeds from the disposition of the collateral. Should the collateral be insufficient to cover the secured debt owed, the secured creditor becomes an unsecured creditor for the difference.

There are limited exceptions to these rules. For instance, certain unsecured creditors can sometimes step into the shoes of secured tax creditors in Chapter 7 liquidation proceedings. In such situations, when the collateral securing the tax claims is sold, the unsecured creditors are paid first. This exception does not include holders of unsecured claims for administrative expenses incurred in Chapter 11 cases that are converted to Chapter 7 liquidations. In the following case, the plaintiff argued that it should.

In re Anderson

United States Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, 811 F.3d 166 (2016).

Facts Henry Anderson filed a voluntary petition in a federal bankruptcy court for relief under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code (which governs reorganizations of the debtor's estate). The Internal Revenue Service (IRS) filed a proof of claim against the bankruptcy estate for unpaid taxes of nearly $1 million. This claim was secured by Anderson's property. Stubbs & Perdue, P.A., served as Anderson's counsel. The court approved compensation of $200,000 to Stubbs for its services. These fees constituted an unsecured claim against the estate for administrative expenses.

Later, Anderson's case was converted to a Chapter 7 liquidation. The trustee accumulated more than $700,000 for distribution to the estate's creditors—but this was not enough to pay the claims of both the IRS and Stubbs. The trustee excluded Stubbs's claim. Stubbs objected. The court dismissed Stubbs's objection. A federal district court upheld the exclusion. Stubbs appealed, arguing that the IRS's claim should be subordinated to Stubbs's claim for fees.

Issue Was Stubbs's claim correctly excluded?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed the dismissal of Stubbs's claim.

Reason Under prior law, all holders of administrative expense claims, like Stubbs, did have a right to subordinate secured tax creditors in Chapter 7 liquidations. Then—after Anderson's bankruptcy petition, but before it was converted to a Chapter 7 liquidation—Congress amended the Code to provide greater protection for holders of tax liens. The court in this case applied the law in effect at the time it rendered its decision. Under Section 724(b)(2), "It is clear that Stubbs is not entitled to subordinate the IRS's secured tax claim in favor of its unsecured claim to Chapter 11 administrative expenses."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Why, as a general rule, should a court apply the law that is in effect at the time the court renders its decision?
- Ethical If Anderson had filed his initial bankruptcy petition under Chapter 7, not under Chapter 11, the result would have been different—Stubbs would have been able to subordinate the IRS claim. Is this fair?

Distribution to Unsecured Creditors Bankruptcy law establishes an order of priority for classes of debts owed to unsecured creditors, and they are paid in the order of their priority. Each class must be fully paid before the next class is entitled to any of the remaining proceeds. If there is any balance remaining after all the creditors are paid, it is returned to the debtor.

In almost all Chapter 7 bankruptcies, the funds will be insufficient to pay all creditors. If there are insufficient proceeds to pay the full amount to all the creditors in a class, the proceeds are distributed proportionately to the creditors in that class. Creditors in classes lower in priority receive nothing. Claims for domestic-support obligations, such as child support and alimony, have the highest priority among unsecured claims, so these debts must be paid first. Exhibit 22–1 illustrates the collection and distribution of property in most voluntary bankruptcies.

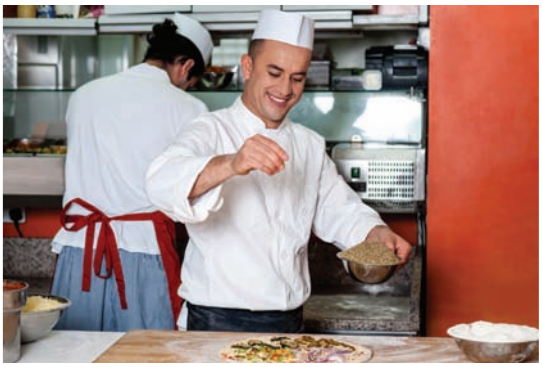
22–2i Discharge



From the debtor's point of view, the primary purpose of liquidation is to obtain a fresh start through the discharge of debts. A discharge voids, or sets aside, any judgment on a discharged debt and prevents any action to collect it. Certain debts, however, are not dischargeable in bankruptcy. Also, certain debtors may not qualify to have all debts discharged in bankruptcy. These situations are discussed next.

Know This
Often, a discharge in bankruptcy—even under Chapter 7—does not free debtors of all of their debts.

Debts That Are Not Dischargeable The most important claims that are not dischargeable under Chapter 7 include the following:

1. Claims for back taxes accruing within two years prior to bankruptcy.
2. Claims for amounts borrowed by the debtor to pay federal taxes or any nondischargeable taxes.
3. Claims against property or funds obtained by the debtor under false pretenses or by false misrepresentations.
4. Claims by creditors who were not notified of the bankruptcy. These claims did not appear on the schedules the debtor was required to file.
5. Claims based on fraud or misuse of funds by the debtor or claims involving the debtor's embezzlement or larceny.
6. Domestic-support obligations and property settlements.
7. Claims for amounts due on a retirement loan account.
8. Claims based on willful or malicious conduct by the debtor toward another or toward the property of another.
9. Certain government fines and penalties.
10. Student loans, unless payment of the loans causes an undue hardship for the debtor and the debtor's dependents (such as when paying the loan leaves the debtor unable to maintain a minimal standard of living).
11. Consumer debts of more than $725 for luxury goods or services owed to a single creditor incurred within ninety days of the order for relief.

A pizza restaurant owner intentionally injures one of his employees, who then sues and is awarded damages by a civil court. If the owner files for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, can his debts to the injured worker be discharged? Why or why not?

Case Example 22.6 Anthony Mickletz owned a pizza restaurant that employed John Carmello. One night after Carmello had finished his shift, Mickletz called him back into the restaurant and accused him of stealing. An argument ensued, and Mickletz shoved Carmello, causing him to fall and injure his back. Because Mickletz did not provide workers' compensation coverage as required by law, the state prosecuted him criminally. He was ordered to pay more than $45,000 in restitution to Carmello for his injuries.

Carmello also filed a civil suit against Mickletz, which the parties agreed to settle for $175,000. Later, Mickletz filed a petition for bankruptcy. Carmello argued that these debts were nondischargeable, and the court agreed. The exceptions from discharge include any debts for willful (deliberate or intentional) injury, and Mickletz's actions were deliberate.[12]

Reasons a Court Can Deny a Discharge A bankruptcy court may also deny the discharge based on the debtor's conduct. Grounds for denial of discharge of the debtor include the following:

1. The debtor's concealment or destruction of property with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor.
2. The debtor's fraudulent concealment or destruction of financial records.
3. The granting of a discharge to the debtor within eight years prior to the filing of the petition.
4. The debtor's failure to complete the required consumer education course.
5. Proceedings in which the debtor could be found guilty of a felony. (Basically, a court may not discharge any debt until the completion of the felony proceedings against the debtor.)

Ethical Issue

Should bankruptcy law provide relief for student loan defaults?

At the start of the 2020s, 45 million borrowers owed $1.56 trillion in outstanding student loan balances. To alleviate this massive debt, some are suggesting reducing the interest rates that can be charged and imposing student loan debt forgiveness after a certain period of time. Although they are popular with the public, these strategies do raise several questions of ethics. What about those borrowers who have already paid off their student loans? Do they get anything? Also, could it be fair to put taxpayers "on the hook" for such a large amount of unpaid student debt?

Under certain conditions, borrowers can ask a bankruptcy court to discharge their student loan debts. To do so, under the "Brunner test," borrowers must show that (1) they cannot, based on current income and expenses, maintain a minimal standard of living; (2) these circumstances are likely to last for a significant amount of time; and (3) they have made good faith efforts at repayment. Applying this standard, a New York bankruptcy judge discharged $220,000 in student loan debt owed by Kevin Rosenberg, who had used to loans to earn an undergraduate history degree and a post-graduate law degree. When he filed for bankruptcy, Rosenberg was making $37,600 a year working in the "outdoor adventure" industry.[13]

When a discharge is denied under any of the five circumstances previously listed, the debtor's assets are still distributed to the creditors. After the bankruptcy proceeding, however, the debtor remains liable for the unpaid portions of all claims.

A discharge may be revoked (taken back) within one year if it is discovered that the debtor acted fraudulently or dishonestly during the bankruptcy proceeding. If that occurs, a creditor whose claim was not satisfied in the distribution of the debtor's property can proceed with a claim against the debtor.

In the following case, the debtors failed to keep adequate records of financially significant transactions. Was this failure a ground for denial of discharge?

In re Dykes

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 954 F.3d 1157 (2020).

Facts Daryll and Sharon Dykes filed a petition for Chapter 7 relief in a federal bankruptcy court, reporting just under $400,000 in assets, over $5.6 million in liabilities, and a monthly income insufficient to cover expenses. Both Daryll and Sharon were surgeons, at one time earning more than $1 million per year and living in a $3 million home. They had lost the home to a foreclosure, followed by a loss of their household goods.

In the schedules filed with the bankruptcy petition, the Dykeses did not explain or make an accounting for the "hundreds of thousands of dollars" of lost property, nor did they disclose "substantial" transfers of their assets to their children. Creditors filing claims in the proceeding included the mortgagee who had foreclosed on their home, the homebuilder, and a jeweler.

Before the Dykeses' assets were fully gathered and the estate administered, the bankruptcy court denied a discharge. A Bankruptcy Appellate Panel (BAP) upheld the denial on the basis of undocumented purchases and returns of hundreds of thousands of dollars in watches and jewelry involving the jeweler that had filed a claim.

The Dykeses appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

Issue Was the Dykeses' failure to keep adequate records of their transactions in watches and jewelry a ground for denial of discharge?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit agreed with the BAP and affirmed the bankruptcy court's judgment.

Reason The Bankruptcy Code authorizes denial of discharge if a debtor "failed to keep or preserve any recorded information . . . from which the debtor's financial condition . . . might be ascertained, unless such . . . failure . . . was justified under all of the circumstances."

In the Dykeses' case, their failure to keep adequate records meant the bankruptcy court could not determine the extent and effect of their financial transactions. The return of valuable watches and jewelry to the jeweler was "a sudden and large dissipation of assets." The initial purchase and subsequent return of the items had a significant impact on the debtors' financial condition. These transactions could also support or undercut the jeweler's claim. But the only record the debtors provided was a receipt "that utterly failed to substantiate the financial effect of the transaction."

The failure of Dykes, "a well-educated and sophisticated collector of highly valuable watches and jewelry," to keep adequate records was unjustified. The debtors were considering bankruptcy. Their creditors were seeking payment. "In these circumstances, a reasonable person would insist on documenting the impact of this transaction on [the debtors'] financial condition."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment In determining whether a debtor's failure to keep adequate records was justified, the Bankruptcy Code requires a determination based on all the circumstances of the case. What factors might a court weigh in making this determination? Discuss.
- Economic How might the Dykes have established, or at least indicated, the fair market value of the watches and jewelry at the time of their return in order to avoid the result in this case? Explain.

22–2j Reaffirmation of Debt

An agreement to pay a debt dischargeable in bankruptcy is called a reaffirmation agreement. A debtor may wish to pay a debt—for instance, a debt owed to a family member, physician, bank, or some other creditor—even though the debt could be discharged in bankruptcy. In addition, a debtor cannot retain secured property while continuing to make payments on the underlying debt without entering into a reaffirmation agreement.

Reaffirmation Agreement An agreement between a debtor and a creditor in which the debtor voluntarily agrees to pay a debt dischargeable in bankruptcy.

Procedures To be enforceable, reaffirmation agreements must be made before the debtor is granted a discharge. The agreement must be signed and filed with the court (along with disclosure documents, as described next). Court approval is required when the debtor is not represented by an attorney. Even when the debtor is represented by an attorney, court approval may be required if it appears that the reaffirmation will result in undue hardship to the debtor. When court approval is required, a separate hearing will take place. The court will approve the reaffirmation only if it finds that the agreement is consistent with the debtor's best interests and will not result in undue hardship.

Required Disclosures To discourage creditors from engaging in abusive reaffirmation practices, the law provides specific language for disclosures that must be given to debtors entering reaffirmation agreements. Among other things, these disclosures explain that the debtor is not required to reaffirm any debt, but that liens on secured property, such as mortgages and cars, will remain in effect even if the debt is not reaffirmed.

The original disclosure documents must be signed by the debtor, certified by the debtor's attorney, and filed with the court at the same time as the reaffirmation agreement. A reaffirmation agreement that is not accompanied by the original signed disclosures will not be effective.

The reaffirmation agreement must disclose the amount of the debt reaffirmed, the rate of interest, the date payments begin, and the right to rescind. The disclosures also caution the debtor: "Only agree to reaffirm a debt if it is in your best interest. Be sure you can afford the payments you agree to make."

Case Example 22.7 Teresa Chandler took out a loan with Peoples Bank to be paid off in forty-eight installments. After making thirteen timely payments, she missed one on July 7. On July 30, she filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy. On August 8, she made her fourteenth payment, which People's Bank applied to the missed July 7 payment. She and People's Bank then signed a standard reaffirmation agreement, which was filed with a Kentucky bankruptcy court on September 11. Because of the missed payment, every payment that Chandler made under the reaffirmation agreement was considered one month late, leading to "harassment," extra fees, and penalties.

Chandler filed a complaint alleging that People's Bank had violated the reaffirmation agreement. An appellate court determined that Chandler mistakenly believed the missed July 7 payment to have been forgiven by her declaration of bankruptcy. When a reaffirmation agreement does not specifically differ from the original agreement, the original agreement controls. Therefore, she still owed People's Bank thirty-four payments, not thirty-three. Furthermore, the court noted, as the reaffirmation agreement went into effect on September 11, the bank could not have violated it by any action linked to a payment made on August 8.[14] ■

22–3 Chapter 11—Reorganization

The type of bankruptcy proceeding used most commonly by corporate debtors is the Chapter 11 reorganization. In a reorganization, the creditors and the debtor formulate a plan under which the debtor pays a portion of its debts and the rest of the debts are discharged. The debtor is allowed to continue in business. This type of bankruptcy is generally a corporate reorganization. Nonetheless, any debtor (except a stockbroker or commodities broker) who is eligible for Chapter 7 relief is normally eligible for relief under Chapter 11. Railroads are also eligible.

Congress has established a "fast-track" Chapter 11 procedure for small-business debtors whose liabilities do not exceed $2.56 million and who do not own or manage real estate.[15] The fast track enables a debtor to avoid the appointment of a creditors' committee and also shortens the filing periods and relaxes certain other requirements. Because the process is shorter and simpler, it is less costly.

The same principles that govern the filing of a liquidation (Chapter 7) petition apply to reorganization (Chapter 11) proceedings. The case may be brought either voluntarily or involuntarily. The automatic-stay provision and its exceptions apply in reorganizations as well, as do the provisions regarding substantial abuse and additional grounds for dismissal (or conversion) of bankruptcy petitions.

22–3a Workouts

In some instances, to avoid bankruptcy proceedings, creditors may prefer a private, negotiated adjustment of creditor-debtor relations, known as a workout. Often, these out-of-court agreements are much more flexible and thus conducive to a speedy settlement. Speed is critical because delay is one of the most costly elements in any bankruptcy proceeding. Another advantage of workout agreements is that they avoid the various administrative costs of bankruptcy proceedings.

Workout An agreement outlining the respective rights and responsibilities of a borrower and a lender as they try to resolve the borrower's default.

22–3b Best Interests of the Creditors

Once a petition for Chapter 11 has been filed, a bankruptcy court can dismiss or suspend all proceedings in a case at any time if dismissal or suspension would better serve the interests of the creditors. Before taking such an action, the court must give notice and conduct a hearing. The Code also allows a court, after notice and a hearing, to dismiss a reorganization case "for cause" when there is no reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation. Similarly, a court can dismiss a Chapter 11 petition when there is an inability to effect a plan or an unreasonable delay by the debtor that may harm the interests of creditors. A debtor whose petition is dismissed for these reasons can file a subsequent Chapter 11 petition in the future.[16]

22–3c Debtor in Possession

On entry of the order for relief, the debtor in Chapter 11 generally continues to operate the business as a debtor in possession (DIP). The court, however, may appoint a trustee (often referred to as a receiver) to operate the debtor's business if gross mismanagement of the business is shown or if appointing a trustee is in the best interests of the estate.

Debtor in Possession (DIP) In Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings, a debtor who is allowed to continue in possession of the business and to continue business operations.

The DIP's role is similar to that of a trustee in a liquidation. The DIP is entitled to avoid preferential payments made to creditors and fraudulent transfers of assets. The DIP can also exercise a trustee's strong-arm powers. The DIP has the power to decide whether to cancel or assume prepetition executory contracts (contracts not yet performed) or unexpired leases.

Cancellation of executory contracts or unexpired leases can be of substantial benefit to a Chapter 11 debtor. Example 22.8 Five years ago, APT Corporation leased an office building for a twenty-year term. Now, APT can no longer pay the rent due under the lease and has filed for Chapter 11 reorganization. In this situation, the debtor in possession can cancel the lease so that APT will not be required to continue paying the substantial rent due for fifteen more years. ■

22–3d Creditors' Committees

As soon as practicable after the entry of the order for relief, a committee of unsecured creditors is appointed.[17] The committee can consult with the trustee or the debtor concerning the administration of the case or the formulation of the plan. Additional creditors' committees may be appointed to represent special interest creditors. Generally, no orders affecting the estate will be entered without the consent of the committee or a hearing in which the judge is informed of the position of the committee.

As mentioned earlier, businesses with debts of less than $2.56 million that do not own or manage real estate can avoid creditors' committees.[18] In these fast-track proceedings, orders can be entered without a committee's consent.

22–3e The Reorganization Plan

Know This

Chapter 11 proceedings are typically prolonged and costly. Whether a firm survives depends on its size and its ability to attract new investors despite its Chapter 11 status.

A reorganization plan is established to conserve and administer the debtor's assets in the hope of an eventual return to successful operation and solvency. The plan must be fair and equitable and must do the following:

1. Designate classes of claims and interests.
2. Specify the treatment to be afforded the classes. (The plan must provide the same treatment for all claims in a particular class.)
3. Provide an adequate means for execution. (Individual debtors must utilize postpetition assets as necessary to execute the plan.)
4. Provide for payment of tax claims over a five-year period.

The plan need not provide for full repayment to unsecured creditors. Instead, creditors receive a percentage of each dollar owed to them by the debtor.

Filing the Plan Only the debtor may file a plan within the first 120 days after the date of the order for relief. This period may be extended, but not beyond eighteen months from the date of the order for relief. If the debtor does not meet the 120-day deadline or obtain an extension, or if the debtor fails to obtain the required creditor consent (discussed next) within 180 days, any party may propose a plan. If a small-business debtor chooses to avoid a creditors' committee, the time for the debtor's filing is 180 days.

Acceptance and Confirmation of the Plan Once the plan has been developed, it is submitted to each class of creditors for acceptance. For the plan to be adopted, each class must accept it. A class has accepted the plan when a majority of the creditors, representing two-thirds of the amount of the total claim, vote to approve it.

Even when all classes of creditors accept the plan, the court may refuse to confirm it if it is not "in the best interests of the creditors." In addition, confirmation is conditioned on the debtor's certifying that all postpetition domestic-support obligations have been paid in full. For small-business debtors, if the plan meets the listed requirements, the court must confirm the plan within forty-five days (unless this period is extended).

The plan can also be modified upon the request of the debtor, DIP, trustee, U.S. trustee, or holder of an unsecured claim. If an unsecured creditor objects to the plan, specific rules apply to the value of property to be distributed under the plan. Tax claims must be paid over a five-year period.

Cram-Down Provision A provision of the Bankruptcy Code that allows a court to confirm a debtor's Chapter 11 reorganization plan even though only one class of creditors has accepted it.

Even if only one class of creditors has accepted the plan, the court may still confirm the plan under the Code's so-called cram-down provision. In other words, the court may confirm the plan over the objections of a class of creditors. Before the court can exercise this right of cram-down confirmation, it must be demonstrated that the plan is fair and equitable.

17. If the debtor has filed a plan accepted by the creditors, the trustee may decide not to call a meeting of the creditors.

Discharge The plan is binding on confirmation. Nevertheless, the law provides that confirmation of a plan does not discharge an individual debtor. For individual debtors, the plan must be completed before discharge will be granted, unless the court orders otherwise. For all other debtors, the court may order discharge at any time after the plan is confirmed.

On completion of the plan, the debtor is given a reorganization discharge from all claims not protected under the plan. This discharge does not apply to any claims that would be denied discharge under liquidation.

22–4 Bankruptcy Relief under Chapter 13 and Chapter 12

In addition to bankruptcy relief through liquidation (Chapter 7) and reorganization (Chapter 11), the Code also provides for individuals' repayment plans (Chapter 13) and family-farmer and family-fisherman debt adjustments (Chapter 12).

22–4a Individuals' Repayment Plan—Chapter 13

Chapter 13 of the bankruptcy code provides for the "adjustment of debts of an individual with regular income." Individuals (not partnerships or corporations) with regular income who owe fixed unsecured debts of less than $394,725 or fixed secured debts of less than $1,184,200 may take advantage of bankruptcy repayment plans.

Among those eligible are salaried employees and sole proprietors, as well as individuals who live on welfare, Social Security, fixed pensions, or investment income. Many small-business debtors have a choice of filing under either Chapter 11 or Chapter 13. Repayment plans offer some advantages because they are typically less expensive and less complicated than reorganization or liquidation proceedings.

How does a Chapter 13 bankruptcy differ from bankruptcy under Chapter 7 and Chapter 11?

Filing the Petition A Chapter 13 repayment plan case can be initiated only by the debtor's filing of a voluntary petition or by court conversion of a Chapter 7 petition (because of a finding of substantial abuse, for instance). Certain liquidation and reorganization cases may be converted to Chapter 13 with the consent of the debtor.[19]

A trustee, who will make payments under the plan, must be appointed. On the filing of a repayment plan petition, an automatic stay takes effect. Although the stay applies to all or part of the debtor's consumer debt, it does not apply to any business debt incurred by the debtor or to any domestic-support obligations.

Good Faith Requirement The Bankruptcy Code imposes the requirement of good faith on a debtor in both the filing of the petition and the filing of the plan. The Code does not define good faith, but if the circumstances as a whole indicate bad faith (such as when a debtor lies about available assets), a court can dismiss a debtor's Chapter 13 petition.

FuzzMartin/E+/Getty Images

How does good faith play a role in Chapter 13 reorganization plans?

The Repayment Plan A plan of rehabilitation by repayment must provide for the following:

1. The turning over to the trustee of future earnings or income of the debtor as necessary for execution of the plan.

19. A Chapter 13 repayment plan may be converted to a Chapter 7 liquidation either at the request of the debtor or, under certain circumstances, "for cause" by a creditor. A Chapter 13 petition may be converted to a Chapter 11 reorganization after a hearing.

Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

2. Full payment through deferred cash payments of all claims entitled to priority, such as taxes.[20]
3. Identical treatment of all claims within a particular class. (The Code permits the debtor to list co-debtors, such as guarantors or sureties, as a separate class.)

The repayment plan may provide either for payment of all obligations in full or for payment of a lesser amount. The debtor applies the means test to determine the amount of disposable income that is available to repay creditors. The debtor is allowed to deduct certain expenses from monthly income to arrive at this amount.

The debtor must begin making payments under the proposed plan within thirty days after the plan has been filed and must continue to make "timely" payments. If the debtor fails to make timely payments or does not commence payments within the thirty-day period, the court can convert the case to a liquidation bankruptcy or dismiss the petition.

The Length of the Plan. The length of the payment plan can be three or five years, depending on the debtor's family income. If the debtor's family income is greater than the median family income in the relevant geographic area under the means test, the term of the proposed plan must be three years.[21] The term may not exceed five years.

Confirmation of the Plan. After the plan is filed, the court holds a confirmation hearing, at which interested parties (such as creditors) may object to the plan. The hearing must be held at least twenty days, but no more than forty-five days, after the meeting of the creditors. The debtor must have filed all prepetition tax returns and paid all postpetition domestic-support obligations before a court will confirm the plan.

The court will confirm a plan with respect to each claim of a secured creditor under any of the following circumstances:

1. If the secured creditors have accepted the plan.
2. If the plan provides that secured creditors retain their liens until there is payment in full or until the debtor receives a discharge.
3. If the debtor surrenders the property securing the claims to the creditors.

Know This

Courts, trustees, and creditors carefully monitor Chapter 13 debtors. If payments are not made, a court can require that the debtor explain why and may allow a creditor to take back the property.

In addition, for a motor vehicle purchased within 910 days before the petition is filed, the plan must provide that a creditor with a purchase-money security interest (PMSI) retains its lien until the entire debt is paid. For PMSIs on other personal property, the payment plan must cover debts incurred within a one-year period preceding the filing.

Discharge After the debtor has completed all payments, the court grants a discharge of all debts provided for by the repayment plan. Generally, all debts are dischargeable except the following:

1. Allowed claims not provided for by the plan.
2. Certain long-term debts provided for by the plan.
3. Certain tax claims and payments on retirement accounts.
4. Claims for domestic-support obligations.
5. Debts related to injury or property damage caused while driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs.

An order granting discharge is final as to the debts listed in the repayment plan. A creditor that willfully continues to attempt to collect on a debt that a court has ordered discharged under Chapter 13 is in violation of the law and can be sanctioned.[22]

20. As with a Chapter 11 reorganization plan, full repayment of all claims is not always required.
21. See 11 U.S.C. Section 1322(d) for details on when a court will find that the Chapter 13 plan should extend to a five-year period.
22. See, for example, In re Vanamann, 561 Bankr. 106 (D.Nev. 2017).

Under the Bankruptcy Code, a debt constitutes a domestic-support obligation if it is "in the nature of alimony, maintenance, or support." The question in the following case was whether a parent's promise to pay his children's college expenses met this requirement.

Case 22.3

In re Chamberlain

United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, 721 Fed.Appx. 826, 2018 WL 985737 (2018).

Facts When Stephen and Judith Chamberlain were divorced, their marital settlement agreement included a "College Education" provision. Stephen promised to "pay the costs of tuition, room and board, books, registration fees, and reasonable application fees incident to . . . an undergraduate college education" for each of their three children, Sarah, Kate, and John. Stephen did not meet this obligation.

Judith obtained an order in a Maryland state court to enforce the agreement and initiated an effort to collect. Stephen filed a petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 13. Judith filed a creditor's claim with the bankruptcy court, contending that the college expenses were domestic-support obligations and thus created priority claims that had to be fully paid. The court agreed. Stephen appealed.

Issue Did Stephen's promise to pay for his children's college education qualify as a domestic-support obligation?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the bankruptcy court. "Stephen's college expense obligation was 'in the nature of support' as required for a domestic support obligation under the Bankruptcy Code."

Reason The intent of the parties when they entered into their marital settlement agreement and the substance of Stephen's promise indicated that the "College Education" provision involved support. The parties' intent was evidenced by the expression of the obligation in the marital settlement agreement and the parties' testimony in the bankruptcy court. These sources revealed that Stephen and Judith believed a college education was important for their children's growth and maturity, that the couple had long intended to provide for that education, and that they knew this could be accomplished only if Stephen assumed the obligation to pay for it. The function of the promise at the time of the divorce indicated that the obligation was support in "substance." This determination was affected by the parties' relative financial circumstances at the time. In that respect, Stephen was the only parent in a position to pay for their children's college education.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Maryland law arguably does not include postsecondary education expenses in the definition of "child support." Should this state law have governed the court's conclusion in the Chamberlain case? Why or why not?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the marital settlement agreement had obligated Stephen to assume the mortgage debt on the family home. If all other facts were the same, would the result have been different?

22–4b Family Farmers and Fishermen—Chapter 12

To help relieve economic pressure on small farmers, Congress created Chapter 12 of the Bankruptcy Code. In 2005, Congress extended this protection to family fishermen, modified its provisions somewhat, and made it a permanent chapter in the Bankruptcy Code (previously, it had to be periodically renewed by Congress).

For purposes of Chapter 12, a family farmer is one whose gross income is at least 50 percent farm dependent and whose debts are at least 50 percent farm related. The total debt must not exceed $10,000,000. A partnership or a close corporation that is at least 50 percent owned by the farm family can also qualify as a family farmer.[23]

A family fisherman is one whose gross income is at least 50 percent dependent on commercial fishing operations and whose debts are at least 80 percent related to commercial fishing. The total debt for a family fisherman must not exceed $2,044,225. As with family farmers, a partnership or close corporation can also qualify.

23. Note that for a corporation or partnership to qualify under Chapter 12, at least 80 percent of the value of the firm's assets must consist of assets related to the farming operation.

Filing the Petition The procedure for filing a family-farmer or family-fisherman bankruptcy plan is similar to the procedure for filing a repayment plan under Chapter 13. The debtor must file a plan not later than ninety days after the order for relief has been entered. The filing of the petition acts as an automatic stay against creditors' and co-obligors' actions against the estate.

A farmer or fisherman who has already filed a reorganization or repayment plan may convert the plan to a Chapter 12 plan. The debtor may also convert a Chapter 12 plan to a liquidation plan.

Content and Confirmation of the Plan The content of a plan under Chapter 12 is basically the same as that of a Chapter 13 repayment plan. Generally, the plan must be confirmed or denied within forty-five days of filing.

The plan must provide for payment of secured debts at the value of the collateral. If the secured debt exceeds the value of the collateral, the remaining debt is unsecured.

For unsecured debtors, the plan must be confirmed if either (1) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan equals the amount of the claim or (2) the plan provides that all of the debtor's disposable income to be received in a three-year period (or longer, by court approval) will be applied to making payments. Completion of payments under the plan discharges all debts provided for by the plan.

Practice and Review

Three months ago, Janet Hart's husband of twenty years died of cancer. Although he had medical insurance, he left Janet with outstanding medical bills of more than $50,000. Janet has worked at the local library for the past ten years, earning $1,500 per month. Since her husband's death, Janet also has received $1,500 in Social Security benefits and $1,100 in life insurance proceeds every month, giving her a monthly income of $4,100. After she pays the mortgage payment of $1,500 and the amounts due on other debts each month, Janet barely has enough left over to buy groceries for her family (she has two teenage daughters at home). She decides to file for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, hoping for a fresh start. Using the information provided in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under the current Bankruptcy Code, what must Janet do before filing a petition for relief under Chapter 7?
2. How much time does Janet have after filing the bankruptcy petition to submit the required schedules? What happens if Janet does not meet the deadline?
3. Assume that Janet files a petition under Chapter 7. Further assume that the median family income in the state in which Janet lives is $49,300. What steps would a court take to determine whether Janet's petition is presumed to be substantial abuse under the means test?
4. Suppose the court determines that no presumption of substantial abuse applies in Janet's case. Nevertheless, the court finds that Janet does have the ability to pay at least a portion of the medical bills out of her disposable income. What would the court likely order in that situation?

Debate This

Rather than being allowed to file Chapter 7 bankruptcy petitions, individuals and couples should always be forced to make an effort to pay off their debts through Chapter 13.

Chapter Summary: Bankruptcy

The Bankruptcy Code

1. Goals of bankruptcy law—The law attempts to balance the rights of the debtor and the creditors by giving the debtor a fresh start and ensuring equitable treatment of creditors.
2. Bankruptcy courts—Bankruptcy proceedings are held in federal bankruptcy courts (under the authority of U.S. district courts). They follow the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure.
3. Types of bankruptcy relief—Chapter 7 provides for liquidation proceedings, Chapter 11 governs reorganizations, and Chapter 13 (for individuals) and Chapter 12 (for family farmers and family fishermen) provide for adjustment of debts of parties with regular income.
4. Special treatment of consumer-debtors—The Bankruptcy Code requires that all consumer-debtors receive written notice of the purpose, benefits, and costs of each chapter of bankruptcy, as well as information on the types of services available from credit counseling agencies.

BANKRUPTCY—A COMPARISON OF CHAPTERS 7, 11, 12, AND 13

Issue	Chapter 7	Chapter 11	Chapters 12 and 13
Who Can Petition	Debtor (voluntary) or creditors (involuntary).	Debtor (voluntary) or creditors (involuntary).	Debtor (voluntary) only.
Who Can Be a Debtor	Any "person" (including partnerships and corporations) except railroads, insurance companies, banks, savings and loan institutions, investment companies licensed by the U.S. Small Business Administration, and credit unions. Farmers and charitable institutions cannot be involuntarily petitioned.	Any debtor eligible for Chapter 7 relief; railroads are also eligible.	Chapter 12—Any family farmer (one whose gross income is at least 50 percent farm dependent and whose debts are at least 50 percent farm related) or family fisherman (one whose gross income is at least 50 percent dependent on and whose debts are at least 80 percent related to commercial fishing) or any partnership or close corporation at least 50 percent owned by a family farmer or fisherman, when total debt does not exceed a specified amount ($10,000,000 for farmers and $2,044,225 for fishermen). Chapter 13—Any individual (not partnerships or corporations) with regular income who owes fixed (liquidated) unsecured debts of less than $394,175 or fixed secured debts of less than $1,184,200.
Procedure Leading to Discharge	Nonexempt property is sold with proceeds to be distributed (in order) to priority groups. Dischargeable debts are terminated.	Plan is submitted. If it is approved and followed, debts are discharged.	Plan is submitted and must be approved if the value of the property to be distributed equals the amount of the claims or if the debtor turns over disposable income for a three-year or five-year period. If the plan is followed, debts are discharged.
Advantages	On liquidation and distribution, most debts are discharged, and the debtor has an opportunity for a fresh start.	Debtor continues in business. Creditors can either accept the plan, or it can be "crammed down" on them. The plan allows for the reorganization and liquidation of debts over the plan period.	Debtor continues in business or possession of assets. If the plan is approved, most debts are discharged after the specified period.

1. After graduating from college, Tina works briefly as a salesperson and then files for bankruptcy. As part of her petition, Tina reveals that her only debts are student loans, taxes accruing within the last year, and a claim against her based on her misuse of funds during her employment. Are these debts dischargeable in bankruptcy? Explain. (See Chapter 7—Liquidation.)
2. Ogden is a vice president of Plumbing Service, Inc. (PSI). On May 1, Ogden loans PSI $10,000. On June 1, the firm repays the loan. On July 1, PSI files for bankruptcy. Quentin is appointed trustee. Can Quentin recover the $10,000 paid to Ogden on June 1? Why or why not? (See Chapter 7—Liquidation.)

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

22–1. Voluntary versus Involuntary Bankruptcy. Burke has been a rancher all her life, raising cattle and crops. Her ranch is valued at $500,000, almost all of which is exempt under state law. Burke has eight creditors and a total indebtedness of $70,000. Two of her largest creditors are Oman ($30,000 owed) and Sneed ($25,000 owed). The other six creditors have claims of less than $5,000 each. A drought has ruined all of Burke's crops and forced her to sell many of her cattle at a loss. She cannot pay off her creditors. (See Chapter 7—Liquidation.)

1. Under the Bankruptcy Code, can Burke, with a $500,000 ranch, voluntarily petition herself into bankruptcy? Explain.
2. Could either Oman or Sneed force Burke into involuntary bankruptcy? Explain.

22–2. Distribution of Property. Montoro petitioned himself into voluntary bankruptcy. There were three major claims against his estate. One was made by Carlton, a friend who held Montoro's negotiable promissory note for $2,500. Another was made by Elmer, Montoro's employee, who claimed that Montoro owed him three months' back wages of $4,500. The last major claim was made by the United Bank of the Rockies on an unsecured loan of $5,000. In addition, Dietrich, an accountant retained by the trustee, was owed $500, and property taxes of $1,000 were owed to Rock County. Montoro's nonexempt property was liquidated, with proceeds of $5,000. Discuss fully what amount each party will receive, and why. (See Chapter 7—Liquidation.)

22–3. Discharge in Bankruptcy. Like many students, Barbara Hann financed her education partially through loans. These loans included three federally insured Stafford Loans of $7,500 each ($22,500 in total). Hann believed that she had repaid the loans, but later, when she filed a Chapter 13 petition, Educational Credit Management Corp. (ECMC) filed an unsecured proof of claim based on the loans. Hann objected. At a hearing at which ECMC failed to appear, Hann submitted correspondence from the lender that indicated the loans had been paid. The court entered an order sustaining Hann's objection. Despite the order, can ECMC resume its effort to collect on Hann's loans? Explain. [In re Hann, 711 F.3d 235 (1st Cir. 2013)] (See Bankruptcy Relief under Chapter 13 and Chapter 12.)

22–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Discharge. Michael and Dianne Shankle divorced. An Arkansas state court ordered Michael to pay Dianne alimony and child support, as well as half of the $184,000 in their investment accounts. Instead, Michael withdrew more than half of the investment funds and spent them. Over the next several years, the court repeatedly held Michael in contempt for failing to pay Dianne. Six years later, Michael filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, including in the petition's schedule the debt to Dianne of unpaid alimony, child support, and investment funds. Is Michael entitled to a discharge of this debt? Explain. [In re Shankle, 554 Fed.Appx. 264 (5th Cir. 2014)] (See Chapter 7—Liquidation.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 22–4, go to Appendix E.

22–5. Discharge under Chapter 13. James Thomas and Jennifer Clark married and had two children. They bought a home in Ironton, Ohio, with a loan secured by a mortgage. Later, they took out a second mortgage. On their divorce, the court gave Clark custody of the children and required Clark to pay the first mortgage. The divorce decree also required Thomas and Clark to make equal payments on the second mortgage and provided that Clark would receive all proceeds on the sale of the home. Thomas failed to make any payments, and Clark sold the home. At that point, she learned that Auto Now had a lien on the home because Thomas had not made payments on his car. Clark used all the sale proceeds to pay off the lien and the mortgages. When Thomas filed a petition for a Chapter 13 bankruptcy in a federal bankruptcy court, Clark filed a proof of claim for the mortgage and lien debts. Clark claimed that Thomas should not be able to discharge these debts because they were part of his domestic-support obligations. Are these debts dischargeable? Explain. [In re Thomas, 591 Fed.Appx. 443 (6th Cir. 2015)] (See Bankruptcy Relief under Chapter 13 and Chapter 12.)

22–6. Liquidation Proceedings. Jeffrey Krueger and Michael Torres, shareholders of Cru Energy, Inc., were embroiled in litigation in a Texas state court. Both claimed to act on Cru's behalf, and each charged the other with attempting to obtain control of Cru through fraud and other misconduct. Temporarily prohibited from participating in Cru's business, Krueger formed Kru, a company with the same business plan and many of the same shareholders as Cru. Meanwhile, to delay state court proceedings, Krueger filed a petition for a Chapter 7 liquidation in a federal bankruptcy court. He did not reveal his interest in Kru to the bankruptcy court. Ownership of Krueger's Cru shares passed to the bankruptcy trustee, but Krueger ignored this. He called a meeting of Cru's shareholders—except Torres—and voted those shares to remove Torres from the board and elect himself chairman, president, chief executive officer, and treasurer. The Cru board then dismissed all of Cru's claims against Krueger in his suit with Torres. Are there sufficient grounds for the bankruptcy court to dismiss Krueger's bankruptcy petition? Discuss. [In re Krueger, 812 F.3d 365 (5th Cir. 2016)] (See Chapter 7—Liquidation.)

22–7. The Reorganization Plan. Under the "plain language" of the Bankruptcy Code, at least one class of creditors must accept a Chapter 11 plan for it to be confirmed. Transwest Resort Properties, Inc., and four related companies filed a petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 11. The five debtors filed a joint reorganization plan. Several classes of their creditors approved the plan. Grasslawn Lodging, LLC, filed a claim based on its loan to two of the companies, and objected to the plan. Grasslawn further asserted that the Code's confirmation requirement applied on a "per debtor," not a "per plan," basis, and because Grasslawn was the only class member for two of the debtors, the plan in this case did not meet the test. Can the court order a "cram-down"? Why or why not? [In the Matter of Transwest Resort Properties, Inc., 881 F.3d 724 (9th Cir. 2018)] (See Chapter 11—Reorganization.)

22–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Reorganization. Jevic Transportation Corporation filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court for a Chapter 11 reorganization. A group of former Jevic truck drivers filed a suit and won a judgment against the firm for unpaid wages. This judgment entitled the workers to payment from Jevic's estate ahead of its unsecured creditors. Later, some of Jevic's unsecured creditors filed a suit against some of its other unsecured creditors. The plaintiffs won a judgment on the ground that the firm's payments to the defendants constituted fraudulent transfers and preferences. These parties then negotiated, without the truck drivers' consent, a settlement agreement that called for the workers to receive nothing on their claims while the creditors were to be paid proportionately. [Czyzewski v Jevic Holding Corp, 580 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 973, 197 L.Ed.2d 398 (2017)] (See Chapter 11—Reorganization.)

1. Was it ethical of the truck drivers to obtain a judgment entitling them to payment ahead of the unsecured creditors? Why or why not?
2. Was it ethical of the unsecured creditors to agree that the workers would receive nothing on their claims? Use the IDDR approach to decide.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

22–9. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Student Loan Debt. Cathy Coleman took out loans to complete her college education. After graduation, Coleman was irregularly employed as a teacher. Eventually, she filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court under Chapter 13. The court confirmed a five-year plan under which Coleman was required to commit all of her disposable income to paying the student loans. Less than a year later, when Coleman was laid off, she still owed more than $100,000 to Educational Credit Management Corp. Coleman asked the court to discharge the debt on the ground that it would be an undue hardship for her to pay it. (See Bankruptcy Relief under Chapter 13 and Chapter 12.)

1. The first group will explain when a debtor normally is entitled to a discharge under Chapter 13.
2. The second group will discuss whether student loans are dischargeable and when "undue hardship" is a legitimate ground for an exception.
3. The third group will outline the goals of bankruptcy law and make an argument, based on these facts and principles, in support of Coleman's request.

Unit Three—Task-Based Simulation

Sonja owns a bakery in San Francisco.

1. Performance of Sales Contracts. Sonja orders two new model X23 McIntyre ovens from Western Heating Appliances for $16,000. Sonja and Western Heating agree orally, on the telephone, that Western will deliver the ovens within two weeks and that Sonja will pay for the ovens when they are delivered. Two days later, Sonja receives a fax from Western confirming her order. Before delivery, Sonja learns that she can obtain the same ovens from another company at a much lower price. Sonja wants to cancel her order, but Western refuses. Is the contract enforceable against Sonja? Why or why not?
2. Banking. To pay a supplier, Sonja issues a check to Milled Grains Co. that is drawn on United First Bank. A Milled Grains employee, with authorization, indorses the check and transfers it to Milled Grains' financial institution, Second Federal Bank. Second Federal puts the check into the regular bank collection process. If United First refuses to honor the check, who will ultimately suffer the loss? Could Sonja be subject to criminal prosecution if United First refuses to honor the check?
3. Security Interests. Sonja wants to borrow $40,000 from Credit National Bank to buy coffee-brewing equipment. If Credit National accepts Sonja's equipment as collateral for the loan, how does it let other potential creditors know of its interest? If Sonja fails to repay the loan, what are Credit National's alternatives with respect to collecting the amount due?
4. Creditors' Rights. Sonya borrows $20,000 from Ace Loan Co. to remodel the bakery and gives it to Jones Construction, a contractor, to do the work. The amount covers only half of the cost, but when Jones finishes the work, Sonja fails to pay the rest. Sonja also does not repay Ace for the loan. What can Jones do to collect what it is owed? What can Ace do?

23 Agency Relationships in Business

Focus Questions

The six Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is the difference between an employee and an independent contractor?
2. How do agency relationships arise?
3. What duties do agents and principals owe to each other?
4. How does a person acquire apparent authority to act as someone's agent?
5. When is a principal liable for an agent's negligence?
6. What are some of the ways in which an agency relationship can be terminated?

"[It] is a universal principle in the law of agency, that the powers of the agent are to be exercised for the benefit of the principal only, and not of the agent or of third parties."

Joseph Story
(Associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, 1811–1844)

One of the most common, important, and pervasive legal relationships is that of agency. In an agency relationship between two parties, one of the parties, called the agent, agrees to represent or act for the other, called the principal. The principal has the right to control the agent's conduct in matters entrusted to the agent. Agents must exercise their powers "for the benefit of the principal only," as Justice Joseph Story indicated in the chapter-opening quotation.

Agency relationships are crucial to the business world. Indeed, the only way that some business entities—including corporations and limited liability companies—can function is through their agents. Using agents provides clear benefits to principals, but agents can also create liability for their principals.

Amelia works as the on-site leasing agent for an apartment complex owned by Premier Properties. As part of her job, she signs leases with tenants and accepts rent on behalf of Premier. She also contracts with companies that do routine maintenance and landscaping at the complex. Is Amelia, as an agent, liable if a maintenance worker is injured while working at the apartment complex? Is Premier (the principal) liable if Amelia makes fraudulent statements to tenants? What happens if Amelia signs a contract for a major renovation of the complex that Premier did not authorize? These are just a few of the legal issues that can arise in agency relationships.

23–1 Agency Law

Section 1(1) of the Restatement (Third) of Agency[1] defines agency as "the fiduciary relation which results from the manifestation of consent by one person to another that the other shall act in his [or her] behalf and subject to his [or her] control, and consent by the other so to act." In other words, in a principal-agent relationship, the parties have agreed that the agent will act on behalf and instead of the principal in negotiating and transacting business with third parties.

Agency A relationship between two parties in which one party (the agent) agrees to represent or act for the other (the principal).

The term fiduciary is at the heart of agency law. The term can be used both as a noun and as an adjective. When used as a noun, it refers to a person who, having undertaken a certain enterprise on behalf of another person, has a duty to act for the other person's benefit in all matters related to that enterprise. When used as an adjective, as in "fiduciary relationship," it means that the relationship involves trust and confidence.

Fiduciary As a noun, a person who, having undertaken a certain enterprise on behalf of another person, has a duty to act for the other person's benefit in all matters related to that enterprise. As an adjective, a relationship founded on trust and confidence.

Agency relationships commonly exist between employers and employees. Agency relationships may sometimes also exist between employers and independent contractors who are hired to perform special tasks or services.

23–1a Employer-Employee Relationships

Normally, all employees who deal with third parties are deemed to be agents. A salesperson in a department store, for instance, is an agent of the store's owner (the principal) and acts on the owner's behalf. Any sale of goods made by the salesperson to a customer is binding on the principal. Similarly, most representations of fact made by the salesperson with respect to the goods sold are binding on the principal.

Because employees who deal with third parties are generally deemed to be agents of their employers, agency law and employment law overlap considerably. Agency relationships, however, can exist outside an employer-employee relationship, so agency law has a broader reach than employment law. Additionally, agency law is based on the common law, whereas much employment law is statutory law.

Note that employment laws (state and federal) apply only to the employer-employee relationship. Statutes governing Social Security, withholding taxes, workers' compensation, unemployment compensation, workplace safety, and employment discrimination usually are applicable only if employer-employee status exists.

23–1b Employer–Independent Contractor Relationships

Independent contractors are not employees because, by definition, those who hire them have no control over the details of their physical performance. Section 2 of the Restatement (Third) of Agency defines an independent contractor as follows:

Independent Contractor One who works for, and receives payment from, an employer but whose working conditions and methods are not controlled by the employer. An independent contractor is not an employee but may be an agent.

> [An independent contractor is] a person who contracts with another to do something for him [or her] but who is not controlled by the other nor subject to the other's right to control with respect to his [or her] physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking. He [or she] may or may not be an agent. [Emphasis added.]

Building contractors and subcontractors are independent contractors. A property owner does not control the acts of either of these professionals. Truck drivers who own their equipment and hire themselves out on a per-job basis are independent contractors, whereas truck drivers who drive company trucks on a regular basis are usually employees.

1. The Restatement (Third) of Agency is an authoritative summary of the law of agency and is often referred to by judges and other legal professionals.

The relationship between a person or firm and an independent contractor may or may not involve an agency relationship. To illustrate: A homeowner who hires a real estate broker to sell the property has contracted with an independent contractor (the broker). The homeowner also has established an agency relationship with the broker for the specific purpose of selling the property. Insurance agents also operate in this manner, as they are both independent contractors and the agents of the insurance companies for which they sell policies. (Note that an insurance broker, in contrast, normally is an agent of the person obtaining insurance and not of the insurance company.)

Focus Question 1
What is the difference between an employee and an independent contractor?

23–1c Determining Employee Status

The courts are frequently asked to determine whether a particular worker is an employee or an independent contractor. How a court decides this issue can have a significant effect on the rights and liabilities of the parties. For instance, employers are required to pay certain taxes, such as Social Security and unemployment insurance taxes, for employees but not for independent contractors. Also, as will be discussed later in the chapter, an employer normally is not legally responsible for the actions of an independent contractor.

Criteria Used by the Courts In determining whether a worker has the status of an employee or an independent contractor, the courts often consider the following questions:

1. How much control can the employer exercise over the details of the work? (If an employer can exercise considerable control over the details of the work, this indicates employee status. The employer's degree of control is perhaps the most important factor weighed by the courts in determining employee status.)
2. Is the worker engaged in an occupation or business distinct from that of the employer? (If so, this points to independent-contractor status.)
3. Is the work usually done under the employer's direction or by a specialist without supervision? (If the work is usually done under the employer's direction, this indicates employee status.)
4. Does the employer supply the tools at the place of work? (If so, this indicates employee status.)
5. For how long is the person employed? (If the person is employed for a long, continuous period, this indicates employee status.)
6. What is the method of payment—by time period or at the completion of the job? (Regular payment by time period, such as once a month, indicates employee status.)
7. What degree of skill is required of the worker? (Independent contractors are more likely to be highly skilled or to have unique skills than to be unskilled, so these types of skills may indicate independent-contractor status.)

Sometimes, workers may benefit from having employee status—for tax purposes and to be protected under certain employment laws, for instance. As mentioned earlier, federal statutes governing employment discrimination apply only when an employer-employee relationship exists. Protection under antidiscrimination statutes provides a significant incentive for workers to claim that they are employees rather than independent contractors.

Employee Status and Overtime According to federal law, employers must pay employees at least one-and-one-half times their regular hourly late for overtime, defined as those hours worked in excess of forty hours per week.[2] Independent contractors are exempt from these overtime rules.

Case Example 23.1 Petroplex Pipe & Construction, Inc., hired Joseph Hobbs and Drake Sweeney as pipe welders on various construction projects, classifying them as independent contractors. Petroplex paid Hobbs and Sweeny between $70 and $80 an hour. The two men generally worked from 7 A.M. to 5 P.M., six days a week, as determined by Petroplex. The welders supplied their own trucks and equipment. They also designated themselves as "self-employed" on tax returns and claimed thousands of dollars in deductions for work-related expenses.

After leaving Petroplex, Hobbs and Sweeney filed a suit against the company, alleging that they had been misclassified as independent contractors and deserved significant overtime pay. A federal appellate court determined that, although the issue was not clear cut, as a matter of "economic reality" Hobbs and Sweeney were too dependent on Petroplex to be considered "in business for [themselves]." Petroplex assigned the welders specific tasks at different work sites, set their hours, and determined their wages. Furthermore, for the several years in question, Hobbs and Sweeney worked exclusively for Petroplex. Consequently, the court found that the welders were employees and should be compensated as such.[3]

What factors will a court look at to determine if a pipe welder is an employee or an independent contractor?

Criteria Used by the IRS The Internal Revenue Service (IRS) has established its own criteria for determining whether a worker is an independent contractor or an employee. The most important factor in this determination is the degree of control the business exercises over the worker.

The IRS tends to closely scrutinize a firm's classification of its workers because employers can avoid certain tax liabilities by hiring independent contractors instead of employees. Even when a firm classifies a worker as an independent contractor, the IRS may decide that the worker is actually an employee. If the IRS decides that an employee is misclassified, the employer will be responsible for paying any applicable Social Security, withholding, and unemployment taxes due for that employee.

Employee Status and "Works for Hire" Ordinarily, a person who creates a copyrighted work is the owner of it—unless it is a "work for hire." Under the Copyright Act, any copyrighted work created by an employee within the scope of employment at the request of the employer is a "work for hire." The employer owns the copyright to the work.

In contrast, when an employer hires an independent contractor—a freelance artist, writer, or computer programmer, for instance—the independent contractor normally owns the copyright. An exception is made if the parties agree in writing that the work is a "work for hire."

Case Example 23.2 Over the course of fifty-five years, Stanley Kauffman contributed numerous film reviews and other articles to The New Republic (TNR) magazine. At no time was Kauffman an employee of TNR. After Kauffman died in 2014, forty-four of his articles written for TNR in 1999 appeared without permission in an anthology. Kauffman's estate sued for copyright infringement. The publisher of the anthology produced a letter, signed in 2004 by Kauffman and TNR's literary editor, stating that "all articles [Kauffman has] written for The New Republic have been 'works for hire'" and therefore belonged to TNR.

A federal appellate court ruled that Kauffman, as an independent contractor, retained ownership of the forty-four articles. The legislative intent behind the "work for hire" writing requirement was to make this area of the law more predictable by requiring tangible evidence of the parties' objectives at the time of the agreement. This intent would be frustrated, ruled the court, if parties could enter into a work-for-hire agreement years after the work in question was created.[4]

Ethical Issues

Does the gig economy take advantage of independent contractors? The gig economy model is based on jobs that are temporary and flexible, performed by independent contractors rather than full-time employees. While workers in the gig economy enjoy a great deal of freedom when it comes to how and when they work, they are not protected by most federal and state labor laws and are not guaranteed a minimum wage or overtime pay. An employer who classifies a worker as an independent contractor avoids paying Social Security and Medicare taxes, which are borne entirely by the worker. By one estimate, businesses reduce their payroll costs by 30 percent when they hire independent contractors rather than employees.

MikeDotta/Shutterstock.com

Why would drivers working for Uber or Lyft want to be reclassified as employees? Why would they want to remain independent contractors?

Finding this situation unfair, California legislators passed a bill designed to extend employee workplace protections to roughly one million gig economy workers in the state. Called AB5, the legislation requires that any worker who performs tasks within the "usual course of the hiring entity's business" must be classified as an employee rather than an independent contractor.[5]

Aimed primarily at large gig-reliant companies such as Uber, Lyft, and Doordash, AB5 has proved controversial. Although appreciative of its protections, many gig workers regret the loss of job freedom that comes with employee status. Furthermore, numerous small businesses located in California will be forced to rely on out-of-state independent contractors or risk closure because of AB5's strain on their limited staffing budgets. "This bill is killing cockroaches with a cannon," said one Los Angeles writer who also operates a small clothing brand.

Focus Question 2

How do agency relationships arise?

23–2 Formation of an Agency

Agency relationships normally are consensual. They come about by voluntary consent and agreement between the parties. Normally, the agreement need not be in writing, and consideration is not required.

A person must have contractual capacity to be a principal. Those who cannot legally enter into contracts directly generally are not allowed to do so indirectly through an agent. (In some states, however, a minor can be a principal.) Any person can be an agent regardless of whether that person has the capacity to enter a contract (including minors).

An agency relationship can be created for any legal purpose. An agency relationship that is created for an illegal purpose or that is contrary to public policy is unenforceable. Example 23.3 Sharp (as principal) contracts with McKenzie (as agent) to sell illegal narcotics. The agency relationship here is unenforceable because selling illegal narcotics is a felony and is contrary to public policy. ■ Similarly, it is also illegal for physicians and other licensed professionals to employ unlicensed agents to perform professional actions.

Generally, an agency relationship can arise in four ways: by agreement of the parties, by ratification, by estoppel, or by operation of law.

23–2a Agency by Agreement

Most agency relationships are based on an express or implied agreement that the agent will act for the principal and that the principal agrees to have the agent so act. An agency agreement can take the form of an express written contract or be created by an oral agreement, such as when a person hires a neighbor to mow his lawn on a regular basis.

An agency agreement can also be implied by conduct. Spotlight Case Example 23.4 Gilbert Bishop was admitted to Laurel Creek Health Care Center suffering from various physical ailments. During an examination, Bishop told Laurel Creek staff that he could not use his hands well enough to write or hold a pencil, but he was otherwise found to be mentally competent. Bishop's sister offered to sign the admissions forms, but it was Laurel Creek's policy to have the patient's spouse sign the admissions papers if the patient was unable to do so.

Bishop's sister then brought his wife, Anna, to the hospital to sign the paperwork, which included a mandatory arbitration clause. Later, when the family filed a lawsuit against Laurel Creek, the nursing home sought to enforce the arbitration clause. Ultimately, a state appellate court held that Bishop was bound by the contract and the arbitration clause his wife had signed. Bishop's conduct had indicated that he was giving his wife authority to act as his agent in signing the admissions papers.[6]

Can a new hospital patient designate someone else to sign all of the paperwork involved in getting admitted to the hospital?

23–2b Agency by Ratification

On occasion, a person who is in fact not an agent (or who is an agent acting outside the scope of authority) may make a contract on behalf of another (a principal). If the principal affirms that contract by word or by action, an agency relationship is created by ratification. Ratification involves a question of intent, and intent can be expressed by either words or conduct. The basic requirements for ratification will be discussed later in this chapter.

Ratification A party's act of accepting or giving legal force to a previously unenforceable contract or other obligation entered into on that party's behalf by another party.

23–2c Agency by Estoppel

When a principal causes a third person to believe that another person is the principal's agent, and the third person deals with the supposed agent, the principal is "estopped to deny" the agency relationship. In such a situation, the principal's actions create the appearance of an agency that does not in fact exist.

The third person must prove that she or he reasonably believed that an agency relationship existed. Facts and circumstances must show that an ordinary, prudent person familiar with business practice and custom would have been justified in concluding that the agent had authority. Case Example 23.5 Aaron Riedel was experiencing severe back pain when he visited the emergency room at Lodi Community Hospital. The attending emergency room physician, an independent contractor, misdiagnosed Riedel's condition. Riedel filed a suit against Lodi, alleging that the physician's negligence was the proximate cause of his subsequent paraplegia. Lodi hospital argued that it was not liable because the physician was not its employee or agent. An Ohio jury disagreed, awarding Riedel $5.2 million in damages.

A state appellate court affirmed, holding that a hospital can, depending on the circumstances, be liable under the doctrine of agency by estoppel for the negligence of an independent contractor physician. Crucially, the court noted, the public is rarely aware of the technical employment arrangements between a hospital and its staff. In this case, Riedel chose Lodi only because it was nearby at the time of his medical emergency. He reasonably expected to be treated by a physician employed by Lodi and to be able to hold Lodi responsible for any resulting negligence.[7]

Note that the acts or declarations of a purported agent in and of themselves do not create an agency by estoppel. Rather, it is the deeds or statements of the principal that create an agency by estoppel.

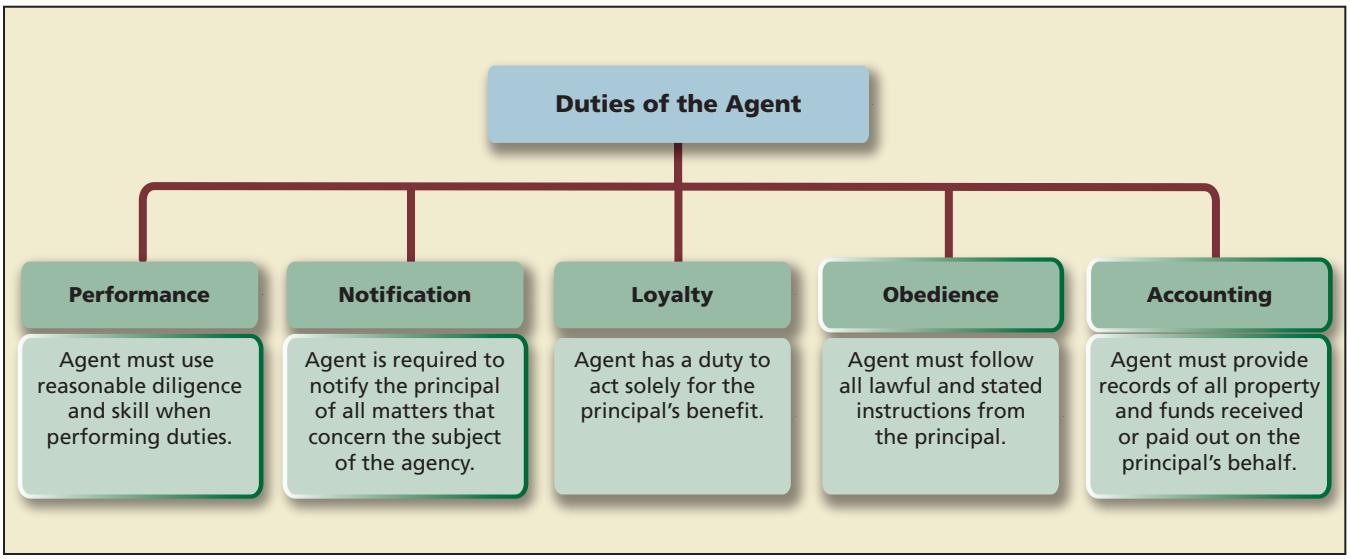
23–2d Agency by Operation of Law

The courts may find an agency relationship in the absence of a formal agreement in other situations as well. This can occur in family relationships, such as when one spouse purchases certain necessaries and charges them to the other spouse's account. The courts will often rule that a spouse is liable for necessaries purchased by the other spouse because of either a social policy or a legal duty to supply necessaries to family members.

Agency by operation of law may also occur in emergency situations. If the agent is unable to contact the principal and failure to act would cause the principal substantial loss, the agent may take steps beyond the scope of agency authority. For instance, a railroad engineer may contract on behalf of the railroad for medical care for an injured motorist hit by the train.

23–3 Duties of Agents and Principals

Focus Question 3
What duties do agents and principals owe to each other?



Once the principal-agent relationship has been created, both parties have duties that govern their conduct. Because an agency relationship is fiduciary (one of trust), each party owes the other the duty to act with the utmost good faith. In general, for every duty of the principal, the agent has a corresponding right, and vice versa.

23–3a Agent's Duties to the Principal

Generally, the agent owes the principal five duties—performance, notification, loyalty, obedience, and accounting (see Exhibit 23–1).

7. Riedel v. Akron General Health System, 2018 -Ohio- 840, 97 N.E.3d 508 (2018).

Performance An implied condition in every agency contract is the agent's agreement to use reasonable diligence and skill in performing the work. When an agent fails to do so, liability for breach of contract may result. The degree of skill or care required of an agent is usually that expected of a reasonable person under similar circumstances. Generally, this is interpreted to mean ordinary care. If an agent has claimed to possess special skill, however, failure to exercise that degree of skill constitutes a breach of the agent's duty.

Not all agency relationships are based on contract. In some situations, an agent acts gratuitously—that is, not for monetary compensation. A gratuitous agent cannot be liable for breach of contract, because there is no contract, but it can be subject to tort liability. Once a gratuitous agent has begun to act in an agency capacity, the agent has the duty to continue to perform in that capacity. In addition, a gratuitous agent must perform in an acceptable manner and is subject to the same standards of care and duty to perform as other agents.

Example 23.6 Bryan's friend Alice is a real estate broker. Alice offers to sell Bryan's vacation home at no charge. If Alice never attempts to sell the home, Bryan has no legal cause of action to force her to do so. If Alice does attempt to sell the home, but then performs so negligently that a sale falls through, Bryan can sue Alice for negligence.

Notification An agent is required to notify the principal of all matters that come to the agent's attention concerning the subject matter of the agency. This is the duty of notification, or the duty to inform. Example 23.7 Lang, an artist, is about to negotiate a contract to sell a series of paintings to Barber's Art Gallery for $25,000. Lang's agent learns that Barber is insolvent and will be unable to pay for the paintings. The agent has a duty to inform Lang of this fact because it is relevant to the subject matter of the agency—the sale of Lang's paintings

Generally, the law assumes that the principal knows of any information acquired by the agent that is relevant to the agency—regardless of whether the agent actually passes on this information to the principal. It is a basic tenet of agency law that notice to the agent is notice to the principal.

Steve Debenport/Getty Images

If a friend who is a licensed real estate broker agrees to sell your house at no charge, can you sue for nonperformance?

Loyalty Loyalty is one of the most fundamental duties in a fiduciary relationship. Basically, the agent has the duty to act solely for the benefit of the principal and not in the interest of the agent or a third party. For instance, an agent cannot represent two principals in the same transaction unless both know of the dual capacity and consent to it.

The duty of loyalty also means that any information or knowledge acquired through the agency relationship is considered confidential. It would be a breach of loyalty to disclose such information either during the agency relationship or after its termination. Typical examples of confidential information are trade secrets and customer lists compiled by the principal.

In short, the agent's loyalty must be undivided. The agent's actions must be strictly for the benefit of the principal and must not result in any secret profit for the agent. Example 23.8 Don contracts with Leo, a real estate agent, to negotiate the purchase of an office building. Leo discovers that the property owner will sell the building only as a package deal with another parcel, so he buys the two properties, intending to resell the building to Don. Leo has breached his fiduciary duty. As a real estate agent, Leo has a duty to communicate all offers to his principal and not to purchase the property secretly and then resell it to his principal. Leo is required to act in Don's best interests and can become the purchaser in this situation only with Don's knowledge and approval.

In the following case, an employer alleged that a former employee had breached his duty of loyalty by planning a competing business while still working for the employer.

Know This

An agent's disclosure of confidential information could constitute the business tort of misappropriation of trade secrets.

Spotlight on Taser International: Case 23.1

Taser International, Inc. v. Ward

Court of Appeals of Arizona, Division 1, 224 Ariz. 389, 231 P.3d 921 (2010).

Facts Taser International, Inc., develops and makes electronic control devices—stun guns—as well as accessories for them, including a personal video and audio recording device called the TASER CAM.

Steve Ward was Taser's vice president of marketing when he began to explore the possibility of developing and marketing devices of his own design, including a clip-on camera. Ward talked to patent attorneys and a product development company and completed most of a business plan.

After he resigned from Taser, Ward formed Vievu, LLC, to market his clip-on camera. Ten months later, Taser announced the AXON, a product that provides an audio-video record of an incident from the visual perspective of the person involved. Taser then filed a suit in an Arizona state court against Ward, alleging that he had breached his duty of loyalty to Taser. The court granted Taser's motion for a summary judgment in the employer's favor. Ward appealed.

Issue Can an employee, while working at a company, research and develop a device to use in competition with the company's products?

Decision No. A state intermediate appellate court agreed with Taser that an employee may not actively compete with his employer before his employment is terminated. But the parties disagreed as to the extent of Ward's pre-termination efforts, creating a genuine issue of material fact that could not be resolved on a motion for summary judgment. The appellate court thus reversed the lower court's decision in Taser's favor and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Reason An agent has a duty to act with good faith and loyalty for the furtherance of the interests of his principal in all matters concerning or affecting the subject of his agency. One aspect of this broad principle is that employees are precluded from actively competing with their employers during the period of employment.

Although an employee may not actively compete prior to termination, the court noted that an employee can take certain actions to prepare for later competition that are not otherwise wrongful. Ward argued that his pre-termination activities did not constitute active competition but were merely lawful preparation for a future business venture. The appellate court concluded that this dispute was one that needed to be resolved by a trial.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Did Ward breach any duties owed to his employer in addition to his alleged breach of the duty of loyalty? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Ward's pre-termination activities focused on a product that was not designed to compete with Taser's products. Would these efforts have breached the duty of loyalty? Why or why not?

Obedience When acting on behalf of a principal, an agent has a duty to follow all lawful and clearly stated instructions of the principal. Any deviation from such instructions is a violation of this duty. During emergency situations, however, when the principal cannot be consulted, the agent may deviate from the instructions without violating this duty. Whenever instructions are not clearly stated, the agent can fulfill the duty of obedience by acting in good faith and in a manner reasonable under the circumstances.

Accounting Unless an agent and a principal agree otherwise, the agent has the duty to keep and make available to the principal an account of all property and funds received and paid out on behalf of the principal. This includes gifts from third parties in connection with the agency. Example 23.9 Marta is a salesperson for Roadway Supplies. Knife River Construction gives Marta a new tablet as a gift for prompt deliveries of Roadway's paving materials. The tablet belongs to Roadway. ■ The agent has a duty to maintain separate accounts for the principal's funds and for the agent's personal funds, and the agent must not intermingle these accounts.

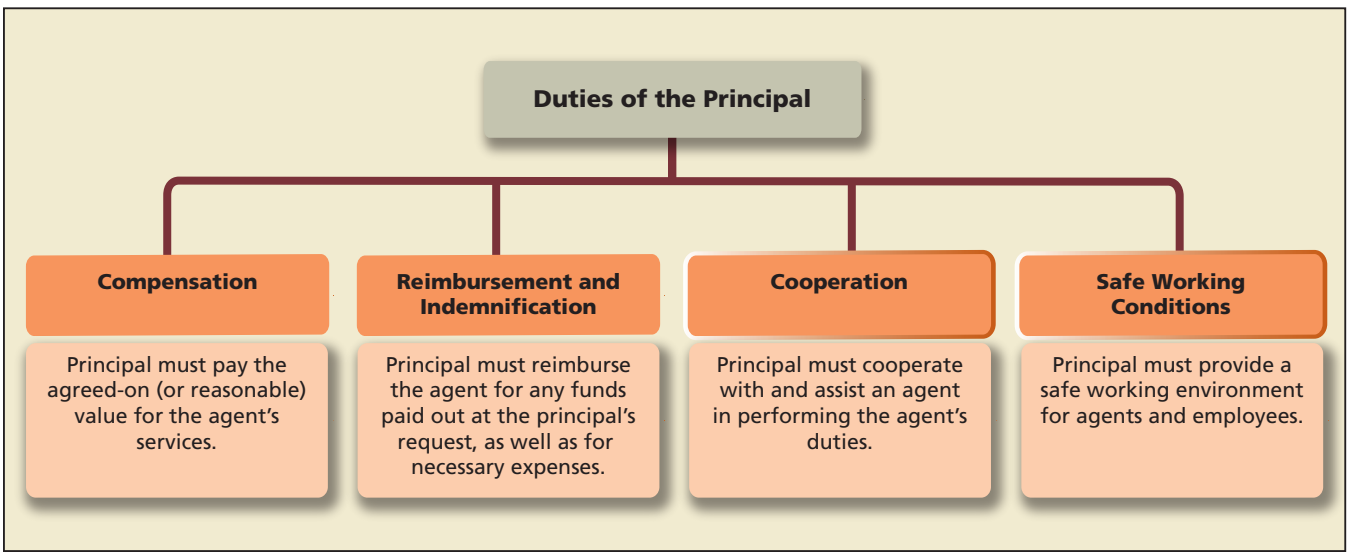
23–3b Principal's Duties to the Agent

The principal also owes certain duties to the agent (as shown in Exhibit 23–2). These duties relate to compensation, reimbursement and indemnification, cooperation, and safe working conditions.

Compensation In general, when a principal requests services from an agent, the agent reasonably expects payment. The principal therefore has a duty to pay the agent for services rendered. For instance, when an accountant or an attorney is asked to act as an agent, an agreement to compensate the agent for service is implied. The principal also has a duty to pay that compensation in a timely manner.

Unless the agency is gratuitous and the agent does not act in exchange for payment, the principal must pay the agreed-on value for the agent's services. If no amount has been expressly agreed on, the principal owes the agent the customary compensation for such services.



Case Example 23.10 Keith Miller worked as a sales representative for Paul M. Wolff Company, a subcontractor specializing in concrete-finishing services. Sales representatives at Wolff were paid a 15 percent commission on projects that met a 35 percent gross profit threshold. The commission was paid after the projects were completed. When Miller resigned, he asked for commissions on fourteen projects for which he had secured contracts but which had not yet been completed. Wolff refused, so Miller sued.

The court found that "an agent is entitled to receive commissions on sales that result from the agent's efforts," even after the employment or agency relationship ends. Miller had met the gross profit threshold on ten of the unfinished projects, and therefore he was entitled to more than $21,000 in commissions.[8]

Reimbursement and Indemnification Whenever an agent disburses funds at the request of the principal, the principal has the duty to reimburse the agent. The principal must also reimburse the agent for any necessary expenses the agent incurs in the reasonable performance of agency duties. Agents cannot recover for expenses incurred through their own misconduct or negligence, however.

Subject to the terms of the agency agreement, the principal has the duty to compensate, or indemnify, an agent for liabilities incurred because of authorized acts and transactions. For instance, if the principal fails to perform a contract formed by the agent with a third party and the third party then sues the agent, the principal must compensate the agent for any costs incurred in defending against the lawsuit.

Additionally, the principal must indemnify the agent for the value of benefits that the agent confers on the principal. The amount of indemnification is usually specified in the agency contract. If it is not, the courts will look to the nature of the benefits and the type of expenses to determine the amount. Note that this rule applies to acts by gratuitous agents as well. Suppose that a person finds a dog that becomes sick, takes the dog to a veterinarian, and pays for the veterinarian's services. The finder is a gratuitous agent and is entitled to be reimbursed by the dog's owner for those costs.

Cooperation A principal has a duty to cooperate with the agent and to assist the agent in performing agency duties. The principal must do nothing to prevent that performance. When a principal grants an agent an exclusive territory, for instance, the principal creates an exclusive agency and cannot compete with the agent or assign or allow another agent to compete. A principal who does so violates the exclusive agency and can be held liable for the agent's lost profits.

Example 23.11 Penny (the principal) creates an exclusive agency by granting Andrew (the agent) an exclusive territory within which Andrew may sell Penny's organic skin care products. If Penny starts to sell the products herself within Andrew's territory—or permits another agent to do so—Penny has failed to cooperate with the agent. Because she has violated the exclusive agency, Penny can be held liable for Andrew's lost net profits. ■

Safe Working Conditions A principal is required to provide safe working premises, equipment, and conditions for all agents and employees. The principal has a duty to inspect the working conditions and to warn agents and employees about any hazards. When the agent is an employee, the employer's liability is frequently covered by state workers' compensation insurance, and federal and state statutes often require the employer to meet certain safety standards.

23–4 Agent's Authority

An agent's authority to act can be either actual (express or implied) or apparent. If an agent contracts outside the scope of the agent's authority, the principal may still become liable by ratifying the contract.

23–4a Express Authority

Express authority is actual authority declared in clear, direct, and definite terms. Express authority can be given orally or in writing.

Equal Dignity Rule A rule requiring that an agent's authority be in writing if the contract to be made on behalf of the principal must be in writing.

Equal Dignity Rule In most states, the equal dignity rule requires that if the contract being executed is or must be in writing, then the agent's authority must also be in writing. Failure to comply with the equal dignity rule can make a contract voidable at the option of the principal. The law regards the contract at that point as a mere offer. If the principal decides to accept the offer, the agent's authority must be ratified, or affirmed, in writing.

Example 23.12 Parker (the principal) orally asks Austin (the agent) to sell a ranch that Parker owns. Austin finds a buyer and signs a sales contract on behalf of Parker to sell the ranch. Because a contract for an interest in realty must be in writing, the equal dignity rule applies here. Thus, the buyer cannot enforce the contract unless Parker subsequently ratifies Austin's agency status in writing. Once Austin's agency status is ratified, either party can enforce rights under the contract.

Modern business practice allows several exceptions to the equal dignity rule. An executive officer of a corporation normally is not required to obtain written authority from the corporation to conduct ordinary business transactions. The equal dignity rule also does not apply when an agent acts in the presence of a principal or when the agent's act of signing is merely a formality. Thus, if the principal negotiates a contract but is called out of town the day it is to be signed and orally authorizes an assistant to act as agent to sign the contract, the oral authorization is normally sufficient.

Power of Attorney Giving an agent a power of attorney confers express authority on the agent.[9] The power of attorney is a written document that is usually notarized. (A document is notarized when a notary public—an individual authorized by the state to attest to the authenticity of signatures—signs and dates the document and imprints it with a seal of authority.) Most states have statutory provisions for creating a power of attorney.

Power of Attorney Authorization for another to act as one's agent or attorney either in specified circumstances (special) or in all situations (general).

Notary Public A public official authorized to attest to the authenticity of signatures.

A power of attorney can be special (permitting the agent to do specified acts only), or it can be general (permitting the agent to transact all business for the principal). Because a general power of attorney grants extensive authority to an agent to act on behalf of the principal in many ways, it should be used with great caution. Ordinarily, a power of attorney terminates on the incapacity or death of the person giving the power.[10]

23–4b Implied Authority

Agents have the implied authority to do what is reasonably necessary to carry out their express authority and accomplish the objectives of the agency. Actual authority can also be implied by custom or inferred from the position the agent occupies.

Example 23.13 Adam is employed by Pete's Supermarket to manage one of its stores. Pete's has not expressly stated that Adam has authority to contract with third persons. Nevertheless, authority to manage a business implies authority to do what is reasonably required (as is customary or can be inferred from a manager's position) to operate the business. It is reasonable to infer that Adam has the authority to form contracts to hire employees, to buy merchandise and equipment, and to advertise the products sold in the store.

Apparent Authority Authority that is only apparent, not real. An agent's apparent authority arises when the principal causes a third party to believe that the agent has authority, even though the agent does not.

Actual authority (express or implied) arises from what the principal manifests to the agent. An agent has apparent authority when the principal, by either words or actions, causes a third party to reasonably believe that an agent has authority to act, even though the agent has no express or implied authority.

Pattern of Conduct Authority usually comes into existence through a principal's pattern of conduct over time. Spotlight Case Example 23.14 Gilbert Church owned Church Farm, Inc., a horse breeding farm in Illinois managed by Herb Bagley. Church Farm's advertisements for the breeding rights to one of its stallions, Imperial Guard, directed

How does a person acquire apparent authority to act as someone's agent?

9. An agent who holds the power of attorney is called an attorney-in-fact for the principal. The holder does not have to be an attorney-at-law (and often is not).
10. A durable power of attorney, however, continues to be effective despite the principal's incapacity. An elderly person, for example, might grant a durable power of attorney to provide for the handling of property and investments or specific health care needs should the elderly person become incompetent.

all inquiries to "Herb Bagley, Manager." Vern and Gail Lundberg contacted Bagley and executed a preprinted contract giving them breeding rights to Imperial Guard "at Imperial Guard's location." Bagley handwrote a statement on the contract that guaranteed the Lundbergs "six live foals in the first two years." He then signed it "Gilbert G. Church by H. Bagley."

The Lundbergs bred four mares, which resulted in one live foal. Church then moved Imperial Guard from Illinois to Oklahoma. The Lundbergs sued Church for breaching the contract by moving the horse. Church claimed that Bagley was not authorized to sign contracts for Church or to change or add terms, but only to present preprinted contracts to potential buyers. The jury found in favor of the Lundbergs and awarded $147,000 in damages. A state appellate court affirmed. Church was bound by Bagley's actions because Church had allowed circumstances to lead the Lundbergs to believe Bagley had the authority. In other words, Bagley had apparent authority to modify and execute the contract on behalf of Church.[11]

Can the manager of a horse-breeding farm make guarantees about foals on the owner's behalf?

Apparent Authority and Estoppel A court can apply the doctrine of agency by estoppel, introduced earlier in the chapter, when a principal has given a third party reason to believe that an agent has authority to act. If the third party honestly relies on the principal's representations to the third party's detriment, the principal may be estopped (prevented) from denying that the agent had apparent authority.

In the following case, a condominium owner argued that the condominium association that managed the units could not enforce bylaws that some of its own board members had violated. The owner argued, in essence, that the board members were agents acting with apparent authority of the association.

Dearborn West Village Condominium Association v. Makki

Court of Appeals of Michigan, 2019 WL 97152 (2019).

Facts Dearborn West Village Condominium Association manages the Dearborn West Village Condominium complex in Dearborn, Michigan. The complex's bylaws permit a condominium owner to lease his or her unit for single-family residential use, but only if the owner is transferred out of the state by an employer for no longer than two years and first provides a lease to the Association for its review.

Mohamed Makki bought five units and, without meeting the conditions of the bylaws, rented all of the units to third parties. The Association filed a complaint in a Michigan state court against Makki to enforce the bylaws and terminate the rentals. The court issued a judgment in favor of the Association.

Makki appealed, asserting that individual board members who had offered to sell him units they were using as rental properties were acting with apparent authority on behalf of the Association. Thereby, he argued, the Association had waived its right to enforce the leasing restrictions in the bylaws.

Issue Was the Association estopped by the actions of individual board members from enforcing the leasing restrictions?

Decision No. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment.

Reason Makki maintained that the actions of individual board members beyond the members' legal authority bound the Association. The appellate court pointed out, however, that "generally, an agent's actions that are outside the scope of the agent's authority do not bind a principal." In other words, estoppel cannot be used to bind a principal in such a situation.

According to the Association's bylaws, its board of directors could not act in ways prohibited by the bylaws, which the board had a duty to enforce. In this case, the board members who leased their units to third parties violated the leasing restrictions in the bylaws and failed to enforce those restrictions. These actions were clearly outside the scope of the authority of the board members and therefore did not bind the Association.

Makki was not in compliance with the leasing restrictions in the Association's bylaws. That one or more of the board members were not in compliance did not obligate the Association to accept or approve Makki's actions in violation of the bylaws.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Normally, modification of the association's bylaws requires the approval of two-thirds of the unit owners. Could Makki have successfully argued that the actions of the board members who violated the bylaws modified them in accord with the freedom to contract? Explain.
- Economic Why might a condominium complex's bylaws impose restrictions on individual owners' leasing of their units? Why might some of those owners opt to violate the restrictions? Discuss.

23–4d Emergency Powers

Sometimes, an unforeseen emergency demands action by the agent to protect or preserve the principal's property or rights, but the agent is unable to communicate with the principal. In that situation, the agent has emergency power. Example 23.15 Rob is an engineer for Pacific Drilling Company. While Rob is acting within the scope of his employment, he is severely injured in an accident on an oil rig many miles from home. Acosta, the rig supervisor, directs Thompson, a physician, to give medical aid to Rob and to charge Pacific for the medical services.

Acosta, an agent, has no express or implied authority to bind the principal, Pacific Drilling, for Thompson's medical services. Because of the emergency situation, however, the law recognizes Acosta as having authority to act appropriately under the circumstances. ■

23–4e Ratification

Ratification occurs when the principal affirms an agent's unauthorized act. When ratification occurs, the principal is bound to the agent's act, and the act is treated as if it had been authorized by the principal from the outset. Ratification can be either express or implied.

If the principal does not ratify the contract, the principal is not bound, and the third party's agreement with the agent is viewed as merely an unaccepted offer. Because the third party's agreement is an unaccepted offer, the third party can revoke the offer at any time, without liability, before the principal ratifies the contract.

The requirements for ratification can be summarized as follows:

1. The agent must have acted on behalf of an identified principal who subsequently ratifies the action.
2. The principal must know of all material facts involved in the transaction. If a principal ratifies a contract without knowing all of the facts, the principal can rescind (cancel) the contract.
3. The principal must affirm the agent's act in its entirety.
4. The principal must have the legal capacity to authorize the transaction at the time the agent engages in the act and at the time the principal ratifies. The third party must also have the legal capacity to engage in the transaction.
5. The principal's affirmation (ratification) must occur before the third party withdraws from the transaction.
6. The principal must observe the same formalities when approving the act done by the agent as would have been required to authorize it initially.

Know This

An agent who exceeds his or her authority and enters into a contract that the principal does not ratify may be liable to the third party on the ground of misrepresentation.

23–5 Liability in Agency Relationships

Frequently, a question arises as to which party, the principal or the agent, should be held liable for contracts formed by the agent or for torts or crimes committed by the agent. We look here at these aspects of agency law.

23–5a Liability for Contracts

Liability for contracts formed by an agent depends on how the principal is classified and on whether the actions of the agent were authorized or unauthorized. Principals are classified as disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed.[12]

Disclosed Principal A principal whose identity is known to a third party at the time the agent makes a contract with the third party.

Partially Disclosed Principal A principal whose identity is unknown by a third party, but the third party knows that the agent is or may be acting for a principal at the time the agent and the third party form a contract.

Undisclosed Principal A principal whose identity is unknown by a third party, and the third party has no knowledge that the agent is acting for a principal at the time the agent and the third party form a contract.

A disclosed principal is a principal whose identity is known by the third party at the time the contract is made by the agent. A partially disclosed principal is a principal whose identity is not known by the third party, but the third party knows that the agent is or may be acting for a principal at the time the contract is made. Example 23.16 Sarah has contracted with a real estate agent to sell certain property. She wishes to keep her identity a secret, but the agent makes it clear to potential buyers of the property that the agent is acting in an agency capacity. In this situation, Sarah is a partially disclosed principal. An undisclosed principal is a principal whose identity is totally unknown by the third party, and the third party has no knowledge that the agent is acting in an agency capacity at the time the contract is made.

Authorized Acts If an agent acts within the scope of authority, normally the principal is obligated to perform the contract regardless of whether the principal was disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed. Whether the agent may also be held liable under the contract, however, depends on the status of the principal.

Disclosed or Partially Disclosed Principal. A disclosed or partially disclosed principal is liable to a third party for a contract made by an agent who is acting within the scope of the agent's authority. (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for illustration.) If the

Liability of Disclosed Principals

To display desserts in restaurants, Mario Sclafani ordered refrigeration units from Felix Storch, Inc. Felix faxed a credit application to Sclafani. The application was faxed back with a signature that appeared to be Sclafani's. Felix delivered the units, but Sclafani did not pay for them. Felix sued Sclafani to collect, but Sclafani denied that he had seen the credit application or signed it. Sclafani claimed that he referred all credit questions to "the woman in the office." Who was liable on the contract?

Analysis: First, you need to identify the agent and the principal. In this situation, with respect to the refrigeration-unit contract with Felix, Sclafani was the principal and "the woman in the office" was his agent. Who is liable for contracts formed by an agent depends on how the principal is classified and on whether the actions of the agent were authorized. If the agent acts within the scope of authority, normally the principal is obligated to perform the contract. If the principal is disclosed—that is, if the principal's identity is known by the third party at the time the contract is made—the agent has no contractual liability for the principal's nonperformance.

Result and Reasoning: Sclafani referred all credit questions to "the woman in the office." Sclafani's referral of credit matters to this woman established that she was his agent. He gave her the authority to enter into legally binding credit contracts on his behalf. Thus, whether Sclafani or "the woman in the office" signed Felix's credit application to guarantee payment, Sclafani is bound to the contract. Sclafani was a disclosed principal—Felix knew his identity at the time the contract was made. Therefore, Sclafani is liable on the contract, and his agent is not.

principal is disclosed, an agent has no contractual liability for the nonperformance of the principal or the third party. If the principal is partially disclosed, in most states the agent is also treated as a party to the contract, and the third party can hold the agent liable for contractual nonperformance.[13] This legal doctrine can also be used to protect the partially disclosed principal against the tortious behavior of a negligent third party.

Case Example 23.17 Tomex, a Danish food corporation, hired Mitsui O.S.K. Lines to deliver 53,000 pounds of frozen pork from Chicago to a supermarket chain in the Dominican Republic. Mitsui contracted with ConGlobal Industries, Inc., to provide a refrigerated shipping container for the pork. ConGlobal employees allegedly set the temperature of the container too high, causing the pork to thaw and destroy its value. Tomex's insurer sued ConGlobal for breach of contract. ConGlobal argued that the case should be dismissed because it never had any direct contact with Tomex and did not know that Mistui was acting as Tomex's agent.

The court rejected this argument, reasoning that ConGlobal had to be aware that Mitsui was acting as an agent for some other party, even if it did not know specifically about Tomex. In other words, it was highly unlikely that Mitsui, a shipping company, owned the pork. Under Illinois law, a contract with a "partially disclosed principal" exists when a "third party knows that the agent is contracting on behalf of a principal but does not know the identity of that principal." Therefore, Tomex (the partially disclosed principal) could properly sue ConGlobal (the third party) to enforce a contract entered into by Mitsui (the agent).[14]

Undisclosed Principal. Sometimes, neither the fact of agency nor the identity of the principal is disclosed, but the agent is acting within the scope of authority. In this situation, the undisclosed principal is bound to perform just as if the principal had been fully disclosed at the time the contract was made.

The agent is also liable as a party to the contract. When a principal's identity is undisclosed and the agent is forced to pay the third party, however, the agent is entitled to be indemnified (compensated) by the principal. The principal, although undisclosed, had a duty to perform, and failure to do so will make the principal ultimately liable.

Once the undisclosed principal's identity is revealed, the third party generally can elect to hold either the principal or the agent liable on the contract. At the same time, the undisclosed principal can require the third party to fulfill the contract, except under any of the following circumstances:

1. The undisclosed principal was expressly excluded as a party in the contract.
2. The contract is a negotiable instrument signed by the agent with no indication of signing in a representative capacity.
3. The performance of the agent is personal to the contract, allowing the third party to refuse the principal's performance.

Unauthorized Acts If an agent has no authority but nevertheless contracts with a third party, the principal cannot be held liable on the contract. It does not matter whether the principal was disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed.

In general, the agent is liable on the contract. Example 23.18 Scranton signs a contract for the purchase of a truck, purportedly acting as an agent under authority granted by Johnson. In fact, Johnson has not given Scranton any such authority. Johnson refuses to pay for the truck, claiming that Scranton had no authority to purchase it. The seller of the truck is entitled to hold Scranton liable for payment.

Know This

An agent who signs a negotiable instrument on behalf of a principal may be personally liable on the instrument. Liability depends, in part, on whether the identity of the principal is disclosed and whether the parties intend the agent to be bound by a signature.

If the principal is disclosed or partially disclosed, the agent is liable to the third party only if the third party relied on the agency status. The agent's liability here is based on the breach of an implied warranty of authority, not on the breach of contract itself.[15] If the third party knows at the time the contract is made that the agent does not have authority—or if the agent expresses to the third party uncertainty as to the extent of the agent's authority—then the agent is not personally liable.

23–5b Liability for Torts and Crimes

Obviously, individuals, including agents, are liable for their own torts and crimes. Whether a principal can also be held liable for an agent's torts and crimes depends on several factors. In some situations, a principal may be held liable for the torts of an agent.

Principal's Tortious Conduct A principal conducting an activity through an agent may be liable for harm resulting from the principal's own negligence or recklessness. Thus, a principal may be liable for giving improper instructions, authorizing the use of improper materials or tools, or establishing improper rules that resulted in the agent's committing a tort.

Example 23.19 Paul knows that Audra is not qualified to drive large trucks. Paul nevertheless tells her to use the company truck to deliver some equipment to a customer. If Audra causes an accident that injures someone, Paul (the principal) will be liable for his own negligence in giving improper instructions to Audra.

Principal's Authorization of Agent's Tortious Conduct A principal who authorizes an agent to commit a tort may be liable to persons or property injured thereby, because the act is considered to be the principal's. Example 23.20 Preston directs his agent, Ames, to cut the corn on specific acreage, which neither of them has the right to do. The harvest is therefore a trespass (a tort), and Preston is liable to the owner of the corn.

Note also that an agent acting at the principal's direction can be liable as a tortfeasor (one who commits a tort), along with the principal, for committing the tortious act even if the agent was unaware of the wrongfulness of the act. Assume in Example 23.20 that Ames, the agent, was unaware that Preston had no right to harvest the corn. Ames can nevertheless be held liable to the owner of the field for damages, along with Preston.

TDKvisuals/Shutterstock.com

A principal instructs an agent to harvest corn on land that the principal does not own. Is the agent liable to the legal owner of the land?

Liability for Agent's Misrepresentation A principal is exposed to tort liability whenever a third person sustains a loss due to the agent's misrepresentation. The principal's liability depends on whether the agent was actually or apparently authorized to make representations and whether the representations were made within the scope of the agency. The principal is always directly responsible for an agent's misrepresentation made within the scope of the agent's authority.

Example 23.21 Arnett is a demonstrator for Moore's products. Moore sends Arnett to a home show to demonstrate the products and to answer questions from consumers. Moore has given Arnett authority to make statements about the products. If Arnett makes only true representations, all is fine, but if she makes false claims, Moore will be liable for any injuries or damages sustained by third parties in reliance on Arnett's false representations.

15. The agent is not liable on the contract because the agent was never intended personally to be a party to the contract.

Liability for Agent's Negligence A principal may also be liable for harm an agent caused to a third party under the doctrine of respondeat superior,[16] a Latin term meaning "let the master respond." This doctrine, which is discussed in this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature, is similar to the theory of strict liability. It imposes vicarious liability, or indirect liability, on the employer—that is, liability without regard to the personal fault of the employer—for torts committed by an employee in the course or scope of employment.

When an agent commits a negligent act, both the agent and the principal are liable. Example 23.22 BDI Communications hires Pinnacle to provide landscaping services for its property. An herbicide sprayed by Pinnacle employee Hoggatt enters BDI's building through the air-conditioning system and causes Catherine, a BDI employee, to suffer a heart attack. If Catherine sues, both Pinnacle (principal) and Hoggatt (agent) can be held liable for negligence. As Pinnacle's agent, Hoggatt is not excused from responsibility for tortious conduct just because he is working for a principal.

Determining the Scope of Employment. The key to determining whether a principal may be liable for an agent's torts under the doctrine of respondeat superior is whether the torts are committed within the scope of employment. In determining whether a particular act

When is a principal liable for an agent's negligence?

Respondeat Superior A doctrine under which a principal or an employer is held liable for the wrongful acts committed by agents or employees while acting within the course and scope of agency or employment.

Vicarious Liability Indirect liability imposed on a supervisory party (such as an employer) for the actions of a subordinate (such as an employee) because of the relationship between the two parties.

16. Pronounced ree-spahn-dee-uht soo-peer-ee-uhr.

The Doctrine of Respondeat Superior

The idea that a master (employer) must respond to third persons for losses negligently caused by the master's servant (employee) first appeared in Lord Holt's opinion in Jones v. Hart (1698).[a] By the early nineteenth century, this maxim had been adopted by most courts and was referred to as the doctrine of respondeat superior.

Theories of Liability The vicarious (indirect) liability of the master for the acts of the servant has been supported primarily by two theories. The first theory rests on the issue of control, or fault—the master has control over the acts of the servant and is thus responsible for injuries arising out of such service. The second theory is economic in nature—the master receives the benefits or profits of the servant's service and therefore should also suffer the losses. Moreover, the master is better able than the servant to absorb such losses.

a. K.B. 642, 90 Eng.Rep. 1255 (1698).

The control theory is clearly recognized in the Restatement (Third) of Agency, which defines a master as "a principal who employs an agent to perform service in his [or her] affairs and who controls, or has the right to control, the physical conduct of the other in the performance of the service." Accordingly, a servant is defined as "an agent employed by a master to perform service in his [or her] affairs whose physical conduct in his [or her] performance of the service is controlled, or is subject to control, by the master."

Limitations on the Employer's Liability There are limitations on the master's liability for the acts of the servant. As discussed in the text, an employer (master) is responsible only for the wrongful conduct of an employee (servant) that occurs in "the scope of employment." Generally, the act must be of a kind that the servant was employed to do, it must have occurred within "authorized time and space limits," and it must have been "activated, at least in part, by a purpose to serve the master."

Application to Today's World The courts have accepted the doctrine of respondeat superior for some two centuries. This theory of vicarious liability has practical implications in all situations in which a principal-agent (master-servant, employer-employee) relationship exists. Today, the small-town grocer with one clerk and the multinational corporation with thousands of employees are equally subject to the doctrine.

occurred within the course and scope of employment, the courts consider the following factors:

1. Whether the employee's act was authorized by the employer.
2. The time, place, and purpose of the act.
3. Whether the act was one commonly performed by employees on behalf of their employers.
4. The extent to which the employer's interest was advanced by the act.
5. The extent to which the private interests of the employee were involved.
6. Whether the employer furnished the means or instrumentality (for instance, a truck or a machine) by which the injury was inflicted.
7. Whether the employer had reason to know that the employee would do the act in question and whether the employee had ever done it before.
8. Whether the act involved the commission of a serious crime.

The Distinction between a "Detour" and a "Frolic." A useful insight into the "scope of employment" concept may be gained from the judge's classic distinction between a "detour" and a "frolic" in the case of Joel v. Morison.[17] In this case, the English court held that if a servant merely took a detour from his master's business, the master is responsible. If, however, the servant was on a "frolic of his own" and not in any way "on his master's business," the master is not liable.

Example 23.23 While driving his employer's vehicle to call on a customer, Mandel decides to stop at a store—which is one block off his route—to take care of a personal matter. Mandel then negligently runs into a parked vehicle owned by Chan. In this situation, because Mandel's detour from the employer's business is not substantial, he is still acting within the scope of employment, and the employer is liable.

But suppose instead that Mandel decides to pick up a few friends for cocktails in another city and in the process negligently runs into Chan's vehicle. In this situation, the departure from the employer's business is substantial—Mandel is on a "frolic" of his own. Thus, the employer normally is not liable to Chan for damages.

When can an employer be held liable for an employee's negligence while driving?

Employee Travel Time. The time an employee spends going to and from work or to and from meals is usually considered outside the scope of employment. If travel is part of a person's position, however, as it is for a traveling salesperson or a regional representative of a company, then travel time is normally considered within the scope of employment. Thus, for such an employee, the duration of the business trip, including the return trip home, is within the scope of employment unless there is a significant departure from the employer's business.

What factors determine the liability of an employer for a worker's negligence while driving? This question was at the center of the dispute in the following case.

Simon v. Farm Bureau Insurance Co.

Court of Appeals of Louisiana, Third Circuit, __ So.3d __, 2020 WL 1041228 (2020).

Facts Jeff Doughty worked for Beta Land Services, Inc. Doughty received two weeks of mandatory training, after which Beta gave him a computer and required him to be at work between 8 A.M. and 5 P.M. every day. His pay was set at a daily rate for ongoing service. Under his employment contract, Beta retained the right to control his schedule and work, and could cancel the contract at any time without liability for breach.

Doughty was bringing supplies from a Beta field office in Lutcher, Louisiana, to the company's main office in Lafayette when his vehicle rear-ended a vehicle driven by Brock Simon. Simon filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Doughty; his insurer, Farm Bureau Insurance Co.; and Beta. Simon alleged that at the time of the accident Doughty was Beta's agent, on a mission for the company, rendering Beta vicariously liable for its agent's negligence. Beta argued that Doughty was an independent contractor and that he had not been on a company mission—he had been commuting to the Lafayette office.

The court found that Doughty was an independent contractor and granted Beta's motion for a judgment in its favor. Simon appealed.

Issue Was Beta vicariously liable for Doughty's negligence?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the trial court's judgment in Beta's favor. The appellate court issued a judgment in Simon's favor, holding Beta liable for Doughty's actions at the time of the accident.

Reason The appellate court concluded that Doughty was not an independent contractor. The principal factor determining the status of an employment relationship is control over the work. Control by the employer indicates an employer-employee relationship. Here, Beta retained the right to control Doughty's work. This control was evidenced by his required schedule and payment arrangement, and was expressed in the parties' employment contract by the stipulation that Beta could cancel it at any time without liability.

At the time of the accident, Doughty was not acting as an independent contractor but was on a "mission" for Beta. The employer had asked him to go to the company's field office in Lutcher before going to the main office in Lafayette. Doughty's direct performance of a duty imposed by his employer brought his actions within the scope of employment.

In response to the assertion that Doughty was not on a mission for Beta, but on a commute, the court stated, "Doughty was not on his way to work. He was already at work, leaving Beta's field office and returning to its main office to deposit the extra supplies."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment If the appellate court had upheld the trial court's finding that Doughty was an independent contractor, would he have been liable to Simon? Explain.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the accident in this case had happened during Doughty's drive home after he had dropped off the supplies. Would the result have been different? Discuss.

Notice of Dangerous Conditions. The employer is charged with knowledge of any dangerous conditions discovered by an employee and pertinent to the employment situation. Example 23.24 Brad, a maintenance employee in Martin's apartment building, notices a lead pipe protruding from the ground in the building's courtyard. Brad neglects either to fix the pipe or to inform Martin of the danger. John trips on the pipe and is injured. The employer is charged with knowledge of the dangerous condition regardless of whether or not Brad actually informed him. That knowledge is imputed to Martin by virtue of the employment relationship.

Liability for Agent's Intentional Torts Most intentional torts that employees commit have no relation to their employment. Thus, their employers will not be held liable. Nevertheless, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the employer can be liable for an employee's intentional torts that are committed within the course and scope of employment, just as the

An agent-employee going to or from work or meals usually is not considered to be within the scope of employment. An agent-employee whose job requires travel, however, is considered to be within the scope of employment for the entire trip, including the return.

employer is liable for negligence. For instance, a department store owner is liable when a security guard who is a store employee commits the tort of false imprisonment while acting within the scope of employment. Similarly, a nightclub owner is liable when a "bouncer" commits the tort of assault and battery while on the job.

In addition, an employer who knows or should know that an employee has a propensity for committing tortious acts is liable for the employee's acts even if they ordinarily would not be considered within the scope of employment. For instance, if the employer hires a bouncer knowing that he has a history of arrests for assault and battery, the employer may be liable if the employee viciously attacks a patron in the parking lot after hours.

An employer may also be liable for permitting an employee to engage in reckless actions that can injure others. Example 23.25 The owner of Bates Trucking observes an employee smoking while filling containerized trucks with highly flammable liquids. Failure to stop the employee will cause the owner to be liable for any injuries that result if a truck explodes.

Liability for Independent Contractor's Torts Generally, an employer is not liable for physical harm caused to a third person by the negligent act of an independent contractor in the performance of the contract. This is because the employer does not have the right to control the details of an independent contractor's performance.

Courts make an exception to this rule when the contract involves unusually hazardous activities, such as blasting operations, the transportation of highly volatile chemicals, or the use of poisonous gases. In such situations, strict liability is imposed, and an employer cannot be shielded from liability merely by using an independent contractor.

Liability for Agent's Crimes Agents are liable for their own crimes. A principal or employer is not liable for an agent's crime even if the crime was committed within the scope of authority or employment, unless the principal participated by conspiracy or other action. In some jurisdictions, under specific statutes, a principal may be liable for an agent's violation in the course and scope of employment. For instance, a principal might be liable when an agent, during work, violates criminal regulations governing sanitation, prices, weights, or the sale of liquor.

23–6 Termination of an Agency

Agency law is similar to contract law in that both an agency and a contract can be terminated by an act of the parties or by operation of law. Once the relationship between the principal and the agent has ended, the agent no longer has the right (actual authority) to bind the principal. For an agent's apparent authority to be terminated, third persons may also need to be notified that the agency has been terminated.

Focus Question 6

What are some of the ways in which an agency relationship can be terminated?

23–6a Termination by Act of the Parties

An agency may be terminated by certain acts of the parties. Bases for termination by acts of the parties include lapse of time, achievement of the purpose of the agency, occurrence of a specific event, mutual agreement, and at the option of one party (see Exhibit 23–3).

When an agency agreement specifies the time period during which the agency relationship will exist, the agency ends when that time period expires. If no definite time is stated, then the agency continues for a reasonable time and can be terminated at will by either party. What constitutes a reasonable time depends on the circumstances and the nature of the agency relationship.

The parties can, of course, mutually agree to end their agency relationship. In addition, as a general rule, either party can terminate the agency relationship without the agreement of the other. The act of termination is called revocation if done by the principal and renunciation if done by the agent. Note, however, that the terminating party may face liability if the termination is wrongful.

Exhibit 23–3 Termination by Act of Parties

METHOD	RULES	ILLUSTRATION
1. Lapse of time	Agency terminates automatically at the end of the stated time.	Page lists her property for sale with Alex, a real estate agent, for six months. The agency ends in six months.
2. Purpose achieved	Agency terminates automatically on the completion of the purpose for which it was formed.	Calvin, a cattle rancher, hires Abe as his agent in the purchase of fifty head of breeding stock. The agency ends when the cattle have been purchased.
3. Occurrence of a specific event	Agency normally terminates automatically on the event's occurrence.	Meredith appoints Allen to handle her business affairs while she is away. The agency terminates when Meredith returns.
4. Mutual agreement	Agency terminates when both parties consent to end the agency relationship.	Linda and Greg agree that Greg will no longer be her agent in procuring business equipment.
5. At the option of one party (revocation, if by principal; renunciation, if by agent)	Either party normally has a right to terminate the agency relationship. Wrongful termination can lead to liability for breach of contract.	When Patrick becomes ill, he informs Alice that he is revoking her authority to be his agent.

Wrongful Termination Although both parties have the power to terminate an agency relationship, they may not always possess the right to do so. Wrongful termination can subject the canceling party to a suit for breach of contract. Case Example 23.26 Smart Trike, Ltd., a Singapore manufacturing company based in Israel, contracted with a New Jersey firm, Piermont Products, LLC, to distribute its products in the United States and Canada. The parties' contract required six months' notice of termination, during which time Smart Trike was to continue paying commissions to Piermont for products that were sold. When Smart Trike terminated the agreement without providing the required notice, Piermont sued for breach of contract. The court held in favor of Piermont. Under the terms of the agreement, Piermont was entitled to receive commissions for products of Smart Trike that it had sold during the six months after the notice of termination.[18]

Agency Coupled with an Interest A special rule applies to an agency coupled with an interest, in which the agent has some legal right (an interest) in the property that is the subject of the agency. Because the agent has an additional interest in the property beyond the normal commission for selling it, the agent's position cannot be terminated until the agent's interest ends.

Agency Coupled with an Interest An agency, created for the benefit of the agent, in which the agent has some legal right (interest) in the property that is the subject of the agency

An agency coupled with an interest is not an agency in the usual sense because it is created for the agent's benefit instead of for the principal's benefit. Example 23.27 Sylvia owns Harper Hills. She needs some cash right away, so she enters into an agreement with Shaquille under which Shaquille will lend her $10,000. In return, she will grant Shaquille a one-half interest in Harper Hills and "the exclusive right to sell" it. The loan is to be repaid out of the sale's proceeds. Shaquille is Sylvia's agent, and their relationship is an agency coupled with an interest. The agency was created when the loan agreement was made for the purpose of securing the loan. Therefore, Shaquille's agency power is irrevocable.

An agency coupled with an interest should not be confused with a situation in which the agent merely derives proceeds or profits from the sale of the subject matter. Many agents are paid a commission for their services, but the agency relationship involved does not constitute an agency coupled with an interest. For instance, a real estate agent who merely receives a commission from the sale of real property does not have a beneficial interest in the property itself.

Notice of Termination No particular form is required for notice of agency termination to be effective. If the agent's authority is written, however, it normally must be revoked in writing. The principal can personally notify the agent, or the agent can learn of the termination through some other means.

When an agency is terminated by act of the parties, it is the principal's duty to inform any third parties who know of the existence of the agency that it has been terminated. If the principal knows that a third party has dealt with the agent, the principal is expected to notify that person directly.

Although an agent's actual authority ends when the agency is terminated, an agent's apparent authority continues until the third party receives notice (from any source) that such authority has been terminated. Example 23.28 Manning bids on a shipment of steel, and Stone is hired as an agent to arrange transportation of the shipment. When Stone learns that Manning has lost the bid, Stone's authority to make the transportation arrangement terminates.

23–6b Termination by Operation of Law

Termination of an agency by operation of law occurs in the circumstances discussed here. Note that when an agency terminates by operation of law, there is no duty to notify third persons.

1. Death or insanity. The general rule is that the death or mental incompetence of either the principal or the agent automatically and immediately terminates an ordinary agency relationship. Knowledge of the death is not required. Example 23.29 Gary sends Tyron to China to purchase a rare painting. Before Tyron makes the purchase, Gary dies. Tyron's agent status is terminated at the moment of Gary's death, even if Tyron does not know that Gary has died. (Some states have enacted statutes that change this common law rule to require an agent's knowledge of the principal's death before termination.)
2. Impossibility. When the specific subject matter of an agency is destroyed or lost, the agency terminates. Example 23.30 Blake employs Pedro to sell Blake's house, but before any sale takes place, the house is destroyed by fire. In this situation, Pedro's agency and authority to sell Blake's house terminate. Similarly, when it is impossible for the agent to perform the agency lawfully because of a change in the law, the agency terminates.
3. Changed circumstances. When an event occurs that has such an unusual effect on the subject matter of the agency that the agent can reasonably infer that the principal will not want the agency to continue, the agency terminates. Example 23.31 Robert hires Miles to sell a tract of land for $40,000. Subsequently, Miles learns that there is oil under the land and that the land is worth $1 million. The agency and Miles's authority to sell the land for $40,000 are terminated.
4. Bankruptcy. If either the principal or the agent petitions for bankruptcy, the agency is usually terminated. In certain circumstances, as when the agent's financial status is irrelevant to the purpose of the agency, the agency relationship may continue. Insolvency (the inability to pay debts when they become due or when liabilities exceed assets), as distinguished from bankruptcy, does not necessarily terminate the relationship.
5. War. When the principal's country and the agent's country are at war with each other, the agency is terminated. In this situation, the agency is automatically suspended or terminated because there is no way to enforce the legal rights and obligations of the parties.

Practice and Review

Lynne Meyer, on her way to a business meeting and in a hurry, stopped by a Buy-Mart store for a new car charger for her smartphone. There was a long line at one of the checkout counters, but a cashier, Valerie Watts, opened another counter and began loading the cash drawer. Meyer told Watts that she was in a hurry and asked Watts to work faster. Watts, however, only slowed her pace. At this point, Meyer hit Watts.

It is not clear whether Meyer hit Watts intentionally or, in an attempt to retrieve the car charger, hit her inadvertently. In response, Watts grabbed Meyer by the hair and hit her repeatedly in the back of the head, while Meyer screamed for help. Management personnel separated the two women and questioned them about the incident. Watts was immediately fired for violating the store's no-fighting policy. Meyer subsequently sued Buy-Mart, alleging that the store was liable for the tort (assault and battery) committed by its employee. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under what doctrine discussed in this chapter might Buy-Mart be held liable for the tort committed by Watts?
2. What is the key factor in determining whether Buy-Mart is liable under this doctrine?
3. Did Watts's behavior constitute an intentional tort or a tort of negligence? How would this difference affect Buy-Mart's potential liability?
4. Suppose that when Watts applied for the job at Buy-Mart, she disclosed in her application that she had previously been convicted of felony assault and battery. Nevertheless, Buy-Mart hired Watts as a cashier. How might this fact affect Buy-Mart's liability for Watts's actions?

Chapter Summary: Agency Relationships in Business

Agency Law

In a principal-agent relationship, an agent acts on behalf of and instead of the principal in dealing with third parties.

1. Employer-employee relationships—An employee who deals with third parties is normally an agent of the employer.
2. Employer–independent contractor relationships—An independent contractor is not an employee because the employer has no control over the details of the independent contractor's physical performance. An independent contractor may or may not be an agent.

	3. Determining employee status—The criteria used by courts includes the following: a. How much control can the employer exercise over the details of the work? b. Is the worker engaged in an occupation or business distinct from that of the employer? c. Is the work usually done under the employer's direction or by a specialist without supervision? d. Does the employer supply the tools at the place of work? e. For how long is the person employed? f. What is the method of payment—by time period or at the completion of the job? g. What degree of skill is required of the worker?
Formation of an Agency	Agency relationships may be formed by the following methods: 1. Agreement—The agency relationship is formed through express consent (oral or written) or implied by conduct. 2. Ratification—The principal either by act or by agreement ratifies the conduct of a person who is not in fact an agent. 3. Estoppel—The principal causes a third person to believe that another person is the principal's agent, and the third person deals with the supposed agent in the reasonable belief that an agency exists. 4. Operation of law—The agency relationship is based on social policy (as in family relationships) or formed in an emergency situation when the agent is unable to contact the principal and failure to act outside the scope of the agent's authority would cause the principal substantial loss.
Duties of Agents and Principals	1. Duties of the agent— a. Performance—In performing agency duties, the agent must use reasonable diligence and skill or use the special skills that the agent has claimed to possess. b. Notification—The agent is required to notify the principal of all matters that come to the agent's attention concerning the subject matter of the agency. c. Loyalty—The agent has a duty to act solely for the benefit of the principal and not in the interest of the agent or a third party. d. Obedience—The agent must follow all lawful and clearly stated instructions of the principal. e. Accounting—The agent has a duty to make available to the principal records of all property and funds received and paid out on behalf of the principal. 2. Duties of the principal— a. Compensation—Except in a gratuitous agency relationship, the principal must pay the agreed-on value (or reasonable value) for the agent's services. b. Reimbursement and indemnification—The principal must reimburse the agent for all funds disbursed at the request of the principal, as well as for funds disbursed for necessary expenses in the reasonable performance of agency duties. c. Cooperation—A principal must cooperate with and assist an agent in performing agency duties. d. Safe working conditions—A principal must provide safe working conditions for agents and employees.
Agent's Authority	1. Express authority—Can be given orally or in writing. Authorization must be in writing if the agent is to execute a contract that must be in writing. 2. Implied authority—Authority deemed necessary for the agent to carry out expressly authorized tasks or tasks customarily associated with the agent's position. 3. Apparent authority—Exists when the principal, by word or action, causes a third party to reasonably believe that an agent has authority to act, even though the agent has no express or implied authority. 4. Ratification—The affirmation by the principal of an agent's unauthorized action or promise. For the ratification to be effective, the principal must be aware of all material facts.

Liability in Agency Relationships	1. Liability for contracts—If the principal's identity is disclosed or partially disclosed at the time the agent forms a contract with a third party, the principal is liable to the third party under the contract if the agent acted with proper authority. If the principal's identity is undisclosed at the time of contract formation, the agent is personally liable to the third party, but if the agent acted with proper authority, the principal is also bound by the contract. 2. Liability for torts and crimes— a. A principal conducting an activity through an agent may be liable for harm resulting from the principal's own negligence or recklessness. b. Under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the principal is liable for any harm caused to another through the agent's torts if the agent was acting within the scope of employment at the time the harmful act occurred. c. Liability for agent's intentional torts—Usually, employers are not liable for the intentional torts that their agents commit, unless the acts are committed within the scope of employment, the employer knows or should know that the employee has a propensity for committing tortious acts, or the employer allowed the employee to engage in reckless acts that caused injury to another. d. Liability for independent contractor's torts—A principal is not liable for harm caused by an independent contractor's negligence, unless unusually hazardous activities are involved. e. Liability for agent's crimes—Agents are responsible for their own crimes, even if the crimes were committed while the agents were acting within the scope of authority or employment. A principal will be liable for an agent's crime only if the principal participated by conspiracy or other action or (in some jurisdictions) if the agent violated certain government regulations in the course of employment.
Termination of an Agency	1. By act of the parties (see Exhibit 23–3) a. Lapse of time. b. Purpose achieved. c. Occurrence of a specific event. d. Mutual agreement. e. At the option of one party. Notice to third parties is required when an agency is terminated by act of the parties. 2. By operation of law— a. Death or insanity. b. Impossibility. c. Changed circumstances. d. Bankruptcy. e. War.

1. Dimka Corporation wants to build a new mall on a specific tract of land. Dimka contracts with Nadine to act as its agent in buying the property. When Nadine learns of the difference between the price that Dimka is willing to pay and the price at which the owner is willing to sell, she wants to buy the land and sell it to Dimka herself. Can she do this? Discuss. (See Duties of Agents and Principals.)
2. Davis contracts with Estee to buy a certain horse on her behalf. Estee asks Davis not to reveal her identity. Davis makes a deal with Farmland Stables, the owner of the horse, and makes a down payment. Estee does not pay the rest of the price. Farmland Stables sues Davis for breach of contract. Can Davis hold Estee liable for whatever damages he has to pay? Why or why not? (See Liability in Agency Relationships.)

23–1. Ratification by Principal. Springer, who was running for Congress, instructed his campaign staff not to purchase any campaign materials without his explicit authorization. In spite of these instructions, one of his campaign workers contracted with Dubychek Printing Co. to print some promotional materials for Springer's campaign. When the printed materials arrived, Springer did not return them but instead used them during his campaign.

When Springer failed to pay for the materials, Dubychek sued for recovery of the price. Springer contended that he was not liable on the sales contract because he had not authorized his agent to purchase the printing services. Dubychek argued that the campaign worker was Springer's agent and that the worker had authority to make the printing contract. Additionally, Dubychek claimed that even if the purchase was unauthorized, Springer's use of the materials constituted ratification of his agent's unauthorized purchase. Is Dubychek correct? Explain. (See Formation of an Agency.)

23–2. Employee versus Independent Contractor. Stephen Hemmerling was a driver for the Happy Cab Co. Hemmerling paid certain fixed expenses and abided by a variety of rules relating to the use of the cab, the hours that could be worked, and the solicitation of fares, among other things. Rates were set by the state. Happy Cab did not withhold taxes from Hemmerling's pay. While driving the cab, Hemmerling was injured in an accident and filed a claim against Happy Cab in a Nebraska state court for workers' compensation benefits. Such benefits are not available to independent contractors. On what basis might the court hold that Hemmerling is an employee? Explain. (See Agency Law.)

23–3. Liability for Contracts. Thomas Huskin and his wife entered into a contract to have their home remodeled by House Medic Handyman Service. Todd Hall signed the contract as an authorized representative of House Medic. It turned out that House Medic was a fictitious name for Hall Hauling, Ltd. The contract did not indicate this, however, and Hall did not inform the Huskins about Hall Hauling. When a contract dispute later arose, the Huskins sued Todd Hall personally for breach of contract. Can Hall be held personally liable? Why or why not? [Huskin v. Hall, 2012 -Ohio- 653 (Ohio Ct.App. 2012)] (See Liability in Agency Relationships.)

23–4. Agent's Authority. Basic Research, LLC, advertised its products on television networks owned by Rainbow Media Holdings, Inc., through an ad agency, Icebox Advertising, Inc. As Basic's agent, Icebox had the express authority to buy ads from Rainbow on Basic's behalf, but the authority was limited to buying ads with cash in advance. Despite this limit, Rainbow sold ads to Basic through Icebox on credit. Basic paid Icebox for the ads, but Icebox did not pass all of the payments on to Rainbow. Icebox filed for bankruptcy. Can Rainbow recoup the unpaid amounts from Basic? Explain. [American Movie Classics v. Rainbow Media Holdings, 508 Fed.Appx. 826 (10th Cir. 2013)] (See Agent's Authority.)

23–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Determining Employee Status. Nelson Ovalles worked as a cable installer for Cox Rhode Island Telecom, LLC, under an agreement with a third party, M&M Communications, Inc. The agreement stated that no employer-employee relationship existed between Cox and M&M's technicians, including Ovalles. Ovalles was required to designate his affiliation with Cox on his work van, clothing, and identification badge, but Cox had minimal contact with him and limited power to control the manner in which he performed his duties. Cox supplied cable wire and similar items, but the equipment was delivered to M&M, not to Ovalles. On a workday, while Ovalles was fulfilling a work order, his van rear-ended a car driven by Barbara Cayer. Is Cox liable to Cayer? Explain. [Cayer v. Cox Rhode Island Telecom, LLC, 85 A.3d 1140 (R.I. 2014)] (See Agency Law.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 23–5, go to Appendix E.

23–6. Agent's Authority. Terry Holden's stepmother, Rosie, was diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS), and Terry's wife, Susan, became Rosie's primary caregiver. Rosie executed a durable power of attorney appointing Susan as her agent. Susan opened a joint bank account with Rosie at Bank of America, depositing $9,643.62 of Rosie's funds. Susan used some of the money to pay for "household expenses to keep us going while we were taking care of her." Rosie died three months later. Terry's father, Charles, as executor of Rosie's estate, filed a petition in a Texas state court against Susan for an accounting. What general duty did Susan owe Rosie as her agent? What does an agent's duty of accounting require? Did Susan breach either of these duties? Explain. [Holden v. Holden, 456 S.W.3d 642 (Tex.App.—Tyler 2015)] (See Agent's Authority.)

23–7. Agency Relationships. Standard Oil of Connecticut, Inc., sells home heating, cooling, and security systems. Standard schedules installation and service appointments with its customers and then contracts with installers and technicians to do the work. The company requires an installer or technician to complete a project by a certain time but to otherwise "exercise independent judgment and control in the execution of any work." The installers and technicians are licensed and certified by the state. Standard does not train them, provide instruction manuals, supervise them at customers' homes, or inspect their work. The installers and technicians use their own equipment and tools, and they can choose which days they work. Standard pays a set rate per project. According to criteria used by the courts, are these installers and technicians independent contractors or employees? Why? [Standard Oil of Connecticut, Inc. v. Administrator, Unemployment Compensation Act, 320 Conn. 611, 134 A.3d 581 (2016)] (See Agency Law.)

23–8. Scope of Agent's Authority. Kindred Nursing Centers East, LLC, owns and operates Whitesburg Gardens, a long-term care and rehabilitation facility in Huntsville, Alabama. Lorene Jones was admitted to the facility following knee-replacement surgery. Jones's daughter, Yvonne Barbour, signed the admission forms required by Whitesburg Gardens as her mother's representative in her presence. Jones did not object. The forms included an "Alternative Dispute Resolution Agreement," which provided for binding arbitration in the event of a dispute between "the Resident" (Jones) and "the Facility" (Whitesburg Gardens). Six days later, Jones was transferred to a different facility. After recovering from the surgery, she filed a suit in an Alabama state court against Kindred, alleging substandard care on a claim of negligence. Can Jones be compelled to submit her claim to arbitration? Explain. [Kindred Nursing Centers East, LLC v. Jones, 201 So.3d 1146 (Ala. 2016)] (See Agent's Authority.)

23–9. Agency Relationships. Jane Westmas was killed when a tree branch cut by Creekside Tree Service, Inc., fell on her while she was walking on a public path through the private property of Conference Point Center on the shore of Lake Geneva in Wisconsin. Conference Point had contracted with Creekside to trim and remove trees from its property, but the owner had no control of (and no right to control) the details of Creekside's work. Jane's husband, John, and her son, Jason, filed a suit in a Wisconsin state court against Creekside, alleging that the service's negligence caused her death. Creekside contended it was immune from the suit under a state statute that provides "no . . . agent of an owner is liable for the death of . . . a person engaging in a recreational activity on the owner's property." Could Creekside be held liable for Jane's death? Why or why not? [Westmas v. Creekside Tree Service, Inc., 2018 WI 12, 379 Wis.2d 471, 907 N.W.2d 68 (2018)] (See Agency Law.)

23–10. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Agent's Authority. Devin Fink was the manager of Precision Tune Auto Care in Charlotte, North Carolina. Randall Stywall brought her car to the shop to replace the rear shocks. Fink filled out the service order with an estimate of the cost. Later, Stywall returned to pick up her car, and Fink collected payment for the work. When Stywall started to drive away, however, the car bounced as if the shocks had not been replaced. A complaint to Precision's corporate office resulted in the discovery that in fact the work had not been done and Fink had kept the payment. He was charged with larceny against his employer. He argued that he had not committed this crime because the victim was Stywall, not Precision. [State of North Carolina v. Fink, 798 S.E.2d 537 (N.C.App. 2017)] (See Agent's Authority.)

1. Which agency principles support the charge against Fink? Explain.
2. Using the IDDR approach, determine whether Fink had an ethical duty to offer a defense to the crime with which he was charged. What does Fink's stated defense suggest about his ethics?

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

23–11. Critical Legal Thinking. What policy is served by the law that employers do not own the copyrights for works created by independent contractors (unless there is a written "work for hire" agreement)? (See Agency Law.)

23–12. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Liability for Independent Contractor's Torts. Dean Brothers Corp. owns and operates a steel-drum manufacturing plant. Lowell Wyden, the plant superintendent, hired Best Security Patrol, Inc. (BSP), a security company, to guard the property and "deter thieves and vandals." Some BSP security guards, as Wyden knew, carried firearms. Pete Sidell, a BSP security guard, was not certified as an armed guard but nevertheless took his gun to work. While working at the Dean plant on October 31, Sidell fired his gun at Tyrone Gaines, in the belief that Gaines was an intruder. The bullet struck and killed Gaines. Gaines's mother filed a lawsuit claiming that her son's death was the result of BSP's negligence, for which Dean was responsible. (See Liability in Agency Relationships.)

1. The first group will determine what the plaintiff's best argument is to establish that Dean is responsible for BSP's actions.
2. The second group will discuss Dean's best defense and formulate arguments in support of it.
3. The third group will consider slightly different facts. Suppose that Dean Brothers had an express policy that prohibited all security guards from carrying firearms on its property, which Wyden had conveyed to BSP. Despite knowing about this policy, Sidell had brought his weapon to work, and then fired it, killing Gaines. Could Dean be held responsible for negligence in that situation? Explain.

24 Employment, Immigration, and Labor Law

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is the employment-at-will doctrine?
2. Under the Family and Medical Leave Act, in what circumstances may an employee take family or medical leave?
3. What is the purpose of state workers' compensation laws?
4. What are the two most important federal statutes governing immigration and employment today?
5. What federal statute gave employees the right to engage in collective bargaining and to strike?

"The employer generally gets the employees he deserves."

Sir Walter Gilbey
1831–1914

Until the early 1900s, most employer-employee relationships were governed by the common law. Even today, private employers have considerable freedom to hire and fire workers under the common law. (This is one reason that employers generally get the employees they deserve, as the chapter-opening quotation observes.)

Numerous statutes and administrative agency regulations now govern the workplace, however. Thus, to a large extent, statutory law has displaced common law doctrines. Note that the distinction made under agency law between employee status and independent-contractor status is important here. The employment laws that will be discussed apply only to the employer-employee relationship. They do not apply to independent contractors.

Suppose that Randall works as an activities director for Valley Manor, a retirement community that offers several independent- and assisted-living options. As director, Randall normally spends his days at the Manor, where he hires and supervises other employees. One day, though, when another employee calls in sick, Randall accompanies residents on an excursion to a local art museum.

During the trip, Randall falls down some cement stairs and breaks his pelvis. He is taken by ambulance to a hospital, where he is told that he will need surgery and likely have a long recovery time. Does Randall qualify for workers' compensation coverage, or did this injury occur outside the scope of his employment? What about the time he will need to take off from work—is Randall entitled to take unpaid medical leave under federal law? If he takes unpaid leave, can he return to his original position afterward? You will learn about these and other important employment-related issues in this chapter.

24–1 Employment at Will

Employment relationships have traditionally been governed by the common law doctrine of employment at will. Under this doctrine, either party may terminate the employment relationship at any time and for any reason, unless doing so would violate an employee's statutory or contractual rights.

Employment at Will A common law doctrine under which either party may terminate an employment relationship at any time for any reason, unless it would violate a contract or statute.

Today, the majority of U.S. workers continue to have the legal status of "employees at will." In other words, this common law doctrine is still in widespread use. Only one state (Montana) does not apply it. Nonetheless, federal and state statutes governing employment relationships prevent the doctrine from being applied in a number of circumstances, and the courts have created several exceptions.

Focus Question 1

What is the employment-at-will doctrine?

24–1a Exceptions to the Employment-at-Will Doctrine

Because of the sometimes harsh effects of the employment-at-will doctrine for employees, the courts have carved out various exceptions to it. These exceptions are based on contract theory, tort theory, and public policy.

Exceptions Based on Contract Theory Some courts have held that an implied employment contract exists between an employer and an employee. An employee who is fired outside the terms of the implied contract may succeed in an action for breach of contract even though no written employment contract exists. Example 24.1 Innova Enterprise's employment manual and personnel bulletin both state that, as a matter of policy, workers will be dismissed only for good cause. If the language is clear so that an employee reasonably expects Innova to follow this policy, a court may find that there is an implied contract based on the terms stated in the manual and bulletin. ■ Generally, the employee's reasonable expectations are the key to whether an employment manual creates an implied contractual obligation.

An employer's oral promises to employees regarding discharge policy may also be considered part of an implied contract. If the employer fires a worker in a manner contrary to what was promised, a court may hold that the employer has violated the implied contract and is liable for damages. Most state courts will judge a claim of breach of an implied employment contract by traditional contract standards.

Exceptions Based on Tort Theory In a few situations, the discharge of an employee may give rise to an action for wrongful discharge under tort theories. Abusive discharge procedures may result in a suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress or defamation.

In addition, some courts have permitted workers to sue their employers under the tort theory of fraud. Example 24.2 Goldfinch, Inc., induces Jarvis to leave a lucrative job and move to another state by offering "a long-term job with a thriving business." In fact, Goldfinch not only is having significant financial problems but also is planning a merger that will result in the elimination of the position offered to Jarvis. If Jarvis takes the job in reliance on Goldfinch's representations and is fired shortly thereafter, she may be able to bring an action against the employer for fraud. ■

Exceptions Based on Public Policy The most common exception to the employment-at-will doctrine is made on the basis that the worker was fired for reasons that violate a fundamental public policy of the jurisdiction. Generally, the public policy involved must be expressed clearly in the jurisdiction's statutory law.

The public-policy exception may also apply to an employee who is discharged for whistleblowing—that is, telling government authorities, upper-level managers, or the media that an employer is engaged in some unsafe or illegal activity. Normally, however, whistleblowers seek protection from retaliatory discharge under federal and state statutory laws, such as the Whistleblower Protection Act.[1]

Whistleblowing An employee's disclosure to government authorities, upper-level managers, or the media that the employer is engaged in unsafe or illegal activities.

Once an employee establishes a claim under the Whistleblower Protection Act, that statute is the employee's exclusive remedy. Case Example 24.3 Dale Yurk was employed at Application Software Technology (AST) Corp. He discovered that AST was planning to reuse and resell software that it had developed for the city of Detroit. Yurk contacted his superiors—including the company's chief executive officer—and told them that he believed the resale infringed on the city's intellectual property rights. Shortly afterward, AST terminated Yurk's employment. Yurk sued AST, alleging that the company had violated both the Whistleblower Protection Act and public policy. A federal district court held that Yurk had stated a claim under the Whistleblower Protection Act and therefore dismissed the public policy claim.[2]

24–1b Wrongful Discharge

Wrongful Discharge An employer's termination of an employee's employment in violation of the law or an employment contract.

Whenever an employer discharges an employee in violation of an employment contract or a statute protecting employees, the employee may bring an action for wrongful discharge. For instance, an employee who is terminated in retaliation for some protected activity, such as whistleblowing or participating in an employment-discrimination investigation, can sue for wrongful discharge.

Rawpixel.com/shutterstock.com

What are some of the circumstances under which an employee can bring an action for wrongful discharge against an employer?

Even if an employer's actions do not violate any provisions in an employment contract or a statute, the employer may still be subject to liability. An employee can sue for wrongful discharge under a common law doctrine such as an agency or tort theory. For instance, if while firing an employee, an employer publicly discloses private facts about that employee's sex life to her co-workers, the employee could claim wrongful discharge based on invasion of privacy. Similarly, if a salesperson is fired because she refuses to participate in falsifying consumers' credit applications as instructed by her employer, she can sue for wrongful discharge as a matter of public policy.[3]

24–2 Wages, Hours, and Leave

In the 1930s, Congress enacted several laws regulating the wages and working hours of employees.

1. The Davis-Bacon Act[4] requires contractors and subcontractors working on federal government construction projects to pay "prevailing wages" to their employees.
2. The Walsh-Healey Act[5] applies to U.S. government contracts. It requires that a minimum wage, as well as overtime pay at 1.5 times regular pay rates, be paid to employees of manufacturers or suppliers entering into contracts with agencies of the federal government.
3. The Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA)[6] extended wage-hour requirements to cover all employers engaged in interstate commerce or in producing goods for interstate commerce. Certain other types of businesses are included as well. The FLSA, as amended, provides the most comprehensive federal regulation of wages and hours today.

24–2a Child Labor

The FLSA prohibits oppressive child labor. Restrictions on child labor differ by age group. Children under fourteen years of age are allowed to do certain types of work. They can deliver newspapers, work for their parents, and be employed in entertainment and (with some exceptions) agriculture. Children aged fourteen and fifteen are allowed to work, but not in hazardous occupations. There are also numerous restrictions on how many hours per day and per week children can work. Working times and hours are not restricted for persons between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, but they cannot be employed in hazardous jobs or in jobs detrimental to their health and well-being. None of these restrictions apply to individuals over the age of eighteen.

24–2b Minimum Wage Requirement

The FLSA provides that a minimum wage of $7.25 per hour must be paid to covered, nonexempt employees. More than half of the states (and some cities) also have minimum wage laws. When the state (or city) minimum wage is greater than the federal minimum wage, the employee is entitled to the higher wage.

Minimum Wage The lowest wage, either by government regulation or by union contract, that an employer may pay an hourly worker.

Example 24.4 Seattle, Washington, has one of the highest minimum wages in the country, at about $15 an hour. Various studies have shown that Seattle employees who had low-paying job when this minimum wage went into effect saw their take-home pay increase or stay the same while working fewer hours. At the same time, the higher minimum wage discouraged new hires in certain fields and caused employers to offer any new hires fewer hours of work. ■

Are employees entitled to receive wages for all the time they spend at work, including times when they are taking a personal break? For some employees, "punching a time clock" means accounting for all of the time that they are not working. These employees must "punch in" when they arrive and "punch out" when they leave for the day, of course, but they also must clock out when they take personal breaks, including bathroom, coffee, and smoking breaks.

The Fair Labor Standards Act does not require that an employer offer personal breaks to its employees. If an employer does offer them, though, employees must be compensated during those breaks. Otherwise, the employer may effectively be in violation of federal minimum wage laws. The issue of unpaid bathroom breaks came to the fore when the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL) filed a lawsuit against American Future Systems, Inc. (doing business as Progressive Business Publications). The DOL alleged that the company had created a compensation system in which none of its six thousand employees were compensated for bathroom breaks. The DOL argued that under federal regulations implementing the FLSA, all workday breaks of twenty minutes or less are compensable time.[7] A federal district court agreed. Because the employees had not been paid for their break time, the court ordered the company to pay past and current employees nearly $2 million in unpaid wages. A federal appellate court affirmed the decision.[8]

Overtime Provisions and Exemptions Under the FLSA, employees who work more than forty hours per week normally must be paid 1.5 times their regular pay for all hours over forty. The FLSA overtime provisions apply only after an employee has worked more than forty hours per week. Thus, employees who work for ten hours a day, four days per week, are not entitled to overtime pay, because they do not work more than forty hours per week.

Certain employees are exempt from the FLSA's overtime provisions. These employees generally include executive, administrative, and professional employees, as well as outside salespersons and those who create computer code. Executive and administrative employees are those whose primary duty is management and who exercise discretion and independent judgment.

Employers are not required to pay overtime wages to exempt employees. Regulations also provide that employers are not required to pay overtime to workers who make salaries of more than $35,568. An employer can voluntarily pay overtime to ineligible employees but cannot waive or reduce the overtime requirements of the FLSA.

The question in the following case was whether an auto dealer's service advisors fit within the FLSA overtime-pay exemption.

Encino Motorcars, LLC v. Navarro

Supreme Court of the United States, 579 U.S. __, 138 S.Ct. 1134, 200 L.Ed.2d 433 (2018).

Facts Encino Motorcars, LLC, is a Mercedes-Benz dealership. Encino's service advisors meet customers, listen to their concerns about their cars, suggest repair and maintenance services, sell new accessories or parts, record service orders, follow up with customers as the services are performed, and explain the repair and maintenance work when customers return for their vehicles. Some of Encino's service advisors, including Hector Navarro, filed a suit in a federal district court against their employer, alleging that the dealership had violated the Fair Labor Standards Act by failing to pay them overtime. Encino argued that the act's exemption from the overtime-pay requirement for "any salesman, partsman, or mechanic primarily engaged in selling or servicing automobiles" applied to service advisors. The court agreed and dismissed the complaint. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the dismissal. Encino appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Were Encino's service advisors exempt from the overtime-pay requirement in the FLSA?

Decision Yes. The United States Supreme Court reversed the appellate court's decision and remanded the case. "In sum, we conclude that service advisors are exempt from the overtime-pay requirement of the FLSA because they are salesmen . . . primarily engaged in . . . servicing automobiles."

Reason The Court stated that a service advisor is obviously a "salesman." The ordinary meaning of "salesman" is someone who sells goods or services. And this is precisely what service advisors do—sell services to customers for their vehicles. The Court expanded the job description to include "servicing automobiles," which was defined to mean "the action of maintaining or repairing a motor vehicle, or the action of providing a service." In the eyes of the Court, service advisors do both. The Court acknowledged that service advisors do not physically repair vehicles. But partsmen, too, are "primarily engaged in . . . servicing automobiles," and like service advisors, do not spend most of their time under the hoods of cars. Instead, these employees obtain vehicle parts and provide them to the mechanics. Thus, reasoned the Court, the phrase "primarily engaged in . . . servicing automobiles" must include some individuals who do not repair vehicles but who are integrally involved in the "servicing process." "That description applies to partsmen and service advisors alike."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment The salesmen, mechanics, and partsmen identified in the FLSA exemption work irregular hours, sometimes away from their principal work site. Service advisors typically work ordinary, fixed schedules on-site. Should the Court have considered these attributes in making its decision in the Encino case? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the FLSA exemption covered "any salesman or mechanic primarily engaged in selling or servicing automobiles" but not "any partsman." Would the result have been different? Explain.

Interaction of State and Federal Wage and Overtime Laws Note that state legislation may include rules that impact federal wages and overtime laws. For instance, if a state requires employers to give employees one day off per week, an employee who works that day may be entitled to overtime wages.

Case Example 24.5 Christopher Mendoza and Meagan Gordon were Nordstrom employees at different locations in California. Nordstrom had asked both Mendoza and Gordon to fill in for other employees. As a result, both had worked more than six consecutive days without receiving a day off. California state law prohibits employers from causing employees "to work more than six days in seven." The employees filed suit against Nordstrom, Inc., and the case ultimately came before the California Supreme Court.

At issue was whether the law applies on a calendar basis, with each workweek considered a fixed unit, or on a rolling basis. If the rolling basis was used, as Nordstrom argued that it should be, employees could work more than six consecutive days if on average they had one day off per seven. The state's highest court held that Nordstrom had violated California's law. Employees are entitled to one day off each workweek, not one day in seven on a rolling basis. Employees could choose not to take the seventh day off (as they are entitled to do), but employers could not force them to do so, the court said.[9]

24–2c Family and Medical Leave

Focus Question 2

Under the Family and Medical Leave Act, in what circumstances may an employee take family or medical leave?

The Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA)[10] allows employees to take time off from work for family or medical reasons or in certain situations that arise from military service. A majority of the states have similar legislation. The FMLA does not supersede any state or local law that provides more generous protection.

Coverage and Applicability The FMLA requires employers who have fifty or more employees to provide employees with up to twelve weeks of unpaid family or medical leave during any twelve-month period. The FMLA expressly covers private and public (government) employees who have worked for their employers for at least a year.

An eligible employee may take up to twelve weeks of leave within a twelve-month period for any of the following reasons:

1. To care for a newborn baby within one year of birth.
2. To care for an adopted or foster child within one year of the time the child is placed with the employee.
3. To care for the employee's spouse, child, or parent who has a serious health condition.
4. If the employee suffers from a serious health condition and is unable to perform the essential functions of the job.
5. For any qualifying exigency (nonmedical emergency) arising out of the fact that the employee's spouse, son, daughter, or parent is a covered military member on active duty.[11] For instance, an employee can take leave to arrange for child care or to deal with financial or legal matters when a spouse is being deployed overseas.

In addition, an employee may take up to twenty-six weeks of military caregiver leave within a twelve-month period to care for a family member with a serious injury or illness incurred as a result of military duty.[12]

Benefits and Protections When an employee takes FMLA leave, the employer must continue the worker's health care coverage on the same terms as if the employee had continued to work. On returning from FMLA leave, most employees must be restored to their original position or to a comparable position (with nearly equivalent pay and benefits, for instance).

An important exception allows the employer to avoid reinstating a key employee—defined as an employee whose pay falls within the top 10 percent of the firm's local workforce. To justify denying reinstatement, the employer must show that reinstating the key employee would cause "substantial and grievous economic injury" to the employer. The employer must also notify the employee of its intention to deny reinstatement.

Violations An employer that violates the FMLA can be required to provide various remedies, including the following:

1. Damages to compensate an employee for lost benefits, denied compensation, and actual monetary losses (such as the cost of providing for care of the family member) up to an amount equivalent to the employee's wages for twelve weeks (twenty-six weeks for military caregiver leave).
2. Job reinstatement.
3. Promotion, if a promotion has been denied.

A successful plaintiff is also entitled to court costs and attorneys' fees. In addition, if the plaintiff shows the employer acted in bad faith, the plaintiff can receive two times the amount of damages awarded by a judge or jury. Supervisors can also be held personally liable, as employers, for violations of the act.

Employers generally are required to notify employees when an absence will be counted against leave authorized under the act. If an employer fails to provide such notice, and the employee consequently suffers an injury because of the lack of notice, the employer may be sanctioned.

24–3 Health, Safety, Income Security, and Privacy

Under the common law, employees who were injured on the job had to file lawsuits against their employers to obtain recovery. Today, numerous state and federal statutes protect employees and their families from the risk of accidental injury, disease, or death resulting from employment. In addition, the government protects employees' income through programs such as Social Security and unemployment insurance, and protects employees' privacy rights to a certain extent.

24–3a The Occupational Safety and Health Act

At the federal level, the primary legislation protecting employees' health and safety is the Occupational Safety and Health Act,[13] which is administered by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). The act imposes on employers a general duty to keep workplaces safe.

To this end, OSHA has established specific safety standards for various industries that employers must follow. For instance, OSHA regulations require the use of safety guards on certain mechanical equipment and set maximum levels of exposure to substances in the workplace that may be harmful to workers' health.

Case Example 24.6 James Bobo worked at the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) nuclear power plant for more than twenty-two years. He eventually contracted asbestos-induced lung cancer. After his death, his wife, Barbara, was diagnosed with malignant mesothelioma. She sued TVA in federal court, alleging that its negligence had resulted in her being exposed to "take-home" asbestos when she washed her husband's work clothes over the years. Although she died prior to trial, her children continued the suit.

At trial, the plaintiffs proved that TVA knew about OSHA regulations—adopted during the time of James's employment—to protect not only workers but also their families. These rules were aimed at preventing asbestos fibers from clinging to an employee's street clothes, skin, or hair and being taken off TVA property. The court held in favor of the plaintiffs and awarded $3.3 million. TVA appealed. A federal appellate court affirmed that TVA was liable for failing to follow OSHA regulations but remanded the case for a recalculation of the damages awarded.[14]

Notices, Records, and Reports The act requires that employers post certain notices in the workplace, maintain specific records, and submit reports. Employers with eleven or more employees are required to keep records of occupational injuries and illnesses. Each record must be made available for inspection when requested by an OSHA compliance officer. Some employers are required to electronically post their workplace injury and illness records from the prior year on OSHA's website.

Whenever a work-related fatality or serious injury requiring hospitalization occurs, employers must report directly to OSHA. The employer must notify OSHA within eight hours if an employee dies and submit a report within twenty-four hours for any inpatient hospitalization, amputation, or loss of an eye. A company that fails to do so will be fined.

Preventing workplace accidents and employee injuries is the goal of the Occupational Safety and Health Act. What are some employer requirements under the act?

Inspections and Employee Complaints OSHA compliance officers may enter and inspect the facilities of any establishment covered by the Occupational Safety and Health Act. Employees may also file complaints of violations and cannot be fired by their employers for doing so. Under the act, an employer cannot discharge an employee who files a complaint or who, in good faith, refuses to work in a high-risk area if bodily harm or death might result.

In the following case, an employer cited for an OSHA violation tried to minimize its own fault by focusing the court's attention on the injured employee's failure to follow workplace safety rules.

Packers Sanitation Services, Inc. v. Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission

United States Court of Appeals, Eleventh Circuit, 795 Fed.Appx. 814 (2020).

Facts Packers Sanitation Services, Inc., provides cleaning services to a poultry processing facility in Gainesville, Georgia. At the facility is a machine known as a quill puller, which is used to remove chickens' tail feathers. A Packers employee hosing down the quill puller stepped too close to the machine. Its rotating augers caught the employee's glove, pulled in his hand, and amputated a fingertip.

After an investigation, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration cited Packers for failing to appropriately guard the quill puller. Packers contested the citation, arguing that the injured employee had violated a workplace rule requiring each employee to stay at least two feet away from an active quill puller.

Continued

After a hearing, an administrative law judge (ALJ) affirmed the violation. The Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission declined to review the decision. Packers appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

Issue Did Packers violate the machine-guarding standard?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit upheld the ALJ's determination.

Reason Federal regulations require physical machine guards to protect employees from hazards such as "ingoing nip points." A quill puller's augers form an ingoing nip point. In this case, there was no line or physical barrier marking a safe distance from the machine for an employee tasked with hosing it down. According to the appellate court, "due to operational necessity, it was reasonably predictable that an employee would enter the zone of danger near that nip point." Supervisors walked past the quill puller regularly and could see that it lacked the required physical guards, which showed that Packers was aware of the hazard.

In response to Packers' argument that the employee would have faced no danger if he had followed the two-foot rule, in effect blaming the employee for his injury, the court stated, "Packers misses the mark. The machine-guarding standard would mean little if a company could escape responsibility merely by reminding its employees to stay a safe distance from dangerous machines. After all, common human errors such as neglect, distraction, inattention or inadvertence, which might cause an employee to enter the zone of danger, are part of the basis for the standards in the first place."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment As a defense to the citation for an OSHA violation, Packers argued that the injured employee violated the proximity rule. Was this defense relevant to the question before the court? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that in this case, no accident had taken place. Instead, the employee had refused to clean the unguarded quill puller, and Packers had discharged him. Would the result have been different? Explain.

24–3b State Workers' Compensation Laws

Workers' Compensation Laws
State statutes that establish an administrative process for compensating workers for injuries that arise in the course of their employment, regardless of fault.

Focus Question 3
What is the purpose of state workers' compensation laws?

State workers' compensation laws establish an administrative procedure for compensating workers injured on the job. Instead of suing, an injured worker files a claim with the administrative agency or board that administers local workers' compensation claims.

All states require employers to provide workers' compensation insurance, but the specific rules vary by state. Most states have a state fund that employers pay into for workers' compensation coverage. Usually, employers can purchase insurance from a private insurer as an alternative to paying into the state fund. Most states also allow certain employers to be self-insured—that is, employers that show an ability to pay claims do not need to buy insurance.

No state covers all employees under its workers' compensation statute. Typically, domestic workers, agricultural workers, temporary employees, and employees of common carriers (companies that provide transportation services to the public) are excluded. Minors are covered.

Requirements for Receiving Workers' Compensation In general, only two requirements must be met for an employee to receive benefits under a state workers' compensation law:

1. The existence of an employment relationship.
2. An accidental injury that occurred on the job or in the course of employment, regardless of fault. (An injury that occurs while an employee is commuting to or from work usually is not considered to have occurred on the job or in the course of employment and hence is not covered.)

This chapter's Business law Analysis feature illustrates these requirements.

An injured employee must notify the employer promptly (usually within thirty days of the accident). Generally, an employee must also file a workers' compensation claim with the appropriate state agency or board within a certain period (sixty days to two years) from the time the injury is first noticed, rather than from the time of the accident.

Workers' Compensation Claims

As a safety measure, Dynea USA, Inc., required an employee, Tony Schrader, to wear steel-toed boots. One of the boots caused a sore on Schrader's leg. The skin over the sore broke, and within a week, Schrader was hospitalized with a methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) infection. He filed a workers' compensation claim. Dynea argued that the MRSA bacteria that caused the infection had been on Schrader's skin before he came to work. Does Schrader's claim meet the requirements to recover workers' compensation benefits?

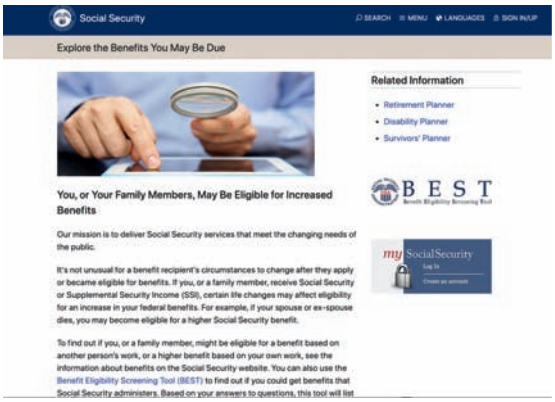
Analysis: To recover benefits under state workers' compensation laws, an employee must show that an injury (1) was accidental and (2) occurred on the job or in the course of employment. Fault is not an issue. The employee must file a claim with the state agency or board that administers local workers' compensation claims, which Schrader did. The issue here is whether the injury occurred on the job or in the course of employment.

Result and Reasoning: Schrader is entitled to workers' compensation benefits. Dynea required its employees to wear the boots that caused the sore on Schrader's leg, which subsequently became infected with MRSA. Even if the bacteria had been on Schrader's skin before he came to work, it was the rubbing of the boot at work that caused the sore through which the bacteria entered his body. Therefore, the second requirement for the recovery of workers' compensation benefits—that the injury occurred on the job—is fulfilled.

Workers' Compensation versus Litigation An employee's acceptance of workers' compensation benefits bars the employee from suing for injuries caused by the employer's negligence. By barring lawsuits for negligence, workers' compensation laws also prevent employers from raising common law defenses to negligence, such as contributory negligence and assumption of risk. A worker may sue an employer who has intentionally injured the worker, however.

24–3c Income Security

Federal and state governments participate in insurance programs designed to protect employees and their families by covering the financial impact of retirement, disability, death, hospitalization, and unemployment. The key federal law on this subject is the Social Security Act.[15]



Social Security The Social Security Act provides for old-age (retirement), survivors', and disability insurance. Hence, the act is often referred to as OASDI. Both employers and employees must contribute under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (FICA)[16] to help pay for Social Security retirement benefits. Retired workers are then eligible to receive monthly payments from the Social Security Administration, which administers the Social Security Act. Social Security benefits are fixed by statute but increase automatically with increases in the cost of living.

Know This
Social Security covers almost all jobs in the United States. Nine out of ten workers contribute to this protection for themselves and their families.

Medicare Medicare is a federal government health insurance program that is administered by the Social Security Administration for people sixty-five years of age and older and for some under the age of sixty-five who are disabled. Medicare originally had two parts, one pertaining to hospital costs and the other to nonhospital medical costs, such as visits to physicians' offices. It now offers additional coverage options and a prescription drug plan. People who have Medicare hospital insurance can also obtain additional federal medical insurance by paying small monthly premiums, which increase as the cost of medical care increases.

Why is the Social Security Act also known as OASDI?

Tax Contributions Under FICA, both employers and employees contribute to Social Security and Medicare, although the contributions are determined differently. The employer withholds the employee's FICA contributions from the employee's wages and ordinarily matches the contributions.

For Social Security, the basis for the contributions is the employee's annual wage base—the maximum amount of the employee's wages that is subject to the tax. The maximum amount subject to the tax is currently $137,700, and the tax rate is 12.4 percent.

The Medicare tax rate is 2.9 percent. Unlike Social Security, Medicare has no cap on the amount of wages subject to the tax. So even if an employee's salary is well above the cap for Social Security, the employee will still owe Medicare tax on the total earned income.

Thus, for Social Security and Medicare together, typically the employer and the employee each pay 7.65 percent—6.2 percent (half of 12.4 percent) for Social Security, up to the maximum wage base, plus 1.45 percent (half of 2.9 percent) for Medicare. Self-employed persons pay both the employer's and the employee's portions of the Social Security and Medicare taxes. Additionally, under the Affordable Care Act, high-income earners are subject to an additional Medicare tax of 0.9 percent (for a total rate of 3.8 percent).

Private Retirement Plans The major federal act regulating employee retirement plans is the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA).[17] This act empowers a branch of the U.S. Department of Labor to enforce its provisions governing employers that have private pension funds for their employees. ERISA does not require an employer to establish a pension plan. When a plan exists, however, ERISA specifies standards for its management, including establishing rules on how funds must be invested and records kept.

ERISA created the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation (PBGC), an independent federal agency, to provide timely and uninterrupted payment of voluntary private pension benefits. The pension plans pay annual insurance premiums (at set rates adjusted for inflation) to the PBGC, which then pays benefits to participants in the event that a plan is unable to do so.

Vesting The creation of an absolute or unconditional right or power.

A key provision of ERISA concerns vesting. Vesting gives an employee a legal right to receive pension benefits at some future date when the employee stops working. Before ERISA was enacted, some employees who had worked for companies for as long as thirty years received no pension benefits when their employment terminated because those benefits had not vested. Under ERISA, generally all employee contributions to pension plans vest immediately, and employee rights to employer contributions to a plan vest after five years of employment.

Know This

If an employer does not pay unemployment taxes, a state government can place a lien (claim) on the business's property to secure the debt.

Unemployment Insurance The Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA)[18] created a state-administered system that provides unemployment compensation to eligible individuals. Under this system, employers pay into a fund, and the proceeds are paid out to qualified unemployed workers. The FUTA and state laws require employers that fall under the provisions of the act to pay unemployment taxes at regular intervals. The proceeds from these taxes are then paid out to qualified unemployed workers.

To be eligible for unemployment compensation, a worker must be willing and able to work. Workers who have been fired for misconduct or who have voluntarily left their jobs are not eligible for benefits. Normally, workers must be actively seeking employment to continue receiving benefits.

Martha's claim normally will be denied because she left her job voluntarily and made no effort to maintain contact with her employer.

How does the Federal Unemployment Tax Act benefit employees?

COBRA The Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (COBRA)[19] enables workers to continue, for a limited time, their health care coverage after they are no longer eligible for their employers' group health insurance plans. The workers—not the employers—pay the premiums for the continued coverage.

COBRA prohibits an employer from eliminating a worker's medical, optical, or dental insurance when the worker's employment is terminated or when a reduction in the worker's hours would affect coverage. Termination of employment may be voluntary or involuntary. Only workers fired for gross misconduct are excluded from protection.

Employers, with some exceptions, must inform an employee of COBRA's provisions when the employee faces termination or a reduction of hours that would affect eligibility for coverage under the employer's health insurance plan. An employer that does not comply with COBRA risks substantial penalties, such as a tax of up to 10 percent of the annual cost of the group plan or $500,000, whichever is less.

Employer-Sponsored Group Health Plans The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA)[20] contains provisions that affect employer-sponsored group health plans. HIPAA does not require employers to provide health insurance, but it does establish requirements for those that do. For instance, HIPAA restricts the manner in which covered employers collect, use, and disclose the health information of employees and their families. Employers must designate privacy officials, distribute privacy notices, and train employees to ensure that employees' health information is not disclosed to unauthorized parties.

Failure to comply with HIPAA regulations can result in civil penalties of up to $100 per person per violation (with a cap of $25,000 per year). The employer is also subject to criminal prosecution for certain types of HIPAA violations and can face up to $250,000 in criminal fines and imprisonment for up to ten years if convicted. The consequences for corporate violations of HIPAA are also severe, with maximum annual civil penalties surpassing $1.7 million.

Affordable Care Act The Affordable Care Act[21] (ACA, commonly referred to as Obamacare) requires most employers with fifty or more full-time employees to offer health insurance benefits. Under the act, any business offering health benefits to its employees, even if it is not legally required to do so, may be eligible for tax credits of up to 35 percent to offset the costs.

Under the so-called "50/30 rule," the ACA applies to businesses that employ at least fifty workers for at least thirty hours a week. (The ACA also applies to any mathematical equivalent of fifty workers for thirty hours, so a business that employs a hundred workers for fifteen hours a week falls under ACA requirements.) An employer who fails to provide health benefits as required under the statute can be fined up to $2,000 for each employee. An employer who offers a plan that costs an employee more than 9.5 percent of the employee's income may have to pay a penalty of $3,000 per insured worker.

24–3d Employee Privacy Rights

Concerns about the privacy rights of employees have arisen in response to the sometimes invasive tactics used by employers to monitor and screen workers. Perhaps the greatest privacy concern in today's employment arena has to do with electronic monitoring.

dlewis33/Getty Images

Can employees refuse to be video-monitored?

Electronic Monitoring More than half of employers engage in some form of surveillance of their employees. Many employers review employees' e-mail, as well as their social media posts and other Internet messages. Employers may also make video recordings of their employees at work, monitor their telephone conversations, and listen to their voice mail.

Employee Privacy Protection. Employees of private (nongovernment) employers have some privacy protection under tort law and state constitutions. In addition, state and federal statutes may limit an employer's conduct in certain respects. For instance, the Electronic Communications Privacy Act prohibits employers from intercepting an employee's personal electronic communications unless they are made on devices and systems furnished by the employer.

Nonetheless, employers do have considerable leeway to monitor employees in the workplace. In addition, private employers generally are free to use filtering software to block access to certain websites, such as sites containing sexually explicit images. The First Amendment's protection of free speech prevents only government employers from restraining speech by blocking websites.

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy. When determining whether an employer is liable for violating an employee's privacy rights, the courts generally weigh the employer's interests against the employee's reasonable expectation of privacy.

Normally, if employees have been informed that their communications are being monitored, they cannot reasonably expect those interactions to be private. In addition, a court will typically hold that employees do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy when using a system (such as an e-mail system) provided by the employer.

If employees are not informed that certain communications are being monitored, however, the employer may be held liable for invading their privacy. Most employers that engage in electronic monitoring notify their employees about the monitoring. Nevertheless, notifying employees of a general policy may not sufficiently protect an employer who monitors forms of communications that the policy fails to mention. For instance, notifying employees that their e-mails and phone calls may be monitored does not necessarily protect an employer who also monitors social media posts or text messages.

For a discussion of how some employers are creating their own social media networks, see this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.

Other Types of Monitoring In addition to monitoring their employees' activities electronically, employers also engage in other types of monitoring. These practices, which have included lie-detector tests and drug tests, have often been subject to challenge as violations of employee privacy rights.

Lie-Detector Tests. At one time, many employers required employees or job applicants to take polygraph examinations (lie-detector tests). Today, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act[22] generally prohibits employers from requiring or requesting that employees or job applicants take lie-detector tests. It also prevents employers from asking about the results of a polygraph or taking any negative employment action based on the results.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Social Media in the Workplace Come of Age

What do corporate giant Dell, Inc., and relatively small Nikon Instruments have in common? They—and many other companies—have created internal social media networks using enterprise social networking software and systems, such as Igloo, Slack, Microsoft Teams, and Workplace by Facebook. A glance at the posts on these internal networks reveals that they are quite different from typical posts on Facebook, LinkedIn, and Twitter. Rather than being personal, the tone is businesslike, and the posts deal with workplace concerns such as how a team is solving a problem or how to sell a new product.

Benefits and Pitfalls of Internal Social Media Networks

Internal social media networks offer businesses several advantages. Perhaps the most important is that employees can obtain real-time information about important issues such as production glitches. They can also exchange tips about how to deal with problems, such as difficult customers. News about the company's new products or those of a competitor is available immediately. Furthermore, employees spend much less time sorting through e-mail. Rather than wasting their fellow employees' time by sending mass e-mailings, workers can post messages or collaborate on presentations via the company's internal network.

The downside is that these networks may become polluted with annoying "white noise." If employees start posting comments about what they ate for lunch, for instance, the system will lose much of its utility. Companies can prevent this from happening by establishing explicit guidelines on what can be posted.

Keeping the Data Safe

Another concern is how to keep data and corporate secrets safe. When a company sets up a social media network, it usually decides which employees can see which files and which employees will belong to each specific "social" group within the company. Often, the data created through a social media network are kept on the company's own servers in secure "clouds."

Critical Thinking

What problems might arise if data from an internal social media system are stored on third party servers?

Certain employers are exempt from these prohibitions. Federal, state, and local government employers, as well as certain security service firms, may conduct polygraph tests. In addition, companies that manufacture and distribute controlled substances may perform lie-detector tests. Other employers may use polygraph tests when investigating losses attributable to theft, including embezzlement and the theft of trade secrets.

Gorodenkoff/shutterstock.com

Does current federal law allow security service firms to use lie-detector tests?

Drug Testing. In the interests of public safety, many employers, including government employers, require their employees to submit to drug testing. Government (public) employers are constrained in drug testing by the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures. Drug testing of public employees is allowed by statute for transportation workers. Courts normally uphold drug testing of certain employees when drug use in a particular job may threaten public safety. Also, when there is a reasonable basis for suspecting government employees of using drugs, courts often find that drug testing does not violate the Fourth Amendment.

The Fourth Amendment does not apply to drug testing conducted by private employers. Hence, the drug testing of private-sector employees is governed by state law, which varies widely. Many states have statutes that allow drug testing by private employers but place restrictions on when and how the testing may be performed. A collective bargaining agreement may also provide protection against drug testing (or authorize drug testing under certain conditions).

The permissibility of a private employee's drug test often hinges on whether the employer's testing was reasonable. Random drug tests and even "zero-tolerance" policies (which deny a "second chance" to employees who test positive for drugs) have been held to be reasonable.

24–4 Immigration Law

What are the two most important federal statutes governing immigration and employment today?

The United States did not have any laws restricting immigration until the late nineteenth century. Today, the most important laws governing immigration and employment are the Immigration Reform and Control Act[23] (IRCA) and the Immigration Act.[24]

Immigration law has become increasingly important in recent years. An estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants now live in the United States. Many of them came to find jobs. Because U.S. employers face serious penalties if they hire undocumented immigrants, businesspersons need to understand our immigration laws.

24–4a Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA)

When the IRCA was enacted in 1986, it provided amnesty to certain groups of illegal aliens living in the United States at the time. It also established a system that sanctions employers who hire immigrants lacking work authorization. The IRCA makes it illegal to hire, recruit, or refer for a fee someone not authorized to work in this country. Through Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officers, the federal government conducts random compliance audits and engages in enforcement actions against employers who hire undocumented immigrants.

I-9 Verification The process of verifying the employment eligibility and identity of a new worker. It must be completed within three days after the worker commences employment.

I-9 Employment Verification To comply with the IRCA, an employer must perform an I-9 verification for a new hire, including those hired as "contractors" or "day workers" if they work under the employer's direct supervision. Form I-9, Employment Eligibility Verification, which is available from U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, must be completed within three days of a worker's commencement of employment. The three-day period is to allow the employer to check the form's accuracy and to review and verify documents establishing the prospective worker's identity and eligibility for employment in the United States.

Documentation Requirements The employer must declare, under penalty of perjury, that an employee produced documents establishing the employee's identity and legal employability. A U.S. passport establishing the person's citizenship is acceptable documentation, as is a document authorizing a foreign citizen to work in the United States, such as a Permanent Resident Card (discussed shortly).

If an employer had any reason to suspect that a worker's documents were forged or inaccurate at the time of hiring, the employer can be fined for violating the IRCA.

Most legal actions for violations of I-9 rules are brought against employees who provide false information or documentation. If the employee enters false information on an I-9 form or presents false documentation, the employer can fire the worker, who then may be subject to deportation. Nevertheless, employers must be honest when verifying an employee's documentation. If an employer "should have known" that the worker was unauthorized, the employer has violated the rules.

Enforcement U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) is the largest investigative arm of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security. ICE has a general inspection program that conducts random compliance audits. Other audits may occur if the agency receives a written complaint alleging an employer's violations. Government inspections include a review of an employer's file of I-9 forms. The government does not need a subpoena or a warrant to conduct such an inspection.

If an investigation reveals a possible violation, ICE will bring an administrative action and issue a Notice of Intent to Fine, which sets out the charges against the employer. The employer has a right to a hearing on the enforcement action if a request is filed within thirty days. This hearing is conducted before an administrative law judge, and the employer has a right to counsel and to discovery. The typical defense in such actions is good faith or substantial compliance with the documentation provisions.

Penalties An employer who violates the law by hiring an unauthorized alien is subject to substantial penalties. The employer may be fined up to $4,568 for each unauthorized employee for a first offense, $11,463 per employee for a second offense, and up to $22,972 for subsequent offenses.

Employers who have engaged in a "pattern or practice of violations" are subject to criminal penalties, which include additional fines and imprisonment for up to ten years. A company may also be barred from future government contracts for violations. In determining the penalty, ICE considers the seriousness of the violation (such as intentional falsification of documents), the employer's past compliance, and whether the employer cooperated with authorities during the investigation.

What are the penalties for employing an unauthorized immigrant?

24–4b The Immigration Act

Often, U.S. businesses find that they cannot hire enough domestic workers with specialized skills. For this reason, U.S. immigration laws have long made provisions for businesses to hire specially qualified foreign workers.

The Immigration Act placed caps on the number of visas (entry permits) that can be issued to immigrants each year, including employment-based visas. Employment-based visas may be classified as permanent (immigrant) or temporary (nonimmigrant). Employers who wish to hire workers with either type of visa must comply with detailed government regulations.[25]

I-551 Permanent Resident Card A company seeking to hire a noncitizen worker on a permanent basis may do so if the worker is self-authorized—that is, if the worker either is a lawful permanent resident or has a valid temporary Employment Authorization Document. A lawful permanent resident can prove legal status to an employer by presenting an I-551 Permanent Resident Card, known as a "green card," or a properly stamped foreign passport.

I-551 Permanent Resident Card A document, known as a "green card," that shows that a foreign-born individual can legally work in the United States.

Many immigrant workers are not already self-authorized, and an employer that wishes to hire them can attempt to obtain labor certification, or green cards, for them. A limited number of new green cards are issued each year. A green card can be obtained only for a person who is being hired for a permanent, full-time position. (A separate authorization system provides for the temporary entry and hiring of nonimmigrant visa workers.)

To gain authorization for hiring a foreign worker, an employer must show that no U.S. worker is qualified, willing, and able to take the job. The government has detailed regulations governing the advertising of positions as well as the certification process. Any U.S. applicants who meet the stated job qualifications must be interviewed for the position. The employer must also be able to show that the qualifications required for the job are a business necessity.

The H-1B Visa Program A relatively common and sometimes controversial temporary visa program is the H-1B visa system. To obtain an H-1B visa, the potential employee must be qualified in a "specialty occupation," meaning that the individual has highly specialized knowledge and has attained a bachelor's or higher degree or its equivalent. Individuals with H-1B visas can stay in the United States for three to six years and can work only for the sponsoring employer.

25. The most relevant regulations can be found at 20 C.F.R. Section 655 (for temporary employment) and 20 C.F.R. Section 656 (for permanent employment).

The recipients of H-1B visas include many high-tech workers. A maximum of sixty-five thousand H-1B visas are set aside each year for new immigrants. That limit is typically reached within the first few weeks of the year. Consequently, technology companies complain that Congress needs to expand the number of H-1B visas available in order to encourage the best and the brightest minds to work in the United States.

An employer who wishes to submit an H-1B application must first file a Labor Condition Application on a form known as ETA 9035. The employer must agree to provide a wage level at least equal to the wages offered to other individuals with similar experience and qualifications. The employer must also show that the hiring will not adversely affect other workers similarly employed. The employer is required to inform U.S. workers of the intent to hire a foreign worker by posting the form. The U.S. Department of Labor reviews the applications and may reject them for omissions or inaccuracies.

H-2, O, L, and E Visas Other specialty temporary visas are available for other categories of employees. H-2A visas provide for workers performing agricultural labor of a seasonal nature. H-2B visas are used for workers in nonagricultural positions. O visas provide entry for persons who have "extraordinary ability in the sciences, arts, education, business or athletics which has been demonstrated by sustained national or international acclaim." L visas allow a company's foreign managers or executives to work inside the United States. E visas permit the entry of certain foreign investors and entrepreneurs.

What federal statute gave employees the right to engage in collective bargaining and to strike?

24–5 Labor Law

In the 1930s, in addition to wage-hour laws, the government also enacted the first of several labor laws. These laws protect employees' rights to join labor unions, to bargain with management over the terms and conditions of employment, and to conduct strikes.

24–5a Federal Labor Laws

Federal labor laws governing union-employer relations have developed considerably since the first law was enacted in 1932. Initially, the laws were concerned with protecting the rights and interests of workers. Subsequent legislation placed some restraints on unions and granted rights to employers. We look next at four major federal statutes regulating union-employer relations.

Norris-LaGuardia Act In 1932, Congress protected peaceful strikes, picketing, and boycotts in the Norris-LaGuardia Act.[26] The statute restricted the power of federal courts to issue injunctions against unions engaged in peaceful strikes. In effect, this act established a national policy permitting employees to organize.

National Labor Relations Act One of the foremost statutes regulating labor is the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), enacted in 1935.[27] This act established the rights of employees to engage in collective bargaining and to strike.

Unfair Labor Practices. The NLRA specifically defined a number of employer practices as unfair to labor:

1. Interference with the efforts of employees to form, join, or assist labor organizations or to engage in concerted activities for mutual aid or protection.
2. An employer's domination of a labor organization or contribution of financial or other support to it.

3. Discrimination in the hiring of or awarding of tenure to employees based on union affiliation.
4. Discrimination against employees for filing charges under the act or giving testimony under the act.
5. Refusal to bargain collectively with the duly designated representative of the employees.

When were many labor union laws created?

The National Labor Relations Board. The NLRA also created the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) to oversee union elections and to prevent employers from engaging in unfair and illegal union activities and unfair labor practices.

The NLRB has the authority to investigate employees' charges of unfair labor practices and to file complaints against employers in response to these charges. When violations are found, the NLRB may issue a cease-and-desist order compelling the employer to stop engaging in the unfair practices. Cease-and-desist orders can be enforced by a federal appellate court if necessary. After the NLRB rules on claims of unfair labor practices, its decision may be appealed to a federal court.

Case Example 24.8 Ozburn-Hessey Logistics (OHL) had a discipline policy under which an employee could be fired for accumulating thirteen tardiness and absence "points." Shortly after OHL replaced its push-button clocks with time-screen clocks, employee Laura Keele checked in one minute late. Keele claimed the new, more complex system confused her, causing the delay. Nonetheless, OHL assessed Keele a tardiness point, her thirteenth, and she was fired.

The NLRB filed a complaint against OHL for unfair labor practices, asserting that the upgrade in clocks should have been negotiated with Keele's union. Because it was not, her firing violated federal labor law. An administrative law judge determined that pushing a touchscreen rather than a plastic button did not represent a "significant" change in the terms of Keele's employment. A federal appeals court agreed. OHL's decision to switch clocks did not require collective bargaining, and Keele's firing was not an unfair labor practice.[28]

Good Faith Bargaining. Under the NLRA, employers and unions have a duty to bargain in good faith. Bargaining over certain subjects (such as wages, hours, and benefits) is mandatory, and a party's refusal to bargain over these subjects is an unfair labor practice that can be reported to the NLRB. An employer may be required to bargain with the union over the use of hidden video surveillance cameras, for instance.

Workers Protected by the NLRA. To be protected under the NLRA, an individual must be an employee, as that term is defined in the statute. Courts have long held that job applicants fall within the definition (otherwise, the NLRA's ban on discrimination in hiring would mean nothing). Additionally, individuals who are hired by a union to organize a company are to be considered employees of the company for NLRA purposes.

Even a temporary worker hired through an employment agency may qualify for protection under the NLRA. The same cannot be said for some faculty at private universities. Case Example 24.9 A group of non-tenure-track adjunct instructors at the University of Southern California (USC) voted to join a union. USC refused to negotiate with these adjuncts on the ground that, like tenured professors, they were "managers" of university policy who are barred from unionizing, rather than less-powerful "employees," who are permitted to unionize under the NLRA. A federal appeals court ruled against USC in this instance but established guidelines that will make it more difficult for non-tenure-track adjunct faculty at private universities to claim employee status in the future.[29]

Closed Shop A firm that requires union membership as a condition of employment.

Union Shop A firm that requires all workers, once employed, to become union members within a specified period of time as a condition of their continued employment.

Right-to-Work Laws State laws providing that employees may not be required to join a union as a condition of retaining employment.

Hot-Cargo Agreement An illegal agreement in which employers voluntarily agree with unions not to handle, use, or deal in the nonunion-produced goods of other employers.

Labor Management Relations Act The Labor Management Relations Act (LMRA), also called the Taft-Hartley Act,[30] was passed in 1947 to proscribe certain unfair union practices, such as the closed shop. A closed shop requires union membership as a condition of employment.

Although the act made the closed shop illegal, it preserved the legality of the union shop. A union shop does not require membership as a prerequisite for employment but can, and usually does, require that workers join the union after a specified amount of time on the job.

The LMRA also prohibited unions from refusing to bargain with employers, engaging in certain types of picketing, and featherbedding—causing employers to hire more employees than necessary. The act also allowed individual states to pass their own right-to-work laws, which make it illegal for union membership to be required for continued employment in any establishment. Thus, union shops are technically illegal in the twenty-eight states that have right-to-work laws.

Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA)[31] established an employee bill of rights and reporting requirements for union activities. The act also outlawed the hot-cargo agreement, in which employers voluntarily agree with unions not to handle, use, or deal in goods produced by nonunion employees working for other employers.

The LMRDA strictly regulates unions' internal business procedures, including union elections. For instance, it requires a union to hold regularly scheduled elections of officers using secret ballots. Ex-convicts are prohibited from holding union office. Moreover, union officials are accountable for union property and funds. Members have the right to attend and to participate in union meetings, to nominate officers, and to vote in most union proceedings.

The LMRDA holds union officers to a high standard of responsibility and ethical conduct in administering the affairs of their union. Case Example 24.10 The Services Employees International Union (SEIU) consists of 2.2 million members who work in health care, public services, and property services. United Health Workers (UHW) is affiliated with SEIU and represents 150,000 health care workers in California. The SEIU proposed moving 150,000 long-term care workers from three separate unions, including 65,000 from the UHW, into a new union chartered by the SEIU. The UHW opposed the move.

Meanwhile, the UHW officials, while still on the UHW payroll, created and promoted a new union—the National Union of Healthcare Workers (NUHW). The SEIU sued the NUHW and the UHW officials for breach of fiduciary duties. The SEIU claimed that union officials had a duty under the LMRDA to act primarily for the benefit of the union. The court agreed, and a federal appellate court affirmed. Officials who diverted union resources to establish a competing union breached their duty under the LMRDA.[32]

24–5b Union Organization

Authorization Card A card signed by an employee that gives a union permission to act on the employee's behalf in negotiations with management.

Typically, the first step in organizing a union at a particular firm is to have the workers sign authorization cards. An authorization card usually states that the worker wishes to have a certain union, such as the United Auto Workers, represent the workforce.

If a majority of the workers sign authorization cards, the union organizers (unionizers) present the cards to the employer and ask for formal recognition of the union. The employer is not required to recognize the union at this point in the process, but it may do so voluntarily on a showing of majority support.

Union Elections If the employer does not voluntarily recognize the union—or if less than a majority of the workers sign authorization cards—the union organizers can petition for an election. The organizers present the authorization cards to the NLRB with a petition to hold an election on unionization. For an election to be held, they must demonstrate that at least 30 percent of the workers to be represented support a union or an election on unionization.

Appropriate Bargaining Unit. Not every group of workers can form a single union. The proposed union must represent an appropriate bargaining unit. One key requirement of an appropriate bargaining unit is a mutuality of interest among all the workers to be represented by the union. Factors considered in determining whether there is a mutuality of interest include the similarity of the jobs of all the workers to be unionized and their physical location.

Election Rules In most instances, the parties agree on the voting unit and other issues. If the parties do not agree, the NLRB holds a pre-election hearing shortly after it receives a petition to resolve issues and determine whether an election should be conducted. Before the hearing, the company must submit a "statement of position" laying out every argument it intends to make against the union. Any argument that the company does not include in its position paper can be excluded from evidence at the hearing. Once the hearing is concluded, an election cannot be scheduled for twenty business days unless the parties agree otherwise.

Voting. If an election is held, the NLRB supervises the election and ensures secret voting and voter eligibility. If the proposed union receives majority support in a fair election, the NLRB certifies the union as the bargaining representative for the employees.

Union Election Campaigns Many disputes between labor and management arise during union election campaigns. Generally, the employer has control over unionizing activities that take place on company property during working hours. An employer may thus limit the campaign activities of union supporters as long as the employer has a legitimate business reason for doing so. The employer may also reasonably limit the times and places that union solicitation occurs so long as the employer is not discriminating against the union. (Can union organizers use company e-mail during campaigns? See this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature for a discussion of this topic.)

Union Organizing Using a Company's E-Mail System

Managerial Strategy

When union organizers start an organizing drive, there are certain restrictions on what they can do, particularly within the workplace. Both employers and employees must comply with Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA).

Protected Concerted Activities

Under Section 7, employees have certain rights to communicate among themselves. Section 7 states, "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, . . . and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

What about communication via e-mail? Can union organizers use a company-operated e-mail system for organizing purposes? Companies typically provide e-mail systems so that employees can communicate with outsiders and among themselves as part of their jobs. Generally, company policies have prohibited the use of company-owned and -operated e-mail systems for other than job-related communications. Some union organizers have challenged this prohibition.

The NLRB's Perspective Evolves

The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) has reversed course several times on the issue of employees' use of company e-mail systems, reflecting the changing politics of board members. In the mid-2010s, the NLRB ruled that, if an employer provides workers with an e-mail system for work functions, then its employees should have a right under the NLRA to use that same system to discuss any work-related concerns, including union activity.[a]

About five years later, the NLRB heard a case involving a Las Vegas casino that prohibited employees from using company e-mail to discuss working conditions.[b] Upholding the casino's ability to do so, the board broadly revoked the right of workers to conduct union affairs on employer-operated e-mail systems. The NLRB held that businesses have a constitutionally protected right to control or limit the use of their property, which includes digital communications. The prohibition must, however, be nondiscriminatory. That is, a business cannot ban union-related e-mails while allowing communications about other subjects that are not strictly work-related.

Business Questions

1. Employees meeting around the water cooler or coffee machine have always had the right to discuss work-related matters. Is an employer-provided e-mail system or social media outlet simply a digital water cooler? Why or why not?

2. Why might the nondiscrimination component of the NLRB's recent ruling make a ban on union-related e-mails difficult for managers to enforce?

a. Purple Communications, Inc. and Communication Workers of America, AFL-CIO, Cases 21-CA-095151, 21-RC-091531, and 21-RC-091584, March 16, 2015.

b. Caesars Entertainment, Inc. and NLRB, Case 28-CA-060841, December 17, 2019.

When workers wish to organize a union, what types of activities are allowed on the employer's premises? What types of activities are not allowed?

Example 24.11 A union is seeking to organize clerks at a department store owned by Amanti Enterprises. Amanti can prohibit all union solicitation in areas of the store open to the public because that activity could seriously interfere with the store's business. If Amanti allows solicitation for charitable causes in the workplace, however, normally it may not prohibit union solicitation.

An employer may campaign among its workers against the union, but the NLRB carefully monitors and regulates the tactics used by management. Otherwise, management might use its economic power to coerce the workers into voting against unionization. If an employer issued threats ("If the union wins, you'll all be fired") or engaged in other unfair labor practices, the NLRB could certify the union even though it lost the election. Alternatively, the NLRB could ask a court to order a new election.

Whether an employer violated its employees' rights under the National Labor Relations Act during a union election campaign was at issue in the following case.

Contemporary Cars, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit 814 F.3d 859 (2016).

Facts Contemporary Cars, Inc., sells and services cars. AutoNation owns this dealership, along with others. The International Association of Machinists began a campaign to organize the company's service technicians. During the election campaign, Contemporary engaged in various activities to monitor and perhaps affect the campaign. AutoNation's vice president, who opposed the union, held group meetings with the service technicians. Afterwards, Bob Berryhill, Contemporary's manager, called individual employees into his office to ask about union activity. He also promised that the dealership was working on finding solutions for various workplace problems the technicians had. In addition, the dealership fired an employee, Anthony Roberts, who was a leader in the union campaign. An administrative law judge ordered Contemporary to stop interfering with its employees' union activities and to reinstate Roberts. The NLRB affirmed the order. The dealership petitioned for a review of the order.

Issue Did Contemporary Cars violate its employees' rights during the union election campaign?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the administrative law judge's order. The dealership and AutoNation violated the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) by interfering with their employees' protected rights to engage in concerted activity and to organize a union.

Reason Contemporary Cars violated the NLRA by "coercively creating an impression of surveillance of union activity, interrogating employees about union activity, and soliciting and promising to remedy employee grievances." In support of its finding of coercion, the court cited the supervisor's comments on the employees' "rush" to leave work to attend union meetings and the way that management met with individual employees who were "alone and outnumbered by managers." The court pointed out that management's meetings with employees represented "an effort to frustrate the union organizing drive by soliciting and at least implicitly promising to adjust grievances." AutoNation's "overly broad" no-solicitation policy was likely to "chill" concerted activity.

Lastly, the court stated that the dealership's discharge of Roberts was motivated by "anti-union animus [hostility]," as evidenced by Berryhill's identification of Roberts as a "troublemaker" and "instigator" of the union campaign. In addition, Roberts had higher productivity, a superior skill rating, and more seniority than technicians who were retained.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment What might the dealership have asserted in defense to the charge that its actions violated its employees' rights?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the dealership had taken no steps to change any of the terms or conditions of employment until well after the union election. Would the result have been different in this case? Explain.

24–5c Collective Bargaining

If the NLRB certifies the union, the union becomes the exclusive bargaining representative of the workers. The central legal right of a union is to engage in collective bargaining on the members' behalf. Collective bargaining is the process by which labor and management negotiate the terms and conditions of employment, such as wages, benefits, and working conditions. Collective bargaining allows union representatives elected by union members to speak on behalf of the members at the bargaining table.

Collective Bargaining The process by which labor and management negotiate the terms and conditions of employment, including working hours and workplace conditions.

Good Faith Negotiating Once an employer and a union sit down at the conference table, they must negotiate in good faith and make a reasonable effort to come to an agreement. They are not obligated to reach an agreement. They must, however, approach the negotiations with the idea that an agreement is possible. Both parties may engage in hard bargaining, but the bargaining process itself must be geared toward reaching a compromise—not avoiding a compromise.

Although good faith is a matter of subjective intent, a party's actions can be used to evaluate the party's good or bad faith. Excessive delaying tactics may be proof of bad faith, as may insistence on obviously unreasonable contract terms. If an employer (or a union) refuses to bargain in good faith without justification, it has committed an unfair labor practice. Exhibit 24–1 illustrates some differences between good faith and bad faith bargaining.

The Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security Act Designed to mitigate the economic impact of the coronavirus pandemic of 2020, the Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (CARES) Act includes several crucial labor law stipulations.[33] To receive federal stimulus loans under CARES, nonunion mid-sized businesses (having between 500 and 10,000 employees) had to agree not to oppose the unionization of their workforces during the term of the loan. Furthermore, to be eligible for CARES loans, mid-sized businesses had to not "abrogate" (or revoke) existing collective bargaining agreements for the term of the loan plus two years following repayment.

Exhibit 24–1 Good Faith versus Bad Faith in Collective Bargaining

Good Faith Bargaining	Bad Faith Bargaining
1. Negotiating with the belief that an agreement is possible	1. Excessive delaying tactics
2. Seriously considering the other side's positions	2. Insistence on unreasonable contract terms
3. Making reasonable proposals	3. Rejecting a proposal without offering a counterproposal
4. Being willing to compromise	4. Engaging in a campaign among workers to undermine the union
5. Sending bargainers who have the authority to enter into agreements for the company	5. Constantly shifting positions on disputed contract terms
	6. Sending bargainers who lack authority to commit the company to a contract

24–5d Strikes

Strike An action undertaken by unionized workers when collective bargaining fails. The workers leave their jobs, refuse to work, and (typically) picket the employer's workplace.

Even when labor and management have bargained in good faith, they may be unable to reach a final agreement. When extensive collective bargaining has been conducted and an impasse results, the union may call a strike against the employer to pressure it into making concessions.

In a strike, the unionized workers leave their jobs and refuse to work. The workers also typically picket the workplace, standing outside the facility with signs stating their complaints. A strike is an extreme action. Striking workers lose their rights to be paid, and management loses production and may lose customers when orders cannot be filled. Labor law regulates the circumstances and conduct of strikes.

Most strikes take the form of "economic strikes," which are initiated because the union wants a better contract. Example 24.12 Teachers in Eagle Point, Oregon, engage in an economic strike after contract negotiations with the school district fail to bring an agreement on pay, working hours, and subcontracting jobs. The unionized teachers picket outside the Eagle Point school building. Classes are canceled for a few weeks until the district can find substitute teachers who will fill in during the strike. ■

The Right to Strike The right to strike is guaranteed by the NLRA, within limits. In addition, certain strike activities, such as picketing, are protected by the free speech guarantee of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Nonworkers have a right to participate in picketing an employer, and workers have the right to refuse to cross a picket line of fellow workers who are engaged in a lawful strike.

Strikers are not allowed to use (or threaten to use) violence against anyone or to prevent others from entering a facility. Furthermore, a strike may be illegal if it contravenes a no-strike clause that was in the previous collective bargaining agreement between the employer and the union.

After a Strike Ends In a typical strike, the employer has a right to hire permanent replacements during the strike. The employer need not terminate the replacement workers when the economic strikers seek to return to work. In other words, striking workers are not guaranteed the right to return to their jobs after the strike if satisfactory replacement workers have been found.

If the employer has not hired replacement workers to fill the strikers' positions, however, then the employer must rehire the economic strikers to fill any vacancies. Employers may not discriminate against former economic strikers, and those who are rehired retain their seniority rights.

Practice and Review

Rick Saldona began working as a traveling salesperson for Aimer Winery in 2009. Sales constituted 90 percent of Saldona's work time. Saldona worked an average of fifty hours per week but received no overtime pay. In June 2019, Saldona's new supervisor, Caesar Braxton, claimed that Saldona had been inflating his reported sales calls and required Saldona to submit to a polygraph test. Saldona reported Braxton to the U.S. Department of Labor, which prohibited Aimer from requiring Saldona to take a polygraph test for this purpose. In August 2019, Saldona's wife, Venita, fell from a ladder and sustained a head injury while employed as a full-time agricultural harvester. Saldona delivered to Aimer's human resources department a letter from his wife's physician indicating that she would need daily care for several months, and Saldona took leave until December 2019. Aimer had sixty-three employees at that time. When Saldona returned to Aimer, he was informed that his position had been eliminated because his sales territory had been combined with an adjacent territory. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Saldona have been legally entitled to receive overtime pay at a higher rate? Why or why not?
2. What is the maximum length of time Saldona would have been allowed to take leave to care for his injured spouse?
3. Under what circumstances would Aimer have been allowed to require an employee to take a lie-detector test?
4. Would Aimer likely be able to avoid reinstating Saldona under the key employee exception? Why or why not?

Debate This

The U.S. labor market is highly competitive, so state and federal laws that require overtime pay are unnecessary and should be abolished.

Employment at Will	Under this common law doctrine, either party may terminate the employment relationship at any time and for any reason ("at will"). 1. Exceptions to the employment-at-will doctrine—Courts have made exceptions to the doctrine on the basis of contract theory, tort theory, and public policy. The public policy exception may sometimes apply to whistleblowers. 2. Wrongful discharge—Whenever an employer discharges an employee in violation of an employment contract or statutory law protecting employees, the employee may bring a suit for wrongful discharge.

Wages, Hours, and Leave	1. Davis-Bacon Act—Requires contractors and subcontractors working on federal government construction projects to pay their employees "prevailing wages." 2. Walsh-Healey Act—Requires firms that contract with federal agencies to pay their employees a minimum wage and overtime pay. 3. Fair Labor Standards Act—Extended wage and hour requirements to cover all employers whose activities affect interstate commerce plus certain other businesses. The act has specific requirements in regard to child labor, maximum hours, minimum wages, and overtime. 4. The Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA)—Requires employers with fifty or more employees to provide employees with up to twelve weeks of unpaid leave (twenty-six weeks for military caregiver leave) during any twelve-month period. An eligible employee: a. May take family leave to care for a newborn baby, an adopted child, or a foster child. b. May take medical leave when the employee or the employee's spouse, child, or parent has a serious health condition requiring care. c. May take military caregiver leave to care for a family member with a serious injury or illness incurred as a result of military duty. d. May take qualifying exigency leave to handle specified nonmedical emergencies when a spouse, parent, or child is in, or called to, active military duty
Health, Safety, Income Security, and Privacy	1. Occupational Safety and Health Act—Requires employers to meet specific safety and health standards that are established and enforced by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). 2. State workers' compensation laws—Establish an administrative procedure for compensating workers who are injured in accidents that occur on the job, regardless of fault. 3. Social Security and Medicare—The Social Security Act provides for old-age (retirement), survivors', and disability insurance. Both employers and employees must make contributions under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (FICA). The Social Security Administration also administers Medicare, a health insurance program for older or disabled persons. 4. Private retirement plans—The federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) establishes standards for the management of employer-provided pension plans. 5. Unemployment insurance—The Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA) created a system that provides unemployment compensation to eligible individuals. Employers are taxed to cover the costs. 6. COBRA—The Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (COBRA) requires employers to give employees, on termination of employment, the option of continuing their medical, optical, or dental insurance coverage for a certain period at their own expense. 7. HIPAA—The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) establishes requirements for employer-sponsored group health plans. The plans must also comply with various safeguards to ensure the privacy of employees' health information. 8. Affordable Care Act—The Affordable Care Act requires most employers with fifty or more full-time employees to offer health insurance benefits. It also provides tax credits to employers who provide benefits even if they are not required to do so. 9. Employee privacy rights—Tort law, state constitutions, and federal and state statutes, as well as the U.S. Constitution, provide some protection for employees' privacy rights. Employer practices that have been challenged by employees as violations of their privacy rights include electronic monitoring, lie-detector tests, and drug testing.
Immigration Law	1. Immigration Reform and Control Act—Prohibits employers from hiring illegal immigrants. The act is administered by U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. Compliance audits and enforcement actions are conducted by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. 2. Immigration Act—Limits the number of legal immigrants entering the United States by capping the number of visas (entry permits) that are issued each year.

Labor Law	1. Federal labor laws— a. Norris-LaGuardia Act—Protects peaceful strikes, picketing, and boycotts. b. National Labor Relations Act—Established the rights of employees to engage in collective bargaining and to strike. It also defined specific employer practices as unfair to labor. The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) was created to administer and enforce the act. c. Labor Management Relations Act—Proscribes certain unfair union practices, such as the closed shop. d. Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act—Established an employee bill of rights and reporting requirements for union activities. 2. Union organization—Union campaign activities and elections must comply with the requirements established by federal labor laws and the NLRB. 3. Collective bargaining—The process by which labor and management negotiate the terms and conditions of employment (such as wages, benefits, and working conditions). The central legal right of a labor union is to engage in collective bargaining on the members' behalf. 4. Strikes—When collective bargaining reaches an impasse, union members may use their ultimate weapon in labor-management struggles—the strike. A strike occurs when unionized workers leave their jobs, refuse to work, and typically picket the employer's workplace.

1. Erin, an employee of Fine Print Shop, is injured on the job. For Erin to obtain workers' compensation, does her injury have to have been caused by Fine Print's negligence? Does it matter whether the action causing the injury was intentional? Explain. (See Health, Safety, Income Security, and Privacy.)
2. Onyx applies for work with Precision Design Company, which tells her that it requires union membership as a condition of employment. She applies for work with Quality Engineering, Inc., which does not require union membership as a condition of employment but requires employees to join a union after six months on the job. Are these conditions legal? Why or why not? (See Labor Law.)

24–1. Unfair Labor Practices. Consolidated Stores is undergoing a unionization campaign. Prior to the union election, management states that the union is unnecessary to protect workers. Management also provides bonuses and wage increases to the workers during this period. The employees reject the union. Union organizers protest that the wage increases during the election campaign unfairly prejudiced the vote. Should these wage increases be regarded as an unfair labor practice? Discuss. (See Labor Law.)

24–2. Wrongful Discharge. Denton and Carlo were employed at an appliance plant. Their job required them to do occasional maintenance work while standing on a wire mesh twenty feet above the plant floor. Other employees had fallen through the mesh, and one was killed by the fall. When Denton and Carlo were asked by their supervisor to do work that would likely require them to walk on the mesh, they refused due to their fear of bodily harm or death. Because of their refusal to do the requested work, the two employees were fired. Was their discharge wrongful? If so, under what federal employment law? To what federal agency or department should they turn for assistance? (See Employment at Will.)

24–3. Exceptions to the Employment-at-Will Doctrine. Li Li worked for Packard Bioscience, and Mark Schmeizl was her supervisor. In March 2000, Schmeizl told Li Li to call Packard's competitors, pretend to be a potential customer, and request "pricing information and literature." Li Li refused to perform the assignment. She told Schmeizl that she thought the work was illegal and recommended that he contact Packard's legal department. Although a lawyer recommended against the practice, Schmeizl insisted that Li Li perform the calls. Moreover, he later wrote negative performance reviews because she was unable to get the requested information when she called competitors and identified herself as a Packard employee. On June 1, 2000, Li Li was terminated on Schmeizl's recommendation.

Can Li Li bring a claim for wrongful discharge? Why or why not? [Li Li v. Canberra Industries, 134 Conn.App. 448, 39 A.3d 789 (2012)] (See Employment at Will.)

24–4. Collective Bargaining. SDBC Holdings, Inc., acquired Stella D'oro Biscuit Co., a bakery in New York City. At the time, a collective bargaining agreement existed between Stella D'oro and Local 50 of the Bakery, Confectionary, Tobacco Workers and Grain Millers International Union. During negotiations to renew the agreement, Stella D'oro allowed Local 50 to examine and take notes on the company's financial statement but would not give Local 50 a copy of the statement. Did Stella D'oro engage in an unfair labor practice? Discuss. [SDBC Holdings, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 711 F.3d 281 (2d Cir. 2013)] (See Labor Law.)

24–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Unemployment Compensation. Fior Ramirez worked as a housekeeper for Remington Lodging & Hospitality, a hotel in Atlantic Beach, Florida. After her father in the Dominican Republic suffered a stroke, she asked her employer for time off to be with him. Ramirez's manager, Katie Berkowski, refused the request. Two days later, Berkowski received a call from Ramirez to say that she was with her father. He died about a week later, and Ramirez returned to work, but Berkowski told her that she had abandoned her position. Ramirez applied for unemployment compensation. Under the applicable state statute, "an employee is disqualified from receiving benefits if he or she voluntarily left work without good cause." Does Ramirez qualify for benefits? Explain. [Ramirez v. Reemployment Assistance Appeals Commission, 135 So.3d 408 (Fla.App. 1 Dist. 2014)] (See Health, Safety, Income Security, and Privacy.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 24–5, go to Appendix E.

24–6. Labor Unions. Carol Garcia and Pedro Salgado, bus drivers for Latino Express, Inc., a transportation company, began soliciting signatures from other drivers to certify the Teamsters Local Union No. 777 as the official representative of the employees. Latino Express fired Garcia and Salgado. The two drivers filed a claim with the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) alleging that the employer had committed an unfair labor practice. Which employer practice defined by the National Labor Relations Act did the plaintiffs most likely charge Latino Express with committing? Is the employer's discharge of Garcia and Salgado likely to be construed as a legitimate act in opposition to union solicitation? If a violation is found, what can the NLRB do? Discuss. [Ohr v. Latino Express, Inc., 776 F.3d 469 (7th Cir. 2015)] (See Labor Law.)

24–7. Income Security. Jefferson Partners LP entered into a collective bargaining agreement (CBA) with the Amalgamated Transit Union. Under the CBA, drivers had to either join the union or pay a fair share—85 percent—of union dues, which were used to pay for administrative costs incurred by the union. An employee who refused to pay was subject to discharge. Jefferson hired Tiffany Thompson to work as a bus driver. When told of the CBA requirement, she said that she thought it was unfair. She asserted that it was illegal to compel her to join the union and that it would be illegal to discharge her for not complying. She refused either to join the union or to pay the dues. More than two years later, she was fired on the ground that her continued refusal constituted misconduct. Is Thompson eligible for unemployment compensation? Explain. [Thompson v. Jefferson Partners LP, 2016 WL 953038 (Minn. App. 2016)] (See Health, Safety, Income Security, and Privacy.)

24–8. Family and Medical Leave. To qualify for leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA), an employee must comply with the employer's usual and customary notice requirements, including call-in policies. Robert Stein, an employee of Atlas Industries, Inc., suffered a knee injury at work. Stein took medical leave to have surgery on the knee. Ten weeks into his recovery, Stein's doctor notified Atlas that Stein could return to work with light-duty restrictions in two days. Stein, however, thought he was on leave for several more weeks. Atlas company policy provided that employees who missed three workdays without notification were subject to automatic termination. Stein did not return to work or call in as Atlas expected. Four days later, he was fired. Did Stein's discharge violate the FMLA? Discuss. [Stein v. Atlas Industries, Inc., 730 Fed.Appx. 313, (6th Cir. 2018)] (See Wages, Hours, and Leave.)

24–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Immigration Law. Split Rail Fence Company sells and installs fencing materials in Colorado. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) sent Split Rail a list of the company's employees whose documentation did not satisfy the Form I-9 employment eligibility verification requirements. The list included long-term workers who had been involved in company activities, parties, and picnics. They had bank accounts, driver's licenses, cars, homes, and mortgages. At Split Rail's request, the employees orally verified that they were eligible to work in the United States. Unwilling to accept the oral verifications, ICE filed a complaint against Split Rail for its continued employment of the individuals. [Split Rail Fence Co. v. United States, 852 F.3d 1228 (10th Cir. 2017)] (See Immigration Law.)

1. Using the IDDR approach, identify Split Rail's ethical dilemma. What steps might the company take to resolve it? Explain.
2. Is penalizing employers the best approach to take in attempting to curb illegal immigration? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

24–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Immigration.

Nicole Tipton and Sadik Seferi owned and operated a restaurant in Iowa. Acting on a tip from the local police, agents of Immigration and Customs Enforcement executed search warrants at the restaurant and at an apartment where some restaurant workers lived. The agents discovered six undocumented aliens working at the restaurant and living together. When the I-9 forms for the restaurant's employees were reviewed, none were found for the six aliens. They were paid in cash while other employees were paid by check. Tipton and Seferi were charged with hiring and harboring illegal aliens. (See Immigration Law.)

1. The first group will develop an argument that Tipton and Seferi were guilty of hiring and harboring illegal aliens.
2. The second group will assess whether Tipton and Seferi can assert a defense by claiming that they did not know that the workers were unauthorized aliens.
3. The third group will determine the potential penalties that Tipton and Seferi could face for violating the Immigration Reform and Control Act by hiring six unauthorized workers.

25 Employment Discrimination

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is required to establish a prima facie case of disparate-treatment discrimination?
2. What is a constructive discharge? To which employment discrimination claims does the theory of constructive discharge apply?
3. What federal act prohibits discrimination based on age?
4. What are three defenses to claims of employment discrimination?
5. Why are affirmative action programs often found to be unconstitutional?

"Equal rights for all, special privileges for none."

Thomas Jefferson
1743–1826

Out of the civil rights movement of the 1960s grew a body of law protecting employees against discrimination in the workplace. Legislation, judicial decisions, and administrative agency actions restrict employers from discriminating against workers on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, age, disability, or military status. A class of persons defined by one or more of these criteria is known as a protected class. The laws designed to protect these individuals embody the sentiment expressed by Thomas Jefferson in the chapter-opening quotation.

Suppose that Ellie, a manager at a large accounting firm, is up for promotion. Ellie's job performance reviews were uniformly positive, with one superior calling her an "outstanding professional" with "strong character and integrity." Furthermore, Ellie has recently played a key role in the firm's winning a multi-million-dollar contract with a local professional sports team.

After failing to get the promotion, Ellie learns that she is not popular among some of her coworkers. Specifically, Ellie discovers a series of memos in which the firm's male partners complain that she is too "manly" and needs "a "course at charm school." One partner writes that, to get promoted, Ellie would need to "walk, talk, and dress more femininely and wear make-up." Can Ellie sue for employment discrimination? Are the memos sufficient evidence to prove that she was not promoted because of her gender? These are some of the questions that will be answered in this chapter.

Several federal statutes prohibit employment discrimination against members of protected classes. Although this chapter focuses on federal statutes, many states have their own laws that protect employees against discrimination, and some provide more protection to employees than federal laws do.

25–1 Title VII of the Civil Rights Act

Protected Class A group of persons protected by specific laws because of the group's defining characteristics, including race, color, religion, national origin, gender sexual orientation, age, disability, and military status.

The most important statute covering employment discrimination is Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.[1] Title VII prohibits discrimination against employees, applicants, and union members on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, gender, or sexual orientation at any stage of employment.

Title VII applies to employers with fifteen or more employees and labor unions with fifteen or more members. Title VII also applies to employment agencies, state and local governing units or agencies, and labor unions that operate hiring halls (where members go regularly to be assigned jobs as they become available). A special section of the act prohibits discrimination in most federal government employment. When Title VII applies to an employer, any employee—including an undocumented (alien) worker—can bring an action for employment discrimination.

25–1a The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

Compliance with Title VII is monitored by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). A victim of alleged discrimination must file a claim with the EEOC before bringing a suit against the employer. The EEOC may investigate the dispute and attempt to arrange an out-of-court settlement. If a voluntary agreement cannot be reached, the EEOC may file a suit against the employer on the employee's behalf.

Example 25.1 Luis, who is of Puerto Rican heritage, gets a job at an Allison's grocery store in San Diego. A training video instructs employees not to speak Spanish if there is a nonSpanish-speaking customer present. On his third day at Allison's, Luis is reprimanded by a supervisor for speaking Spanish to a Latino customer. Later, Luis is prohibited from speaking Spanish with his coworkers during breaks. He is also harassed by other employees for speaking Spanish at any time.

Luis files a claim with the EEOC because of this treatment. In turn, the EEOC sues Allison's, alleging that its enforcement of an unwritten, blanket "speak-English-only" policy is a form of national origin discrimination under Title VII. ■

What action can supermarket employees take if they feel they are being discriminated against based on their national origin?

If the EEOC decides not to investigate the claim, the EEOC issues a "right to sue" that allows the victim to bring a personal lawsuit against the employer. The EEOC does not investigate every claim of employment discrimination, regardless of the merits of the claim. Generally, it investigates only "priority cases," such as cases involving retaliatory discharge (firing an employee in retaliation for submitting a claim to the EEOC) and cases involving types of discrimination that are of particular concern to the EEOC.

25–1b Limitations on Class Actions

The United States Supreme Court issued an important decision that limited the rights of employees—as a group, or class—to bring discrimination claims against their employer. The Court held that to bring a class action, employees must prove a company-wide policy of discrimination that had a common effect on all the plaintiffs covered by the action.[2]

25–1c Intentional and Unintentional Discrimination

Title VII prohibits both intentional and unintentional discrimination.

Intentional Discrimination Intentional discrimination by an employer against an employee is known as disparate-treatment discrimination. Because intent can be difficult to prove, courts have established certain procedures for resolving disparate-treatment cases.

Disparate-Treatment Discrimination A form of employment discrimination that results when an employer intentionally discriminates against employees who are members of protected classes.

A plaintiff who sues on the basis of disparate-treatment discrimination in hiring must first make out a prima facie* case. Prima facie is Latin for "at first sight." Legally, it refers to a fact that is presumed to be true unless contradicted by evidence.

Prima Facie* Case A case in which the plaintiff has produced sufficient evidence of a claim that the case will be decided for the plaintiff unless the defendant produces evidence to rebut the claim.

Establishing a* Prima Facie *Case. To establish a prima facie case of disparate-treatment discrimination in hiring, a plaintiff must show all of the following:

1. The plaintiff is a member of a protected class.
2. The plaintiff applied and was qualified for the job in question.
3. The plaintiff was rejected by the employer.
4. The employer continued to seek applicants for the position or filled the position with a person not in a protected class.

Focus Question 1

What is required to establish a prima facie case of disparate-treatment discrimination?

A plaintiff who can meet these relatively easy requirements has made out a prima facie case of illegal discrimination and will win in the absence of a legally acceptable employer defense.

Sometimes, a current or former employee makes a claim of discrimination. When the plaintiff alleges that the employer fired or took some other adverse employment action against him or her, the same basic requirements apply. To establish a prima facie case, the plaintiff must show that the firing or adverse treatment was based on discriminatory reasons.

Burden-Shifting Procedure. Once a prima facie case has been established, the burden then shifts to the employer-defendant, who must articulate a legal reason for not hiring the plaintiff or for taking some other adverse employment action. If the employer did not have a legal reason for taking the action, the plaintiff wins.

If the employer can articulate a legitimate reason for the action, the burden shifts back to the plaintiff. To prevail, the plaintiff must then show that the employer's reason is a pretext (not the true reason) and that the employer's decision was actually motivated by discriminatory intent.

Unintentional Discrimination Employers often use interviews and tests to choose among a large number of applicants for job openings. Minimum educational requirements are also common. These practices and procedures may have an unintended discriminatory impact on a protected class. Disparate-impact discrimination occurs when a protected group is adversely affected by an employer's practices, procedures, or tests, even though they may not appear to be discriminatory.

Disparate-Impact Discrimination Discrimination that results from certain employer practices or procedures that, although not discriminatory on their face, have a discriminatory effect.

In a disparate-impact discrimination case, the complaining party must first show statistically that the employer's practices, procedures, or tests are discriminatory in effect. Once the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show that the practices or procedures in question were justified.

There are two ways of showing that an employer's practices, procedures, or tests are effectively discriminatory—that is, that disparate-impact discrimination exists. These involve the pool of applicants and the rate of hiring.

Pool of Applicants. A plaintiff can prove a disparate impact by comparing the employer's workforce with the pool of qualified individuals available in the local labor market. The plaintiff must show that (1) as a result of educational or other job requirements or hiring procedures, (2) the percentage of nonwhites, women, or members of other protected classes in the employer's workforce (3) does not reflect the percentage of that group in the pool of qualified applicants. A plaintiff who can show a connection between the practice and the disparity has made out a prima facie case and need not provide evidence of discriminatory intent.

Rate of Hiring. A plaintiff can also prove disparate-impact discrimination by comparing the employer's selection rates of members and nonmembers of a protected class (for instance, whites and nonwhites). When a job requirement or hiring procedure excludes members of a protected class from an employer's workforce at a substantially higher rate than nonmembers, discrimination occurs, regardless of the balance in the employer's workforce.

The EEOC has devised a test, called the "four-fifths rule," to determine whether an employment selection procedure is discriminatory on its face. Under this rule, a selection rate for protected classes that is less than four-fifths, or 80 percent, of the rate for the group with the highest rate generally is regarded as evidence of disparate impact.

Example 25.2 Shady Cove District Fire Department administers an exam to applicants for the position of firefighter. At the exam session, one hundred white applicants take the test, and fifty pass and are hired. At the same exam session, sixty minority applicants take the test, but only twelve pass and are hired. Because twelve is less than four-fifths (80 percent) of fifty, the test will be considered discriminatory under the EEOC guidelines.

How might the "four-fifths rule" apply to the results of a fire department's entrance exam?

25–1d Discrimination Based on Race, Color, and National Origin

Title VII prohibits employers from discriminating against employees or job applicants on the basis of race, color, or national origin. If an employer's standards for selecting or promoting employees have a discriminatory effect on job applicants or employees in these protected classes, then a presumption of illegal discrimination arises. To avoid liability, the employer must then show that its standards have a substantial, demonstrable relationship to realistic qualifications for the job in question.

Example 25.3 Hai is an instructor at a university in Arkansas. When the university terminates his employment and hires a white male instructor, he files a lawsuit for employment discrimination. Hai is able to make out a prima facie case of discrimination because he (1) is a member of a protected class, (2) is qualified for the job, (3) suffered an adverse employment action, and (4) was replaced by a non-Asian instructor.

Nonetheless, the university can avoid liability for discrimination by showing that it discharged Hai for legitimate and nondiscriminatory reasons. For example, if Hai was terminated because he had argued with a university vice president and refused to comply with her instructions, the university is not liable for unlawful discrimination.

Reverse Discrimination Note that discrimination based on race can also take the form of reverse discrimination, or discrimination against "majority" individuals, such as white males.

Case Example 25.4 Montana's Department of Transportation receives federal funds for transportation projects. As a condition of receiving the funds, Montana was required to set up a program to avoid discrimination in awarding contracts to disadvantaged business enterprises (DBEs). DBEs are businesses owned by members of historically disadvantaged groups, such as minorities. Mountain West Holding Company, Inc., installs signs, guardrails, and concrete barriers on highways in Montana and competes against DBEs for contracts.

Mountain West sued the state in federal court for violating Title VII by giving preference to the DBEs. At trial, the court pointed out that any classifications based on race are permissible "only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests." Montana thus had the burden of showing that its DBE program met this requirement. To show that the program addressed actual discrimination, the state presented a study that reported disparities in state-awarded contracts and provided anecdotal evidence of a "good ole' boys" network within the state's contracting industry. The district court accepted this evidence and concluded that Montana had satisfied its burden. A federal appellate court reversed, finding that the evidence was insufficient to prove a history of discrimination that would justify the preferences given to DBEs.[3]

Potential Section 1981 Claims Victims of racial or ethnic discrimination may also have a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1981. This section, which was enacted in 1866 to protect the rights of freed slaves, prohibits discrimination on the basis of race or ethnicity in the formation or enforcement of contracts. Because employment is often a contractual relationship, Section 1981 can provide an alternative basis for a plaintiff's action and is potentially advantageous because it does not place a cap on damages. (There is a cap placed on Title VII damages from small employers, as will be discussed later.)

25–1e Discrimination Based on Religion

Title VII also prohibits government employers, private employers, and unions from discriminating against persons because of their religion. (This chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature discusses how employers who examine prospective employees' social media posts, including posts concerning religion, might engage in unlawful discrimination.)

Employers cannot treat their employees more or less favorably based on the employees' religious beliefs or practices and cannot require employees to participate in any religious activity (or forbid them from participating in one). Example 25.5 Jason, a salesperson for TC Chevy, does not attend the weekly prayer meetings of dealership employees for several months. Then he is discharged by his employer. If Jason can show that the dealership required its employees to attend prayer gatherings and fired him for not attending, he has a valid claim of religious discrimination.

Reasonable Accommodation An employer must "reasonably accommodate" the religious practices of its employees, unless to do so would cause undue hardship to the employer's business. This means that an employer may need to make reasonable adjustments to the work environment to allow employees to practice their religion. Reasonable accommodation is required even if an employee's belief is not based on the doctrines of a traditionally recognized religion, such as Christianity or Judaism, or a particular denomination, such as Baptist. The only requirement is that the belief be sincerely held by the employee.

Why is it likely that a hairdresser who is fired for taking a day off on a major Jewish holiday will succeed in a religious discrimination lawsuit against her former employer?

Example 25.6 Tomilina, who is Jewish, works as a hairdresser for Sally's Salon. Two weeks before Yom Kippur, Tomilina asks Sally if she can have a day off on the important Jewish holiday, which always falls on a Saturday. Sally denies the request. Tomilina fails to show up for work on Yom Kippur, and Sally fires her.

When Tomilina sues Sally for religious discrimination, Sally presents two defenses. First, reasonably accommodating Tomilina's request would cause undue hardship, because Saturday is the salon's busiest day of the week, and Sally needs all her employees serving customers. Second, Tomilina is not a religious person, and the day off was really for personal reasons. If Tomilina can show that (a) she was able to reschedule her Saturday appointments, and (b) her religious beliefs are sincere, then she will most likely prevail in her Title VII suit against Sally.

Hiring Discrimination Based on Social Media Posts

Human resource officers in most companies routinely check job candidates' social media posts when deciding whom to hire. Certainly, every young person is warned not to post photos that they might later regret having made available to potential employers. But a more serious issue involves standard reviewing of job candidates' social media information. Specifically, do employers discriminate based on such information?

An Experiment in Hiring Discrimination via Online Social Networks

Two researchers at Carnegie-Mellon University conducted an experiment to determine whether social media information posted by prospective employees influences employers' hiring decisions.[a] The researchers created false résumés and social media profiles. They submitted job applications on behalf of the fictional "candidates" to about four thousand U.S. employers. They then compared employers' responses to different groups—for instance, to Muslim candidates versus Christian candidates.

The researchers found that candidates whose public profiles indicated that they were Muslim were less likely to be called for interviews than Christian applicants. The difference was particularly pronounced in parts of the country with more conservative residents. In those locations, Muslims received callbacks only 2 percent of the time, compared with 17 percent for Christian applicants. According to the authors of the study, "Hiring discrimination via online searches of candidates may not be widespread, but online disclosures of personal traits can significantly influence the hiring decisions of a self-selected set of employers."

Job Candidates' Perception of the Hiring Process

Job candidates frequently view the hiring process as unfair when they know that their social media profiles have been used in the selection process. This perception may make litigation more likely. Nevertheless, 70 percent of employers report using social media to recruit job applicants. More than half of those who recruit in this manner admit that they have disqualified applicants based on content found in their social media accounts.[b]

The EEOC Speaks Up

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) has investigated how prospective employers can use social media to engage in discrimination in the hiring process. Given that the Society for Human Resource Management estimates that more than three-fourths of its members use social media in their employment screening process, the EEOC is interested in regulating this procedure.

Social media sites, examined closely, can provide information to a prospective employer on the applicant's race, color, national origin, disability, religion, and other protected characteristics. The EEOC has reminded employers that such information—whether it comes from social media postings or other sources—may not legally be used to make employment decisions on prohibited bases, such as race, gender, sexual orientation and religion.

Critical Thinking

Can you think of a way a company could use information from an applicant's social media posts without running the risk of being accused of hiring discrimination?

Undue Hardship As mentioned, an employer is not required to make an accommodation that would cause the employer undue hardship. A reasonable attempt to accommodate does not necessarily require the employer to make every change an employee requests or to make a permanent change for an employee's benefit.

Case Example 25.7 Leontine K. Robinson worked as an administrative assistant in the emergency department at the Children's Hospital Boston. The hospital started requiring all employees who worked in or had access to patient-care areas to receive the influenza (flu) vaccine. When Robinson (who had previously received a tetanus vaccine) refused to get the flu vaccine based on her religious beliefs, the hospital terminated her employment. Robinson filed a lawsuit alleging religious discrimination. The hospital argued that allowing Robinson to keep her patient-care position without receiving the vaccine would create an undue hardship. The court agreed and granted a summary judgment for the hospital.[4]

25–1f Discrimination Based on Gender

Under Title VII, as well as other federal acts, employers are forbidden from discriminating against employees on the basis of gender. Employers are prohibited from classifying jobs as male or female and from advertising positions as male or female unless they can prove that the gender of the applicant is essential to the job. In addition, employers cannot have separate male and female seniority lists and cannot refuse to promote employees based on gender.

Gender Must Be a Determining Factor Generally, to succeed in a suit for gender discrimination, a plaintiff must demonstrate that gender was a determining factor in the employer's decision to fire or refuse to hire or promote her or him. Typically, this involves looking at all of the surrounding circumstances.

Case Example 25.8 Evangeline Parker received multiple promotions at Reema Consulting Services, Inc. (RCSI). In response, a jealous coworker told other employees that Parker had been promoted because she was having sex with a superior. After this false rumor spread, Parker was informed that she had become ineligible for further advancement and was blamed for "bringing the situation to the workplace."

A trial court barred Parker's gender discrimination lawsuit, finding that RCSI's actions, while reprehensible, were based on her alleged conduct (the affair with her superior), not her gender. A federal appeals court disagreed, emphasizing the continuing power of the cultural stereotype that women use sex to achieve success in the business world. This same stereotype does not apply to successful men. Therefore, the court ruled, gender was a possible determining factor in RCSI's conduct toward Parker, and her lawsuit could proceed.[5]

Pregnancy Discrimination The Pregnancy Discrimination Act[6] expanded Title VII's definition of gender discrimination to include discrimination based on pregnancy. Women affected by pregnancy, childbirth, or related medical conditions must be treated the same as other persons not so affected but similar in ability to work. For instance, an employer cannot discriminate against a pregnant woman by withholding benefits available to others under employee benefit programs.

An employer is required to reasonably accommodate a worker who is pregnant. In the following case, an employer accommodated many of its employees who had lifting restrictions due to disabilities. The employer refused to accommodate a pregnant employee with a similar restriction. Did this refusal constitute a violation of the Pregnancy Discrimination Act?

Young v. United Parcel Service, Inc.

United States Supreme Court, 575 U.S. 206, 135 S.Ct. 1338 191 L.Ed.2d 279 (2015).

Facts Peggy Young was a driver for United Parcel Service, Inc. (UPS). When she became pregnant, her doctor advised her not to lift more than twenty pounds. UPS required drivers to lift up to seventy pounds and told Young that she could not work under a lifting restriction. She filed a suit in a federal district court against UPS, claiming an unlawful refusal to accommodate her pregnancy-related lifting restriction.

Is UPS required to offer a pregnant employee a less physically demanding job?

Juanmonino/iStock Unreleased/Getty Images

Young alleged that UPS had multiple light-duty-for-injury categories to accommodate individuals whose non-pregnancy-related disabilities created work restrictions similar to hers. UPS responded that, because Young did not fall into any of those categories, it had not discriminated against her. The court issued a summary judgment in UPS's favor. The U.S. Court of Appeals of the Fourth Circuit affirmed the judgment. Young appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Did Young create a genuine dispute as to whether UPS provided more favorable treatment to employees whose situation could not reasonably be distinguished from hers?

Decision Yes. The United States Supreme Court vacated the judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit and remanded the case for further proceedings. On remand, the court must also determine whether Young created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether UPS's stated reasons for treating Young less favorably were a pretext (false reason).

Reason In an action under the Pregnancy Discrimination Act, a plaintiff must show that the employer's policies impose a significant burden on pregnant employees. Thus, to create a genuine issue of material fact in this case, the plaintiff needs to provide evidence that the employer accommodates nonpregnant workers while failing to accommodate pregnant workers.

If Young's allegations are true, she can show that UPS accommodates nonpregnant employees with lifting restrictions and does not accommodate pregnant employees with similar limitations. This showing would establish a prima facie case of disparate treatment. In response to UPS's defense, Young can point out the fact that the employer has multiple policies to accommodate nonpregnant employees with lifting restrictions. This fact might suggest that UPS's reasons for not accommodating pregnant employees with lifting restrictions are weak—"to the point that a jury could find that its reasons for failing to accommodate pregnant employees give rise to an inference of intentional discrimination."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Could UPS have succeeded in this case if it had claimed simply that it would be more expensive or less convenient to include pregnant women among those whom it accommodates? Explain.

Protections Extend to Employees' Post-Pregnancy. An employer must continue to reasonably accommodate medical conditions of an employee related to pregnancy and childbirth, even after the pregnancy has ended. Case Example 25.9 Professional Ambulance, LLC, hired Allison Mayer as an emergency medical technician (EMT) while she was still breastfeeding an infant. She was supposed to work three twelve-hour shifts a week, but Professional did not provide her with a schedule so that she could arrange child care. Mayer informed Professional that she needed to take short breaks to use a pump to express breast milk (lactation breaks). At first, her supervisor told her to take these breaks in the restroom, but Mayer objected because the conditions were unsanitary. Then the employer made Mayer take lactation breaks in an office that was not private or secure and made Mayer uncomfortable because the male EMTs could hear her pumping.

A few weeks later, Professional fired Mayer, claiming that it was because other employees had complained about her being rude and abusive. The employer refused to provide her with further explanation and replaced her with a male EMT with fewer qualifications. Mayer sued. A federal district court found that Mayer had established a prima facie case of discrimination on the basis of pregnancy, childbirth, or related medical conditions.[7]

Wage Discrimination The Equal Pay Act[8] requires equal pay for male and female employees doing similar work at the same establishment. To determine whether the Equal Pay Act has been violated, a court will look to the primary duties of the two jobs—the job content rather than the job description controls. If the wage differential is due to "any factor other than gender," such as a seniority or merit system, then it does not violate the Equal Pay Act.

The Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act[9] made discriminatory wages actionable under federal law regardless of when the discrimination began. Previously, plaintiffs had had to file a complaint within a limited time period. Today, if a plaintiff continues to work for the employer while receiving discriminatory wages, the time period for filing a complaint is basically unlimited.

If a hospital does not hire a physician because she identifies as a transgender woman, has the hospital violated Title VII?

Discrimination against Transgender Persons In the past, most courts held that federal law (Title VII) does not protect transgender persons from discrimination. Until 2020, federal courts started interpreting Title VII as applicable to discrimination because of sexual orientation.

Case Example 25.10 Dr. Deborah Fabian applied for a position as an on-call orthopedic surgeon at the Hospital of Central Connecticut. The hospital apparently declined to hire Fabian because she disclosed her identity as a transgender woman. Fabian sued the hospital alleging violations of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and the Connecticut Fair Employment Practices Act (CFEPA).

The hospital filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that neither Title VII nor the Connecticut statute prohibits discrimination on the basis of transgender identity. The federal district court rejected this argument, however, finding that discrimination on the basis of transgender identity is discrimination on the basis of gender for Title VII purposes. Fabian was entitled to take her case to a jury and to argue violations of Title VII and the CFEPA.[10]

The Supreme Court on June 15, 2020, in the case Bostock v. Clayton County (combined with two other cases), ruled that an employer who fires an individual merely for being gay, lesbian, or transgender violates Title VII. In other words, adverse employment decisions based on gender identity are necessarily a form of gender discrimination and therefore illegal.

Should corporations regulate pronoun use in the workplace?

The former Nike employee, Jazz Lyles, self-identifies as transmasculine and chooses to be referred to by the pronouns they/them/their. After being repeatedly "misgendered," or denied a preferred gender identity, by coworkers, Lyles left Nike and filed a $1.1 million discrimination lawsuit against the company. Could this situation have been avoided? Along with society at large, corporate America is being asked by many transgender and gender-nonconforming individuals to use pronouns other than he/him/his or she/her/hers. When this doesn't happen, according to one employment attorney, bias takes place in the form of "disbelief, disregard, and disrespect."

For many years prior to 2020, federal law was unsettled concerning the applicability of Title VII to gender identity. As a result, employers were often at a loss for guidance when it came to resolving these disputes, particularly when one employee's religious beliefs clashed with another's gender identity requirements. A solution favored by many human resources experts was a workplace policy based on the concept of respect. That is, employees did not have to "embrace or value" a colleague's choice of pronoun use, but they did have to respect it.

25–1g Constructive Discharge

Constructive Discharge A termination of employment brought about by making the employee's working conditions so intolerable that the employee reasonably feels compelled to leave.

The majority of Title VII complaints involve unlawful discrimination in decisions to hire or fire employees. In some situations, however, employees who leave their jobs voluntarily can claim that they were "constructively discharged" by the employer. Constructive discharge occurs when the employer causes the employee's working conditions to be so intolerable that a reasonable person in the employee's position would feel compelled to quit.

When constructive discharge is claimed, the employee can pursue damages for loss of income, including back pay. These damages ordinarily are not available to an employee who left a job voluntarily.

Proving Constructive Discharge To prove constructive discharge, an employee must present objective proof of intolerable working conditions. The employee must also show that the employer knew or had reason to know about the conditions, yet failed to correct them within a reasonable period. In addition, courts generally require the employee to show causation—that the employer's unlawful discrimination caused the working conditions to be intolerable. Put in a different way, the employee's resignation must be a foreseeable result of the employer's discriminatory action. Courts weigh the facts on a case-by-case basis.

What is a constructive discharge? To which employment discrimination claims does the theory of constructive discharge apply?

Employee demotion is one of the most frequently cited reasons for a finding of constructive discharge, particularly when the employee was subjected to humiliation. Example 25.11 Khalil's employer humiliates him in front of his coworkers by informing him that he is being demoted to an inferior position. Khalil's coworkers continually insult and harass him about his national origin (he is from Iran). The employer is aware of this discriminatory treatment but does nothing to remedy the situation, despite repeated complaints from Khalil. After several months, Khalil quits his job and files a Title VII claim. In this situation, Khalil would likely have sufficient evidence to maintain an action for constructive discharge in violation of Title VII.

Constructive Discharge Applies to All Title VII Discrimination Note that constructive discharge is a theory that plaintiffs can use to establish any type of discrimination claims under Title VII, including race, color, national origin, religion, gender, and sexual orientation. It is most commonly asserted in cases involving sexual harassment. Constructive discharge has also been successfully used in situations involving discrimination based on age or disability.

25–1h Sexual Harassment

Title VII protection against sexual harassment in the workplace addresses two types of harassment:

Sexual Harassment The demanding of sexual favors in return for job promotions or other benefits, or language or conduct that is so sexually offensive that it creates a hostile working environment.

1. Quid pro quo harassment occurs when sexual favors are demanded in return for job opportunities, promotions, salary increases, or other benefits. Quid pro quo is a Latin phrase that is often translated as "something in exchange for something else."
2. Hostile-environment harassment occurs when a pattern of sexually offensive conduct runs throughout the workplace and the employer has not taken steps to prevent or discourage it. In this situation, the workplace is permeated with discriminatory intimidation, ridicule, and insult, and this behavior is so severe or pervasive that it alters the conditions of employment.

Harassment by Supervisors For an employer to be held liable for a supervisor's sexual harassment, the supervisor normally must have taken a tangible employment action against the employee. A tangible employment action is a significant change in employment status or benefits, such as occurs when an employee is fired, refused a promotion, demoted, or reassigned to a position with significantly different responsibilities. Only a supervisor, or another person acting with the authority of the employer, can cause this sort of injury. A constructive discharge also qualifies as a tangible employment action.

Tangible Employment Action A significant change in employment status or benefits, such as occurs when an employee is fired, refused a promotion, or reassigned to a lesser position.

The United States Supreme Court has issued several important rulings in cases alleging sexual harassment by supervisors that established what is known as the "Ellerth/Faragher affirmative defense."[11] The defense has two elements:

1. That the employer has taken reasonable care to prevent and promptly correct any sexually harassing behavior (by establishing effective antiharassment policies and complaint procedures, for instance).
2. That the plaintiff-employee unreasonably failed to take advantage of any preventive or corrective opportunities provided by the employer to avoid harm.

An employer that can prove both elements normally will not be liable for a supervisor's harassment.

Retaliation by Employers Employers sometimes retaliate against employees who complain about sexual harassment or other Title VII violations. Retaliation can take many forms. An employer might demote or fire the person, or otherwise change the terms, conditions, and benefits of employment. Title VII prohibits retaliation, and employees can sue their employers on that basis.

In retaliation claims, individuals assert that they have suffered a harm as a result of making a charge, testifying, or participating in a Title VII investigation or proceeding. Plaintiffs do not have to prove that the challenged action adversely affected their workplace or employment. Instead, to prove retaliation, plaintiffs must show that the challenged action was one that would likely have dissuaded a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination. Title VII's retaliation protection extends to an employee who speaks out about discrimination during an employer's internal investigation of another employee's complaint.

This chapter's Business Law Analysis feature illustrates how courts analyze retaliation claims.

11. Burlington Industries, Inc. v. Ellerth, 524 U.S. 742, 118 S.Ct. 2257, 141 L.Ed.2d 633 (1998); and Faragher v. City of Boca Raton, 524 U.S. 775, 118 S.Ct. 2275, 141 L.Ed.2d 662 (1998).

Retaliation Claims

Shane Dawson, a male homosexual, worked for Entek International. Some of Dawson's coworkers, including his supervisor, made derogatory comments about his sexual orientation. Dawson's work deteriorated. He filed a complaint with Entek's human resource department. Two days later, he was fired. State law made it unlawful for an employer to discriminate against an individual based on sexual orientation. Can Dawson establish a claim for retaliation?

Analysis: Title VII prohibits retaliation. In retaliation claims, individuals assert that they suffered harm as a result of making a charge, testifying, or participating in a Title VII investigation or proceeding. To prove retaliation, a plaintiff must show that the challenged action was one that would likely have dissuaded a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination.

Result and Reasoning: Dawson can establish a claim for retaliation in his state. Under the applicable state law, it was unlawful for an employer to discriminate against an individual based on sexual orientation. Dawson was subjected to derision on the part of coworkers, including his supervisor, based on his sexual orientation. He filed a complaint with his employer's human resource department. Two days later, he was fired. The fact that the firing occurred so soon after the complaint filing would support a retaliation claim, as would the other circumstances, especially the supervisor's conduct. Also, the discharge would likely have tended to dissuade others from making claims of discrimination. Therefore, it is likely that Dawson offered enough evidence to establish a claim for retaliation.

Harassment by Coworkers and Nonemployees When the harassment of coworkers, rather than supervisors, creates a hostile working environment, an employee may still have a cause of action against the employer. Normally, though, the employer will be held liable only if the employer knew, or should have known, about the harassment and failed to take immediate remedial action.

Occasionally, a court may also hold an employer liable for harassment by nonemployees if the employer knew about the harassment and failed to take corrective action. Example 25.12 Gordon, who owns and manages a Great Bites restaurant, knows that one of his regular customers, Dean, repeatedly harasses Sharon, a waitress. If Gordon does nothing and permits the harassment to continue, he may be liable under Title VII even though Dean is not an employee of the restaurant.

In the following case, a female firefighter claimed that her male coworkers subjected her to a hostile working environment and that the fire department knew about the harassment but failed to act. The city (the defendant) responded that there was no evidence to support this claim.

Franchina v. City of Providence

United States Court of Appeals, First Circuit, 881 F.3d 32 (2018).

Facts Lori Franchina, a rescue lieutenant with the Providence Fire Department, was assigned to work a shift with firefighter Andre Ferro. During the shift, Ferro subjected her to unprofessional sexual comments and conduct. Based on Franchina's account of Ferro's actions, Chief Curt Varone filed an intra-department complaint, charging Ferro with sexual harassment.

Other firefighters then began to treat Franchina with contempt. She was subjected to insubordination and verbal assaults, and was spit on and shoved, among other things. She submitted forty different complaints of harassment to her superiors. No action was taken against the perpetrators. Franchina filed a suit in a federal district court against the city, asserting that she was subjected to a hostile work environment as a result of her gender in violation of Title VII. The city argued that Franchina presented no evidence to support her claim. A jury issued a verdict in her favor and awarded damages. The city appealed.

Issue Was the evidence sufficient to support the jury's verdict of a hostile work environment?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed the judgment. "The abuse Lori Franchina suffered at the hands of the Providence Fire Department is nothing short of abhorrent . . . . Employers should be cautioned that turning a blind eye to blatant discrimination does not generally fare well under anti-discrimination laws like Title VII."

Reason A hostile work environment exists when a workplace is infused with discriminatory insults and behavior so pervasive or severe that it changes the conditions of the victim's employment. In this case, the intimidating remarks and ridicule directed toward Franchina were shown to be motivated by her gender. The male firefighters' repeated use of derogatory, gender-specific epithets—such as slut, whore, bitch, and Frangina (a combination of her last name and the word vagina)—was sufficient evidence of sexual harassment to support the jury's verdict. "This type of sexually based animus [hostility] is a hallmark of Title VII."

But there was more. Title VII prohibits subjecting the members of one gender to conditions of employment to which members of the other gender are not exposed. Evidence showed that within the Providence fire department female firefighters were treated as less competent—unless they were perceived as willing to have sex with the male firefighters. Women perceived as willing to have sex with their male coworkers were treated better. "This sampling of evidence demonstrates that the accumulated effect . . . taken together constitutes a hostile work environment."

Critical Thinking

- Economic Because of the constant harassment, Franchina had to be placed on injured-on-duty status. Later, diagnosed with severe post-traumatic stress disorder and unable to work again as a rescue lieutenant, she "retired." What is the appropriate measure of damages for this result? Discuss.
- Legal Environment What steps might an employer take to avoid the circumstances that occurred in the Franchina case?

Same-Sex Harassment In Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Services, Inc.,[12] the United States Supreme Court held that Title VII protection extends to individuals who are sexually harassed by members of the same sex. Proving that the harassment in same-sex cases is "based on sex" can be difficult, though. It is usually easier to establish a case of same-sex harassment when the harasser is homosexual.

Sexual-Orientation Harassment Federal law (Title VII) is now interpreted by the Supreme Court to prohibit discrimination or harassment based on a person's sexual orientation. Prior to June 2020, a growing number of states, however, enacted laws that prohibited sexual orientation discrimination in private employment. Some states, such as Michigan, explicitly prohibited discrimination based on a person's gender identity or expression. In addition, many companies and organizations, such as the National Football League, voluntarily established nondiscrimination policies that included sexual orientation.

25–1i Online Harassment

Employees' online activities can create a hostile working environment in many ways. Racial jokes, ethnic slurs, or other comments contained in e-mail, texts, blogs, or social media posts can become the basis for a claim of hostile-environment harassment or other forms of discrimination. Similarly, a worker who regularly sees sexually explicit and offensive images on a coworker's computer screen may claim that they create a hostile working environment.

Employers may be able to avoid liability for online harassment if they take prompt remedial action. Example 25.13 While working at TriCom, Shonda receives racially harassing tweets from another employee. Shortly afterward, the company issues a warning to the offending employee about the proper use of the Internet at work and holds two meetings to discuss company policy on the use of social media. If Shonda sues TriCom for racial discrimination, a court may find that because the employer took prompt remedial action, TriCom should not be held liable for its employee's racially harassing tweets. ■

25–1j Remedies under Title VII

Employer liability under Title VII may be extensive. If a plaintiff successfully proves that unlawful discrimination occurred, that plaintiff may be awarded reinstatement, back pay, retroactive promotions, and damages. Compensatory damages are available in cases of intentional discrimination. Punitive damages may be recovered against a private employer only if the employer acted with malice or reckless indifference to an individual's rights.

The total amount of compensatory and punitive damages that plaintiffs can recover depends on the size of the employer. For instance, there is a $50,000 cap on damages from employers with one hundred or fewer employees.

25–2 Discrimination Based on Age, Disability, or Military Status

Certain types of employment discrimination that are not banned by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act are prohibited under other statutes. These include discrimination based on age, disability, and military status.

25–2a Discrimination Based on Age

What federal act prohibits discrimination based on age?

Age discrimination is potentially the most widespread form of discrimination, because anyone—regardless of race, color, national origin, or gender—could be a victim at some point in life. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA)[13] prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of age against individuals forty years of age or older. The act also prohibits mandatory retirement for nonmanagerial workers. In addition, the act protects federal and private-sector employees from retaliation based on age-related complaints.

For the act to apply, an employer must have twenty or more employees, and the employer's business activities must affect interstate commerce. The EEOC administers the ADEA, but the act also permits private causes of action against employers for age discrimination.

Procedures under the ADEA The burden-shifting procedure under the ADEA differs from the procedure under Title VII. As explained earlier, if the plaintiff in a Title VII case can show that the employer was motivated, at least in part, by unlawful discrimination, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to articulate a legitimate nondiscriminatory reason. Thus, in cases in which the employer has a "mixed motive" for discharging an employee, the employer has the burden of proving that its reason was legitimate.

Under the ADEA, in contrast, a plaintiff must show that the unlawful discrimination was not just a reason but the reason for the adverse employment action. In other words, the employee has the burden of establishing "but for" causation—but for the plaintiff's age, the adverse action would not have happened.

Prima Facie Age Discrimination Case. To establish a prima facie case, the plaintiff must show the following:

1. The plaintiff is a member of the protected age group.
2. The plaintiff was qualified for the position from which he or she was discharged.
3. The plaintiff was discharged because of age discrimination.

Then the burden shifts to the employer to give a legitimate nondiscriminatory reason for the adverse action.

Pretext. If the employer offers a legitimate reason for its action, then the plaintiff must show that the stated reason is only a pretext (a false reason) and that the plaintiff's age was the real reason for the employer's decision.

Case Example 25.14 Jerry Stever was a financial adviser at US Bancorp, Inc. He was terminated at age sixty-eight for "deficient performance." Stever sued US Bancorp in federal court alleging age discrimination and claiming that deficient performance was a pretext. The plaintiff proved that he was in the protected age group (over forty) and was qualified for the position, but he lacked proof that he had been discharged because of his age.

Stever argued that two younger financial advisers had received more favorable treatment from the company than he had. Showing that "similarly situated" younger employees were treated more favorably would have given rise to an inference of discrimination. The court found no evidence of preferential treatment, however. One of the men had generated considerably more revenue than Stever, and the other man differed from Stever in terms of seniority and prior performance. Thus, they were not similarly situated to Stever.

Stever also claimed that his manager had made the comment, "we old dogs had to learn new tricks." The district court found that this single stray remark was not sufficient to demonstrate age discrimination and granted summary judgment to US Bancorp. A federal appellate court affirmed the decision on appeal.[14]

A male bank employee who is over sixty years old is fired for not performing well. If he believes the reason was a pretext, what must he do to establish a prima facie case for age discrimination?

State Employees Not Covered by the ADEA Generally, the states are immune from lawsuits brought by private individuals in federal court, unless a state consents to the suit. This immunity stems from the United States Supreme Court's interpretation of the Eleventh Amendment.

State immunity under the Eleventh Amendment is not absolute, however. When fundamental rights are at stake, Congress has the power to abolish state immunity through legislation. For instance, Congress has chosen to subject states to private lawsuits under the Family and Medical Leave Act. State employers are usually immune from suits brought by employees under the ADEA, the Americans with Disabilities Act, and the Fair Labor Standards Act, however.

25–2b Discrimination Based on Disability

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA)[15] prohibits disability-based discrimination in workplaces with fifteen or more workers (with the exception of state government employers, who are generally immune). Basically, the ADA requires that employers reasonably accommodate the needs of persons with disabilities unless to do so would cause undue hardship. The ADA Amendments Act broadened the ADA's coverage.[16]

Procedures under the ADA To prevail on a claim under the ADA, a plaintiff must show all of the following:

1. The plaintiff has a disability.
2. The plaintiff is otherwise qualified for the employment in question.
3. The plaintiff was excluded from the employment solely because of the disability.

As in Title VII cases, a plaintiff must pursue the claim through the EEOC before filing an action in court for a violation of the ADA.

The EEOC may decide to investigate and perhaps even sue the employer on behalf of the employee. If the EEOC decides not to sue, then the employee is entitled to sue in court. The EEOC can bring a suit against an employer for disability-based discrimination even though the employee previously agreed to submit any job-related disputes to arbitration.

Plaintiffs in lawsuits brought under the ADA may seek many of the same remedies available under Title VII. These include reinstatement, back pay, a limited amount of compensatory and punitive damages (for intentional discrimination), and certain other forms of relief. Repeat violators may be ordered to pay fines of up to $100,000.

What Is a Disability? The ADA is broadly drafted to cover persons with a wide range of disabilities. Specifically, the ADA defines disability to include any of the following:

1. A physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of an individual's major life activities.
2. A record of such an impairment.
3. Being regarded as having such an impairment.

Health conditions that have been considered disabilities under the federal law include alcoholism, acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), blindness, cancer, cerebral palsy, diabetes, heart disease, muscular dystrophy, and paraplegia. Testing positive for the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) has qualified as a disability, as has morbid obesity. (A morbidly obese person weighs twice the normal weight for the person's height.)

Note that obesity does not qualify as a disability under the ADA unless it involves physical impairment. Case Example 25.15 Melvin Morriss applied for a machinist position at BNSF Railway. He was offered the position conditioned on a medical review, which was required because the position was considered safety sensitive. BNSF physicians found that Morriss's body mass index, or BMI, exceeded 40, identifying him as seriously obese. (BMI is a typical method of evaluating a person's body fat.) BNSF had a policy of not employing workers with BMIs of 40 or more in safety-sensitive positions. Thus, the company rescinded its offer of employment.

Morriss sued, alleging discrimination on the basis of disability, but the court found that Morriss's obesity was not a physical impairment under the ADA. Morriss was otherwise in good health and did not suffer from any medical condition that caused his obesity or any medical condition associated with obesity. Therefore, the court granted a summary judgment to BNSF Railway. A federal appellate court affirmed.[17]

Association with Disabled Persons. A separate provision in the ADA prevents employers from taking adverse employment actions based on stereotypes or assumptions about individuals who associate with people who have disabilities.[18] Example 25.16 Joan, an employer, refuses to hire Edward, who has a daughter with a physical disability. She bases her decision on the assumption that, because of his daughter's disability, Edward will miss work too often or be unreliable. Edward can sue Joan for violating the ADA's provisions.

Mitigating Measures. At one time, the courts focused on whether a person was disabled after the use of corrective devices or medication. Thus, a severely nearsighted person whose eyesight could be corrected by wearing glasses did not qualify as having a disability. Then Congress amended the ADA to strengthen its protections and prohibit employers from considering mitigating measures, such as medications, when determining if an individual has a disability.

Disability is now determined on a case-by-case basis. A condition may fit the definition of disability in one set of circumstances, but not in another. Spotlight Case Example 25.17 Larry Rohr, a welding specialist for a power district in Arizona, was diagnosed with type 2 diabetes. If he fails to follow a complex regimen of daily insulin injections and blood tests, as well as a strict diet, his blood sugar will rise to a level that aggravates his disease. Therefore, Rohr's physician forbade him from taking work assignments that involved overnight, out-of-town travel, which were common in his job.

Because of these limitations, the power district asked him to transfer, apply for disability, or take early retirement. Rohr sued for disability discrimination. The lower court granted summary judgment for the employer. Rohr appealed. A federal appellate court reversed. The court held that under the amended ADA, diabetes is a disability if it significantly restricts an individual's eating (a major life activity), as it did for Rohr. Therefore, Rohr was entitled to a trial on his discrimination claim.[19]

Disclosure of Confidential Medical Information. ADA provisions also require employers to keep their employees' medical information confidential. An employee who discovers that an employer has disclosed the employee's confidential medical information has a right to sue the employer—even if the employee was not technically disabled. The prohibition against disclosure also applies to other employees acting on behalf of the employer.

Case Example 25.18 George Shoun was working at his job at Best Formed Plastics, Inc., when he fell and injured his shoulder. Another Best Formed employee, Jane Stewart, prepared an accident report for the incident and processed Shoun's workers' compensation claim. As a result of the injury, Shoun had to take several months off work and received workers' compensation.

Stewart posted on her Facebook page a statement about how Shoun's shoulder injury "kept him away from work for 11 months and now he is trying to sue us." Shoun sued Best Formed under the ADA for wrongfully disclosing confidential information about his medical condition to other people via Facebook. He claimed the action resulted in loss of employment and impairment of his earning capacity. The court allowed Shoun's claim to go forward to trial.[20]

What legal remedy is available to an employee under the ADA if a coworker refers to the employee's injured shoulder in a Facebook post?

Reasonable Accommodation The ADA does not require that employers accommodate the needs of job applicants or employees with disabilities who are not otherwise qualified for the work. If a job applicant or an employee with a disability can perform essential job functions with a reasonable accommodation, however, the employer must make the accommodation.

Required modifications may include installing ramps for a wheelchair, establishing more flexible working hours, creating or modifying job assignments, and creating or improving training materials and procedures. Generally, employers should give primary consideration to employees' preferences in deciding what accommodations should be made.

Undue Hardship. Employers who do not accommodate the needs of persons with disabilities must demonstrate that the accommodations will cause "undue hardship" in terms of being significantly difficult or expensive for the employer. Usually, the courts decide whether an accommodation constitutes an undue hardship on a case-by-case basis by looking at the employer's resources in relation to the specific accommodation.

Example 25.19 Bryan, who uses a wheelchair, works for a cell phone company that provides parking for its employees. Lockhart informs company supervisors that the parking spaces are so narrow that he is unable to extend the ramp that allows him to get in and out of his van. Bryan requests that the company reasonably accommodate his needs by paying a monthly fee for him to use a larger parking space in an adjacent lot. In this situation, a court would likely find that it would not be an undue hardship for the employer to pay for additional parking for Bryan.

Before reaching conclusions about the necessity and reasonableness of an accommodation, a court must determine that the part of a job affected by the accommodation is an essential function of the job. In the following case, the court addressed this issue.

Kassa v. Synovus Financial Corp.

United States Court of Appeals, Eleventh Circuit, 800 Fed.Appx. 804 (2020).

Facts Tony Kassa, who suffers from bipolar disorder and intermittent explosive disorder, worked for Synovus Financial Corporation in the company's Network Operation Center (NOC). Kassa's supervisor, Diana Young, knew about his disorders and granted his request to take short breaks when he became frustrated as long as his area was covered and he could be reached if necessary.

As part of a corporate restructuring, Kassa was transferred to the Automated Teller Machine (ATM) team to handle customer service calls. Worried about the possible effects that his disorders might have during calls, Kassa asked his new supervisor, Wes Mason, if he could take a short break whenever he was having an episode. The request was not granted. Several months later, after a "rude and unprofessional" comment during a call, Kassa was terminated.

He filed a suit in a federal district court against Synovus, alleging discrimination under the Americans with Disabilities Act for the employer's failure to provide him with a reasonable accommodation for his disability. The court, after concluding that the plaintiff had failed to show that Synovus had withheld reasonable accommodation, granted the company's motion for summary judgment. Kassa appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

Issue Did Synovus violate the ADA by denying Kassa's request to take short breaks?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit vacated the lower court's summary judgment in Synovus's favor on Kassa's failure-to-accommodate claim and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Reason An employer's failure to provide a reasonable accommodation for the known physical or mental limitations of an otherwise qualified individual with a disability is a violation of the ADA, unless doing so would impose an undue hardship on the employer.

An accommodation is reasonable only if it enables the employee to perform an essential function of the job. In Kassa's case, the appellate court found that answering customer service calls was an essential function of his job. He testified that answering customer service calls was "just about all" he did in his position. And sometimes he was the only one available to take the calls.

The court also found that Kassa's request to take short breaks was a reasonable accommodation for his disability. He could control his anger by taking short breaks, which would enable him to answer calls. In his position on the NOC team, his supervisor had allowed him to take short breaks with positive results.

But when Kassa was transferred to Mason's team, the accommodations stopped. The court concluded, "Because an employer's failure to provide a reasonable accommodation is itself a violation of the ADA, Synovus is unentitled to summary judgment."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Could Synovus have successfully claimed that Kassa's short breaks created an undue hardship? Explain.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that instead of asking to take a short break whenever he had an episode, Kassa had asked if he could take customer service calls only from technicians, work nights, or work from home. Would the result have been different? Discuss.

Job Applications and Preemployment Physical Exams. Employers must modify their job-application process so that those with disabilities can compete for jobs with those who do not have disabilities. For instance, a job announcement might be modified to allow job applicants to respond by e-mail or letter, as well as by telephone, so that it does not discriminate against potential applicants with hearing impairments.

Employers are restricted in the kinds of questions they may ask on job application forms and during preemployment interviews. Furthermore, they cannot require persons with disabilities to submit to preemployment physicals unless such exams are required of all other applicants. Employers can condition an offer of employment on the applicant's successfully passing a medical examination, but can disqualify the applicant only if the medical problems discovered would render the applicant unable to perform the job.

Preemployment screening procedures must be applied equally in regard to all job applicants.

Substance Abuse. Drug addiction is a disability under the ADA because it is a substantially limiting impairment. The act does not protect those who are actually using illegal drugs. The ADA protects only persons with former drug addictions—those who have completed or are now in a supervised drug-rehabilitation program. Individuals who have used drugs casually in the past are not protected under the act. They are not considered addicts and therefore do not have a disability (addiction).

People suffering from alcoholism are protected by the ADA. Of course, employers have the right to prohibit the use of alcohol in the workplace and can require that employees not be under the influence of alcohol while working. Employers can also fire or refuse to hire people who are alcoholics if (1) they pose a substantial risk of harm either to themselves or to others, and (2) the risk cannot be reduced by reasonable accommodation.

Health Insurance Plans. Workers with disabilities must be given equal access to any health insurance provided to other employees and cannot be excluded from coverage for preexisting health conditions. An employer can put a limit, or cap, on health care payments under its group health policy, but such caps must be "applied equally to all insured employees" and must not "discriminate on the basis of disability."

25–2c Discrimination Based on Military Status

The Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA) prohibits discrimination against persons who have served in the military.[21] In effect, the USERRA makes military service and status a protected class and gives members of this class a right to sue an employer for violations.

Broad Application and Provisions The USERRA covers all employers, public and private, large and small. Even an employer with only one employee is subject to its provisions. The act also applies to United States employers operating in foreign countries.

DanielBendjy/E+/Getty Images

Are reserve and former members of the military considered a protected class? Why or why not?

Under the USERRA, military plaintiffs can sue not only the employer but also individual employees who were acting in an official capacity for the employer. In other words, these employees—supervisors, for instance—can be held personally liable for violations. Additionally, there is no statute of limitations for bringing a lawsuit. The cause of action could have arisen ten weeks or ten years before the suit was filed.

The USERRA specifies that veterans can be terminated from their employment only "for cause." The employer is obligated to give employees a list of all the behaviors that would trigger a for-cause termination.

Prima Facie* Case of Discrimination under the USERRA To establish a prima facie case under the USERRA, the plaintiff must establish that the employer took an adverse employment action based in part on the employee's connection with the military. If another similarly situated person who did not serve in the military or engage in a protected activity was treated more favorably than the plaintiff, the employer has violated the USERRA.

Case Example 25.20 Baldo Bello, a staff sergeant with the United States Marine Corps Reserve, was employed by the Village of Skokie as a police officer. Police officers in Skokie normally have nine regular days off (RDO) per month and eight sick days per year. Skokie officers who are in the Reserve receive two weeks of paid leave for annual training each summer, but they do not receive pay for the required weekend military training.

During his first four years as an officer in Skokie, Bello always requested RDOs to cover his weekend training drills. After that, he started requesting military leave for the two to four days of drills per month, in addition to his nine RDO days. Skokie at first granted Bello

Exhibit 25–1 Coverage of Employment Discrimination Laws

TITLE VII OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT	AGE DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT ACT	AMERICANS WITH DISABILITIES ACT (AS AMENDED)	UNIFORMED SERVICES EMPLOYMENT AND REEMPLOYMENT RIGHTS ACT
Prohibits discrimination based on race, color, national origin, religion, gender, sexual orientation, and pregnancy; prohibits sexual harassment.	Prohibits discrimination against persons over forty years of age.	Prohibits discrimination against persons who have a mental or physical impairment that substantially limits a major life activity, who have a record of such an impairment, who are regarded as having such an impairment, or who are associated with a disabled person.	Prohibits discrimination against persons who have served in the military.
Applies to employers with fifteen or more employees.	Applies to employers with twenty or more employees.	Applies to employers with fifteen or more employees.	Applies to all employers, even if they have only one employee.

military leave for monthly drills but later began to deny the requests. When Skokie officials told Bello that he needed to schedule his RDOs to cover his weekend military training, he filed suit in a federal district court alleging violations of the USERRA. Skokie filed a motion for summary judgment, which the court denied. The court found that Bello was meeting his employer's legitimate expectations. He was therefore entitled to a trial on the issue of whether Skokie had treated his leave requests less favorably than requests from other employees.[22]

Plaintiffs May Be Entitled to Promotions Under the USERRA, returning service members are to be reemployed in the jobs that they would have attained had they not been absent for military service. Reinstatement could affect their seniority, status, pay, and other rights and benefits (such as health and pension plans). In essence, this means that a returning service member who successfully sues an employer for violations of the USERRA could receive not only damages and reinstatement but also a promotion.

Exhibit 25–1 illustrates the coverage of the employment discrimination laws discussed in this chapter.

25–3 Defenses to Employment Discrimination

The first line of defense for an employer charged with employment discrimination is to assert that the plaintiff has failed to meet the initial burden of proving that discrimination occurred. Once a plaintiff succeeds in proving discrimination, the burden shifts to the employer to justify the discriminatory practice.

Possible justifications include that the discrimination was the result of a business necessity, a bona fide occupational qualification, or a seniority system. In addition, as noted earlier, an employer that has an effective antiharassment policy and takes prompt remedial action when harassment occurs may be shielded from liability for sexual harassment under Title VII.

Focus Question 4

What are three defenses to claims of employment discrimination?

25–3a Business Necessity

An employer may defend against a claim of disparate-impact (unintentional) discrimination by asserting that a practice that has a discriminatory effect is a business necessity. Example 25.21 EarthFix, Inc., an international consulting agency, requires its applicants to be fluent in at least two languages. If requiring a second language is shown to have a discriminatory effect,

Business Necessity A defense to an allegation of employment discrimination in which the employer demonstrates that an employment practice that discriminates against members of a protected class is related to job performance.

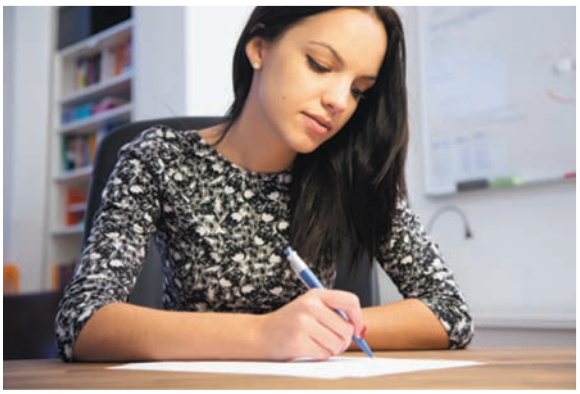
EarthFix can argue that this requirement is necessary for its workers to perform the job at a required level of competence. If EarthFix can demonstrate a definite connection between multilingual fluency and job performance, it normally will succeed in this business necessity defense.

25–3b Bona Fide Occupational Qualification

Bona Fide Occupational Qualification (BFOQ) An identifiable characteristic reasonably necessary to the normal operation of a particular business. Such characteristics can include gender, national origin, and religion, but not race.

Another defense applies when discrimination against a protected class is essential to a job—that is, when a particular trait is a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ). Race, however, can never be a BFOQ.

Generally, courts have restricted the BFOQ defense to instances in which the employee's gender is essential to the job. For instance, a women's clothing store might legitimately hire only female sales attendants if part of an attendant's job involves assisting clients in the store's dressing rooms. Similarly, the Federal Aviation Administration can legitimately impose age limits for airline pilots—but an airline cannot impose weight limits only on female flight attendants.



25–3c Seniority Systems

Seniority System A system in which those who have worked longest for an employer are first in line for promotions, salary increases, and other benefits, and are last to be laid off if the workforce must be reduced.

An employer with a history of discrimination may have no members of protected classes in upper-level positions. Nevertheless, the employer may have a defense against a discrimination suit if promotions or other job benefits have been distributed according to a fair seniority system. In a seniority system, workers with more years of service are promoted first or laid off last.

Case Example 25.22 Charee Stanley worked as a flight attendant for ExpressJet Airlines, Inc. A practicing Muslim, Stanley requested that she be excused from preparing and serving alcohol during flights for religious reasons. ExpressJet refused this accommodation, which would have been at odds with a collective bargaining agreement (CBA) between the airline and its employees. The CBA gave senior flight attendants the ability to choose work assignments, including whether to serve alcohol.

Because of her short tenure with the airline, Stanley was frequently the junior attendant on a particular flight. Consequently, she was required by the CBA to serve alcohol if her senior partner declined to do so. A federal appeals court ruled that ExpressJet would violate this seniority system if it granted Stanley's accommodation request, and therefore her religious discrimination claim was preempted by the CBA.[23]

If this job candidate makes material misrepresentations on her application and is hired, can her employer use after-acquired evidence to shield itself from a discrimination lawsuit?

25–3d After-Acquired Evidence of Employee Misconduct

In some situations, employers have attempted to avoid liability for employment discrimination on the basis of after-acquired evidence of an employee's misconduct—that is, evidence that the employer discovered after the employee had filed a lawsuit. Example 25.23 Pratt Legal Services fires Lucy, who then sues Pratt for employment discrimination. During pretrial investigation, Pratt discovers that Lucy made material misrepresentations on her job application. Had Pratt known of these misrepresentations, it would have had grounds to fire Lucy.

After-acquired evidence of wrongdoing cannot shield an employer entirely from liability for discrimination. It may, however, be used to limit the amount of damages for which the employer is liable.

25–4 Affirmative Action

Federal statutes and regulations providing for equal opportunity in the workplace were designed to reduce or eliminate discriminatory practices with respect to hiring, retaining, and promoting employees. Affirmative action programs go further and attempt to "make up" for past patterns of discrimination by giving members of protected classes preferential treatment in hiring or promotion. During the 1960s, all federal and state government agencies, private companies that contracted to do business with the federal government, and institutions that received federal funding were required to implement affirmative action policies.

Affirmative Action Job-hiring policies that give special consideration to members of protected classes in an effort to overcome present effects of past discrimination.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act neither requires nor prohibits affirmative action. Thus, most private firms have not been required to implement affirmative action policies, though many have voluntarily done so. Affirmative action programs have been controversial, however, particularly when they have resulted in reverse discrimination.

25–4a Equal Protection Issues

Because of their inherently discriminatory nature, affirmative action programs may violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Any federal, state, or local affirmative action program that uses racial or ethnic classifications as the basis for making decisions is subject to strict scrutiny (the highest standard to meet) by the courts.

Focus Question 5

Why are affirmative action programs often found to be unconstitutional?

Today, an affirmative action program normally is constitutional only if it attempts to remedy past discrimination and does not make use of quotas or preferences. Furthermore, once such a program has succeeded in the goal of remedying past discrimination, it must be changed or eliminated.

Know This

The Fourteenth Amendment prohibits any state from denying any person "the equal protection of the laws." This prohibition applies to the federal government through the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

25–4b State Laws Prohibiting Affirmative Action Programs

Some states, including California, Maryland, Michigan, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, Virginia, and Washington, have enacted laws that prohibit affirmative action programs at public institutions (colleges, universities, and state agencies) within their borders. The United States Supreme Court has recognized that states have the power to enact such bans. Case Example 25.24 Michigan voters passed an initiative to amend the state's constitution to prohibit publicly funded colleges from granting preferential treatment to any group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin. The law also prohibited Michigan from considering race and gender in public hiring and contracting decisions.

A group that supports affirmative action programs in education sued the state's attorney general and others, claiming that the initiative deprived minorities of equal protection and violated the U.S. Constitution. A federal appellate court agreed that the law violated the equal protection clause, but the United States Supreme Court reversed. The Court did not rule on the constitutionality of any specific affirmative action program but held that a state has the inherent power to ban affirmative action within that state.[24]

Amaani Lyle, an African American woman, took a job as a scriptwriters' assistant at Warner Brothers Television Productions. She worked for the writers of Friends, a popular, adult-oriented television series. One of her essential job duties was to type detailed notes for the scriptwriters during brainstorming sessions in which they discussed jokes, dialogue, and story lines. The writers then combed through Lyle's notes after the meetings for script material.

During the meetings, the three male scriptwriters told lewd and vulgar jokes and made sexually explicit comments and gestures. They often talked about their personal sexual experiences and fantasies, and some of these conversations were later used in episodes of Friends. During the meetings, Lyle never complained that she found the writers' conduct offensive.

After four months, Lyle was fired because she could not type fast enough to keep up with the writers' conversations during the meetings. She filed a suit against Warner Brothers alleging sexual harassment and claiming that her termination was based on racial discrimination. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Lyle's claim of racial discrimination be for intentional (disparate-treatment) or unintentional (disparate-impact) discrimination? Explain.
2. Can Lyle establish a prima facie case of racial discrimination? Why or why not?
3. When she was hired, Lyle was told that typing speed was extremely important to her position. At the time, she maintained that she could type eighty words per minute, so she was not given a typing test. It later turned out that Lyle could type only fifty words per minute. What impact might typing speed have on Lyle's lawsuit?
4. Lyle's sexual harassment claim was based on the hostile work environment created by the writers' sexually offensive conduct at meetings that she was required to attend. The writers, however, argued that their behavior was essential to the "creative process" of writing Friends, a show that routinely contained sexual innuendos and adult humor. Which defense discussed in the chapter might Warner Brothers assert using this argument?

Chapter Summary: Employment Discrimination

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act	Title VII prohibits employment discrimination based on race, color, national origin, religion, sexual orientation, or gender. 1. Procedures—An employee alleging discrimination must file a claim with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). The EEOC may sue the employer on the employee's behalf. If it does not, the EEOC may allow the employee to sue the employer directly. 2. Types of discrimination—Title VII prohibits both intentional (disparate-treatment) and unintentional (disparate-impact) discrimination. Disparate-impact discrimination occurs when an employer's practices, tests, or procedures, such as requiring a certain level of education, have the effect of discriminating against a protected class. Title VII extends to discriminatory practices, such as various forms of harassment, in the online environment. 3. Remedies for discrimination under Title VII—Remedies include reinstatement, back pay, and retroactive promotions. Damages (both compensatory and punitive) may be awarded for intentional discrimination.
Discrimination Based on Age, Disability, or Military Status	1. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA)—Prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of age against individuals forty years of age or older. Procedures for bringing a case under the ADEA are similar to those for bringing a case under Title VII. 2. The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA)—Prohibits employment discrimination against persons with disabilities who are otherwise qualified to perform the essential functions of the jobs for which they apply. a. To prevail on a claim, a plaintiff must have a disability, must be otherwise qualified for the employment in question, and must have been excluded from it solely because of the disability. Procedures and remedies under the ADA are similar to those in Title VII cases. b. The ADA defines the term disability as a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of an individual's major life activities, a record of such impairment, or being regarded as having such an impairment. c. Employers are required to reasonably accommodate the needs of qualified persons with disabilities through such measures as modifying the physical work environment and permitting more flexible work schedules. 3. The Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA)—Prohibits discrimination against persons who have served in the military. The USERRA applies to all employers regardless of their size.
Defenses to Employment Discrimination	As defenses to claims of employment discrimination, employers may assert that the discrimination was required for reasons of business necessity, to meet a bona fide occupational qualification, or to maintain a legitimate seniority system. Evidence of prior employee misconduct acquired after the employee has been fired is not a defense to discrimination.
Affirmative Action	Affirmative action programs attempt to "make up" for past patterns of discrimination by giving members of protected classes preferential treatment in hiring or promotion. Such programs are subject to strict scrutiny by the courts and are often struck down for violating the Fourteenth Amendment.

1. Ruth is a supervisor for a Subs & Suds restaurant. Tim is a Subs & Suds employee. The owner announces that some employees will be discharged. Ruth tells Tim that if he has sex with her, he can keep his job. Is this sexual harassment? Why or why not? (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)
2. Koko, a person with a disability, applies for a job at Lively Sales Corporation for which she is well qualified, but she is rejected. Lively continues to seek applicants and eventually fills the position with a person who does not have a disability. Could Koko succeed in a suit against Lively for discrimination? Explain. (See Discrimination Based on Age, Disability, or Military Status.)

25–1. Title VII Violations. Discuss fully whether either of the following actions would constitute a violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

1. Tennington, Inc., is a consulting firm with ten employees. These employees travel on consulting jobs in seven states. Tennington has an employment record of hiring only white males. (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)
2. Novo Films, Inc., is making a film about Africa and needs to employ approximately one hundred extras for this picture. To hire these extras, Novo advertises in all major newspapers in Southern California. The ad states that only African Americans need apply. (See Defenses to Employment Discrimination.)

25–2. Religious Discrimination. Gina Gomez, a devout Roman Catholic, worked for Sam's Department Stores, Inc., in Phoenix, Arizona. Sam's considered Gomez a productive employee because her sales exceeded $200,000 per year. The store gave its managers the discretion to grant unpaid leave to employees but prohibited vacations or leave during the holiday season—October through December. Gomez felt that she had a "calling" to go on a "pilgrimage" in October to a location in Bosnia where some persons claimed to have had visions of the Virgin Mary. The Catholic Church had not designated the site an official pilgrimage site, the visions were not expected to be stronger in October, and tours were available at other times. The store managers denied Gomez's request for leave, but she had a nonrefundable ticket and left anyway. Sam's terminated her employment, and she could not find another job. Can Gomez establish a prima facie case of religious discrimination? Explain. (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)

25–3. Spotlight on Dress Code Policies—Discrimination Based on Gender. Burlington Coat Factory Warehouse, Inc., had a dress code that required male sales clerks to wear business attire consisting of slacks, shirt, and necktie. Female sales clerks, by contrast, were required to wear a smock so that customers could readily identify them. Karen O'Donnell and other female employees refused to wear the smock. Instead, they reported to work in business attire and were suspended. After numerous suspensions, the female employees were fired for violating Burlington's dress code policy. All other conditions of employment, including salary, hours, and benefits, were the same for female and male employees. Was the dress code policy discriminatory? Why or why not? [O'Donnell v. Burlington Coat Factory Warehouse, Inc., 656 F.Supp. 263 (S.D.Ohio 1987)] (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)

25–4. Age Discrimination. Beginning in 1986, Paul Rangel was a sales professional for pharmaceutical company Sanofi-Aventis U.S., LLC (S-A). Rangel had satisfactory performance reviews until 2006, when S-A issued new expectations guidelines with sales call quotas and other standards that he failed to meet. After two years of negative performance reviews, Rangel—who was then more than forty years old—was terminated as part of a nationwide reduction of sales professionals who had not met the expectations guidelines. This sales force reduction also included younger workers. Did S-A engage in age discrimination? Discuss. [Rangel v. Sanofi Aventis U.S. LLC, 507 Fed.Appx. 782 (10th Cir. 2013)] (See Discrimination Based on Age, Disability, or Military Status.)

25–5. Discrimination Based on Disability. Cynthia Horn worked for Knight Facilities Management–GM, Inc., in Detroit, Michigan, as a janitor. When Horn developed a sensitivity to cleaning products, her physician gave her a "no exposure to cleaning solutions" restriction. Knight discussed possible accommodations with Horn. She suggested that restrooms be eliminated from her cleaning route or that she be provided with a respirator. Knight explained that she would be exposed to cleaning solutions in any situation and concluded that there was no work available within her physician's restriction. Has Knight violated the Americans with Disabilities Act by failing to provide Horn with the requested accommodations? Explain. [Horn v. Knight Facilities Management–GM, Inc., 556 Fed.Appx. 452 (6th Cir. 2014)] (See Discrimination Based on Age, Disability, or Military Status.)

25–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Sexual Harassment. Jamel Blanton, a male employee at a Pizza Hut restaurant operated by Newton Associates, Inc., in San Antonio, Texas, was subjected to sexual and racial harassment by the general manager, who was female. Newton had a clear, straightforward antidiscrimination policy and complaint procedure. The policy provided that in such a situation, an employee should complain to the harasser's supervisor. Blanton alerted a shift leader and an assistant manager about the harassment, but they were subordinate to the general manager and did not report the harassment to higher-level management. When Blanton finally complained to a manager with authority over the general manager, the employer investigated and fired the general manager within four days. Blanton filed a suit in a federal district court against Newton, seeking to impose liability on the employer for the general manager's actions. What is Newton's best defense? Discuss. [Blanton v. Newton Associates, Inc., 593 Fed.Appx. 389 (5th Cir. 2015)] (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)

25–7. Discrimination Based on Disability. Dennis Wallace was a deputy sheriff for Stanislaus County, California, when he injured his left knee. After surgery, he was subject to limits on prolonged standing, walking, and running. The county assigned him to work as a bailiff. The sergeants who supervised him rated his performance above average. Less than a year later, without consulting those supervisors, the county placed him on an unpaid leave of absence, under the mistaken belief that he could not safely perform the essential functions of the job. Wallace filed an action in a California state court against the county, alleging discrimination based on disability. Under state law, discriminatory intent is shown by evidence that an actual or perceived disability was a "substantial motivating factor or reason" for an employer's adverse employment action. An employee is not required to show that the action was motivated by animosity or ill will. Could Wallace likely prove the "substantial motivating factor or reason" element? Explain. [Wallace v. County of Stanislaus, 245 Cal.App.4th 109, 199 Cal.Rptr.3d 462 (5 Dist. 2016)] (See Discrimination Based on Age, Disability, or Military Status.)

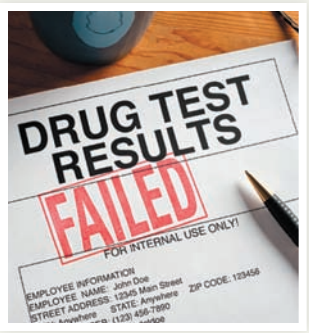
25–8. Discrimination Based on Gender. The Fresno County Office of Education hired Aileen Rizo as a math consultant. She had previously worked as a middle and high school math teacher, earning about $50,000 a year. Fresno based the salary of its new hires on the individual's prior salary, according to the county's Standard Operating Procedure (SOP). When Rizo learned that she was being paid less than comparable male employees for the same work, she filed a complaint. The county responded that all salaries were set under the SOP. Rizo filed a suit against Jim Yovino, the Fresno superintendent, claiming a violation of the Equal Pay Act. She asserted that under the Equal Pay Act, an employer should not be able to justify a wage differential between men and women on the basis of prior salary. Yovino argued that basing pay on a prior salary was permissible under an exception in the act for "any factor other than gender." Did the county violate the Equal Pay Act? Discuss. [Rizo v. Yovino, 887 F.3d 453 (9th Cir. 2018)] (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)

25–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Unintentional Discrimination. McLane Company is a supply-chain services company that distributes goods to retailers. McLane requires employees with physically demanding jobs to have physical evaluations, both when they start work and when they return after medical leave. After working in a physically demanding job for McLane for eight years, Damiana Ochoa took maternity leave. When she returned to work, she failed the physical evaluation and was fired. She filed a discrimination complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). The agency issued a subpoena—an order to appear in court—seeking the names and contact information of McLane employees who had been asked to have evaluations throughout the company's national operations. [McLane Co. v. E.E.O.C., 581 U.S.___, 137 S.Ct. 1159, 197 L.Ed.2d 500 (2017)] (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)

1. On what legal ground might McLane legitimately refuse to comply with the EEOC's subpoena? What practical factors could affect the choice not to comply? Discuss.
2. Using the IDDR approach, consider whether McLane has an ethical duty to comply with the subpoena.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments



25–10. Critical Legal Thinking. Why has the federal government limited the application of the statutes discussed in this chapter to firms with a specified number of employees, such as fifteen or twenty? Should these laws apply to all employers regardless of size? Why or why not? (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)

25–11. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Discrimination Based on Race. Two African American plaintiffs sued the producers of the reality television series The Bachelor and The Bachelorette for racial discrimination. The plaintiffs claimed that the shows had never featured a person of color in the lead role. Plaintiffs also alleged that the producers had failed to provide people of color who auditioned for lead roles with the same opportunities to compete as white people who auditioned. (See Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.)

1. The first group will assess whether the plaintiffs can establish a prima facie case of disparate-treatment discrimination.
2. The second group will consider what the plaintiffs would have to show to establish disparate-impact discrimination.
3. The third group will assume that the plaintiffs established a prima facie case and that the burden has shifted to the employer to articulate a legal reason for not hiring the plaintiffs. What legitimate reasons might the employer assert for not hiring the plaintiffs in this situation? Should the law require television producers to hire persons of color for lead roles in reality television shows? Explain your answer.

Unit Four—Task-Based Simulation

iStockphoto.com/KLH49

Two brothers, Ray and Paul Ashford, start a business—Ashford Brothers, Inc.—manufacturing a new type of battery system for hybrid automobiles. The batteries hit the market at the perfect time and are in great demand.

1. Agency. Loren, one of Ashford's salespersons, anxious to make a sale, intentionally quotes a price to a customer that is $500 lower than Ashford has authorized for the product. The customer purchases the product at the quoted price. When Ashford learns of the deal, it claims that it is not legally bound to the sales contract because it has not authorized Loren to sell the product at that price. Is Ashford bound to the contract? Discuss fully.
2. Workers' Compensation. One day, Gina, an Ashford employee, suffered a serious burn when she accidentally spilled some acid on her hand. The accident occurred because another employee, who was suspected of using illegal drugs, carelessly bumped into her. Gina's hand required a series of skin grafts before it healed sufficiently to allow her to return to work. Gina wants to obtain compensation for her lost wages and medical expenses. Can she do that? If so, how?
3. Drug Testing. After Gina's injury, Ashford decides to conduct random drug tests on all of its employees. Several employees claim that the testing violates their privacy rights and bring a lawsuit. What factors will the court consider in deciding whether the random drug testing is legally permissible?
4. COBRA. Ashford provides health insurance for its two hundred employees, including Dan. For personal medical reasons, Dan takes twelve weeks' leave. During this period, can Dan continue his coverage under Ashford's health insurance plan? After Dan returns to work, Ashford closes Dan's division and terminates the employees, including Dan. Can Dan continue his coverage under Ashford's health insurance plan after the termination? Explain.
5. Sexual Harassment. Aretha, another employee at Ashford, is disgusted by the sexually offensive behavior of several male employees. She has complained to her supervisor on several occasions about the behavior, but the supervisor merely laughs at her concerns. Aretha decides to bring a legal action against the company for sexual harassment. Does Aretha's complaint concern quid pro quo harassment or hostile-environment harassment? What federal statute protects employees from sexual harassment? What remedies are available under that statute? What procedures must Aretha follow in pursuing her legal action?

26 Sole Proprietorships and Franchises

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What advantages and disadvantages are associated with the sole proprietorship?
2. What is required by the Franchise Rule, and why?
3. What might happen if a franchisor exercises too much control over the operations of a franchise?
4. When will a court decide that a franchisor has wrongfully terminated a franchise?

Entrepreneur One who initiates and assumes the financial risk of a new business enterprise and undertakes to provide or control its management.

"Why not go out on a limb? Isn't that where the fruit is?"

Frank Scully
1892–1964
(American author)

Many Americans would agree with Frank Scully's comment in the chapter-opening quotation that to succeed in business one must "go out on a limb." Certainly, an entrepreneur's primary motive for "going out on a limb" to start a business enterprise is to make profits.

An entrepreneur is one who initiates and assumes the financial risks of a new enterprise and undertakes to provide or control its management. Keep in mind that many of the biggest corporations today, such as Apple, Alphabet (Google), and Amazon, were originally very small companies. Jeff Bezos, founder of Amazon, and Steve Jobs, founder of Apple, started their companies in their garages.

One of the first decisions an entrepreneur must make is which form of business organization will be most appropriate for the new endeavor. In selecting an organizational form, the entrepreneur will consider a number of factors, including (1) ease of creation, (2) the liability of the owners, (3) tax considerations, and (4) the ability to raise capital. Keep these factors in mind as you read the chapters in this unit and learn about the various forms of business organization. In considering these business forms, remember, too, that the primary motive of an entrepreneur is to make profits.

Traditionally, entrepreneurs have used three major forms to structure their business enterprises—the sole proprietorship, the partnership, and the corporation. In this chapter, we examine sole proprietorships. We also discuss franchises. Although the franchise is not, strictly speaking, a separate business organizational form, it is widely used today by entrepreneurs.

26–1 Sole Proprietorships

The simplest form of business is a sole proprietorship. In this form, the owner is the business. Thus, anyone who does business without creating a separate business organization has a sole proprietorship.

Sole Proprietorship The simplest form of business organization, in which the owner is the business. The owner reports business income as personal income and is legally responsible for all debts and obligations incurred by the business.

More than two-thirds of all U.S. businesses are sole proprietorships. Sole proprietors can own and manage any type of business, from an informal home office or Web-based undertaking to a large restaurant or construction firm. Most sole proprietorships are small enterprises, however. About 99 percent of the sole proprietorships in the United States have revenues of less than $1 million per year.

26–1a Advantages of the Sole Proprietorship

Focus Question 1

What advantages and disadvantages are associated with the sole proprietorship?

A major advantage of the sole proprietorship is that the proprietor owns the entire business and has a right to receive all of the profits (because of assuming all of the risk). In addition, starting a sole proprietorship is often easier and less costly than starting any other kind of business, as few legal formalities are involved. Generally, no documents need to be filed with the government to start a sole proprietorship.[1]

Taxes A sole proprietor pays only personal income taxes (including Social Security and Medicare taxes) on the business's profits. The profits are reported as personal income on the proprietor's personal income tax return. In other words, the business itself need not file an income tax return. Sole proprietors are allowed to establish retirement accounts that are tax-exempt until the funds are withdrawn. Like any form of business enterprise, a sole proprietorship can be liable for other taxes, such as those collected and applied to the disbursement of unemployment compensation.

Flexibility A sole proprietorship also offers more flexibility than does a partnership or a corporation. The sole proprietor is free to make any decision concerning the business—including whom to hire, when to take a vacation, and what kind of business to pursue. The sole proprietor can sell or transfer all or part of the business to another party at any time without seeking approval from anyone else. In contrast, approval is typically required from partners in a partnership and from shareholders in a corporation.

In the following case, a sole proprietor sold his cabinet and furniture business to another sole proprietor, and later filed a claim to recover for a customer's breach of contract. Considering that the seller no longer owned the business, on what basis did he have standing to pursue the claim?

1. Sole proprietorships may need to comply with certain zoning requirements, obtain a business license or other appropriate license from the state, and the like.

Case 26.1

Port Orchard Airport, Inc. v. Wagner

Court of Appeals of Washington, Division 2, __ Wash.App. __, __ P.3d __, 2020 WL 901452 (2020).

Facts Shannon Wagner was the owner of Northwest Cabinets & Furniture, a sole proprietorship, in Port Orchard, Washington, when he sold the business and its assets to Claire Misenar. Those assets included the business's books and records, computers and software, fixtures and furniture, phone system, phone number, trade name and all other intellectual property, domain name, social media accounts, and inventory. Wagner continued to work for the business, and within two years, Wagner and Misenar were married.

Continued

Later, Wagner filed a breach of contract claim in a Washington state court against Port Orchard Airport, Inc., for work performed by Northwest Cabinets & Furniture after Wagner had sold the business and married Misenar. A jury awarded damages, but the court found that Wagner was not the owner of the business, concluded that he lacked standing to assert the claim, and granted Port Orchard's motion to dismiss. Wagner appealed.

Issue Did Wagner have standing to pursue the claim against Port Orchard?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the trial court's order dismissing Wagner's claim and remanded the case with instructions to the trial court to reinstate the jury verdict in Wagner's favor.

Reason The trial court concluded that Northwest Cabinets & Furniture was Misenar's separate property. The appellate court disagreed.

Misenar bought the business, a sole proprietorship, from Wagner. The appellate court recognized, "When an individual does business as a sole proprietorship, the individual and the sole proprietorship are legally indistinguishable. An individual does not create a separate legal entity by doing business as a sole proprietor." The court reasoned that because Northwest Cabinets & Furniture was a sole proprietorship, it was inseparable from Misenar.

To have standing to assert a claim, a party must have a "real" interest in the case. In the state of Washington, all property acquired during marriage is community property. Wagner and Misenar were married. Therefore, Wagner had a community property interest in Northwest Cabinets & Furniture. And a community property interest is a sufficiently real interest to confer standing.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment The trial court ruled that Wagner could have been an agent for "the business." Why, in the view of the appellate court, did this ruling make no sense?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that instead of Wagner, Misenar had pursued the claim in the case against Port Orchard. Would the result have been different? Discuss.

26–1b Disadvantages of the Sole Proprietorship

The major disadvantage of the sole proprietorship is that the proprietor alone bears the burden of any losses or liabilities incurred by the business enterprise. In other words, the sole proprietor has unlimited liability, or legal responsibility, for all obligations incurred in doing business.

Can a person who owns a trucking business as a sole proprietorship avoid liability for the business's tax debts?

Case Example 26.1 Richard Casias registered his business, Casias Trucking, as a sole proprietorship with the New Mexico Taxation and Revenue Department. Several years later, Casias began presenting Casias Trucking as a limited liability company (LLC) to the public. He did not, however, follow the proper procedures in registering this change with the Department.

An audit revealed that Casias Trucking owed about $200,000 in back taxes, interest, and penalties. When the bulk of this amount went unpaid, the Department placed a tax lien on Casias's personal property. Casias argued that the tax liability did not rest with him, but with Casias Trucking LLC. A state appeals court ruled that, because Casias had failed to properly register Casias Trucking as an LLC with the Department, it remained a sole proprietorship. Therefore, Casias was personally liable for Casias Trucking's debts.[2]

This chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature further demonstrates how difficult it is for a sole proprietor to escape liability for acts taken on behalf of the business entity.

"Doing Business As" a Sole Proprietor

Suppose Jane Smith wants to start a face-mask manufacturing business as a sole proprietor. Jane finds the name "Jane Smith's Face Masks" uninspiring. She would rather call her new venture "Masks Almighty." She thinks this name will make for more effective online marketing. Because the business name is different from her name, in many states Jane will be required to file a "Doing Business As" (DBA) statement, which provides notice to the public of the true owner of the enterprise.

Simple, Inexpensive, and Separate

Even if it were not legally required, many sole proprietors would file for DBAs, known in some jurisdictions as Fictitious Business Names (FBNs). For the most part, DBAs are simple and inexpensive to create. As with the case of Jane Smith, they allow the sole proprietor to match the name to the product or service provided in a marketing-friendly way. DBAs also provide privacy and a degree of separation for sole proprietors who might not want their personal names easily connected to their businesses.

Regulations for DBAs vary from state to state. In most instances, the sole proprietor must go online and check a state database to ensure that the new trade name is not already being used. In many, though not all, states, the entire DBA process can be completed on the Internet, with costs as low as $45 and approval waiting times as short as one week.

The DBA Effect

The fact that the name of the business owner and the name of the business are different does not change the basic rule that, with a sole proprietorship, the owner is the business. A federal court felt the need to drive this legal point home to David Ruiz after a restaurant that Ruiz owned as a sole proprietor showed a televised boxing match without paying a licensing fee. When the licensor sued, Ruiz said that he had leased the restaurant, Cotija Mex Grill, to Enrique Hernandez before the night of the match. Therefore, Ruiz claimed, he was not responsible for the incident.

"It is unclear," said the court, "how Ruiz could lease Cotija to Hernandez when Cotija, as a sole proprietorship, is legally indistinct from Ruiz." Because Ruiz and the restaurant, with its DBA, were a single legal entity, the court ruled, Ruiz could be held liable for Cotija Mex Grill's wrongdoing.[a]

Critical Thinking

After filing (often online) a DBA or FBN, the sole proprietor must publish the statement in a newspaper to notify the public. For the most part, online DBA notification is not an option. Should it be? Explain your answer.

a. G & G Closed Circuit Events, LLC, v. Gonzalez Ruiz, 379 F.Supp. 3d 1061 (S.D. Cal. 2019).

Personal Assets at Risk Because of the sole proprietor's unlimited liability, creditors can go after personal assets to satisfy any business debts. Although sole proprietors may obtain insurance to protect the business, liability can easily exceed policy limits. This unlimited liability is a major factor to be considered in choosing a business form.

Example 26.2 Sheila operates a golf shop near a world-class golf course as a sole proprietorship. One of Sheila's employees fails to secure a display of golf clubs, and they fall on Dean, a professional golfer, and seriously injure him. If Dean sues Sheila's shop and wins, Sheila's personal liability could easily exceed the limits of her insurance policy. Sheila could lose not only her business, but also her house, her car, and any other personal assets that can be attached to pay the judgment.

Lack of Continuity and Limited Ability to Raise Capital The sole proprietorship also has the disadvantage of lacking continuity after the death of the proprietor. When the owner dies, so does the business—it is automatically dissolved.

Another disadvantage is that in raising capital, the proprietor is limited to personal funds and any loans that can be obtained for the business. Lenders may be unwilling to make loans to sole proprietorships, particularly start-ups, because the sole proprietor risks unlimited personal liability and may not be able to pay.

26–2 Franchises

Franchise Any arrangement in which the owner of a trademark, trade name, or copyright licenses another to use that trademark, trade name, or copyright in the selling of goods or services.

Franchisee One receiving a license to use another's (the franchisor's) trademark, trade name, or copyright in the sale of goods and services.

Franchisor One licensing another (the franchisee) to use the owner's trademark, trade name, or copyright in the selling of goods or services.

Instead of setting up a completely independent business, many entrepreneurs opt to purchase a franchise. A franchise is an arrangement in which the owner of intellectual property—such as a trademark, a trade name, or a copyright—licenses others to use it in the selling of goods or services. A franchisee (a purchaser of a franchise) is generally legally independent of the franchisor (the seller of the franchise). At the same time, the franchisee is economically dependent on the franchisor's integrated business system. In other words, a franchisee can operate as an independent businessperson and choose any business form but still obtain the advantages of a regional or national organization. Today, franchising companies and their franchisees account for a significant portion of all retail sales in this country. Well-known franchises include McDonald's, 7-Eleven, and Holiday Inn.

26–2a Types of Franchises

Many different kinds of businesses sell franchises, and numerous types of franchises are available. Generally, though, most franchises fall into one of three classifications: distributorships, chain-style business operations, or manufacturing or processing-plant arrangements.

If a brand of beer is sold through authorized wholesale distributors only, can a potential distributor of the beer obtain an exclusive territory?

Distributorships In a distributorship, a manufacturer (the franchisor) licenses a dealer (the franchisee) to sell its product. Often, a distributorship covers an exclusive territory. Automobile dealerships and beer distributorships are examples of this type of franchise.

Example 26.3 Black Snow Beer Company distributes its beer brands through a network of authorized wholesale distributors, each with an assigned territory. Marik signs a distributorship contract for the area from Gainesville to Ocala, Florida. If the contract states that Marik is the exclusive distributor in that area, then no other franchisee may distribute Black Snow beer in that region. ■

Chain-Style Business Operations In a chain-style business operation, a franchise operates under a franchisor's trade name and is identified as a member of a select group of dealers that engage in the franchisor's business. The franchisee is generally required to follow standardized or prescribed methods of operation. In addition, the franchisee may be required to obtain materials and supplies exclusively from the franchisor.

McDonald's and most other fast-food chains are examples of chain-style franchises. This type of franchise is also common in service-related businesses, including real estate brokerage firms such as Century 21 and tax-preparing services such as H&R Block, Inc.

Manufacturing or Processing-Plant Arrangements In a manufacturing or processing-plant arrangement, the franchisor transmits to the franchisee the essential ingredients or formula to make a particular product. The franchisee then markets the product either at wholesale or at retail in accordance with the franchisor's standards. Examples of this type of franchise are Pepsi-Cola and other soft-drink bottling companies.

Know This

Because a franchise involves the licensing of a trademark, a trade name, or a copyright, the law governing intellectual property may apply in some situations.

26–2b Laws Governing Franchising

Because a franchise relationship is primarily a contractual relationship, it is governed by contract law. If the franchise exists primarily for the sale of products manufactured by the franchisor, the law governing sales contracts as expressed in Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code applies.

Additionally, the federal government and most states have enacted laws governing certain aspects of franchising. Generally, these laws are designed to protect prospective franchisees from dishonest franchisors and to prohibit franchisors from terminating franchises without good cause.

Federal Regulation of Franchising The federal government regulates franchising through laws that apply to specific industries and through the Franchise Rule, created by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC).

Industry-Specific Standards. Congress has enacted laws that protect franchisees in certain industries, such as automobile dealerships and service stations. These laws protect the franchisee from unreasonable demands and bad-faith terminations of the franchise by the franchisor.

An automobile manufacturer-franchisor cannot make unreasonable demands of dealer-franchisees or set unrealistically high sales quotas, for instance. If an automobile manufacturer-franchisor terminates a franchise because of a dealer-franchisee's failure to comply with unreasonable demands, the manufacturer may be liable for damages.[3]

Similarly, federal law prescribes the conditions under which a franchisor of service stations can terminate a franchise.[4] In addition, federal antitrust laws sometimes apply to prohibit certain types of anticompetitive agreements involving service-station franchises.

The Franchise Rule. The FTC's Franchise Rule requires franchisors to disclose certain material facts that a prospective franchisee needs in order to make an informed decision concerning the purchase of a franchise.[5] Those who violate the Franchise Rule are subject to substantial civil penalties, and the FTC can sue on behalf of injured parties to recover damages.

Focus Question 2

What is required by the Franchise Rule, and why?

The rule requires the franchisor to make numerous written disclosures to prospective franchisees (see Exhibit 26–1). All representations made to a prospective franchisee must have a reasonable basis. For instance, if a franchisor provides projected earnings figures, the franchisor must indicate whether the figures are based on actual data or hypothetical

Exhibit 26–1 The FTC's Franchise Rule Requirements

REQUIREMENTS	EXPLANATION
Written (or electronic) disclosures	The franchisor must make numerous disclosures, such as the range of goods and services included, as well as the value and estimated profitability of the franchise. Disclosures can be delivered on paper or electronically. Prospective franchisees must be able to download or save any electronic disclosure documents.
Reasonable basis for any representations	To prevent deception, all representations made to a prospective franchisee must have a reasonable basis at the time they are made.
Projected earnings figures	If a franchisor provides projected earnings figures, the franchisor must indicate whether the figures are based on actual data or hypothetical examples. The Franchise Rule does not require franchisors to provide potential earnings figures, however.
Actual data	If a franchisor makes sales or earnings projections based on actual data for a specific franchise location, the franchisor must disclose the number and percentage of its existing franchises that have achieved this result.
Explanation of terms	Franchisors are required to explain termination, cancellation, and renewal provisions of the franchise contract to potential franchisees before the agreement is signed.

examples. If a franchisor makes sales or earnings projections based on actual data for a specific franchise location, the franchisor must disclose the number and percentage of its existing franchises that have achieved this result. The Franchise Rule does not require franchisors to provide potential earnings figures, however.

State Regulation of Franchising State legislation varies but generally is aimed at protecting franchisees from unfair practices and bad-faith terminations by franchisors.

State Disclosures. A number of states have laws similar to the federal rules requiring franchisors to provide presale disclosures to prospective franchisees.[6] Many state laws also require that a disclosure document (known as the Franchise Disclosure Document, or FDD) be registered or filed with a state official. State laws may also require that a franchisor submit advertising aimed at prospective franchisees to the state for approval.

To protect franchisees, a state law may require the disclosure of information such as the actual costs of operation, recurring expenses, and profits earned, along with data substantiating these figures. State deceptive trade practices acts may also apply and may prohibit certain actions on the part of franchisors.

When can an automobile manufacturer franchisor terminate the franchise of an authorized dealer for failing to sufficiently hire and train personnel?

Requirements for Termination. To prevent arbitrary or bad-faith terminations, state law may prohibit termination without "good cause" or require that certain procedures be followed in terminating a franchising relationship.

Case Example 26.4 TS & A Motors (TSA) entered into a franchise agreement to become an authorized dealership for the sale and service of Kia automobiles. Under this agreement, TSA was required to employ a "sufficient number of competent personnel" and provide regular training for its parts and service department employees.

Over a period of nearly five years, TSA consistently failed to fill the positions mandated by the franchise agreement or to provide the necessary training for staffers. Finally, Kia canceled TSA's franchise. TSA sued, claiming that Kia had not given it enough time under state law to fix issues caused by "an unprecedented tight labor market for automobile service workers." The Supreme Court of New Hampshire ruled that Kia had good cause for termination, considering the "continuing nature" of TSA's staffing problems and Kia's patience while giving the franchisee multiple chances to solve these problems.[7]

26–3 The Franchise Contract

The franchise relationship is defined by a contract between the franchisor and the franchisee. The franchise contract specifies the terms and conditions of the franchise and spells out the rights and duties of both parties. If either party fails to perform the contractual duties, that party may be subject to a lawsuit for breach of contract. Generally, statutes and case law governing franchising emphasize the importance of good faith and fair dealing in franchise relationships.

Because each type of franchise relationship has its own characteristics, franchise contracts tend to differ. Nonetheless, certain major issues typically are addressed in a franchise contract.

26–3a Payment for the Franchise

The franchisee ordinarily pays an initial fee or lump-sum price for the franchise license (the privilege of being granted a franchise). This fee is separate from the various products that the franchisee purchases from or through the franchisor. The franchise agreement may also require the franchisee to pay a percentage of advertising costs and certain administrative expenses.

In some industries, the franchisor relies heavily on the initial sale of the franchise for realizing a profit. In other industries, the continued dealing between the parties brings profit to both. Generally, the franchisor receives a stated percentage of the annual (or monthly) sales or volume of business done by the franchisee.

What are some of the payments that franchisees typically make to franchisors?

26–3b Business Premises

The franchise agreement may specify whether the premises for the business must be leased or purchased outright. Sometimes, a building must be constructed or remodeled to meet the terms of the agreement. The agreement usually specifies whether the franchisor supplies equipment and furnishings for the premises or whether this is the responsibility of the franchisee.

26–3c Location of the Franchise

Typically, the franchisor determines the territory to be served. Some franchise contracts give the franchisee exclusive rights, or "territorial rights," to a certain geographic area. Other franchise contracts, though they define the territory allotted to a particular franchise, either specifically state that the franchise is nonexclusive or are silent on the issue of territorial rights.

Many franchise cases involve disputes over territorial rights, and the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing often comes into play in this area of franchising. If the franchise contract does not grant exclusive territorial rights to a franchisee and the franchisor allows a competing franchise to be established nearby, the franchisee may suffer a significant loss in profits. In this situation, a court may hold that the franchisor's actions breached an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing.

26–3d Quality Control by the Franchisor

The day-to-day operation of the franchise business normally is left up to the franchisee. Nonetheless, the franchise agreement may specify that the franchisor will provide some degree of supervision and control so that it can protect the franchise's name and reputation.

Means of Control When the franchise prepares a product, such as food, or provides a service, such as motel accommodations, the contract often states that the franchisor will establish certain standards for the facility. Typically, the contract states that the franchisor is permitted to make periodic inspections to ensure that the standards are being maintained.

As a means of controlling quality, franchise agreements also typically limit the franchisee's ability to sell the franchise to another party. Example 26.5 Mark Keller, an authorized Jaguar franchise, contracts to sell its dealership to Henrique Autos West. A Jaguar franchise generally cannot be sold without Jaguar Cars' permission. Prospective franchisees must meet Jaguar's customer satisfaction standards. If Henrique Autos fails to meet those standards, Jaguar can refuse to allow the sale and can terminate the franchise.

Focus Question 3

What might happen if a franchisor exercises too much control over the operations of a franchise?

Degree of Control As a general rule, the validity of a provision permitting the franchisor to establish and enforce certain quality standards is unquestioned. The franchisor has a legitimate interest in maintaining the quality of the product or service to protect its name and reputation.

If a franchisor exercises too much control over the operations of its franchisees, however, the franchisor risks potential liability. A franchisor may also occasionally be held liable—under the doctrine of respondeat superior—for the tortious acts of the franchisees' employees. (This chapter's Cybersecurity and the Law feature looks at the issue of control in the context of security breaches.)

Know This

Under the doctrine of respondeat superior, an employer may be liable for the torts of employees if they occur within the scope of employment, without regard to the personal fault of the employer.

26–3e Pricing Arrangements

Franchises provide the franchisor with an outlet for the firm's goods and services. Depending on the nature of the business, the franchisor may require the franchisee to purchase certain supplies from the franchisor at an established price.[8] A franchisor cannot, however, set the prices at which the franchisee will resell the goods, because such price setting may be a violation of state or federal antitrust laws, or both. A franchisor can suggest retail prices but cannot mandate them.

8. Although a franchisor can require franchisees to purchase supplies from it, requiring a franchisee to purchase exclusively from the franchisor may violate federal antitrust laws.

Brinker International, Inc.

The news that Brinker International, Inc., was the defendant in a cybersecurity class-action lawsuit did not attract much attention outside the business world.[a] The reason: Brinker, a franchisor, has only a fraction of the name recognition of its main franchise, Chili's Grill & Bar. But when the payment systems at a number of Chili's restaurants were hacked, Brinker was the entity sued, underscoring a growing dilemma for franchisors in the era of large-scale data breaches.

Attacking the Franchise

Because of the massive number of credit card transactions they process, franchises are a common target of hackers. In case after case involving franchises such as Dairy Queen, UPS, Wendy's, and Goodwill, hackers have used malware to infiltrate the franchise's point-of-sale (POS) system. Even though the franchisee usually has actual control over the POS terminals, the focus in the wake of a data breach is almost always the franchisor.

In some instances, the Franchise Disclosure Document (FDD) will contain specific provisions that detail the responsibilities and obligations for both franchisors and franchisees with regard to data protection. Many FDDs are vague when it comes to cybersecurity, however, leaving the impression that the franchisor, which generally has control over the franchisee's information technology (IT) systems, must provide security for those systems. Furthermore, as far as plaintiffs' attorneys are concerned, the "deep pockets" of the franchisor hold more promise for a large settlement that do the relatively limited resources of any individual franchisee. So, as was the case with Brinker, after a data breach of a franchisee, the blame and potential liability almost always end up with the franchisor.

Critical Thinking

Suppose a franchisor has two choices when it comes to cybersecurity provisions in its FDD. The franchisor can either (a) assume control and responsibility for a franchisee's privacy security system, or (b) avoid this control and responsibility, leaving point-of-sale security in the hands of the franchisee. Which is the better choice? Why?

26–4 Franchise Termination

The duration of the franchise is a matter to be determined between the parties. Sometimes, a franchise will start out for a short period, such as a year, so that the franchisor can determine whether it wants to stay in business with the franchisee. At other times, the duration of the franchise contract correlates with the term of the lease for the business premises, and both are renewable at the end of that period.

26–4a Grounds for Termination

Usually, the franchise agreement specifies that termination must be "for cause" and then defines the grounds for termination. Cause might include, for instance, the death or disability of the franchisee, insolvency of the franchisee, breach of the franchise agreement, or failure to meet specified sales quotas.

In the following case, a franchisee contended that its franchisor did not have good cause to terminate the franchise.

S&P Brake Supply, Inc. v. Daimler Trucks North America, LLC

Montana Supreme Court, 2018 MT 25, 390 Mont. 243, 411 P.3d 1264 (2018).

Facts S&P Brake Supply, Inc., was the sole authorized dealer of Western Star Trucks in Yellowstone County, Montana. S&P operated its franchise under an agreement with Daimler Trucks North America, LLC. The agreement required S&P to sell a certain number of trucks in its "area of responsibility" (AOR) (Yellowstone County). Over a three-year period, S&P sold only two trucks. Daimler advised its franchisee to use more effective marketing strategies and hire more sales staff, among other things.

The next year, primarily because of S&P's failure to meet its sales goals, Daimler notified S&P that the franchise was being terminated. S&P filed an objection with the Montana Department of Justice, Motor Vehicle Division. The department issued a decision in Daimler's favor. S&P filed a petition in a state court for review. The court upheld the department's decision. S&P appealed to the Montana Supreme Court.

Issue Did Daimler have good cause to terminate S&P's franchise?

Decision Yes. The Montana Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. The court did not err by upholding the department's decision.

Reason The evidence showed, and the department found, that "S&P's sales were deficient no matter which way one analyzed the data." Year after year, S&P failed to meet its sales goals, which were based on market factors and the population of Yellowstone County. In addition to this failure, of the seven Western Star trucks registered in the county during the last four years of S&P's franchise, S&P had sold only two of them. That the majority of Western Star trucks in S&P's AOR were bought elsewhere indicated that the franchisee was not reaching and serving local customers. Compared to the sales performance of other Western Star dealers in the region, S&P's share of its market was low. This comparison relied on national truck registration data. S&P argued that an analysis of its performance should have been based solely on evidence related to Yellowstone County. Because S&P was the only dealer in the county, however, limiting the evidence would not allow a comparison to other dealers, and there would be no meaningful basis for evaluating the lone franchisee's performance.

Critical Thinking

- Economic The department concluded that S&P's failure to use more effective marketing strategies and to hire more sales staff breached the franchise agreement. S&P argued that these were not material breaches because the agreement's fundamental purpose was to sell trucks. Is S&P correct? Discuss.
- Legal Environment Considering that S&P was the only Western Star truck dealer in Yellowstone County, did discontinuing the franchise injure the public interest? Explain.

Notice Requirements Most franchise contracts provide that notice of termination must be given. If no set time for termination is specified, then a reasonable time, with notice, is implied. A franchisee must be given reasonable time to wind up the business—that is, to do the accounting and return the copyright or trademark or any other property of the franchisor.

Opportunity to Cure a Breach A franchise agreement may state that the franchisee may attempt to cure an ordinary, curable breach within a certain period of time after notice so as to postpone, or even avoid, the termination of the contract. Even when a contract contains a notice-and-cure provision, however, a franchisee's breach of the duty of honesty and fidelity may be enough to allow the franchisor to terminate the franchise.

Spotlight Case Example 26.6 Milind and Minaxi Upadhyaya entered into a franchise contract with 7-Eleven, Inc., to operate a store in Pennsylvania. The contract included a notice-and-cure provision. Under 7-Eleven's usual contract, franchisees lease the store and equipment, and receive a license to use 7-Eleven's trademarks and other intellectual property. 7-Eleven receives a percentage of the store's gross profit (net sales less the cost of goods sold).

A 7-Eleven manager noticed a high rate of certain questionable transactions at the Upadhyayas' store and began investigating. The investigation continued for nearly two years and revealed that the store had been misreporting its sales to 7-Eleven so as to conceal sales proceeds. Evidence indicated that nearly one-third of the store's sales transactions had not been properly recorded.

7-Eleven sent a "non-curable" notice of material breach and termination of the franchise to the Upadhyayas. The franchisees argued that they had not been given an opportunity to cure the breach. The court found there was sufficient evidence of fraud to warrant immediate termination without an opportunity to cure.[9]

Tupungato/Shutterstock.com

Why did a court prevent 7-Eleven franchisees from curing a breach of their franchise agreement?

26–4b Wrongful Termination

Because a franchisor's termination of a franchise often has adverse consequences for the franchisee, much franchise litigation involves claims of wrongful termination. Generally, the termination provisions of contracts are more favorable to the franchisor. This means that the franchisee, who normally invests a substantial amount of time and funds to make the franchise operation successful, may receive little or nothing for the business on termination. The franchisor owns the trademark and hence the business.

It is in this area that statutory and case law become important. The federal and state laws discussed earlier attempt, among other things, to protect franchisees from arbitrary or unfair termination of their franchises by the franchisors.

Focus Question 4

When will a court decide that a franchisor has wrongfully terminated a franchise?

26–4c The Importance of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

Generally, both statutory law and case law emphasize the importance of good faith and fair dealing in terminating a franchise relationship. In determining whether a franchisor has acted in good faith when terminating a franchise agreement, the courts generally try to balance the rights of both parties.

If a court perceives that a franchisor has arbitrarily or unfairly terminated a franchise, the franchisee will be provided with a remedy for wrongful termination. When a franchisor's decision to terminate a franchise was made in the normal course of the franchisor's business operations, however, that weighs in favor of the franchisor. In that situation, a court generally will not consider termination wrongful as long as reasonable notice of termination was given to the franchisee.

The importance of good faith and fair dealing in a franchise relationship is underscored by the consequences of the franchisor's acts in the following case.

Spotlight on Holiday Inns: Case 26.3

Holiday Inn Franchising, Inc. v. Hotel Associates, Inc.

Court of Appeals of Arkansas, 2011 Ark.App. 147, 382 S.W.3d 6 (2011).

Facts Buddy House was in the construction business. For decades, he collaborated on projects with Holiday Inn Franchising, Inc. Their relationship was characterized by good faith—many projects were undertaken without written contracts. At Holiday Inn's request, House inspected a hotel in Wichita Falls, Texas, to estimate the cost of getting it into shape. Holiday Inn wanted House to renovate the hotel and operate it as a Holiday Inn. House estimated that recovering the cost of renovation would take him more than ten years, so he asked for a franchise term longer than Holiday Inn's usual ten years. Holiday Inn refused but said that if he ran the hotel "appropriately," the term would be extended at the end of ten years. House bought the hotel, renovated it, and operated it as Hotel Associates, Inc. (HAI), generating substantial profits. He refused offers to sell it for as much as $15 million.

Before the ten years had passed, Greg Aden, a Holiday Inn executive, developed a plan to license a different local hotel as a Holiday Inn instead of renewing House's franchise license. Aden stood to earn a commission from licensing the other hotel. No one informed House of Aden's plan. When the time came, HAI applied for an extension of its franchise, and Holiday Inn asked for major renovations. HAI spent $3 million to comply with this request. Holiday Inn did not renew the term for HAI, however, and granted a franchise to the other hotel instead. HAI sold its hotel for $5 million and filed a suit against Holiday Inn, asserting fraud. The court awarded HAI compensatory and punitive damages. Holiday Inn appealed.

Issue Did Holiday Inn's failure to inform House that it intended to grant the franchise to a different local hotel constitute fraud?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment.

Reason The court recognized that a failure to volunteer information normally does not constitute fraud. But silence can amount to fraud when parties are in a relationship of trust and there is an "inequality" of knowledge between them—for instance, when one party has information that the other party is justified in assuming does not exist.

In this case, House's relationship with Holiday Inn was characterized by "honesty, trust, and the free flow of pertinent information." With respect to the Wichita Falls hotel, Holiday Inn assured HAI that its franchise would be renewed after ten years if it ran the hotel "appropriately." House was thus justified in assuming that his franchise was not in jeopardy.

Holiday Inn, however, knew of Aden's plan to license a different facility in the same area and did not inform House. In these circumstances, the failure to inform was fraud. Even Holiday Inn personnel, including Aden, admitted that House should have been informed. The appellate court also upheld the lower court's award of compensatory damages and increased the amount of punitive damages, citing Holiday Inn's "degree of reprehensibility."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Why should House and HAI have been advised of Holiday Inn's plan to grant a franchise to a different hotel in their territory?

Practice and Review

Carlos Del Rey decided to open a fast-food Mexican restaurant and signed a franchise contract with a national chain called La Grande Enchilada. Under the franchise agreement, Del Rey purchased the building, and La Grande Enchilada supplied the equipment. The contract required the franchisee to strictly follow the franchisor's operating manual and stated that failure to do so would be grounds for terminating the franchise contract. The manual set forth detailed operating procedures and safety standards, and provided that a La Grande Enchilada representative would inspect the restaurant monthly to ensure compliance.

Nine months after Del Rey began operating his restaurant, a spark from the grill ignited an oily towel in the kitchen. No one was injured, but by the time firefighters put out the fire, the kitchen had sustained extensive damage. The cook told the fire department that the towel was "about two feet from the grill" when it caught fire, which was in compliance with the franchisor's manual that required towels to be at least one foot from the grills. Nevertheless, the next day La Grande Enchilada notified Del Rey that his franchise would terminate in thirty days for failure to follow the prescribed safety procedures. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What type of franchise was Del Rey's La Grande Enchilada restaurant?
2. If Del Rey operates the restaurant as a sole proprietorship, who bears the loss for the damaged kitchen? Explain.
3. Assume that Del Rey files a lawsuit against La Grande Enchilada, claiming that his franchise was wrongfully terminated. What is the main factor a court would consider in determining whether the franchise was wrongfully terminated?
4. Would a court be likely to rule that La Grande Enchilada had good cause to terminate Del Rey's franchise in this situation? Why or why not?

Chapter Summary: Sole Proprietorships and Franchises

Sole Proprietorships	The sole proprietorship is the simplest form of business organization. Anyone who does business without creating a separate business entity is a sole proprietor. The owner is the business. The owner pays personal income taxes on all profits and is personally liable for all business debts.
Franchises	1. Types of franchises— a. Distributorships (for example, automobile dealerships). b. Chain-style business operations (for example, fast-food chains). c. Manufacturing or processing-plant arrangements (for example, soft-drink bottling companies). 2. Laws governing franchising—Franchises are governed by contract law. They are also governed by federal and state statutory laws, as well as agency regulations.

The Franchise Contact	The franchise relationship is defined by a contract between the franchisor and the franchisee. The contract normally spells out the following terms: 1. Payment for the franchise—Ordinarily, the contract requires the franchisee (purchaser) to pay an initial fee or lump-sum price for the franchise license. 2. Business premises—The contract may specify whether the business premises will be leased or purchased by the franchisee and which party will provide the equipment and furnishings. 3. Location of the franchise—The franchisor typically specifies the territory to be served by the franchisee. 4. Quality control—The franchisor may require the franchisee to abide by certain standards of quality relating to the product or service offered. 5. Pricing arrangements—The franchisor may require the franchisee to purchase certain supplies from the franchisor at an established price but cannot set retail resale prices.
Franchise Termination	Usually, the contract specifies the duration and conditions of termination of the franchise arrangement. Both federal and state statutes attempt to protect franchisees from franchisors who unfairly or arbitrarily terminate franchises.

1. Frank plans to open a sporting goods store and to hire Gogi and Hap. Frank will invest only his own funds. He expects that he will not make a profit for at least eighteen months and will make only a small profit in the three years after that. He hopes to expand eventually. Would a sole proprietorship be an appropriate form for Frank's business? Why or why not? (See Sole Proprietorships.)
2. Thirsty Bottling Company and U.S. Beverages, Inc. (USB), enter into a franchise agreement that states that the franchise may be terminated at any time "for cause." Thirsty fails to meet USB's specified sales quota. Does this constitute "cause" for termination? Why or why not? (See Franchise Termination.)

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

26–1. Franchising. Maria, Pablo, and Vicky are recent college graduates who would like to go into business for themselves. They are considering purchasing a franchise. If they enter into a franchising arrangement, they would have the support of a large company that could answer any questions they might have. Also, a firm that has been in business for many years would be experienced in dealing with some of the problems that novice businesspersons might encounter. These and other attributes of franchises can lessen some of the risks of the marketplace. What other aspects of franchising—positive and negative—should Maria, Pablo, and Vicky consider before committing themselves to a particular franchise? (See Franchises.)

26–2. Control of a Franchise. National Foods, Inc., sells franchises to its fast-food restaurants, known as Chicky-D's. Under the franchise agreement, franchisees agree to hire and train employees strictly according to Chicky-D's standards. In addition, Chicky-D's regional supervisors must approve all new hires and policies, which they generally do. Chicky-D's reserves the right to terminate a franchise for violating the franchisor's rules. After several incidents of racist comments and conduct by Tim, a recently hired assistant manager at a Chicky-D's, Sharon, a counterperson at the restaurant, resigns. Sharon files a suit against National. National files a motion for summary judgment, arguing that it is not liable for harassment by franchise employees. Will the court grant National's motion? Why or why not? (See The Franchise Contact.)

26–3. Spotlight on McDonald's—Franchise Termination.

C.B. Management, Inc., had a franchise agreement with McDonald's Corp. to operate McDonald's restaurants in Cleveland, Ohio. The agreement required C.B. to make monthly payments of certain percentages of the gross sales to McDonald's. If any payment was more than thirty days late, McDonald's had the right to terminate the franchise. The agreement also stated that even if McDonald's accepted a late payment, that would not "constitute a waiver of any subsequent breach." McDonald's sometimes accepted C.B.'s late payments, but when C.B. defaulted on the payments in July, McDonald's gave notice of thirty days to comply or surrender possession of the restaurants. C.B. missed the deadline. McDonald's demanded that C.B. vacate the restaurants, but C.B. refused. McDonald's alleged that C.B. had violated the franchise agreement. C.B. claimed that McDonald's had breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Which party should prevail, and why? [McDonald's Corp. v. C.B. Management Co., 13 F.Supp.2d 705 (N.D.Ill. 1998)] (See Franchise Termination.)

26–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Quality Control. JTH Tax, Inc., doing business as Liberty Tax Service, provides tax preparation and related loan services throughout the United States in more than two thousand company-owned and franchised stores. Liberty's agreement with its franchisees reserved the right to control their ads. In company operations manuals, Liberty provided step-by-step instructions, directions, and limitations to its franchisees regarding their ads. Liberty retained the right to unilaterally modify the steps at any time. The California Attorney General filed a suit in a California state court against Liberty, alleging misleading or deceptive ads by its franchisees regarding refund anticipation loans and e-refund checks. Can Liberty be held liable? Discuss. [People v. JTH Tax, Inc., 212 Cal.App.4th 1219, 151 Cal.Rptr.3d 728 (1 Dist. 2013)] (See The Franchise Contract.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 26–4, go to Appendix E.

26–5. Quality Control. The franchise agreement of Domino's Pizza, LLC, sets out operational standards, including safety requirements, for a franchisee to follow but provides that the franchisee is an independent contractor. Each franchisee is free to use its own means and methods. For example, Domino's does not know whether a franchisee's delivery drivers are complying with vehicle safety requirements. MAC Pizza Management, Inc., operates a Domino's franchise. A vehicle driven by Joshua Balka, a MAC delivery driver, hydroplaned due to a bald tire and wet pavement, and struck the vehicle of Devavaram and Ruth Christopher, killing Ruth and injuring Devavaram. Is Domino's liable for negligence? Explain. [Domino's Pizza, LLC v. Reddy, 2015 WL 1247349 (Tex.App.—Beaumont 2015)] (See The Franchise Contract.)

26–6. Franchise Termination. Executive Home Care Franchising, LLC, sells in-home health-care franchises. Clint, Massare, and Greer Marshall entered into a franchise agreement with Executive Home Care. The agreement provided that the franchisees' failure to comply with the agreement's terms would likely cause irreparable harm to the franchisor, entitling it to an injunction. About two years later, the Marshalls gave up their franchise. They returned thirteen boxes of documents, stationery, operating manuals, marketing materials, and other items—everything in their possession that featured Executive Home Care trademarks. They quit operating out of the franchised location. They transferred the phone number back to the franchisor and informed their clients that they were no longer associated with Executive Home Care. They continued to engage in the home health-care business, however, under the name "Well-Being Home Care Corp." Is Executive Home Care entitled to an injunction against the Marshalls and their new company? Discuss. [Executive Home Care Franchising, LLC v. Marshall Health Corp., 642 Fed.Appx. 181 (3d Cir. 2016)] (See Franchise Termination.)

26–7. Location of the Franchise. Chrysler, LLC, awarded a Chrysler-Jeep franchise in Billings, Montana, to Lithia Motors, Inc. Lithia exceeded the sales goals and other expectations expressed in the franchise agreement. Later, Chrysler approved an application by Rimrock Chrysler, Inc., to open an additional Chrysler-Jeep franchise less than a mile from Lithia's location. Lithia's agreement was silent on the issue of territorial rights, but the dealer protested Chrysler's approval of Rimrock's application. Could Chrysler's actions be considered a breach of the franchisor's deal with Lithia? Discuss. [Rimrock Chrysler, Inc. v. State of Montana Department of Justice, Motor Vehicle Division, 2018 MT 24, 390 Mont. 235, 411 P.3d 1278 (2018)] (See The Franchise Contract.)

26–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Sole Proprietorships. Tom George was the sole owner of Turbine Component Super Market, LLC (TCSM), when its existence was terminated by the state of Texas. A TCSM creditor, Turbine Resources Unlimited, filed and won a suit in a Texas state court against George for breach of contract. The plaintiff sought to collect the amount of the judgment through a sale of George's property. Instead of turning his assets over to the court, however, George tried to hide them by reforming TCSM. Without telling the court, he paid an unrelated debt with $100,000 of TCSM's funds. George claimed that the funds were a loan and that he was merely an employee of TCSM. [Mitchell v. Turbine Resources Unlimited, Inc., 523 S.W.3d 189 (Tex.App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 2017)] (See Sole Proprietorships.)

1. Is it more likely that the court will recognize TCSM as an LLC or a sole proprietorship? Why?
2. Using the Discussion step of the IDDR approach, consider whether the owner of a business has an ethical obligation to represent the character and purpose of the organization truthfully.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

26–9. Business Law Writing. Jordan Mendelson is interested in purchasing a franchise in a meal-preparation business. Customers will come to the business to assemble gourmet dinners and then take the prepared meals to their homes for cooking. The franchisor requires each store to use a specific layout and provides the recipes for various dinners, but the franchisee is not required to purchase the food products from the franchisor. What general factors should Mendelson consider before entering into a contract to buy such a franchise? Is location important? Are there any laws that Mendelson should consider, given that this franchise involves food preparation and sales? Should Mendelson operate this business as a sole proprietorship? Why or why not? (See The Franchise Contract.)

26–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Franchise Termination. Walid Elkhatib, an Arab American, bought a Dunkin' Donuts franchise in Illinois. Ten years later, Dunkin' Donuts began offering breakfast sandwiches with bacon, ham, or sausage through its franchises. Elkhatib refused to sell these items at his store on the ground that his religion forbade the handling of pork. Elkhatib then opened a second franchise, at which he also refused to sell pork products. The next year, at both locations, Elkhatib began selling meatless sandwiches. He also opened a third franchise. When he proposed to relocate this franchise, Dunkin' Donuts refused to approve the new location and informed him that it would not renew any of his franchise agreements because he did not carry the full sandwich line. Elkhatib filed a lawsuit against Dunkin' Donuts. (See Franchise Termination.)

1. The first group will argue on behalf of Elkhatib that Dunkin' Donuts wrongfully terminated his franchises.
2. The second group will take the side of Dunkin' Donuts and justify its decision to terminate the franchises.
3. The third group will assess whether Dunkin' Donuts acted in good faith in its relationship with Elkhatib. It will also consider whether Dunkin' Donuts should be required to accommodate Elkhatib's religious beliefs and allow him to not serve pork in these three locations.

27 All Forms of Partnership

Focus Questions

The five Focus Question below are designed to help impove your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What are the three essential elements of a partnership?
2. What are the fiduciary duties of partners in a general partnership?
3. What is dissociation? What happens when a partner dissociates from a partnership?
4. What advantages do limited liability partnerships offer to businesspersons that are not offered by general partnerships?
5. What are the key differences between the rights and liabilities of general partners and those of limited partners?

"All men's gains are the fruit of venturing."

Herodotus
Fifth Century B.C.E.
(Greek historian)

Historically, the two most common forms of business organization selected by two or more persons going into business together have been the partnership and the corporation. A partnership arises from an agreement, express or implied, between two or more persons to carry on a business for profit. Partners are co-owners of a business and have joint control over its operation and the right to share in its profits. As the chapter-opening quotation indicates, all gains are the "fruit of venturing," and partnerships—to the extent that they encourage business ventures—contribute to those gains.

Suppose that, after graduating with a fine arts degree, Coralee starts an online business that sells handmade jewelry and crafts. Her business grows, and she hires employees. Then she meets an app developer, Derek, who wants to invest in her business. He also wants to work with her to create an app that will enable people to easily place orders for her goods from their smartphones and from devices such as Alexa and Google Home.

Coralee agrees to give Derek a 25 percent share of her business profits in exchange for the cash he is contributing and for building the app. Although they sign a contract to that effect, the contract does not identify a particular business form. Is Derek now Coralee's partner? Does Derek have a right to control any aspects of Coralee's business? If Derek never creates the app, or if the app does not function properly, does Coralee still have to give him 25 percent of the profits? Is she liable for his actions? In this chapter, you will learn the answers to questions such as these.

27–1 Basic Partnership Concepts

The traditional partnership is an ordinary, or general, partnership. General partnerships are governed both by common law concepts—in particular, those relating to agency—and by statutory law. As in so many other areas of business law, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has drafted uniform laws for partnerships, and these uniform laws have been widely adopted by the states.

27–1a Agency Concepts and Partnership Law

When two or more persons agree to do business as partners, they enter into a special relationship with one another. To an extent, their relationship is similar to an agency relationship because each partner is deemed to be the agent of the other partners and of the partnership. Thus, the common law agency concepts apply. Specifically, each partner is charged with knowledge of, and responsibility for, acts done within the scope of the partnership relationship. In their relationships with one another, partners, like agents, are bound by fiduciary ties.

In one important way, however, partnership law is distinct from agency law. A partnership is based on a voluntary contract between two or more competent persons who agree to commit financial capital, labor, and skill to a business with the understanding that profits and losses will be shared. In a nonpartnership agency relationship, the agent usually does not have an ownership interest in the business and is not obliged to bear a portion of the ordinary business losses.

Know This

Two or more persons are required to form a partnership. Other forms of business can be organized by a single individual.

27–1b The Uniform Partnership Act

The Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) governs the operation of partnerships in the absence of an express agreement. In other words, the partners are free to establish rules for their partnership that differ from those stated in the UPA. The majority of the states have adopted the most recent version of the UPA (completed in 1997 and last amended in 2013).

27–1c Definition of a Partnership

The UPA defines a partnership as "an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit" [UPA 101(6)]. Note that the UPA's definition of person includes corporations, so a corporation can be a partner in a partnership [UPA 101(10)]. The intent to associate is a key element of a partnership, and a person cannot join a partnership unless all of the other partners consent [UPA 401(i)].

Partnership An agreement by two or more persons to carry on, as co-owners, a business for profit.

27–1d Essential Elements of a Partnership

Parties sometimes find themselves in conflict over whether their business enterprise is a legal partnership, especially when there is no formal, written partnership agreement. In determining whether a partnership exists, courts usually look for three essential elements, which are implicit in the UPA's definition of a general partnership:

1. A sharing of profits and losses.
2. A joint ownership of the business.
3. An equal right to be involved in the management of the business.

If the evidence in a particular case is insufficient to establish all three factors, the UPA provides a set of guidelines to be used.

Focus Question 1

What are the three essential elements of a partnership?

The court in the following case considered these and other factors to determine whether a partnership existed between two participants in a new restaurant venture.

Case 27.1

Harun v. Rashid

Texas Court of Appeals, Dallas, 2018 WL 329292 (2018).

Facts Mohammed Harun was interested in opening a new restaurant, Spice-N-Rice, in Irving, Texas, but lacked the financial resources. He asked Sharif Rashid if Rashid was interested in funding the venture. Rashid said that he was and provided $60,000. Rashid also helped negotiate a lease for the restaurant, was a signatory on its bank account, dealt with contractors, paid for advertising, and bought furniture, equipment, and supplies. In addition, Rashid hired a bookkeeper to perform the restaurant's accounting.

When the bookkeeper expressed concern about Harun's reporting of Spice-N-Rice's income on his tax return, Harun removed Rashid from the bank account and locked him out of the restaurant's premises. Rashid filed a suit in a Texas state court against Harun and Spice-N-Rice, alleging the existence of a partnership and a breach of fiduciary duty. Harun denied that he and Rashid had ever been partners. The court ruled that a partnership existed and awarded damages to Rashid. The defendant appealed.

Issue Were Harun and Rashid partners in Spice-N-Rice?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's award to Rashid of actual damages of $36,000 (the difference between Rashid's investment of $60,000 and the amount Harun had repaid), punitive damages of $36,000, and attorneys' fees of $79,768, plus interest and costs.

Reason The court listed several factors that can indicate the existence of a partnership in a business. These included the parties' sharing, or right to share, the profits, losses, and liabilities of the business, and the parties' participation, or right to participate, in control of the business. Another factor is an agreement to contribute, or the actual contribution of, money or property to the business.

Rashid presented evidence of his investment and participation in the opening and operation of Spice-N-Rice, including an agreement with Harun to share in its profits and losses. His payment of the restaurant's bills, his hiring of and communicating with the bookkeeper, and his access to the business's bank account were further indications of his partnership in the venture. The appellate court stated, "We conclude the trial court's finding a partnership existed between Harun and Rashid is supported by more than a scintilla [small amount] of evidence." The parties' status as partners supported the lower court's award of damages to Rashid for a breach of fiduciary duty.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Harun's income tax return and other documents prepared by the bookkeeper on behalf of Spice-N-Rice identified the business as a sole proprietorship. Should the appellate court have reversed the finding of a partnership on this basis? Explain.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the appellants had complained that there was a lack of evidence of an agreement between Harun and Rashid to share losses. Would the result have been different? Why or why not?

The Sharing of Profits and Losses The sharing of both profits and losses from a business creates a presumption (legal inference) that a partnership exists. Case Example 27.1 David Tubb, representing Superior Shooting Systems, Inc., entered into an agreement with Aspect International, Inc., to create a business that would make and sell ammunition to the public. Their contract stated that both companies would participate in the business and split the profits equally, but it did not say explicitly that they would share the losses. It also did not specify what type of entity the business would be. A dispute arose between the two companies, and the matter ended up in court.

A Texas appellate court held that the two corporations had created a partnership even though there was no express agreement to share in losses. They had agreed to share control and ownership of the business and to split the profits equally. They would therefore also have to share the losses equally.[1]

A court will not presume that a partnership exists, however, if shared profits are received as payment of any of the following [UPA 202(c)(3)]:

1. A debt by installments or interest on a loan.
2. Wages of an employee or payment for the services of an independent contractor.
3. Rent to a landlord.
4. An annuity to a surviving spouse or representative of a deceased partner.
5. A sale of the goodwill of a business or property.

Example 27.2 A debtor, Mason, owes a creditor, Alice, $5,000 on an unsecured debt. They agree that Mason will pay 10 percent of his monthly business profits to Alice until the loan with interest has been paid. Although Mason and Alice are sharing profits from the business, they are not presumed to be partners.

What factors can an investor present in court to show that the investor entered into a partnership with a restaurant owner?

Joint Property Ownership Joint ownership of property does not in and of itself create a partnership [UPA 202(c)(1), (2)]. The parties' intentions are key. Example 27.3 Chiang and Burke jointly own farmland and lease it to a farmer for a share of the profits from the farming operation in lieu of fixed rental payments. This arrangement normally would not make Chiang, Burke, and the farmer partners.

Equal Management Rights In general, every partner in a partnership has an equal say in managing the partnership's affairs. In other words, each partner has a single vote in the management decisions, regardless of that partner's proportional interest in the business (unless the partners have agreed otherwise).

27–1e Entity versus Aggregate Theory of Partnerships

At common law, a partnership was treated only as an aggregate of individuals and never as a separate legal entity. Thus, at common law a lawsuit could never be brought by or against the firm in its own name. Each individual partner had to sue or be sued.

Today, in contrast, a majority of the states follow the UPA and treat a partnership as an entity for most purposes. For instance, a partnership usually can sue or be sued, collect judgments, and have all accounting procedures performed in the name of the partnership entity [UPA 201, 307(a)]. As an entity, a partnership may hold the title to real or personal property in its name rather than in the names of the individual partners. Additionally, federal procedural laws permit the partnership to be treated as an entity in lawsuits in federal courts and bankruptcy proceedings.

27–1f Tax Treatment of Partnerships

Modern law does treat a partnership as an aggregate of the individual partners rather than as a separate legal entity in one situation—for federal income tax purposes. The partnership is a pass-through entity and not a taxpaying entity.

Pass-Through Entity A business entity that has no tax liability. The entity's income is passed through to the owners, and they pay taxes on the income.

Information Return A tax return submitted by a partnership that reports the business's income and losses. The partnership itself does not pay taxes on the income received by the partnership.

A pass-through entity is a business entity that has no tax liability—the entity's income is passed through to the owners of the entity, who pay income taxes on it. Thus, the income or losses the partnership incurs are "passed through" the entity framework and attributed to the partners on their individual tax returns. The partnership itself pays no taxes and is responsible only for filing an information return with the Internal Revenue Service.

A partner's profit from the partnership (whether distributed or not) is taxed as individual income to the individual partner. Similarly, partners can deduct a share of the partnership's losses on their individual tax returns (in proportion to their partnership interests).

27–2 Formation and Operation

A partnership is a voluntary association of individuals. As such, it is formed by the agreement of the partners.

27–2a The Partnership Agreement

As a general rule, agreements to form a partnership can be oral, written, or implied by conduct. Some partnership agreements, however, such as one authorizing the transfer of interests in real property, must be in writing to be legally enforceable. (Recall that a writing may be an electronic record.)

Articles of Partnership A written agreement that sets forth each partner's rights and obligations with respect to the partnership.

A partnership agreement, called articles of partnership, can include any terms that the parties wish, unless the terms are illegal or contrary to public policy or statute [UPA 103]. The terms commonly included in a partnership agreement are listed in Exhibit 27–1.

The rights and duties of partners are governed largely by the specific terms of their partnership agreement. In the absence of provisions to the contrary in the partnership agreement, the law imposes certain rights and duties, as discussed in the following subsections. The character and nature of the partnership business generally influence the application of these rights and duties.

Exhibit 27–1 Common Terms Included in a Partnership Agreement

TERM	DESCRIPTION
Basic Structure	1. Name of the partnership and names of the partners. 2. Location of the business and the state law under which the partnership is organized. 3. Purpose and duration of the partnership.
Capital Contributions	1. Amount of capital that each partner is contributing. 2. The agreed-on value of any real or personal property that is contributed instead of cash. 3. How losses and gains on contributed capital will be allocated, and whether contributions will earn interest.
Sharing of Profits and Losses	1. Percentage of the profits and losses of the business that each partner will receive. 2. When distributions of profit will be made and how net profit will be calculated.
Management and Control	1. How management responsibilities will be divided among the partners. 2. Name(s) of the managing partner(s) and whether other partners have voting rights.
Dissociation and Dissolution	1. Events that will cause the dissociation of a partner or dissolve the firm, such as the retirement, death, or incapacity of any partner. 2. How partnership property will be valued and apportioned on dissociation and dissolution. 3. Whether an arbitrator will determine the value of partnership property on dissociation and dissolution, and whether that determination will be binding.

27–2b Duration of the Partnership

The partnership agreement can specify the duration of the partnership by stating that it will continue until a certain date or the completion of a particular project. A partnership that is specifically limited in duration is called a partnership for a term. Generally, withdrawing prematurely (before the expiration date) from a partnership for a term constitutes a breach of the agreement. The responsible partner can be held liable for any resulting losses [UPA 602(b)(2)].

If no fixed duration is specified, the partnership is a partnership at will. A partnership at will can be dissolved at any time without liability.

27–2c Partnership by Estoppel

When a third person has reasonably and detrimentally relied on a representation that a nonpartner was part of a partnership, a court may conclude that a partnership by estoppel exists.

Partnership by Estoppel A partnership imposed by a court when nonpartners have held themselves out to be partners, or have allowed themselves to be held out as partners, and others have detrimentally relied on their misrepresentations.

Liability Imposed A partnership by estoppel may arise when a person who is not a partner holds himself or herself out as a partner and makes representations that third parties rely on. In this situation, a court may impose liability—but not partnership rights—on the alleged partner.

Case Example 27.4 Sanitation District No. 1 (SD1) contracted with DCI Properties to upgrade the sewage systems of several counties in Northern Kentucky. DCI contracted with Coppage Construction Company to provide the labor, goods, and services for the construction project. After a series of disputes, DCI terminated its contract with Coppage. In a lawsuit against SD1, Coppage alleged that it had extended credit, consisting of goods and services, to DCI based on its belief that DCI and SD1 were partners.

The trial court dismissed the claim, holding that SD1 and DC1 were not partners and that SD1 therefore could not be liable to Coppage for any damages resulting from DCI's actions. A state appeals court reversed, noting that SD1 had assured Coppage that it was backing the project financially. Indeed, on one occasion, SD1—not DCI—had made a payment to Coppage. Even if there was no express partnership between DCI and SD1, the court ruled, Coppage should be given the chance to argue there was an "apparent" partnership under the doctrine of partnership by estoppel.[2]

Nonpartner as Agent A partnership by estoppel may also be imposed when a partner represents, expressly or impliedly, that a nonpartner is a member of the firm. In this situation, the nonpartner may be regarded as an agent whose acts are binding on the partnership [UPA 308].

27–2d Rights of Partners

The rights of partners in a partnership relate to the following areas: management, interest in the partnership, compensation, inspection of books, accounting, and property.

Management Rights In a general partnership, all partners have equal rights in managing the partnership [UPA 401(f)]. Unless the partners agree otherwise, each partner has one vote in management matters regardless of the proportional size of that partner's interest in the firm. In a large partnership, partners often agree to delegate daily management responsibilities to a management committee made up of one or more of the partners.

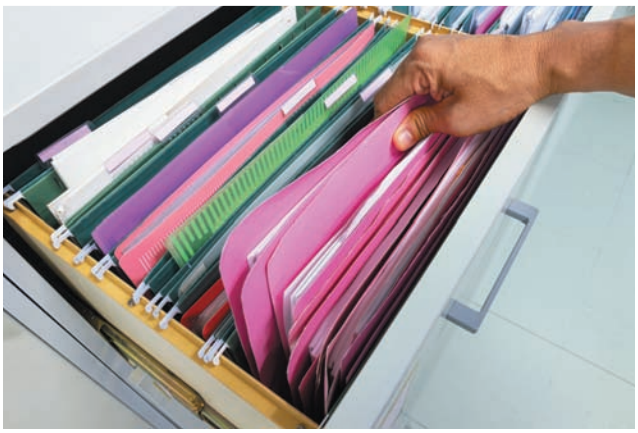
The majority rule controls decisions in ordinary matters connected with partnership business, unless otherwise specified in the agreement. Decisions that significantly change the nature of the partnership or its ordinary course of business, however, require the unanimous consent of the partners [UPA 301(2), 401(i), (j)]. For instance, unanimous consent is likely required for a partnership to admit new partners, to amend the partnership agreement, or to enter a new line of business.

Interest in the Partnership Each partner is entitled to the proportion of business profits and losses designated in the partnership agreement. If the agreement does not apportion profits (indicate how the profits will be shared), the UPA provides that profits will be shared equally. If the agreement does not apportion losses, losses will be shared in the same ratio as profits [UPA 401(b)].



Example 27.5 The partnership agreement for Rick and Brent provides for capital contributions of $60,000 from Rick and $40,000 from Brent. If the agreement is silent as to how Rick and Brent will share profits or losses, they will share both profits and losses equally. In contrast, if the agreement provides for profits to be shared in the same ratio as capital contributions, 60 percent of the profits will go to Rick, and 40 percent will go to Brent. Unless the agreement provides otherwise, losses will be shared in the same ratio as profits. ■

Compensation Devoting time, skill, and energy to partnership business is a partner's duty and generally is not a compensable service. Rather, as mentioned, a partner's income from the partnership takes the form of a distribution of profits according to the partner's share in the business.

Partners can, of course, agree otherwise. For instance, the managing partner of a law firm often receives a salary—in addition to a share of profits—for performing special administrative or managerial duties.

Inspection of Books Partnership books and records must be accessible to all partners. Each partner has the right to receive full and complete information concerning the conduct of all aspects of partnership business [UPA 403]. Partners have a duty to provide the information to the firm, which has a duty to preserve it and keep accurate records.

The partnership's books must be kept at the firm's principal business office (unless partners agree otherwise) and cannot be removed without the consent of all of the partners. Every partner is entitled to inspect all books and records on demand and can make copies of the materials. The personal representative of a deceased partner's estate has the same right of access to partnership books and records as the decedent would have had [UPA 403].

Where are partnership books and records normally kept?

Accounting of Partnership Assets or Profits An accounting of partnership assets or profits is required to determine the value of each partner's share in the partnership. An accounting can be performed voluntarily, or it can be compelled by court order. Under UPA 405(b), a partner has the right to bring an action for an accounting during the term of the partnership, as well as on the partnership's dissolution.

Property Rights Property acquired by a partnership is the property of the partnership and not of the partners individually [UPA 203]. Partnership property includes all property that was originally contributed to the partnership and anything later purchased by the partnership or in the partnership's name (except in rare circumstances) [UPA 204].

A partner may use or possess partnership property only on behalf of the partnership [UPA 401(g)]. A partner is not a co-owner of partnership property and has no right to sell, mortgage, or transfer it.

Because partnership property is owned by the partnership as an entity and not by the individual partners, the property cannot be used to satisfy the personal debts of individual partners. A partner's creditor, however, can petition a court for a charging order to attach the partner's interest in the partnership (her or his proportionate share of any profits that are distributed) to satisfy the partner's obligation. (A partner can also assign her or his right to a share of the partnership profits to another to satisfy a debt.)

Charging Order In partnership law, an order granted by a court to a judgment creditor that entitles the creditor to attach a partner's interest in the partnership.

27–2e Duties and Liabilities of Partners

The duties and liabilities of partners are basically derived from agency law. Each partner is an agent of every other partner and acts as both a principal and an agent in any business transaction within the scope of the partnership agreement.

Each partner is also a general agent of the partnership in carrying out the usual business of the firm "or business of the kind carried on by the partnership" [UPA 301(1)]. Thus, every act of a partner concerning partnership business, or "business of the kind," and every contract signed in the partnership's name bind the firm.

Fiduciary Duties The fiduciary duties a partner owes to the partnership and to the other partners are the duty of care and the duty of loyalty [UPA 404(a)]. Under the UPA, a partner's duty of care involves refraining from "grossly negligent or reckless conduct, intentional misconduct, or a knowing violation of law" [UPA 404(c)]. A partner is not liable to the partnership for simple negligence or honest errors in judgment in conducting partnership business.

The duty of loyalty requires a partner to account to the partnership for "any property, profit, or benefit" derived by the partner from the partnership's business or the use of its property [UPA 404(b)]. A partner must also refrain from competing with the partnership in business or dealing with the firm as an adverse party.

The duty of loyalty can be breached by self-dealing, misusing partnership property, disclosing trade secrets, or usurping a partnership business opportunity, as the following Classic Case illustrates.

Focus Question 2

What are the fiduciary duties of partners in a general partnership?

Classic Case 27.2

Meinhard v. Salmon

Court of Appeals of New York, 249 N.Y. 458, 164 N.E. 545 (1928).

Facts Walter Salmon negotiated a twenty-year lease for the Hotel Bristol in New York City. To pay for the conversion of the building into shops and offices, Salmon entered into an agreement with Morton Meinhard, who was to assume half of the cost. Salmon and Meinhard agreed to share the profits and losses from the joint venture (a joint venture is similar to a partnership but typically is created for a single project, whereas a partnership usually involves an ongoing business). Salmon was to have the sole power to manage the building, however.

What fiduciary duties does a partner have with respect to renewing a hotel lease?

Less than four months before the end of the lease term, the building's owner approached Salmon about a project to raze the converted structure and construct a new building. Salmon agreed and signed a new lease in the name of his own business, Midpoint Realty Company, without telling Meinhard. When Meinhard learned of the deal, he filed a suit against Salmon. The court ruled in Meinhard's favor, and Salmon appealed.

Issue Did Salmon breach his fiduciary duty of loyalty to Meinhard?

Decision Yes. The Court of Appeals of New York held that Salmon had breached his fiduciary duty by failing to inform Meinhard of the business opportunity and secretly taking advantage of it for himself. The court therefore granted Meinhard an interest "measured by the value of half of the entire lease."

Reason The court stated, "Joint adventurers, like copartners, owe to one another, while the enterprise continues, the duty of the finest loyalty." Salmon's conduct excluded Meinhard from any chance to compete and from any chance to enjoy the opportunity for benefit. As a partner, Salmon was bound by his "obligation to his copartners in such dealings not to separate his interest from theirs, but, if he acquires any benefit, to communicate it to them." Salmon was also the managing co-adventurer, and thus the court found that "for him and for those like him the rule of undivided loyalty is relentless and supreme."

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Salmon had disclosed the proposed deal to Meinhard, who had said that he was not interested. Would the result in this case have been different? Explain.
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This case involved a joint venture, not a partnership. At the time, a member of a joint venture had only the duty to refrain from actively subverting the rights of the other members. The decision in this case imposed the highest standard of loyalty on joint-venture members. The duty is now the same in both joint ventures and partnerships. Courts today frequently quote the eloquent language used in this opinion when describing the standard of loyalty that applies to partnerships.

Breach and Waiver of Fiduciary Duties A partner's fiduciary duties may not be waived or eliminated in the partnership agreement. In fulfilling these duties, each partner must act consistently with the obligation of good faith and fair dealing [UPA 103(b), 404(d)]. The agreement can specify acts that the partners agree will violate a fiduciary duty.

Note that partners may pursue their own interests without automatically violating these duties [UPA 404(e)]. The key is disclosing the interest to the other partners. Example 27.6 Jayne, a partner at Jacoby & Meyers, owns a shopping mall. Jayne may vote against a partnership proposal to open a competing mall, provided that she has fully disclosed her interest in the existing shopping mall to the other partners at the firm. Partners cannot make secret profits or put self-interest before their duty to the interest of the partnership, however.

Authority of Partners The UPA affirms general principles of agency law that pertain to the authority of a partner to bind a partnership in contract. If a partner acts within the scope of this authority, the partnership is legally bound to honor the partner's commitments to third parties.

A partner may also subject the partnership to tort liability under agency principles. When a partner is carrying on partnership business with third parties in the usual way, both the partner and the firm share liability. The partnership will not be liable, however, if the third parties know that the partner had no authority to commit the partnership.

Limitations on Authority. A partnership may limit the capacity of a partner to act as the firm's agent or transfer property on its behalf by filing a "statement of partnership authority" in a designated state office [UPA 105, 303]. Such limits on a partner's authority normally are effective only with respect to third parties who are notified of the limitations. (An exception is made in real property transactions when the statement of authority has been recorded with the appropriate state office.)

The Scope of Implied Powers. The agency concepts relating to apparent authority, actual authority, and ratification also apply to partnerships. The extent of implied authority is generally broader for partners than for ordinary agents.

In an ordinary partnership, the partners can exercise all implied powers reasonably necessary and customary to carry on that particular business. Some customarily implied powers include the authority to make warranties on goods in a retail sales business and the power to enter into contracts consistent with the firm's ordinary course of business.

Example 27.7 Jamie, a partner in a firm that operates a retail tire store, regularly promises that "each tire will be warranted for normal wear for 40,000 miles." Because Jamie has authority to make warranties, the partnership is bound to honor them. Jamie would not, however, have the authority to sell the partnership's office equipment, fixtures, or other property without the consent of all of the other partners.

A partner in a tire store tells customers that every tire comes with a specific type of warranty. How could the partner's words affect the partnership as a whole?

Liability of Partners One significant disadvantage associated with a traditional partnership is that partners are personally liable for the debts of the partnership. In most states, the liability is essentially unlimited because the acts of one partner in the ordinary course of business subject the other partners to personal liability [UPA 305].

Joint Liability. Each partner in a partnership is jointly liable for the partnership's obligations. Joint liability means that a third party must sue all of the partners as a group, but each partner can be held liable for the full amount.[3]

Joint Liability In partnership law, the partners' shared liability for partnership obligations and debts. A third party must sue all of the partners as a group, but each partner can be held liable for the full amount.

If, for instance, a third party sues one individual partner on a partnership contract, that partner has the right to demand that the other partners be sued as well. In fact, if the third party does not name all of the partners in the lawsuit, the assets of the partnership cannot be used to satisfy the judgment. With joint liability, the partnership's assets must be exhausted before creditors can reach the partners' individual assets.

Joint and Several Liability. In the majority of the states, under UPA 306(a), partners are jointly and severally (separately or individually) liable for all partnership obligations. Joint and several liability means that a third party has the option of suing all of the partners together (jointly) or one or more of the partners separately (severally).

Joint and Several Liability In partnership law, a doctrine under which a plaintiff may sue, and collect a judgment from, all of the partners together (jointly) or one or more of the partners separately (severally, or individually). Partners can be held liable even if they did not participate in, ratify, or know about the conduct that gave rise to the lawsuit.

All the partners in a partnership can be held liable even if a particular partner did not participate in, know about, or ratify the conduct that gave rise to the lawsuit. Normally, though, the partnership's assets must be exhausted before a creditor can enforce a judgment against a partner's personal assets [UPA 307(d)]. In addition, a partner who commits a tort may be required to indemnify (reimburse) the partnership for any damages it pays unless the tort was committed in the ordinary course of the partnership's business.

A judgment against one partner severally (separately) does not extinguish the others' liability. (Similarly, a release of one partner does not discharge the partners' several liability.) Those not sued in the first action may be sued subsequently, unless the court in the first action held that the partnership was not liable.

If a plaintiff is successful in a suit against a partner or partners, the plaintiff may collect on the judgment only against the assets of those partners named as defendants. Example 27.8 Brian and Julie are partners. If Tom sues Brian for a debt on a partnership contract and wins, Tom can collect the amount of the judgment against Brian only. If Tom cannot collect enough from Brian, however, Tom can later sue Julie for the difference.

Liability of Incoming Partners. A partner newly admitted to an existing partnership is not personally liable for any partnership obligations incurred before the person became a partner [UPA 306(b)]. The new partner's liability to existing creditors of the partnership is limited to the amount of the partner's capital contribution to the firm.

3. Under the prior version of the UPA, which is still in effect in a few states, partners were subject to joint liability on partnership debts and contracts, but not on partnership debts arising from torts.

Example 27.9 Smartclub, an existing partnership with four members, admits a new partner, Alex. He contributes $100,000 to the partnership. Smartclub has debts amounting to $600,000 at the time Alex joins the firm. Although Alex's capital contribution of $100,000 can be used to satisfy Smartclub's prior obligations, Alex is not personally liable for debts incurred before he became a partner. If, however, the partnership incurs additional debts after Alex becomes a partner, he will be personally liable for those amounts, along with all other partners.

27–3 Dissociation and Termination

Dissociation The severance of the relationship between a partner and a partnership.

Dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in the carrying on of the partnership business. Dissociation normally entitles the partner to have his or her interest purchased by the partnership. It also terminates the partner's actual authority to act for the partnership and to participate with the partners in running the business.

Once dissociation occurs, the partnership normally may continue to do business without the dissociating partner.[4] If the partners no longer wish to (or are unable to) continue the business, the partnership may be terminated (dissolved).

Focus Question 3

What is dissociation? What happens when a partner dissociates from a partnership?

27–3a Events That Cause Dissociation

Under UPA 601, a partner can be dissociated from a partnership in any of the following ways:

1. By the partner's voluntarily giving notice of an "express will to withdraw." (When a partner gives notice of intent to withdraw, the remaining partners must decide whether to continue the partnership business. If they decide not to continue, the voluntary dissociation of a partner will dissolve the firm [UPA 801(1)].)
2. By the occurrence of an event agreed to in the partnership agreement.
3. By a unanimous vote of the other partners under certain circumstances.
4. By order of a court or arbitrator if the partner has engaged in wrongful conduct that affects the partnership business. The court can order dissociation if a partner breached the partnership agreement or violated a duty owed to the partnership or to the other partners. Dissociation may also be ordered if the partner engaged in conduct that makes it "not reasonably practicable to carry on the business in partnership with the partner" [UPA 601(5)].
5. By the partner's declaring bankruptcy, assigning his or her interest in the partnership for the benefit of creditors, becoming physically or mentally incapacitated, or dying.

A partner who is convicted of a crime can be dissociated from a partnership. What other events can cause a partner's dissociation?

Wrongful Dissociation A partner always has the power to dissociate from the firm, but may not have the right to do so. If the partner lacks the right to dissociate, then the dissociation is considered wrongful under the law [UPA 602]. When a partner's dissociation is in breach of the partnership agreement, for instance, it is wrongful.

4. Under the previous version of the UPA, when a partner withdrew from a partnership, the partnership was considered dissolved, its business had to be wound up, and the proceeds had to be distributed to creditors and among the partners. The new UPA dramatically changed the law governing partnership breakups and does not require that a partnership be dissolved just because one partner has left the firm.

Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Example 27.10 Jensen & Whalen's partnership agreement states that it is a breach of the agreement for any partner to assign partnership property to a creditor without the consent of the other partners. If Janis, a partner, makes such an assignment, she not only has breached the agreement but also has wrongfully dissociated from the partnership.

A partner who wrongfully dissociates is liable to the partnership and to the other partners for damages caused by the dissociation. This liability is in addition to any other obligation to the partnership or to the partners.

Effects of Dissociation Dissociation (rightful or wrongful) terminates some of the rights of the dissociated partner, requires that the partnership purchase the dissociated partner's interest, and alters the liability of the parties to third parties.

Rights and Duties. On dissociation, a partner loses the right to participate in the management and conduct of the partnership business [UPA 603]. The partner's duty of loyalty also ends. A partner's duty of care continues only with respect to events that occurred before dissociation, unless the partner participates in winding up the partnership's business (discussed shortly).

Example 27.11 Tanya, a partner who leaves an accounting firm, Bubb & Ferngold, can immediately compete with that firm for new clients. She must exercise care in completing ongoing client transactions, however, and must account to Bubb & Ferngold for any fees received from the former clients based on those transactions.

Buyouts. According to the rules of UPA 701, the partnership interest of a dissociated partner must be purchased by the partnership. The buyout price is based on the amount that would have been distributed to the partner if the partnership had been wound up on the date of dissociation. Offset against the price are any amounts owed by the partner to the partnership, including any damages to the firm if the dissociation was wrongful.

Buyout Price The amount payable to a partner on dissociation from a partnership, based on the amount distributable to that partner if the partnership had been wound up on that date and offset by any damages for wrongful dissociation.

Liability to Third Parties. For two years after a partner dissociates from a continuing partnership, the partnership may be bound by the acts of the dissociated partner based on apparent authority [UPA 702]. In other words, if a third party reasonably believed at the time of a transaction that the dissociated partner was still a partner, the partnership may be liable. In addition, a dissociated partner may be liable for partnership obligations entered into during a two-year period following dissociation [UPA 703].

To avoid this possible liability, a partnership should notify its creditors, customers, and clients of a partner's dissociation. Also, either the partnership or the dissociated partner can file a statement of dissociation in the appropriate state office to limit the dissociated partner's authority to ninety days after the filing [UPA 704].

27–3b Partnership Termination

The same events that cause dissociation can result in the end of the partnership if the remaining partners no longer wish to (or are unable to) continue the business. A partner's departure will not necessarily end the partnership, though. The partnership can continue if the remaining partners consent.

The termination of a partnership is referred to as dissolution, which essentially means the commencement of the winding up process. Winding up is the actual process of collecting, liquidating, and distributing the partnership assets. If the partners entered into a buy-sell agreement (discussed shortly) at the time they formed the partnership, that agreement will govern the specific procedures used.

Dissolution The formal disbanding of a partnership or a corporation. Partnerships can be dissolved by acts of the partners, by operation of law, or by judicial decree.

Winding Up The second of two stages in the termination of a partnership or corporation, in which the firm's assets are collected, liquidated, and distributed, and liabilities are discharged.

Dissolution. Dissolution of a partnership generally can be brought about by acts of the partners, by operation of law, or by judicial decree [UPA 801]. Any partnership (including one for a fixed term) can be dissolved by the partners' agreement. Similarly, if the partnership agreement states that it will dissolve on a certain event, such as a partner's death or bankruptcy, then the occurrence of that event will dissolve the partnership. A partnership for a fixed term or a particular undertaking is dissolved by operation of law at the expiration of the term or on the completion of the undertaking.

Case Example 27.12 Will Sukenik and Irvin Fine formed PDC Office Park as general partners. Under the partnership agreement, on the death of one partner, the other had thirty days to elect to continue the partnership. Fine died, but Sukenik failed to take this step. A third party that owned a limited interest in PDC convinced a trial court that the partnership must be dissolved and its assets liquidated. Although Sukenik tried numerous delaying tactics to block this dissolution, including a breach of contract suit against the third party, a state appeals court ruled that the terms of the partnership were clear and must be respected.[5]

Illegality or Impracticality. Any event that makes it unlawful for the partnership to continue its business will result in dissolution [UPA 801(4)]. Under the UPA, a court may order dissolution when it becomes obviously impractical for the firm to continue—for instance, if the business can only be operated at a loss [UPA 801(5)]. Even when one partner has brought a court action seeking to dissolve a partnership, the partnership continues to exist until it is legally dissolved by the court or by the parties' agreement.

Case Example 27.13 Members of the Russell family began operating Russell Realty Associates (RRA) as a partnership. Eddie Russell had decision-making authority over the partnership's business, which involved buying, holding, leasing, and selling investment properties. After several years, Eddie and his sister, Nina Russell, became involved in disputes, and Nina began to routinely question Eddie's business decisions. Because of their disagreements, RRA experienced two years of delays before it could sell one piece of property. Although the firm continued to profit, Eddie filed a complaint seeking a judicial dissolution of the partnership, which the court granted. Nina appealed.

The Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's decision that Russell Realty must be judicially dissolved. The partners' relationship had deteriorated to the point where the partnership was unable to function effectively. As a result, the firm had incurred substantial and unnecessary added costs, which frustrated the partnership's economic purpose and made it impracticable to continue.[6]

Why might a court judicially dissolve a golf club partnership in response to a lawsuit brought by one of the partners?

Good Faith. Each partner must exercise good faith during the dissolution of a partnership. Some state statutes allow partners injured by another partner's bad faith to file a tort claim for wrongful dissolution.

Case Example 27.14 Attorneys Randall Jordan and Mary Helen Moses formed a two-member partnership for an indefinite term. Jordan ended the partnership three years later and asked the court for declarations concerning the partners' financial obligations. Moses, who had objected to ending the partnership, filed a claim against Jordan for wrongful dissolution and for appropriating $180,000 in fees that should have gone to the partnership.

Ultimately, the court held in favor of Moses. A claim for wrongful dissolution of a partnership may be based on damages arising from the excluded partner's loss of "an existing, or continuing, business opportunity" or of income and material assets. Because Jordan had attempted to appropriate partnership assets through dissolution, Moses could sue for wrongful dissolution.[7]

Winding Up and Distribution of Assets After dissolution, the partnership continues for the limited purpose of the winding up process. The partners cannot create new obligations on behalf of the partnership. They have authority only to complete transactions begun but not finished at the time of dissolution and to wind up the partnership's business [UPA 803, 804(1)].

What happens when the partners cannot agree on the method for a distribution of the partnership assets during the winding up process? That was the question before the court in the following case.

7. Jordan v. Moses, 291 Ga. 39, 727 S.E.2d 460 (2012).

Guenther v. Ryerson

Idaho Supreme Court, 166 Idaho 315, 458 P.3d 184 (2020).

Facts Joseph Guenther and Michelle Ryerson bought real property on Lost Sage Lane in Boise, Idaho, and formed a partnership, West Foothills TIC, to develop a vineyard for profit. There was no written partnership agreement and no allocation of contributions or responsibility for liabilities. Both parties commingled their personal funds with partnership funds, investing a considerable amount in the development of the vineyard and the construction of a house.

When they decided not to continue to operate the business as partners, Guenther filed an action in an Idaho state court to dissolve the partnership. He sought to buy Ryerson's interest in the Lost Sage Lane property and continue to live there and work the vineyard. Ryerson asked the court to liquidate the partnership's assets by sale. She claimed that this was the only way to determine the true value of the property. Guenther argued that a different means of winding up the partnership's business would be more equitable. The court issued an order that required the property to be sold on the open market. Guenther appealed.

Issue Is a sale of partnership assets on the open market required in this case?

Decision Yes. The Idaho Supreme Court held that the property of the Guenther and Ryerson partnership must be sold on the open market for its fair market value, and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Reason Idaho's version of the Uniform Partnership Act requires a partnership, in winding up its business, to discharge its debts, obligations, and other liabilities, settle and close its business, and marshal and distribute its assets. The act further requires that, unless the partnership agreement provides otherwise, "all distributions made to the partners must be paid in money."

In the view of the state's highest court, "the plain language" of the act is "unambiguous." During the winding up of the business of a partnership, a distribution to a partner must be paid in money. A distribution to a partner in any form other than money would contradict the plain language of the act and would not be allowed. Thus, before being distributed to the partners, the firm's assets must be reduced to cash.

The court found the application of these requirements to the facts of this case to be "fairly straightforward." Guenther and Ryerson had no written partnership agreement, and they had not otherwise provided for, or agreed to, a distribution of their partnership's property in any form other than cash. Therefore, under the state's partnership statutes, the Lost Sage Lane property must be reduced to cash before being distributed to the partners.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Could the partnership in this case have avoided the liquidation of its assets during the winding up process? Explain.
- Economic How should the lower court, on remand, structure the sale of the partnership's Lost Sage Lane property? Discuss.

Duties and Compensation. Winding up includes collecting and preserving partnership assets, discharging liabilities (paying debts), and accounting to each partner for the value of that partner's interest in the partnership. Partners continue to have fiduciary duties to one another and to the firm during this process. UPA 401(h) provides that a partner is entitled to compensation for services in winding up partnership affairs (and reimbursement for expenses incurred in the process) above and apart from a share in the partnership profits.

Know This
Secured creditors have priority over unsecured creditors in any assets that serve as collateral for a partnership's debts.

Creditors' Claims. Both creditors of the partnership and creditors of the individual partners can make claims on the partnership's assets. In general, partnership creditors and the partners' personal creditors share proportionately in the partners' assets, which include their interests in the partnership.

A partnership's assets are distributed according to the following priorities [UPA 807]:

1. Payment of debts, including those owed to partner and nonpartner creditors.
2. Return of capital contributions and distribution of profits to partners.

If the partnership's liabilities are greater than its assets, the partners bear the losses—in the absence of a contrary agreement—in the same proportion in which they shared the profits (rather than, for instance, in proportion to their contributions to the partnership's capital).

Partnership Buy-Sell Agreements Before entering into a partnership, partners may agree on how the assets will be valued and divided in the event that the partnership dissolves. Such an agreement may eliminate costly negotiations or litigation later.

Buy-Sell Agreement An agreement made at the time of partnership formation providing for one or more of the partners to buy out the other or others, in the event the firm is dissolved. It is also called a buyout agreement.

The agreement may provide for one or more partners to buy out the other or others, should the situation warrant. This is called a buy-sell agreement, or simply a buyout agreement. Alternatively, the agreement may specify that one or more partners will determine the value of the interest being sold and that the other or others will decide whether to buy or sell.

Under UPA 701(a), if a partner's dissociation does not result in a dissolution of the partnership, a buyout of the partner's interest is mandatory. The UPA contains an extensive set of buyout rules that apply when the partners do not have a buy-sell agreement. Basically, a withdrawing partner receives the same amount through a buyout that the partner would receive if the business were winding up [UPA 701(b)].

27–4 Limited Liability Partnerships

Focus Question 4
What advantages do limited liability partnerships offer to businesspersons that are not offered by general partnerships?

The limited liability partnership (LLP) is a hybrid form of business designed mostly for professionals who normally do business as partners in a partnership. Almost all of the states have enacted LLP statutes.

Limited Liability Partnership (LLP) A hybrid form of business organization that is used mainly by professionals who normally do business as partners in a partnership. An LLP is a pass-through entity for tax purposes, but a partner's personal liability for the malpractice of other partners is limited.

The major advantage of the LLP is that it allows a partnership to continue as a pass-through entity for tax purposes but limits the personal liability of the partners. The LLP is especially attractive for professional service firms and family businesses. All of the "Big Four" accounting firms—the four largest international accountancy and professional services firms—are organized as LLPs, including Ernst & Young, LLP, and PricewaterhouseCoopers, LLP.

27–4a Formation of an LLP

LLPs must be formed and operated in compliance with state statutes, which may include provisions of the UPA. The appropriate form must be filed with a central state agency, usually the secretary of state's office, and the business's name must include either "Limited Liability Partnership" or "LLP" [UPA 1001, 1002]. An LLP must file an annual report with the state to remain qualified as an LLP in that state [UPA 1003].

In most states, it is relatively easy to convert a traditional partnership into an LLP because the firm's basic organizational structure remains the same. Additionally, all of the statutory and common law rules governing partnerships still apply (apart from those modified by the LLP statute). Normally, LLP statutes are simply amendments to a state's already existing partnership law.

27–4b Liability in an LLP

An LLP allows professionals, such as attorneys and accountants, to avoid personal liability for the malpractice of other partners. Partners in an LLP are still liable for their own wrongful acts, such as negligence, of course. Also liable is the partner who supervised the individual who committed a wrongful act. (This supervisory liability generally applies to all types of partners and partnerships, not just LLPs.)

Example 27.15 Five lawyers operate a law firm as a limited liability partnership. One of the attorneys, Dan, is sued for malpractice and loses. The firm's malpractice insurance is insufficient to pay the judgment. If the firm had been organized as a general partnership, the personal assets of the other attorneys could be used to satisfy the obligation. Because the firm is organized as an LLP, however, no other partner at the law firm can be held personally liable for Dan's malpractice, unless that partner acted as Dan's supervisor. In the absence of a supervisor, only Dan's personal assets can be used to satisfy the judgment. ■

What advantage do limited liability partnerships offer to professionals, such as attorneys?

Although LLP statutes vary from state to state, generally each state statute limits the liability of partners in some way. For instance, Delaware law protects each innocent partner from the "debts and obligations of the partnership arising from negligence, wrongful acts, or misconduct." The UPA more broadly exempts partners in an LLP from personal liability for any partnership obligation, "whether arising in contract, tort, or otherwise" [UPA 306(c)].

Liability outside the State of Formation When an LLP formed in one state wishes to do business in another state, it may be required to register in the second state—for instance, by filing a Statement of Foreign Qualification [UPA 1102]. Because state LLP statutes are not uniform, a question sometimes arises as to which law applies if the LLP statutes in the two states provide different liability protection. Most states apply the law of the state in which the LLP was formed, which is also the rule under UPA 1101.

Sharing Liability among Partners When more than one partner in an LLP is negligent, there is a question as to how liability is to be shared. Is each partner jointly and severally liable for the entire result, as a general partner would be in most states?

Some states provide instead for proportionate liability—that is, for separate determinations of the negligence of the partners. Example 27.16 Accountants Zach and Lyla are partners in an LLP, with Zach supervising Lyla. Lyla negligently fails to file a tax return for a client, Centaur Tools. Centaur files a suit against Zach and Lyla. Under a proportionate liability statute, Zach will be liable for no more than his portion of the responsibility for the missed tax deadline. In a state that does not allow for proportionate liability, Zach can be held liable for the entire loss. ■

What are the key differences between the rights and liabilities of general partners and those of limited partners?

27–5 Limited Partnerships

A limited partnership (LP) limits the liability of some of its owners. Limited partnerships originated in medieval Europe and have been in existence in the United States since the early 1800s. Today, most states and the District of Columbia have adopted laws based on the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (RULPA).

Limited Partnership (LP) A partnership consisting of one or more general partners and one or more limited partners.

General Partner In a limited partnership, a partner who assumes responsibility for the management of the partnership and has full liability for all partnership debts.

Limited Partners In a limited partnership, a partner who contributes capital to the partnership but has no right to participate in its management and has no liability for partnership debts beyond the amount of her or his investment.

Certificate of Limited Partnership The document that must be filed with a designated state official to form a limited partnership.

Know This

A limited partner is liable only to the extent of any contribution made to the partnership, but can lose this limited liability by participating in management.

Limited partnerships differ from general partnerships in several ways.[8] A limited partnership consists of at least one general partner and one or more limited partners. A general partner assumes management responsibility for the partnership and so has full responsibility for the partnership and for all of its debts. Limited partners contribute cash or other property and own an interest in the firm but do not undertake any management responsibilities and are not personally liable for partnership debts beyond the amount of their investment. A limited partner can forfeit limited liability by taking part in the management of the business.

27–5a Formation of an LP

In contrast to the informal, private, and voluntary agreement that usually suffices for a general partnership, the formation of a limited partnership is a public and formal proceeding. The partners must strictly follow statutory requirements. See Exhibit 27–2 for a comparison of the characteristics of general and limited partnerships.

Not only must a limited partnership have at least one general partner and one limited partner, but the partners must also sign a certificate of limited partnership. The certificate must include certain information, such as the name, mailing address, and capital contribution of each general and limited partner. The certificate must be filed with the designated state official—under the RULPA, the secretary of state. The certificate is usually open to public inspection.

27–5b Liabilities of Partners in an LP

General partners, unlike limited partners, are personally liable to the partnership's creditors. Thus, at least one general partner is necessary in a limited partnership so that someone has personal liability. This policy can be circumvented in states that allow a corporation to be

8. Under the UPA, a general partnership can be converted into a limited partnership and vice versa [UPA 902, 903]. The UPA also provides for the merger of a general partnership with one or more general or limited partnerships under rules that are similar to those governing corporate mergers [UPA 905].

Exhibit 27–2 A Comparison of General Partnerships and Limited Partnerships

CHARACTERISTIC	GENERAL PARTNERSHIP (UPA)	LIMITED PARTNERSHIP (RULPA)
Creation	By agreement of two or more persons to carry on a business as co-owners for profit.	By agreement and by filing a certificate of limited partnership with the secretary of state. There must be at least one general partner and one limited partner.
Sharing of Profits and Losses	By agreement. In the absence of agreement, profits are shared equally by the partners, and losses are shared in the same ratio as profits.	Profits are shared as stated in the certificate. Losses are also shared, up to the amount of the limited partners' capital contributions. In the absence of a provision in the certificate, profits and losses are shared on the basis of percentages of capital contributions.
Liability	Unlimited personal liability of all partners.	Unlimited personal liability of all general partners; limited partners liable only to the extent of their capital contributions.
Capital Contribution	No minimum or mandatory amount; set by agreement.	Set by agreement.
Management	By agreement. In the absence of agreement, all partners have an equal voice.	Only the general partner (or the general partners). Limited partners have no voice. A limited partner who participates in management will be just as liable as a general partner to third parties.
Duration	A fixed term can be set by the agreement. If no duration is specified, the partners can continue to do business even when a partner dissociates from the partnership.	As specified in the certificate. An LP may be dissolved by a court or by the general partner's bankruptcy, retirement, mental incompetence, or death. Death of a limited partner does not terminate the partnership, unless the deceased is the only remaining limited partner.

the general partner in a partnership. Because the corporation has limited liability by virtue of corporate laws, if a corporation is the general partner, no one in the limited partnership has personal liability.

The liability of limited partners, as mentioned, is limited to the capital that they contribute or agree to contribute to the partnership [RULPA 502]. Limited partners enjoy this limited liability only so long as they do not participate in management [RULPA 303].

A limited partner who participates in management will be just as liable as a general partner to any creditor who transacts business with the limited partnership. Liability arises when the creditor believes, based on the limited partner's conduct, that the limited partner is a general partner [RULPA 303]. The extent of review and advisement a limited partner can engage in before being exposed to liability is not always clear, however.

Ethical Issue

Should an innocent general partner be jointly liable for fraud? When general partners in a limited partnership jointly engage in fraud, there is usually no question that they are jointly liable. But if one general partner engages in fraud and the other is unaware of the wrongdoing, is it fair to make the innocent partner share in the liability? Many states' limited partnership laws protect innocent general partners from suits for fraud brought by limited partners. The law is less clear, however, in some other situations.

For example, Robert Bisno and James Coxeter formed two limited partnerships to develop property in Berkeley, California. Without Coxeter's knowledge, Bisno took almost $500,000 from one of the partnerships to buy a personal home. He also made material misrepresentations to potential investors. One of those investors, George Miske—after purchasing an interest in the limited partnership—discovered the fraud and brought suit. Coxeter argued that Miske was a limited partner, not an innocent third party. Under the state's limited partnership law, that meant Coxeter should be protected from liability.

The court disagreed. The fraud at issue had induced Miske to purchase the limited partnership interest. Therefore, at the time the fraud was perpetrated by Bisno, Miske was an innocent third party. As a result, Coxeter, though innocent of any wrongdoing, was jointly liable.[9]

27–5c Dissociation and Dissolution in an LP

A general partner has the power to voluntarily dissociate, or withdraw, from a limited partnership unless the partnership agreement specifies otherwise. A limited partner can withdraw from the partnership by giving six months' notice unless the partnership agreement specifies a term, which most do. Also, some states have passed laws prohibiting the withdrawal of limited partners.

Events That Cause Dissolution A limited partnership can be dissolved by court decree [RULPA 802]. In addition, a general partner's voluntary dissociation from the firm normally will lead to dissolution unless all partners agree to continue the business. Similarly, the bankruptcy, retirement, death, or mental incompetence of a general partner will cause the dissociation of that partner and the dissolution of the limited partnership unless the other members agree to continue the firm [RULPA 801].

Bankruptcy of a limited partner, however, does not dissolve the partnership unless it causes the bankruptcy of the firm. Death or an assignment of the interest of a limited partner does not dissolve a limited partnership [RULPA 702, 704, 705].

Distribution of Assets On dissolution, creditors' claims, including those of partners who are creditors, take first priority. After that, partners and former partners receive unpaid distributions of partnership assets and, except as otherwise agreed, amounts representing returns of their capital contributions and proportionate distributions of profits [RULPA 804].

Can a limited partner in actor Kevin Costner's limited partnership force the sale of the entity?

Valuation of Assets Disputes commonly arise about how the partnership's assets should be valued and distributed on dissolution and whether the business should be sold. Spotlight Case Example 27.17 Actor Kevin Costner was a limited partner in Midnight Star Enterprises, LP, which runs a casino, bar, and restaurant in South Dakota. There were two other limited partners, Carla and Francis Caneva, who owned a small percentage of the partnership (3.25 units each) and received salaries for managing its operations. Another company owned by Costner, Midnight Star Enterprises, Limited (MSEL), was the general partner. Costner thus controlled a majority of the partnership (93.5 units).

When communications broke down between the partners, MSEL asked a court to dissolve the partnership. MSEL's accountant determined that the firm's fair market value was $3.1 million. The Canevas presented evidence that a competitor would buy the business for $6.2 million. The Canevas wanted the court to force Costner to either buy the business for that price or sell it on the open market to the highest bidder. Ultimately, the state's highest court held in favor of Costner. A partner cannot force the sale of a limited partnership when the other partners want to continue the business. The court also accepted the $3.1 million buyout price of MSEL's accountant and ordered Costner to pay the Canevas the value of their 6.5 partnership units.[10]

Practice and Review

Grace Tarnavsky and her sons, Manny and Jason, bought a ranch known as the Cowboy Palace in March 2019. The three orally agreed to share the business for five years. Grace contributed 50 percent of the investment, and each son contributed 25 percent. Manny agreed to handle the livestock, and Jason agreed to do the bookkeeping. The Tarnavskys took out joint loans and opened a joint bank account into which they deposited the ranch's proceeds and from which they made payments for property, cattle, equipment, and supplies.

In September 2021, Manny severely injured his back while baling hay and became permanently unable to handle livestock. Manny therefore hired additional laborers to tend the livestock, causing the Cowboy Palace to incur significant debt. In September 2022, Al's Feed Barn filed a lawsuit against Jason to collect $32,400 in unpaid debts. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Was this relationship a partnership for a term or a partnership at will?
2. Did Manny have the authority to hire additional laborers to work at the ranch after his injury? Why or why not?
3. Under the UPA, can Al's Feed Barn bring an action against Jason individually for the Cowboy Palace's debt? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that after his back injury in 2021, Manny sent his mother and brother notice indicating his intent to withdraw from the partnership. Can he still be held liable for the debt to Al's Feed Barn? Why or why not?

Debate This

A partnership should automatically end when one partner dissociates from the firm.

Chapter Summary: All Forms of Partnership

Basic Partnership Concepts	1. Agency concepts and partnership law—A partnership is similar to an agency relationship except that partners have an ownership interest in the business and are obliged to bear a portion of ordinary business losses. 2. The Uniform Partnership Act (UPA)—Governs the operation of partnerships in the absence of an express agreement. 3. Definition of a partnership—An agreement by two or more persons to carry on, as co-owners, a business for profit. 4. Essential elements of a partnership—A sharing of profits and losses, a joint ownership of the business, and an equal right to be involved in the management of the business. 5. Entity versus aggregate theory of partnerships—A majority of the states follow the UPA and treat a partnership as an entity for most purposes. 6. Tax treatment of partnerships—Partnerships are treated as an aggregate of the individual partners rather than as a separate legal entity for federal income tax purposes. The partnership is a pass-through entity and not a tax-paying entity.
Formation and Operation	1. The partnership agreement—Also called articles of partnership, the written agreement sets forth each partner's rights and obligations with respect to the partnership. 2. Duration of the partnership—A partnership specifically limited in duration is called a partnership for a term. If no fixed duration is specified, the partnership is called a partnership at will. 3. Partnership by estoppel—Imposed by a court when a third person has reasonably and detrimentally relied on a representation that a nonpartner was part of a partnership. 4. Rights of partners—Rights include (a) management, (b) interest in the partnership, (c) compensation, (d) inspection of books, (e) accounting, and (f) property. 5. Duties and liabilities of partners— a. Fiduciary duties (duty of care and duty of loyalty) may not be waived. Each partner must act consistently with good faith and fair dealing. b. A partner has the authority to bind the partnership in a contract. A partner may also subject the partnership to tort liability under agency principles. The extent of implied authority is generally broader for partners than for ordinary agents. c. In a traditional partnership, partners are personally liable for the debts of the partnership.
Dissociation and Termination	1. Events that cause dissociation— a. A partner's voluntarily giving notice of an "express will to withdraw." b. The occurrence of an event agreed to in the partnership agreement. c. Unanimous vote of the other partners under certain circumstances. d. The order of a court or arbitrator if the partner engaged in wrongful conduct that affects the business. e. The partner's declaring bankruptcy, assigning his or her interest in the partnership for the benefit of creditors, becoming physically or mentally incapacitated, or dying. 2. Partnership termination—Referred to as dissolution. Winding up is the actual process of collecting, liquidating, and distributing the partnership assets. A buy-sell agreement provides for one or more of the partners to buy out the other or others, and may specify how the assets will be valued in the event the firm is dissolved.

Limited Liability Partnerships (LLPs)	1. Formation—The appropriate form must be filed with a state agency, usually the secretary of state's office. Typically, an LLP is formed by professionals who work together as partners in a partnership. Under most state LLP statutes, it is relatively easy to convert a traditional partnership into an LLP. 2. Liabilities of partners—LLP statutes vary, but under the UPA, professionals generally can avoid personal liability for acts committed by other partners. Partners in an LLP continue to be liable for their own wrongful acts and for the wrongful acts of those whom they supervise.
Limited Partnerships (LPs)	1. Formation—A certificate of limited partnership must be filed with the secretary of state's office or other designated state official. The certificate must include information about the business. The partnership consists of one or more general partners and one or more limited partners. 2. Liabilities of partners—General partners have unlimited liability for partnership obligations. Limited partners are liable only to the extent of their contributions. Limited partners have no voice in management. If they do participate in management, they risk having general-partner liability. 3. Dissociation and dissolution—A limited partnership can be dissolved by court decree. In addition, a general partner's voluntary dissociation, bankruptcy, death, or mental incompetence will cause the dissociation of that partner and the partnership's dissolution unless all partners agree to continue the business. The death or assignment of the interest of a limited partner does not dissolve the partnership. Bankruptcy of a limited partner also does not dissolve the partnership unless it causes the bankruptcy of the firm.

1. Darnell and Eliana are partners in D&E Designs, an architectural firm. When Darnell dies, his widow claims that as Darnell's heir, she is entitled to take his place as Eliana's partner or to receive a share of the firm's assets. Is she right? Why or why not? (See Dissociation and Termination.)
2. Finian and Gloria are partners in F&G Delivery Service. When business is slow, without Gloria's knowledge, Finian leases the delivery vehicles as moving vans. Because the delivery vehicles would otherwise be sitting idle in a parking lot, can Finian keep the income that results from leasing the vehicles? Explain your answer. (See Formation and Operation.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

27–1. Partnership Formation. Daniel is the owner of a chain of shoe stores. He hires Rubya to be the manager of a new store, which is to open in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Daniel, by written contract, agrees to pay Rubya a monthly salary and 20 percent of the profits. Without Daniel's knowledge, Rubya represents himself to Classen as Daniel's partner, showing Classen the agreement to share profits. Classen extends credit to Rubya. Rubya defaults. Discuss whether Classen can hold Daniel liable as a partner. (See Formation and Operation.)

27–2. Limited Partnership. Dorinda, Luis, and Elizabeth form a limited partnership. Dorinda is a general partner, and Luis and Elizabeth are limited partners. Discuss fully whether each of the separate events below constitutes a dissolution of the limited partnership. (See Limited Partnerships.)

1. Luis assigns his partnership interest to Ashley.
2. Elizabeth is petitioned into involuntary bankruptcy.
3. Dorinda dies.

27–3. Winding Up. Dan and Lori Cole operated a Curves franchise exercise facility in Angola, Indiana, as a partnership. The firm leased commercial space from Flying Cat, LLC, for a renewable three-year term. The Coles renewed the lease for a second three-year term. Two years later, however, the Coles divorced. By the end of the second term, the Coles owed Flying Cat more than $21,000 on the lease. Without telling the landlord about the divorce, Lori signed another extension. More rent went unpaid. Flying Cat obtained a judgment in an Indiana state court against the partnership for almost $50,000. Can Dan be held liable? Why or why not? [Curves for Women Angola v. Flying Cat, LLC, 983 N.E.2d 629 (Ind.App. 2013)] (See Dissociation and Termination.)

27–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Partnerships. Karyl Paxton asked Christopher Sacco to work with her interior design business, Pierce Paxton Collections, in New Orleans. At the time, they were in a romantic relationship. Sacco was involved in every aspect of the business—bookkeeping, marketing, and design—but was not paid a salary. He was reimbursed, however, for expenses charged to his personal credit card, which Paxton also used. Sacco took no profits from the firm, saying that he wanted to "grow the business" and "build sweat equity." When Paxton and Sacco's personal relationship soured, she fired him. Sacco objected, claiming that they were partners. Is Sacco entitled to 50 percent of the profits of Pierce Paxton Collections? Explain. [Sacco v. Paxton, 133 So.3d 213 (La.App. 2014)] (See Formation and Operation.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 27–4, go to Appendix E.

27–5. Formation. Leisa Reed and Randell Thurman lived together in Spring City, Tennessee. Randell and his father, Leroy, formed a cattle-raising operation and opened a bank account in the name of L&R Farm. Within a few years, Leroy quit the operation. Leisa and Randell each wrote a personal check for $5,000 to buy his cattle. Leisa picked up supplies, fed and administered medicine to cattle, collected hay, and participated in the bookkeeping for L&R. Later, checks drawn on her personal account for $12,000 to buy equipment and $35,000 to buy cattle were deposited into the L&R account. After several years, Leisa decided that she no longer wanted to associate with Randell, but they could not agree on a financial settlement. Was Leisa a partner in L&R? Is she entitled to half of the value of L&R's assets? Explain. [Reed v. Thurman, 2015 WL 1119449 (Tenn.App. 2015)] (See Formation and Operation.)

27–6. Formation and Operation. FS Partners is a general partnership whose partners are Jerry Stahlman, a professional engineer, and Fitz & Smith, Inc., a corporation in the business of excavating and paving. Timothy Smith signed the partnership agreement on Fitz & Smith's behalf and deals with FS matters on Fitz & Smith's behalf. Stahlman handles the payment of FS's bills, including its tax bills, and is the designated partner on FS's federal tax return. FS was formed to buy and develop twenty acres of unoccupied, wooded land in York County, Pennsylvania. The deed to the property lists the owner as "FS Partners, a general partnership." When the taxes on the real estate were not paid, the York County Tax Claim Bureau published notice that the property would be sold at a tax sale. The bureau also mailed a notice to FS's address of record and posted a notice on the land. Is this sufficient notice of the tax sale? Discuss. [FS Partners v. York County Tax Claim Bureau, 132 A.3d 577 (Pa. 2016)] (See Formation and Operation.)

27–7. Dissociation and Termination. Marc Malfitano and seven others formed Poughkeepsie Galleria as a partnership to own and manage a shopping mall in New York. The partnership agreement stated that "all decisions to be made by the Partners shall be made by the casting of votes" with "no less than fifty-one percent" of the partners "required to approve any matter." The agreement also provided that the partnership would dissolve on "the election of the Partners" or "the happening of any event which makes it unlawful for the business . . . to be carried on." Later, Malfitano decided to dissociate from the firm and wrote to the other partners, "I hereby elect to dissolve the Partnership." Did Malfitano have the power and the right to dissociate from Poughkeepsie Galleria? Could he unilaterally dissolve the partnership? Can the other partners continue the business? Which, if any, of these actions violate the partnership agreement? Discuss. [Congel v. Malfitano, 101 N.E.3d 341, 2018 WL 1473551 (N.Y.S.2d 2018)] (See Dissociation and Termination.)

27–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and a Partner's Fiduciary Duty. Floyd Finch and Bruce Campbell were partners in a law firm. They did not have a written partnership agreement, but they shared the firm's expenses and profits equally. The partnership operated on a cash basis, using billing software to track time spent on client matters. Instead of using the software, however, Finch would review e-mails and other work product to create and generate bills months or years after the work had been performed. As a result, large amounts of the firm's accounts receivable were uncollectible. Upset over the lost revenue, Campbell filed a claim in a Missouri state court against Finch. Campbell argued that failing to bill clients in a timely manner was a breach of a partner's fiduciary duty. He alleged that Finch was trying to lower his income because he was involved in divorce proceedings. Finch responded that billing clients was a matter of partnership management and operation reserved to the judgment of each partner. [Finch v. Campbell, 541 S.W.3d 616 (Mo.App.W.D. 2017)] (See Formation and Operation.)

1. Is Finch's billing practice a breach of ethics? Explain, using the IDDR approach.
2. Finch asserted that there must be self-dealing for a partner's act to be a breach of fiduciary duty. Is he correct? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

27–9. Business Law Writing. Sandra Lerner and Patricia Holmes were friends. One evening, while applying nail polish to Lerner, Holmes layered a raspberry color over black to produce a new color, which Lerner liked. Later, the two created other colors with names like "Bruise," "Smog," and "Oil Slick," and titled their concept "Urban Decay." Lerner and Holmes started a firm to produce and market the polishes but never discussed the sharing of profits and losses. They agreed to build the business and then sell it. Together, they did market research, worked on a logo and advertising, obtained capital, and hired employees. Then Lerner began scheming to edge Holmes out of the firm. (See Formation and Operation.)

1. Lerner claimed that there was no partnership agreement because there was no agreement on how to divide profits. Was Lerner right? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that Lerner, but not Holmes, had contributed a significant amount of personal funds to developing and marketing the new nail polish. Would this entitle Lerner to receive more of the profit? Explain.
3. Did Lerner violate her fiduciary duty? Why or why not?

27–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Partnership Formation and Operation. At least six months before the Summer Olympic Games in Atlanta, Georgia, a group made up of Stafford Fontenot, Steve Turner, Mike Montelaro, Joe Sokol, and Doug Brinsmade agreed to sell Cajun food at the games and began making preparations. On May 19, the group (calling themselves Prairie Cajun Seafood Catering of Louisiana) applied for a business license with the county health department.

Ted Norris sold members of the group a mobile kitchen in return for an $8,000 check drawn on the "Prairie Cajun Seafood Catering of Louisiana" account and two promissory notes, one for $12,000 and the other for $20,000. The notes, which were dated June 12, listed only Fontenot "d/b/a Prairie Cajun Seafood" as the maker (d/b/a is an abbreviation for "doing business as").

On July 31, Fontenot and his friends signed a partnership agreement, which listed specific percentages of profits and losses. They drove the mobile kitchen to Atlanta, but business was disastrous. When the notes were not paid, Norris filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Fontenot, seeking payment. (See Formation and Operation.)

1. The first group will discuss the elements of a partnership and determine whether there was a partnership among Fontenot and the others.
2. The second group will determine who can be held liable on the notes and why.
3. The third group will discuss the concept of "d/b/a," or "doing business as." Does a person who uses this designation when signing checks or promissory notes avoid liability on the checks or notes?

Our government allows entrepreneurs to choose from a variety of business organizational forms. Many businesspersons would agree with the chapter-opening quotation that in business "to play it safe is not to play." Because risk is associated with the potential for higher profits, businesspersons are motivated to choose organizational forms that limit their liability while allowing them to take risks that may lead to greater profits.

A relatively new and increasingly common form of business organization is the limited liability company (LLC). LLCs have become the organizational form of choice among many small businesses. Other special business forms outlined in this chapter include joint ventures, syndicates, joint stock companies, business trusts, and cooperatives.

28–1 The Limited Liability Company

A limited liability company (LLC) is a hybrid business form that combines the limited liability aspects of a corporation and the tax advantages of a partnership. This chapter's Landmark in the Law feature discusses the evolution of laws authorizing LLCs in the United States.

LLCs are governed by state LLC statutes, which vary, of course, from state to state. In an attempt to create more uniformity, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) issued the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (ULLCA). Fewer than one-fifth of the states have adopted it, however. Thus, the law governing LLCs remains far from uniform.

Nevertheless, some provisions are common to most state statutes. We base our discussion of LLCs on these common elements.

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What advantages do limited liability companies offer to businesspersons that are not offered by sole proprietorships or partnerships?
2. What are the two options for managing limited liability companies?
3. What happens when a member dissociates from an LLC?
4. What is a joint venture? How is it similar to a partnership? How is it different?

Limited Liability Company (LLC) Statutes

Limited liability companies (LLCs) have been used for more than a century in various foreign jurisdictions, including several European and South American nations. They did not emerge in the United States, however, until the late 1970s. Wyoming became the first state to pass legislation authorizing the creation of LLCs in 1977.

Taxation Rules Encouraged States to Pass Legislation After Wyoming's adoption of its LLC statute, it still was unclear how the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) would treat LLCs for tax purposes. In 1988, however, the IRS ruled that Wyoming LLCs could be taxed as partnerships instead of corporations, providing that certain requirements were met. This ruling was favorable toward LLCs because it meant that, like a partnership, an LLC could pass through profits to its owners without paying taxes on them. Before the ruling, only one other state—Florida, in 1982—had authorized LLCs. The 1988 ruling encouraged additional states to enact LLC statutes, and within less than a decade, all states had done so.

Other IRS rules also encouraged more widespread use of LLCs in the business world. Under these rules, any unincorporated business with more than one owner is automatically taxed as a partnership unless it indicates otherwise on the tax form or fits into one of the exceptions. The exceptions involve publicly traded companies, companies formed under a state incorporation statute, and certain foreign-owned companies. If a business chooses to be taxed as a corporation, it can indicate this preference by checking a box on the IRS form.

Foreign Entities May Be LLC Members Another factor that has encouraged the creation of LLCs in this country is that foreign investors are allowed to become LLC members. In an era increasingly characterized by global business efforts and investments, the LLC often offers U.S. firms and potential investors from other countries greater flexibility and opportunities than are available through partnerships or corporations.

Application to Today's World Once it became clear that LLCs could be taxed as partnerships, the LLC form of business organization was widely adopted. Members could avoid the personal liability associated with the partnership form of business as well as the double taxation of the corporate form of business. Today, LLCs are a common form of business organization.

28–1a The Nature of the LLC

Member A person who has ownership interests in a limited liability company.

LLCs share many characteristics with corporations. Like corporations, LLCs are creatures of the state. In other words, they must be formed and operated in compliance with state law. Like shareholders in a corporation, the owner of an LLC—called a member—enjoys limited liability [ULLCA 303].

Limited Liability of Members Members of LLCs are shielded from personal liability in most situations. In other words, the liability of members is normally limited to the amount of their investments.

An exception arises when a member has significantly contributed to an LLC's tortious conduct.

Case Example 28.1 JGR Technologies, LLC, provided various Internet-related services for the Missouri Radio Ozarks Network (ORN). Following a fee dispute between the two companies, Luke Baugh, a JGR employee, "seized' several Internet domain names owned by ORN that were associated with its radio stations, including kuku.com. Baugh then sold kuku.com to a foreign buyer for $50,000.

A trial court found Baugh and three JGR members liable for the tort of conversion, which occurs when someone intentionally interferes with another's personal property. The JGR members appealed on the ground that they were shielded by law from liability for the acts of Baugh on behalf of the LLC. A state appellate court noted that a great deal of evidence had been presented at trial showing the extent to which the three LLC members "participated in or directed" Baugh's tortious conduct. Consequently, the appeals court affirmed the trial court's ruling. The members were personally liable and, along with Baugh, owed ORN $50,000 in damages, plus interest.[1]

When Liability May Be Imposed The members of an LLC, like the shareholders in a corporation, can lose their limited personal liability in certain circumstances. For instance, when an individual guarantees payment of a business loan to the LLC, that individual is personally liable for the business's obligation. In addition, if an LLC member fails to comply with certain formalities, such as by commingling personal and business funds, a court can impose personal liability.

Under various principles of corporate law, courts may hold the owners of a business liable for its debts. On rare occasions, for instance, courts ignore the corporate structure ("pierce the corporate veil") to expose the shareholders to personal liability when it is required to achieve justice. Similarly, courts will sometimes pierce the veil of an LLC to hold its members personally liable. Note, however, that courts have reserved piercing the veil of an LLC for circumstances that are clearly extraordinary. There must normally be some flagrant disregard of the LLC formalities, as well as fraud or malfeasance on the part of the LLC member.

Case Example 28.2 Tom and Shannon Brown purchased a new home in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, from Ray Richard and Nick Welch. Richard had hired Waldron Properties, LLC (WP), to build the home. Several years later, cracks began to develop in the walls of the Browns' home as a result of defects in the construction of the foundation. The Browns sued Murray Waldron, the sole member of WP, for breach of warranty under the state's New Home Warranty Act (NHWA). Because Waldron had signed the notice required by the NHWA that the Browns had received when they bought the home, they claimed that Waldron was liable personally.

The trial court found that WP (the LLC), not Waldron individually, was the builder of the Browns' home. The Browns appealed. They contended that even if WP was the builder, the court should pierce the veil of the LLC and hold Waldron personally liable. A state appellate court affirmed the lower court's ruling. The Browns had not entered into a contract with either Waldron or WP. There was not sufficient evidence that Waldron had disregarded LLC formalities or had engaged in fraud or other misconduct to justify piercing the LLC's veil to hold him personally liable.[2]

Other Similarities to Corporations Like corporations, LLCs are legal entities apart from their members. As a legal person, an LLC can sue or be sued, enter into contracts, and hold title to property [ULLCA 201]. The terminology used to describe LLCs formed in other states or nations is also similar to the terminology used in corporate law. For instance, an LLC formed in one state but doing business in another state is referred to in the second state as a foreign LLC.

28–1b The Formation of the LLC

LLCs are creatures of statute and thus must follow state statutory requirements.

Articles of Organization To form an LLC, articles of organization must be filed with a central state agency—usually the secretary of state's office [ULLCA 202].[3] Typically, the articles must include the name of the business, its principal address, the name and address of a registered agent, the members' names, and information on how the LLC

2. Brown v. Waldron, 186 So.3d 955 (Miss.App. 2016).
3. In addition to requiring the filing of articles of organization, a few states require that a notice of the intention to form an LLC be published in a local newspaper.

will be managed [ULLCA 203]. The business's name must include the words Limited Liability Company or the initials LLC [ULLCA 105(a)]. Although a majority of the states permit one-member LLCs, some states require at least two members.

Preformation Contracts Businesspersons sometimes enter into contracts on behalf of a business organization that is not yet formed. For instance, persons forming a corporation may enter into contracts during the process of incorporation but before the corporation becomes a legal entity. These contracts are referred to as preincorporation contracts. Once the corporation is formed, it can adopt the preincorporation contract (by means of a novation, which substitutes a new contract for the old contract) and enforce the contract terms.

In dealing with the preorganization contracts of LLCs, courts may apply the well-established principles of corporate law relating to preincorporation contracts. That is, when the promoters of an LLC enter preformation contracts, the LLC, once formed, can adopt the contracts through novation and then enforce them.

Spotlight Case Example 28.3 607 South Park, LLC, entered into an agreement to sell a hotel to 607 Park View Associates, Ltd., which then assigned the rights to the purchase to another company, 02 Development, LLC. At the time, 02 Development did not yet exist—it was legally created several months later. 607 South Park subsequently refused to sell the hotel to 02 Development, and 02 Development sued for breach of the purchase agreement.

A California appellate court ruled that LLCs should be treated the same as corporations with respect to preorganization contracts. Although 02 Development did not exist when the agreement was executed, once it came into existence, it could enforce any preorganization contract made on its behalf.[4]

28–1c Jurisdictional Requirements

A significant difference between LLCs and corporations involves federal jurisdictional requirements. Under federal law, a corporation is deemed to be a citizen of the state where it is incorporated and maintains its principal place of business.[5] Federal law does not mention the citizenship of partnerships, LLCs, and other unincorporated associations, but the courts have tended to regard these entities as citizens of every state of which their members are citizens.

The state citizenship of LLCs may come into play when a party sues an LLC based on diversity of citizenship. Remember that when parties to a lawsuit are from different states, a federal court can exercise diversity jurisdiction if the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. Total diversity of citizenship must exist, however.

Example 28.4 Jen, a citizen of New York, wishes to bring a lawsuit against Skycel, an LLC formed under the laws of Connecticut. One of Skycel's members also lives in New York. Jen will not be able to bring the action against Skycel in federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction because the defendant LLC is also considered a citizen of New York. The same would be true if Jen was filing a suit against multiple defendants and one of the defendants lived in New York.

28–1d Advantages of the LLC

The LLC offers many advantages to businesspersons, which is why this form of business organization has become increasingly popular.

Focus Question 1

What advantages do limited liability companies offer to businesspersons that are not offered by sole proprietorships or partnerships?

Limited Liability A key advantage of the LLC is that the liability of members is limited to the amount of their investments. The LLC as an entity can be held liable for any loss or injury caused by the wrongful acts or omissions of its members. The members themselves generally are not personally liable.

In the following case, an LLC member, who was also the LLC's manager, alleged that he was not personally liable for the firm's failure to meet its obligations to a creditor.

Nesset, Inc. v. Jones

Court of Appeals of Iowa, __ N.W.2d __, 2020 WL 1879582 (2020).

Facts Larry Nesset, the owner of Nesset, Inc., doing business as Weber Paint and Glass, subcontracted to complete various remodeling projects for the renovation of the hundred-year-old Sokol building in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, owned by Green Development, LLC.

When Green Development's general contractor, Miles Wilson, bowed out, Nesset began to deal directly with Charles Jones, member and manager of the LLC. Nesset and Jones did not enter into a written contract.

Disputes soon arose between Jones and Nesset concerning the quality of certain work. Months passed, and some of Weber's invoices to Green Development remained unpaid. In text messages and letters, Jones affirmed his intent to pay the past due bills. These communications were not written on LLC letterhead and did not include Jones's title.

Ultimately, Nesset filed a petition in an Iowa state court against Jones and the LLC to collect on the debt, alleging breach of contract. Jones answered that any contractual relationship Weber had would have been with Green Development, not with Jones personally.

The court issued a judgment in Nesset's favor, holding Jones personally liable for $17,708.33, plus interest and attorney's fees. Jones appealed.

Issue Did the trial court mistakenly hold Jones personally liable for Green Development's breach?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the trial court's ruling on the question of Jones's personal liability for his LLC's debt. "The record does not support the [trial] court's conclusion that Jones is individually liable."

Reason The appellate court explained that an LLC is an entity distinct from its members. Normally, a member or manager is not liable for the debts or other liabilities of the firm solely because he or she acts as a member or manager.

Under exceptional circumstances, a court will pierce the veil of an LLC and hold a member or manager personally liable. This can occur if the LLC is undercapitalized, does not keep separate books or records, commingles its finances with those of an individual, pays an individual's debts, is used to commit an illegal act such as fraud, or is otherwise "merely a sham."

In this case, Nesset failed to show that the circumstances warranted imposing personal liability on Jones as a member of Green Development. Nesset acknowledged that Jones acted as the LLC's representative when he took over the general contracting duties from Wilson. When Weber's invoices were paid, Jones made the payments on Green Development's account. Nesset offered no evidence that the LLC was undercapitalized, lacked separate books or finances, was promoting any fraud or illegality, or was a sham. Furthermore, "Nothing about the casual nature of Jones's text messages undermines the financial soundness or legitimacy of his LLC structure."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Besides the "exceptional circumstances" noted by the court in the Nesset case, in what situations might an LLC's member or manager be personally liable for the liability of the company? Explain.
- Economic Why does the law allow—and even encourage—limits on the liability of a business organization's owners and managers for the organization's actions? Discuss.

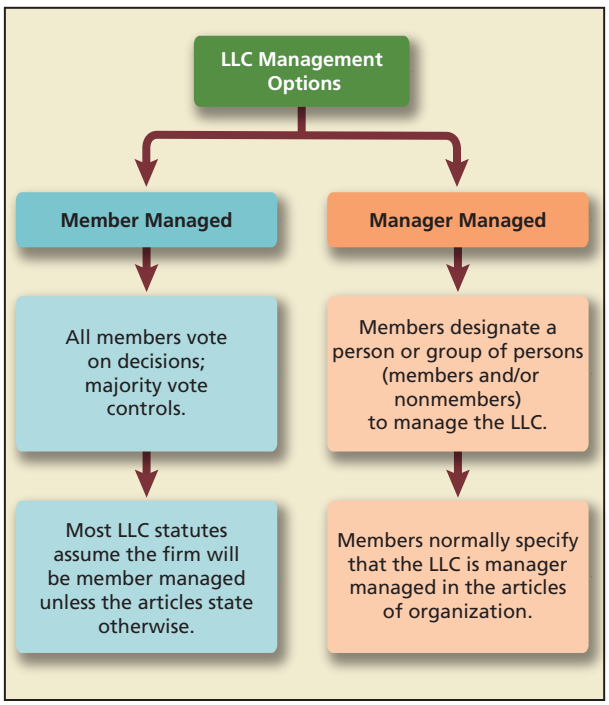
Flexibility in Taxation Another advantage of the LLC is its flexibility in regard to taxation. An LLC that has two or more members can choose to be taxed either as a partnership or as a corporation. A corporate entity normally must pay income taxes on its profits, and the shareholders must then pay personal income taxes on any of those profits that are distributed as dividends. An LLC that wants to distribute profits to its members may prefer to be taxed as a partnership to avoid the "double taxation" that is characteristic of the corporate entity.

Unless an LLC indicates that it wishes to be taxed as a corporation, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) automatically taxes it as a partnership. This means that the LLC, as an entity, pays no taxes. Rather, as in a partnership, profits are "passed through" the LLC to the members, who then personally pay taxes on the profits.

If an LLC's members want to reinvest profits in the business rather than distribute the profits to members, however, they may prefer to be taxed as a corporation. Corporate income tax rates also may be lower than personal tax rates.

An LLC that has only one member cannot be taxed as a partnership. For federal income tax purposes, one-member LLCs are automatically taxed as sole proprietorships unless they indicate that they wish to be taxed as corporations. With respect to state taxes, most states follow the IRS rules.

Management and Foreign Investors One more advantage of the LLC for businesspersons is the flexibility it offers in terms of business operations and management, as will be discussed shortly. Foreign investors are allowed to become LLC members, so organizing as an LLC can enable a business to attract investors from other countries.



Focus Question 2

What are the two options for managing limited liability companies?

28–1e Disadvantages of the LLC

The main disadvantage of the LLC is that state LLC statutes are not uniform. Therefore, businesses that operate in more than one state may not receive consistent treatment. Generally, most states apply to a foreign LLC (an LLC formed in another state) the law of the state where the LLC was formed. Difficulties can arise, though, when one state's court must interpret and apply another state's laws.

Exhibit 28–1 Management of an LLC

28–2 LLC Operation and Management

The members of an LLC have considerable flexibility in operating and managing the business. Here, we discuss management options for an LLC, the fiduciary duties owed, and the operating agreement and general operating procedures.

28–2a Management of an LLC

Basically, LLC members have two options for managing the firm, as shown in Exhibit 28–1. It can be either a member-managed LLC or a manager-managed LLC. Most LLC statutes and the ULLCA provide that unless the articles of organization specify otherwise, an LLC is assumed to be member managed [ULLCA 203(a)(6)].

In a member-managed LLC, all of the members participate in management, and decisions are made by majority vote [ULLCA

404(a)]. In a manager-managed LLC, the members designate a person or group of persons to manage the firm. The management group may consist of only members, both members and nonmembers, or only nonmembers.

However an LLC is managed, its managers need to be aware of the firm's potential liability under employment-discrimination laws. Those laws may sometimes extend to individuals who are not members of a protected class, as discussed in this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature.

28–2b Fiduciary Duties

Under the ULLCA, managers in a manager-managed LLC owe fiduciary duties (the duty of loyalty and the duty of care) to the LLC and to its members, just as corporate directors and officers owe fiduciary duties to the corporation and to its shareholders [ULLCA 409(a), (h)]. Because not all states have adopted the ULLCA, some state statutes provide that managers owe fiduciary duties only to the LLC and not to its members.

To whom a fiduciary duty is owed may seem insignificant at first glance, but it can have a dramatic effect on the outcome of litigation. In North Carolina and Virginia, for instance,

Managerial Strategy

Can a Person Who Is Not a Member of a Protected Class Sue for Discrimination?

Under federal law and the laws of most states, discrimination in employment based on race, color, religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, age, or disability is prohibited. Persons who are members of these protected classes can sue if they are subjected to discrimination.

But can a person subjected to discrimination bring a lawsuit if he is not a member of a protected class, even though managers and other employees believe that he is? This somewhat unusual situation occurred in New Jersey.

A New Jersey Case

Myron Cowher worked at Carson & Roberts Site Construction & Engineering, Inc. For more than a year, at least two of his supervisors directed almost daily barrages of anti-Semitic remarks at him. They believed that he was Jewish, although his actual background was German-Irish and Lutheran.

Cowher brought a suit against the supervisors and the construction company, claiming a hostile work environment. The trial court, however, ruled that he did not have standing to sue under New Jersey law because he was not Jewish and, thus, was not a member of a protected class. Cowher appealed.

The appellate court disagreed with the trial court. The court ruled that if Cowher could prove that the discrimination "would not have occurred but for the perception that he was Jewish," his claim was covered by New Jersey's antidiscrimination law.[a] In the appellate court's view, the nature of the discriminatory remarks—and not the actual characteristics of the plaintiff—determines whether the remarks are actionable.

Perception and Reality

Corey Dickson, an obese bus driver, had been teased by coworkers about his weight. Under New Jersey law, Dickson did not quality as disabled because his obesity was not caused by a medical condition. Still, Dickson brought a hostile work environment claim against his employer, arguing that, as in the Cowher case, his coworkers perceived him to be a member of a protected class even though technically he was not. An appellate court dismissed the lawsuit, holding that Dickson's coworkers perceived that he was obese, not disabled, and obesity alone did not make him a member of a protected class.[b]

Business Questions

1. Should a manager for an LLC respond to employee complaints of discrimination any differently than a manager at a corporation, a partnership, or a sole proprietorship? Why or why not?

2. How can a company, whether an LLC or some other business form, reduce the possibility of discrimination lawsuits?

a. Cowher v. Carson & Roberts, 425 N.J.Super. 285, 40 A.3d 1171 (2012).

b. Dickson v. Community Bus Lines, Inc., 206 A.3d 429, 458 N.J.Super. 522 (2019).

When can a person who is not a member of a protected class sue a company for discrimination?

Operating Agreement An agreement in which the members of a limited liability company set forth the details of how the business will be managed and operated.

LLC statutes do not explicitly state that managers owe fiduciary duties to members.[6] Thus, in those two states, a manager-member owes fiduciary duties only to the LLC and not to its members.[7] In contrast, laws in Idaho and Kentucky provide that a manager-member owes fiduciary duties to the LLC's members and that the members can sue the manager for breaching fiduciary duties.[8]

28–2c The LLC Operating Agreement

The members of an LLC can decide how to operate the various aspects of the business by forming an operating agreement [ULLCA 103(a)]. In many states, an operating agreement is not required for an LLC to exist, and if there is one, it need not be in writing. Generally, though, LLC members should protect their interests by creating a written operating agreement.

Operating agreements typically contain provisions relating to the following areas:

1. Management and how future managers will be chosen or removed. (Although most LLC statutes are silent on this issue, the ULLCA provides that members may choose and remove managers by majority vote [ULLCA 404(b)(3)].)
2. How profits will be divided.
3. How membership interests may be transferred.
4. Whether the dissociation of a member, such as by death or departure, will trigger dissolution of the LLC.
5. Whether formal members' meetings will be held.
6. How voting rights will be apportioned. (If the agreement does not cover voting, LLC statutes in most states provide that voting rights are apportioned according to each member's capital contributions. Some states provide that, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, each member has one vote.)
7. How a buyout price will be calculated in the event of a member's dissociation.

If a dispute arises and there is no agreement covering the topic under dispute, the state LLC statute will govern the outcome. For instance, most LLC statutes provide that if the members have not specified how profits will be divided, they will be divided equally among the members. When an issue is not covered by an operating agreement or by an LLC statute, the courts often apply principles of partnership law.

Sometimes, as in the following case, an operating agreement and the state's LLC statutes are applied together to determine the outcome of a dispute between the members of an LLC.

Case 28.2

Schaefer v. Orth

Wisconsin Court of Appeals, 382 Wis.2d 271, 915 N.W.2d 730 (2018).

Facts Jason Schaefer and Randy Orth created Grilled Cheese, LLC, to own and operate a "Tom and Chee" franchise, a casual restaurant specializing in grilled cheese sandwiches and soups. The operating agreement provided that Schaefer would be responsible for the restaurant's day-to-day operations, for which the LLC would pay him a monthly salary and bonuses. Orth would be responsible for the LLC's business and financial decisions and would not receive any compensation. The restaurant reported a profit only in its first full month of operations. Five months later, when Schaefer was not paid his salary and bonuses, he quit.

Later, Orth closed the restaurant and worked to wind up the business. Both parties lost all the funds they had invested in the LLC. Schaefer filed a suit in a Wisconsin state court against Orth, claiming breach of contract for Orth's failure to pay Schaefer's salary. The court directed a verdict in Orth's favor. Schaefer appealed.

Issue Was Orth personally liable to Schaefer for his unpaid salary and bonuses?

Decision No. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment. "The evidence presented at trial does not permit a legal conclusion that Orth was personally liable to Schaefer for" his unpaid salary and bonuses.

Reason At trial, both Orth and Schaefer testified that the LLC, not Orth, was responsible for paying Schaefer's compensation. The agreement's "unambiguous language" supported this testimony. A section titled "Distributions" provided that Schaefer's salary and bonuses were to be paid before other "distributions" to the members. All "distributions" were to be made from the funds of the LLC. Similarly, a section titled "Profits" stated, "The LLC shall, as the first priority, allocate Profit to Schaefer to the extent, if any, [of] compensation accruing in his favor." The agreement defined "profit" as the profit of the LLC.

Furthermore, under Wisconsin's LLC statutes, "the . . . obligations . . . of a limited liability company . . . shall be solely the . . . obligations . . . of the limited liability company." A member of an LLC "is not personally liable for any . . . obligation . . . of the limited liability company, except that a member or manager may become personally liable by his or her acts or conduct other than as a member or manager." Here, there was no evidence that Orth acted outside his capacity as a member or manager when Schaefer was not paid his salary and bonuses.

Critical Thinking

Under this provision, would Schaefer be entitled to an award of attorneys' fees even though the trial court granted Orth's motion for a directed verdict? Discuss.*
- Legal Environment Could Schaefer have sued the LLC to recover his unpaid salary and bonuses? Explain.

28–3 Dissociation and Dissolution of an LLC

Recall that in a partnership, dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in the carrying on of the business. The same concept applies to LLCs. Like a partner in a partnership, a member of an LLC has the power to dissociate at any time but may not have the right to dissociate.

Under the ULLCA, the events that trigger a member's dissociation from an LLC are similar to the events causing a partner to be dissociated under the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA). These include voluntary withdrawal, expulsion by other members or by court order, bankruptcy, incompetence, and death. Generally, if a member dies or otherwise dissociates from an LLC, the other members may continue to carry on the LLC's business, unless the operating agreement provides otherwise.

28–3a The Effects of Dissociation

A member who dissociates from an LLC loses the right to participate in management and the right to act as an agent for the LLC. The member's duty of loyalty to the LLC also terminates, and the duty of care continues only with respect to events that occurred before dissociation.

Generally, the dissociated member also has a right to have his or her interest in the LLC bought out by the other members. The LLC's operating agreement may contain provisions establishing a buyout price. If it does not, the member's interest is usually purchased at a fair value. In states that have adopted the ULLCA, the LLC must purchase the interest at fair value within 120 days after the dissociation.

If the member's dissociation violates the LLC's operating agreement, it is considered legally wrongful, and the dissociated member can be held liable for damages caused by the dissociation. Example 28.5 Chadwick and Barrel are members of an LLC. Chadwick manages the accounts, and Barrel, who has many connections in the community and is a skilled investor, brings in the business. If Barrel wrongfully dissociates from the LLC, the LLC's business will suffer, and Chadwick can hold Barrel liable for the loss of business resulting from her withdrawal.

28–3b Dissolution

Regardless of whether or not a member's dissociation was wrongful, normally the dissociated member has no right to force the LLC to dissolve. The remaining members can opt to either continue or dissolve the business.

Members can also stipulate in their operating agreement that certain events will cause dissolution, or they can agree that they have the power to dissolve the LLC by vote. As with partnerships, a court can order an LLC to be dissolved in certain circumstances. For instance, a court might order dissolution when the members have engaged in illegal or oppressive conduct, or when it is no longer feasible to carry on the business.

Case Example 28.6 Charles Timmons was a member of Lake City Golf Club, a limited liability company operated by another member, Claude Ste. Marie. Timmons became disenchanted with Ste. Marie's management of the club's finances and filed a suit against Lake City. The settlement agreement from this action granted Timmons $1,750,000 to be paid by Lake City in installments. When Lake City was unable to make these payments, Timmons sued again. This time, an arbitrator decided that, given its precarious financial situation, Lake City must be judicially dissolved. A trial court eventually found that Timmons was owed about $1,850,000 of the proceeds from this dissolution, an amount upheld on appeal.[9] (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for an illustration of when a court will not dissolve an LLC.)

A judge's exercise of discretion to order the dissolution of an LLC was disputed in the following case.

9. Timmons v. Lake City Golf, LLC, 293 So.3d 596 (Fla.Dis.Ct.App. 2020).

Case 28.3

Reese v. Newman

District of Columbia Court of Appeals, 131 A.3d 880 (2016).

Facts Allison Reese and Nicole Newman, the owners of ANR Construction Management, LLC, could not reconcile their difference of opinion over the company's direction. Newman told Reese that she was going to dissolve and wind up the firm. Reese wanted Newman to dissociate from ANR, so that Reese could continue the business. This dispute led to Newman's filing a suit in a District of Columbia court against Reese.

Following a trial, a jury found grounds for both ANR's dissolution and Newman's dissociation. The court chose to exercise its discretion under the state statutes governing the dissociation of members and the dissolution of LLCs. The court ordered dissolution. Reese appealed.

Issue Did the trial judge have the discretion to choose either the dissociation of a member or the dissolution of the LLC?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's order. The trial court acted within its discretion in ordering dissolution rather than dissociation.

Reason Reese argued that the statutes did not allow for any exercise of discretion by the judge but instead required the court to order Newman's dissociation based on the jury's findings. The appellate court disagreed. The court applied the plain language rule to construe the language of the two statutes. Both the dissociation statute and the dissolution statute used the word "shall" ("shall be dissociated" and "shall be dissolved"), which the court reasoned was not a command. The court interpreted the effect as meaning "when both grounds for dissociation of a member and dissolution of the LLC exist, the trial judge has discretion to choose either alternative."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Newman alleged that after she delivered her notice to dissolve ANR, Reese locked her out of the LLC's bank accounts, blocked her access to the LLC's files and e-mail, and ended her salary and health benefits. Do these allegations, if proved, support or refute the court's decision to dissolve the firm? Explain.

28–3c Winding Up

When an LLC is dissolved, any members who did not wrongfully dissociate may participate in the winding up process. To wind up the business, members must collect, liquidate, and distribute the LLC's assets.

Members may preserve the assets for a reasonable time to optimize their returns, and they continue to have the authority to perform reasonable acts in conjunction with winding up. In other words, the LLC will be bound by the reasonable acts of its members during the winding up process.

Once all the LLC's assets have been sold, the proceeds are distributed. Debts to creditors are paid first (including debts owed to members who are creditors of the LLC). The members' capital contributions are returned next. Any remaining amounts are then distributed to members in equal shares or according to their operating agreement.

When Will a Court Order the Dissolution of an LLC?

Business Law Analysis

Walter Van Houten and John King formed 1545 Ocean Avenue, LLC, with each managing 50 percent of the business. Its purpose was to renovate an existing building and construct a new commercial building. Van Houten and King quarreled over many aspects of the work on the properties. King claimed that Van Houten paid the contractors too much for the work performed. As the projects neared completion, King demanded that the LLC be dissolved and that Van Houten agree to a buyout. Because the parties could not agree on a buyout, King sued for dissolution. The trial court enjoined (prevented) further work on the projects until the dispute was settled.

As the ground for dissolution, King cited the fights over management decisions. There was no claim of fraud or frustration of purpose. The trial court ordered that the LLC be dissolved, and Van Houten appealed. Should either of the owners be forced to dissolve the LLC before the completion of its purpose—that is, before the building projects are finished?

Analysis: The issue here is whether disagreements over management decisions are a sufficient reason for a court to dissolve an LLC. Normally, the grounds for dissolution are specified in the operating agreement. If not, then a court will consider several factors. Usually, the petitioning member must establish that (1) the management of the entity is unable or unwilling to reasonably permit or promote the stated purpose of the entity to be realized or achieved, or (2) continuing the entity is financially unfeasible.

A court will not dissolve a LLC merely because events have not turned out exactly as the LLC's owners originally envisioned or because the LLC has failed to be profitable. Dissolution is reserved for situations in which the LLC's management has become so dysfunctional or its business purpose so thwarted that it is no longer practicable to operate the business. For instance, when there is a voting deadlock among members or the defined purpose of the entity has become impossible to fulfill, a court will order dissolution.

Result and Reasoning: Here, there was disagreement about the work being done (and the price), but the project was moving toward completion. Thus, there is no reason that the purpose of the LLC should not be fulfilled. Also, there is no evidence that the entity is financially unfeasible. Therefore, a court is not likely to order dissolution of the LLC.

28–4 Special Business Forms

Focus Question 4

What is a joint venture? How is it similar to a partnership? How is it different?

Besides the business forms already discussed in this unit, several other forms can be used to organize a business. For the most part, these special business forms are hybrid organizations—that is, they combine features of other organizational forms, such as partnerships and corporations. These forms include joint ventures, syndicates, joint stock companies, business trusts, and cooperatives.

28–4a Joint Ventures

Joint Venture A joint undertaking by two or more persons or business entities to combine their efforts or their property for a single transaction or project or for a related series of transactions or projects. A joint venture is generally treated like a partnership for tax and other legal purposes.

In a joint venture, two or more persons or business entities combine their efforts or their property for a single transaction or project or for a related series of transactions or projects. For instance, when several contractors combine their resources to build and sell houses in a single development, their relationship is a joint venture. Unless otherwise agreed, joint venturers share profits and losses equally.

Joint ventures range in size from very small activities to multimillion-dollar joint actions carried out by some of the world's largest corporations. Large organizations often investigate new markets or new ideas by forming joint ventures with other enterprises. Example 28.7 BMW enters into a joint venture with JLR's Range Rover Division. Under the agreement, the companies work together and use the S63, a twin-turbo V8 engine, to manufacture certain automobiles. ■

Similarities to Partnerships The joint venture resembles a partnership and is taxed like a partnership. For this reason, most courts apply the same principles to joint ventures as they apply to partnerships. Joint venturers owe each other the same fiduciary duties, including the duty of loyalty, that partners owe each other. Thus, if one of the venturers secretly buys land that was supposed to be acquired by the joint venture, the other joint venturers may be awarded damages for the breach of loyalty. Joint venturers have some authority as agents to enter into contracts for business purposes that will bind the joint venture.

Know This

A partnership involves a continuing relationship of the partners. A joint venture is often a one-time association.

A joint venturer can be held personally liable for the venture's debts (because joint venturers share losses as well as profits). Like partners, joint venturers have equal rights to manage the activities of the enterprise, but they can agree to give control of the operation to one of the members.

Differences from Partnerships Joint ventures differ from partnerships in several important ways. A joint venture is typically created for a single project or series of transactions, whereas a partnership usually (though not always) involves an ongoing business. Thus unlike most partnerships, a joint venture normally terminates when the project or the transaction for which it was formed has been completed.

Because the activities of a joint venture are more limited than the business of a partnership, the members of a joint venture are presumed to have less power to bind their co-venturers. Accordingly, the members of a joint venture have less implied and apparent authority than the partners in a partnership (each of whom is treated as an agent of the other partners).

28–4b Syndicates

Syndicate A group of individuals or firms that join together to finance a project. A syndicate is also called an investment group.

In a syndicate, or investment group, several individuals or firms join together to finance a particular project. Syndicates can finance projects such as the construction of a shopping center or the purchase of a professional basketball franchise. The form of such groups varies considerably. A syndicate may be organized as a corporation or as a general or limited partnership. In some instances, the members do not have a legally recognized business arrangement but merely purchase and own property jointly.

28–4c Joint Stock Companies

A joint stock company is a true hybrid of a partnership and a corporation. It has many characteristics of a corporation in that (1) its ownership is represented by transferable shares of stock, (2) it is managed by directors and officers of the company or association, and (3) it can have a perpetual existence.

Most of its other features, however, are more characteristic of a partnership, and it is usually treated like a partnership. Like a partnership, a joint stock company is formed by agreement (not statute). Property is usually held in the names of the members, who are called shareholders, and they have personal liability. In a joint stock company, however, shareholders are not considered to be agents of one another, as they are in a partnership.

Joint Stock Company A hybrid form of business organization that combines characteristics of a corporation and a partnership. Usually, a joint stock company is regarded as a partnership for tax and other legal purposes.

28–4d Business Trusts

A business trust is created by a written trust agreement that sets forth the interests of the beneficiaries and obligations and powers of the trustee. This form of organization was started in Massachusetts in an attempt to obtain the limited liability advantage of a corporation while avoiding restrictions on real property ownership. With a business trust, legal ownership and management of the trust's property stay with one or more of the trustees, and the profits are distributed to the beneficiaries.

A business trust resembles a corporation in many respects. Beneficiaries of the trust, for instance, are not personally responsible for the trust's debts or obligations. In fact, in a number of states, business trusts must pay corporate taxes.

Business Trust A form of business organization, created by a written trust agreement, that resembles a corporation. Legal ownership and management of the trust's property stay with the trustees, and the profits are distributed to the beneficiaries, who have limited liability.

Cooperative An association, which may or may not be incorporated, that is organized to provide an economic service to its members. Unincorporated cooperatives are often treated like partnerships for tax and other legal purposes.

28–4e Cooperatives

A cooperative (co-op) is an association that is organized to provide an economic service to its members (or shareholders). It may or may not be incorporated. Most cooperatives are organized under state statutes for cooperatives, general business corporations, or LLCs. Co-ops range in size from small, local consumer cooperatives to national businesses such as Ace Hardware and Land O'Lakes, a well-known producer of dairy products.

Generally, an incorporated cooperative distributes dividends, or profits, to its owners on the basis of their transactions with the cooperative rather than on the basis of the amount of capital they contributed. Members of incorporated cooperatives have limited liability, as do shareholders of corporations and members of LLCs. Cooperatives that are unincorporated are often treated like partnerships, and members have joint liability for the cooperative's acts.

The cooperative form of business is generally adopted by groups of individuals who wish to pool their resources to gain some advantage in the marketplace. Consumer purchasing co-ops, for instance, are formed to obtain lower prices through quantity discounts. Seller marketing co-ops are formed to control the market and thereby enable members to sell their goods at higher prices.

Most people believe that cooperatives are small enterprises, but not all are. Ace Hardware is a nationwide co-op that was formed over eighty years ago. What is the benefit of forming a co-op?

Practice and Review

The city of Papagos, Arizona, had a deteriorating bridge in need of repair on a prominent public roadway. The city posted notices seeking proposals for an artistic bridge design and reconstruction. Davidson Masonry, LLC—owned and managed by Carl Davidson and his wife, Marilyn Rowe—decided to submit a bid for a decorative concrete project that incorporated artistic metalwork. They contacted Shana Lafayette, a local sculptor who specialized in large-scale metal creations, to help them design the bridge. The city selected their bridge design and awarded them the contract for a commission of $184,000.

Davidson Masonry and Lafayette then entered into an agreement to work together on the bridge project. Davidson Masonry agreed to install and pay for concrete and structural work, and Lafayette agreed to install the metalwork at her expense. They agreed that overall profits would be split, with 25 percent going to Lafayette and 75 percent going to Davidson Masonry. Lafayette designed numerous metal salmon sculptures that were incorporated into colorful decorative concrete forms designed by Rowe, while Davidson performed the structural engineering. The group worked together successfully until the completion of the project. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Davidson Masonry automatically be taxed as a partnership or a corporation? Explain.
2. Is Davidson Masonry member managed or manager managed?
3. When Davidson Masonry and Lafayette entered into an agreement to work together, what kind of special business form was created? Explain.
4. Suppose that during construction, Lafayette entered into an agreement to rent space in a warehouse that was close to the bridge so that she could work on her sculptures near the location where they would be installed. She entered into the contract without the knowledge or consent of Davidson Masonry. In this situation, would a court be likely to hold that Davidson Masonry was bound by the contract? Why or why not?

Because LLCs are essentially just partnerships with limited liability for members, all partnership laws should apply.

Chapter Summary: Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms

The Limited Liability Company	A limited liability company (LLC) is a hybrid form of business enterprise that offers the limited liability of a corporation and the tax advantages of a partnership. 1. Formation—Articles of organization must be filed with the appropriate state office—usually the office of the secretary of state—setting forth the name of the business, its principal address, the name and address of a registered agent, the names of the owners (called members), and information on how the LLC will be managed. 2. Advantages and disadvantages of the LLC—Advantages of the LLC include limited liability, the option to be taxed as a partnership or as a corporation, and flexibility in deciding how the business will be managed and operated. The LLC also allows foreign investors to be members. The main disadvantage is the absence of uniformity in state LLC statutes.
LLC Operation and Management	1. Management—An LLC can be member managed or manager managed. The management group may consist of members only, both members and nonmembers, or nonmembers only. 2. Fiduciary duties—In some states, managers in a manager-managed LLC owe fiduciary duties (the duty of loyalty and the duty of care) to the LLC and to its members. 3. Operating agreement—When an LLC is formed, the members decide, in an operating agreement, how the business will be managed and what rules will apply to the organization.
Dissociation and Dissolution of an LLC	Members of an LLC have the power to dissociate from the LLC at any time, but they may not have the right to dissociate. Dissociation does not always result in the dissolution of an LLC. The remaining members can choose to continue the business. Dissociated members have a right to have their interest purchased by the other members. If the LLC is dissolved, the business must be wound up and the assets sold. Creditors are paid first, and then members' capital investments are returned. Any remaining proceeds are distributed to members.
Special Business Forms	1. Joint venture—An organization created by two or more persons in contemplation of a single transaction or project or a related series of transactions or projects. A joint venture is similar to a partnership in many respects. 2. Syndicate—An investment group that undertakes to finance a particular project. A syndicate may be organized as a corporation or as a general or limited partnership. 3. Joint stock company—A business form similar to a corporation in some respects (transferable shares of stock, management by directors and officers, perpetual existence) but otherwise resembling a partnership. 4. Business trust—A business form created by a written trust agreement that sets forth the interests of the beneficiaries and the obligations and powers of the trustees. Beneficiaries are not personally liable for the debts or obligations of the business trust, which is similar to a corporation in many respects. 5. Cooperative—An association organized to provide an economic service, without profit, to its members. A co-op may or may not be incorporated.

1. Gabriel, Harry, and Ida are members of Jeweled Watches, LLC. What are their options with respect to the management of their firm? (See LLC Operation and Management.)
2. Greener Delivery Company and Hiway Trucking, Inc., form a business trust. Insta Equipment Company and Jiffy Supply Corporation form a joint stock company. Kwik Mart, Inc., and Luscious Produce, Inc., form an incorporated cooperative. What do these forms of business organization have in common? (See Special Business Forms.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

28–1. Limited Liability Companies. John, Lesa, and Trevor form a limited liability company. John contributes 60 percent of the capital, and Lesa and Trevor each contribute 20 percent. Nothing is decided about how profits will be divided. John assumes that he will be entitled to 60 percent of the profits, in accordance with his contribution. Lesa and Trevor, however, assume that the profits will be divided equally. A dispute over the profits arises, and ultimately a court has to decide the issue. What law will the court apply? In most states, what will result? How could this dispute have been avoided in the first place? Discuss fully. (See The Limited Liability Company.)

28–2. Special Business Forms. Faraway Corp. supplies business equipment. Faraway is considering entering into two contracts, one with a joint stock company east of the Mississippi River and the other with a business trust formed by a number of sole proprietors on the West Coast. Both contracts require Faraway to make large capital outlays in order to supply the businesses with restaurant equipment. In both business organizations, at least two shareholders or beneficiaries are personally wealthy, but each organization has limited financial resources. The owner-managers of Faraway are not familiar with either form of business organization. Because each form resembles a corporation, they are concerned about whether they will be able to collect payments from the wealthy members of the business organizations in the event that either organization breaches the contract by failing to make the payments. Discuss fully Faraway's concern. (See Special Business Forms.)

28–3. Jurisdiction. Joe, a resident of New Jersey, wants to open a restaurant. He asks his friend Kay, who is an experienced attorney and a New Yorker, for her business and legal advice in exchange for a 20 percent ownership interest in the restaurant. Kay helps Joe negotiate a lease for the restaurant premises and advises Joe to organize the business as a limited liability company (LLC). Joe forms Café Olé, LLC, and, with Kay's help, obtains financing. Then, the night before the restaurant opens, Joe tells Kay that he is "cutting her out of the deal." The restaurant proves to be a success. Kay wants to file a suit in a federal district court against Joe and the LLC. Can a federal court exercise jurisdiction over the parties based on diversity of citizenship? Explain. (See The Limited Liability Company.)

28–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—LLC Operation. James Williford, Patricia Mosser, Marquetta Smith, and Michael Floyd formed Bluewater Logistics, LLC, to bid on construction contracts after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast. Under Mississippi law, every member of a member-managed LLC is entitled to participate in managing the business. The operating agreement provided for a "supermajority" 75 percent vote to remove a member who "has either committed a felony or under any other circumstances that would jeopardize the company status" as a contractor. After Bluewater had completed more than $5 million in contracts, Smith told Williford that she, Mosser, and Floyd were exercising their "supermajority" vote to fire him. No reason was provided. Williford sued Bluewater and the other members. Did Smith, Mosser, and Floyd breach the state LLC statute, their fiduciary duties, or the Bluewater operating agreement? Discuss. [Bluewater Logistics, LLC v. Williford, 55 So.3d 148 (Miss. 2011)] (See LLC Operation and Management.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 28–4, go to Appendix E.

28–5. Jurisdictional Requirements. Fadal Machining Centers, LLC, and MAG Industrial Automation Centers, LLC, sued a New Jersey–based corporation, Mid-Atlantic CNC, Inc., in federal district court. Ten percent of MAG was owned by SP MAG Holdings, a Delaware LLC. SP MAG had six members, including a Delaware limited partnership called Silver Point Capital Fund and a Delaware LLC called SPCP Group III. In turn, Silver Point and SPCP Group had a common member, Robert O'Shea, who was a New Jersey citizen. Assuming that the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, does the district court have diversity jurisdiction? Why or why not? [Fadal Machining Centers, LLC v. Mid-Atlantic CNC, Inc., 464 Fed.Appx. 672 (9th Cir. 2012)] (See The Limited Liability Company.)

28–6. Jurisdictional Requirements. Siloam Springs Hotel, LLC, operates a Hampton Inn in Siloam Springs, Arkansas. Siloam bought insurance from Century Surety Co. to cover the hotel. When guests suffered injuries due to a leak of carbon monoxide from the heating element of an indoor swimming pool, Siloam filed a claim with Century. Century denied coverage. Siloam disputed the denial. Century asked a federal district court to resolve the dispute. In asserting that the federal court had jurisdiction, Century noted that the amount in controversy exceeded $75,000 and that the parties had complete diversity of citizenship: Century is "a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio, with its principal place of business in Michigan," and Siloam is "a corporation organized under the laws of Oklahoma, with its principal place of business in Arkansas." Can the court exercise diversity jurisdiction in this case? Discuss. [Siloam Springs Hotel, L.L.C. v. Century Surety Co., 781 F.3d 1233 (10th Cir. 2015)] (See The Limited Liability Company.)

28–7. Special Business Forms. Randall and Peggy Norman operated a dairy farm in Pine River, Minnesota. About ten years after the operation was begun, the cows started to experience health issues. Over the next eighteen years, the herd suffered many serious health problems. Eventually, stray electrical voltage—which can use cow hooves as an unintended pathway, causing health issues—was detected. By then, milk production in the Normans' herd had declined from 27 percent above the state average to 20 percent below it. The Normans filed a suit in a Minnesota state court against Crow Wing Cooperative Power & Light Company, a member-owned electrical cooperative that provided electricity to the Normans' farm. If Crow Wing is found to have acted negligently, can its members be held jointly liable for the cooperative's acts? Explain. [Norman v. Crow Wing Cooperative Power & Light Co., 2016 WL 687472 (Minn.App. 2016)] (See Special Business Forms.)

28–8. Limited Liability. Vision Metals, Inc., owned and operated a pipe manufacturing facility that caused groundwater contamination. The Texas Commission on Environmental Quality (TCEQ) issued a plan that obligated Vision to treat the water and monitor the treatment. Later, Vision sold the property to White Lion Holdings, LLC. Bernard Morello, the sole member of White Lion, knew of the environmental obligations accompanying the property. When White Lion failed to comply with the TCEQ plan, the agency filed a suit in a Texas state court against Morello, asserting violations of the state's environmental rules. Morello was charged with personally removing the facility's treatment plant and monitoring system. Considering the nature of an LLC, what is Morello's best argument that he is not liable? Is this argument likely to succeed? Explain. [State of Texas v. Morello, 61 Tex.Sup.Ct.J. 381, 547 S.W.3d 881 (2018)] (See Limited Liability Companies.)

28–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and LLC Operation and Management. Q Restaurant Group Holdings, LLC, owns and operates Q-BBQ restaurants. Michael Lapidus managed the restaurants and conducted the day-to-day operations. This included bargaining with the restaurants' vendors, buying the supplies, keeping the books and records of account, and handling the company's money. Lapidus dealt with the staff and made the hiring and firing decisions. He was expected to use his best efforts to grow the profitability of the restaurants. The LLC discovered, however, that Lapidus was misappropriating and converting company funds to his own use. He was also exposing the LLC to liability by mistreating female employees and vendors. When the members voted to terminate Lapidus, he changed the passwords on the Q-BBQ social media accounts, interfered with the employees during their work hours, and refused to return company property in his possession. [Q Restaurant Group Holdings, LLC v. Lapidus, 2017 IL App (2d) 170804-U, 2017 WL 6550606 (2017)] (See LLC Operation and Management.)

1. What action should the LLC take against Lapidus? Consider the ethics of the options, using the IDDR approach.
2. Suppose that Lapidus was in the midst of a contentious divorce, experiencing severe financial problems, and undergoing psychological distress as a consequence. Could these issues excuse his conduct at work? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

28–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Fiduciary Duties. Newbury Properties Group owns, manages, and develops real property. Jerry Stoker and the Stoker Group, Inc. (the Stokers), also develop real property. Newbury entered into agreements with the Stokers concerning a large tract of property in Georgia. The parties formed Bellemare, LLC, to develop various parcels of the tract for residential purposes. The operating agreement of Bellemare indicated that "no Member shall be accountable to the LLC or to any other Member with respect to any other business or activity even if the business or activity competes with the LLC's business." Later, when the Newbury group contracted with other parties to develop parcels within the tract in competition with Bellemare, LLC, the Stokers sued, alleging breach of fiduciary duty. (See LLC Operation and Management.)

1. The first group will discuss and outline the fiduciary duties that the members of an LLC owe to each other.
2. The second group will determine whether the terms of an operating agreement can alter these fiduciary duties.
3. The last group will decide in whose favor the court should rule in this situation.

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is a close corporation?
2. What four steps are involved in bringing a corporation into existence?
3. In what circumstances might a court disregard the corporate entity ("pierce the corporate veil") and hold the shareholders personally liable?
4. What are the duties of corporate directors and officers?
5. What is a voting proxy?

Corporation A legal entity formed in compliance with statutory requirements that is distinct from its shareholder-owners.

"A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law."

John Marshall
1755–1835
(Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, 1801–1835)

A corporation is a creature of statute—a legal entity created and recognized by state law. As John Marshall indicated in the chapter-opening quotation, a corporation is an artificial being, existing only in law and neither tangible nor visible. Its existence generally depends on state law. Each state has its own body of corporate law, and these laws are not entirely uniform.

The Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA) is a codification of modern corporate law that has been influential in shaping state corporation statutes. Today, the majority of state statutes are guided by the most recent version of the MBCA, often referred to as the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA).

Keep in mind, however, that there is considerable variation among the laws of states that have used the MBCA or the RMBCA as a basis for their statutes. In addition, several states do not follow either act. Consequently, individual state corporation laws should be relied on to determine corporate law, rather than the MBCA or RMBCA.

29–1 Nature and Classification

A corporation is a legal entity created and recognized by state law. This business entity can have one or more owners (called shareholders), and it operates under a name distinct from the names of its owners. Both individuals and other businesses can be shareholders. The corporation substitutes itself for its shareholders when conducting corporate business and incurring liability. Its authority to act and the liability for its actions, however, are separate and apart from the shareholders who own it.

A corporation is recognized under U.S. law as a person—an artificial legal person, as opposed to a natural person. As a "person," it enjoys many of the same rights and privileges under state and federal law that U.S. citizens enjoy. For instance, corporations possess the same right of access to the courts as citizens and can sue or be sued. The constitutional guarantees of due process, free speech, and freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures also apply to corporations.

29–1a Corporate Personnel

In a corporation, the responsibility for the overall management of the firm is entrusted to a board of directors, whose members are elected by the shareholders. The board of directors hires corporate officers and other employees to run the corporation's daily business operations.

When an individual purchases a share of stock (an equity interest) in a corporation, that person becomes a shareholder and thus an owner of the corporation. Unlike the members of a partnership, the body of shareholders can change constantly without affecting the continued existence of the corporation. A shareholder can sue the corporation, the corporation can sue a shareholder, and in certain situations, a shareholder can sue "on behalf of" the corporation.

29–1b The Limited Liability of Shareholders

The major advantage of the corporate form is the limited liability of its owners (shareholders). Corporate shareholders' liability is limited to the amount of their investments. Shareholders usually are not otherwise liable for the debts of the corporation. To enable the firm to obtain credit, however, shareholders in small companies sometimes voluntarily assume personal liability, as guarantors, for corporate obligations.

29–1c Corporate Earnings and Taxation

When a corporation earns profits, it can either pass them on to its shareholders in the form of a dividend or retain them as profits. These retained earnings, if invested properly, will yield higher corporate profits in the future and cause the price of the company's stock to rise. Individual shareholders can then reap the benefits in the capital gains that they receive when they sell their stock.

Dividend A distribution of corporate profits to the corporation's shareholders in proportion to the number of shares held.

Retained Earnings The portion of a corporation's profits that has not been paid out as dividends to shareholders.

Whether a corporation retains its profits or passes them on to the shareholders as dividends, those profits are subject to income taxation by various levels of government. Failure to pay taxes can lead to severe consequences. The state can suspend the entity's corporate status until the taxes are paid or even dissolve the corporation for failing to pay taxes.

Another important aspect of corporate taxation is that corporate profits can be subject to double taxation. The company pays tax on its profits, and then if the profits are passed on to the shareholders as dividends, the shareholders must also pay income tax on them. The corporation normally does not receive a tax deduction for dividends it distributes to shareholders. This double-taxation feature is one of the major disadvantages of the corporate business form.

Currently, the federal government taxes corporate income at a flat rate of 21 percent. This relatively low rate is good for corporate profits but does not affect the potential for double taxation.

29–1d Torts and Criminal Acts

Under modern criminal law, a corporation may be held liable for the criminal acts of its agents and employees. Although corporations cannot be imprisoned, they can be fined. (Of course, corporate directors and officers can be imprisoned, and many have been in recent years.) In addition, under sentencing guidelines for crimes committed by corporate employees (white-collar crimes), corporations can face fines amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars.

A corporation is also liable for the torts committed by its agents or officers within the course and scope of their employment. The doctrine of respondeat superior applies to corporations in the same way as it does to other agency relationships. A claim against a corporate employer based on respondeat superior requires a showing that the individual who committed the tort was an employee acting in the course of employment. The question in the following case was whether the identity of the employee had to be established as well.

Wulf v. Bravo Brio Restaurant Group, Inc.

Court of Appeals of Ohio, Twelfth District, Butler County, 2019 -Ohio- 3434, 142 N.E.3d 123 (2019).

Facts Roland Wulf went to dinner at the Bravo Cucina Italiana restaurant in West Chester, Ohio. He was walking down an aisle between dining booths and the kitchen food counter to the restroom when someone backed into him. Wulf lost his balance, fell to the floor, and fractured a hip.

He filed a complaint in an Ohio state court against the owner of the restaurant, Bravo Brio Restaurant Group, Inc. Wulf alleged that his injuries resulted from the negligence of a Bravo waitress and that Bravo Brio, her corporate employer, was liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior. Wulf described the waitress—in her twenties, 5 feet 6 inches tall, slender, with brown hair, in a Bravo uniform, and not wearing glasses—and testified that she had admitted working for the restaurant and had apologized. But he could not specifically identify her.

The trial court concluded that Wulf's failure to identify the waitress was fatal to his claim and granted Bravo Brio's motion for summary judgment. Wulf appealed.

Issue Did the trial court err in requiring that the waitress be specifically identified as a prerequisite to applying the doctrine of respondeat superior?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the judgment of the trial court and remanded the case for further proceedings. Wulf did not need to establish the waitress's identity to proceed with his claim against Bravo Brio.

Reason The appellate court set out the principles for the application of the doctrine of respondeat superior in a case involving an employee's negligence.

For the employer to be liable, the employee's negligent acts must occur during the performance of work subject to the employer's control. The employee's acts must also be within the scope of the employment. That is all that an injured plaintiff needs to prove for the doctrine to apply—the employee was negligent and acting within the scope of employment. As the court pointed out, "There is no requirement that the employee be named as a party to the suit in order to prove his [or her] negligent acts."

The court found no cases requiring that the identity of the employee be established to apply the doctrine. The court added, "We see no reason why a claim of respondeat superior should be dependent upon the plaintiff establishing the identity of the negligent employee, as long as the plaintiff establishes that the negligent individual was an employee in the course of employment." Thus, in the Wulf case, specific identification of the waitress was not required because Wulf saw her Bravo uniform and she acknowledged working for the restaurant.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment What issues of fact must be resolved concerning Wulf's claim for Bravo Brio to be held liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior? Discuss.
- Economic Why should a corporation be held liable for torts committed by its employees during the course of their employment?

29–1e Classification of Corporations

Corporations can be classified in several ways. The classification of a corporation normally depends on its location, purpose, and ownership characteristics, as described in the following subsections.

Domestic, Foreign, and Alien Corporations A corporation is referred to as a domestic corporation by its home state (the state in which it incorporates). A corporation formed in one state but doing business in another is referred to in the second state as a foreign corporation. A corporation formed in another country (say, Mexico) but doing business in the United States is referred to in the United States as an alien corporation.

Domestic Corporation In a given state, a corporation that is organized under the law of that state.

Foreign Corporation In a given state, a corporation that does business in that state but is not incorporated there.

Alien Corporation A corporation formed in another country but doing business in the United States.

A corporation does not have an automatic right to do business in a state other than its state of incorporation. In some instances, it must obtain a certificate of authority in any state in which it plans to do business. Once the certificate has been issued, the corporation generally can exercise in that state all of the powers conferred on it by its home state. If a foreign corporation does business in a state without obtaining a certificate of authority, the state can impose substantial fines and sanctions on the corporation, and sometimes even on its officers, directors, or agents.

Note that most state statutes specify certain activities, such as soliciting orders via the Internet, that are not considered doing business within the state. Thus, a foreign corporation normally does not need a certificate of authority to sell goods or services via the Internet or by mail.

Courts are often asked to determine what constitutes "doing business" in a state for jurisdictional purposes. Case Example 29.1 South Carolina resident Bud Fidrych severely injured his thumb at The Boscolo-Milano hotel in Milan, Italy. Fidrych subsequently filed a negligence lawsuit in a federal district court in South Carolina against Marriott International, Inc., a Delaware corporation that was affiliated with The Boscolo.

The district court established that, although Marriott did not own or operate any hotels in South Carolina, it had ninety franchisees and licensees in the state. Additionally, Marriott's booking website was accessible to South Carolinians, just as it was accessible to anyone with online access. Finally, as a foreign corporation, Marriott had obtained the necessary certificate of authority to operate in South Carolina.

These minimal contacts did not, the district court ruled, make Marriott "at home" in South Carolina for jurisdictional purposes. Therefore, Fidrych's lawsuit could not proceed. A federal appeals court agreed. As the court noted, under South Carolina law, obtaining a certificate of authority does not automatically indicate that a foreign corporation conducts "sufficient activities" in the state to be subject to a lawsuit in the state's courts.[1]

What factors will a court consider when determining whether a hotel chain has "sufficient activities" in a state to be subject to a negligence lawsuit there?

Public and Private Corporations A public corporation is one formed by the government to meet some political or governmental purpose. Cities and towns that incorporate are common examples. In addition, many federal government organizations—such as the U.S. Postal Service, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and AMTRAK—are public corporations.

Public Corporation A corporation owned by a federal, state, or municipal government to meet a political or governmental purpose.

Note that a public corporation is not the same as a publicly held corporation (often called a public company). A publicly held corporation is any corporation whose shares are publicly traded in securities markets, such as the New York Stock Exchange or the NASDAQ. (The NASDAQ is an electronic stock exchange founded by the National Association of Securities Dealers.)

Publicly Held Corporation A corporation whose shares are publicly traded in securities markets, such as the New York Stock Exchange or the NASDAQ.

Private corporations, in contrast, are created either wholly or in part for private benefit. Most corporations are private. Although private corporations may serve a public purpose, as a public electric or gas utility does, they are owned by private persons rather than by the government.[2]

2. The United States Supreme Court first recognized the property rights of private corporations and clarified the distinction between public and private corporations in the landmark case Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 518, 4 L.Ed. 629 (1819).

Nonprofit Corporations Corporations that are formed without a profit-making purpose are called nonprofit or not-for-profit corporations. Private hospitals, educational institutions, charities, and religious organizations, for instance, are frequently organized as nonprofit corporations. The nonprofit corporation is a convenient form of organization that allows various groups to own property and to form contracts without exposing the individual members to personal liability.

Close Corporation A corporation whose shareholders are limited to a small group of persons, often family members.

Close Corporations Most corporate enterprises in the United States fall into the category of close corporations. A close corporation is one whose shares are held by relatively few persons, often members of a family. Close corporations are also referred to as closely held, family, or privately held corporations.

Focus Question 1
What is a close corporation?

Usually, the members of the small group constituting a close corporation are personally known to one another. Because the number of shareholders is so small, there is no trading market for the shares. In practice, close corporations often operate somewhat like partnerships. The statutes in many states allow them to depart significantly from certain formalities required by traditional corporation law.[3]

Under the RMBCA, close corporations have considerable flexibility in determining their operating rules [RMBCA 7.32]. If all of a corporation's shareholders agree in writing, the corporation can operate without directors and bylaws. In addition, a close corporation need not hold annual or special shareholders' or directors' meetings, issue stock certificates, or keep formal records of shareholders' and directors' decisions.[4]

Management of Close Corporations. Management of a close corporation resembles that of a sole proprietorship or a partnership in that a single shareholder or a tightly knit group of shareholders usually hold the positions of directors and officers. As a corporation, however, the firm must meet all specific legal requirements set forth in state statutes.

How is a close corporation usually managed?

To prevent a majority shareholder from dominating a close corporation, a close corporation may require that more than a simple majority of the directors approve any action taken by the board. In a larger corporation, such a requirement would typically apply only to extraordinary actions (such as selling all the corporate assets) and not to ordinary business decisions.

Transfer of Shares in Close Corporations. By definition, a close corporation has a small number of shareholders. Thus, the transfer of one shareholder's shares to someone else can cause serious management problems. The other shareholders may find themselves required to share control with someone they do not know or like.

To avoid this situation, the corporation could restrict the transferability of shares to outside persons. Shareholders could be required to offer their shares to the corporation or the other shareholders before selling them to an outside purchaser. In fact, a few states have statutes that prohibit the transfer of close corporation shares unless certain persons—including shareholders, family members, and the corporation—are first given the opportunity to purchase the shares for the same price.

Misappropriation of Close Corporation Funds. Sometimes, a majority shareholder in a close corporation takes advantage of the position by misappropriating company funds. In such situations, the normal remedy for the injured minority shareholders is to have their shares appraised and to be paid the fair market value for them.

3. For example, in some states (such as Maryland), a close corporation need not have a board of directors.
4. Shareholders cannot agree, however, to eliminate certain rights of shareholders, such as the right to inspect corporate books and records and the right to bring lawsuits on behalf of the corporation.

S Corporations A close corporation that meets the qualifying requirements specified in Subchapter S of the Internal Revenue Code can operate as an S corporation. (A corporation will automatically be taxed under Subchapter C unless it elects S corporation status.) If a corporation has S corporation status, it can avoid the imposition of income taxes at the corporate level while retaining many of the advantages of a corporation, particularly limited liability. Among the numerous requirements for S corporation status, the following are the most important:

S Corporation A close business corporation that has most corporate attributes, including limited liability, but qualifies under the Internal Revenue Code to be taxed as a partnership.

1. The corporation must be a domestic corporation.
2. The corporation must not be a member of an affiliated group of corporations.
3. The shareholders must be individuals, estates, or certain trusts. Partnerships and nonqualifying trusts cannot be shareholders. Corporations can be shareholders under certain circumstances.
4. The corporation must have no more than one hundred shareholders.
5. The corporation must have only one class of stock, although all shareholders do not have to have the same voting rights.
6. No shareholder of the corporation may be a nonresident alien.

An S corporation is treated differently from a regular corporation for tax purposes. It is taxed like a partnership, so the corporate income passes through to the shareholders, who pay personal income tax on it. This treatment enables the S corporation to avoid the double taxation that is imposed on regular corporations. In addition, the shareholders' tax brackets may be lower than the tax bracket that the corporation would have been in if the tax had been imposed at the corporate level.

In spite of these benefits, the S corporation has lost much of its appeal. The newer limited liability business forms (such as LLCs, LPs, and LLPs) offer similar tax advantages and greater flexibility.

The shareholders of professional corporations generally must be licensed professionals.

Professional Corporations Professionals such as physicians, lawyers, dentists, and accountants can incorporate. Professional corporations typically are identified by the letters S.C. (service corporation), P.C. (professional corporation), or P.A. (professional association). In general, the laws governing the formation and operation of professional corporations are similar to those governing ordinary business corporations. There are some differences in terms of liability, however.

Benefit Corporation A for-profit corporation that seeks to have a material positive impact on society and the environment. It is available by statute in a number of states.

For liability purposes, some courts treat a professional corporation somewhat like a partnership and hold each professional liable for any malpractice committed by others in the firm within the scope of the firm's business. With the exception of malpractice or a breach of duty to clients or patients, a shareholder in a professional corporation generally cannot be held liable for torts committed by other professionals at the firm.

Benefit Corporations A growing number of states have enacted legislation that creates a new corporate form called a benefit corporation. A benefit corporation is a for-profit corporation that seeks to have a material positive impact on society and the environment. Benefit corporations differ from traditional corporations in the following ways:

1. Purpose. Although the corporation is designed to make a profit, its purpose is to benefit the public as a whole (rather than just to provide long-term shareholder value, as in ordinary corporations). The directors of a benefit corporation must, during the decision-making process, consider the impact of their decisions on society and the environment.

2. Accountability. Shareholders of a benefit corporation determine whether the company has achieved a material positive impact. Shareholders also have a right of private action, called a benefit enforcement proceeding, enabling them to sue the corporation if it fails to pursue or create public benefit.
3. Transparency. A benefit corporation must issue an annual benefit report on its overall social and environmental performance that uses a recognized third-party standard to assess its performance. The report must be delivered to the shareholders and posted on a public website.

In the following case, a benefit corporation took an action that it believed would have a positive impact on those it was established to serve. Two of those affected by the action disagreed and filed a suit to challenge the action.

Case 29.2

Greenfield v. Mandalay Shores Community Association

California Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 6, 21 Cal.App.5th 896, 230 Cal.Rptr.3d 827 (2018).

Facts Mandalay Shores is a beach community in California's Oxnard Coastal Zone, where nonresidents have vacationed for decades, renting homes on a short-term basis. Robert and Demetra Greenfield owned a single-family residence at Mandalay Shores that they rented to families for periods of less than thirty days. Mandalay Shores Community Association is a mutual benefit corporation established for the development of the community. The association adopted a resolution banning short-term rentals (STRs), claiming that it was necessary to reduce parking, noise, and trash problems. Homeowners who rented their homes "for less than 30 consecutive days" were subjected to fines of up to $5,000 per offense.

The Greenfields filed a suit in a California state court against the association, contending that the STR ban violated the California Coastal Act. The court denied the plaintiffs' request for a preliminary injunction to stay the enforcement of the association's resolution. The Greenfields appealed.

Issue Did the association violate California state law when it adopted the STR ban?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's denial of the Greenfields' motion and ordered the issuance of a preliminary injunction.

Reason The California Coastal Act is meant to "maximize public access to and along the coast and maximize public recreational opportunities to the coastal zone consistent with sound resources conservation principles and constitutionally protected right of private property owners." A coastal development permit is required to undertake a "development" in the coastal zone. A development includes any "change in the density or intensity of use of land."

The STR ban affects 1,400 housing units on beach properties that have long been used as STRs. It changes the intensity of use and access to single-family residences in the Oxnard Coastal Zone. Thus, its imposition is subject to a decision by the city and the Coastal Commission, not by a homeowners' association. In effect, the court ruled that the association had "erected a monetary barrier to the beach," and it had "no right to do so."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Did the STR ban adopted by the association comport with or contravene its status as a benefit corporation? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that instead of adopting an STR ban on its own, the association had petitioned the city and the Coastal Commission to impose one. Would the result have been different? Explain.

29–2 Formation and Powers

Incorporating a business is much simpler today than it was at one time. Many states allow businesses to incorporate via the Internet.

29–2a Promotional Activities

In the past, preliminary steps were taken to organize and promote a business prior to incorporating. Contracts were made with investors and others on behalf of the future corporation. Today, due to the relative ease of forming a corporation in most states, persons incorporating a business rarely, if ever, engage in preliminary promotional activities.

Nevertheless, businesspersons need to understand that they are personally liable for any preincorporation contracts made with investors, accountants, or others on behalf of the future corporation. Liability continues until the corporation is formed and explicitly assumes the contract by novation.

29–2b Incorporation Procedures

Each state has its own set of incorporation procedures, which most often are listed on the secretary of state's website. Generally, however, all incorporators follow four basic steps, discussed next.

Focus Question 2

What four steps are involved in bringing a corporation into existence?

Select the State of Incorporation Because state corporate laws differ, individuals may look for the states that offer the most advantageous tax or other provisions. Many corporations, for instance, have chosen to incorporate in Delaware because it has historically had the least restrictive laws, along with provisions that favor corporate management. For reasons of convenience and cost, though, businesses often choose to incorporate in the state in which the corporation's business will primarily be conducted.

Secure an Appropriate Corporate Name The choice of a corporate name is subject to state approval to ensure against duplication or deception. In today's online world, what matters most is to secure a corporate name that can be used as a domain name. A new corporation's name cannot be the same as (or deceptively similar to) the name of an existing corporation. Therefore, the incorporators usually must perform a search to confirm that the corporate name they choose is available as a domain name. State approval of the name may also be required. In addition, all states require the corporation name to include the word Corporation, Incorporated, Company, or Limited, or an abbreviation of one of these terms.

Prepare the Articles of Incorporation The primary document needed to incorporate a business is the articles of incorporation. The articles include basic information about the corporation and serve as a primary source of authority for its future organization and business functions. The person or persons who execute (sign) the articles are the incorporators. Articles of incorporation vary widely depending on the jurisdiction and the size and type of the corporation. Generally, though, the articles must include the following information [RMBCA 2.02]:

Articles of Incorporation The document that is filed with the appropriate state official, usually the secretary of state, when a business is incorporated and that contains basic information about the corporation.

1. The name of the corporation.
2. The number of shares of stock the corporation is authorized to issue [RMBCA 2.02(a)]. (Large corporations often also state a par value for each share, such as $0.20 per share, and specify the various types or classes of stock authorized for issuance.)
3. The name and street address of the corporation's initial registered agent and registered office. The registered agent is the person who can receive legal documents (such as orders to appear in court) on behalf of the corporation. The registered office is usually the main corporate office.
4. The name and address of each incorporator.

Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

In addition, the articles may set forth other information, such as the names and addresses of the initial members of the board of directors and the duration and purpose of the corporation. A corporation has perpetual existence unless the articles state otherwise.

As to the corporation's purpose, a corporation can be formed for any lawful purpose, and the RMBCA does not require the articles to include a specific statement of purpose. Consequently, the articles often include only a general statement of purpose. By not mentioning specifics, the corporation avoids the need for future amendments to the corporate articles [RMBCA 2.02(b)(2)(i), 3.01]. Similarly, the articles do not provide much detail about the firm's operations, which are spelled out in the company's bylaws (discussed shortly).

File the Articles of Incorporation Once the articles of incorporation have been prepared and signed by the incorporators, they are sent to the appropriate state official. They are most often filed with the secretary of state's office, along with the required filing fee. In most states, the secretary of state then stamps the articles as "Filed" and returns a copy of the articles to the incorporators. Once this occurs, the corporation officially exists.

Bylaws The internal rules of management adopted by a corporation at its first organizational meeting.

29–2c First Organizational Meeting to Adopt Bylaws

After incorporation, the first organizational meeting must be held. If the articles of incorporation named the initial board of directors (as is typical), then the directors, by majority vote, call the meeting. If the articles did not name the directors, then the incorporators hold the meeting to elect the directors and conduct any other necessary business.

oneinchpunch/Shutterstock.com

What are some of the important functions of a corporation's first organizational meeting?

Usually, the most important function of the first organizational meeting is the adoption of the bylaws, which are the corporation's internal rules of management. The bylaws cannot conflict with the state corporate statute or the articles of incorporation [RMBCA 2.06].

Under the RMBCA, the shareholders may amend or repeal the bylaws. The board of directors may also amend or repeal the bylaws, unless the articles of incorporation or provisions of the state corporate statute reserve this power to the shareholders exclusively [RMBCA 10.20]. The bylaws typically describe such matters as voting requirements for shareholders, the election and replacement of the board of directors, and the manner and time of holding shareholders' and board meetings.

Know This

Unlike the articles of incorporation, bylaws do not need to be filed with a state official.

29–2d Improper Incorporation

The procedures for incorporation are very specific. If they are not followed precisely, others may be able to challenge the existence of the corporation. Errors in the incorporation procedures can become important when, for instance, a third party who is attempting to enforce a contract or bring a suit for a tort injury learns of them.

De Jure* Corporations If a corporation has substantially complied with all conditions precedent to incorporation, the corporation is said to have de jure (rightful and lawful) existence. In most states and under the RMBCA 2.03(b), the secretary of state's filing of the articles of incorporation is conclusive proof that all mandatory statutory provisions have been met.

Sometimes, the incorporators fail to comply with all statutory mandates. If the defect is minor, such as an incorrect address listed on the articles of incorporation, most courts will overlook the defect and find that a de jure corporation exists.

De Facto* Corporations If a defect in formation is substantial, such as a corporation's failure to hold an organizational meeting to adopt bylaws, the outcome will vary depending on the court. Some states, including Mississippi, New York, Ohio, and Oklahoma, recognize the common law doctrine of de facto corporation. In those states, the courts will treat a corporation as a legal corporation despite the defect in its formation if all three of the following requirements are met:

1. A state statute exists under which the corporation can be validly incorporated.
2. The parties have made a good faith attempt to comply with the statute.
3. The parties have already undertaken to do business as a corporation.

Many states' courts, however, have interpreted their states versions of the RMBCA as abolishing the common law doctrine of de facto corporation. These states include Alaska, Arizona, Minnesota, New Mexico, Oregon, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, and Washington, as well as the District of Columbia. In those states, if there is a substantial defect in complying with the statutory mandates, the corporation does not legally exist, and the incorporators are personally liable.

Corporation by Estoppel Sometimes, a business association holds itself out to others as being a corporation when it has made no attempt to incorporate. In those situations, the firm normally will be estopped (prevented) from denying corporate status in a lawsuit by a third party. The estoppel doctrine most commonly applies when a third party contracts with an entity that claims to be a corporation but has not filed articles of incorporation. It may also be applied when a third party contracts with a person claiming to be an agent of a corporation that does not, in fact, exist.

When justice requires, the courts treat an alleged corporation as if it were an actual corporation for the purpose of determining the rights and liabilities in a particular circumstance. Recognition of corporate status does not extend beyond the resolution of the problem at hand.

Case Example 29.2 55 Day Spa, Inc., signed a three-year lease to rent premises owned by Ilan Weiss, who represented himself as a managing member of TY Builders II, LLC. Three months later, 55 Day Spa informed Weiss that it would be vacating the premises. Weiss, who had since incorporated and operated as TY Builders II, Inc., filed an action to recover damages for breach of contract. 55 Day Spa moved for the lawsuit to be dismissed, arguing that because TY Builders II, Inc., did not exist when the lease was signed, the corporation could not enforce the terms of the lease.

A New York trial court found that 55 Day Spa had recognized TY Builders as a valid business operation when it agreed to lease the property and when it took possession of the property. Therefore, it should not be allowed to use Weiss's lack of proper incorporation as an excuse to break the contract. A state appellate court agreed, holding that, pursuant to the doctrine of corporation by estoppel, TY Builders II, Inc., should be "deemed to exist" for the purpose of Weiss's contract with 55 Day Spa.[5]

Why would a court estop (prevent) a day spa owner from breaking a lease with a corporation that did not legally exist when the two parties signed the contract?

29–2e Corporate Financing

Part of the process of corporate formation involves financing. Corporations normally are financed by the issuance and sale of corporate securities. Securities—stocks and bonds—evidence the right to participate in earnings and the distribution of corporate property or the obligation to pay funds.

Securities Generally, stocks, bonds, or other items that represent an ownership interest in a corporation or a promise of repayment of debt by a corporation.

Bond Securities that evidence a corporate (or government) debt.

Bonds A bond (a debenture or debt security) represents the borrowing of funds. Bonds are issued by business firms and by governments at all levels as evidence of the funds they are borrowing from investors.

Bonds normally have a designated maturity date—the date when the principal, or face, amount of the bond is returned to the bondholder. Bondholders also receive fixed-dollar interest payments, usually semiannually, during the period of time before maturity. For that reason, bonds are sometimes referred to as fixed-income securities. Because debt financing represents a legal obligation on the part of the corporation, various features and terms of a particular bond issue are specified in a lending agreement.

Of course, not all debt is in the form of debt securities. For instance, some debt is in the form of accounts payable and notes payable, which typically are short-term debts. Bonds are simply a way for the corporation to split up its long-term debt so that it can be more easily marketed.

Stocks Securities that evidence an ownership (equity) interest in a corporation, measured in units of shares.

Common Stock Shares of ownership in a corporation that give the owner a proportionate interest in the corporation with regard to control, earnings, and net assets. Common stock is lowest in priority with respect to payment of dividends and distribution of the corporation's assets on dissolution.

Preferred Stock Stock that has priority over common stock as to payment of dividends and distribution of assets on the corporation's dissolution.

Stocks Issuing stock is another way that corporations can obtain financing. Stocks, or equity securities, represent the purchase of ownership in the business firm. The true ownership of a corporation is represented by common stock. Common stock provides a proportionate interest in the corporation with regard to (1) control (voting rights), (2) earnings, and (3) net assets. A shareholder's interest is generally proportionate to the number of shares the shareholder owns out of the total number of shares issued.

An issuing firm is not obligated to return a principal amount per share to each holder of its common stock, nor does the firm have to guarantee a dividend. Indeed, some corporations never pay dividends. Holders of common stock are investors who assume a residual position in the overall financial structure of a business. They benefit when the market price of the stock increases. In terms of receiving payment for their investments, they are last in line.

Preferred stock is stock with preferences. Holders of preferred stock usually have priority over holders of common stock as to dividends and payment on dissolution of the corporation, but may not have the right to vote. Although holders of preferred stock have a stronger position than common shareholders with respect to dividends and claims on assets, they will not share in the full prosperity of the firm if it grows successfully over time. Preferred stockholders do receive fixed dividends periodically, however, and they may benefit to some extent from changes in the market price of the shares.

Venture Capital Financing provided by professional, outside investors (venture capitalists) to new business ventures.

Venture Capital Start-up businesses and high-risk enterprises often obtain venture capital financing. Venture capital is capital provided to new business ventures by professional, outside investors (venture capitalists, usually groups of wealthy investors and securities firms). Venture capital investments are high risk—the investors must be willing to lose their invested funds—but offer the potential for well-above-average returns at some point in the future.

To obtain venture capital financing, the start-up business typically gives up a share of its ownership to the venture capitalists. In addition to funding, venture capitalists may provide managerial and technical expertise, and they nearly always are given some control over the new company's decisions. Many Internet-based companies, such as Amazon and Google, were initially financed by venture capital.

Private Equity Capital Funds invested in an existing corporation by a private equity firm, usually to purchase and reorganize it.

Private Equity Capital Private equity firms pool funds from wealthy investors and use this private equity capital to invest in existing corporations. Usually, a private equity firm buys an entire corporation and then reorganizes it. Sometimes, divisions of the purchased company are sold off to pay down debt. Ultimately, the private equity firm may sell shares in the reorganized (and perhaps more profitable) company to the public in an initial public offering (IPO). In this way, the private equity firm can make profits by selling its ownership rights in the company to the public.

Crowdfunding Crowdfunding is a cooperative activity in which people network and pool funds and other resources via the Internet to assist a cause or invest in a venture. Sometimes, crowdfunding is used to raise funds for charitable purposes, such as disaster relief, but increasingly it is being used to finance budding entrepreneurs. Basic crowdfunding websites include NextSeed and StartEngine.

Crowdfunding A cooperative activity in which people network and pool funds and other resources via the Internet to assist a cause (such as disaster relief) or invest in a venture (business).

Current Securities and Exchange Commission rules allow companies to offer and sell securities through crowdfunding. The rules, which took effect relatively recently, removed a decades-old ban on public solicitation for private investments. In essence, this means that companies can advertise investment opportunities to the public, which will encourage more crowdfunding in the future. The new rules are intended to help smaller companies raise capital while providing investors with additional protections.

29–2f Corporate Powers

When a corporation is created, the express and implied powers necessary to achieve its purpose also come into existence. Corporations cannot engage in acts that are beyond their powers, nor can a corporation's owners (shareholders) avoid liability if they misuse the corporate entity for their own personal benefit.

Express Powers The express powers of a corporation are found in its articles of incorporation, in the law of the state of incorporation, and in the state and federal constitutions. Corporate bylaws also establish express powers of the corporation. Because state corporation statutes frequently provide default rules that apply if the company's bylaws are silent on an issue, it is important that the bylaws set forth the specific operating rules of the corporation. In addition, after the bylaws are adopted, the corporation's board of directors will pass resolutions that grant or restrict corporate powers.

On occasion, the U.S. government steps in to challenge what a corporation may consider one of its express powers. This chapter's Cybersecurity and the Law feature discusses steps taken by the U.S. government that threaten the ability of corporations to protect cloud-based data.

Implied Powers When a corporation is created, it acquires certain implied powers. Barring express constitutional, statutory, or other prohibitions, the corporation has the implied power to perform all acts reasonably appropriate and necessary to accomplish its corporate purposes. For this reason, a corporation has the implied power to borrow funds within certain limits, to lend funds, and to extend credit to those with whom it has a legal or contractual relationship.

Most often, the president or chief executive officer of the corporation will execute the necessary papers on behalf of the corporation. In so doing, a corporate officer has the implied power to bind the corporation in matters directly connected with the ordinary business affairs of the enterprise. There is a limit to what a corporate officer can do, though. A corporate officer does not have the authority to bind the corporation to an action that will greatly affect the corporate purpose or undertaking, such as the sale of substantial corporate assets.

Ultra Vires* Doctrine The term ultra vires means "beyond the powers." In corporate law, acts of a corporation that are beyond its express and implied powers are ultra vires* acts.

Ultra Vires* Acts Acts of a corporation that are beyond its express and implied powers to undertake (the Latin phrase means "beyond the powers").

In the past, most cases dealing with ultra vires acts involved contracts made for unauthorized purposes. Now, however, most private corporations are organized for "any legal business" and not for a specific purpose, so the ultra vires doctrine has declined in importance. Today, cases that allege ultra vires acts usually involve nonprofit corporations or municipal (public) corporations.[6]

The CLOUD Act

The case pending before the United States Supreme Court involved a battle of wills between the U.S. government and Microsoft Corporation in its role as a cloud service provider (CSP). The federal government had issued a warrant requiring Microsoft to produce e-mails related to a criminal narcotics investigation. The e-mails were stored in a Microsoft cloud storage location in Ireland. Microsoft refused to comply with the warrant, arguing that the reach of the U.S. government stopped at the U.S. border, and sought to have the warrant invalidated.

Microsoft initially lost its case in a New York district court but won on appeal in the U.S. Appeals Court for the Second Circuit. The U.S. Justice Department then filed an appeal with the Supreme Court, which agreed to hear the case.[a]

Before the case could come to trial, however, Congress resolved the issue by enacting the Clarifying Lawful Overseas Use of Data (CLOUD) Act.[b] This legislation provides the U.S. government with access to cloud-based data held by U.S. CSPs regardless of where in the world the data are physically stored. For purposes of the law, cloud-based data includes e-mails, texts, instant messages, remote or backup data storage, wireless calls, and other forms of business information.

The U.S. Department of Justice heralded passage of the CLOUD Act as critical to global investigations of terrorism, cybercrime, and the sexual exploitation of children.

Qualified Foreign Governments

The CLOUD Act also creates a framework for the United State to enter into treaties that would give qualified foreign governments (QFGs) access to cloud data stored by the "Big Five" American CSPs—Amazon, Apple, Facebook, Google, and Microsoft. For U.S. businesses, the potential consequences of this provision are significant.

Suppose that a U.S. company called Ramway, Inc., uses Google to store its digital data in the cloud. A QFG suspects that Ramway is involved in criminal activity. Without involving U.S. courts, Google can give the QFG access to Ramway's digital data as part of that government's criminal investigation. Ramway may never even be aware of the QFG's request, or of Google's compliance with it. The CLOUD Act does not require the CSP or foreign government to disclose data requests to the targeted CSP customer.

Domestically, the Big Five CSPs receive more than 175,000 requests for information linked to criminal investigations from U.S. law enforcement agencies each year.

Critical Thinking

What type of American businesses are impacted by the CLOUD Act? What steps should these businesses take in response to the CLOUD Act?

b. 18 U.S.C. Section 2703.

Under Section 3.04 of the RMBCA, shareholders can seek an injunction from a court to prevent (or stop) the corporation from engaging in ultra vires acts. The attorney general in the state of incorporation can also bring an action to obtain an injunction against the ultra vires transactions or seek dissolution of the corporation.

29–2g Piercing the Corporate Veil

Piercing the Corporate Veil The action of a court to disregard the corporate entity and hold the shareholders personally liable for corporate debts and obligations.

Occasionally, the owners use a corporate entity to perpetrate a fraud, circumvent the law, or in some other way accomplish an illegitimate objective. In these situations, the court will ignore the corporate structure by piercing the corporate veil and exposing the shareholders to personal liability [RMBCA 2.04].

Generally, courts pierce the veil when corporate privilege is abused for personal benefit or when the corporate business is treated so carelessly that it is indistinguishable from that of a controlling shareholder. In short, when the facts show that great injustice would result from a shareholder's use of a corporation to avoid individual responsibility, a court will look behind the corporate structure to the individual shareholder. The shareholder/owner is then required to assume personal liability to creditors for the corporation's debts.

Factors That Lead Courts to Pierce the Corporate Veil The following are some of the factors that frequently cause the courts to pierce the corporate veil:

1. A party is tricked or misled into dealing with the corporation rather than the individual.
2. The corporation is set up to never make a profit or always be insolvent, or it is too thinly capitalized—that is, it has insufficient capital at the time of formation to meet its prospective debts or other potential liabilities.
3. Statutory corporate formalities, such as holding required corporation meetings, are not followed.
4. Personal and corporate interests are commingled to such an extent that the corporation has no separate identity.

Focus Question 3

In what circumstances might a court disregard the corporate entity ("pierce the corporate veil") and hold the shareholders personally liable?

Commingled Mixed to such a degree that the individual parts (such as funds or goods) no longer have separate identities.

The courts may use the same criteria in deciding whether to pierce the veil of an LLC. Case Example 29.3 Timothy Hunsaker was the sole member of Breawick, LLC, a construction company in Ohio. Cheryl Denny hired Breawick to build a house. During the course of construction, many disagreements arose, and Hunsaker eventually quit working before the house was finished. Denny had to hire another company to repair Hunsaker's flaws and finish the house. Denny then filed a claim against Breawick and Hunsaker for breach of contract and other offenses. She claimed, among other things, that Hunsaker had altered the building plans without her consent and demanded payments beyond those specified in the contract.

The trial court found that Breawick had breached its contract with Denny by charging excessive amounts without her approval and failing to perform in a "workmanlike" manner. His acts were so egregious under Ohio law that the court was willing to "pierce the corporate veil" and hold Hunsaker personally liable for the amount Denny spent to finish the house after he quit. An appellate court affirmed. Hunsaker had drawn funds from Breawick's bank account to pay for personal expenses and had taken no steps to distinguish himself from the business entity. The appeals court concluded that Breawick was Hunsaker's "alter ego" and had no separate existence of its own. "A member of a limited liability company may be held personally liable" if it is shown that the member's behavior merits disregarding, or piercing, the company's limited liability structure.[7] (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature, which illustrates a situation in which a court may decide not to pierce the corporate veil.)

A Potential Problem for Close Corporations The potential for corporate assets to be used for personal benefit is especially great in a close corporation. In such a corporation, the separate status of the corporate entity and the shareholders must be carefully preserved. Certain practices invite trouble for a close corporation, such as the commingling of corporate and personal funds or the shareholders' continuous personal use of corporate property (for instance, vehicles).

Typically, courts are reluctant to hold shareholders in close corporations personally liable unless there is some evidence of fraud or wrongdoing. Spotlight Case Example 29.4 Pip, Jimmy, and Theodore

Piercing the Corporate Veil

Business Law Analysis

Country Contractors, Inc., contracted to provide excavation services for Westside Storage of Indianapolis, Inc., but did not complete the job and later filed for bankruptcy. Stephen Songer and Jahn Songer were Country's sole shareholders. The Songers had not misused the corporate form to engage in fraud. The firm had not been undercapitalized, personal and corporate funds had not been commingled, and Country had kept accounting records and minutes of its annual board meetings. Are the Songers personally liable for Country's failure to complete its contract?

Analysis:

A hallmark of the corporate form of business organization is that shareholders are not personally liable for the debts of the corporation. If the corporation fails, the shareholders can lose their investments, but that is generally the limit of their liability. A court may pierce the corporate veil to hold the shareholders personally liable in certain instances of fraud, undercapitalization, or failure to observe corporate formalities. But these situations are exceptions.

Result and Reasoning: The Songers are not personally liable for Country's failure to complete its contract with Westside Storage. They had not misused the corporate form to engage in misconduct, the firm had not been undercapitalized, and personal and corporate funds had not been commingled. In addition, Country had kept accounting records and minutes of its annual board meetings, thus observing the formalities required by law. These circumstances fall under none of the exceptions to the limit on shareholders' liability for corporate obligations. Thus, as shareholders, the Songers are not personally liable for the failure of their company to complete its job.

Brennan are brothers and shareholders of Brennan's, Inc., which owns and operates New Orleans's famous Brennan's Restaurant. As a close corporation, Brennan's, Inc., did not hold formal corporate meetings with agendas and minutes, but it did maintain corporate books, hold corporate bank accounts, and file corporate tax returns.

The Brennan brothers retained attorney Edward Colbert to represent them in a family matter, and the attorney's bills were sent to the restaurant and paid from the corporate account. Later, when Brennan's, Inc., sued Colbert for malpractice, Colbert argued that the court should pierce the corporate veil because the Brennan brothers did not observe corporate formalities. The court refused to do so, however, because there was no evidence of fraud or other wrongdoing by the Brennan brothers. There is no requirement for small, close corporations to operate with the formality usually expected of larger corporations.[8]

29–3 Directors and Officers

Corporate directors and officers play different roles in the corporation. It is important to understand the rights, duties, and liabilities of directors and officers.

29–3a Directors

The board of directors is the ultimate authority in every corporation. Directors have responsibility for all policymaking decisions necessary to the management of corporate affairs. The board selects and removes the corporate officers, determines the capital structure of the corporation, and declares dividends.

Directors are sometimes inappropriately characterized as agents because they act on behalf of the corporation. No individual director, however, can act as an agent to bind the corporation. As a group, directors collectively control the corporation in a way that no agent is able to control a principal.

Few qualifications are legally required for directors. Only a handful of states impose minimum age and residency requirements. A director may be a shareholder, but this is not necessary (unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws require it).

Election of Directors Subject to statutory limitations, the number of directors is set forth in the corporation's articles or bylaws. Historically, the minimum number of directors has been three, but today many states permit fewer. Normally, the incorporators appoint the first board of directors at the time the corporation is created. The initial board serves until the first annual shareholders' meeting. Subsequent directors are elected by a majority vote of the shareholders.

Directors usually serve for a term of one year—from annual meeting to annual meeting. Most state statutes permit longer and staggered terms. A common practice is to elect one-third of the board members each year for a three-year term. In this way, there is greater management continuity.

A director can be removed for cause—that is, for failing to perform a required duty—either as specified in the articles or bylaws or by shareholder action. When a vacancy occurs or a new position is created through amendment of the articles or bylaws, how the vacancy is filled depends on state law or the provisions of the bylaws. Usually, either the shareholders or the board itself can fill the vacant position by an election. The board cannot attempt to manipulate the election in order to reduce the shareholders' influence, however. If it does, the shareholders can challenge the election in court.

Know This
The articles of incorporation may provide that a director can be removed only for cause.

Compensation of Directors In the past, corporate directors rarely were compensated. Today, they are often paid at least nominal sums and may receive more substantial compensation in large corporations because of the time, the work, the effort, and especially the risk involved. Most states permit the corporate articles or bylaws to authorize compensation for directors. In fact, the RMBCA states that unless the articles or bylaws provide otherwise, the board of directors itself may set directors' compensation [RMBCA 8.11].

In many corporations, directors are also chief corporate officers (president or chief executive officer, for instance) and receive compensation in their managerial positions. A director who is also an officer of the corporation is referred to as an inside director, whereas a director who does not hold a management position is an outside director. Typically, a corporation's board of directors includes both inside and outside directors.

Inside Director A person on the board of directors who is also an officer of the corporation.

Outside Director A person on the board of directors who does not hold a management position in the corporation.

Board of Directors' Meetings The board of directors conducts business by holding formal meetings with recorded minutes. The dates of regular meetings are usually established in the articles or bylaws or by board resolution, and ordinarily no further notice is required. Special meetings can be called as well, with notice sent to all directors. Today, most states allow directors to participate in board meetings from remote locations via telephone, Web conferencing, Zoom, or Skype, provided that all the directors can simultaneously hear each other during the meeting [RMBCA 8.20].

Normally, a majority of the board of directors constitutes a quorum [RMBCA 8.24]. (A quorum is the minimum number of members of a body of officials or other group that must be present in order for business to be validly transacted.) Some state statutes, including those of Delaware and New York, specifically allow corporations to set a quorum at less than a majority but not less than one-third of the directors.

Quorum The number of members of a decision-making body that must be present before business may be transacted.

Once a quorum is present, the directors transact business and vote on issues affecting the corporation. Each director present at the meeting has one vote.[9] Ordinary matters generally require a simple majority vote, but certain extraordinary issues may require a greater-than-majority vote.

What are the two committees most commonly formed by a large corporation's board of directors?

Committees of the Board of Directors When a board of directors has a large number of members and must deal with myriad complex business issues, meetings can become unwieldy. Therefore, the boards of large publicly held corporations typically create committees of directors and delegate certain tasks to these committees. Committees focus on individual subjects and increase the efficiency of the board.

Two of the most common types of committees are the executive committee and the audit committee. An executive committee handles interim management decisions between board meetings. It is limited to making decisions about ordinary business matters and does not have the power to declare dividends, amend the bylaws, or authorize the issuance of stock. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act requires all publicly held corporations to have an audit committee. The audit committee is responsible for the selection, compensation, and oversight of the independent public accountants that audit the firm's financial records.

Rights of Directors A corporate director must have certain rights to function properly in that position and make informed policy decisions for the company.

1. Right to participation. Directors are entitled to participate in all board of directors' meetings and to be notified of these meetings. Because the dates of regular board meetings are usually specified in the bylaws, no notice of these meetings is required. If special meetings are called, however, notice is required unless waived by the director.
2. Right of inspection. Each director can access the corporation's books and records, facilities, and premises. Inspection rights are essential for directors to make informed decisions and to exercise the necessary supervision over corporate officers and employees. This right of inspection is almost absolute and cannot be restricted (by the articles, bylaws, or any act of the board).
3. Right to indemnification. When directors become involved in litigation by virtue of their positions or actions, they may have a right to be indemnified (reimbursed) for legal costs, fees, and damages incurred. Most states allow corporations to indemnify and purchase liability insurance for corporate directors [RMBCA 8.51].

Case Example 29.5 NavLink, Inc., a Delaware corporation, provides high-end data management for customers and governments in Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Lebanon, and the United Arab Emirates. NavLink's co-founders, George Chammas and Laurent Delifer, serve on its board of directors. Chammas and Delifer were concerned about the company's 2015 annual budget and three-year operating plan. Despite repeated requests, Chammas was never given the minutes from several board meetings in 2015. Chammas and Delifer believed that the other directors were withholding information and holding secret "pre-board meetings" at which plans and decisions were being made without them. They filed a lawsuit in a Delaware state court seeking inspection rights.

The court ordered NavLink to provide the plaintiffs with board meeting minutes and with communications from NavLink's secretary regarding the minutes. The plaintiffs were also entitled to inspect corporate documents and communications concerning NavLink's 2015 budget and three-year plan.[10]

29–3b Corporate Officers and Executives

Know This
Shareholders own the corporation, and directors make policy decisions, but the officers who run the corporation's daily business often have significant decision-making power.

Corporate officers and other executive employees are hired by the board of directors. At a minimum, most corporations have a president, one or more vice presidents, a secretary, and a treasurer. In most states, an individual can hold more than one office, such as president and secretary, and can be both an officer and a director of the corporation. In addition to carrying out the duties articulated in the bylaws, corporate and managerial officers act as agents of the corporation, and the ordinary rules of agency normally apply to their employment.

Corporate officers and other high-level managers are employees of the company, so their rights are defined by employment contracts. The board of directors, though, normally can remove corporate officers at any time with or without cause. If the directors remove an officer in violation of an employment contract, however, the corporation may be liable for breach of contract.

29–3c Duties and Liabilities of Directors and Officers

Focus Question 4
What are the duties of corporate directors and officers?

Directors and officers are considered fiduciaries of the corporation because their relationship with the corporation and its shareholders is one of trust and confidence. As fiduciaries, directors and officers owe ethical—and legal—duties to the corporation and to the shareholders as a whole. These fiduciary duties include the duty of care and the duty of loyalty.

Duty of Care Directors and officers must exercise due care in performing their duties. The standard of due care generally requires a director or officer to act in good faith (honestly) and to exercise the care that an ordinarily prudent person would exercise in similar circumstances. In addition, directors and officers are expected to act in what they consider to be the best interests of the corporation [RMBCA 8.30]. Directors and officers whose failure to exercise due care results in harm to the corporation or its shareholders can be held liable for negligence (unless the business judgment rule applies, as discussed shortly).

Duty to Make Informed and Reasonable Decisions. Directors and officers are expected to be informed on corporate matters and to conduct a reasonable investigation of the relevant situation before making a decision. They must do what is necessary to keep adequately informed: attend meetings and presentations, ask for information from those who have it, read reports, and review other written materials. They cannot make decisions on the spur of the moment without adequate research.

Although directors and officers are expected to act in accordance with their own knowledge and training, they are also normally entitled to rely on information given to them by certain other persons. Most states and Section 8.30(b) of the RMBCA allow a director to make decisions in reliance on information furnished by competent officers and employees. The director may also rely on information provided by professionals (such as attorneys and accountants) and by committees of the board of directors on which the director does not serve.

Duty to Exercise Reasonable Supervision. Directors are also expected to exercise a reasonable amount of supervision when they delegate work to corporate officers and employees. Example 29.6 Dale, a corporate bank director, has not attended a board of directors' meeting for five years. In addition, Dale never inspects any of the corporate books or records and generally fails to supervise the efforts of the bank president and the loan committee. Meanwhile,

Brennan, the bank president, makes various improper loans and permits large overdrafts. In this situation, Dale can be held liable to the corporation for losses resulting from the unsupervised actions of the bank president and the loan committee.

Business Judgment Rule A rule under which courts will not hold corporate officers and directors liable for honest mistakes of judgment and bad business decisions that were made in good faith.

The Business Judgment Rule. Directors and officers are expected to exercise due care and to use their best judgment in guiding corporate management, but they are not insurers of business success. Under the business judgment rule, a corporate director or officer will not be liable to the corporation or to its shareholders for honest mistakes of judgment or bad business decisions made in good faith.

Courts give significant deference to the decisions of corporate directors and officers, and consider the reasonableness of a decision at the time it was made, without the benefit of hindsight. Thus, corporate decision makers are not subjected to second-guessing by shareholders or others in the corporation.

When the Rule Applies. The business judgment rule will apply as long as the director or officer did the following:

1. Took reasonable steps to become informed about the matter.
2. Had a rational basis for the decision.
3. Did not have a conflict between personal interests and the interests of the corporation.

Case Example 29.7 iStar, Inc., promised to award shares of company stock to employees for their performance if its stock averaged a certain price per share over a specific period. The stock price rose 300 percent, but the performance target was missed. The board changed the basis for an award from performance to service—any employee who had been with iStar for a certain period of time was entitled to an award. The board then issued additional shares to pay the awards.

Two iStar shareholders, Albert and Lena Oliveira, demanded that the board cancel the awards and filed a suit on the company's behalf to seek damages. The board declined to file the suit. The Oliveiras then sued Jay Sugarman, the board chairman, and the other iStar directors, alleging a breach of fiduciary duty. The court held in favor of the directors and dismissed the suit. The Oliveiras' "bald allegations of impropriety are plainly insufficient to overcome the presumption of the business judgment rule."[11]

How did the business judgment rule help iStar employees receive a stock award for their tenure with the company?

The Rule Provides Broad Protections. The business judgment rule provides broad protections to corporate decision makers. In fact, most courts will apply the rule unless there is evidence of bad faith, fraud, or a clear breach of fiduciary duties. Consequently, if there is a reasonable basis for a business decision, a court is unlikely to interfere with that decision, even if the corporation suffers as a result. The business judgment rule does not apply, however, when a director engages in fraud, dishonesty, or other intentional or reckless misconduct. For instance, if a director acts without board approval, ignores board rules, and personally mistreats other directors, shareholders, and employees, the business judgment rule may not protect that director.

Duty of Loyalty Loyalty can be defined as faithfulness to one's obligations and duties. In the corporate context, the duty of loyalty requires directors and officers to subordinate their personal interests to the welfare of the corporation. Directors cannot use corporate funds or confidential corporate information for personal advantage and must refrain from self-dealing. For instance, a director should not personally take advantage of a business opportunity that is offered to the corporation and is in the corporation's best interest.

Cases dealing with the duty of loyalty typically involve one or more of the following:

1. Competing with the corporation.
2. Usurping (taking over) a corporate opportunity.
3. Having an interest that conflicts with the interest of the corporation.
4. Engaging in insider trading (using information that is not public to make a profit trading securities).
5. Authorizing a corporate transaction that is detrimental to minority shareholders.
6. Selling control over the corporation.

The following Classic Case illustrates the conflict that can arise between a corporate official's personal interests and the duty of loyalty.

Classic Case 29.3

Guth v. Loft, Inc.

Supreme Court of Delaware, 23 Del.Ch. 255, 5 A.2d 503 (1939).

Facts In 1930, Charles Guth became the president of Loft, Inc., a candy and restaurant chain. At the time, Guth and his family owned Grace Company, which made syrups for soft drinks in a plant in Baltimore, Maryland. Coca-Cola Company supplied Loft with cola syrup. Unhappy with what he felt was Coca-Cola's high price, Guth entered into an agreement with Roy Megargel to acquire the trademark and formula for Pepsi-Cola and form Pepsi-Cola Corporation.

BrooklynScribe/Shutterstock.com

Pepsi-Cola got its start when the head of Loft Candy Company usurped a corporate opportunity.

Neither Guth nor Megargel could finance the new venture, and Grace Company was insolvent. Without the knowledge of Loft's board of directors, Guth used Loft's capital, credit, facilities, and employees to further the Pepsi enterprise. At Guth's direction, a Loft employee made the concentrate for the syrup, which was sent to Grace Company to add sugar and water. Loft charged Grace Company for the concentrate but allowed forty months' credit. Grace charged Pepsi for the syrup but also granted substantial credit. Grace sold the syrup to Pepsi's customers, including Loft, which paid on delivery or within thirty days. Loft also paid for Pepsi's advertising.

Finally, losing profits at its stores as a result of switching from Coca-Cola, Loft filed a suit in a Delaware state court against Guth, Grace, and Pepsi, seeking their Pepsi stock and an accounting. The court entered a judgment in the plaintiff's favor. The defendants appealed to the Delaware Supreme Court.

Issue Did Guth violate his duty of loyalty to Loft, Inc., by acquiring the Pepsi-Cola trademark and formula for himself without the knowledge of Loft's board of directors?

Decision Yes. The Delaware Supreme Court upheld the judgment of the lower court. The state supreme court was "convinced that the opportunity to acquire the Pepsi-Cola trademark and formula, goodwill and business belonged to [Loft], and that Guth, as its president, had no right to appropriate the opportunity to himself."

Reason The court pointed out that the officers and directors of a corporation stand in a fiduciary relationship to that corporation and to its shareholders. Corporate officers and directors must protect the corporation's interest at all times. They must also "refrain from doing anything that works injury to the corporation." In other words, corporate officers and directors must provide undivided and unselfish loyalty to the corporation, and "there should be no conflict between duty and self-interest." Whenever an opportunity is presented to the corporation, officers and directors with knowledge of that opportunity cannot seize it for themselves. "The corporation may elect to claim all of the benefits of the transaction for itself, and the law will impress a trust in favor of the corporation upon the property, interest, and profits required."

Continued

Guth clearly created a conflict between his self-interest and his duty to Loft—the corporation of which he was president and director. Guth illegally appropriated the Pepsi-Cola opportunity for himself and thereby placed himself in the position of competing with the company for which he worked.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Loft's board of directors had approved Pepsi-Cola's use of its personnel and equipment. Would the court's decision have been different? Discuss.

- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This early Delaware decision was one of the first to set forth a test for determining when a corporate officer or director has breached the duty of loyalty. The test has two basic parts—whether the opportunity was reasonably related to the corporation's line of business, and whether the corporation was financially able to undertake the opportunity. The court also considered whether the corporation had an interest or expectancy in the opportunity and recognized that when the corporation had "no interest or expectancy, the officer or director is entitled to treat the opportunity as his own."

Disclosure of Conflicts of Interest Corporate directors often have many business affiliations, and a director may sit on the board of more than one corporation. Of course, directors are precluded from entering into or supporting businesses that operate in direct competition with corporations on whose boards they serve. Their fiduciary duty requires them to make a full disclosure of any potential conflicts of interest that might arise in any corporate transaction [RMBCA 8.60].

In addition, a corporation sometimes enters into a contract or engages in a transaction in which an officer or director has a personal interest. The director or officer must make a full disclosure of that interest and must abstain from voting on the proposed transaction.

Example 29.8 Southwood Corporation needs office space. Alden, one of its five directors, owns the building adjoining the corporation's main office building. He negotiates a lease with Southwood for the space, making a full disclosure to Southwood and the other four directors. The lease arrangement is fair and reasonable, and it is unanimously approved by the other four directors. In this situation, Alden has not breached his duty of loyalty to the corporation, and thus the lease contract is valid. If it were otherwise, directors would be prevented from ever transacting business with the corporations they serve. ■

Liability of Directors and Officers Directors and officers are exposed to liability on many fronts. They are, of course, liable for their own crimes and torts. They also may be held liable for the crimes and torts committed by corporate employees under their supervision.

Additionally, if shareholders perceive that the corporate directors are not acting in the best interests of the corporation, they may sue the directors on behalf of the corporation. (This is known as a shareholder's derivative suit, which will be discussed later in this chapter.) Directors and officers can also be held personally liable under a number of statutes, such as those enacted to protect consumers or the environment.

29–4 Shareholders

Know This
Shareholders normally are not agents of the corporation.

The acquisition of a share of stock makes a person an owner and shareholder in a corporation. Shareholders thus own the corporation, but they generally are not responsible for its daily management. Although they have no legal title to corporate property, such as buildings and equipment, they do have an equitable (ownership) interest in the firm.

29–4a Shareholders' Powers

Shareholders must approve fundamental changes affecting the corporation before the changes can be implemented. Hence, shareholders are empowered to amend the articles of incorporation and bylaws, approve a merger or the dissolution of the corporation, and approve the sale of all or substantially all of the corporation's assets. Some of these powers are subject to prior board approval. Shareholder approval may also be requested (though it is not required) for certain other actions, such as to approve an independent auditor.

Shareholders have the power to elect or remove members of the board of directors. As mentioned earlier, the incorporators normally choose the first directors, who serve until the first shareholders' meeting. From that time on, the selection and retention of directors are exclusively shareholder functions.

Directors usually serve their full terms. If the shareholders judge them unsatisfactory, they are simply not reelected. Shareholders have the inherent power, however, to remove a director from office for cause (such as for breach of duty or misconduct) by a majority vote. Some state statutes (and some corporate articles) permit removal of directors without cause by the vote of a majority of the shareholders entitled to vote.

29–4b Shareholders' Meetings

Shareholders' meetings must occur at least annually. In addition, special meetings can be called to deal with urgent matters. A corporation must notify its shareholders of the date, time, and place of an annual or special shareholders' meeting at least ten days, but not more than sixty days, before the meeting date [RMBCA 7.05].[12] Notice of a special meeting must include a statement of the purpose of the meeting, and business transacted at the meeting is limited to that purpose.

Focus Question 5

What is a voting proxy?

Proxies It is usually not practical for owners of only a few shares of stock of publicly traded corporations to attend shareholders' meetings. Therefore, the law allows stockholders to either vote in person or appoint another person as their agent to vote their shares at the meeting. The agent's formal authorization to vote the shares is called a proxy (from the Latin procurare, meaning "to manage, take care of"). Proxy materials are sent to all shareholders before shareholders' meetings.

Proxy In corporate law, formal authorization to serve as an agent for corporate shareholders and vote their shares in a certain manner.

Management often solicits proxies, but any person can solicit proxies to concentrate voting power. Proxies have been used by groups of shareholders as a device for taking over a corporation. Proxies normally are revocable (that is, they can be withdrawn), unless they are specifically designated as irrevocable. Under RMBCA 7.22(c), proxies last for eleven months, unless the proxy agreement provides for a longer period.

Shareholder Proposals When shareholders want to change a company policy, they can put their idea up for a shareholder vote. They can do this by submitting a shareholder proposal to the board of directors and asking the board to include the proposal in the proxy materials that are sent to all shareholders before meetings.

Rules for Proxies and Shareholder Proposals The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), which regulates the purchase and sale of securities, has special provisions relating to proxies and shareholder proposals. SEC Rule 14a-8 provides that all shareholders who own stock worth at least $1,000 are eligible to submit proposals for inclusion in corporate proxy materials. The corporation is required to include information on whatever proposals will be considered at the shareholders' meeting along with proxy materials.

12. A shareholder can waive the requirement of written notice by signing a waiver form or, in some states, by attending a meeting without protesting the lack of notice.

Under the SEC's e-proxy rules,[13] all public companies must post their proxy materials on the Internet and notify shareholders how to find that information. Although the law requires proxy materials to be posted online, public companies may still choose among several options—including paper documents and DVDs sent by mail—for delivering the materials to shareholders.

Ethical Issue

Should proxy advisory firms be more heavily regulated by the SEC? Hundreds of shareholder proposals are put forward each year, making it difficult for institutional investors, such as mutual funds, to stay current. As a result, these investors rely on proxy advisory firms for recommendations on how to vote at corporate annual meetings. Given that institutional investors hold nearly 80 percent of American shares, proxy advisory firms have a significant influence on the success or failure of many shareholder proposals. Supporters of these firms believe that this influence acts as a positive check on "egregious management behavior" in a way that individual investors could never hope to accomplish.

At the same time, just two firms—Institutional Shareholder Services (ISS) and Glass Lewis—control about 97 percent of the proxy advisory market. Given the widespread practice of "robo-voting," in which institutional investors automatically follow proxy advisor advice, this dominance gives ISS and Glass Lewis, by one estimate, control of nearly 38 percent of all shareholder votes in the United States. Furthermore, critics believe that proxy advisory firms generally favor shareholder proposals that advocate environmental and social agendas, regardless of the proposals' impact on corporate profits or shareholder value. In recent years, the SEC has tried to curb the influence of the proxy industry by subjecting it to anti-fraud regulations that punish false or misleading statements and by requiring more transparency regarding the motives behind proxy voting advice.

29–4c Shareholder Voting

Shareholders exercise ownership control through the power of their votes. Corporate business matters are presented in the form of resolutions, which shareholders vote to approve or disapprove. Each common shareholder is entitled to one vote per share. The articles of incorporation can exclude or limit voting rights, particularly for certain classes of shares. For instance, owners of preferred stock usually are denied the right to vote.

Quorum Requirements For shareholders to act during a meeting, a quorum must be present. Generally, a quorum exists when shareholders holding more than 50 percent of the outstanding shares are present, but state laws often permit the articles of incorporation to set higher or lower quorum requirements.

Know This
Once a quorum is present, a vote can be taken even if some shareholders leave without casting their votes.

Voting Requirements Once a quorum is present, voting can proceed. If a state statute requires specific voting procedures, the corporation's articles or bylaws must be consistent with the statute.

Normally, a majority vote of the shares represented at the meeting is required to pass resolutions. At times, more than a simple majority vote is required, either by a state statute or by the corporate articles. Extraordinary corporate matters, such as a merger, consolidation, or dissolution of the corporation, require approval by a higher percentage of all corporate shares entitled to vote [RMBCA 7.27].

Case Example 29.9 The board of directors of Tesla, Inc., approved an incentive-laden compensation plan for Elon Musk, the electric car company's chief executive officer (CEO). The board then called a special meeting of Tesla stockholders to vote on the plan. Because CEO compensation is not considered an "extraordinary" corporate matter, failure to vote would not be counted as a "no" but rather, it would have no effect on the proceedings. With a quorum established, 73 percent of the shares present at the meeting voted in favor of the plan. This tally represented only 47 percent of all shares, not counting those controlled by Musk and his wife.

In response to a lawsuit filed by an unhappy shareholder, a Delaware court rejected the argument that the vote was invalid because it did not represent the majority view of all disinterested stockholders. Under state law, as long as a majority of shares entitled to vote are present at a shareholder's meeting, and the majority of those shares vote "yes," the result is valid. The court did, however, allow the shareholder to challenge Musk's compensation—which could be as high at $56 billion—on the grounds that it was unfairly excessive.[14]

franz12/Shutterstock.com

Why did a court accept a stockholder vote to increase the salary of a Tesla executive even though fewer than half of all eligible shares voted "yes" on the matter?

Cumulative Voting Most states permit, and some require, shareholders to elect directors by cumulative voting. This voting method is designed to allow minority shareholders to be represented on the board of directors.[15]

With cumulative voting, each shareholder is entitled to a total number of votes equal to the number of board members to be elected multiplied by the number of voting shares the shareholder owns. The shareholder can cast all of these votes for one candidate or split them among several candidates. All candidates stand for election at the same time.

Example 29.10 Nak Corporation has 10,000 shares issued and outstanding. The minority shareholders hold 3,000 shares, and the majority shareholders hold the other 7,000 shares. Three members of the board are to be elected. The majority shareholders' nominees are Acevedo, Barkley, and Craycik. The minority shareholders' nominee is Drake. Can Drake be elected by the minority shareholders?

If cumulative voting is allowed, the answer is yes. Together, the minority shareholders have 9,000 votes (3 directors to be elected times 3,000 shares held by minority shareholders equals 9,000 votes). All of these votes can be cast to elect Drake. The majority shareholders have 21,000 votes (3 times 7,000 equals 21,000), but these votes have to be distributed among their three nominees. No matter how the majority shareholders cast their 21,000 votes, they will not be able to elect all three directors if the minority shareholders cast all of their 9,000 votes for Drake, as illustrated in Exhibit 29–1.

In contrast, in "regular" voting, each candidate is elected by a simple majority. A shareholder cannot give more than one vote per share to any single nominee.

15. See, for instance, California Corporations Code Section 708. Under RMBCA 7.28, however, no cumulative voting rights exist unless the articles of incorporation provide for them.

Other Voting Techniques Before a shareholders' meeting, a group of shareholders can agree in writing to vote their shares together in a specified manner. Such agreements, called shareholder voting agreements, usually are held to be valid and enforceable. As noted earlier, a shareholder can also appoint a voting agent and vote by proxy.

29–4d Rights of Shareholders

Shareholders possess numerous rights in addition to the right to vote their shares, and we examine several here.

Stock Certificate A certificate issued by a corporation evidencing the ownership of a specified number of shares in the corporation.

Stock Certificates In the past, shareholders had a right to a stock certificate that evidenced ownership of a specified number of shares in the corporation. Only a few jurisdictions still require physical stock certificates, however. Shareholders there have the right to demand that the corporation issue certificates (or replace those that were lost or destroyed). Stock is intangible personal property, however, and the ownership right exists independently of the certificate itself.

In most states today and under RMBCA 6.26, boards of directors may provide that shares of stock will be uncertificated, or "paperless"—that is, no physical stock certificates will be issued. Notice of shareholders' meetings, dividends, and operational and financial reports are distributed according to the ownership lists recorded in the corporation's books.

Preemptive Rights The rights of a shareholder in a corporation to have the first opportunity to purchase a new issue of that corporation's stock in proportion to the amount of stock already owned by the shareholder.

Preemptive Rights Sometimes, the articles of incorporation grant preemptive rights to shareholders [RMBCA 6.30]. With preemptive rights, a shareholder receives a preference over all other purchasers to subscribe to or purchase a prorated share of a new issue of stock. Generally, preemptive rights apply only to additional, newly issued stock and must be exercised within a specified time period (usually thirty days).

A shareholder who is given preemptive rights can purchase a percentage of the new shares being issued that is equal to the percentage of shares already held in the company. This allows each shareholder to maintain proportionate control, voting power, and financial interest in the corporation.

Example 29.11 Alisha is a shareholder who owns 10 percent of a company. Because she has preemptive rights, she can buy 10 percent of any new issue (to maintain her 10 percent position). Thus, if the corporation issues one thousand more shares, Alisha can buy one hundred of them.

Preemptive rights are most important in close corporations because each shareholder owns a relatively small number of shares but controls a substantial interest in the corporation. Without preemptive rights, it would be possible for a shareholder to lose proportionate control over the firm.

Dividends As mentioned, a dividend is a distribution of corporate profits or income ordered by the directors and paid to the shareholders in proportion to their shares in the corporation. Dividends can be paid in cash, property, stock of the corporation that is paying the dividends, or stock of other corporations.[16] On one occasion, a distillery declared and paid a "dividend" in bonded whiskey.

State laws vary, but each state determines the general circumstances and legal requirements under which dividends are paid. State laws also control the sources of revenue to be used. All states allow dividends to be paid from the undistributed net profits earned by the corporation, for instance, and a number of states allow dividends to be paid out of any surplus.

16. Technically, dividends paid in stock are not dividends. They maintain each shareholder's proportionate interest in the corporation.

Illegal Dividends. Dividends are illegal if they are improperly paid from an unauthorized account, or if their payment causes the corporation to become insolvent (unable to pay its debts as they come due). Whenever dividends are illegal or improper, the board of directors can be held personally liable for the amount of the payment.

Directors' Failure to Declare a Dividend. When directors fail to declare a dividend, shareholders can ask a court to compel the directors to do so. To succeed, the shareholders must show that the directors have acted so unreasonably in withholding the dividend that their conduct is an abuse of their discretion. The mere fact that the firm has sufficient earnings or surplus available to pay a dividend is not enough to compel directors to distribute funds that, in the board's opinion, should not be distributed. There must be a clear abuse of discretion.

Inspection Rights Shareholders in a corporation enjoy both common law and statutory inspection rights. The RMBCA provides that every shareholder is entitled to examine specified corporate records for a proper purpose, provided the request is made in advance. The shareholder can inspect in person or have an attorney, accountant, or other authorized agent do so. In some states, a shareholder must have held shares for a minimum period of time immediately preceding the demand to inspect or must hold a minimum number of outstanding shares.

The power of inspection is fraught with potential abuses, and the corporation is allowed to protect itself from them. For instance, a corporation can properly deny a shareholder access to corporate records to prevent harassment or to protect trade secrets or other confidential corporate information.

Case Example 29.12 Trading Block Holdings, Inc., offers online brokerage services. On April 1, some Trading Block shareholders, including Sunlitz Holding Company, sent a letter (through an attorney) asking to inspect specific items in the corporation's books and records. This letter indicated that the purpose was to determine the company's financial condition, how it was being managed, and whether its financial practices were appropriate. The letter also stated that the shareholders wanted to know whether Trading Block's management had engaged in any self-dealing that had negatively impacted the company as a whole.

On April 30, Trading Block responded with a letter stating that the plaintiffs were on a "fishing expedition" and did not have a proper purpose for inspecting the corporate records. Eventually, the shareholders filed a motion to compel inspection in an Illinois state court. The trial court denied the plaintiffs' motion. On appeal, the reviewing court reversed. The court held that the plaintiffs' allegations of self-dealing constituted a proper purpose for their inspection request.[17]

How might a shareholder's right to inspect corporate books help or hurt a corporation?

Transfer of Shares Corporate stock represents an ownership right in intangible personal property. The law generally recognizes the right to transfer stock to another person unless there are valid restrictions on its transferability, such as frequently occur with close corporation stock. Restrictions must be reasonable and can be set out in the bylaws or in a shareholder agreement.

When shares are transferred, a new entry is made in the corporate stock book to indicate the new owner. Until the corporation is notified and the entry is complete, all rights—including voting rights and the right to dividend distributions—remain with the currently recorded owner.

29–4e The Shareholder's Derivative Suit

Shareholder's Derivative Suit A suit brought by a shareholder to enforce a corporate cause of action against a third person.

When the corporation is harmed by the actions of a third party, the directors can bring a lawsuit in the name of the corporation against that party. If the corporate directors fail to bring a lawsuit, shareholders can do so "derivatively" in what is known as a shareholder's derivative suit.

The right of shareholders to bring a derivative action is especially important when the wrong suffered by the corporation results from the actions of corporate directors or officers. For obvious reasons, the directors and officers would probably be unwilling to take any action against themselves.

Written Demand Required Before shareholders can bring a derivative suit, they must submit a written demand to the corporation, asking the board of directors to take appropriate action [RMBCA 7.40]. The directors then have ninety days in which to act. Only if they refuse to do so can the derivative suit go forward. In addition, a court will dismiss a derivative suit if the majority of directors or an independent panel determines in good faith that the lawsuit is not in the best interests of the corporation [RMBCA 7.44].

Damages Recovered Go into Corporate Funds When shareholders bring a derivative suit, they are not pursuing rights or benefits for themselves personally but are acting as guardians of the corporate entity. Therefore, if the suit is successful, any damages recovered normally go into the corporation's treasury, not to the shareholders personally.

Example 29.13 Zeon Corporation is owned by two shareholders, each holding 50 percent of the corporate shares. One of the shareholders wants to sue the other for misusing corporate assets. In this situation, the plaintiff-shareholder will have to bring a shareholder's derivative suit (not a suit in the plaintiff's own name) because the alleged harm was suffered by Zeon, not by the plaintiff personally. Any damages awarded will go to the corporation, not to the plaintiff-shareholder. ■

29–4f Duties of Majority Shareholders

In some instances, a majority shareholder is regarded as having a fiduciary duty to the corporation and to the minority shareholders. This occurs when a single shareholder (or a few shareholders acting in concert) owns a sufficient number of shares to exercise de facto (actual) control over the corporation. In these situations, which commonly involve close corporations, majority shareholders owe a fiduciary duty to the minority shareholders.

When a majority shareholder breaches the fiduciary duty to a minority shareholder, the minority shareholder can sue for damages. A breach of fiduciary duties by those who control a close corporation normally constitutes what is known as oppressive conduct. A common example of a breach of fiduciary duty occurs when the majority shareholders "freeze out" the minority shareholders and exclude them from certain benefits of participating in the firm.

Example 29.14 Brodie, Jordan, and Barbara form a close corporation to operate a machine shop. Brodie and Jordan own 75 percent of the shares in the company, but all three are directors. After disagreements arise, Brodie asks the company to purchase his shares, but his requests are refused. A few years later, Brodie dies, and his wife, Ella, inherits his shares. Jordan and Barbara refuse to perform a valuation of the company, deny Ella access to the corporate information she requests, do not declare any dividends, and refuse to elect Ella as a director. In this situation, the majority shareholders have violated their fiduciary duty to Ella. ■

29–5 Major Business Forms Compared

When deciding which form of business organization would be most appropriate, businesspersons normally take into account several factors, including ease of creation, the liability of the owners, tax considerations, and the need for capital. Each major form of business organization offers distinct advantages and disadvantages with respect to these and other factors. Exhibit 29–2 summarizes the essential advantages and disadvantages of each of the forms of business organization discussed in this unit.

Exhibit 29–2 Major Forms of Business Compared

CHARACTERISTIC	SOLE PROPRIETORSHIP	GENERAL PARTNERSHIP	CORPORATION
Method of Creation	Created at will by owner.	Created by agreement of the parties.	Authorized by the state under the state's corporation law.
Legal Position	Not a separate entity; owner is the business.	A general partnership is a separate legal entity in most states.	Always a legal entity separate and distinct from its owners—a legal fiction for the purposes of owning property and being a party to litigation.
Liability	Unlimited liability.	Unlimited liability.	Limited liability of shareholders—shareholders are not liable for the debts of the corporation.
Duration	Determined by owner; automatically dissolved on owner's death.	Terminated by agreement of the partners, but can continue to do business even when a partner dissociates from the partnership.	Can have perpetual existence.
Transferability of Interest	Interest can be transferred, but individual's proprietorship then ends.	Although partnership interest can be assigned, assignee does not have full rights of a partner.	Shares of stock can be transferred.
Management	Completely at owner's discretion.	Each partner has a direct and equal voice in management unless expressly agreed otherwise in the partnership agreement.	Shareholders elect directors, who set policy and appoint officers.
Taxation	Owner pays personal taxes on business income.	Each partner pays pro rata share of income taxes on net profits, whether or not they are distributed.	Double taxation—corporation pays income tax on net profits, with no deduction for dividends, and shareholders pay income tax on disbursed dividends they receive.
Organizational Fees, Annual License Fees, and Annual Reports	None or minimal.	None or minimal.	All required.
Transaction of Business in Other States	Generally no limitation.	Generally no limitation.[a]	Normally must qualify to do business and obtain certificate of authority.

a. A few states have enacted statutes requiring that foreign partnerships qualify to do business within those states.

Practice and Review

William Sharp was the sole shareholder and manager of Chickasaw Club, Inc., an S corporation that operated a popular nightclub of the same name in Columbus, Georgia. Sharp maintained a corporate checking account but paid the club's employees, suppliers, and entertainers in cash out of the club's proceeds. Sharp owned the property on which the club was located. He rented it to the club but made mortgage payments out of the club's proceeds and often paid other personal expenses with Chickasaw corporate funds.

At 12:45 A.M. on July 31, eighteen-year-old Aubrey Lynn Pursley, who was already intoxicated, entered the Chickasaw Club. Chickasaw employees did not check Pursley's identification to verify her age, as required by a city ordinance. Pursley drank more alcohol at Chickasaw and was visibly intoxicated when she left the club at 3:00 A.M. with a beer in her hand. Shortly afterward, Pursley lost control of her car, struck a tree, and was killed. Joseph Dancause, Pursley's stepfather, filed a tort lawsuit against Chickasaw Club and William Sharp. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under what theory might the court in this case make an exception to the limited liability of shareholders and hold Sharp personally liable for the damages? What factors would be relevant to the court's decision?
2. Suppose that Chickasaw's articles of incorporation failed to describe the corporation's purpose or management structure as required by state law. Would the court be likely to rule that Sharp is personally liable to Dancause on that basis? Why or why not?
3. Suppose that the club extended credit to its regular patrons in an effort to maintain a loyal clientele, although neither the articles of incorporation nor the corporate bylaws authorized this practice. Would the corporation likely have the power to engage in this activity? Explain.
4. How would the court classify Chickasaw Club, Inc.—domestic or foreign, public or private?

Chapter Summary: Corporations

Nature and Classification	A corporation is a legal entity distinct from its owners. Formal statutory requirements, which vary somewhat from state to state, must be followed in forming a corporation. Under U.S. law, a corporation is recognized as an artificial legal person and enjoys the same rights that U. S. citizens enjoy. 1. Corporate personnel—Shareholders, whose liability is limited to the amount of their investments, own the corporation. They elect a board of directors to govern the corporation. The board of directors hires corporate officers and other employees to run the firm's daily business. 2. Corporate taxation—The corporation pays income tax on net profits, and shareholders pay income tax on the disbursed dividends that they receive from the corporation (double-taxation feature). 3. Torts and criminal acts—The corporation is liable for the torts committed by its agents or officers within the course and scope of their employment (under the doctrine of respondeat superior). A corporation can be held liable (and be fined) for the criminal acts of its agents and employees. 4. Domestic, foreign, and alien corporations—A corporation is referred to as a domestic corporation within its home state (the state in which it incorporates), as a foreign corporation by any state that is not its home state, and as an alien corporation if it originates in another country but does business in the United States. 5. Public and private corporations—A public corporation is formed by a government (for example, a city or town). A private corporation is formed wholly or in part for private benefit. Most corporations are private corporations. 6. Nonprofit corporations—Corporations formed without a profit-making purpose. 7. Close corporations—Corporations owned by a relatively small number of individuals, often members of the same family. Transfer of shares is usually restricted. 8. S corporations—Small domestic corporations that receive special tax treatment under Subchapter S of the Internal Revenue Code. Shareholders enjoy limited liability while avoiding double taxation. 9. Professional corporations—Corporations formed by professionals (such as physicians and lawyers). For liability purposes, some courts disregard the corporate form and treat the shareholders as partners. 10. Benefit corporations—Corporations formed to benefit the public as a whole and have a material positive impact on society and the environment.
Formation and Powers	1. Promotional activities—A person who enters contracts on behalf of the future corporation is personally liable on all preincorporation contracts until the corporation is formed and assumes the contracts by novation. 2. Incorporation procedures—Procedures vary among the states, but the basic steps are as follows: a. Select a state of incorporation. b. Secure an appropriate corporate name. c. Prepare the articles of incorporation. The articles must include the corporate name, the number of shares of stock the corporation is authorized to issue, the names and addresses of the registered office and agent, and the name and address of each incorporator. d. File the articles with the secretary of state. The state's filing of the articles authorizes the corporation to conduct business. 3. First organizational meeting—The main function of the meeting is to adopt the bylaws, or internal rules of the corporation, but other business, such as election of the board of directors, may also take place. 4. Improper incorporation—A corporation that has complied with the conditions for incorporation has de jure status. A minor defect in formation generally does not affect this status. If a defect is substantial, courts in some states may hold that the corporation has de facto status and treat it as a corporation despite the defect. 5. Corporation by estoppel—If a firm is not incorporated but represents itself to be a corporation and is sued as such by a third party, it may be held to be a corporation by estoppel.

	6. Corporate financing—Corporations normally are financed by the issuance and sale of securities. Bonds are debt securities representing funds borrowed by the firm, and stocks are equity securities representing ownership in the firm. 7. Corporate powers— a. Express and implied powers—The express powers of a corporation are found in its articles of incorporation, in the law of the state of incorporation, and in the state and federal constitutions. Barring express constitutional, statutory, or other prohibitions, the corporation has the implied power to perform all acts reasonably appropriate and necessary to accomplish its corporate purposes. b. Ultra vires* doctrine —Any act of a corporation that is beyond its express or implied powers is an ultra vires act and may lead to a lawsuit by the shareholders or the state attorney general. 8. Piercing the corporate veil—To avoid injustice, courts may "pierce the corporate veil" and hold a shareholder personally liable. This usually occurs when the facts show that great injustice would result from the use of a corporation to avoid individual responsibility.
Directors and Officers	1. Directors—Directors are responsible for all policymaking decisions necessary to the management of corporate affairs. Directors are elected by the shareholders and usually serve a one-year term. Compensation is usually specified in the corporate articles or bylaws. The board conducts business by holding formal meetings with recorded minutes. Directors' rights include the rights of participation, inspection, and indemnification. 2. Corporate officers and executives—Corporate officers and other executive employees are normally hired by the board of directors and have the rights defined by their employment contracts. 3. Duty of care—Directors and officers are obligated to act in good faith, to use prudent business judgment in the conduct of corporate affairs, and to act in the corporation's best interests. A director who fails to exercise this duty of care can be answerable to the corporation and to the shareholders. 4. The business judgment rule—This rule immunizes directors and officers from liability for honest mistakes of judgment or bad business decisions made in good faith. 5. Duty of loyalty—Directors and officers have a fiduciary duty to subordinate their own interests to those of the corporation in matters relating to the corporation. 6. Conflicts of interest—To fulfill their duty of loyalty, directors and officers must make a full disclosure of any potential conflicts between their personal interests and those of the corporation. 7. Liability—Directors and officers are liable for their own crimes and torts, and may be liable for the crimes and torts committed by corporate employees under their supervision.
Shareholders	1. Shareholders' powers—Shareholders must approve all fundamental changes affecting the corporation and elect the board of directors. 2. Shareholders' meetings—Shareholders' meetings must occur at least annually. Special meetings can be called when necessary. Notice of the date, time, and place of the meeting (and its purpose, if it is specially called) must be sent to shareholders. Shareholders may vote by proxy and may submit proposals to be included in the proxy materials sent to shareholders before meetings. 3. Shareholder voting—Shareholder voting requirements and procedures are as follows: a. A minimum number of shareholders (a quorum) must be present at a meeting for business to be conducted. Resolutions are usually passed by simple majority vote. b. Cumulative voting may be required or permitted. Cumulative voting gives minority shareholders a better chance to be represented on the board of directors. c. A shareholder voting agreement (in which shareholders agree to vote their shares together) is usually held to be valid and enforceable. 4. Rights of shareholders—Shareholders have numerous rights, which may include preemptive rights, the right to dividends, inspection rights, the right to transfer shares, and the right to sue on behalf of the corporation (bring a shareholder's derivative suit). 5. Duties of shareholders—A majority shareholder may be regarded as having a fiduciary duty to the corporation and to minority shareholders. A breach of fiduciary duties by those who control a close corporation normally constitutes oppressive conduct.

Issue Spotters

1. Name Brand, Inc., is a small business. Twelve members of a single family own all of its stock. Ordinarily, corporate income is taxed at the corporate and shareholder levels. How can Name Brand avoid this double taxation of income? (See Nature and Classification.)
2. Wonder Corporation has an opportunity to buy stock in XL, Inc. The directors decide that instead of buying the stock in the name of the corporation, they will buy it for themselves. Yvon, a Wonder shareholder, learns of the purchase and wants to sue the directors on Wonder's behalf. Can she do it? Explain. (See Shareholders.)

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

29–1. Preincorporation. Cummings, Okawa, and Taft are recent college graduates who want to form a corporation to manufacture and sell personal computers. Peterson tells them he will set in motion the formation of their corporation. First, Peterson makes a contract with Owens for the purchase of a piece of land for $20,000. Owens does not know of the prospective corporate formation at the time the contract is signed. Second, Peterson makes a contract with Babcock to build a small plant on the property being purchased. Babcock's contract is conditional on the corporation's formation. Peterson secures all necessary capitalization and files the articles of incorporation. Discuss whether the newly formed corporation, Peterson, or both are liable on the contracts with Owens and Babcock. Is the corporation automatically liable to Babcock on formation? Explain. (See Formation and Powers.)

29–2. Conflicts of Interest. Oxy Corp. is negotiating with the Wick Construction Co. for the renovation of the Oxy corporate headquarters. Wick, the owner of the Wick Construction Co., is also one of the five members of Oxy's board of directors. The contract terms are standard for this type of contract. Wick has previously informed two of the other directors of his interest in the construction company. Oxy's board approves the contract by a three-to-two vote, with Wick voting with the majority. Discuss whether this contract is binding on the corporation. (See Directors and Officers.)

29–3. Spotlight on Smart Inventions—Piercing the Corporate Veil. Thomas Persson and Jon Nokes founded Smart Inventions, Inc., to market household consumer products. The success of their first product, the Smart Mop, continued with later products, which were sold through infomercials. Persson and Nokes were the firm's officers and equal shareholders, with Persson responsible for product development and Nokes in charge of day-to-day activities. By 1998, they had become dissatisfied with each other's efforts. Nokes represented the firm as financially "dying," and "in a grim state, . . . worse than ever." He offered to buy all of Persson's shares for $1.6 million, and Persson accepted.

On the day that they signed the agreement to transfer the shares, Smart Inventions began marketing a new product—the Tap Light. It was an instant success, generating millions of dollars in revenues. In negotiating with Persson, Nokes had intentionally kept the Tap Light a secret. Persson sued Smart Inventions, asserting fraud and other claims. Under what principle might Smart Inventions be liable for Nokes's fraud? Is Smart Inventions liable in this case? Explain. [Persson v. Smart Inventions, Inc., 125 Cal.App.4th 1141, 23 Cal.Rptr.3d 335 (2 Dist. 2005)] (See Formation and Powers.)

29–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Piercing the Corporate Veil. Scott Snapp contracted with Castlebrook Builders, Inc., which was owned by Stephen Kappeler, to remodel a house. Kappeler estimated that the remodeling would cost around $500,000. Eventually, however, Snapp paid Kappeler more than $1.3 million. Snapp filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Castlebrook, alleging breach of contract and fraud, among other things. During the trial, it was revealed that Castlebrook had issued no shares of stock and had commingled personal and corporate funds. The minutes of the corporate meetings all looked exactly the same. In addition, Kappeler could not provide an accounting for the Snapp project. In particular, he could not explain evidence of double and triple billing nor demonstrate that the amount Snapp paid had actually been spent on the remodeling project. Are these sufficient grounds to pierce the corporate veil? Explain. [Snapp v. Castlebrook Builders, Inc., 2014 -Ohio- 163, 7 N.E.3d 574 (2014)] (See Formation and Powers.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 29–4, go to Appendix E.

29–5. Torts. Jennifer Hoffman took her cell phone to a store owned by R&K Trading, Inc., for repairs. Later, Hoffman filed a suit in a New York state court against R&K, Verizon Wireless, Inc., and others, seeking to recover damages for a variety of torts, including infliction of emotional distress and negligent hiring and supervision. She alleged that an R&K employee, Keith Press, had examined her phone in a back room, accessed private photos of her stored on her phone, and disseminated the photos to the public. Hoffman testified that "after the incident, she learned from another R&K employee that personal information and pictures had been removed from the phones of other customers." Can R&K be held liable for the torts of its employees? Explain. [Hoffman v. Verizon Wireless, Inc., 5 N.Y.S.3d 123, 125 A.D.3d 806 (2015)] (See Nature and Classification.)

29–6. Piercing the Corporate Veil. In New York City, 2406-12 Amsterdam Associates, LLC, brought an action in a New York state court against Alianza Dominicana and Alianza, LLC, to recover unpaid rent. The plaintiff asserted cause to pierce the corporate veil, alleging that Alianza Dominicana had made promises to pay its rent while discreetly forming Alianza, LLC, to avoid liability for it. According to 2406-12, Alianza, LLC, was 90 percent owned by Alianza Dominicana, had no employees, and had no function but to hold Alianza Dominicana's assets away from its creditors. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's claim. Assuming that 2406-12's allegations are true, are there sufficient grounds to pierce Alianza, LLC's corporate veil? Discuss. [2406-12 Amsterdam Associates, LLC v. Alianza, LLC, 136 A.D.3d 512, 25 N.Y.S.2d 167 (1 Dept. 2016)] (See Formation and Powers.)

29–7. Rights of Shareholders. FCR Realty, LLC, and Clifford B. Green & Sons, Inc., were co-owned by three brothers—Frederick, Clifford Jr., and Richard Green. Each brother was a shareholder of the corporation. Frederick was a controlling shareholder, as well as president. Each brother owned a one-third interest in the LLC. Clifford believed that Frederick had misused LLC and corporate funds to pay nonexistent debts and liabilities and had diverted LLC assets to the corporation. He also contended that Frederick had disbursed about $1.8 million in corporate funds to Frederick's own separate business. Clifford hired an attorney and filed an action on behalf of the two companies against Frederick for a breach of fiduciary duty. Frederick argued that Clifford lacked the knowledge necessary to adequately represent the companies' interest because he did not understand financial statements. Can Clifford maintain the action against Frederick? If so, and if the suit is successful, who recovers the damages? Explain. [FCR Realty, LLC v. Green, 2016 WL 571449 (Conn.Super. 2016)] (See Shareholders.)

29–8. Certificate of Authority. Armour Pipe Line Company assigned leases to its existing oil wells in Texas to Sandel Energy, Inc. The assignment included royalties for the oil produced from the wells. Armour specified that the assignment "does not pertain to production attributable to these leases from any new wells," reserving for itself an interest in those royalties. Later, Armour—a foreign corporation in Texas—forfeited its certificate of authority to do business in the state. More than three years later, the certificate was reissued. Meanwhile, new wells were drilled on the leases. Sandel filed a suit in a Texas state court against Armour, claiming that the reservation of a royalty interest in those wells was "ineffective" because of the temporary forfeiture. When and why does a corporation need a certificate of authority? Is Armour entitled to the royalties from the new wells? Discuss. [Armour Pipeline Co. v. Sandel Energy, Inc., 546 S.W.3d 455 (Tex.App.—Houston (14th Dist.) 2018)] (See Nature and Classification.)

29–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Duties of Directors and Officers. Hewlett-Packard Company (HP) hired detectives to secretly monitor the phones and e-mail accounts of its directors to find the sources of leaks of company information to the media. When the government learned of the monitoring, criminal charges were brought against HP's then-chairwoman and general counsel. Mark Hurd, HP's chief executive officer, was found free of wrongdoing. The scandal had the effect of bolstering Hurd's reputation for integrity, and he became both chairman and CEO. In congressional testimony, press releases, and investor briefings, Hurd proclaimed HP's integrity and its intent to enforce violations of its corporate code of ethics, the Standards of Business Conduct (SBC). Hurd's statements concerning HP's commitment to ethics and compliance with the SBC reassured investors and the public, and kept HP's stock prices from falling.

Meanwhile, an independent contractor for HP accused Hurd of sexual harassment. An investigation by HP's board found no harassment, but revealed that Hurd had lied about his personal relationship with the woman and falsified expense reports to cover it up. Hurd resigned, causing the price of HP stock to drop. A group of shareholders sued HP claiming that Hurd's unethical behavior while promoting HP's commitment to ethics constituted fraud. [Retail Wholesale and Department Store Union Local 338 Retirement Fund v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 845 F.3d 1268 (9th Cir. 2017)] (See Directors and Officers.)

1. Using the Discussion step of the IDDR approach, consider whether Hurd's conduct constituted an ethical violation against HP and its shareholders.
2. Using the Review step of the IDDR approach, evaluate HP's decision to monitor its directors' phones.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

29–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Shareholders' Duties. Milena Weintraub and Larry Griffith were shareholders in Grand Casino, Inc., which operated a casino in South Dakota. Griffith owned 51 percent of the stock and Weintraub 49 percent. Weintraub managed the casino, which Griffith typically visited once a week. At the end of 2012, an accounting audit showed that the cash on hand was less than the amount posted in the casino's books. Later, more shortfalls were discovered. In October 2014, Griffith did a complete audit. Weintraub was unable to account for $200,500 in missing cash. Griffith kept all of the casino's most recent profits, including Weintraub's $90,447.20 share, and, without telling Weintraub, sold the casino for $400,000 and kept all of the proceeds. Weintraub filed a suit against Griffith, asserting a breach of fiduciary duty. Griffith countered with evidence of Weintraub's misappropriation of corporate cash. (See Shareholders.)

1. The first group will discuss the duties that these parties owed to each other and determine whether Weintraub or Griffith, or both, breached those duties.
2. The second group will decide how this dispute should be resolved and who should pay what to whom to reconcile the finances.
3. The third group will discuss whether Weintraub or Griffin violated any ethical duties to each other or to the corporation.

Investor Protection, Insider Trading, and Corporate Governance

30

After the stock market crash of 1929, Congress enacted legislation to regulate securities markets. Securities generally include any instruments representing corporate ownership (stock) or debts (bonds). The goal of regulation was to provide investors with more information to help them make buying and selling decisions about securities and to prohibit deceptive, unfair, and manipulative practices.

> "You are remembered for the rules you break."
> General Douglas MacArthur
> 1880–1964
> (U.S. Army general)

Today, the sale and transfer of securities are heavily regulated by federal and state statutes and by government agencies. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) is the main independent regulatory agency that administers securities regulations. The SEC continually updates its rules in response to legislation, such as the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act.[1]

Despite all efforts to regulate the securities markets, people continue to break the rules and are often remembered for it, as observed in the chapter-opening quotation. Consider what happened to Jun Ying, who was an executive with Equifax when the consumer credit reporting agency experienced a massive data breach affecting 145 million Americans. Acting on this sensitive information before it became public, Ying sold about $1 million in shares of Equifax stock. When news of the hack reached global financial markets, the stock's value dropped 15 percent. Yin was convicted of insider trading and scolded by a federal prosecutor for thinking of "his own financial gain before the millions of people exposed in this data breach even knew they were victims."

In this chapter, we explore securities regulations and laws on insider trading so that you understand how to avoid breaking the rules. We also discuss corporate governance and accountability.

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

2. What is insider trading? Why is it prohibited?
3. What are some of the features of state securities laws?
4. What certification requirements does the Sarbanes-Oxley Act impose on corporate executives?

30–1 Securities Act of 1933

Focus Question 1
What is meant by the term securities?

The Securities Act of 1933[2] governs initial sales of stock by businesses. The act was designed to prohibit various forms of fraud and to stabilize the securities industry by requiring that all essential information concerning the issuance of securities be made available to the investing public. Basically, the purpose of the 1933 act is to require disclosure. The act provides that all securities transactions must be registered with the SEC unless they qualify for an exemption.

National Archives

During the stock market crash of 1929, hordes of investors crowded Wall Street to find out the latest news. How did the "crash" affect stock trading in the years thereafter?

30–1a What Is a Security?

Section 2(1) of the Securities Act contains a broad definition of securities, which generally include the following:[3]

1. Instruments and interests commonly known as securities, such as preferred and common stocks, treasury stocks, bonds, debentures, and stock warrants.
2. Any interests, such as stock options, puts, calls, or other types of privilege on a security or on the right to purchase a security or a group of securities on a national security exchange.
3. Notes, instruments, or other evidence of indebtedness, including certificates of interest in a profit-sharing agreement and certificates of deposit.
4. Any fractional undivided interest in oil, gas, or other mineral rights.
5. Investment contracts, which include interests in limited partnerships and other investment schemes.

Investment Contract In securities law, a transaction in which a person invests in a common enterprise reasonably expecting profits that are derived primarily from the efforts of others.

The Howey Test In interpreting the act, the United States Supreme Court has held that an investment contract is any transaction in which a person (1) invests (2) in a common enterprise (3) reasonably expecting profits (4) derived primarily or substantially from others' managerial or entrepreneurial efforts.[4] Known as the Howey test, this definition continues to guide the determination of what types of contracts can be considered securities.

The following case centered on an alleged Ponzi scheme—a fraudulent investment operation that pays returns to investors with funds from later investors rather than with profits earned by legitimate means. In reaching its decision, the court had to apply the Howey test to determine whether the agreements in question met the definition of investment contracts and were, therefore, securities.

Case 30.1

Securities and Exchange Commission v. Scoville

United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, 913 F.3d 1204 (2019).

Facts Internet traffic exchange businesses sell visits to a buyer's website to make it look more popular than it really is so that it will rank higher in search results displayed by Google and other search engines. Charles Scoville operated an exchange through his company Traffic Monsoon, LLC. Its primary product was Adpacks—bundled Internet advertising services that entitled buyers to a certain number of visits to their websites but also gave them the opportunity to share in the company's revenue. Buyers were offered the possibility of high rates of return on the amounts they paid for the Adpacks. The company represented that the returns came from the sales of all of its advertising services. In fact, the returns on the purchases of Adpacks were paid with money from later Adpack sales.

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed an action in a federal district court against Scoville, alleging that he had violated federal securities laws by operating Traffic Monsoon as a Ponzi scheme in which the business paid returns to its investors financed, not by the success of the business, but with funds acquired from later investors. Before the trial, the court enjoined the defendant from continuing to operate his business. Scoville appealed, arguing that Adpacks were not securities.

Issue Did the Adpacks meet the requirements of the Howey test?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit affirmed the district court's decision to enjoin Scoville from continuing to operate his business.

Reason The appellate court pointed out that the Securities Act of 1933 regulates investments "in whatever form they are made and by whatever name they are called." The court alluded to "the virtually limitless scope of human ingenuity, especially in the creation of countless and variable schemes devised by those who seek the use of the money of others on the promise of profits."

As defined by the Securities Act of 1933, an investment contract is a security. In the Howey case, the United States Supreme Court defined an investment contract as a contract, transaction, or scheme whereby a person invests money in a common enterprise and is led to expect profits solely from the efforts of the promoter or a third party. Thus, under Howey, there are three requirements that distinguish an investment contract from other business deals: (1) an investment, (2) in a common enterprise, (3) with a reasonable expectation of profits to be derived from the entrepreneurial or managerial efforts of others.

Here, the appellate court reasoned, an Adpack was an investment, offering its buyer the opportunity to share in Traffic Monsoon's revenue. An Adpack involved a common enterprise—the sale of Internet advertising services. And an Adpack provided its buyer with a reasonable expectation of profit derived from others' entrepreneurial or managerial efforts—Traffic Monsoon's success was expected to depend "significantly" on its efforts to sell its advertising services.

Accordingly, "the district court did not err in concluding that Adpacks meet Howey's three-part test and, therefore, qualify as investment contracts and, thus, as securities subject to regulation under the federal securities laws."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Scoville argued that the Adpacks were not investment contracts because there was no guarantee that buyers would receive a return on their investment. Should the court have ruled in Scoville's favor based on this argument? Explain.
- Economic The return on an investment in an Adpack was not based on any underlying business activity. Instead, money from new investors was used to pay earlier investors. Is this a legitimate business model? Discuss.

Many Types of Securities For our purposes, it is probably convenient to think of securities in their most common forms—stocks and bonds issued by corporations. Bear in mind, though, that securities can take many forms, including interests in whiskey, cosmetics, worms, beavers, boats, vacuum cleaners, muskrats, and cemetery lots. Almost any stake in the ownership or debt of a company can be considered a security. Investment contracts in condominiums, franchises, limited partnerships in real estate, and oil or gas or other mineral rights have qualified as securities as well.

30–1b Registration Statement

Section 5 of the Securities Act of 1933 broadly provides that a security must be registered before being offered to the public unless it qualifies for an exemption. The issuing corporation must file a registration statement with the SEC and must provide all investors with a prospectus. In principle, the registration statement and the prospectus supply sufficient information to enable unsophisticated investors to evaluate the financial risk involved.

A prospectus is a written disclosure document that describes the security being sold, the financial operations of the issuing corporation, and the investment risk attaching to the security. The prospectus also serves as a selling tool for the issuing corporation. The SEC allows an issuer to deliver its prospectus to investors electronically.[5]

Prospectus A written document required by securities laws when a security is being sold. The prospectus describes the security, the financial operations of the issuing corporation, and the risk attaching to the security.

5. Basically, an electronic prospectus must meet the same requirements as a printed prospectus. The SEC has special rules that address situations in which the graphics, images, or audio files in a printed prospectus cannot be reproduced in electronic form. 17 C.F.R. Section 232.304.

Know This

The purpose of the Securities Act of 1933 is disclosure. The SEC does not consider whether a security is worth the investment price.

Contents of the Registration Statement The registration statement must be written in plain English and must fully describe the following:

1. The securities being offered for sale, including their relationship to the issuer's other securities.
2. The corporation's properties and business (including a financial statement certified by an independent public accounting firm).
3. The management of the corporation, including managerial compensation, stock options, pensions, and other benefits. Any interests of directors or officers in any material transactions with the corporation must be disclosed.
4. How the corporation intends to use the proceeds of the sale.
5. Any pending lawsuits or special risk factors.

All companies, both domestic and foreign, must file their registration statements electronically so that they can be posted on the SEC's EDGAR (Electronic Data Gathering, Analysis, and Retrieval) database. The EDGAR database includes material on initial public offerings, proxy statements, corporations' annual reports, registration statements, and other documents that have been filed with the SEC. Investors can access the database online to obtain information that they can use to make investment decisions.

The Registration Process The registration statement does not become effective until after it has been reviewed and approved by the SEC (unless it is filed by a well-known seasoned issuer, as will be discussed shortly). The process includes several stages, and the 1933 act restricts the types of activities that an issuer can engage in at each stage.

Prefiling Period. During the prefiling period (before the registration statement is filed), the issuer normally cannot sell or offer to sell the securities. Once the registration statement has been filed, a waiting period begins while the SEC reviews the registration statement for completeness.[6]

Waiting Period. During the waiting period, or quiet period, the securities can be offered for sale but cannot legally be sold. Only certain types of offers are allowed during this period.

All issuers can now distribute a preliminary prospectus, which contains most of the information that will be included in the final prospectus but often does not include a price. Most issuers can also distribute a free-writing prospectus.[7] A free-writing prospectus is any type of written, electronic, or graphic offer that describes the issuer or its securities. The free-writing prospectus must include a legend indicating that the issuer has filed a registration statement (including a prospectus) with the SEC and that these documents can be obtained at the SEC website.

Free-Writing Prospectus A written, electronic, or graphic communication associated with the offer to sell a security and used during the waiting period to supplement other information about the security.

Posteffective Period. Once the SEC has reviewed and approved the registration statement and the waiting period is over, the registration is effective, and the posteffective period begins. The issuer can now offer and sell the securities without restrictions. If the company issued a preliminary or free-writing prospectus to investors, it must provide those investors with a final prospectus either before or at the time they purchase the securities. The issuer can require investors to download the final prospectus from a website if it notifies them of the appropriate Internet address.

6. The waiting period must last at least twenty days but always extends much longer because the SEC invariably requires numerous changes and additions to the registration statement.
7. See SEC Rules 164 and 433.

Well-Known Seasoned Issuers A well-known seasoned issuer (WKSI) is a firm that has issued at least $1 billion in securities in the last three years or has outstanding stock valued at $700 million or more in the hands of the public.[8] WKSIs have greater flexibility than other issuers. They can file registration statements the day they announce a new offering and are not required to wait for SEC review and approval. They can also use a free-writing prospectus at any time, even during the prefiling period.

Know This
The issuer of an exempt security does not have to disclose the same information as other issuers.

30–1c Exempt Securities

Certain types of securities are exempt from the registration requirements of the Securities Act because they are low-risk investments or are regulated by other statutes.[9] Exempt securities maintain their exempt status forever and can also be resold without being registered. Exempt securities include the following:

- Government-issued securities.
- Bank and financial institution securities.
- Short-term notes and drafts (negotiable instruments that have a maturity date that does not extend beyond nine months).
- Securities of nonprofit, educational, and charitable organizations.
- Securities issued by common carriers (railroads and trucking companies).
- Insurance policies, endowments, and annuity contracts.
- Securities issued in a corporate reorganization in which one security is exchanged for another or in a bankruptcy proceeding.
- Securities issued in stock dividends and stock splits.

30–1d Exempt Transactions

The Securities Act of 1933 also exempts certain transactions from registration requirements (see Exhibit 30–1 for a summary of these exemptions). The transaction exemptions are very broad and can enable an issuer to avoid the high cost and complicated procedures associated with registration. For instance, private (nonpublic) offerings that involve a small number of investors generally are exempt. Securities offered and sold only to residents of the state in which the issuing firm is incorporated and does business are also exempt. In addition, crowdfunding is allowed without SEC registration, as discussed in this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.

Note, however, that even when a transaction is exempt from the registration requirements, the offering is still subject to the antifraud provisions of the 1933 act (and the 1934 act).

Investment Crowdfunding—Regulations and Restrictions

Today, small entrepreneurs can gain access to public funds through crowdfunding without filing a registration statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). Generally, crowdfunding refers to raising small sums of money from a large number of individuals via the Internet. Crowdfunding as a way for businesses to raise equity capital was made possible by the Jumpstart Our Business Startups Act, or JOBS Act—specifically, by Title III, also known as the Crowdfund Act.[a]

Restrictions on Those Who Invest

The Crowdfund Act imposes certain restrictions on investors. The aggregate amount sold to any investor cannot exceed the greater of $2,200 or 5 percent of the investor's annual income or net worth if that net worth is less than $107,000. For those investors with higher incomes or net worth, the limit is 10 percent.

Other Restrictions

Companies seeking investment funds through crowdfunding cannot offer shares directly to investors. They must go through an online fundraising platform registered with the SEC. Some companies that provide such platforms take an active role in the crowdfunding process, drafting paperwork and soliciting investors. Others take a more hands-off approach. An increasing number of approved crowdfunding portals are available. They usually impose a fee of 5 to 10 percent of the funds raised.

Of course, a potential start-up entrepreneur does not simply create a video and ask people to send money via the Internet. Paperwork must be filed prior to the start of a crowdfunding campaign, and detailed financial statements must be available for potential investors. At the beginning of the COVID-19 outbreak, the SEC made it easier for small businesses that might not ordinarily be eligible for crowdfunding to take advantage of these procedures for a much-needed infusion of capital.

Critical Thinking

What alternatives are there to crowdfunding for a start-up business?

a. 17 C.F.R. Parts 200, 227, 232, 239, 240, and 249 (2016).

exempt from registration.[10] Under Regulation A,[11] the issuer must file with the SEC a notice of the issue and an offering circular, which must also be provided to investors before the sale. This is a much simpler and less expensive process than full registration.

There are two types of public offerings under this regulation:

- Tier 1, for securities offerings of up to $20 million in a twelve-month period.
- Tier 2, for securities offerings of up to $50 million in a twelve-month period. (Legislation has been proposed that would raise the Tier 2 limit to $75 million.)

An issuer of $20 million or less of securities can elect to proceed under either Tier 1 or Tier 2. Both tiers are subject to certain basic requirements, and Tier 2 offerings are subject to additional requirements. Purchasers under Tier 2 who are not accredited investors cannot purchase shares that cost more than 10 percent of their annual income or net worth. (An accredited investor is a sophisticated investor, such as a bank, an insurance company, and a person whose income or net worth exceeds a certain amount.)

Accredited Investor In the context of securities offerings, a sophisticated investor, such as a bank, insurance company, investment company, the issuer's executive officers and directors, and a person whose income or net worth exceeds certain limits.

Important Rule Changes. Note that the cap for Regulation A—which, as noted, is now $50 million—was $5 million until 2015. At that time, the SEC approved rule changes (commonly known as Reg A+) to make it easier for small and mid-sized businesses to raise capital. This chapter's Landmark in the Law feature discusses these important changes.

Changes to Regulation A: "Reg A+"

Under the Securities Act of 1933, before offering or selling securities, a corporation must register the securities with the SEC unless the securities qualify for an exemption.

Traditionally, most of the exempt transactions have involved offers and sales made to accredited investors (sophisticated investors, such as banks, insurance companies, and people whose income or net worth exceeds a certain amount). As a result, members of the general public were unable to invest in smaller, growth-stage companies and start-ups.

In addition, small businesses and start-ups were at a relative disadvantage in raising capital through initial public offerings (IPOs) if they could not qualify for an exemption or afford the cost of SEC registration. Start-ups were forced to seek financing from other sources, often giving up some degree of control in the business in exchange for funds.

Legislation Led to Amended Rules Congress passed the Jumpstart Our Business Startups Act (JOBS Act)[a] to encourage small business growth and to bolster employment. The goal was to provide more funding and reduce the regulatory hurdles for companies trying to go public. In 2015, the SEC adopted final rules (Regulation A+ or Reg A+) to implement the JOBS Act. These rules establish an IPO process that is less expensive and complicated than the procedures associated with normal SEC registration.

Reg A+ Provides Benefits Reg A+ expands the number of issuers that qualify for exemption by raising the limit from $5 to $50 million. It also creates a two-tier system—one for companies seeking to raise less than $20 million, and another for those seeking to raise between $20 and $50 million. Small and mid-sized businesses can now raise up to $50 million a year selling stock by using a simple, streamlined, and cost-efficient process.

Moreover, anyone in the world can invest in Reg A+ offerings, not just accredited investors, although some restrictions apply to certain offerings.[b] Companies can also advertise their stock to the general public. (This is not possible with transactions exempted under Regulation D)

Application to Today's Law The SEC's changes to Regulation A offer average investors enhanced opportunities to invest in companies that they believe in and hope to profit from financially. Reg A+ also helps start-ups and growing companies reach a bigger pool of potential investors and still retain control of their operations. Because it provides a simpler, lower-cost IPO process for small businesses, Reg A+ is likely to decrease the significance of all the other exemptions over time.

b. For Tier 2 offerings, nonaccredited investors cannot invest more than 10 percent of their annual income or net worth.

Example 30.1 Myomo, Inc., is a company based in Massachusetts that makes robotic medical devices for people with upper-body paralysis. How did Myomo, Inc., in Massachusetts, benefit from rule changes to Regulation A offerings?

Testing the Waters. Before preparing a Regulation A offering circular, companies are allowed to "test the waters" for potential interest. To test the waters means to determine potential interest without actually selling any securities or requiring any commitment on the part of those who express interest.

Small Offerings—Regulation D The SEC's Regulation D contains exemptions from registration requirements (Rules 504 and 506) for offers that either involve a small dollar amount or are made in a limited manner.

Rule 504. Rule 504 is the exemption used by most small businesses. It provides that noninvestment company offerings up to $5 million in any twelve-month period are exempt. Noninvestment companies are firms that are not engaged primarily in the business of investing or trading in securities. (In contrast, an investment company is a firm that buys a large portfolio of securities and professionally manages it on behalf of many smaller shareholders-owners. A mutual fund is a type of investment company.)

Example 30.2 Zeta Enterprises is a limited partnership that develops commercial property. Zeta intends to offer $600,000 of its limited partnership interests for sale between June 1 and May 31. According to the definition of a security, this offering would be subject to the registration and prospectus requirements of the 1933 Securities Act.

Under Rule 504, however, the sales of Zeta's interests are exempt from these requirements because Zeta is a noninvestment company making an offering of less than $1 million in a twelve-month period. Therefore, Zeta can sell its limited partnership interests without filing a registration statement with the SEC or issuing a prospectus to any investor.

Rule 506—Private Placement Exemption. Rule 506 exempts private noninvestment company offerings in unlimited amounts if these offerings are not generally solicited or advertised. This exemption is often referred to as the private placement exemption because it exempts "transactions not involving any public offering."[12] The offering can involve an unlimited number of accredited investors and no more than thirty-five unaccredited investors. The issuer must believe that each unaccredited investor has sufficient knowledge or experience in financial matters to be capable of evaluating the investment's merits and risks.[13]

Know This
Investors can be "sophisticated" by virtue of their education and experience or by virtue of investing through knowledgeable, experienced representatives.

The private placement exemption is perhaps most important to firms that want to raise funds through the sale of securities without registering them. Example 30.3 Citco Corporation needs to raise capital to expand its operations. Citco decides to make a private $10 million offering of its common stock directly to two hundred accredited investors and thirty highly sophisticated, but unaccredited, investors. Citco provides all of these investors with a prospectus and material information about the firm, including its most recent financial statements.

As long as Citco notifies the SEC of the sale, this offering will likely qualify for the private placement exemption. The offering is nonpublic and not generally advertised. There are fewer than thirty-five unaccredited investors, and each of them possesses sufficient knowledge and experience to evaluate the risks involved. The issuer has provided all purchasers with the necessary material information. Thus, Citco will not be required to comply with the registration requirements of the Securities Act.

Resales and Safe Harbor Rules Most securities can be resold without registration. The Securities Act provides exemptions for resales by most persons other than issuers or underwriters. Thus, the average investor who sells shares of stock does not have to file a registration statement with the SEC.

Different rules apply to resales of restricted securities—securities acquired in an unregistered private sale. Resales of restricted securities trigger the registration requirements unless the party selling them complies with Rule 144 or Rule 144A. These rules are sometimes referred to as "safe harbors."

Rule 144. Rule 144 exempts restricted securities from registration on resale if all of the following conditions are met:

1. There is adequate current public information about the issuer. ("Adequate current public information" refers to the reports that certain companies are required to file under the 1934 Securities Exchange Act.)

12. 15 U.S.C. Section 77d(2).

2. The person selling the securities has owned them for at least six months, if the issuer is subject to the reporting requirements of the 1934 act. If the issuer is not subject to the 1934 act's reporting requirements, the seller must have owned the securities for at least one year.
3. The securities are sold in certain limited amounts in unsolicited brokers' transactions.
4. The SEC is notified of the resale.[14]

Rule 144A. Rule 144A allows the resale of unregistered securities that, at the time of issue, are not of the same class as securities listed on a national securities exchange or quoted in a U.S. automated interdealer quotation system.[15] The securities may be sold only to qualified institutional buyers (institutions, such as insurance companies and banks, that hold and manage at least $100 million in securities). The seller must take reasonable steps to ensure that the buyer knows that the seller is relying on the exemption under Rule 144A.

Know This

Securities do not have to be held for a specific period (six months) to be exempt from registration on a resale under Rule 144A, as they do under Rule 144.

30–1e Violations of the 1933 Act

It is a violation of the Securities Act to intentionally defraud investors by misrepresenting or omitting facts in a registration statement or prospectus. Liability may also be imposed on those who are negligent with respect to the preparation of these publications. Selling securities before the effective date of the registration statement or under an exemption for which the securities do not qualify also results in liability.

Remedies Criminal violations are prosecuted by the U.S. Department of Justice. Violators may be fined anywhere from $10,000 to $2 million, depending on circumstances, and imprisoned for up to five years.

The SEC is authorized to seek civil sanctions against those who willfully violate the 1933 act. It can request an injunction to prevent further sales of the securities involved or ask the court to grant other relief, such as an order to a violator to refund profits. Parties who purchase securities and suffer harm as a result of false or omitted statements may also bring suits in a federal court to recover their losses and other damages.

Defenses There are three basic defenses to charges of violations under the 1933 act. A defendant can avoid liability by proving any of the following:

1. The statement or omission was not material.
2. The plaintiff knew about the misrepresentation at the time of purchasing the stock.
3. The defendant exercised due diligence in preparing the registration and reasonably believed at the time that the statements were true and there were no omissions of material facts.

In most instances, a defendant must disclose any conflicts of interest when that defendant substantially benefits from recommending to clients specific investment purchases. Case Example 30.4 Dennis Malouf worked for UASNM, Inc., an investment advice firm. Malouf steered his clients to purchase securities from a branch office of the financial service company Raymond James. The owner of this Raymond James branch earned commissions from these trades, making it easier for him to pay off a large sum of money he owed Malouf. UASNM compliance procedures required Malouf to disclose this conflict of interest. He failed to do so.

Under what circumstances can an investment advisor be held responsible for false or misleading statements made by another party regarding the trade of securities?

The SEC found that Malouf had engaged in a deceptive scheme under the 1933 Act and banned him from the securities industry for life. Malouf countered that it was not his duty to warn UASNM's clients of the conflict of interest. Rather, that responsibility lay with UASNM's compliance officer. An appeals court rejected this attempt to shift the blame, holding that—clearly—Malouf had known he was required to report his conflict of interest to the compliance officer and had failed to do so.[16]

30–2 Securities Exchange Act of 1934

The 1934 Securities Exchange Act provides for the regulation and registration of securities exchanges, brokers, dealers, and national securities associations, such as the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD). Unlike the 1933 act, which is a one-time disclosure law, the 1934 act provides for continuous periodic disclosures by publicly held corporations to enable the SEC to regulate subsequent trading.

The Securities Exchange Act applies to companies that have assets in excess of $10 million and either two thousand or more shareholders or five hundred or more shareholders who are unaccredited. These corporations are referred to as Section 12 companies because they are required to register their securities under Section 12 of the 1934 act. Section 12 companies must file reports with the SEC annually and quarterly, and sometimes even monthly if specified events occur (such as a merger). Other provisions in the 1934 act require all securities brokers and dealers to be registered, to keep detailed records of their activities, and to file annual reports with the SEC.

The act also authorizes the SEC to engage in market surveillance to deter undesirable market practices such as fraud, market manipulation (attempts at illegally influencing stock prices), and misrepresentation. In addition, the act provides for the SEC's regulation of proxy solicitations for voting.

30–2a Section 10(b), SEC Rule 10b-5, and Insider Trading

Section 10(b) is an especially important section of the Securities Exchange Act. This section proscribes the use of any manipulative or deceptive mechanism in violation of SEC rules and regulations. Among the rules that the SEC has promulgated pursuant to Section 10(b) is SEC Rule 10b-5, which prohibits the commission of fraud in connection with the purchase or sale of any security.

SEC Rule 10b-5 A rule of the Securities and Exchange Commission that prohibits the commission of fraud in connection with the purchase or sale of any security.

SEC Rule 10b-5 applies to almost all cases concerning the trading of securities, whether on organized exchanges, in over-the-counter markets, or in private transactions. Generally, the rule covers just about any form of security, and the securities need not be registered under the 1933 act for the 1934 act to apply.

Know This

A required element in any fraud claim is reliance. The innocent party must justifiably have relied on the misrepresentation.

Private parties can sue for securities fraud under the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5. The basic elements of a securities fraud action are as follows:

1. A material misrepresentation (or omission) in connection with the purchase and sale of securities.
2. Scienter (a wrongful state of mind).

Insider Trading One of the major goals of Section 10(b) and SEC Rule 10b-5 is to prevent so-called insider trading, which occurs when persons buy or sell securities on the basis of information that is not available to the public. Corporate directors, officers, and majority shareholders, among others, often have advance inside information about events that can affect the future market value of the corporate stock. Obviously, acting on this information would give them a trading advantage over the general public and other shareholders.

The 1934 act defines inside information and extends liability to those who take advantage of such information in their personal transactions when they know that the information is unavailable to those with whom they are dealing. Section 10(b) of the act and SEC Rule 10b-5 apply to anyone who has access to or receives information of a nonpublic nature on which trading is based—not just to corporate "insiders."

Focus Question 2

What is insider trading? Why is it prohibited?

Insider Trading The purchase or sale of securities on the basis of information that has not been made available to the public.

Disclosure under SEC Rule 10b-5 Any material omission or misrepresentation of material facts in connection with the purchase or sale of a security may violate not only the Securities Act of 1933 but also the antifraud provisions of Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5. The key to liability (which can be civil or criminal) under Section 10(b) and SEC Rule 10b-5 is whether the insider's information is material.

The following are some examples of material facts calling for disclosure under SEC Rule 10b-5:

1. Fraudulent trading in the company's stock by a broker-dealer.
2. A dividend change (whether up or down).
3. A contract for the sale of corporate assets.
4. A new discovery, a new process, or a new product.
5. A significant change in the firm's financial condition.
6. Potential litigation against the company.

What are some examples of material facts that should be disclosed according to SEC Rule 10b-5?

Note that any one of these facts, by itself, is not automatically considered a material fact. Rather, it will be regarded as a material fact if it is significant enough that it would likely affect an investor's decision as to whether to purchase or sell the company's securities.

Example 30.5 Sheen, Inc., is the defendant in a class-action product liability suit that its attorney, Paula, believes that the company will lose. Paula has advised Sheen's directors, officers, and accountants that the company will likely have to pay a substantial damages award. Sheen plans to make a $5 million offering of newly issued stock before the date when the trial is expected to end. Sheen's potential liability and the financial consequences to the firm are material facts that must be disclosed, because they are significant enough to affect an investor's decision as to whether to purchase the stock.

The following is a Classic Case interpreting materiality under SEC Rule 10b-5.

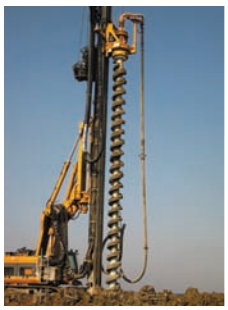
Classic Case 30.2

Securities and Exchange Commission v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 401 F.2d 833 (1968).



Facts On November 12, 1963, the Texas Gulf Sulphur Company (TGS) drilled a hole that appeared to yield a core with an exceedingly high mineral content, although further drilling would be necessary to establish whether there was enough ore to be mined commercially. TGS kept secret the results of the core sample.

After learning of the ore discovery, officers and employees of the company made substantial purchases of TGS's stock or accepted stock options (rights to purchase stock).

On April 11, 1964, an unauthorized report of the mineral find appeared in the newspapers. On the following day, April 12, TGS issued a press release that played down the discovery and stated that it was too early to tell whether the ore find would be significant.

Later on, TGS announced a strike of at least 25 million tons of ore. The news led to a substantial increase in the price of TGS stock. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) brought a suit in a federal district court against the officers and employees of TGS for violating the insider-trading prohibition of SEC Rule 10b-5. The officers and employees argued that the prohibition did not apply. They reasoned that the information on which they had traded was not material, as the find had not been commercially proved.

The trial court held that most of the defendants had not violated SEC Rule 10b-5, and the SEC appealed.

DyziO/Shutterstock.com

After sample drilling revealed potential mineral deposits, company executives made large stock purchases. Did they violate insider trading laws?

Issue Did the officers and employees of TGS violate SEC Rule 10b-5 by buying the stock, even though they did not know the full extent and profit potential of the ore discovery at the time of their purchases?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the lower court's decision and remanded the case for further proceedings, holding that the employees and officers had violated SEC Rule 10b-5's prohibition against insider trading.

Reason For SEC Rule 10b-5 purposes, the test of materiality is whether the information would affect the judgment of reasonable investors. Reasonable investors include speculative as well as conservative investors. "A major factor in determining whether the . . . discovery [of the ore] was a material fact is the importance attached to the drilling results by those who knew about it. . . . The timing by those who knew of it of their stock purchases and their purchases of short-term calls [rights to buy shares at a specified price within a specified time period]—purchases in some cases by individuals who had never before purchased calls or even TGS stock—virtually compels the inference that the insiders were influenced by the drilling results. . . . We hold, therefore, that all transactions in TGS stock or calls by individuals apprised of the drilling results . . . were made in violation of Rule 10b-5."

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that further drilling had revealed that there was not enough ore at this site for it to be mined commercially. Would the defendants still have been liable for violating SEC Rule 10b-5? Why or why not?
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This landmark case affirmed the principle that the test of whether information is "material," for SEC Rule 10b-5 purposes, is whether it would affect the judgment of reasonable investors. The corporate insiders' acquisition of stock and stock options indicated that they were influenced by the results—in other words, that the information about the drilling results was material. The courts continue to cite this case when applying SEC Rule 10b-5 to cases of alleged insider trading.

Outsiders and SEC Rule 10b-5 The traditional insider-trading case involves true insiders—corporate officers, directors, and majority shareholders who have access to (and trade on) inside information. Increasingly, liability under Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5 is being extended to certain "outsiders"—persons who trade on inside information acquired indirectly. Two theories have been developed under which outsiders may be held liable for insider trading: the tipper/tippee theory and the misappropriation theory.

Tipper/Tippee Theory. Anyone who acquires inside information as a result of a corporate insider's breach of a fiduciary duty can be liable under SEC Rule 10b-5. This liability extends to a tippee (an individual who receives "tips" from insiders) and even remote tippees (tippees of tippees).

Tippee A person who receives inside information.

The key to liability under this theory is that the inside information must be obtained as a result of someone's breach of a fiduciary duty to the corporation whose shares are involved in the trading. The tippee is liable under this theory only if the following requirements are met:

1. There is a breach of a duty not to disclose inside information.
2. The disclosure is made in exchange for personal benefit.
3. The tippee knows (or should know) of this breach and benefits from it.

Case Example 30.6 Eric McPhail was a member of the same country club as an executive at American Superconductor. While they were golfing, the executive shared information with McPhail about the company's expected earnings, contracts, and other major developments, trusting that McPhail would keep the information confidential. Instead, McPhail repeatedly tipped six of his other golfing buddies at the country club, and they all used the nonpublic information to their advantage in trading. In this situation, the executive breached his duty not to disclose the information, which McPhail knew. McPhail (the tippee) is liable under SEC Rule 10b-5, and so are his other golfing buddies (remote tippees). All traded on inside information to their benefit.[17]

kali9/E+/Getty Images

A golfer obtains inside information while playing with an executive of a listed company. The golfer then tells his friends about this valuable information. When can friends be liable for insider trading under securities law?

Misappropriation Theory. Liability for insider trading may also be established under the misappropriation theory. Under this theory, an individual who wrongfully obtains (misappropriates) inside information and trades on it for personal gain should be held liable because, in essence, that individual stole information rightfully belonging to another.

The misappropriation theory has been controversial because it significantly extends the reach of SEC Rule 10b-5 to outsiders who ordinarily would not be deemed fiduciaries of the corporations in whose stock they trade. It is not always wrong to disclose material, nonpublic information about a company to another person. Nevertheless, a person who obtains the information and trades securities on it can be liable.

Case Example 30.7 Robert Bray, a real estate developer, first met Patrick O'Neill, an executive at Eastern Bank, at the Oakley Country Club, and the two men became good friends. One day, Bray told O'Neill that he needed cash to fund a project and asked O'Neill if he had any "bank stock tips" for him. O'Neill mentioned a few names of local banks. Then Bray wrote the word "Wainwright" on a napkin and slid it across the bar to O'Neill.

O'Neill, who knew that Eastern Bank was in the process of buying Wainwright Bank, told Bray, "this could be a good one." The next day, Bray bought 25,000 shares of Wainwright stock, and he bought another 31,000 shares a few weeks later. Then, Eastern publicly announced that it was buying Wainwright, and the stock price doubled. Bray eventually sold the stock at a profit of $300,000.

The SEC prosecuted Bray for insider trading using the misappropriation theory. He was convicted after a jury trial. On appeal, the conviction was affirmed. Bray and O'Neill had been good friends for many years. The jury could reasonably have concluded that Bray not only knew that he had traded on material, nonpublic information, but also knew that O'Neill owed Eastern a duty of loyalty and confidentiality.[18]

Minimizing the Personal-Benefits Test. Following precedent, courts have consistently held that, under Section 10(b) and SEC Rule 10b-5, tippers/insiders are not guilty of securities fraud unless they disclose material information in exchange for a personal benefit. This is the so-called personal-benefits test.

The importance of the personal-benefits test was lessened significantly by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in a case in which tippers were convicted on federal wire fraud charges. The court ruled that, under federal criminal law, prosecutors are not required to prove that tippers received any personal benefit in exchange for sharing material information with tippees.[19] Without the need to prove that defendants received a personal benefit, the federal government has a strong incentive to treat insider trading broadly as a white-collar crime rather than specifically as a violation of the 1934 Act.

Insider Reporting and Trading—Section 16(b) Section 16(b) of the 1934 act provides for the recapture by the corporation of all profits realized by an insider on a purchase and sale, or sale and purchase, of the corporation's stock within any six-month period.[20] It is irrelevant whether the insider actually uses inside information—all such short-swing profits must be returned to the corporation.

Short-Swing Profits Profits earned by a purchase and sale, or sale and purchase, of the same security within a six-month period.

In this context, insiders means officers, directors, and large stockholders of Section 12 corporations. (Large stockholders are those owning at least 10 percent of the class of equity securities registered under Section 12 of the 1934 act.) To discourage such insiders from using nonpublic information about their companies for their personal benefit in the stock market, the SEC requires them to file reports concerning their ownership and trading of the corporation's securities.

Section 16(b) applies not only to stock but also to stock warrants, options, and securities convertible into stock. In addition, the courts have fashioned complex rules for determining profits. Note, however, that the SEC exempts a number of transactions under Rule 16b-3.[21]

Exhibit 30–2 compares the effects of SEC Rule 10b-5 and Section 16(b). Because of these and other effects, corporate insiders are wise to seek specialized counsel before trading in the corporation's stock.

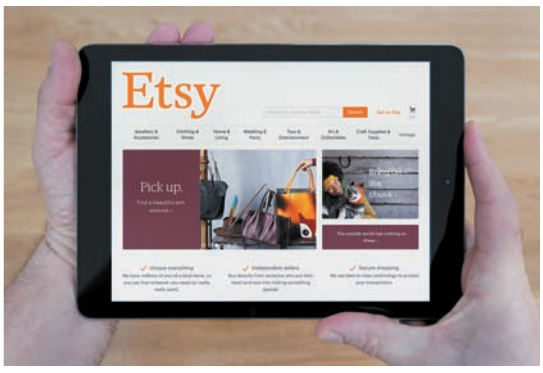
The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act The disclosure requirements of SEC Rule 10b-5 had the unintended effect of deterring the disclosure of forward-looking information. Example 30.8 BT Company announces that its projected earnings in a future time period will be a certain amount, but the forecast turns out to be wrong. The earnings are, in fact, much lower, and the price of BT's stock is affected negatively. The shareholders then file a suit against BT, claiming that its directors violated SEC Rule 10b-5 by disclosing misleading financial information.

To encourage companies to make earnings projections, Congress passed the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (PSLRA) in 1995.[22] The PSLRA provides a "safe harbor" for publicly held companies that make forward-looking statements, such as financial forecasts. Those who make such statements are protected against liability for securities fraud if they include "meaningful cautionary statements identifying important factors that could cause actual results to differ materially from those in the forward-looking statement."[23]

The PSLRA also affects the level of detail required in securities fraud complaints. Plaintiffs must specify each purportedly misleading statement and say how it led them to a mistaken belief.

30–2b Regulation of Proxy Statements



Section 14(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 regulates the solicitation of proxies (authorization to vote shares) from shareholders of Section 12 companies. The SEC regulates the content of proxy statements. Whoever solicits a proxy must fully and accurately disclose in the proxy statement all of the facts that are pertinent to the matter on which the shareholders are to vote. SEC Rule 14a-9 is similar to the antifraud provisions of SEC Rule 10b-5. Remedies for violations range from injunctions to prevent a vote from being taken to monetary damages.

30–2c Violations of the 1934 Act

As mentioned earlier, violations of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act and SEC Rule 10b-5, including insider trading, may be subject to criminal or civil liability.

Scienter* Requirement For either criminal or civil sanctions to be imposed, scienter must exist—that is, the violator must have had an intent to defraud or knowledge of engaging in misconduct. Scienter can be proved by showing that the defendant made false statements or wrongfully failed to disclose material facts. In some situations, scienter can even be proved by showing that the defendant was consciously reckless as to the truth or falsity of the relevant statements.

Case Example 30.9 Etsy, Inc., a Brooklyn-based company, operates a website that connects buyers and sellers of handmade and vintage goods. When Etsy went public, it filed a prospectus and registration statement that set forth its commitment to working solely with "responsible, small-batch manufacturing partners" that adhere to Etsy's ethical expectations. Further, it described the company as "a mindful, transparent, and humane business." The statement also explained the company's methods for safeguarding against counterfeit goods and goods that infringe on another's copyright or trademark rights.

Saleh Altayyar and several other investors sued Etsy, alleging that it had misrepresented or omitted material facts in its registration statement. The plaintiffs claimed that Etsy had made false and misleading statements about its values and that nearly 5 percent of its goods were counterfeit or infringing. Etsy argued that it had exercised due diligence and reasonably believed that the statements were true and contained no omissions of material facts. A federal district court in New York ruled in Etsy's favor and dismissed the case. The court found that the plaintiffs did not establish scienter. "The plaintiffs may disagree with the defendants' opinions [statements about the company], but disagreement does not render the opinions false."[24]

In filing a complaint, the plaintiff must state facts giving rise to an inference of scienter—knowledge that an action was illegal or that statements were false. The dispute in the following case was whether, as part of an allegation of securities fraud under Section 10(b) of the 1934 act, the plaintiffs adequately alleged the required elements of the claim, including scienter.

Case 30.3

Singer v. Reali

United States Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, 883 F.3d 425 (2018).

Facts TranS1, Inc., a medical device company, sold the "System," a spinal surgical procedure. TranS1's financial success hinged on reimbursement by health insurers and government health care programs of the claims of the surgeons who used the System. When the American Medical Association designated the System to be "experimental," surgeons could no longer count on being reimbursed for its use. TranS1 then coached surgeons to file fraudulent claims that would allow for full reimbursement. The company's officers publicly stated that they were "assisting surgeons in obtaining appropriate reimbursement" but did not reveal the fraudulent scheme.

When TranS1 disclosed that the government was investigating the firm, the value of its stock dropped. Phillip Singer and other shareholders filed a suit in a federal district court against Kenneth Reali and other TranS1 officers, alleging a violation of Section 10(b). The court dismissed the complaint. The plaintiffs appealed.

Issue Did the complaint sufficiently allege the misrepresentation, scienter, and causation elements of the claim?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit vacated the judgment of the district court and remanded the case.

Reason The misrepresentation element requires a deceptive, material misstatement or omission by a defendant with a duty to disclose. To allege scienter, a plaintiff must show that the defendant acted with an intent to deceive. The causation element requires a direct connection between the defendant's fraud and the plaintiff's loss. In this case, the complaint asserted that TranS1's declaration that it was assisting surgeons in obtaining reimbursement established a duty to disclose the allegedly fraudulent scheme. The company violated this duty by failing to make the disclosure. This was material because a reasonable investor would consider the scheme important in deciding whether to buy or sell TranS1 stock.

The complaint's allegation that the officers knew of the "clearly illegal" scheme when the company violated its duty to disclose gave rise to "a strong inference" of the defendants' intent to deceive. And the complaint's statement that after TranS1 publicly revealed the government's investigation, the value of the company's stock dropped "is wholly adequate" to allege the cause of the plaintiffs' loss.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment In documents available to the public, TranS1 included general warnings about "the risks of regulatory scrutiny and litigation." Did this satisfy the company's duty to disclose its allegedly fraudulent scheme? Why or why not?
- Economic If the plaintiffs can prove the elements of their claim, what should be the measure of their damages? Explain.

Scienter* Not Required for Section 16(b) Violations Violations of Section 16(b) include the sale by insiders of stock acquired less than six months before the sale (or less than six months after the sale if selling short). These violations are subject to civil sanctions. Liability under Section 16(b) is strict liability. Neither scienter nor negligence is required.

Criminal Penalties For violations of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5, an individual may be fined up to $5 million, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. A partnership or a corporation may be fined up to $25 million. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act increased the penalties for securities fraud. Section 807 of the act provides that for a willful violation of the 1934 act, the violator may be imprisoned for up to twenty-five years in addition to being fined.

For a defendant to be convicted in a criminal prosecution under the securities laws, there can be no reasonable doubt that the defendant was aware of acting wrongfully. A jury is not allowed merely to speculate that the defendant may have acted willfully.

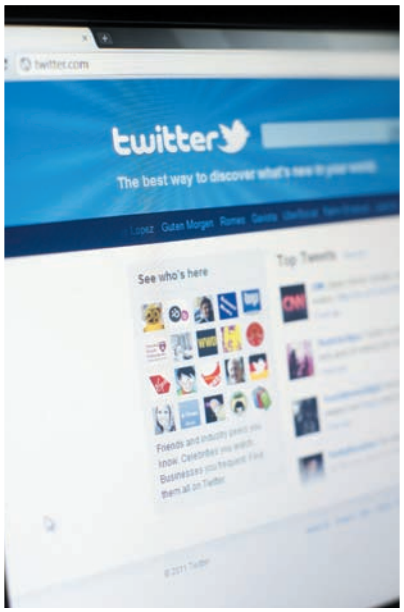
Case Example 30.10 Kim Hannan had several clients that he had acquired from his former employment as a financial advisor. He also owned several small businesses. Hannan's lavish lifestyle and his method of raising funds from his clients aroused the suspicion of his girlfriend, Pamela Crawford, who lodged an anonymous complaint with the SEC. State investigators determined that Hannan, through deception, had convinced his clients to provide him with $1.6 million to fund not only his failed businesses but also his gambling sprees and other personal expenses. An Ohio jury found Hannan guilty on fifty-one counts of securities fraud, and he was sentenced to twenty years in prison.

Hannan appealed, arguing that prosecutors had not proved his intent to deceive his clients and that "misfortune does not constitute fraud." Evidence from his trial, however, showed that Hannan had solicited funds from his clients by telling them that his businesses were flourishing, when the opposite was true. In fact, Hannan was operating a Ponzi scheme in which he paid old investors with funds from new investors. Furthermore, he never informed clients that he was using their investments for personal expenses. An appeals court found that Hannan had "intentionally made false representations" that misled his clients. The court affirmed his conviction accordingly.[25]

Civil Sanctions The SEC can also bring suit in a federal district court against anyone violating or aiding in a violation of the 1934 act or SEC rules by purchasing or selling a security while in the possession of material nonpublic information.[26] The violation must occur on or through the facilities of a national securities exchange or through a broker or dealer. A court may assess a penalty for as much as triple the profits gained or the loss avoided by the guilty party. In addition, the Insider Trading and Securities Fraud Enforcement Act increased the number of persons who may be subject to civil liability for insider trading and gave the SEC authority to pay monetary rewards to informants.[27]

Private parties may also sue violators of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5. A private party may obtain rescission (cancellation) of a contract to buy securities or damages to the extent of the violator's illegal profits. Those found liable have a right to seek contribution from those who share responsibility for the violations, including accountants, attorneys, and corporations. For violations of Section 16(b), a corporation can bring an action to recover the short-swing profits.

30–2d Online Securities Fraud



A problem facing the SEC today is how to enforce the antifraud provisions of the securities laws in the online environment. Internet-related forms of securities fraud include many types of investment scams. Spam, online newsletters and bulletin boards, chat rooms, blogs, social media, and tweets can all be used to spread false information and perpetrate fraud. For a relatively small cost, fraudsters can even build sophisticated Web pages to facilitate their investment scams.

Investment Newsletters Hundreds of online investment newsletters provide information on stocks. Legitimate online newsletters can help investors gather valuable information, but some e-newsletters are used for fraud. The law allows companies to pay the people who write these newsletters to tout their securities, but the newsletters are required to disclose who paid for the advertising. Many newsletters do not follow that law, however. Thus, an investor reading an online newsletter may believe that the information is unbiased, when in fact the fraudsters will directly profit by convincing investors to buy or sell particular stocks.

Zoonar GmbH/Alamy

How do social media, such as Twitter and Facebook, complicate securities fraud?

Social Media Social media sites have presented a particularly difficult problem for the SEC. Using sites such as Twitter and Facebook, anonymous fraudsters can quickly disseminate information to millions of people at little or no cost. Again, their aim is to convince others to trade in specific stocks. It can be difficult for the SEC to access social media accounts to investigate potential violations. The government must subpoena the sites to determine the user behind particular messages. In addition, social media sites are constantly being updated and changed, which adds another wrinkle for enforcement.

Still, the SEC can take steps to protect investors against deceptive behavior in this arena. For instance, the agency temporarily suspended the ability of twenty-three companies to sell shares in the wake of the COVID-19 outbreak of 2020. These companies had used social media to make false or misleading claims about their products' ability to "prevent, detect, or cure coronavirus." SEC officials worried that such claims were being used to "pump up" the value of a stock, which would then be "dumped" by the fraudulent promoters before the inevitable reality-based market correction.

30–3 State Securities Laws

Focus Question 3
What are some of the features of state securities laws?

Every state has its own corporate securities laws, or "blue sky laws," that regulate the offer and sale of securities within its borders. (The phrase blue sky laws dates to a 1917 decision by the United States Supreme Court in which the Court declared that the purpose of such laws was to prevent "speculative schemes which have no more basis than so many feet of 'blue sky.'")[28] Article 8 of the Uniform Commercial Code, which has been adopted by all of the states, also imposes various requirements relating to the purchase and sale of securities.

30–3a Requirements under State Securities Laws

State securities laws apply mainly to intrastate transactions (transactions within one state). Typically, state laws have disclosure requirements and antifraud provisions, many of which are patterned after Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act and SEC Rule 10b-5. State laws also provide for the registration of securities offered or issued for sale within the state and impose disclosure requirements.

Case Example 30.11 Randall Fincke was the founder, director, and officer of Access Cardiosystems, Inc., a small start-up company that sold portable automated external heart defibrillators. Fincke prepared a business plan stating that Access's "patent counsel" had advised him that Access's product did not infringe any patents. This statement was false—patent counsel never offered Access any opinion on the question of infringement.

Fincke gave this plan to potential investors, including Joseph Zimmel, who bought $1.5 million in Access shares. When the company later filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, Zimmel filed a complaint with the federal bankruptcy court, alleging that Fincke had violated the Massachusetts blue sky law. The court awarded Zimmel $1.5 million in damages, and the award was affirmed on appeal. Fincke had solicited investors by means of a false statement of material fact, in violation of the fraud provisions in the state's securities laws.[29]

Methods of registration, required disclosures, and exemptions from registration vary among states. Unless an exemption from registration is applicable, issuers must register or qualify their stock with the appropriate state official, often called a corporations commissioner. Additionally, most state securities laws regulate securities brokers and dealers.

30–3b Concurrent Regulations

Since the adoption of the 1933 and 1934 federal securities acts, the state and federal governments have regulated securities concurrently. Issuers must comply with both federal and state securities laws, and exemptions from federal law are not exemptions from state laws.

Know This
Federal securities laws do not take priority over state securities laws.

The dual federal and state system has not always worked well, particularly during the early 1990s, when the securities markets underwent considerable expansion. Today, most duplicate regulations have been eliminated, and the SEC has exclusive power to regulate most national securities activities. In addition, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws substantially revised the Uniform Securities Act to coordinate state and federal securities regulation and enforcement efforts. A majority of the states have adopted this most recent version of the Uniform Securities Act.[30]

30–4 Corporate Governance

Corporate governance can be narrowly defined as the relationship between a corporation and its shareholders. Some argue for a broader definition—that corporate governance specifies the rights and responsibilities among different participants in the corporation, such as the board of directors, managers, shareholders, and other stakeholders, and spells out the rules and procedures for making decisions on corporate affairs. Regardless of the way it is defined, effective corporate governance requires more than just compliance with laws and regulations.

Corporate Governance A set of policies specifying the rights and responsibilities of the various participants in a corporation and spelling out the rules and procedures for making corporate decisions.

Effective corporate governance is essential in large corporations because corporate ownership (by shareholders) is separated from corporate control (by officers and managers). Under these circumstances, officers and managers may attempt to advance their own interests at the expense of the shareholders. The well-publicized corporate scandals in the first decade of the 2000s clearly illustrated the reasons for concern about managerial opportunism.

30–4a Promoting Accountability

Effective corporate governance standards are designed to address problems and to motivate officers to make decisions that promote the financial interests of the company's shareholders. Generally, corporate governance entails corporate decision-making structures that monitor employees (particularly officers) to ensure that they are acting for the benefit of the shareholders. Firms that are more accountable to shareholders typically report higher profits, higher sales growth, higher firm value, and other economic advantages.

Corporate governance involves, at a minimum:

1. Audited reporting of the corporation's financial progress, so that managers can be evaluated.
2. Legal protections for shareholders so that violators of the law who attempt to take advantage of shareholders can be punished for misbehavior and victims can recover damages for any associated losses.

Governance and Corporate Law State corporation statutes set up the legal framework for corporate governance. Under the corporate law of Delaware, where most major companies incorporate, all corporations must have certain structures of corporate governance in place. The most important structure, of course, is the board of directors, because the board makes the major decisions about the future of the corporation.

The Board of Directors Under corporate law, a corporation must have a board of directors elected by the shareholders. Directors are responsible for ensuring that the corporation's officers are operating wisely and in the exclusive interest of shareholders. The directors receive reports from the officers and give them managerial direction. In reality, though, corporate directors devote a relatively small amount of time to monitoring officers.

Ideally, shareholders would monitor the directors' supervision of the officers. In practice, however, it can be difficult for shareholders to monitor directors and hold them responsible for corporate failings. Although the directors can be sued for failing to do their jobs effectively, directors are rarely held personally liable.

The Audit Committee. A crucial committee of the board of directors is the audit committee, which oversees the corporation's accounting and financial reporting processes, including both internal and outside auditors. Unless the committee members have sufficient expertise and are willing to spend the time to carefully examine the corporation's bookkeeping methods, however, the audit committee may be ineffective.

The audit committee also oversees the corporation's "internal controls." These controls, carried out largely by the company's internal auditing staff, are measures taken to ensure that reported results are accurate. For instance, internal controls help to determine whether a corporation's debts are collectible. If the debts are not collectible, it is up to the audit committee to make sure that the corporation's financial officers do not simply pretend that payment will eventually be made.

The Compensation Committee. Another important committee of the board of directors is the compensation committee. This committee monitors and determines the compensation of the company's officers. As part of this process, it is responsible for assessing the officers' performance and for designing a compensation system that will better align the officers' interests with those of the shareholders.

Ethical Issue

Does corporate America need gender quotas for boards of directors? Driven by pressure from institutional investors—as well as changes in the society at large—the nation's 500 largest corporations increased the number of women on their boards of directors by 37 percent during the last half of the 2010s. At the same time, California became the first state to legally compel the presence of women on corporate boards. Under California law, every publicly traded company based in the state must have at least one female director or be fined $100,000. Companies with five board members must have at least two female directors, and those with six board members must have at least three female directors. Larger corporations face fines of $300,000 for every seat that should be filled by a woman but is not.[31]

Given that the average director salary in California is about $180,000, complying with this law will be a hardship for some smaller firms. Still, the legislator who sponsored the law lauded its twin goals of "advancing gender equality" and enhancing "the economic well-being of the state." Opponents of the law counter that it is "patronizing" to women and also violates the equal protection clause of the U.S. Constitution by perpetuating gender-based discrimination. In addition, critics point out that a number of European countries have had gender quotas for corporate boards of directors in place for years, with no measurable impact on corporate financial performance or the expected "trickle-down" effect of increased hiring of female executives.

30–4b The Sarbanes-Oxley Act

In 2002, following a series of corporate scandals, Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act,[32] which addresses certain issues relating to corporate governance. Generally, the act attempts to increase corporate accountability by imposing strict disclosure requirements and harsh penalties for violations of securities laws. The act requires chief corporate executives to take responsibility for the accuracy of financial statements and reports that are filed with the SEC.

Additionally, the act requires that certain financial and stock-transaction reports be filed with the SEC earlier than was required under the previous rules. The act also created a new entity, called the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, to regulate and oversee public accounting firms. Other provisions of the act established private civil actions and expanded the SEC's remedies in administrative and civil actions.

Because of the importance of this act for corporate leaders and for those dealing with securities transactions, we highlight some of its key provisions relating to corporate accountability in Exhibit 30–3.

More Internal Controls and Accountability The Sarbanes-Oxley Act introduced direct federal corporate governance requirements for public companies (companies whose shares are traded in the public securities markets). The law addressed many of the corporate governance procedures discussed here and created new requirements in an attempt to make the system work more effectively. The requirements deal with independent monitoring of company officers by both the board of directors and auditors.

Exhibit 30–3 Some Key Provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act Relating to Corporate Accountability

Certification Requirements—Under Section 906 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the chief executive officers (CEOs) and chief financial officers (CFOs) of most major companies listed on public stock exchanges must certify financial statements that are filed with the SEC. CEOs and CFOs must certify that filed financial reports "fully comply" with SEC requirements and that all of the information reported "fairly represents in all material respects, the financial conditions and results of operations of the issuer."

Under Section 302 of the act, CEOs and CFOs of reporting companies are required to certify that a signing officer reviewed each quarterly and annual filing with the SEC and that none contained untrue statements of material fact. Also, the signing officer or officers must certify that they have established an internal control system to identify all material information and that any deficiencies in the system were disclosed to the auditors.

Effectiveness of Internal Controls on Financial Reporting—Under Section 404(a), all public companies are required to assess the effectiveness of their internal control over financial reporting. Section 404(b) requires independent auditors to report on management's assessment of internal controls, but companies with a public float (price times total shares publicly owned) of less than $75 million are exempted from this requirement.

Loans to Directors and Officers—Section 402 prohibits any reporting company, as well as any private company that is filing an initial public offering, from making personal loans to directors and executive officers (with a few limited exceptions, such as for certain consumer and housing loans).

Protection for Whistleblowers—Section 806 protects whistleblowers—employees who report ("blow the whistle" on) securities violations by their employers—from being fired or in any way discriminated against by their employers.

Blackout Periods—Section 306 prohibits certain types of securities transactions during "blackout periods"—periods during which the issuer's ability to purchase, sell, or otherwise transfer funds in individual account plans (such as pension funds) is suspended.

Enhanced Penalties for—

- Violations of Section 906 Certification Requirements— A CEO or CFO who certifies a financial report or statement filed with the SEC knowing that the report or statement does not fulfill all of the requirements of Section 906 will be subject to criminal penalties of up to $1 million in fines, ten years in prison, or both. Willful violators of the certification requirements may be subject to $5 million in fines, twenty years in prison, or both.
- Violations of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act—Penalties for securities fraud under the 1934 act were increased. Individual violators may be fined up to $5 million, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. Willful violators may be imprisoned for up to twenty-five years in addition to being fined.
- Destruction or Alteration of Documents—Anyone who alters, destroys, or conceals documents or otherwise obstructs any official proceeding will be subject to fines, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both.
- Other Forms of White-Collar Crime—The act stiffened the penalties for certain criminal violations, such as federal mail and wire fraud, and ordered the U.S. Sentencing Commission to revise the sentencing guidelines for white-collar crimes.

Statute of Limitations for Securities Fraud—Section 804 provides that a private right of action for securities fraud may be brought no later than two years after the discovery of the violation or five years after the violation, whichever is earlier.

Sections 302 and 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley require high-level managers (the most senior officers) to establish and maintain an effective system of internal controls. The system must include "disclosure controls and procedures" to ensure that company financial reports are accurate and timely and to document financial results prior to reporting.

Senior management must reassess the system's effectiveness annually. Some companies had to take expensive steps to bring their internal controls up to the new federal standard. After the act was passed, hundreds of companies reported that they had identified and corrected shortcomings in their internal control systems.

Exemptions for Smaller Companies The Sarbanes-Oxley Act initially required all public companies to have an independent auditor file a report with the SEC on management's assessment of internal controls. Later, however, Congress enacted an exemption for smaller companies in an effort to reduce compliance costs. Public companies with a market capitalization, or public float (price times total shares publicly owned), of less than $75 million no longer need to have an auditor report on management's assessment of internal controls.

Certification and Monitoring Requirements Section 906 requires that chief executive officers (CEOs) and chief financial officers (CFOs) certify that the information in the corporate financial statements "fairly represents in all material respects, the financial conditions and results of operations of the issuer." This requirement makes officers directly accountable for the accuracy of their financial reporting and avoids any "ignorance defense" if shortcomings are later discovered.

The act also includes requirements to improve directors' monitoring of officers' activities. All members of the corporate audit committee for public companies must be outside directors. The audit committee must have a written charter that sets out its duties and provides for performance appraisal. At least one "financial expert" must serve on the audit committee, which must hold executive meetings without company officers present. In addition to reviewing the internal controls, the committee also monitors the actions of the outside auditor.

Focus Question 4

What certification requirements does the Sarbanes-Oxley Act impose on corporate executives?

Practice and Review

Dale Emerson served as the chief financial officer for Reliant Electric Company, a distributor of electricity serving portions of Montana and North Dakota. Reliant was in the final stages of planning a takeover of Dakota Gasworks, Inc., a natural gas distributor that operated solely within North Dakota. On a weekend fishing trip with his uncle, Ernest Wallace, Emerson mentioned that he had been putting in a lot of extra hours at the office planning a takeover of Dakota Gasworks. When he returned from the fishing trip, Wallace purchased $20,000 worth of Reliant stock. Three weeks later, Reliant made a tender offer to Dakota Gasworks stockholders and purchased 57 percent of Dakota Gasworks stock. Over the next two weeks, the price of Reliant stock rose 72 percent before leveling out. Wallace sold his Reliant stock for a gross profit of $14,400. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would registration with the SEC be required for Dakota Gasworks securities? Why or why not?
2. Did Emerson violate Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5? Why or why not?
3. What theory or theories might a court use to hold Wallace liable for insider trading?
4. Under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, who would be required to certify the accuracy of the financial statements Reliant filed with the SEC?

Chapter Summary: Investor Protection, Insider Trading, and Corporate Governance

Securities Act of 1933	Prohibits fraud and stabilizes the securities industry by requiring disclosure of all essential information relating to the issuance of securities to the investing public. 1. Registration requirements—Securities, unless exempt, must be registered with the SEC before being offered to the public. a. The registration statement must include detailed financial information about the securities being offered for sale; the issuing corporation's properties, business, and management; the intended use of the proceeds of the sale of the securities being issued; and any pending lawsuits or special risk factors. b. The issuer must provide investors with a prospectus that describes the security being sold, the financial operations of the issuing corporation, and the investment risk attaching to the security. 2. Exemptions—The SEC has exempted certain offerings from the requirements of the Securities Act of 1933. Exemptions may be determined on the basis of the size of the issue, whether the offering is private or public, and whether advertising is involved.
Securities Exchange Act of 1934	Provides for the regulation and registration of securities exchanges, brokers, dealers, and national securities associations. Maintains a continuous disclosure system for publicly held corporations to enable the SEC to regulate subsequent trading. Applies to companies that have assets in excess of $10 million and either two thousand or more shareholders or five hundred or more shareholders who are unaccredited (Section 12 companies). 1. SEC Rule 10b-5 [under Section 10(b) of the 1934 act]—This rule prohibits the commission of fraud in connection with the purchase or sale of any security. a. Applies to almost all trading of securities—a firm's securities do not have to be registered under the 1933 act for the 1934 act to apply. b. Applies to insider trading by corporate officers, directors, majority shareholders, and any persons receiving inside information (information not available to the public) who base their trading on this information. Liability for insider trading may be based on the tipper/tippee or the misappropriation theory. c. May be violated by omitting or misrepresenting "material facts" related to the purchase or sale of a security. d. Liability for violations can be civil or criminal. 2. Insider trading [under Section 16(b) of the 1934 act]—To prevent corporate insiders from taking advantage of inside information, the 1934 act requires officers, directors, and shareholders owning 10 percent or more of the issued stock of a corporation to turn over to the corporation all short-term profits (called short-swing profits) realized from the purchase and sale or sale and purchase of corporate stock within any six-month period. 3. Regulation of proxies—Section 14(a) of the 1934 act regulates the solicitation of proxies from shareholders of Section 12 companies. 4. Online securities fraud—The SEC today faces the problem of enforcing the antifraud provisions of the securities laws in the online environment. Internet-related forms of securities fraud include fraudulent newsletters and social media posts.
State Securities Laws	Regulate the offer and sale of securities within state borders (also known as blue sky laws). States regulate securities concurrently with the federal government. The Uniform Securities Act promotes coordination of state and federal securities regulation and enforcement efforts.
Corporate Governance	Involves a set of policies specifying the rights and responsibilities of the various participants in a corporation and spelling out the rules and procedures for making decisions on corporate affairs. Corporate governance is necessary in large corporations because corporate ownership (by the shareholders) is separated from corporate control (by officers and managers). This separation of corporate ownership and control can often result in conflicting interests. Corporate governance standards address such issues. 1. Promoting accountability—Measures designed to ensure that officers and other employees are acting in the best interests of shareholders include audits of the corporation's financial health and oversight by a board of directors. 2. Sarbanes-Oxley Act—This act attempts to increase corporate accountability by imposing strict disclosure requirements and harsh penalties for violations of securities laws.

Issue Spotters

1. When a corporation wishes to issue certain securities, it must provide sufficient information for an unsophisticated investor to evaluate the financial risk involved. Specifically, the law imposes liability for making a false statement or omission that is "material." What sort of information would an investor consider material? (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)
2. Lee is an officer of Magma Oil, Inc. Lee knows that a Magma geologist has just discovered a new deposit of oil. Can Lee take advantage of this information to buy and sell Magma stock? Why or why not? (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

30–1. Registration Requirements. Langley Brothers, Inc., a corporation incorporated and doing business in Kansas, decides to sell common stock worth $1 million to the public. The stock will be sold only within the state of Kansas. Joseph Langley, the chair of the board, says the offering need not be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission. His brother, Harry, disagrees. Who is right? Explain. (See Securities Act of 1933.)

30–2. Insider Trading. David Gain is the chief executive officer (CEO) of Forest Media Corp., which is interested in acquiring RS Communications, Inc. To initiate negotiations, Gain meets with RS's CEO, Gill Raz, on Friday, July 12. Two days later, Gain phones his brother, Mark, who buys 3,800 shares of RS stock on the following Monday. Mark discusses the deal with their father, Jordan, who buys 20,000 RS shares on Thursday. On July 25, the day before the RS bid is due, Gain phones his parents' home, and Mark buys another 3,200 RS shares. Over the next few days, Gain periodically phones Mark and Jordan, both of whom continued to buy RS shares. On August 5, RS refuses Forest's bid and announces that it is merging with another company. The price of RS stock rises 30 percent, increasing the value of Mark's and Jordan's shares by nearly $660,000 and $400,000, respectively. Is Gain guilty of insider trading? What is required to impose sanctions for this offense? Could a court hold Gain liable? Why or why not? (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)

30–3. Violations of the 1934 Act. Matrixx Initiatives, Inc., makes and sells over-the-counter pharmaceutical products. Its core brand is Zicam, which accounts for 70 percent of its sales. Matrixx received reports that some consumers had lost their sense of smell (a condition called anosmia) after using Zicam Cold Remedy. Four product liability suits were filed against Matrixx, seeking damages for anosmia. In public statements relating to revenues and product safety, however, Matrixx did not reveal this information.

James Siracusano and other Matrixx investors filed a suit in a federal district court against the company and its executives under Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5, claiming that the statements were misleading because they did not disclose the information about the product liability suits. Matrixx argued that to be material, information must consist of a statistically significant number of adverse events that require disclosure. Because Siracusano's claim did not allege that Matrixx knew of a statistically significant number of adverse events, the company contended that the claim should be dismissed. What is the standard for materiality in this context? Should Siracusano's claim be dismissed? Explain. [Matrixx Initiatives, Inc. v. Siracusano, 563 U.S. 27, 131 S.Ct. 1309, 179 L.Ed.2d 398 (2011)] (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)

30–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Disclosure under SEC Rule 10b-5. Dodona I, LLC, invested $4 million in two securities offerings from Goldman, Sachs & Co. The investments were in collateralized debt obligations (CDOs). Their value depended on residential mortgage-backed securities (RMBSs), whose value in turn depended on the performance of subprime residential mortgages. Before marketing the CDOs, Goldman had noticed several "red flags" relating to investments in the subprime market, in which it had invested heavily.

To limit its risk, Goldman began betting against subprime mortgages, RMBSs, and CDOs, including the CDOs it had sold to Dodona. In other words, Goldman made investments based on the assumption that subprime mortgages and the securities instruments built upon them would decrease in value. In an internal e-mail, one Goldman official commented that the company had managed to "make some lemonade from some big old lemons." Nevertheless, Goldman's marketing materials provided only boilerplate statements about the risks of investing in the securities. The CDOs were later downgraded to junk status, and Dodona suffered a major loss while Goldman profited. Assuming that Goldman did not affirmatively misrepresent any facts about the CDOs, can Dodona still recover under SEC Rule 10b-5? If so, how? [Dodona I, LLC v. Goldman, Sachs & Co., 847 F.Supp.2d 624 (S.D.N.Y. 2012)] (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)

30–5. Violations of the 1933 Act. Three shareholders of iStorage sought to sell their stock through World Trade Financial Corp. The shares were restricted securities—that is, securities acquired in an unregistered, private sale. Restricted securities typically bear a "restrictive" legend clearly stating that they cannot be resold in the public marketplace. This legend had been wrongly removed from the iStorage shares, however. Information about the company that was publicly available included the fact that, despite a ten-year life, it had no operating history or earnings. In addition, it had net losses of about $200,000, and its stock was thinly traded. Without investigating the company or the status of its stock, World Trade sold more than 2.3 million shares to the public on behalf of the three customers. Did World Trade violate the Securities Act of 1933? Discuss. [World Trade Financial Corp. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 739 F.3d 1243 (9th Cir. 2014)] (See Securities Act of 1933.)

30–6. Securities Act of 1933. Big Apple Consulting USA, Inc., provided small publicly traded companies with a variety of services, including marketing, business planning, and website development and maintenance. CyberKey Corp. sold customizable USB drives. CyberKey falsely informed Big Apple that CyberKey had been awarded a $25 million contract with the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). Big Apple used this information in aggressively promoting CyberKey's stock and was compensated for the effort in the form of CyberKey shares. When the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) began to investigate, Big Apple sold its shares for $7.8 million. The SEC filed an action in a federal district court against Big Apple, alleging a violation of the Securities Act of 1933. Can liability be imposed on a seller for a false statement that was made by someone else? Explain. [U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Big Apple Consulting USA, Inc., 783 F.3d 786 (11th Cir. 2015)] (See Securities Act of 1933.)

30–7. The Securities Exchange Act of 1934. Dilean Reyes-Rivera was the president of Global Reach Trading (GRT), a corporation registered in Puerto Rico. His brother Jeffrey was the firm's accountant. Along with GRT sales agents and other promoters, the brothers solicited funds from individuals by promising to invest the funds in low-risk, short-term, high-yield securities. The investors were guaranteed a rate of return of up to 20 percent. Through this arrangement, more than 230 persons provided the brothers with about $22 million. This money was not actually invested. Instead, the funds received from later investors were used to pay "returns" to earlier investors. The Reyes-Riveras spent $4.6 million of the proceeds to buy luxury vehicles, houses, furniture, jewelry, and trips for themselves. What is this type of scheme called? What are the potential consequences? Discuss. [United States v. Reyes-Rivera, 812 F.3d 79 (1st Cir. 2016)] (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934 .)

30–8. Securities Fraud. First Solar, Inc., is one of the world's largest producers of photovoltaic solar panel modules. When First Solar revealed to the market that the company had discovered defects in its products, the price of the company's stock fell, causing the shareholders to suffer an economic loss. Mineworkers' Pension Scheme and other First Solar shareholders filed a suit in a federal district court against the firm and its officers, alleging a violation of Section 10(b). The plaintiffs contended that for more than two years, First Solar had wrongfully concealed its discovery, misrepresented the cost and scope of the defects, and reported false information on financial statements. On these facts, can the plaintiffs successfully plead the causation element of a securities fraud action under Section 10(b)? Explain. [Mineworkers' Pension Scheme. v. First Solar Inc., 881 F.3d 750 (9th Cir. 2018)] (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)

30–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and InsiderTrading. Nan Huang was a senior data analyst for Capital One Financial Corporation. In violation of the company's confidentiality policies, Huang downloaded and analyzed confidential information regarding purchases made with Capital One credit cards at more than 200 consumer retail companies and used that information to conduct more than 2,000 trades in the securities of those companies. Capital One terminated Huang due to his violation of the company's policies. The next day, Huang boarded a flight to his home country of China. Four days later, the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a complaint against Huang, alleging violations of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5. [Securities and Exchange Commission v. Huang, 684 Fed. Appx. 167 (3d Cir. 2017)] (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)

1. Evaluate the ethics of Huang's actions, as an employee of Capital One, using the IDDR approach.
2. When Capital One learned what Huang had done, was the company ethically obligated to terminate him? Explain.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

30–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Violations of Securities Laws. Karel Svoboda, a credit officer for Rogue Bank, evaluated and approved his employer's extensions of credit to clients. These responsibilities gave Svoboda access to nonpublic information about the clients' earnings, performance, acquisitions, and business plans from confidential memos, e-mail, and other sources. Svoboda devised a scheme with Alena Robles, an independent accountant, to use this information to trade securities. Pursuant to their scheme, Robles traded in the securities of more than twenty different companies and profited by more than $2 million. Svoboda also executed trades for his own profit of more than $800,000, despite their agreement that Robles would do all of the trading. Aware that their scheme violated Rogue Bank's policy, they attempted to conduct their trades in such a way as to avoid suspicion. When the bank questioned Svoboda about his actions, he lied, refused to cooperate, and was fired. (See Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)

1. The first group will determine whether Svoboda or Robles committed any crimes.
2. The second group will decide whether Svoboda or Robles is subject to civil liability. If so, who could file a suit and on what ground? What are the possible sanctions?
3. A third group will identify any defenses that Svoboda or Robles could raise and determine whether the defenses would be likely to succeed.

Unit Five—Task-Based Simulation

John leases an office and buys computer equipment. Initially, to pay for the lease and the equipment, he goes into the business of designing applications for smartphones. He also has an idea for a new software product that he hopes will be more profitable than designing apps. Whenever he has time, he works on the software.

1. Selecting a Business Organization. After six months, Mary and Paul come to work in the office to help develop John's idea. John continues to pay the rent and other expenses, including salaries for Mary and Paul. John does not expect to make a profit until the software is developed, which could take months. Even then, there may be very little profit unless the product is marketed successfully. If the software is successful, though, John believes that the firm will be able to follow up with other products. In choosing a form of business organization for this firm, what are the important considerations? What are the advantages and disadvantages of each basic option?
2. Corporate Nature and Classification. It is decided that the organizational form for this firm should provide limited liability for the owners. The owners will include John, Mary, Paul, and some members of their respective families. Limited liability is one of the features of the corporate form. Ordinarily, however, corporate income is taxed at both the corporate level and the shareholder level. Which corporate form could the firm use to avoid this double taxation? Which other forms of business organization provide limited liability? What factors, other than liability and taxation, influence a firm's choice among these forms?
3. Duties of Corporate Directors. The firm is incorporated as Digital Software, Inc. (DSI). The software is developed and marketed successfully, and DSI prospers. John, Mary, and Paul become directors of DSI. At a board meeting, Paul proposes a marketing strategy for DSI's next product, and John and Mary approve it. Implementing the strategy causes DSI's profits to drop. If the shareholders accuse Paul of breaching his fiduciary duty to DSI, what is Paul's most likely defense? If the shareholders accuse John and Mary of the same breach, what is their best defense? In either case, if the shareholders file a suit, how is a court likely to rule?
4. Securities Regulation. Mary and Paul withdraw from DSI to set up their own firm. To obtain operating capital, they solicit investors, who agree to become "general partners." Mary and Paul designate themselves "managing partners." The investors are spread over a wide area geographically and learn about Mary and Paul's business only through contact from Mary and Paul. Are Mary and Paul truly soliciting partners, or are they selling securities? What are the criteria for determining whether an investment is a security? What are the advantages and disadvantages of selling securities versus soliciting partners?

31 Antitrust Law and Promoting Competition

Focus Questions

The six Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is a monopoly? What is market power? How do these concepts relate to each other?
2. What rule do courts apply to price-fixing agreements, and why?
3. What two types of activities are prohibited by Section 2 of the Sherman Act?
4. What are the four major provisions of the Clayton Act, and what types of activities do these provisions prohibit?
5. What agencies of the federal government enforce the federal antitrust laws?
6. When will a U.S. court apply the Sherman Act to foreign persons or entities?

"Competition is not only the basis of protection to the consumer but is the incentive to progress."

Herbert Hoover 1874–1964
(Thirty-first president of the United States, 1929–1933)

The laws regulating economic competition in the United States are referred to as antitrust laws. They include the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890,[1] the Clayton Act,[2] and the Federal Trade Commission Act,[3] passed by Congress to further curb anticompetitive and unfair business practices. Congress later amended these acts to broaden and strengthen their coverage.

The basis of antitrust legislation is our society's desire to foster competition. As President Herbert Hoover said in the chapter-opening quotation, competition not only protects the consumer, but also provides "the incentive to progress." Consumers and society as a whole benefit when producers strive to develop better products that they can sell at lower prices to beat the competition.

How do antitrust laws promote competition? Suppose that Select Seafood Company is one of five major producers of prepackaged seafood in the United States. Casey Bowman, Select's chief executive officer, has been meeting with leaders of the other four producers for the last several years. They discuss market developments, supply issues, and other matters of common interest. But what if they were to agree eventually to work together to control the price of packaged seafood in the United States? Such a price-fixing agreement would be illegal because it would harm competition. If the government found out about it, the firms could be prosecuted under the laws discussed in this chapter.

31–1 The Sherman Antitrust Act

Antitrust Laws Laws protecting commerce from unlawful restraints and anticompetitive practices.

Today's antitrust laws are the direct descendants of common law actions intended to limit restraints of trade (agreements between or among firms that have the effect of reducing competition in the marketplace). Such actions date to the fifteenth century in England.

After the U.S. Civil War (1861–1865), the American public became increasingly concerned about declining competition in the marketplace. Large corporate enterprises were attempting to reduce or eliminate competition by legally tying themselves together in contracts to create business trusts (unincorporated organizations with limited liability). The most powerful of these organizations was the Standard Oil trust.

In 1890, Congress passed "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies"—commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act or, more simply, as the Sherman Act. The Sherman Act became (and still is) one of the government's most powerful weapons in the effort to maintain a competitive economy. The act and the role of the Standard Oil trust in its passage are examined in this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature.

31–1a Major Provisions of the Sherman Act

Sections 1 and 2 contain the main provisions of the Sherman Act:

1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal [and is a felony punishable by a fine and/or imprisonment].

The Sherman Antitrust Act

The author of the Sherman Antitrust Act, Senator John Sherman, was the brother of the famous Civil War general William Tecumseh Sherman and a recognized financial authority. Sherman had been concerned for years about diminishing competition in U.S. industry and the emergence of monopolies, such as the Standard Oil trust.

The Standard Oil Trust By 1890, the Standard Oil trust had become the foremost petroleum refining and marketing combination in the United States. Streamlined, integrated, and centrally controlled, Standard Oil maintained an indisputable monopoly over the industry. The trust controlled 90 percent of the U.S. market for refined petroleum products, making it impossible for small producers to compete.

The increasing consolidation in U.S. industry, and particularly the Standard Oil trust, came to the attention of the public in March 1881. Henry Demarest Lloyd, a young journalist from Chicago, published an article in the Atlantic Monthly entitled "The Story of a Great Monopoly." The article argued that the U.S. petroleum industry was dominated by one firm—Standard Oil. Lloyd's article was so popular that the issue was reprinted six times. It marked the beginning of the U.S. public's growing concern over monopolies.

The Passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act The common law regarding trade regulation was not always consistent. Certainly, it was not very familiar to the members of Congress. The public concern over large business trusts was familiar, however. In 1888, 1889, and again in 1890, Senator Sherman introduced in Congress bills designed to destroy the large combinations of capital that, he felt, were creating imbalance within the nation's economy.

In 1890, the Fifty-First Congress finally enacted the bill into law. Generally, the act prohibits business combinations and conspiracies that restrain trade and commerce, as well as certain monopolistic practices. According to its author, the Sherman Act "does not announce a new principle of law, but applies old and well-recognized principles of the common law."[a]

Application to Today's World The Sherman Antitrust Act remains very relevant to today's world. The U.S. Department of Justice and state attorneys general investigate many complaints and prosecute a number of corporations for Sherman Act violations each year.

Focus Question 1

What is a monopoly? What is market power? How do these concepts relate to each other?

2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony [and is similarly punishable].

31–1b Differences between Section 1 and Section 2

The two sections of the Sherman Act are quite different. Violation of Section 1 requires two or more persons, as a person cannot contract or combine or conspire alone. Thus, the essence of the illegal activity is the act of joining together. Section 2, though, can apply either to one person or to two or more persons because it refers to "every person." Thus, unilateral conduct can result in a violation of Section 2.

It follows that the cases brought under Section 1 of the Sherman Act differ from those brought under Section 2. Section 1 cases are often concerned with finding an agreement (written or oral) that leads to a restraint of trade. Section 2 cases deal with the structure of a monopoly that already exists in the marketplace.

Monopoly A market in which there is a single seller or a very limited number of sellers.

Monopoly Power The ability of a monopoly to dictate what takes place in a given market.

Market Power The power of a firm to control the market price of its product. A monopoly has the greatest degree of market power.

The term monopoly generally is used to describe a market in which there is a single seller or a very limited number of sellers. Whereas Section 1 focuses on agreements that are restrictive—that is, agreements that have a wrongful purpose—Section 2 addresses the misuse of monopoly power in the marketplace. Monopoly power exists when a firm has an extreme amount of market power—the power to affect the market price of its product.

Both Section 1 and Section 2 seek to curtail market practices that result in undesired monopoly pricing and output behavior. For a case to be brought under Section 2, however, the "threshold" or "necessary" amount of monopoly power must already exist. We illustrate the different requirements for violating these two sections of the Sherman Act in Exhibit 31–1.

31–1c Jurisdictional Requirements

The Sherman Act applies only to restraints that have a substantial impact on interstate commerce. Generally, any activity that substantially affects interstate commerce falls within the scope of the Sherman Act. The Sherman Act also extends to U.S. nationals abroad who are engaged in activities that have an effect on U.S. foreign commerce.

Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over antitrust cases brought under the Sherman Act. State laws regulate local restraints on competition, and state courts decide claims brought under those laws.

In the following case, the defendants argued that their bid-rigging scheme did not fall under the Sherman Act because the proof of a connection between the scheme and interstate commerce fell short.

Exhibit 31–1 Required Elements of a Sherman Act Violation

SECTION 1 VIOLATION REQUIREMENTS	SECTION 2 VIOLATION REQUIREMENTS
1. An agreement between two or more parties that 2. unreasonably restrains competition and 3. affects interstate commerce.	1. The possession of monopoly power in the relevant market, and 2. the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

Case 31.1

United States v. Vega-Martínez

United States Court of Appeals, First Circuit, 949 F.3d 43 (2020).

Facts Private bus companies owned by Luciano Vega-Martínez and others provided busing for students to public schools in Caguas, Puerto Rico. The municipality announced that it would hold an auction for four-year school bus transportation contracts. Instead of submitting competing bids, the bus company owners met and agreed to divide up the routes among themselves. For each route, they designated a "winner" whose noncompetitive "low" bid would not be outbid by the others.

Unaware of the bid rigging, the municipality awarded the routes to the "low bidders." When the scheme was revealed, two years into the four-year term of the contracts, the federal government charged the owners of the bus companies with conspiracy to restrain trade in violation of the Sherman Act. A jury convicted the defendants, and a federal district court sentenced them to prison terms and ordered restitution.

Vega-Martínez appealed, contending that the bid rigging did not fall under the Sherman Act because there was insufficient proof of a connection between the scheme and interstate commerce.

Issue Did the defendants' conduct take place in the flow of interstate commerce, or did it substantially affect interstate commerce?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed the trial court's determination. The appellate court also upheld the defendants' convictions, their prison sentences, and the trial court's order for restitution.

Reason The appellate court recognized that the Sherman Act "reaches only activities in the flow of interstate commerce or that, while wholly local in nature, would substantially affect interstate commerce if successful." Bid rigging is a form of price fixing. In such cases, there is "almost surely" an impact on the relevant market and therefore an effect on interstate commerce.

Here, the government provided sufficient evidence to establish a connection between the defendants' activities and interstate commerce "beyond a reasonable doubt." The federal government provided the funds used to pay the conspirators. In the court's estimation, the defendants' "grab" of those funds was alone sufficient to establish an interstate connection, "given that the funds flowed in interstate commerce."

But there was more. The buses that the defendants planned to use for their routes were all bought in Florida. This meant that they "flowed" in interstate commerce. If the prices for the buses increased substantially, the demand for buses would be affected. The court noted, for example, that if the municipality merged bus routes or reduced the services in other ways, the result might be fewer buses bought by local companies from Florida or other states.

"The evidence in total was sufficient to establish a nexus with interstate commerce."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Could the defendants have successfully argued that their agreement to rig bids and allocate the market for public school bus transportation was reasonable, or that it could be justified on an economic or business basis? Explain.
- Economic Following the discovery of the bid-rigging scheme, Caguas held a presumably fair auction to award new school bus transportation contracts. Could the bids in the second auction provide a basis for determining the restitution amounts? Discuss.

31–2 Section 1 of the Sherman Act

The underlying assumption of Section 1 of the Sherman Act is that society's welfare is harmed if rival firms are permitted to join in an agreement that consolidates their market power or otherwise restrains competition. The types of trade restraints that Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits generally fall into two broad categories: horizontal restraints and vertical restraints, both of which will be explained shortly. First, though, we look at the rules that the courts may apply when assessing the anticompetitive impact of alleged restraints on trade.

31–2a Per Se Violations versus the Rule of Reason

Some restraints are so blatantly and substantially anticompetitive that they are deemed a per se* violation—illegal per se (on their face, or inherently)—under Section 1. Other agreements, however, even though they result in enhanced market power, do not unreasonably

Per Se* Violation A restraint of trade that is so anticompetitive that it is deemed inherently (per se) illegal.

Rule of Reason A test used to determine whether an anticompetitive agreement constitutes a reasonable restraint on trade. Courts consider such factors as the purpose of the agreement, its effect on competition, and whether less restrictive means could have been used.

restrain trade. Using what is called the rule of reason, the courts analyze anticompetitive agreements that allegedly violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act to determine whether they actually constitute reasonable restraints on trade.

Why the Rule of Reason Was Developed The need for a rule-of-reason analysis of some agreements in restraint of trade is obvious—if the rule of reason had not been developed, almost any business agreement could conceivably be held to violate the Sherman Act. Justice Louis Brandeis effectively phrased this sentiment in Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, a case decided in 1918:

> Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains. To bind, to restrain, is of their very essence. The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition.[4]

Factors Courts Consider under the Rule of Reason When analyzing an alleged Section 1 violation under the rule of reason, a court will consider the following factors:

1. The purpose of the agreement.
2. The parties' ability to implement the agreement to achieve that purpose.
3. The effect or potential effect of the agreement on competition.
4. Whether the parties could have relied on less restrictive means to achieve their purpose.

Does forcing consumers to buy bundles of cable and satellite channels constitute an antitrust violation?

Spotlight Case Example 31.1 A group of consumers sued NBC Universal, the Walt Disney Company, and other broadcasters, as well as cable and satellite distributors, for antitrust violations. The consumers claimed that the bundling together of high-demand and low-demand television channels in cable and satellite programming packages violates the Sherman Act. Bundling forces consumers to pay for channels they do not watch to have access to channels they watch regularly.

The consumers argued that the defendants, through their control of high-demand programming, exercised market power that made it impossible for any distributor to offer unbundled programs. A federal appellate court ruled in favor of the defendants and dismissed the case. The court reasoned that the bundling of channels does not injure competition and thus does not violate the Sherman Act.[5]

31–2b Horizontal Restraints

Horizontal Restraint Any agreement that restrains competition between rival firms competing in the same market.

The term horizontal restraint is encountered frequently in antitrust law. A horizontal restraint is any agreement that in some way restrains competition between rival firms competing in the same market. Horizontal restraints may include price fixing, group boycotts, market divisions, and trade associations.

Price-Fixing Agreement An agreement between competitors to fix the prices of products or services at a certain level.

Price Fixing Any price-fixing agreement—an agreement among competitors to fix prices—constitutes a per se violation of Section 1. The agreement on price need not be explicit. As long as it restricts output or artificially fixes price, it violates the law.

Classic Case Example 31.2 Independent oil producers in Texas and Louisiana were caught between falling demand due to the Great Depression of the 1930s and increasing supply from newly discovered oil fields in the region. In response to these conditions, a group of major refining companies agreed to buy "distress" gasoline (excess supplies) from the independents so as to dispose of it in an "orderly manner." Although there was no explicit agreement as to price, it was clear that the purpose of the agreement was to limit the supply of gasoline on the market and thereby raise prices.

There may have been good reasons for the agreement. Nonetheless, the United States Supreme Court recognized the potentially adverse effects that such an agreement could have on open and free competition. The Court held that the reasonableness of a price-fixing agreement is never a defense. Any agreement that restricts output or artificially fixes price is a per se violation of Section 1.[6]

Focus Question 2

What rule do courts apply to price-fixing agreements, and why?

Price-fixing cartels (groups) are commonplace in today's business world, particularly among global companies. International price-fixing cartels have been alleged in numerous industries, including air freight, auto parts, computer monitors, digital commerce, and pharmaceuticals. The U.S. government actively pursues companies that it suspects of being involved in price-fixing cartels.

Case Example 31.3 After Amazon released the Kindle e-book reader, it began selling e-book downloads at $9.99 (lower than the actual cost) and made up the difference by selling more Kindles. When the iPad entered the e-book scene, Apple and some book publishers agreed to use Apple's "agency" model, which Apple was already using for games and apps. The agency model allowed the book publishers to set their own prices, while Apple kept 30 percent as a commission.

The U.S. government sued Apple and the publishers for price fixing. Because the publishers involved in the arrangement chose prices that were relatively similar, the government argued that price fixing was evident and "would not have occurred without the conspiracy among the defendants." Ultimately, a federal appellate court held that Apple's agreement with publishers was a per se illegal price-fixing conspiracy. As a result, Apple was ordered to pay $400 million to consumers and $50 million in attorneys' fees.[7]

Group Boycotts A group boycott is an agreement by two or more sellers to refuse to deal with (that is, to boycott) a particular person or firm. Because they involve concerted action, group boycotts have been held to constitute per se violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. To prove a violation of Section 1, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the boycott or joint refusal to deal was undertaken with the intention of eliminating competition or preventing entry into a given market. Most boycotts are illegal. A few types of boycotts, such as group boycotts against a supplier for political reasons, may be protected under the First Amendment right to freedom of expression, however.

Group Boycott An agreement by two or more sellers to refuse to deal with a particular person or firm.

Market Divisions It is a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act for competitors to divide up territories or customers. Example 31.4 Bell TV Basics, Hall Servo Supplies, and Prime Electronics compete against each other in the states of Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma. The three firms agree that Bell will sell products only in Kansas, Hall will sell only in Nebraska, and Prime will sell only in Oklahoma. This concerted action violates Section 1 of the Sherman Act. It reduces marketing costs and allows all three firms (assuming there is no other competition) to raise the price of the goods they sell in their respective states.

The same violation would take place if the three firms divided up their customers by class rather than region. They might agree that Bell would sell only to institutional purchasers (such as governments and schools) in all three states, Hall only to wholesalers, and Prime only to retailers. The result would be the same.

Trade Associations Businesses in the same general industry or profession frequently organize trade associations to pursue common interests. A trade association may engage in various joint activities, such as exchanging information, representing the members' business interests before governmental bodies, conducting advertising campaigns, and setting regulatory standards to govern the industry or profession.

Generally, the rule of reason is applied to many of these horizontal actions. If a court finds that a trade association practice or agreement that restrains trade is sufficiently beneficial both to the association and to the public, it may deem the restraint reasonable.

In concentrated industries, however, trade associations can be, and have been, used as a means to facilitate anticompetitive actions, such as fixing prices or allocating markets. A concentrated industry is one in which either a single firm or a small number of firms control a large percentage of market sales. When trade association agreements have substantially anticompetitive effects, a court will consider them to be in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

Concentrated Industry An industry in which a single firm or a small number of firms control a large percentage of market sales.

31–2c Vertical Restraints

A vertical restraint of trade results from an agreement between firms at different levels in the manufacturing and distribution process. In contrast to horizontal relationships, which occur at the same level of operation, vertical relationships encompass the entire chain of production. The chain of production normally includes the purchase of inventory, basic manufacturing, distribution to wholesalers, and eventual sale of a product at the retail level. When a single firm carries out two or more of the separate functional phases, it is considered to be a vertically integrated firm.

Vertical Restraint A restraint of trade created by an agreement between firms at different levels in the manufacturing and distribution process.

Vertically Integrated Firm A firm that carries out two or more functional phases (manufacturing, distribution, and retailing, for instance) of the chain of production.

Even though firms operating at different functional levels are not in direct competition with one another, they are in competition with other firms. Thus, agreements between firms standing in a vertical relationship may affect competition. Some vertical restraints are per se violations of Section 1. Others are judged under the rule of reason.

Territorial or Customer Restrictions In arranging for the distribution of its products, a manufacturing firm often wishes to insulate dealers from direct competition with other dealers selling the product. To do so, it may institute territorial restrictions or attempt to prohibit wholesalers or retailers from reselling the product to certain classes of buyers, such as competing retailers.

May Have Legitimate Purpose. A firm may have legitimate reasons for imposing such territorial or customer restrictions. For instance, an electronics manufacturer may wish to prevent a dealer from reducing costs and undercutting rivals by offering the manufacturer's products without promotion or customer service. In this situation, the cost-cutting dealer reaps the benefits (sales of the product) paid for by other dealers who undertake promotion and arrange for customer service. By not providing customer service (and relying on a nearby dealer to provide the service), the cost-cutting dealer may also harm the manufacturer's reputation.

Judged under the Rule of Reason. Territorial and customer restrictions were once considered per se violations of Section 1. In 1977, however the United States Supreme Court held that they should be judged under the rule of reason. Classic Case Example 31.5 The Supreme Court case involved GTE Sylvania, Inc., a manufacturer of television sets. Sylvania limited the number of retail franchises that it granted in any given geographic area. It also required each franchise to sell only Sylvania products from that location.

Sylvania retained sole discretion to increase the number of retailers in an area. When the company decided to open a new franchise, it terminated the franchise of Continental T.V., Inc. Continental sued, claiming that Sylvania's vertically restrictive franchise system violated

Section 1. The Supreme Court found that "vertical restrictions promote interbrand competition by allowing the manufacturer to achieve certain efficiencies in the distribution of his products." Therefore, Sylvania's vertical system, which was not price restrictive, did not constitute a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.[8]

The decision in the Continental case marked a definite shift from rigid characterization of these kinds of vertical restraints to a more flexible, economic analysis under the rule of reason. A firm may have legitimate reasons for imposing territorial or customer restrictions, and not all such restrictions harm competition.

Resale Price Maintenance Agreements An agreement between a manufacturer and a distributor or retailer in which the manufacturer specifies what the retail prices of its products must be is referred to as a resale price maintenance agreement. Such agreements were also once considered to be per se violations of the Sherman Act.

Resale Price Maintenance Agreement An agreement between a manufacturer and a retailer in which the manufacturer specifies what the retail prices of its products must be.

Today, however, both maximum resale price maintenance agreements and minimum resale price maintenance agreements are judged under the rule of reason.[9] The setting of a maximum—or a minimum—price that retailers and distributors can charge for a manufacturer's products may sometimes increase competition and benefit consumers.

31–3 Section 2 of the Sherman Act

Focus Question 3

What two types of activities are prohibited by Section 2 of the Sherman Act?

Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits certain concerted activities that restrain trade. In contrast, Section 2 condemns "every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize." Thus, two distinct types of behavior are subject to sanction under Section 2: monopolization and attempts to monopolize.

One tactic that may be involved in either offense is predatory pricing. Predatory pricing involves an attempt by one firm to drive its competitors from the market by selling its product at prices substantially below the normal costs of production. Once the competitors are eliminated, the firm will presumably attempt to recapture its losses and go on to earn higher profits by driving prices up far above their competitive levels.

Predatory Pricing The pricing of a product below cost with the intent to drive competitors out of the market.

31–3a Monopolization

The United States Supreme Court has defined the offense of monopolization as involving two elements:

1. The possession of monopoly power in the relevant market.
2. "The willful acquisition or maintenance of [that] power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident."[10]

Monopolization The possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power, as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

To establish a violation of Section 2, a plaintiff must prove both of these elements—monopoly power and an intent to monopolize.

Defining Monopoly Power The Sherman Act does not define monopoly. In economic theory, monopoly refers to control of a single market by a single entity. It is well established in antitrust law, however, that a firm may be deemed a monopolist even though it is not the sole seller in a market.

Additionally, size alone does not determine whether a firm is a monopoly. For instance, a "mom and pop" grocery located in an isolated town is a monopolist if it is the only grocery serving that particular market. Size in relation to the market is what matters, because monopoly involves the power to affect prices.

Proving Monopoly Power Monopoly power may be proved by direct evidence that the firm used its power to control prices and restrict output. Usually, though, there is not enough evidence to show that the firm was intentionally controlling prices, so the plaintiff has to offer indirect, or circumstantial, evidence of monopoly power.

To prove monopoly power indirectly, the plaintiff must show that the firm has a dominant share of the relevant market and that there are significant barriers for new competitors entering that market. A plaintiff must also show that the relevant market is a market capable of being monopolized. Case Example 31.6 Global distribution systems (GDSs) are electronic networks that travel agents use to book flights for their clients. Sabre Holding Corporation dominates the GDS market to the extent that travel agents have little choice but to use its platforms. Taking advantage of this position, Sabre negotiated highly favorable agreements with the airlines. US Airways, Inc., a Sabre client, sued the company for illegally monopolizing the travel-agent GDS market in violation of Section 2. A district court dismissed the lawsuit, noting that Sabre was the only company that offered its specific services to travel agents. Thus, it could not, wrongly monopolize a market that was limited to its own customers.

VGstockstudio/Shutterstock.com

Under what circumstances can a company that offers a single product or service, such as booking networks for travel agents, be considered a "relevant market" under Section 2 of the Sherman Act?

A federal appellate court disagreed, holding that "a single brand of a product or service" can be a relevant market for antitrust purposes when no substitute exists for that product or service. In other words, it was possible that travel agents—and airlines—were unfairly "locked into" working with Sabre. Therefore, the court ruled US Airways (which later merged with American Airlines) should be given the chance to prove that Sabre was operating as an illegal monopoly in this instance.[11]

Relevant Market Before a court can determine whether a firm has a dominant market share, it must define the relevant market. The relevant market consists of two elements: a relevant product market and a relevant geographic market.

Relevant Product Market. The relevant product market includes all products that, although produced by different firms, have identical attributes—for example, tea. It also includes reasonably interchangeable products. Products are considered reasonably interchangeable if consumers treat them as acceptable substitutes (coffee may be substituted for tea, for instance).

Establishing the relevant product market is often a key issue in monopolization cases because the way the market is defined may determine whether a firm has monopoly power. When the product market is defined narrowly, the degree of a firm's market power appears greater. Example 31.7 White Whale Apps acquires Springleaf Apps, its main competitor in nationwide Android-based mobile phone apps. White Whale maintains that the relevant product market consists of all online retailers of mobile phone apps. The Federal Trade Commission (FTC), however, argues that the relevant product market consists of retailers that sell only apps for Android mobile phones. Under the FTC's narrower definition, White Whale can be seen to have a dominant share of the relevant product market. Thus, the FTC can take appropriate actions against White Whale.

Relevant Geographic Market. The second component of the relevant market is the market's geographic extent. For products that are sold nationwide, the geographic market encompasses the entire United States. If transportation costs are significant or a producer and its competitors sell in only a limited area (one in which customers have no access to other sources of the product), the geographic market is limited to that area. A national firm may thus compete in several distinct areas and have monopoly power in one area but not in another.

Generally, the geographic market is that section of the country within which a firm can increase its price a bit without attracting new sellers or losing many customers to alternative suppliers outside that area. Of course, the Internet and e-commerce are changing the notion of the size and limits of a geographic market. It may become difficult to perceive any geographic market as local, except for products that are not easily transported, such as concrete.

The Intent Requirement Monopoly power, in and of itself, does not constitute the offense of monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The offense also requires an intent to monopolize.

A dominant market share may be the result of business acumen or the development of a superior product. It may simply be the result of a historic accident. In these situations, the acquisition of monopoly power is not an antitrust violation. Indeed, it would be contrary to society's interest to condemn every firm that acquired a position of power because it was well managed and efficient, and marketed a product desired by consumers.

In contrast, if a firm possesses market power as a result of carrying out some purposeful act to acquire or maintain that power through anticompetitive means, then it is in violation of Section 2. In most monopolization cases, intent may be inferred from evidence that the firm had monopoly power and engaged in anticompetitive behavior.

Know This
Section 2 of the Sherman Act essentially condemns the act of monopolizing, not the possession of monopoly power.

Unilateral Refusals to Deal As discussed previously, joint refusals to deal (group boycotts) are subject to close scrutiny under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. A single manufacturer acting unilaterally, though, normally is free to deal, or not to deal, with whomever it wishes.

Nevertheless, in some instances, a unilateral refusal to deal will violate Section 2 of the Sherman Act. These instances occur only if (1) the firm refusing to deal has—or is likely to acquire—monopoly power and (2) the refusal is likely to have an anticompetitive effect on a particular market.

Example 31.8 Clark Industries, the owner of three of the four major downhill ski areas in Blue Hills, Idaho, refuses to continue participating in a jointly offered six-day "all Blue Hills" lift ticket. Clark's refusal to cooperate with its smaller competitor is a violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Because Clark owns three-fourths of the local ski areas, it has monopoly power. Thus, its unilateral refusal to deal has an anticompetitive effect on the market. ■

Attempted Monopolization An action by a firm that involves anticompetitive conduct, the intent to gain monopoly power, and a "dangerous probability" of success in achieving monopoly power.

31–3b Attempts to Monopolize

Section 2 also prohibits attempted monopolization of a market, which requires proof of the following three elements:

1. Anticompetitive conduct.
2. The specific intent to exclude competitors and garner monopoly power.
3. A "dangerous" probability of success in achieving monopoly power. The probability is not dangerous unless the alleged offender possesses some degree of market power. Only serious threats of monopolization are condemned as violations.

31–4 The Clayton Act

Focus Question 4

What are the four major provisions of the Clayton Act, and what types of activities do these provisions prohibit?

In 1914, Congress attempted to strengthen federal antitrust laws by enacting the Clayton Act. The act was aimed at specific anticompetitive or monopolistic practices that the Sherman Act did not cover. The substantive provisions of the act deal with four distinct forms of business behavior, which are declared illegal but not criminal. In each instance, the act states that the behavior is illegal only if it tends to substantially lessen competition or to create monopoly power. The major offenses under the Clayton Act are set out in Sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of the act.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Big Tech's Monopoly Problem

Traditionally, the tripwire for antitrust action has been price. In other words, a company begins to draw scrutiny from federal regulators when its market power grows to a point that would allow it to harm consumers by charging unfairly high prices for its goods or services.

Today's largest tech companies (Big Tech), however, provide many of their most popular services at a zero price, in exchange for data rather than money. Thus, consumers do not pay to search the Internet on Google, or to stay in touch with friends on Facebook, or to download many free apps from Apple.

Yet these Big Tech companies are being investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission for violating antitrust law. Why?

Dominating Many Markets

The answer lies in concerns about size and anticompetitive tendencies. Alphabet, the parent company of Google, has acquired more than two hundred startups—including YouTube, Android, and Waze—and dominates the online advertising and mapping industries. Facebook was allowed to purchase its two main social networking rivals, Instagram and WhatsApp, without any antitrust consequences. Amazon owns one of the biggest e-commerce marketplaces in the world and also sells products on it.

Smaller competitors have filed numerous lawsuits against Big Tech for anticompetitive practices, such as knowingly violating patents, engaging in unfair business negotiations, and manipulating results on search engines.

Amazon, in particular, has come under criticism for its ability to "out-discount" its competitors and become the dominant force in any market it enters. Notoriously, Amazon engaged in a price war with Diapers.com, dropping the price of Amazon diapers to the point at which the smaller company could no longer compete and was acquired—by Amazon.

Forced Breakups?

Politicians and antimonopoly activists have devised several strategies to limit the reach of Big Tech. One proposed law would ban companies with market values of more than $100 billion from acquiring any other companies.

Another possible law would prohibit any company with annual global revenues of more than $25 billion from owning a platform and doing business on that platform. Such a restriction would require Amazon to "spin off" its brands, such as Amazon Basics, and would require Apple to sell its apps, such as Mail and Maps. For the industry's fiercest critics, there is only one solution: forced breakups, turning these few giant tech companies into many smaller companies, as happened to the telephone industry in the 1980s.

Critical Thinking

Given that consumers seem to benefit from the free or low-cost services provided by Big Tech, should these companies have limits placed on them by federal antitrust regulators? Explain your answer.

31–4a Section 2—Price Discrimination

Price Discrimination A seller's act of charging competing buyers different prices for identical products or services.

Section 2 of the Clayton Act prohibits price discrimination, which occurs when a seller charges different prices to competing buyers for identical goods or services. Congress strengthened this section by amending it in 1936 with the passage of the Robinson-Patman Act. As amended, Section 2 prohibits price discrimination that cannot be justified by differences in production costs, transportation costs, or cost differences due to other reasons.

Requirements To violate Section 2, the seller must be engaged in interstate commerce, the goods must be of like grade and quality, and the goods must have been sold to two or more purchasers. In addition, the effect of the price discrimination must be to substantially lessen competition, tend to create a monopoly, or otherwise injure competition. Without proof of an actual injury resulting from the price discrimination, the plaintiff cannot recover damages.

Price discrimination claims can arise from discounts, offsets, rebates, or allowances given to one buyer over another. Giving favorable credit terms, delivery, or freight charges to only some buyers can also lead to allegations of price discrimination. For instance, in some circumstances, offering goods to different customers at the same price but including free delivery only for some of the customers may violate Section 2.

Defenses There are several statutory defenses to liability for price discrimination.

1. Cost justification. If the seller can justify the price reduction by demonstrating that a particular buyer's purchases saved the seller costs in producing and selling the goods, the seller will not be liable for price discrimination.
2. Meeting competitor's prices. If the seller charged the lower price in a good-faith attempt to meet an equally low price of a competitor, the seller will not be liable for price discrimination. Example 31.9 Rogue, Inc., is a retail dealer of Mercury Marine outboard motors in Shady Cove, Oregon. Mercury Marine also sells its motors to other dealers in the Shady Cove area. When Rogue discovers that Mercury is selling its outboard motors at a substantial discount to Rogue's largest competitor, it files a price discrimination lawsuit. Mercury Marine can defend itself by showing that the discounts given to Rogue's competitor were made in good faith to meet the low price charged by another manufacturer of marine motors. ■
3. Changing market conditions. A seller may lower its price on an item in response to changing conditions affecting the market for or the marketability of the goods concerned. Sellers are allowed to readjust their prices to meet the realities of the market without liability for price discrimination. Thus, if an advance in technology makes a particular product less marketable than it was previously, a seller can lower the product's price.

State Laws Concerning Price Discrimination Some states have enacted statutes to prohibit price discrimination, which can apply in addition to the Clayton Act. For instance, a state statute may apply when a business sells goods or services at different prices to buyers in different locations within the state. Some of these laws protect specific businesses, such as auto dealerships, from discriminatory wholesale or incentive pricing.

Other state laws protect businesses and consumers from economic injuries caused by wrongful business practices. These include unfair competition statutes. In the following case, a state court considered whether an allegation of age-based price discrimination in violation of the state's civil rights statute could support a claim for a violation of the state's unfair competition statute.

Candelore v. Tinder, Inc.

California Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, 19 Cal.App.5th 1138, 228 Cal.Rptr.3d 336 (2018).

Facts Tinder, Inc., owns and operates the dating app Tinder. The free version of Tinder presents users with photos of potential dates. When a photo appears on the device's screen, the user can swipe right to express approval, or swipe left to express disapproval. The premium service, Tinder Plus, allows users to access additional features of the app for a monthly fee. Tinder charges consumers who are age thirty and older $19.99 per month for Tinder Plus, while it charges consumers under the age of thirty only $9.99 or $14.99 per month for the Tinder Plus features.

On behalf of consumers who were over age thirty when they subscribed to Tinder Plus, Allan Candelore filed a suit in a California state court against Tinder, Inc. Candelore alleged age-based price discrimination in violation of California's civil rights statute, which prohibits arbitrary discrimination by businesses on the basis of personal characteristics, and the state's unfair competition law (UCL). The court concluded that the company's age-based pricing model was justified by public policies that promote "profit maximization by the vendor, a legitimate goal in our capitalistic economy." Candelore appealed.

Issue Can an allegation of age-based price discrimination in violation of the state's civil rights statute support a claim for a violation of the state's unfair competition statute?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the judgment of the lower court. "Tinder's alleged discriminatory pricing model violates the public policy embodied in the [civil rights statute, and] the UCL . . . provides an independent basis for relief on the facts alleged."

Reason Society's interest in increasing the use, of a premium online dating app by persons under thirty is not compelling enough to justify discriminatory age-based pricing. Users over thirty who are less economically advantaged could be excluded from enjoying the same premium app. Maximizing profits can be an acceptable business objective that can be advanced by price discrimination. But this goal is no excuse for a prohibited discriminatory policy. Tinder's pricing model discriminates against users over the age of thirty. The complaint alleges a sufficient claim for age discrimination in violation of the state's civil rights statute. The UCL prohibits unfair competition, which includes any unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent business practice. The violation of any law can serve as the basis for a violation of the UCL. Because the complaint adequately states a claim for a violation of the civil rights statute, the allegations are sufficient to state a claim under the UCL.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment A California statute provides for the waiver of fees at state university campuses for senior citizens. What distinguishes this differential treatment from the discriminatory practice at issue in the Candelore case?
- Economic Instead of personal characteristics such as age, could a business like Tinder use economic distinctions to broaden its user base and increase profits? Discuss.

31–4b Section 3—Exclusionary Practices

Under Section 3 of the Clayton Act, sellers or lessors cannot condition the sale or lease of goods on the buyer's or lessee's promise not to use or deal in the goods of the seller's competitor. In effect, this section prohibits two types of vertical agreements involving exclusionary practices—exclusive-dealing contracts and tying arrangements.

Exclusive-Dealing Contract An agreement under which a seller forbids a buyer to purchase products from the seller's competitors.

Exclusive-Dealing Contracts A contract under which a seller forbids a buyer to purchase products from the seller's competitors is called an exclusive-dealing contract. A seller is prohibited from making an exclusive-dealing contract under Section 3 if the effect of the contract is "to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly."

Classic Case Example 31.10 In a case decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1949, Standard Oil Company, the largest gasoline seller in the nation at that time, made exclusive-dealing contracts with independent stations in seven western states. The contracts involved 16 percent of all retail outlets, with sales amounting to approximately 7 percent of all retail sales in that market. The market was substantially concentrated because the seven largest gasoline suppliers all used exclusive-dealing contracts with their independent retailers. Together, these suppliers controlled 65 percent of the market.

The Court looked at market conditions after the arrangements were instituted and found that market shares were extremely stable and entry into the market was apparently restricted. Because competition was "foreclosed in a substantial share" of the relevant market, the Court held that Section 3 of the Clayton Act had been violated.[12]

Note that since the Supreme Court's 1949 decision, a number of subsequent decisions have called the holding in this case into doubt.[13]

Today, it is clear that to violate antitrust law, an exclusive-dealing agreement (or a tying arrangement, discussed next) must qualitatively and substantially harm competition. To prevail, a plaintiff must present affirmative evidence that the performance of the agreement will foreclose competition and harm consumers.

Tying Arrangements When a seller conditions the sale of a product (the tying product) on the buyer's agreement to purchase another product (the tied product) produced or distributed by the same seller, a tying arrangement results. The legality of a tying arrangement (or tie-in sales agreement) depends on many factors, particularly the purpose of the agreement and its likely effect on competition in the relevant markets (the market for the tying product and the market for the tied product).

Tying Arrangement A seller's act of conditioning the sale of a product or service on the buyer's agreement to purchase another product or service from the seller.

Section 3 of the Clayton Act has been held to apply only to commodities, not to services. Some tying arrangements, however, can also be considered agreements that restrain trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Thus, cases involving tying arrangements of services have been brought under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Although earlier cases condemned tying arrangements as illegal per se, courts now evaluate tying agreements under the rule of reason.

Case Example 31.11 The city of LaGrange, Georgia, was the only provider of water and natural gas services to much of unincorporated Troup County. LaGrange passed an ordinance requiring that all new construction in this area install gas appliances in order to receive water service from the city. In response, Diverse Power, a local, private electric company, filed a suit against LaGrange, alleging that the ordinance constituted an unlawful tying arrangement. That is, Troup County residents who needed water (the tying product) were forced to use natural gas (the tied product) instead of electricity offered by Diverse Power.

LaGrange did not deny that it had created a tying arrangement. Rather, the city argued that, as a government entity, it was exempt from federal antitrust law. Disagreeing, a federal appellate court noted that, by this logic, LaGrange could pass an anticompetitive ordinance covering any product—from natural gas service to the "purchase of Goodyear tires"—as long as it was tied to the city's legal water-services monopoly. Not wishing to grant LaGrange "powers so unlimited," the court allowed Diverse Power's lawsuit to proceed.[14]

NarisaFotoSS/Shutterstock.com

Why might a private electric company succeed in a lawsuit against a city that has "tied" its water and natural gas services?

31–4c Section 7—Mergers

Under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, a person or business organization cannot hold stock or assets in another entity "where the effect … may be to substantially lessen competition." Section 7 is the statutory authority for preventing mergers or acquisitions that could result in monopoly power or a substantial lessening of competition in the marketplace.

Market Concentration A crucial consideration in most merger cases is the market concentration of a product or business. Determining market concentration involves allocating percentage market shares among the various companies in the relevant market. When a small number of companies control a large share of the market, the market is concentrated.

Market Concentration The degree to which a small number of firms control a large percentage of a relevant market.

Example 31.12 If the four largest grocery stores in Chicago account for 80 percent of all retail food sales, the market is concentrated in those four firms. If one of these stores absorbs the assets and liabilities of another, so that the other ceases to exist, the result is a merger that further concentrates the market and possibly diminishes competition.

Competition is not necessarily diminished solely as a result of market concentration, and courts will consider other factors in determining whether a merger will violate Section 7. One factor of particular importance in evaluating the effects of a merger is whether the merger will make it more difficult for potential competitors to enter the relevant market.

Horizontal Merger A merger between two firms that are competing in the same market.

Horizontal Mergers

A merger between firms that compete with each other in the same market is called a horizontal merger. If a horizontal merger creates an entity with a significant market share, the merger will be presumed illegal because it increases market concentration. The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) and the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) have established guidelines for determining which mergers will actually be challenged. The guidelines focus on whether a merger will substantially lessen competition.

When analyzing the legality of a horizontal merger, the courts also consider three other factors: the overall concentration of the relevant product market, the relevant market's history of tending toward concentration, and whether the merger is apparently designed to establish market power or to restrict competition.

Vertical Merger The acquisition by a company at one stage of production of a company at a higher or lower stage of production (such as a company merging with one of its suppliers or retailers).

Vertical Mergers

A vertical merger occurs when a company at one stage of production acquires a company at a higher or lower stage of production. An example of a vertical merger is a company merging with one of its suppliers or retailers.

Whether a vertical merger is illegal generally depends on several factors, such as whether the merger would produce a firm controlling an undue proportion of the relevant market. The courts also analyze the concentration of firms in the market, barriers to entry into the market, and the apparent intent of the merging parties. A vertical merger is unlawful if it prevents competitors of either merging firm from competing in a segment of the market that otherwise would be open to them, resulting in a substantial lessening of competition.

31–4d Section 8—Interlocking Directorates

Section 8 of the Clayton Act deals with interlocking directorates—that is, the practice whereby individuals serve as directors on the boards of two or more competing companies simultaneously. Specifically, no person may be a director in two or more competing corporations at the same time if either of the corporations has capital, surplus, or undivided profits aggregating more than $38,204,000 or competitive sales of $3,820,400 or more. (The FTC adjusts the threshold amounts each year. The amounts given here are those announced by the FTC in 2020.)

The reasoning behind the FTC's prohibition of interlocking directorates is that if two competing businesses share the same officers and directors, the firms are unlikely to compete with one another, or to compete aggressively. If directors or officers do not comply with this prohibition, they may be liable under the Clayton Act.

Focus Question 5

What agencies of the federal government enforce the federal antitrust laws?

31–5 Enforcement and Exemptions

The federal agencies that enforce the federal antitrust laws are the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) and the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). The FTC was established in 1914 by the Federal Trade Commission Act. Section 5 of that act condemns all forms of anticompetitive behavior that are not covered under other federal antitrust laws.

31–5a Enforcement by Federal Agencies

Only the DOJ can prosecute violations of the Sherman Act, which may be either criminal or civil offenses. Violations of the Clayton Act are not crimes, but the act can be enforced by either the DOJ or the FTC through civil proceedings.

The DOJ or the FTC may ask the courts to impose various remedies, including divestiture (making a company give up one or more of its operating functions) and dissolution. A meatpacking firm, for instance, might be forced to divest itself of control or ownership of butcher shops.

Divestiture A company's sale of one or more of its divisions' operating functions under court order as part of the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

The FTC has sole authority to enforce violations of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. FTC actions are effected through administrative orders, but if a firm violates an FTC order, the FTC can seek court sanctions for the violation.

Know This

Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act is broader than the other antitrust laws. It covers nearly all anticompetitive behavior, including conduct that does not violate either the Sherman Act or the Clayton Act.

31–5b Actions by Private Parties

A private party who has been injured as a result of a violation of the Sherman Act or the Clayton Act can sue for treble damages (three times the actual damages suffered) and attorneys' fees. In some instances, private parties may also seek injunctive relief to prevent antitrust violations. A party wishing to sue under the Sherman Act must prove the following:

1. The antitrust violation either caused or was a substantial factor in causing the injury that was suffered.
2. The unlawful actions of the accused party affected business activities of the plaintiff that were protected by the antitrust laws.

Treble Damages Damages that, by statute, are three times the amount of actual damages suffered.

Additionally, a great deal of case law has established that to pursue antitrust lawsuits, private parties must present some evidence suggesting that an illegal agreement was made.[15]

A private party can bring an action under Section 2 of the Sherman Act based on the attempted enforcement of a fraudulently obtained patent. Such an action is called a Walker Process claim.[16] To prevail, the plaintiff must first show that the defendant obtained the patent by committing fraud against the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and enforced the patent with knowledge of the fraud. The plaintiff must then establish all the other elements of a Sherman Act monopolization claim—anticompetitive conduct, an intent to monopolize, and a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.

In the following case, a respiratory filter maker was accused of patent infringement. The maker sought a declaratory judgment of noninfringement, asserting a Walker Process claim. One of the primary issues was whether attorneys' fees were an appropriate basis for damages.

15. See Viamedia, Inc. v. Comcast Corp., 951 F.3d. 429 (7th Cir. 2020).
16. The name of the claim comes from the title of the case in which the claim originated—Walker Process Equipment v. Food Machine and Chemical Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 86 S.Ct. 347, 15 L.Ed.2d 247 (1965).

Case 31.3

TransWeb, LLC v. 3M Innovative Properties Co.

United States Court of Appeals, Federal Circuit, 812 F.3d 1295 (2016).

Facts TransWeb, LLC, manufactures respirator filters made of nonwoven fibrous material to be worn by workers at contaminated work sites. At a filtration industry exposition, TransWeb's founder, Kumar Ogale, handed out samples of TransWeb's filter material. At the time, 3M Innovative Products Company was experimenting with filter materials. At the expo, 3M employees obtained the TransWeb samples.

Continued

More than a year later, 3M obtained patents for its filter products and filed a suit against TransWeb, claiming infringement. 3M asserted that it had not received the TransWeb samples until after its patent application had been filed. The suit was dismissed.

TransWeb then filed a suit in a federal district court, seeking a declaratory judgment of noninfringement and asserting a Walker Process claim. A jury found that 3M had obtained its patents through fraud, that its assertion of the patents against TransWeb violated antitrust law, and that TransWeb was entitled to attorneys' fees as damages. TransWeb had incurred $7.7 million in fees defending against 3M's infringement suit. The court trebled this to $23 million. 3M appealed.

Issue Can a court award treble damages based on the amount of attorneys' fees that the plaintiff incurred?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment and award of trebled attorneys' fees.

Reason The court reasoned that 3M's unlawful act was the bringing of a suit based on a patent known to be fraudulently obtained. What made this act unlawful under the antitrust laws was its attempt to gain a monopoly based on this fraudulently obtained patent. "TransWeb's attorney fees flow directly from this unlawful aspect of 3M's act." Thus, the court concluded, they "are an antitrust injury that can properly serve as the basis for antitrust damages."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment How would TransWeb's injury have been "shared by all consumers in the relevant markets" if TransWeb had not sued until after it had been driven out of those markets by 3M's actions?
- Ethical What does 3M's conduct suggest about its corporate ethics?

31–5c Exemptions from Antitrust Laws

There are many legislative and constitutional limitations on antitrust enforcement. Most are statutory or judicially created exemptions applying to the areas listed in Exhibit 31–2. One of the most significant exemptions covers joint efforts by businesspersons to obtain legislative, judicial, or executive action. Under this exemption, for instance, Blu-ray producers can jointly lobby Congress to change the copyright laws without being held liable for attempting to restrain trade.

31–6 U.S. Antitrust Laws in the Global Context

Focus Question 6

When will a U.S. court apply the Sherman Act to foreign persons or entities?

U.S. antitrust laws have a broad application. Not only may persons in foreign nations be subject to their provisions, but the laws may also be applied to protect foreign consumers and competitors from violations committed by U.S. business firms. Consequently, foreign persons—a term that by definition includes foreign governments—may sue under U.S. antitrust laws in U.S. courts.

31–6a The Extraterritorial Application of U.S. Antitrust Laws

The United States is a major proponent of free competition in the global economy. Accordingly, Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides for the extraterritorial effect of the U.S. antitrust laws. Any conspiracy that has a substantial effect on U.S. commerce is within the reach of the Sherman Act. The violation may even occur outside the United States, and foreign persons, including governments, can be sued for violation of U.S. antitrust laws.

Before U.S. courts will exercise jurisdiction and apply antitrust laws, it must be shown that the alleged violation had a substantial effect on U.S. commerce. U.S. jurisdiction is automatically invoked, however, when a per se violation occurs. If a domestic firm, for instance, joins a foreign cartel to control the production, price, or distribution of goods, and this cartel has a substantial effect on U.S. commerce, a per se violation may arise. Hence, both the domestic firm and the foreign cartel could be sued for violation of the U.S. antitrust laws.

Exhibit 31–2 Exemptions to Antitrust Enforcement

EXEMPTION	SOURCE AND SCOPE
Labor	Clayton Act—Permits unions to organize and bargain without violating antitrust laws and specifies that strikes and other labor activities normally do not violate any federal law.
Agricultural associations	Clayton Act and Capper-Volstead Act—Allow agricultural cooperatives to set prices.
Fisheries	Fishery Cooperative Marketing Act—Allows the fishing industry to set prices.
Insurance companies	McCarran-Ferguson Act—Exempts the insurance business in states in which the industry is regulated.
Exporters	Webb-Pomerene Act—Allows U.S. exporters to engage in cooperative activity to compete with similar foreign associations. Export Trading Company Act—Permits the U.S. Department of Justice to exempt certain exporters.
Professional baseball	The United States Supreme Court has held that professional baseball is exempt because it is not "interstate commerce."
Oil marketing	Interstate Oil Compact—Allows states to set quotas on oil to be marketed in interstate commerce.
Defense activities	Defense Production Act—Allows the president to approve, and thereby exempt, certain activities to further the military defense of the United States.
Small businesses' cooperative research	Small Business Administration Act—Allows small firms to undertake cooperative research.
State actions	The United States Supreme Court has held that actions by a state are exempt if the state clearly articulates and actively supervises the policy behind its action.
Regulated industries	Industries (such as airlines) are exempt when a federal administrative agency (such as the Federal Aviation Administration) has primary regulatory authority.
Businesspersons' joint efforts to seek government action	Cooperative efforts by businesspersons to obtain legislative, judicial, or executive action are exempt unless it is clear that an effort is "objectively baseless" and is an attempt to make anticompetitive use of government processes.

Likewise, if a foreign firm doing business in the United States enters into a price-fixing or other anticompetitive agreement to control a portion of U.S. markets, a per se violation may exist. This may be true even if a foreign law directly conflicts with U.S. antitrust law.

Case Example 31.13 Science Products, Inc., and The Ranis Company, Inc., were U.S. companies that imported large amounts of vitamin C. These companies filed a lawsuit against four Chinese manufacturers that collectively controlled over 60 percent of the world's vitamin C market, alleging a conspiracy to fix prices and manipulate output in the United States in violation of the Sherman Act.

The defendants did not dispute these allegations. Instead, they claimed that they had acted in accordance with Chinese government regulations, and that their actions were therefore beyond the reach of the American legal system. An appellate court agreed and overturned the decision of the district court, which had ruled in favor of the plaintiffs and awarded them approximately $147 million in damages. The United States Supreme Court, in turn, reversed the appellate court, stating that American judges should "carefully consider" a foreign country's laws and views but should not allow those factors to fully decide the matter. In this case, the Court found that evidence of the defendants' price fixing was persuasive, regardless of the policy goals of the Chinese government.[17]

Can a Chinese company that is required by its government to fix the prices of vitamin C in the United States be exempted from U.S. antitrust law? Why or why not?

31–6b The Application of Foreign Antitrust Laws

Large U.S. companies increasingly must be concerned about the application of foreign antitrust laws as well. The European Union (EU), in particular, has stepped up its enforcement actions against antitrust violators. The EU's laws promoting competition are stricter in many respects than those of the United States and define more conduct as anticompetitive. Microsoft, Apple, and Amazon have been investigated, and sometimes fined, by the EU's Competitive Commission, but the main target of European antitrust efforts has been Google.

After years of investigations, the EU found that Google had (1) abused its dominant position in the search engine market by promoting its own services over those of its rivals, (2) used its ownership of the Android operating system to illegally keep other smartphone manufacturers out of the market, and (3) forced websites that want to use Google's search bar to favor ads run by Google's advertising clients. The EU imposed a combined $9.5 billion in antitrust fines against Google because of these infractions.

Along with Facebook, Google has also been the focus of billions of dollars in lawsuits under a set of European privacy rules called the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR). These rules are designed to limit the amount of personal data that large technology companies can collect without the consent of users.

In the past, the EU was sometimes faulted for unfairly victimizing technology companies from the United States. Today, the EU's efforts are viewed as potential models for American antitrust efforts in this field, discussed earlier in the chapter.

Practice and Review

The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN) is a nonprofit entity that organizes Internet domain names. It is governed by a board of directors elected by various groups with commercial interests in the Internet. One of ICANN's functions is to authorize an entity to serve as a registrar for certain top-level domains (TLDs). ICANN entered into an agreement with VeriSign to provide registry services for the ".com" TLD in accordance with ICANN's specifications. VeriSign complained that ICANN was restricting the services that VeriSign could make available as a registrar, blocking new services, imposing unnecessary conditions on those services, and setting the prices at which the services were offered. VeriSign claimed that ICANN's control of the registry services for domain names violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Should ICANN's actions be judged under the rule of reason or be deemed a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act? Explain.
2. Should ICANN's actions be viewed as a horizontal or a vertical restraint of trade? Explain.
3. Does it matter that ICANN's directors are chosen by groups with commercial interests in the Internet? Why or why not?
4. If the dispute is judged under the rule of reason, what might be ICANN's defense for having a standardized set of registry services that must be used?

Chapter Summary: Antitrust Law and Promoting Competition

The Sherman Antitrust Act (1890)	1. Major provisions— a. Section 1—Prohibits contracts, combinations, and conspiracies in restraint of trade. (1) Horizontal restraints subject to Section 1 include price-fixing agreements, group boycotts (joint refusals to deal), horizontal market divisions, and certain trade association agreements. (2) Vertical restraints subject to Section 1 include territorial or customer restrictions and resale price maintenance agreements. b. Section 2—Prohibits monopolies and attempts to monopolize. 2. Jurisdictional requirements—The Sherman Act applies only to activities that have a significant impact on interstate commerce and those that affect U.S. foreign commerce. 3. Interpretive rules— a. Per se rule—Applied to restraints on trade that are so inherently anticompetitive that they cannot be justified and are deemed illegal as a matter of law. b. Rule of reason—Applied when an anticompetitive agreement may be justified by legitimate benefits. Under the rule of reason, the lawfulness of a trade restraint will be determined by the purpose and effects of the restraint.
The Clayton Act (1914)	Aimed at specific anticompetitive or monopolistic acts not covered by the Sherman Act. The major provisions are as follows: 1. Section 2—As amended in 1936 by the Robinson-Patman Act, prohibits a seller engaged in interstate commerce from price discrimination that substantially lessens competition. 2. Section 3—Prohibits exclusionary practices, such as exclusive-dealing contracts and tying arrangements, when the effect may be to substantially lessen competition. 3. Section 7—Prohibits mergers when the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly. a. A horizontal merger will be presumed unlawful if the entity created by the merger will have a significant market share. b. A vertical merger will be unlawful if the merger prevents competitors of either merging firm from competing in a segment of the market that otherwise would be open to them, resulting in a substantial lessening of competition. 4. Section 8—Prohibits interlocking directorates.
Enforcement and Exemptions	1. Enforcement by federal agencies—The U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission enforce the federal antitrust laws. 2. Actions by private parties—Private parties who have been injured as a result of violations of the Sherman Act or Clayton Act may bring civil suits, and, if successful, they may be awarded treble damages and attorneys' fees. 3. Exemptions from antitrust laws—See Exhibit 31–2 for a list of significant exemptions.

U.S. Antitrust Laws in the Global Context	1. Extraterritorial application of U.S. laws—U.S. antitrust laws can be applied in foreign nations to protect foreign consumers and competitors. Foreign governments and persons can also bring actions under U.S. antitrust laws. Section 1 of the Sherman Act applies to any conspiracy that has a substantial effect on U.S. commerce. 2. Application of foreign laws—Many other nations also have laws that promote competition and prohibit trade restraints, and some are more restrictive than U.S. laws. These foreign antitrust laws are increasingly being applied to U.S. firms.

Issue Spotters

1. Under what circumstances would Pop's Market, a small store in a small, isolated town, be considered a monopolist? If Pop's is a monopolist, is it in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act? Why or why not? (See Section 2 of the Sherman Act.)
2. Maple Corporation conditions the sale of its syrup on buyers' agreement to buy Maple's pancake mix. What factors would a court consider to decide whether this arrangement violates the Clayton Act? (See The Clayton Act.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

31–1. Sherman Act. An agreement that is blatantly and substantially anticompetitive is deemed a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Under what rule is an agreement analyzed if it appears to be anticompetitive but is not a per se violation? In making this analysis, what factors will a court consider? (See Section 1 of the Sherman Act.)

31–2. Tying Arrangement. John Sheridan owned a Marathon gas station franchise. He sued Marathon Petroleum Co. under Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act, charging it with illegally tying the processing of credit card sales to the gas station. As a condition of obtaining a Marathon dealership, dealers had to agree to let the franchisor process credit cards. They could not shop around to see if credit card processing could be obtained at a lower price from another source. The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim. Sheridan appealed. Is there a tying arrangement? If so, does it violate the law? (See The Clayton Act.)

31–3. Spotlight on Digital Music—Price Fixing. Together, EMI, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, Universal Music Group Recordings, Inc., and Warner Music Group Corp. produced, licensed, and distributed 80 percent of the digital music sold in the United States. The companies formed MusicNet to sell music to online services that sold the songs to consumers. MusicNet required all of the services to sell the songs at the same price and subject to the same restrictions. Digitization of music became cheaper, but MusicNet did not change its prices. Did MusicNet violate the antitrust laws? Explain. [Starr v. Sony BMG Music Entertainment, 592 F.3d 314 (2d Cir. 2010)] (See Section 1 of the Sherman Act.)

31–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Price Discrimination. Dayton Superior Corp. sells its products in interstate commerce to several companies, including Spa Steel Products, Inc. The purchasers often compete directly with each other for customers. From 2005 to 2007, one of Spa Steel's customers purchased Dayton Superior's products from two of Spa Steel's competitors. According to the customer, Spa Steel's prices were always 10 to 15 percent higher for the same products. As a result, Spa Steel lost sales to at least that customer and perhaps others. Spa Steel wants to sue Dayton Superior for price discrimination. Which requirements for such a claim under Section 2 of the Clayton Act does Spa Steel satisfy? What additional facts will it need to prove? [Dayton Superior Corp. v. Spa Steel Products, Inc., 2012 WL 113663 (N.D.N.Y. 2012)] (See The Clayton Act.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 31–4, go to Appendix E.

31–5. Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) and the National Federation of State High School Associations (NFHS), in an effort to enhance player safety and reduce technology-driven home runs and other big hits, set a standard for nonwood baseball bats to ensure that aluminum and composite bats performed like wood bats. Marucci Sports, LLC, makes nonwood bats. Under the new standard, four of Marucci's eleven products were decertified for use in high school and collegiate games. Marucci filed suit against the NCAA and the NFHS under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. At trial, Marucci's evidence focused on injury to its own business. Did the NCAA and NFHS's standard restrain trade in violation of the Sherman Act? Explain. [Marucci Sports, LLC v. National Collegiate Athletic Association, 751 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 2014)] (See Section 1 of the Sherman Act.)

31–6. Mergers. St. Luke's Health Systems, Ltd., operated an emergency clinic in Nampa, Idaho. Saltzer Medical Group, P.A., had thirty-four physicians practicing at its offices in Nampa. Saint Alphonsus Health System, Inc., operated the only hospital in Nampa. St. Luke's acquired Saltzer's assets and entered into a five-year professional service agreement with the Saltzer physicians. This affiliation resulted in a combined share of two-thirds of the Nampa adult primary care provider market. Together, the two entities could impose a significant increase in the prices charged patients and insurers, and correspondence between the parties indicated that they would. Saint Alphonsus filed a suit against St. Luke's to block the merger. Did this affiliation violate antitrust law? Explain. [Saint Alphonsus Medical Center-Nampa Inc. v. St. Luke's Health System, Ltd., 778 F.3d 775 (9th Cir. 2015)] (See The Clayton Act.)

31–7. Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Manitou North America, Inc., makes and distributes telehandlers (forklifts with extendable telescopic booms) to dealers throughout the United States. Manitou agreed to make McCormick International, LLC, its exclusive dealer in the state of Michigan. Later, Manitou entered into an agreement with Gehi Company, which also makes and sells telehandlers. The companies agreed to allocate territories within Michigan among certain dealers for each manufacturer, limiting the dealers' selection of competitive products to certain models. Under this agreement, McCormick was precluded from buying or selling Gehi telehandlers. What type of trade restraint did the agreement between Manitou and Gehi represent? Is this a violation of antitrust law? If so, who was injured, and how were they injured? Explain. [Manitou North America, Inc. v. McCormick International, LLC, 2016 WL 439354 (2016)] (See Section 1 of the Sherman Act.)

31–8. Tying Arrangements. PRC-Desoto International, Inc., makes and distributes more than 90 percent of the aerospace sealant used in military and commercial aircraft. Packaging Systems, Inc., buys the sealant in wholesale quantities, repackages it into special injection kits, and sells the kits on the retail market to aircraft maintenance companies. PRC-Desoto bought one of the two main manufacturing companies of injection kits and announced a new policy to prohibit the repackaging of its sealant for resale. Packaging Systems was forced to buy both the sealant and the kits from PRC-Desoto. Due to the anti-repackaging constraint, the reseller could no longer meet its buyers' needs for pre-filled injection kits. Does this policy represent an unlawful tying arrangement? Explain. [Packaging Systems, Inc. v. PRC-Desoto International, Inc., 2018 WL 735978 (C.D.Cal. 2018)] (See The Clayton Act.)

31–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Apple, Inc., controls which apps—such as ringtones, instant messaging, and video—can run on iPhone software. Apple's App Store is a website where iPhone users can find, buy, and download the apps. Apple prohibits third-party developers from selling iPhone apps through channels other than the App Store, threatening to cut off sales by any developer who violates this prohibition. Apple also discourages iPhone owners from downloading unapproved apps, threatening to void iPhone warranties if they do. Seven iPhone app buyers filed a complaint in a federal district court against Apple. The plaintiffs alleged that the firm monopolized the market for iPhone apps. [In re Apple iPhone Antitrust Litigation, 846 F.3d 313 (9th Cir. 2017)] (See Section 2 of the Sherman Act.)

1. Using the Decision step of the IDDR approach, provide reasons why Apple might attempt to protect iPhone software by setting narrow boundaries on the sales of related apps and aggressively enforcing them.
2. Explain why Apple's actions in this case might be considered unethical.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

31–10. Business Law Writing. Write two paragraphs explaining some ways in which antitrust laws might place too great a burden on commerce in the global marketplace. (See Section 2 of the Sherman Act.)

31–11. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Antitrust Violations. Residents of the city of Madison, Wisconsin, became concerned about overconsumption of liquor near the campus of the University of Wisconsin (UW). The city took action by imposing conditions on area bars to discourage reduced-price "specials" that were believed to encourage high-volume and dangerous drinking. Later, the city began to draft an ordinance to ban all drink specials. Bar owners responded by announcing that they had "voluntarily" agreed to discontinue drink specials on Friday and Saturday nights after 8:00 P.M. The city put its ordinance on hold. Several UW students filed a lawsuit against the local bar owners' association alleging violations of antitrust law. (See Section 1 of the Sherman Act.)

1. The first group will identify the grounds on which the plaintiffs might base their claim for relief and formulate an argument on behalf of the plaintiffs.
2. The second group will determine whether the defendants are exempt from the antitrust laws.
3. The third group will decide how the court should rule in this dispute and provide reasons for its answer.

32 Consumer and Environmental Law

Focus Questions

The six Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

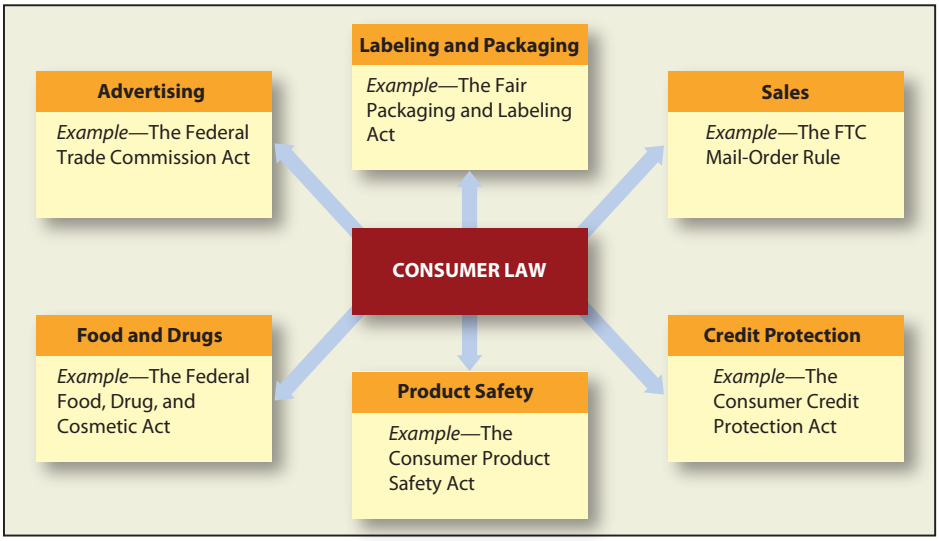
1. When will advertising be deemed deceptive?
2. What law protects consumers against contaminated and misbranded foods and drugs?
3. What does Regulation Z require, and how does it relate to the Truth in Lending Act?
4. What does an environmental impact statement contain, and who must file one?
5. What are three main goals of the Clean Water Act?
6. What is Superfund? What categories of people are liable under Superfund?

"The good of the people is the greatest law."

Marcus Tullius Cicero
106–43 B.C.E. (Roman politician and orator)

Congress has enacted a substantial amount of legislation to protect "the good of the people," to borrow Cicero's phrase from the chapter-opening quotation. All statutes, agency rules, and common law judicial decisions that attempt to protect the interests of consumers are classified as consumer law. Similarly, all laws and regulations designed to protect and preserve the environment are categorized as environmental law.



Sources of consumer protection exist at all levels of government. Numerous federal laws have been passed to define the duties of sellers and the rights of consumers. Exhibit 32–1 indicates some of the areas of consumer law that are regulated by statutes.

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) is one of many federal agencies that work to protect consumers. One FTC action, for instance, involved Luminosity, a popular "brain-training" app made by Lumos Labs, Inc. Lumos advertised that playing the app's games led to better performance in school, sports, and work—in addition to helping prevent Alzheimer's disease and other forms of dementia. According to the ads, people who played ten minutes a day three times a week would realize their full potential in every aspect of life.

Lumos could not provide scientific evidence to support these claims, however. As a result, the FTC concluded that the advertising was deceptive in violation of consumer protection laws and filed an action against the company. Ultimately, Lumos was ordered to pay a $2 million fine and to stop running the deceptive ads.

Exhibit 32–1 Selected Areas of Consumer Law Regulated by Statutes

32–1 Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling

Nearly every agency and department of the federal government has an office of consumer affairs. Most states have one or more such offices, including the offices of state attorneys general, to assist consumers. Many of the complaints received by these offices involve consumers who say they were misled by sellers' advertising, marketing, sales, or labeling tactics.

Focus Question 1
When will advertising be deemed deceptive?

32–1a Deceptive Advertising

One of the most important federal consumer protection laws is the Federal Trade Commission Act.[1] The act created the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) to carry out the broadly stated goal of preventing unfair and deceptive trade practices, including deceptive advertising.

Generally, deceptive advertising involves a claim that would mislead a reasonable consumer. Vague generalities and obvious exaggerations (that a reasonable person would not believe to be true) are permissible. These claims are known as puffery. Case Example 32.1 Sheila Cruz and others sued Anheuser-Busch Companies, LLC, for falsely advertising its "Bud Light Lime-A-Rita" beverages as "light." She argued that the word "light" was misleading because the drinks contained more calories than light beer (Bud Light). The court dismissed Cruz's case, and a federal appellate court affirmed. The Lime-A-Rita beverages were described and advertised as "Margaritas with a Twist," so no reasonable consumer would believe they were the same as light beer. They also contained fewer calories than traditional tequila margaritas. Thus, the court concluded that the label was not misleading.[2] When a claim has the appearance of authenticity, however, it may create problems.

Deceptive Advertising Advertising that misleads consumers, either by making unjustified claims about a product or by omitting a material fact concerning the product.

Bryan Steffy/Getty Images

Was Anheuser-Busch's advertisement for a "light" alcoholic beverage deceptive? Why or why not?

Claims That Appear to Be Based on Factual Evidence Advertising that appears to be based on factual evidence but that in fact cannot be scientifically supported will be deemed deceptive. For instance, advertising that uses a phrase such as "scientifically proven" or "clinical studies show" may appear to be factual. But if no actual data support the claims, then the advertising is deceptive.

The following Spotlight Case involved an advertising claim based on limited scientific evidence.

1. 15 U.S.C. Sections 41–58
2. Cruz v. Anheuser-Busch Companies, LLC, 682 Fed.Appx. 583 (9th Cir. 2017).

Spotlight Case 32.1

POM Wonderful, LLC v. Federal Trade Commission

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 777 F.3d 478 (2015).

Facts POM Wonderful, LLC, makes and sells pomegranate-based products. In ads, POM touted medical studies claiming to show that daily consumption of its products could treat, prevent, or reduce the risk of heart disease, prostate cancer, and erectile dysfunction. These ads mischaracterized the scientific evidence.

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) charged POM with, and held POM liable for, making false, misleading, and unsubstantiated representations in violation of the FTC act. POM was barred from running future ads asserting that its products treat or prevent any disease unless "randomized, controlled, human clinical trials" (RCTs) demonstrated statistically significant results. POM petitioned the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to review this injunctive order.

What kinds of health claims about pomegranate juice can its producer make?

Issue Can an advertising claim based on limited scientific evidence be deemed deceptive?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit enforced the FTC's order. "An advertiser who makes express representations about the level of support for a particular claim must possess the level of proof claimed in the ad and must convey that information to consumers in a non-misleading way."

Reason POM's ads conveyed the impression that clinical studies had established the ability of its products to treat, prevent, or reduce the risk of serious disease. To establish such a relationship, however, requires RCTs. The FTC examined the studies that POM cited and concluded that the studies did not qualify as RCTs that would adequately substantiate POM's claims.

Experts in cardiology and urology require "randomized, double-blinded, placebo-controlled clinical trials to substantiate any claim that a product treats, prevents, or reduces the risk of disease." The random assignment of a subject to a treatment or control group increases the likelihood that the groups are similar, so that any difference in the outcome between the groups can be attributed to the treatment. When a study is double-blinded, the participants and the investigators do not know who is in which group, making bias less likely to affect the results. The existence of the control group allows investigators to distinguish the effects of a tested product from other effects, such as those due to the act of being treated (the placebo effect).

Critical Thinking

- Ethical POM claimed that, for ethical reasons, RCTs should not be required to substantiate disease-related claims about food products. It argued that, for instance, "doctors cannot . . . ethically deprive a control group of patients of all Vitamin C for a decade to determine whether Vitamin C helps prevent cancer." Is this a valid argument? Why or why not?

Bait-and-Switch Advertising Advertising a product at an attractive price and then telling consumers that the advertised product is not available or is of poor quality and encouraging them to purchase a more expensive item.

Bait-and-Switch Advertising The FTC has issued rules that govern specific advertising techniques.[3] Some retailers systematically advertise merchandise at low prices to get customers into their stores and then tell the customers that the merchandise is unavailable or of poor quality and encourage them to purchase a more expensive item instead. This practice, known as bait-and-switch advertising, is a form of deceptive advertising.

The low price is the "bait" to lure the consumer into the store. The salesperson is instructed to "switch" the consumer to a different, more expensive item. According to the FTC, bait-and-switch advertising occurs if the seller refuses to show the advertised item or fails to have reasonable quantities of it available. It also occurs if the seller fails to promise to deliver the advertised item within a reasonable time or discourages employees from selling the item.

Example 32.2 Signs on the front of Shockoe Tire Store advertise tires for sale for $30 each. When consumers come in looking for the $30 tires, salespeople tell them the tires are sold out and try to convince them to buy more expensive tires instead. Under FTC guidelines, Shockoe's bait-and-switch sales tactics are deceptive advertising.

Online Deceptive Advertising Deceptive advertising occurs in the online environment as well. The FTC actively monitors online advertising and has identified numerous websites that have made false or deceptive claims for products and services.

The FTC issues guidelines to help online businesses comply with the laws prohibiting deceptive advertising. Current guidelines include the following basic requirements:

1. All advertisements—both online and offline—must be truthful and not misleading.
2. The claims made in an ad must be substantiated—that is, advertisers must have evidence to back up their claims.
3. Ads cannot be unfair, which the FTC defines as "likely to cause substantial consumer injury that consumers could not reasonably avoid and that is not outweighed by the benefit to consumers or competition."
4. Ads must disclose relevant limitations and qualifying information underlying the claims.
5. Required disclosures must be "clear and conspicuous." Because consumers may not read an entire Web page, an online disclosure should be placed as close as possible to the claim being qualified. Generally, hyperlinks to a disclosure are recommended only for lengthy disclosures. If hyperlinks are used, they should be obvious and should be placed as close as possible to the information they qualify.

Know This
Changes in technology often require changes in the law.

The FTC creates additional guidelines as needed to respond to new issues that arise with online advertising.

Federal Trade Commission Actions The FTC receives complaints from many sources, including competitors of alleged violators, consumers, trade associations, Better Business Bureaus, and government organizations and officials. When the agency receives numerous and widespread complaints about a particular problem, it often will investigate.

Formal Complaint. If the FTC concludes that a given advertisement is unfair or deceptive, it sends a formal complaint to the alleged offender. The company may agree to settle the complaint without further proceedings. If not, the FTC can conduct a hearing before an administrative law judge in which the company can present its defense. The agency also can file lawsuits in federal court seeking injunctions, civil penalties, and other forms of relief.

Example 32.3 The popular online dating service Match.com allows users to maintain free profiles on its website. These users cannot, however, respond to other members without paying a subscription fee. The FTC sued the corporate parent of Match.com for engaging in deceptive advertising practices designed to "trick" nonpaying members into purchasing access to the site. According to the FTC's complaint, Match.com sent millions of fake "You caught his eye" e-mails to users who had only free accounts, suggesting that another member was romantically interested in them. At least 500,000 users, the agency estimates, were convinced to buy paid subscriptions after being flattered by these fraudulent e-mails.

Cease-and-Desist Order An administrative or judicial order prohibiting a person or business firm from conducting activities that an agency or court has deemed illegal.

Counteradvertising New advertising that is undertaken to correct earlier false claims that were made about a product.

Multiple Product Order An order requiring a firm that has engaged in deceptive advertising to cease and desist from false advertising in regard to all the firm's products.

FTC Orders and Remedies. If the FTC succeeds in proving that an advertisement is unfair or deceptive, it usually issues a cease-and-desist order requiring the company to stop the challenged advertising. In some circumstances, the FTC may also require counteradvertising, in which the company advertises anew—in print, on the Internet, on radio, or on television—to inform the public about the earlier misinformation. The FTC sometimes institutes a multiple product order, which requires a firm to cease and desist from false advertising in regard to all of its products, not just the product that was the subject of the action.

Damages When Consumers Are Injured. When a company's deceptive ad involves wrongful charges to consumers, the FTC may seek other remedies, including restitution. Case Example 32.4 The FTC sued the University of Phoenix (UOP), a for-profit university, and its parent corporation over a deceptive advertising campaign that focused on prospective students' career prospects. Titled "Let's Get To Work," the campaign's social media, television, and radio advertisements made it appear that the school was working with high-profile employers such as Yahoo!, Microsoft, Twitter, and Adobe to find jobs for UOP graduates.

In reality, none of these "corporate partners" had any connection with UOP. Conceding wrongdoing, UOP agreed to settle with the FTC for $191 million. While $50 million of this amount went to the FTC as a fine, the remaining $141 million was used to pay off the debts of UOP students who had been misled by the deceptive advertisements.[4]

32–1b False Advertising Claims under the Lanham Act

The Lanham Act protects trademarks, as discussed earlier in this text. The act also covers false advertising claims. To state a successful claim for false advertising under this act, a business must establish each of the following elements:

1. An injury to a commercial interest in reputation or sales.
2. Direct causation of the injury by false or deceptive advertising by a competing company.
3. A loss of business from buyers who were deceived by the advertising.

32–1c State Laws Concerning False Advertising

State consumer-fraud statutes also prohibit false, misleading, and deceptive advertising. Recovery under a state law typically requires proof of the following elements:

1. The defendant committed a deceptive or unfair act.
2. The act was committed in the course of trade or commerce.
3. The defendant intended that others rely on the deception.
4. The plaintiff suffered actual damages proximately caused by the deception.

At issue in the following case was a plaintiff's claim under Illinois's consumer fraud statute.

Case 32.2

Haywood v. Massage Envy Franchising, LLC

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 887 F.3d 329 (2018).

Facts Massage Envy, LLC, is a franchisor based in Arizona that grants licenses to independently owned and operated entities for the use of its name, trademark, and standardized operations. Massage Envy's website advertises its services, including an "Introductory 1-hour Massage Session." At the bottom of the home page, a link to "pricing and promotional details" leads to a page with disclaimers. One disclaimer, titled "Session," explains that a "session includes massage or facial and time for consultation and dressing."

Kathy Haywood, a resident of Illinois, scheduled an appointment through the website. At the session, for which Haywood paid with a gift card, she received a massage that lasted no more than fifty minutes. Citing Massage Envy's online ad, Haywood filed a suit in a federal district court against the company, alleging unfair and deceptive business practices in violation of the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act (ICFA). The court dismissed the claim. Haywood appealed.

Issue Did Haywood fail to establish the causation required by the state's consumer fraud statute?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the dismissal. "The district court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the complaint."

Reason To succeed on a claim under the state's ICFA, a plaintiff must establish: (1) a deceptive act or promise by the defendant, (2) the defendant's intent that the plaintiff rely on the act or promise, (3) the commission of the act or making of the promise in the course of trade or commerce, and (4) actual damage as a result. In other words, the deceptive act or promise must have been the "but-for" cause of the damage.

Here, the court found that Haywood failed to establish causation. The court noted the lack of a contention in the complaint that Haywood's belief about the length of the massage caused her to make her appointment. "The only reasonable conclusion is that Massage Envy's representations regarding the one-hour massage session were not the but-for cause of any alleged injury." According to the court, "the only reasonable and plausible inference" is that the gift card influenced Haywood to book the massage, not Massage Envy's alleged deception.

Critical Thinking

- Economic A fraud injury can be measured in two ways. As a loss of the benefit of the bargain, damages consist of the difference between the value of what was promised and the value of what was received. Under the out-of-pocket rule, the measure is the difference between the price paid and the market value of what was received. If Haywood had established her claim, which of these methods would have applied? Why?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that reliance was not an element of a consumer fraud claim under the ICFA. Would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

32–1d Marketing

In addition to regulating advertising practices, Congress has passed several laws to protect consumers against other marketing practices.

Telephone Solicitation The Telephone Consumer Protection Act (TCPA)[5] prohibits telephone solicitation using an automatic telephone dialing system or a prerecorded voice. The act is enforced by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). In addition, most states have statutes regulating telephone solicitation.

The TCPA has long been considered lacking when it comes to protecting consumers against unsolicited robocalls—calls or texts generated by computerized autodialing technology and placed by a telemarketer. By the end of the 2010s, American were receiving between 5 and 6 billion unsolicited robocalls each month. In response, Congress passed the TRACED Act, an amendment to the TCPA that broadens the definition of prohibited robocalls and requires telephone providers to offer consumers more effective robocall-blocking options.[6] The amendment also gives the FCC the ability to impose substantial fines on individuals or businesses entities.

Fraudulent Telemarketing The FTC's Telemarketing Sales Rule (TSR)[7] requires a telemarketer to identify the seller's name, describe the product being sold, and disclose all material facts related to the sale (such as the total cost of the goods being sold). The TSR makes it illegal for telemarketers to misrepresent information or facts about their goods or services. A telemarketer must also remove a consumer's name from its list of potential contacts if the customer so requests.

An amendment to the TSR established the national Do Not Call Registry. Telemarketers must refrain from calling consumers who have placed their names on the list. Significantly, the TSR applies to any offer made to consumers in the United States—even if the offer comes from a foreign firm. Thus, the TSR helps to protect consumers from illegal cross-border telemarketing operations.

Case Example 32.5 Jason Abraham formed Instant Response Systems, LLC (IRS), to sell medical alert monitoring systems to the elderly. IRS employed telemarketers to make sales calls to people sixty-four years old and older. Some of these consumers were on the Do Not Call Registry. The telemarketers, using company-supplied scripts, falsely told consumers that they were calling in response to a request for information about IRS's medical alert services. Consumers who did not order the IRS system were still billed for it, receiving follow-up letters and calls accusing them of nonpayment. When they objected, IRS employees resorted to threats.

How did the Telemarketing Sales Rule affect a dispute between a medical-alert service and the Federal Trade Commission?

The FTC sued IRS and Abraham for violating the Telemarketing Sales Rule and won. IRS's telemarketers had made false and misleading statements to consumers, and had used threats to force them to make payments. IRS had also called individuals on the Do Not Call Registry without permission. The court ordered Abraham to pay more than $3.4 million (the amount of revenues he had received through the company's unlawful scheme). The court also permanently enjoined (prohibited) Abraham from marketing medical alert systems in the future.[8]

32–1e Sales

Various statutes protect consumers by requiring the disclosure of certain terms in sales transactions and providing rules governing such matters as unsolicited merchandise, door-to-door sales, and mail-order sales. The FTC has regulatory authority in this area, as do some other federal agencies.

"Cooling-Off" Laws Laws that allow buyers of goods sold in certain transactions to cancel their contracts within three business days.

Many states and the FTC have "cooling-off" laws that permit the buyers of goods sold in certain transactions to cancel their contracts within three business days. The FTC rule also requires that consumers be notified in Spanish of this right if the oral negotiations for the sale were in that language. The contracts that fall under these cancellation rules include trade show sales contracts, contracts for home equity loans, Internet purchase contracts, and home (door-to-door) sales contracts. In addition, certain states have passed laws allowing consumers to cancel contracts for things such as dating services, gym memberships, and weight loss programs.

The FTC's Mail, Internet, or Telephone Order Merchandise Rule[9] protects consumers who purchase goods via mail, Internet, or phone. Merchants must ship orders within the time promised in their advertisements and must notify consumers when orders cannot be shipped on time. If the seller does not give an estimated shipping time, it must ship within thirty days. Merchants must also issue a refund within a specified period of time when a consumer cancels an order.

32–1f Labeling

In general, labels must be accurate, and they must use words that are understood by the ordinary consumer. In some instances, labels must specify the raw materials used in the product, such as the percentage of cotton, nylon, or other fibers used in a garment. In other instances, the product must carry a warning, such as those required on cigarette packages and advertising.[10]

Automobile Fuel Economy Labels The Energy Policy and Conservation Act (EPCA)[11] requires automakers to attach an information label to every new car. This label must include the Environmental Protection Agency's fuel economy estimate for the vehicle. Spotlight Case Example 32.6 Gaetano Paduano bought a new Honda Civic Hybrid in California. The information label on the car included the fuel economy estimate from the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). Honda's sales brochure added, "Just drive the Hybrid like you would a conventional car and save on fuel bills."

When Paduano discovered that the car's fuel economy was less than half of the EPA's estimate, he sued Honda for deceptive advertising. The automaker claimed that the federal law (the EPCA) preempted the state's deceptive advertising law, but the court held in Paduano's favor, finding that the federal statute did not preempt a claim for deceptive advertising made under state law.[12]

Food Labeling Because the quality and safety of food are so important to consumers, several statutes deal specifically with food labeling. The Fair Packaging and Labeling Act requires that food product labels identify (1) the product, (2) the net quantity of the contents, (3) the manufacturer, and (4) the packager or distributor.[13] The act includes additional requirements concerning descriptions on packages, savings claims, components of nonfood products, and standards for the partial filling of packages.

Nutritional Content. Food products must bear labels detailing the food's nutritional content, including the number of calories and the amounts of various nutrients. The Nutrition Labeling and Education Act requires food labels to provide standard nutrition facts and regulates the use of such terms as fresh and low fat.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) are the primary agencies that issue regulations on food labeling. These rules are published in the Federal Register and updated annually. For instance, current rules require labels on fresh and frozen fruits and vegetables to indicate where the food originated so that consumers can know if their food was imported.

Product Identification Issues. FDA regulations define dairy products as coming from milk-producing animals such as cows and goats. Yet supermarkets are filled with drinks made from non-dairy sources such as almonds and cashews that are labeled "milk." A similar phenomenon exists in the meat industry, with a proliferation of plant- and soy-based products mimicking the shape and taste of animal meat. Representatives of the traditional dairy and beef industries believe that labeling these alternative food sources as "milk" and "burgers" risks confusing consumers.

A number of states and the federal government are considering legislation that would ban the use of words such as milk and burger on the labels of products that are not derived from animal sources. Critics of this regulatory trend reject the idea that consumers are unsure whether almond milk comes from a cow or an Impossible Burger is made with beef. Any confusion that might exist, these observers point out, can be cleared up by the nutritional content label.

Case Example 32.7 A group of California consumers brought a class action lawsuit against Blue Diamond Growers, claiming that the company mislabeled its almond beverages as "almond milk." The plaintiffs insisted that the product should be labeled "imitation milk" because it resembles dairy milk to a degree that is confusing to consumers. A federal appeals court dismissed this lawsuit, finding that a "reasonable consumer" is not going to be deceived into thinking that almond milk is a substitute for or an equivalent to dairy milk. As long as Blue Diamond accurately labels and advertises its almond milk, the court held, it is not "misleading" under federal or state law.[14]

Amarita/Shutterstock.com

Why did an appeals court reject the argument that labeling an almond beverage "milk" was misleading to consumers?

Caloric Content of Restaurant Foods. The health care reform bill enacted in 2010 (the Affordable Care Act) included provisions aimed at combating the problem of obesity in the United States. All restaurant chains with twenty or more locations are now required to post the caloric content of the foods on their menus so that customers will know how many calories the foods contain.[15] Foods offered through vending machines must also be labeled so that their caloric content is visible to would-be purchasers.

In addition, restaurants must post guidelines on the number of calories that an average person requires daily so that customers can determine what portion of a day's calories a particular food will provide. The hope is that consumers, armed with this information, will consider the number of calories when they make their food choices. The federal law on menu labeling supersedes all previous state and local laws.

Know This

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration is authorized to obtain, among other things, orders for the recall and seizure of certain products.

32–2 Protection of Health and Safety

Although labeling laws promote consumer health and safety, there is a significant distinction between regulating the information dispensed about a product and regulating the actual content of the product. The classic example is tobacco products. Producers of tobacco products are required to warn consumers about the hazards associated with the use of their products, but the sale of tobacco products has not been subjected to significant restrictions or banned outright despite the obvious dangers to health. We now examine various laws that regulate the actual products made available to consumers.

Focus Question 2

What law protects consumers against contaminated and misbranded foods and drugs?

32–2a Food and Drugs

The most important legislation regulating food and drugs is the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (FDCA).[16] The act protects consumers against adulterated (contaminated) and misbranded foods and drugs.

The FDCA established food standards, specified safe levels of potentially hazardous food additives, and provided guidelines for advertising and labeling food products. The FDCA also created a reportable food registry, established record-keeping requirements, required the registration of all food facilities, and provided for inspections. Most of these statutory requirements are monitored and enforced by the FDA.

Some foods considered safe by the FDCA in the United States are prohibited in Europe, however. For instance, products containing ingredients such as olestra (often in potato chips) and brominated vegetable oils (in certain sports drinks) are banned in the European Union. Many foreign nations also ban the use of certain chemicals and food colorings that are commonly found in U.S. food products.

Tainted Foods In the last several years, many people in the United States have contracted food poisoning from eating foods that were contaminated—often with Salmonella or E.coli bacteria. Example 32.8 Hundreds of people across the United States were sickened by eating contaminated food at the popular restaurant chain Chipotle Mexican Grill. Causes of illness in these outbreaks included E.coli and Salmonella, as well as the highly contagious norovirus. In response, Congress enacted the Food Safety Modernization Act (FSMA),[17] which provides greater government control over the U.S. food safety system.

The goal of the modernization act was to shift the focus of federal regulators from responding to incidents of contamination to preventing them. The act also gives the FDA authority to directly recall any food products that it suspects are tainted, rather than relying on the producers to recall items.

The FSMA requires any party that manufactures, processes, packs, distributes, receives, holds, or imports food products to pay a fee and register with the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. (There are some exceptions for small farmers.) Owners and operators of such facilities are required to analyze and identify food safety hazards, implement preventive controls, monitor effectiveness, and take corrective actions. The act also places more restrictions on importers of food and requires them to verify that imported foods meet U.S. safety standards.

Drugs and Medical Devices The FDA is also responsible under the FDCA for ensuring that drugs are safe and effective before they are marketed to the public. It is the responsibility of the company seeking to market a drug to test it and submit evidence that it is safe and effective. The FDA has established extensive procedures that drug manufacturers must follow. The FDA also has the authority to regulate medical devices, such as pacemakers, and to withdraw from the market any such device that is mislabeled.[18]

The FDA has been criticized for failing to recognize the addictive qualities of prescription opioids such as Oxycontin and fentanyl, which have been linked to hundreds of thousands of opioid overdose deaths. Case Example 32.9 Pharmaceutical Manufacturing Research Services, Inc. (PMRS), sought approval from the FDA to advertise a new prescription opioid drug as being less prone to abuse and addiction than other opioids. The company claimed that its product contained a purplish dye that would "create a visual deterrent" to intravenous injection. Furthermore, the drug's label would recommend a maximum daily dose below industry standards.

The FDA denied approval on the grounds that PMRS had not provided any evidence that, based on its physical and chemical properties, the drug actually carried less potential for abuse. A federal appeals court upheld the FDA's decision, finding that a proposed label heralding PMRS's product as "the safest opioid" on the market would be false or misleading.[19]

32–2b Consumer Product Safety

The Consumer Product Safety Act[20] created a comprehensive regulatory scheme over consumer safety matters and established the Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC).

The CPSC's Authority The CPSC conducts research on the safety of individual products and maintains a clearinghouse on the risks associated with various products. The Consumer Product Safety Act authorizes the CPSC to do the following:

1. Set safety standards for consumer products.
2. Ban the manufacture and sale of any product that the commission believes poses an "unreasonable risk" to consumers. (Products banned by the CPSC have included various types of fireworks, cribs, and toys, as well as many products containing asbestos or vinyl chloride.)
3. Remove from the market any products it believes to be imminently hazardous. The CPSC frequently works with manufacturers to voluntarily recall defective products from stores. Example 32.10 In cooperation with the CPSC, the Scandinavian company IKEA recalled nearly 1 million three-drawer Kullen dressers after it became clear that these pieces of furniture easily tipped over, posing an unacceptable danger to small children. (The dressers had been linked to the deaths of at least nine children, along with dozens of injuries.)
4. Require manufacturers to report any products already sold or intended for sale that have proved to be hazardous.
5. Administer other product-safety legislation, including the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act[21] and the Federal Hazardous Substances Act.[22]

buzbuzzer/iStock Unreleased/Getty Images

Why would IKEA want to cooperate with the Consumer Product Safety Commission?

Notification Requirements The Consumer Product Safety Act imposes notification requirements on distributors of consumer products. Distributors must immediately notify the CPSC when they receive information that a product "contains a defect which . . . creates a substantial risk to the public" or "an unreasonable risk of serious injury or death."

32–2c Health Care Reforms

The health care reforms (Obamacare) enacted in 2010 gave Americans new rights and benefits with regard to health care.[23] These laws prohibit certain insurance company practices, such as denial of coverage for preexisting conditions.

Expanded Coverage for Children and Seniors The reforms enabled more children to obtain health-insurance coverage and allowed young adults (under age twenty-six) to remain covered by their parents' health-insurance policies. The legislation also ended lifetime limits and most annual limits on care, and gave patients access to recommended preventive services (such as cancer screenings, vaccinations, and well-baby checks) without cost. Under most standard health care plans, Medicare recipients receive a 75 percent discount on the cost of name-brand and generic drugs.

Controlling Costs of Health Insurance In an attempt to control the rising costs of health insurance, the laws placed restrictions on insurance companies. Insurance companies must spend at least 85 percent of all premium dollars collected from large employers (80 percent of premiums collected from individuals and small employers) on benefits and quality improvement. If insurance companies do not meet these goals, they must provide rebates to consumers. Additionally, states can require insurance companies to justify their premium increases to be eligible to participate in the health-insurance exchanges mandated by the law.

32–3 Credit Protection

Credit protection is one of the most important aspects of consumer protection legislation. A large percentage of U.S. consumers have credit cards, and many carry a balance on these cards and other revolving debt, which amounts to over a trillion dollars of such debt nationwide. The Consumer Financial Protection Bureau oversees the credit practices of banks, mortgage lenders, and credit card companies.

32–3a Truth in Lending Act

A key statute regulating the credit and credit card industries is the Truth in Lending Act (TILA), the name commonly given to Title 1 of the Consumer Credit Protection Act (CCPA), as amended.[24] The TILA is basically a disclosure law. It is administered by the Federal Reserve Board and requires sellers and lenders to disclose credit terms or loan terms (such as the annual percentage rate, or APR, and any finance charges) so that individuals can shop around for the best financing arrangements.

Application TILA requirements apply only to persons who, in the ordinary course of business, lend funds, sell on credit, or arrange for the extension of credit. Thus, sales or loans made between two consumers do not come under the act. Additionally, this law protects only debtors who are natural persons (as opposed to the artificial "person" of a corporation) and does not extend to other legal entities.

Disclosure The TILA's disclosure requirements are found in Regulation Z,[25] issued by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. If the contracting parties are subject to the TILA, the requirements of Regulation Z apply to any transaction involving an installment sales contract that calls for payment to be made in more than four installments. Transactions subject to Regulation Z typically include installment loans, retail installment sales, car loans, home-improvement loans, and certain real estate loans, if the amount of financing is less than $58,300.

Regulation Z A set of rules issued by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors to implement the provisions of the Truth in Lending Act.

Equal Credit Opportunity The Equal Credit Opportunity Act (ECOA) amended the TILA. The ECOA prohibits the denial of credit solely on the basis of race, religion, national origin, color, gender, marital status, or age. The act also prohibits credit discrimination on the basis of whether an individual receives certain forms of income, such as public-assistance benefits.

Courts tend to interpret the ECOA's protections broadly, particularly when the lending institution is perceived to have treated a credit applicant unfairly. Case Example 32.11 Chase Bank USA rejected Jeffrey Chen's application for a credit card, citing his previous "unsatisfactory relationship with the bank" as the only reason for the denial. Chen filed suit against Chase for violating the ECOA. Chase moved for the action to be dismissed because Chen could not show that he had been the victim of discrimination based on any of the factors identified in the ECOA.

Investigating the legislative record of the ECOA, a federal court found that Congress intended for the law not only to discourage discriminatory practices but also to provide educational and informational benefits to consumers. Under this latter requirement, "instead of being told only that they do not meet a particular creditor's standards," rejected credit applicants must be given specific reasons for the denial. Because Chase clearly failed to provide Chen with this information, the court ruled that Chen's action under the ECOA could proceed.[26]

What are some basic TILA provisions that benefit credit card holders?

Credit Card Rules The TILA also contains provisions regarding credit cards. One provision limits the liability of a cardholder to $50 per card for unauthorized charges made before the creditor was notified that the card was lost. If a consumer received an unsolicited credit card in the mail that was later stolen, the company that issued the card cannot charge the consumer for any unauthorized charges.

Another provision requires credit card companies to disclose the balance computation method that is used to determine the outstanding balance and to state when finance charges begin to accrue. Other provisions set forth procedures for resolving billing disputes with the credit card company. These procedures may be used if, for instance, a cardholder wishes to withhold payment for a faulty product purchased with a credit card.

Amendments to Credit Card Rules Amendments to TILA's credit card rules added the following protections:

1. A company may not retroactively increase the interest rates on existing card balances unless the account is sixty days delinquent.
2. A company must provide forty-five days' advance notice to consumers before changing its credit card terms.
3. Monthly bills must be sent to cardholders twenty-one days before the due date.
4. The interest rate charged on a customer's credit card balance may not be increased except in specific situations, such as when a promotional rate ends.
5. A company may not charge fees for being over the credit card's limit except in specified situations.
6. When the customer has balances at different interest rates, payments in excess of the minimum amount due must be applied first to the balance with the highest rate (for instance, a higher interest rate is commonly charged for cash advances).
7. A company may not compute finance charges based on the previous billing cycle (a practice known as double-cycle billing, which hurts consumers because they are charged interest for the previous cycle even if they have paid the bill in full).

32–3b Fair Credit Reporting Act

The Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA)[27] protects consumers against inaccurate credit reporting and requires that lenders and other creditors report correct, relevant, and up-to-date information. The act provides that consumer credit reporting agencies may issue credit reports to users only for specified purposes. Legitimate purposes include the extension of credit, the issuance of insurance policies, and in response to the consumer's request.

Consumer Notification and Inaccurate Information Any time a consumer is denied credit or insurance on the basis of a credit report, the consumer must be notified of that fact. The same notice must be sent to consumers who are charged more than others ordinarily would be for credit or insurance because of their credit reports.

Under the FCRA, consumers can request the source of any information used by the credit agency, as well as the identity of anyone who has received an agency's report. Consumers are also permitted to have access to the information contained about them in a credit reporting agency's files.

A consumer who discovers that the agency's files contain inaccurate information should report the problem to the agency. On the consumer's written (or electronic) request, the agency must conduct a systematic examination of its records. Any unverifiable or erroneous information must be deleted within a reasonable period of time.

Remedies for Violations A credit reporting agency that fails to comply with the act is liable for actual damages, plus additional damages not to exceed $1,000 and attorneys' fees.[28] Creditors and other companies that use information from credit reporting agencies may also be liable for violations of the FCRA. Punitive damages may be awarded for willful violations. An insurance company's failure to notify new customers that they are paying higher insurance rates as a result of their credit scores is considered a willful violation of the FCRA.[29]

Which law attempts to protect consumers against inaccurate credit information?

Ethical Issue

Can a company that provides background checks willfully violate the Fair Credit Reporting Act? After graduating from college with a bachelor's degree, Richard Williams applied for a job in his hometown with Rent-A-Center as an account representative. As part of the application process, he agreed to a drug test (which he passed) and a criminal-background check. Rent-A-Center contracted with First Advantage LNS Screening Solutions, Inc., a credit reporting agency that provides various background checks.

First Advantage reported to Rent-A-Center that a Richard Williams had a sale-of-cocaine record in another part of the state. Williams disputed the report. First Advantage admitted that Richard Williams is a common name and that it had not obtained three identifiers of that record. When First Advantage investigated, it determined that the criminal record was for a different person with the same name. It removed that criminal record from Williams's report. By then, however, it was too late, as Rent-A-Center had hired someone else.

Williams continued applying for a multitude of jobs. Eventually, another prospective employer ran a background check through First Advantage. This time, First Advantage reported to the employer that Williams had been convicted of aggravated battery on a pregnant woman. Again, it turned out to be a different Richard Williams, but by then, the employer had rejected Williams and hired someone else. Williams sued First Advantage in a federal district court for willfully violating the FCRA. After a jury trial, he was awarded $250,000 in compensatory damages and $3.3 million in punitive damages. First Advantage filed a motion for a new trial, which the court denied. Evidence supported the jury's finding that First Advantage had willfully violated the FCRA and that the damages awarded were appropriate and not unconstitutionally excessive.[30]

32–3c Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act

Congress passed the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions (FACT) Act to combat identity theft.[31] The act established a national fraud alert system so that consumers who suspect that they have been or may be victimized by identity theft can place an alert in their credit files. The act also requires the major credit reporting agencies to provide consumers with a free copy of their credit reports every twelve months.

Another provision requires account numbers on credit card receipts to be truncated (shortened) so that merchants, employees, and others who have access to the receipts cannot obtain a consumer's name and full credit card number. The act also mandates that financial institutions work with the FTC to identify "red flag" indicators of identity theft and to develop rules for disposing of sensitive credit information.

32–3d Fair Debt Collection Practices Act

The Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA)[32] attempts to curb abuses by collection agencies. The act applies only to specialized debt-collection agencies and attorneys who regularly attempt to collect debts on behalf of someone else, usually for a percentage of the amount owed. Creditors attempting to collect debts are not covered by the act unless, by misrepresenting themselves, they cause the debtors to believe that they are collection agencies.

Requirements Under the FDCPA, a collection agency may not do any of the following:

1. Contact the debtor at the debtor's place of employment if the debtor's employer objects.
2. Contact the debtor at inconvenient or unusual times (such as three o'clock in the morning), or at any time if the debtor is being represented by an attorney.
3. Contact third parties other than the debtor's parents, spouse, or financial adviser about payment of a debt unless a court authorizes such action.
4. Harass or intimidate the debtor (by using abusive language or threatening violence, for instance) or make false or misleading statements (such as posing as a police officer).
5. Communicate with the debtor at any time after receiving notice that the debtor is refusing to pay the debt, except to advise the debtor of further action to be taken by the collection agency.

The FDCPA also requires a collection agency to include a validation notice whenever it initially contacts a debtor for payment of a debt or within five days of that initial contact. The notice must state that the debtor has thirty days in which to dispute the debt and to request a written verification of the debt from the collection agency. The debtor's request for debt validation must be in writing.

The question before the court in the following case concerned what constitutes a misleading statement in violation of the FDCPA.

32. 15 U.S.C. Section 1692.

Case 32.3

Manuel v. Merchants and Professional Bureau, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, 956 F.3d 822 (2020).

Facts Silvia Manuel owed Texas Orthopedics, Sports and Rehabilitation Associates $250. The debt was transferred to Merchants and Professional Bureau, Inc., for collection.

After six years had passed with no effort to collect, Merchants sent Manuel four collection letters. By that time, a four-year Texas statute of limitations barred any suit to collect the debt. In other words, the debt was not legally enforceable. But the collection letters did not disclose this fact, instead making vague references to a "special offer" and possible "additional collection efforts."

Manuel filed a suit in a federal district court against Merchants, claiming that the collection letters were false and misleading under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA). The court issued a summary judgment in Manuel's favor. She had agreed not to seek actual damages and thus was awarded the maximum $1,000 statutory damages.

Merchants appealed, arguing that its silence concerning the legal enforceability of the old debt was not in itself misleading.

Issue Did Merchants' collection letters misrepresent the legal enforceability of Manuel's debt?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the lower court.

Reason The appellate court reasoned that, when "read as a whole," the letters from Merchants were misleading. The letters did not notify Manuel that Texas has a statute of limitations, explain how that statute could affect collection of the debt, or even specify when the debt had been incurred. "If they had," stated the court, "they might give a consumer at least some inkling that the debt might be too old to be legally enforceable."

The letters referred vaguely to a "special offer," implying that it would expire soon, and to "additional collection efforts" that could be made if the debt was not paid. Neither the terms of the offer nor the possible collection efforts were set out. According to the court, "the combined effect of the letters' vague language and their silence as to the debt's time-barred nature leaves [a] consumer with the impression that the debt is enforceable, and that if payment is not levied quickly then adverse collection efforts will follow."

The FDCPA requires clarity. Ambiguous language in a collection letter can violate the act. The court read Merchants' letters to be "examples of careful and crafted ambiguity." In sum, the court concluded, the letters "misrepresent the legal enforceability of the underlying debt in violation" of the FDCPA.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment How might Merchants have phrased its debt collection letters to meet the standards of the FDCPA? Explain.
- Economic Why would a debt collector use carefully crafted, ambiguous language in an attempt to collect an old debt? Discuss.

Enforcement The Federal Trade Commission is primarily responsible for enforcing the FDCPA. A debt collector who fails to comply with the act is liable for actual damages, plus additional damages not to exceed $1,000 and attorneys' fees.

Debt collectors who violate the act are exempt from liability if they can show that the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error. The "bona fide error" defense typically has been applied to mistakes of fact or clerical errors.

32–4 Protecting the Environment

We now turn to a discussion of the various ways in which businesses are regulated by the government in the interest of attempting to protect the environment. Environmental protection is not without a price. For many businesses, the costs of complying with environmental regulations are high, and for some, they may seem too high.

32–4a Federal Regulation

Congress has enacted a number of statutes to control the impact of human activities on the environment. Some of these laws have been passed in an attempt to improve the quality of air and water. Other laws specifically regulate toxic chemicals, including pesticides, herbicides, and hazardous wastes.

Environmental Regulatory Agencies The primary agency regulating environmental law is the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). Other federal agencies with authority to regulate specific environmental matters include the Department of the Interior, the Department of Defense, the Department of Labor, the Food and Drug Administration, and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

State and local agencies also play an important role in enforcing federal environmental legislation. In addition, most federal environmental laws provide that private parties can sue to enforce environmental regulations if government agencies fail to do so. Typically, a threshold hurdle in such suits is meeting the requirements for standing to sue.

Focus Question 4

What does an environmental impact statement contain, and who must file one?

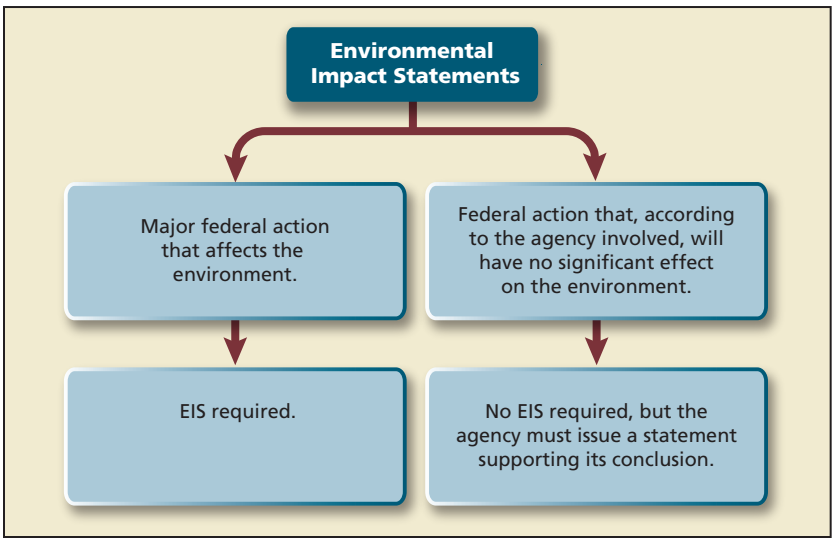
Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) A formal analysis required for any major federal action that will significantly affect the quality of the environment to determine the action's impact and explore alternatives.

Environmental Impact Statements All agencies of the federal government must take environmental factors into consideration when making significant decisions. The National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA)[33] requires that an environmental impact statement (EIS) be prepared for every major federal action that significantly affects the quality of the environment (see Exhibit 32–2). An EIS must analyze the following:

1. The impact that the action will have on the environment.
2. Any adverse effects on the environment and alternative actions that might be taken.
3. Irreversible effects the action might generate.

Note that an EIS must be prepared for every major federal action. An action qualifies as "major" if it involves a substantial commitment of resources (monetary or otherwise). An action is "federal" if a federal agency has the power to control it. Example 32.12 Development of a ski resort by a private developer on federal land may require an EIS. Construction or operation of a nuclear plant, which requires a federal permit, necessitates an EIS, as does creation of a dam as part of a federal project. ■



If an agency decides that an EIS is unnecessary, it must issue a statement supporting this conclusion. Private individuals, consumer interest groups, businesses, and others who believe that a federal agency's actions threaten the environment often use EISs as a means of challenging those actions.

32–4b Common Law Actions

Even before there were statutes and regulations explicitly protecting the environment, the common law recognized that individuals have the right not to have their environment contaminated by others. Common law remedies against environmental pollution originated centuries ago in England. Those responsible for operations that created dirt, smoke, noxious odors, noise, or toxic substances were sometimes held liable under common law theories of nuisance or negligence. Today, individuals who have suffered harm from pollution continue to rely on the common law to obtain damages and injunctions against business polluters.

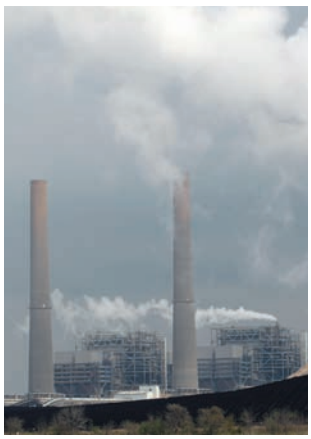
Nuisance Under the common law doctrine of nuisance, persons may be held liable if they use their property in a manner that unreasonably interferes with others' rights to use or enjoy their own property. In these situations, the courts commonly balance the harm caused by the pollution against the costs of stopping it.

Nuisance A common law doctrine under which persons may be held liable for using their property in a manner that unreasonably interferes with others' rights to use or enjoy their own property.



Courts have often denied injunctive relief on the ground that the hardships that would be imposed on the polluter and on the community are relatively greater than the hardships suffered by the plaintiff. Example 32.13 Hewitt's Factory causes neighboring landowners to suffer from smoke, soot, and vibrations. If the factory is the core of the local economy, a court may leave it in operation and award monetary damages to the injured parties. Damages may include compensation for any decline in the value of their property caused by Hewitt's operation.

To obtain relief from pollution under the nuisance doctrine, a property owner may have to identify a distinct harm (a "private" nuisance) separate from that affecting the general public. Under the common law—which is still followed in some states—individuals must establish a private nuisance to have standing to sue. A public authority (such as a state's attorney general), though, can sue to stop or reduce a "public" nuisance.

Negligence and Strict Liability An injured party may sue a business polluter under the negligence and strict liability theories discussed in the torts chapter. A negligence action is based on a business's alleged failure to use reasonable care toward a party whose injury was foreseeable and was caused by the lack of reasonable care. For instance, employees might sue an employer whose failure to use proper pollution controls contaminated the air and caused the employees to suffer respiratory illnesses.

Businesses that engage in ultrahazardous activities—such as the transportation of radioactive materials—are strictly liable for any injuries the activities cause. In a strict liability action, the injured party does not need to prove that the business failed to exercise reasonable care.

Lawsuits for personal injuries caused by exposure to a toxic substance, such as asbestos, radiation, or hazardous waste, have given rise to a growing body of tort law known as toxic torts. These torts may be based on a theory of negligence or strict liability.

How can a local factory that is considered a "nuisance" by nearby property owners be held liable for noise or air pollution?

Toxic Torts A civil wrong arising from exposure to a toxic substance, such as asbestos, radiation, or hazardous waste.

32–5 Air and Water Pollution

The United States has long recognized the need to protect our natural resources. During the industrial revolution, factories began discharging substances into our air and water. Over time, it became clear that many of these substances were harmful to our environment, and the government began regulating.

32–5a Air Pollution

Federal involvement with air pollution goes back to the 1950s and 1960s, when Congress authorized funds for air pollution research and enacted the Clean Air Act.[34] The Clean Air Act provides the basis for issuing regulations to control multistate air pollution. It covers both mobile sources of pollution (such as automobiles and other vehicles) and stationary sources of pollution (such as electric utilities and industrial plants).

Mobile Sources of Air Pollution Regulations governing air pollution from automobiles and other mobile sources specify pollution standards and establish time schedules for meeting the standards. The EPA periodically updates the pollution standards to reduce the amount of emissions allowed in light of new developments and data.

The most recent federal guidelines for mobile sources of air pollution were passed in 2020.[35] Under Part II of the Safer Affordable Fuel Efficient Vehicles (SAFE) Rule, American automakers must reduce emissions in new passenger cars and light trucks by 1.5 percent each year through 2026, starting with model year 2021. Similarly, SAFE Part II requires automakers to improve the fuel efficiency of their fleets by 1.5 percent per year through 2026, also starting in 2021.

Stationary Sources of Air Pollution The Clean Air Act authorizes the EPA to establish air-quality standards for stationary sources, such as manufacturing plants. The standards are aimed at controlling hazardous air pollutants—those likely to cause death or a serious, irreversible, or incapacitating condition, such as cancer or neurological or reproductive damage.

The act recognizes that the primary responsibility in this area rests with state and local governments. Thus, the EPA sets primary and secondary levels of ambient standards—that is, the maximum permissible levels of certain pollutants—and the states formulate plans to achieve those standards. Different standards apply depending on whether the sources of pollution are located in clean areas or polluted areas and whether they are existing sources or major new sources.

Hazardous Air Pollutants. The Clean Air Act requires the EPA to list all regulated hazardous air pollutants on a prioritized schedule. In all, nearly two hundred substances, including asbestos, benzene, beryllium, cadmium, and vinyl chloride, have been classified as hazardous. They are emitted from stationary sources by a variety of business activities, including smelting (melting ore to produce metal), dry cleaning, house painting, and commercial baking.

Maximum Achievable Control Technology. The Clean Air Act does not establish specific emissions standards for each hazardous air pollutant. Instead, the act requires major new sources of pollutants to use pollution-control equipment that represents the maximum achievable control technology, or MACT, to reduce emissions. The EPA issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard.[36]

Greenhouse Gases Although greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide (CO_2), are generally thought to contribute to global climate change, the Clean Air Act does not specifically mention CO_2 emissions. Therefore, the EPA did not regulate CO_2 emissions until 2009, after the Supreme Court ruled that it had the authority to do so.

Classic Case Example 32.14 Environmental groups and several states, including Massachusetts, sued the EPA in an effort to force the agency to regulate CO_2 emissions. When the case reached the United States Supreme Court, the EPA argued that the plaintiffs lacked standing. The agency claimed that because climate change has widespread effects, an individual plaintiff cannot show the particularized harm required for standing. The agency also maintained that it did not have authority under the Clean Air Act to address global climate change and regulate CO_2.

The Court, however, ruled that Massachusetts had standing because its coastline, including state-owned lands, faced a threat from the rising sea levels that may result from climate change. The Court also held that the Clean Air Act's broad definition of air pollution gives the EPA authority to regulate CO_2 and requires the EPA to regulate any air pollutants that might "endanger public health or welfare." Accordingly, the Court ordered the EPA to determine whether CO_2 was a pollutant that endangered the public health.[37] The EPA went on to conclude that greenhouse gases, including CO_2 emissions, do constitute a public danger and began regulating them in 2011.

Violations of the Clean Air Act For violations of emission limits under the Clean Air Act, the EPA can assess civil penalties of up to $101,439 per day. Additional fines of up to $7,500 per day can be assessed for other violations, such as failing to maintain the required records. To penalize those who find it more cost-effective to violate the act than to comply with it, the EPA is authorized to obtain a penalty equal to the violator's economic benefits from noncompliance. Persons who provide information about violators may be paid up to $10,000. Private individuals can also sue violators.

Does the Environmental Protection Agency have the power to regulate CO_2 emissions from power plants?

32–5b Water Pollution

Water pollution stems mostly from industrial, municipal, and agricultural sources. Pollutants entering streams, lakes, and oceans include organic wastes, heated water, sediments from soil runoff, nutrients (including fertilizers and human and animal wastes), and toxic chemicals and other hazardous substances.

Federal regulations governing the pollution of water can be traced back to the 1899 Rivers and Harbors Appropriation Act.[38] These regulations prohibited ships and manufacturers from discharging or depositing refuse in navigable waterways without a permit. In 1948, Congress passed the Federal Water Pollution Control Act (FWPCA),[39] but its regulatory system and enforcement powers proved to be inadequate.

The Clean Water Act In 1972, amendments to the FWPCA—known as the Clean Water Act (CWA)—established the following goals: (1) make waters safe for swimming, (2) protect fish and wildlife, and (3) eliminate the discharge of pollutants into the water. The amendments set specific time schedules, which were extended by amendment and by the Water Quality Act.[40] Under these schedules, the EPA limits the discharge of various types of pollutants based on the technology available for controlling them.

Focus Question 5

What are three main goals of the Clean Water Act?

Permit System for Point-Source Emissions. The CWA established a permit system, called the National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System (NPDES), for regulating discharges from "point sources" of pollution. Point sources include industrial facilities, municipal facilities (such as sewer pipes and sewage treatment plants), and agricultural facilities.[41] Under this system, industrial, municipal, and agricultural polluters must apply for permits before discharging wastes into surface waters.

NPDES permits can be issued by the EPA, authorized state agencies, and Indian tribes, but only if the discharge will not violate water-quality standards (either federal or state standards). Special requirements must be met to discharge toxic chemicals and residue from oil spills. NPDES permits must be renewed every five years.

Storm Water. Although the NPDES system initially focused mainly on industrial wastewater, it was later expanded to cover storm water discharge. Case Example 32.15 The Maryland Department of the Environment (MDE) issued separate storm sewer system (MS4) discharge permits to various counties in Maryland. including Anacosta Riverkeeper, sued the MDE, claiming that its MS4 permits did not comply with federal law. They argued that the MS4 permits allowed permit holders to discharge chemicals and other substances into the Chesapeake Bay at levels exceeding the daily maximum load set by the EPA. A state trial court ruled in the MDE's favor, and the plaintiffs appealed.

A state appellate court reviewed the requirements of the state's MS4 permit system and determined that it complied with the Clean Water Act. Although Maryland's storm water management system was not perfect, the court concluded that it was a reasonable attempt to control and restore the state's water quality. The court reasoned that municipal storm water discharge is highly intermittent and includes relatively high flows that occur over short periods. The fact that the discharges sometimes exceeded the daily maximum load did not mean that the MS4 permits violated the Clean Water Act.[42]

What law governs discharge of pollutants into water?

Standards for Equipment. Regulations generally specify that the best available control technology, or BACT, be installed. The EPA issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard. Essentially, the guidelines require the most effective pollution-control equipment available.

New sources must install BACT equipment before beginning operations. Existing sources are subject to timetables for the installation of BACT equipment and must immediately install equipment that utilizes the best practical control technology, or BPCT. The EPA also issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard.

Violations of the Clean Water Act Because point-source water pollution control is based on a permit system, the permits are the key to enforcement. States have primary responsibility for enforcing the permit system, subject to EPA monitoring.

Discharging emissions into navigable waters without a permit, or in violation of pollution limits under a permit, violates the CWA. Violators are subject to a variety of civil and criminal penalties. Depending on the violation, civil penalties can be as high as $55,800 per violation per day.

Criminal penalties, which apply only if a violation was intentional, range from a fine of $2,500 per day and imprisonment for up to one year to a fine of $1 million and fifteen years' imprisonment. Injunctive relief and damages can also be imposed. The polluting party can be required to clean up the pollution or pay for the cost of doing so.

Drinking Water The Safe Drinking Water Act[43] requires the EPA to set maximum levels for pollutants in public water systems. Public water system operators must come as close as possible to meeting the EPA's standards by using the best available technology that is economically and technologically feasible. Each supplier of drinking water must send an annual statement describing the source of its water to every household it supplies. The statement must disclose the level of any contaminants in the water and any possible health concerns associated with the contaminants.

32–6 Toxic Chemicals and Hazardous Waste

Today, the control of toxic chemicals used in agriculture and in industry has become increasingly important. If not properly disposed of, these chemicals may present a substantial danger to human health and the environment—for instance, by contaminating public drinking water resources.

32–6a Pesticides and Herbicides

The Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA)[44] regulates the use of pesticides and herbicides. These substances must be (1) registered before they can be sold, (2) certified and used only for approved applications, and (3) used in limited quantities when applied to food crops. The act gives the EPA authority to oversee the sale and use of these substances and to determine whether, and at what levels, a substance may be harmful.

It is a violation of FIFRA to sell a pesticide or herbicide that is unregistered or has had its registration canceled or suspended. It is also a violation to sell a pesticide or herbicide with a false or misleading label, or to destroy or deface any labeling required under the act.

Criminal penalties for commercial dealers include imprisonment for up to one year and a fine of up to $50,000. Farmers and other private users of pesticides or herbicides who violate the act are subject to a $1,000 fine and incarceration for up to thirty days. Note that a state can also regulate the sale and use of federally registered pesticides.

32–6b Toxic Substances

The Toxic Substances Control Act[45] regulates chemicals and chemical compounds that are known to be toxic, such as asbestos and polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs). The act also controls the introduction of new chemical compounds by requiring investigation of any possible harmful effects from these substances.

The act authorizes the EPA to require that manufacturers, processors, and other organizations planning to use chemicals first determine their effects on human health and the environment. The EPA can regulate substances that could pose an imminent hazard or an unreasonable risk of injury to health or the environment. The EPA may require special labeling, limit the use of a substance, set production quotas, or prohibit the use of a substance altogether.

32–6c Resource Conservation and Recovery Act

The Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA)[46] was passed in reaction to concern over the effects of hazardous waste materials on the environment. The RCRA required the EPA to determine which forms of solid waste should be considered hazardous and to establish regulations to monitor and control hazardous waste disposal.

The act authorized the EPA to issue technical requirements for facilities that store and treat hazardous waste. The act also required all producers of hazardous waste materials to label and package properly any hazardous waste to be transported. Amendments to the RCRA decreased the use of land containment in the disposal of hazardous waste and required smaller generators of hazardous waste to comply with the act.

32–6d Superfund

The Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA),[47] commonly known as Superfund, regulates the clean-up of disposal sites in which hazardous waste is leaking into the environment. CERCLA, as amended, has four primary elements:

1. It established an information-gathering and analysis system that enables the government to identify chemical dump sites and determine the appropriate action.

2. It authorized the EPA to respond to hazardous substance emergencies and to arrange for the clean-up of a leaking site directly if the persons responsible for the problem fail to clean up the site.
3. It created a Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund (also called Superfund) to pay for the clean-up of hazardous sites using funds obtained through taxes on certain businesses.
4. It allowed the government to recover the cost of clean-up from persons who were responsible (even remotely) for hazardous substance releases.

Potentially Responsible Parties Superfund provides that when a release or a potential release of hazardous chemicals from a site occurs, the following persons may be held responsible for cleaning up the site:

1. A person who generated the wastes disposed of at the site.
2. A person who transported the waste to the site.
3. The person who owned or operated the site at the time of the disposal.
4. The current owner or operator of the site.

Potentially Responsible Party (PRP) A party liable for the costs of cleaning up a hazardous waste disposal site under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act.

A person falling within one of these categories is referred to as a potentially responsible party (PRP). If the PRPs do not clean up the site, the EPA can clean up the site and recover the costs from the PRPs.

Strict Liability of PRPs Superfund imposes strict liability on PRPs, and that liability cannot be avoided through transfer of ownership. Thus, selling a site where hazardous wastes were disposed of does not relieve the seller of liability, and the buyer also becomes liable for the clean-up. Liability also extends to businesses that merge with or buy corporations that have violated CERCLA.

Joint and Several Liability Liability under Superfund is usually joint and several—that is, a person who generated only a fraction of the hazardous waste disposed of at the site may nevertheless be liable for all of the clean-up costs. CERCLA authorizes a party who has incurred clean-up costs to bring a "contribution action" against any other person who is liable or potentially liable for a percentage of the costs.

XenLights/Alamy

Who is liable for the clean-up of leaking hazardous waste?

Minimizing Liability One way for a business to minimize its potential liability under Superfund is to conduct environmental compliance audits of its own operations regularly. That is, the business can investigate its own operations and property to determine whether any environmental hazards exist.

The EPA encourages companies to conduct self-audits and promptly detect, disclose, and correct wrongdoing. Companies that do so are subject to lighter penalties for violations of environmental laws. (Fines may be reduced by as much as 75 percent.)

In addition, under EPA guidelines, the EPA will waive all fines if a small company corrects environmental violations within 180 days after being notified of the violations (or 360 days if pollution-prevention techniques are involved). The policy does not apply to criminal violations of environmental laws, though, or to violations that pose a significant threat to public health, safety, or the environment.

Defenses There are a few defenses to liability under CERCLA. The most important is the innocent landowner defense, which may protect a landowner who acquired the property after it was used for hazardous waste disposal.

To succeed in this defense, landowners must show that at the time the property was acquired, they had no reason to know that it had been used for hazardous waste disposal. These owners must show that at the time of the purchase, they undertook all appropriate investigation into the previous ownership and uses of the property to determine whether there was reason to be concerned about hazardous substances. In effect, this defense protects only property owners who took precautions and investigated the possibility of environmental hazards at the time they bought the property.

Practice and Review

Residents of Lake Caliopa, Minnesota, began noticing an unusually high number of lung ailments among the local population. Several concerned citizens pooled their resources and commissioned a study to compare the frequency of these health conditions in Lake Caliopa with national averages. The study concluded that residents of Lake Caliopa experienced four to seven times the rate of frequency of asthma, bronchitis, and emphysema as the population nationwide.

During the study period, citizens began expressing concerns about the large volume of smog emitted by the Cotton Design apparel manufacturing plant on the outskirts of town. The plant had a production facility two miles east of town beside the Tawakoni River and employed seventy workers. Just downstream on the Tawakoni River, the city of Lake Caliopa operated a public waterworks facility, which supplied all city residents with water.

After conducting its own investigation, the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency ordered Cotton Design to install new equipment to control air and water pollution. Later, citizens brought a lawsuit in a Minnesota state court against Cotton Design for various respiratory ailments allegedly caused or compounded by smog from Cotton Design's factory. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under the common law, what would each plaintiff be required to identify in order to be given relief by the court?
2. What standard for limiting emissions into the air does Cotton Design's pollution-control equipment have to meet?
3. If Cotton Design's emissions violated the Clean Air Act, how much can the EPA assess in fines per day?
4. What information must the city send to every household that it supplies with water?

Chapter Summary: Consumer and Environmental Law

CONSUMER LAW
Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling	1. Deceptive advertising—Generally, an advertising claim will be deemed deceptive if it would mislead a reasonable consumer. a. Bait-and-switch advertising—Advertising a lower-priced product (the bait) to lure consumers into the store and then telling them the product is unavailable or of poor quality and urging them to buy a higher-priced product (the switch) instead; prohibited by the FTC. b. Online deceptive advertising—The FTC has issued guidelines to help online businesses comply with the laws prohibiting deceptive advertising. c. FTC actions against deceptive advertising—(1) A formal complaint is sent to the alleged offender. (2) A cease and-desist order is generally issued, requiring the advertiser to stop the challenged advertising. (3) Counteradvertising may be required, so that the advertiser can correct the earlier misinformation. (4) Restitution may be sought. 2. False advertising claims under the Lanham Act—A successful claim for false advertising requires that a business establish (a) an injury to a commercial interest in reputation or sales, (b) direct causation of the injury by false or deceptive advertising by a competing company, and (c) a loss of business from buyers who were deceived by the advertising. 3. Marketing—Telemarketers are prohibited from using automatic dialing systems and prerecorded voices. Telemarketers must identify the seller, describe the product being sold, and disclose all material facts related to the sale. 4. Sales—"Cooling-off" laws permit buyers of goods sold in certain sales transactions (such as trade shows and door-to-door sales) to cancel their contracts within three business days. 5. Labeling—Manufacturers must comply with the labeling requirements for their specific products. In general, all labels must be accurate and not misleading.
Protection of Health and Safety	1. Food and drugs—The federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act protects consumers against adulterated and misbranded foods and drugs. The act establishes food standards, specifies safe levels of potentially hazardous food additives, and provides guidelines for advertising and labeling food products. 2. Consumer product safety—The Consumer Product Safety Act seeks to protect consumers from injury from hazardous products. The Consumer Product Safety Commission has the power to set safety standards for consumer products, ban the manufacture and sale of products that pose unreasonable risk, and remove products that are deemed imminently hazardous from the market.
Credit Protection	1. Truth in Lending Act, or TILA—A disclosure law that requires sellers and lenders to disclose credit terms or loan terms in certain transactions, including retail installment sales and loans, car loans, home-improvement loans, and certain real estate loans. Additionally, the TILA provides for the following: a. Equal credit opportunity—Creditors are prohibited from discriminating on the basis of race, religion, marital status, gender, national origin, color, or age. b. Credit card protection—Liability of cardholders for unauthorized charges is limited to $50, providing that notice requirements are met. Consumers are not liable for unauthorized charges made on unsolicited credit cards. The act also sets out procedures to be used in settling disputes between credit card companies and their cardholders.

	2. Fair Credit Reporting Act—Entitles consumers to request verification of the accuracy of a credit report and to have unverified or false information removed from their files. 3. Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act—Combats identity theft by establishing a national fraud alert system. It requires account numbers to be truncated and credit reporting agencies to provide one free credit report per year to consumers. 4. Fair Debt Collection Practices Act—Prohibits debt collectors from using unfair debt-collection practices, such as contacting the debtor at the debtor's place of employment if the employer objects or at unreasonable times, contacting third parties about the debt, and harassing the debtor.
ENVIRONMENTAL LAW
Protecting the Environment	1. Federal regulation— a. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is the primary agency regulating environmental law and administers most federal environmental policies and statutes. b. An environmental impact statement (EIS) is required for every major federal action. An EIS must analyze the action's impact on the environment, its adverse effects and possible alternatives, and its irreversible effects on environmental quality. 2. Common law actions— a. Nuisance—A common law doctrine under which persons may be held liable if their use of their property unreasonably interferes with others' rights to use their own property. b. Negligence and strict liability—Parties may recover damages for injuries sustained as a result of a firm's pollution-causing activities if they can demonstrate that the harm was a foreseeable result of the firm's failure to exercise reasonable care (negligence). Businesses engaging in ultrahazardous activities are liable for whatever injuries the activities cause, regardless of whether they exercise reasonable care.
Air and Water Pollution	1. Air pollution—Regulated under the authority of the Clean Air Act and its amendments. 2. Water pollution—Regulated under the authority of the Rivers and Harbors Appropriation Act and the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended by the Clean Water Act.
Toxic Chemicals and Hazardous Waste	Pesticides and herbicides, toxic substances, and hazardous waste are regulated under the authority of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act; the Toxic Substances Control Act; and the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, respectively. The Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA), or Superfund, regulates clean-up of hazardous waste disposal sites.

Issue Spotters

1. United Pharmaceuticals, Inc., has developed a new drug that it believes will be effective in the treatment of patients with AIDS. The drug has had only limited testing, but United wants to make the drug widely available as soon as possible. To market the drug, what must United prove to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration? (See Protection of Health and Safety.)
2. ChemCorp generates hazardous wastes from its operations. Disposal Trucking Company transports those wastes to Eliminators, Inc., which owns a site for hazardous waste disposal. Eliminators sells the property on which the disposal site is located to Fluid Properties, Inc. If the Environmental Protection Agency cleans up the site, from whom can it recover the cost? (See Toxic Chemicals and Hazardous Waste.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

32–1. Environmental Laws. Fruitade, Inc., is a processor of a soft drink called Freshen Up. Fruitade uses returnable glass bottles, which it cleans with a special acid to allow for further beverage processing. The acid is diluted with water and then allowed to pass into a navigable stream. Fruitade crushes its broken bottles and throws the crushed glass into the stream. Discuss fully any environmental laws that Fruitade may have violated. (See Air and Water Pollution.)

32–2. Credit Protection. Maria Ochoa receives two new credit cards on May 1. She has solicited one of them from Midtown Department Store, and the other arrives unsolicited from High-Flying Airlines. During the month of May, Ochoa makes numerous credit card purchases from Midtown Department Store, but she does not use the High-Flying Airlines card. On May 31, a burglar breaks into Ochoa's home and steals both credit cards, along with other items.

Ochoa notifies Midtown Department Store of the theft on June 2, but she fails to notify High-Flying Airlines. Using the Midtown credit card, the burglar makes a $500 purchase on June 1 and a $200 purchase on June 3. The burglar then charges a vacation flight on the High-Flying Airlines card for $1,000 on June 5. Ochoa receives the bills for these charges and refuses to pay them. Discuss Ochoa's liability in these situations. (See Credit Protection.)

32–3. Spotlight on McDonald's—Food Labeling. A McDonald's Happy Meal® consists of an entrée, a small order of French fries, a small drink, and a toy. In the early 1990s, McDonald's Corp. began to aim its Happy Meal marketing at children aged one to three. In 1995, McDonald's began making nutritional information for its food products available in documents known as "McDonald's Nutrition Facts." The documents list the food items that the restaurant serves and provide a nutritional breakdown, but the Happy Meal is not included.

Marc Cohen filed a suit in an Illinois state court against McDonald's. Cohen alleged, among other things, that McDonald's had violated a state law prohibiting consumer fraud and deceptive business practices by failing to follow the Nutrition Labeling and Education Act (NLEA). The NLEA generally requires that standard nutrition facts be listed on food labels. The act, however, sets out different, less detailed requirements for products specifically intended for children under the age of four. Does it make sense to have different requirements for children of this age? Why or why not? Should a state court impose regulations when the NLEA has not done so? Explain. [Cohen v. McDonald's Corp., 347 Ill.App.3d 627, 808 N.E.2d 1, 283 Ill.Dec. 451 (1 Dist. 2004)] (See Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling.)

32–4. Environmental Impact Statements. The U.S. Forest Service (USFS) proposed a travel management plan (TMP) for the Beartooth Ranger District in the Pryor and Absaroka Mountains in the Custer National Forest of southern Montana. The TMP would convert unauthorized user-created routes within the wilderness to routes authorized for motor vehicle use. It would also permit off-road "dispersed vehicle camping" within 300 feet of the routes, with some seasonal restrictions. The TMP would ban cross-country motorized travel outside the designated routes. Is an environmental impact statement required before the USFS implements the TMP? If so, what aspects of the environment should the USFS consider in preparing it? Discuss. [Pryors Coalition v. Weldon, 551 Fed.Appx. 426 (9th Cir. 2014)] (See Protecting the Environment.)

32–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Deceptive Advertising. Innovative Marketing, Inc. (IMI), sold "scareware"—computer security software. IMI's Internet ads redirected consumers to sites where they were told that a scan of their computers had detected dangerous files—viruses, spyware, and "illegal" pornography. In fact, no scans were conducted. Kristy Ross, an IMI cofounder and vice president, reviewed and edited the ads. She was also aware of the many complaints that consumers had made about them. An individual can be held liable under the Federal Trade Commission Act's prohibition of deceptive acts or practices if the person (1) participated directly in the deceptive practices or had the authority to control them and (2) had or should have had knowledge of them. Were IMI's ads deceptive? If so, can Ross be held liable? Explain. [Federal Trade Commission v. Ross, 743 F.3d 886 (4th Cir. 2014)] (See Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 32–5, go to Appendix E.

32–6. The Clean Water Act. ICG Hazard, LLC, operated the Thunder Ridge surface coal mine in Leslie County, Kentucky, under a National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System permit issued by the Kentucky Division of Water (KDOW). As part of the operation, ICG discharges selenium into the surrounding water. Selenium is a naturally occurring element that endangers aquatic life at a certain concentration. KDOW knew when it issued the permit that mines in the area may produce selenium but did not specify discharge limits for the element in ICG's permit. Instead, the agency imposed a one-time monitoring requirement, which ICG met. Does ICG's discharge of selenium violate the Clean Water Act? Explain. [Sierra Club v. ICG Hazard, LLC, 781 F.3d 281 (6th Cir. 2015)] (See Air and Water Pollution.)

32–7. Debt Collection. Zakia Mashiri owns a home in San Diego, California. She is a member of the Westwood Club Homeowners' Association (HOA), which charges each member an annual fee. When Mashiri failed to pay the fee, the law firm of Epsten Grinnell & Howell sent her a letter demanding payment. The letter read, "Failure to pay your . . . account in full within thirty-five days from the date of this letter will result in a lien . . . against your property." Mashiri asked for validation of the debt. Within two weeks of receiving it, she sent the HOA a check for the fee. Meanwhile, the law firm filed a lien against her property. Mashiri filed a lawsuit in a federal district court against the law firm, alleging a violation of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. On what provision of the act did Mashiri likely base her allegation? Will she succeed in her lawsuit against the law firm? Explain your answer. [Mashiri v. Epsten Grinnell & Howell, 845 F.3d 984 (9th Cir. 2017)] (See Credit Protection.)

32–8. False Advertising. Rainbow School, Inc., has run a childcare facility in Fayetteville, North Carolina, for over twenty years. In addition to using the word "rainbow" in its name, the school uses rainbow imagery on its logo. Rainbow Early Education Holding, LLC, operates child-care facilities in several states. Early Education opened a branch in Fayetteville near the school under the name "Rainbow Child Care Center" that also used rainbow imagery on its logo. The school filed a suit in a federal district court against Early Education, alleging a violation of the Lanham Act. The parties entered into a settlement agreement that required Early Education to stop using the word "rainbow" in connection with its Fayetteville facility. The court issued an injunction to enforce the agreement. Early Education continued to use the word "rainbow" in domain names, links, and meta tags associated with its Fayetteville facility's website. Rainbow imagery was used in a mailer inviting residents to the "nearest Rainbow Child Care Center." Did Early Education violate the Lanham Act? Explain. [Rainbow School, Inc. v. Rainbow Early Education Holding LLC, 887 F.3d 610 (4th Cir. 2018)] (See Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling.)

32–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Consumer Protection. In Richland, Washington, Robert Ingersoll planned his wedding to include about a hundred guests, a photographer, a caterer, a wedding cake, and flowers. Ingersoll had been a customer of Arlene's Flowers and Gifts for more than nine years and had spent several thousand dollars at the shop. When he approached Arlene's owner, Baronelle Stutzman, to buy flowers for his wedding, she refused because Ingersoll and his fiancé, Curt Freed, were a same-sex couple. Deeply offended, Ingersoll and Freed dropped their wedding plans and married in a modest ceremony. [Arlene's Flowers, Inc. v. State of Washington, __U.S.__, 138 S.Ct. 2671, 201 L.Ed.2d 1067 (2018)] (See Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling.)

1. Federal and state laws attempt to protect consumers from unfair trade practices, including discriminatory requirements, related to consumer transactions. Using the Review step of the IDDR approach, consider whether it would be ethically fair to hold Stutzman personally liable for a violation of these laws.
2. Using the Discussion step of the IDDR approach, consider actions that Ingersoll and Freed as consumers might take in response to Arlene's—Stutzman's—discriminatory rejection of their offer to do business.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

32–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Consumer Protections. Many states have enacted laws that go even further than federal laws to protect consumers against deceptive and false advertising. These laws vary tremendously from state to state. (See Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling.)

1. The first group will decide whether having different laws is fair to sellers, who may be prohibited from engaging in a practice in one state that is legal in another.
2. The second group will consider how these different laws might affect a business.
3. A third group will determine whether it is fair that residents of one state have more protection than residents of another.

33 Liability of Accountants and Other Professionals

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. Under what common law theories may professionals be liable to clients?
2. What are the rules concerning an auditor's liability to third parties?
3. How might an accountant violate the Securities Act?
4. What crimes might an accountant commit under the Internal Revenue Code?
5. What is protected by the attorney-client privilege?

"A member should observe the profession's technical and ethical standards . . . and discharge professional responsibility to the best of the member's ability."

Article V, Code of Professional Conduct
American Institute of Certified Public Accountants

Professionals, such as accountants, attorneys, physicians, and architects, are increasingly faced with the threat of liability. In part, this is because the public has become more aware that professionals are required to deliver competent services and adhere to certain standards of performance within their professions.

The standard of due care to which the members of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants are expected to adhere is set out in the chapter-opening quotation. Investors rely heavily on the opinions of certified public accountants when making decisions about whether to invest in a company.

The failure of several major companies and leading public accounting firms in the past twenty years has focused attention on the importance of abiding by professional accounting standards. Numerous corporations—from American International Group (AIG, the world's largest insurance company), to Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, now-defunct Theranos, and Japan-based Toshiba—have been accused of engaging in accounting fraud. These companies may have reported fictitious revenues, concealed liabilities or debts, or artificially inflated their assets.

33–1 Potential Liability to Clients

Focus Question 1
Under what common law theories may professionals be liable to clients?

Under the common law, professionals may be liable to clients for breach of contract, negligence, or fraud.

33–1a Liability for Breach of Contract

Accountants and other professionals face liability under the common law for any breach of contract. A professional owes a duty to a client to honor the terms of their contract and to perform the contract within the stated time period. If the professional fails to perform as agreed, then the contract has been breached, and the client has the right to pursue recovery of damages.

Possible damages include expenses incurred by the client in securing another professional to provide the contracted-for services and any other reasonable and foreseeable losses that arise from the professional's breach. For instance, if the client had to pay penalties for failing to meet deadlines, the court may order the professional to pay an equivalent amount in damages to the client.

33–1b Liability for Negligence

Accountants and other professionals may also be held liable under the common law for negligence in the performance of their services. Recall that the following elements must be proved to establish negligence:

1. A duty of care existed.
2. That duty of care was breached.
3. The plaintiff suffered an injury.
4. The injury was proximately caused by the defendant's breach of the duty of care.

Negligence cases against professionals often focus on the standard of care exercised by the professional. All professionals are subject to standards of conduct established by codes of professional ethics, by state statutes, and by judicial decisions. They are also governed by the contracts they enter into with their clients.

In performing their contracts, professionals must exercise the established standards of care, knowledge, and judgment generally accepted by members of their professional group. Here, we look at the duty of care owed by two groups of professionals that frequently perform services for business firms: accountants and attorneys.

Accountant's Duty of Care Accountants play a major role in a business's financial system. Accountants establish and maintain financial records, as well as design, control, and audit record-keeping systems. They also prepare statements that reflect an individual's or a business's financial status, give tax advice, and prepare tax returns.

Generally, an accountant must possess the skills that an ordinarily prudent accountant would have and must exercise the degree of care that an ordinarily prudent accountant would exercise. The level of skill expected of accountants and the degree of care that they should exercise in performing their services are reflected in the standards discussed next.

GAAP and GAAS. When performing their services, accountants in the United States must comply with generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP) and generally accepted auditing standards (GAAS). The Financial Accounting Standards Board (FASB, usually pronounced "faz-bee") determines what accounting conventions, rules, and procedures constitute GAAP at a given point in time. GAAS, established by the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, set forth the professional qualities and judgment that an auditor should exercise

Generally Accepted Accounting Principles (GAAP) The conventions, rules, and procedures developed by the Financial Accounting Standards Board to define accepted accounting practices at a particular time.

Generally Accepted Auditing Standards (GAAS) Standards established by the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants to define the professional qualities and judgment that should be exercised by an auditor in performing an audit.

in performing an audit. Normally, an accountant who conforms to generally accepted standards and acts in good faith will not be held liable to the client for incorrect judgment.

A violation of GAAP or GAAS is considered prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the accountant. Compliance with GAAP and GAAS, however, does not necessarily relieve an accountant from potential legal liability. An accountant may be held to a higher standard of conduct established by state statute or by judicial decisions.

International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS). A set of accounting standard used in many nations around the world.

IFRS. Although U.S. companies use GAAP, many other countries rely on a different set of accounting rules known as International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS). There has been some discussion of eventually replacing GAAP with IFRS, which are considered simpler and more straightforward. For the time being, however, companies in the United States will continue to comply with GAAP.

Defalcation Embezzlement or misappropriation of funds.

Auditor An accountant qualified to perform audits (systematic inspections) of a business's financial records.

Discovering Improprieties. An accountant is not required to discover every impropriety, defalcation [1] (embezzlement), or fraud in a client's books. If, however, the impropriety, defalcation, or fraud has gone undiscovered because of the accountant's negligence or failure to perform an express or implied duty, the accountant will be liable for any resulting losses suffered by the client. Therefore, an accountant who uncovers suspicious financial transactions and fails to investigate the matter fully or to inform the client of the discovery can normally be held liable to the client for the resulting loss.

Suppose an accountant uncovers evidence that a partner has been embezzling funds from a client law firm. What steps should the accountant take? What are the possible ramifications if the accountant fails to take these steps?

Audits. One of the most important tasks that an accountant may perform for a business is an audit. An audit is a systematic inspection, by analyses and tests, of a business's financial records. An accountant qualified to perform audits is often called an auditor. After performing an audit, the auditor issues an opinion letter stating whether the financial statements fairly present the business's financial position.

The purpose of an audit is to provide the auditor with evidence to support an opinion on the reliability of the business's financial statements. A normal audit is not intended to uncover fraud or other misconduct. Nevertheless, an accountant may be liable for failing to detect misconduct if a normal audit would have revealed it. Also, if an auditor agreed to examine the records for evidence of fraud or other obvious misconduct and then failed to detect it, the auditor may be liable.

Qualified Opinions and Disclaimers. In issuing an opinion letter, an auditor may qualify the opinion or include a disclaimer. In a disclaimer, the auditor basically states that there is insufficient information to issue an opinion. A qualified opinion or a disclaimer must be specific and must identify the reason for the qualification or disclaimer.

Example 33.1 Richard performs an audit of Lacey Corporation. In the opinion letter, Richard qualifies his opinion by stating that there is uncertainty about how a lawsuit against the firm will be resolved. In this situation, Richard will not be liable if the outcome of the suit is unfavorable for the firm. Richard could still be liable, however, for failing to discover other problems that an audit in compliance with GAAS rules would have revealed. ■

Unaudited Financial Statements. Sometimes, accountants are called on to prepare unaudited financial statements. (A financial statement is considered unaudited if incomplete auditing procedures have been used in its preparation or if insufficient procedures have been used to justify an opinion.) Lesser standards of care are typically required in this situation.

1. This term, pronounced deh-fal-kay-shun, is derived from the Latin de ("off") and falx ("sickle"—a tool used for cutting grain or tall grass). As used here, the term refers to the act of an embezzler.

Nevertheless, accountants may be liable for omissions from unaudited statements. Accountants may be subject to liability for failing, in accordance with standard accounting procedures, to designate a balance sheet as "unaudited." An accountant will also be held liable for failure to disclose to a client any facts or circumstances that give reason to believe that misstatements have been made or that a fraud has been committed.

Defenses to Negligence. If an accountant is found guilty of negligence, the client can collect damages for losses that arose from the accountant's negligence. An accountant facing a claim of negligence, however, has several possible defenses, including the following:

1. The accountant was not negligent.
2. If the accountant was negligent, this negligence was not the proximate cause of the client's losses.
3. The client was also negligent (depending on whether state law allows contributory negligence as a defense).

Example 33.2 Coopers & Peterson, LLP, provides accounting services for Bandon Steel Mills, Inc. (BSM). Coopers advises BSM to report a certain transaction as a $12.3 million gain on its financial statements. Later, BSM plans to make a public offering of its stock. The SEC reviews its financial statements and determines that certain errors in the accounting treatment of the transaction have to be corrected before the sale.

Because of the delay, the public offering does not occur on May 2, when BSM's stock is selling for $16 per share. Instead, it takes place on June 13, when, due to unrelated factors, the price has fallen to $13.50. If BSM files a lawsuit against Coopers, claiming that the negligent accounting resulted in the stock's being sold at a lower price, BSM is unlikely to prevail. Although the accounting firm's negligence may have delayed the stock offering, the negligence was not the proximate cause of the decline in the stock price. Thus, Coopers would not be liable for damages based on the price decline. ■

Assume that the accounting firm for this steel manufacturer makes an error in a financial statement. If the initial public offering is delayed and the stock price falls in the meantime, is the accounting firm liable for the lower price?

Attorney's Duty of Care

The conduct of attorneys is governed by rules established by each state and by the American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct. All attorneys owe a duty to provide competent and diligent representation.

Attorneys are required to be familiar with well-settled principles of law applicable to a case and to find relevant law that can be discovered through a reasonable amount of research. They must also investigate and discover facts that could materially affect clients' legal rights.

Normally, an attorney's performance is expected to be that of a reasonably competent general practitioner of ordinary skill, experience, and capacity. An attorney who holds himself or herself out as having expertise in a particular area of law (such as intellectual property) is held to a higher standard of care in that area of the law than attorneys without such expertise.

Misconduct. Typically, a state's rules of professional conduct for attorneys provide that committing a criminal act that reflects adversely on the attorney's "honesty or trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects" is professional misconduct. The rules often further provide that a lawyer should not engage in conduct involving "dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." Under these rules, state authorities can discipline attorneys for many types of misconduct.

Case Example 33.3 Evangalos Argyrakis, a Nebraska attorney, pleaded guilty to a felony for repeatedly punching his eighty-three-year-old father in the face. He was sentenced to three years' probation. The state judiciary began an inquiry into whether Argyrakis had been convicted of a "crime of violence," which would trigger severe sanctions under Nebraska's rules of professional conduct for attorneys. Argyrakis denied the allegation, insisting that his father had been the "aggressor" in the incident. In addition, Argyrakis blamed his behavior on mental health issues for which he had recently started receiving treatment.

The Nebraska Supreme Court was unmoved by Argyrakis's claims of self-defense and mental health problems. In the court's view, by falling back on such excuses, Argyrakis showed that he had not accepted responsibility for his actions. The court also found that Argyrakis had clearly been convicted of a crime of violence. Given the need to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the legal profession, the court decided that it had no alternative but to disbar Argyrakis, thus prohibiting him from the further practice of law in the state.[2]

Malpractice Professional negligence, or failure to exercise reasonable care and professional judgment, that results in injury, loss, or damage to those relying on the professional.

Liability for Malpractice. An attorney who fails to exercise reasonable care and professional judgment breaches the duty of care and can be held liable for malpractice (professional negligence). In malpractice cases—as in all cases involving allegations of negligence—the plaintiff must prove that the attorney's breach of the duty of care actually caused the plaintiff to suffer some injury.

Ethical Issue

What are an attorney's responsibilities with respect to protecting data stored on the cloud? To achieve both cost savings and better security, more and more attorneys are storing their data, including confidential client information, on the cloud. Sometimes, professionals assume that once their data have migrated to the cloud, they no longer have to be concerned with keeping the information secure. But cloud computing is simply the virtualization of the computing process. In other words, the professional is still ultimately responsible for the information.

Attorneys' obligations for their clients' information are spelled out in the American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which serve as the basis for the ethics rules for attorneys adopted by most states. Comment 17 to Model Rule 1.6 states, "The lawyer must take reasonable precautions to prevent the [client's] information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients." Thus, lawyers have an ethical duty to safeguard confidential client information, whether it is stored as documents in a filing cabinet or as electromagnetic impulses on a server that might be located anywhere. (Note that Rule 1.6 does not require an attorney to guarantee that a breach of confidentiality will never occur.)

Certainly, it is harder to maintain control over information stored on the cloud. The attorney who "owns" the data probably does not even know the location of the server where the information is stored. Furthermore, a provider of cloud computing services may move data from one server to another. Nevertheless, attorneys should be aware of jurisdictional issues and make sure that their cloud computing service provider is complying with data protection regulations and privacy notification requirements wherever the provider's servers are located.

Case Example 33.4 June De Line consulted with attorney Carol Johnston on estate and wealth-preservation matters, especially with respect to a home June owned in La Jolla, California. With Johnston's assistance, June sought to effect a "base transfer" in which she would sell the La Jolla home and buy a home in Los Angeles while retaining the La Jolla home's relatively low assessment value, meaning that her property taxes would not increase. She would also be able to leave the home to her daughter Grace at the same assessment.

Rules for the base transfer were not adequately observed in the purchase, however, so June (and Grace) did not receive the expected tax benefits.

Grace sued Johnston in a California state court for malpractice. The court dismissed this suit, holding that Johnston owed no duty of care to Grace because Grace was not Johnston's client. Grace appealed, arguing that she was owed a duty of care as her mother's intended beneficiary. An appeals court upheld the lower court's decision, noting that it remained uncertain whether (1) June would keep the Los Angeles house for the rest of her life, (2) June would transfer the house to Grace on her death, or (3) California's property tax laws would remain the same until June's death. Therefore, the court ruled, any injury that a nonclient such as Grace might suffer because of Johnston's alleged malpractice was not "reasonably foreseeable" and could not be the basis for legal action.[3]

What must a plaintiff prove when when claiming that an attorney has committed malpractice?

33–1c Liability for Fraud

Recall that fraud, or fraudulent misrepresentation, involves the following elements:

1. A misrepresentation of a material fact.
2. An intent to deceive.
3. Justifiable reliance by the innocent party on the misrepresentation.

In addition, to obtain damages, the innocent party must have been injured. Both actual and constructive fraud are potential sources of legal liability for an accountant or other professional.

Actual Fraud A professional may be held liable for actual fraud when (1) the professional intentionally misstates a material fact to mislead a client, and (2) the client is injured as a result of justifiably relying on the misstated fact. A material fact is one that a reasonable person would consider important in deciding whether to act.

The connection between the fraudulent conduct of an accountant and the tax liability of a defrauded business owner was at issue in the following case.

3. De Line v. Katten Muchin Rosenman LLP, __ Cal.App.2d __, 2020 WL 598099 (2020).

Case 33.1

Suarez v. Fernandez

Court of Appeals of Texas, Dallas, __ S.W.3d __, 2019 WL 1922732 (2019).

Facts Susanna Fernandez, Julian Ochoa, Francisco Bravo, and Rogelio Montoya formed El Hoyo, Inc., to operate a restaurant. Juan Suarez was the accountant for the corporation.

In the seventh year of El Hoyo's operation, during an audit of the restaurant's records, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) informed Fernandez that she had an outstanding personal tax liability of $105,397. She contacted Bravo and Montoya, who told her to speak with Suarez. Her attempts to see Suarez were unsuccessful.

Fernandez filed a suit in a Texas state court against Suarez, asserting fraud and seeking actual damages and exemplary, or punitive, damages. She claimed that Suarez had fraudulently used her identity to process credit card payments for goods sold by the restaurant, kept the proceeds without paying the taxes, and thereby made her personally liable for the unpaid amount. Suarez did not respond to the complaint.

After a hearing, the trial court rendered a default judgment in favor of Fernandez, awarding the plaintiff the amount of the unpaid taxes as damages and $400,000 in exemplary damages. Suarez filed an appeal.

Issue Was there sufficient proof of a causal connection between Suarez's fraud and Fernandez's injuries?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the trial court's judgment and award of actual damages. "We conclude the evidence was legally sufficient to support the trial court's actual damage award."

Reason Fernandez was the only witness at the hearing in the trial court. She testified that Suarez had told her that El Hoyo had a taxpayer ID number and a machine to process credit card payments through the corporation's merchant account. However, the IRS informed her during its audit that all of the credit card payments had been processed under her name and Social Security number. Credit card income for food and drinks at the restaurant led to her outstanding tax liability of $105,397.

Before this revelation, Fernandez had no idea that credit card payments to the restaurant were being processed under her name instead of through a corporate account. She had not given permission for this use of her name and Social Security number. When Fernandez had confronted Bravo and Montoya, they had said they knew nothing about the set-up and had told her to ask Suarez. She had attempted to see Suarez several times, but he had completely avoided her.

Fernandez's unopposed testimony was sufficient to prove that her personal tax liability for credit card payments to the restaurant resulted from Suarez's misrepresentation. The appellate court remanded the case for a redetermination of the amount of exemplary damages, however, which were limited under a state statute to "two times the amount of economic damages."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment In light of the fact that Suarez did not respond to Fernandez's complaint at the trial level, should any restrictions be placed on his appeal? Discuss.
- Economic What might Fernandez and El Hoyo have done to thwart Suarez's fraud? Explain.

Constructive Fraud Conduct that is treated as fraud under the law even when there is no proof of intent to defraud, usually because of the existence of a special relationship or fiduciary duty.

Constructive Fraud Professionals may sometimes be held liable for constructive fraud whether or not they acted with fraudulent intent. Liability arises because the professional has a duty to the client and violates that duty by making a material misrepresentation. The client must be injured as a result of justifiably relying on the professional's misstatements to obtain damages.

Constructive fraud may be found when accountants are grossly negligent in performing their duties. Example 33.5 Paula, an accountant, is conducting an audit of ComCo, Inc. Paula accepts the explanations of Ron, a ComCo officer, regarding certain financial irregularities, despite evidence that contradicts those explanations and indicates that the irregularities may be illegal. Paula's conduct could be characterized as an intentional failure to perform a duty in reckless disregard of the consequences of such failure. This would constitute gross negligence and could be held to be constructive fraud. ■

33–2 Potential Liability to Third Parties

Traditionally, accountants and other professionals owed a duty only to those with whom they had a direct contractual relationship—that is, those with whom they were in privity of contract. A professional's duty was solely to the client. Violations of statutes, fraud, and other intentional or reckless acts of wrongdoing were the only exceptions to this general rule.

Today, numerous third parties—including investors, shareholders, creditors, corporate managers and directors, and regulatory agencies—rely on the opinions of auditors when making decisions. In view of this extensive reliance, many courts have all but abandoned the privity requirement in regard to accountants' liability to third parties.

In this section, we focus primarily on the potential liability of auditors to third parties. The majority of courts now hold that auditors can be held liable to third parties for negligence, but the standard for the imposition of this liability varies.

33–2a The Ultramares Rule

Focus Question 2

What are the rules concerning an auditor's liability to third parties?

The traditional rule regarding an accountant's liability to third parties is based on privity of contract and was enunciated by Chief Judge Benjamin Cardozo (of the New York Court of Appeals) in 1931. Classic Case Example 33.6 Fred Stern & Company hired the public accounting firm of Touche, Niven & Company to review Stern's financial records and prepare a balance sheet for the year ending December 31, 1923.[4] Touche prepared the balance sheet and supplied Stern with thirty-two certified copies. According to the certified balance sheet, Stern had a net worth (assets less liabilities) of $1,070,715.26.

In reality, however, Stern's liabilities exceeded its assets. The company's records had been falsified by insiders at Stern so that assets exceeded liabilities, resulting in a positive net worth. In reliance on the certified balance sheets, Ultramares Corporation loaned substantial amounts to Stern. After Stern was declared bankrupt, Ultramares brought an action against Touche for negligence in an attempt to recover damages.

The New York Court of Appeals (that state's highest court) refused to impose liability on Touche. The court concluded that Touche's accountants owed a duty of care only to those persons for whose "primary benefit" the statements were intended. In this case, the statements were intended only for the benefit of Stern. The court held that in the absence of privity or a relationship "so close as to approach that of privity," a party could not recover from an accountant.[5]

The Requirement of Privity The requirement of privity has since been referred to as the Ultramares rule, or the New York rule. It continues to be used in some states. Spotlight Case Example 33.7 Toro Company supplied equipment and credit to Summit Power Equipment Distributors and required Summit to submit audited reports indicating its financial condition. Accountants at Krouse, Kern & Company prepared the reports, which allegedly contained mistakes and omissions regarding Summit's financial condition.

Toro extended large amounts of credit to Summit in reliance on the audited reports. When Summit was unable to repay the loans, Toro brought a negligence action against the accounting firm and proved that accountants at Krouse had known the reports would be used by Summit to induce Toro to extend credit. Nevertheless, under the Ultramares rule, the court refused to hold the accounting firm liable because the firm was not in privity with Toro.[6]

blackred/Getty Images

To what extent is an accounting firm liable for incorrect balance-sheet information that is distributed to the public?

"Near Privity" Modification The Ultramares rule was modified somewhat in a 1985 New York case, Credit Alliance Corp. v. Arthur Andersen & Co.[7] In that case, the court held that if a third party has a sufficiently close relationship or nexus (link, or connection) with an accountant, then the Ultramares privity requirement may be satisfied without the establishment of an accountant-client relationship. The rule enunciated in the Credit Alliance case is often referred to as the "near privity" rule. Only a minority of states have adopted this rule.

33–2b The Restatement Rule

The Ultramares rule has been severely criticized. Because much of the work performed by auditors is intended for use by persons who are not parties to the contract, many argue that auditors should owe a duty to these third parties. As support for this position has grown, there has been an erosion of the Ultramares rule to expose accountants to liability to third parties in some situations.

The majority of courts have adopted the position taken by the Restatement (Third) of Torts, which states that accountants are subject to liability for negligence not only to their clients but also to foreseen or known users—or classes of users—of their reports or financial statements. Under the Restatement (Third) of Torts, an accountant's liability extends to the following:

1. Persons for whose benefit and guidance the accountant "intends to supply the information or knows that the recipient intends to supply it."
2. Persons whom the accountant "intends the information to influence or knows that the recipient so intends."

Example 33.8 Steve, an accountant, prepares a financial statement for Tech Software, Inc., a client, knowing that Tech Software will submit the statement when it applies for a loan from First National Bank. If Steve makes negligent misstatements or omissions in the statement, he may be held liable to the bank because he knew that the bank would rely on his work product when deciding whether to make the loan.

33–2c The "Reasonably Foreseeable Users" Rule

A small minority of courts hold accountants liable to any users whose reliance on an accountant's statements or reports was reasonably foreseeable. This standard has been criticized as extending liability too far and exposing accountants to massive liability.

Exhibit 33–1 summarizes the three different views of accountants' liability to third parties. The majority of courts have concluded that the Restatement's approach is the most reasonable because it allows accountants to control their exposure to liability. Liability is "fixed by the accountants' particular knowledge at the moment the audit is published," not by the foreseeability of the harm that might occur to a third party after the report is released.

33–2d Liability of Attorneys to Third Parties

Like accountants, attorneys may be held liable under the common law to third parties who rely on legal opinions to their detriment. Generally, an attorney is not liable to a nonclient unless there is fraud (or malicious conduct) by the attorney. The liability principles stated in the Restatement (Third) of Torts, however, may apply to attorneys as well as to accountants.

33–3 Liability of Accountants under Federal Laws

Accountants also face potential liability under federal statutes, several of which merit special discussion. These include the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the Securities Act of 1933, the 1934 Securities Exchange Act, and the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act.

Exhibit 33–1 Three Basic Rules of Accountant's Liability to Third Parties

RULE	DESCRIPTION	APPLICATION
Ultramares* rule	Liability is imposed only if the accountant is in privity, or near privity, with the third party.	A minority of courts apply this rule.
Restatement* rule	Liability is imposed only if the third party's reliance is foreseen, or known, or if the third party is among a class of foreseen, or known, users.	The majority of courts have adopted this rule.
"Reasonably foreseeable users" rule	Liability is imposed if the third party's use was reasonably foreseeable.	A small minority of courts use this rule.

33–3a The Sarbanes-Oxley Act

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act imposes a number of strict requirements on both domestic and foreign public accounting firms. These requirements apply to firms that provide auditing services to companies ("issuers") whose securities are sold to public investors. The act defines an issuer as a company that (1) has securities that are registered under Section 12 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, (2) is required to file reports under Section 15(d) of the 1934 act, or (3) files—or has filed—a registration statement that has not yet become effective under the Securities Act of 1933.

The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board The Sarbanes-Oxley Act increased government oversight of public accounting practices by creating the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission. The board oversees the audit of public companies that are subject to securities laws. The goal is to protect public investors and to ensure that public accounting firms comply with the provisions of the act. The act defines public accounting firms as firms "engaged in the practice of public accounting or preparing or issuing audit reports." The key provisions relating to the duties of the oversight board and the requirements relating to public accounting firms are summarized in Exhibit 33–2.

Exhibit 33–2 Key Provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act Relating to Public Accounting Firms

AUDITOR INDEPENDENCE
To help ensure that auditors remain independent of the firms that they audit, Title II of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act does the following:
1. Makes it unlawful for Registered Public Accounting Firms (RPAFs) to perform both audit and nonaudit services for the same company at the same time. Nonaudit services include the following: • Bookkeeping or other services related to the accounting records or financial statements of the audit client. • Financial information systems design and implementation. • Appraisal or valuation services. • Fairness opinions. • Management functions. • Broker or dealer, investment adviser, or investment banking services.
2. Requires preapproval for most auditing services from the issuer's (the corporation's) audit committee.
3. Requires audit partner rotation by prohibiting RPAFs from providing audit services to an issuer if either the lead audit partner or the audit partner responsible for reviewing the audit has provided such services to that corporation in each of the prior five years.
4. Requires RPAFs to make timely reports to the audit committees of the corporations. The report must indicate all critical accounting policies and practices to be used; all alternative treatments of financial information within generally accepted accounting principles that have been discussed with the corporation's management officials, the ramifications of the use of such alternative treatments, and the treatment preferred by the auditor; and other material written communications between the auditor and the corporation's management.
5. Makes it unlawful for an RPAF to provide auditing services to an issuer if the corporation's chief executive officer, chief financial officer, chief accounting officer, or controller was previously employed by the auditor and participated in any capacity in the audit of the corporation during the one-year period preceding the date that the audit began.
DOCUMENT INTEGRITY AND RETENTION
1. The act provides that anyone who destroys, alters, or falsifies records with the intent to obstruct or influence a federal investigation or in relation to bankruptcy proceedings can be criminally prosecuted and sentenced to a fine, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both.
2. The act requires accountants who audit or review publicly traded companies to retain all working papers related to the audit or review for a period of five years (amended to seven years). Violators can be sentenced to a fine, imprisonment for up to ten years, or both.

As part of an audit, the board may compel persons to testify in an investigative interview. Under the board's rules, any person compelled to testify "may be accompanied, represented and advised by counsel." The board can limit attendance at the interview to the person being examined, that person's counsel, and other persons that the board determines are "appropriate."

Whether the board infringed a witness's right to counsel under its own rules was at issue in the following case.

Laccetti v. Securities and Exchange Commission

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 885 F.3d 724 (2018).

Facts The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board investigated an audit by the Ernst & Young accounting firm. The investigation focused on Mark Laccetti, who was the Ernst & Young partner in charge of the audit. As part of the investigation, the board interviewed Laccetti. During the interview, the board allowed him to be accompanied by an Ernst & Young attorney. But the board denied his request to also be accompanied by an accounting expert who would assist his counsel. Ultimately, the board found that Laccetti had violated the board's rules and auditing standards. The board suspended him from the accounting profession for two years and fined him $85,000. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) upheld the sanctions. Laccetti appealed.

Issue Did the board act unlawfully when it barred Laccetti from bringing an accounting expert to assist his legal counsel during the investigative interview?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit vacated the SEC's order against Laccetti and remanded the case. "The Board infringed [Laccetti's] right to counsel by unreasonably barring the accounting expert from assisting his counsel at the interview."

Reason Laccetti's request was denied because the board did not want Ernst & Young to monitor the investigation. The court reasoned that this rationale "suffers from three independent flaws." First, the explanation was arbitrary and capricious—"given the presence of the Ernst & Young attorney at the interview," the rationale "makes no sense." Second, the board could have told Laccetti to bring an accounting expert who was not affiliated with Ernst & Young, but the board did not do this. Third, the board's rules prevent it from denying Laccetti the use of an expert to assist his counsel at the interview. A lawyer educated only in the law may not fully serve a client during the proceeding without guidance from an expert. If this assistance is denied, the client's right to counsel is "substantially qualified." In this light, "an expert is an extension of counsel." Furthermore, the board directs its staff to permit the presence of "a technical consultant" at an investigative interview.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment If the board were to open a new disciplinary proceeding against Laccetti and re-interview him, what would it have to do to comply with the court's decision?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the board's rules guaranteed a witness's right to counsel but expressly excluded "technical consultants and experts" during an investigative interview. Would the result have been different? Explain.

Working Papers The documents used and developed by an accountant during an audit, such as notes, computations, and memoranda.

Requirements for Maintaining Working Papers Performing an audit for a client involves an accumulation of working papers—the documents used and developed during the audit. These include notes, computations, memoranda, copies, and other papers that make up the work product of an accountant's services to a client.

Under the common law, which in this instance has been codified in a number of states, working papers remain the accountant's property. It is important for accountants to retain such records in the event that they need to defend against lawsuits for negligence or other actions in which their competence is challenged. The client also has a right to access an accountant's working papers because they reflect the client's financial situation. On a client's request, an accountant must return to the client any of the client's records or journals, and failure to do so may result in liability.

Section 802(a)(1) of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act required accountants to maintain working papers relating to an audit or review for five years from the end of the fiscal period in which the audit or review was concluded. The requirement was subsequently extended to seven years. A knowing violation of this requirement will subject the accountant to a fine, imprisonment for up to ten years, or both.

33–3b The Securities Act of 1933

The Securities Act requires issuers to file registration statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) prior to an offering of securities.[8] Accountants frequently prepare and certify the financial statements that are included in the issuer's registration statement.

Liability under Section 11 Section 11 of the 1933 Securities Act imposes civil liability on accountants for misstatements and omissions of material facts in registration statements. Accountants may be liable if a financial statement they prepared for inclusion "contained an untrue statement of a material fact or omitted to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading."[9]

Focus Question 3
How might an accountant violate the Securities Act?

An accountant's liability for a misstatement or omission of a material fact in a registration statement extends to anyone who acquires a security covered by the registration statement. A purchaser of a security need only demonstrate having suffered a loss on the security. Proof of reliance on the materially false statement or misleading omission ordinarily is not required. Nor is there a requirement of privity between the accountant and the security purchaser.

The Due Diligence Standard. Section 11 imposes a duty on accountants to use due diligence in preparing the financial statements included in registration statements. Thus, after a purchaser has proved a loss on a security, the accountant has the burden of showing that due diligence was exercised in the preparation of the financial statements.

Due Diligence A required standard of care that certain professionals, such as accountants, must meet to avoid liability for securities violations.

To prove due diligence, accountants must demonstrate that they followed generally accepted standards and did not commit negligence or fraud. Specifically, to avoid liability, accountants must show that they did the following:

1. Conducted a reasonable investigation.
2. Had reasonable grounds to believe and did believe, at the time the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were true and that there was no omission of a material fact that would be misleading.[10]

In particular, the due diligence standard places a burden on accountants to verify information furnished by a corporation's officers and directors. Merely asking questions is not always sufficient to satisfy the requirement. Accountants may be held liable for failing to detect danger signals in documents furnished by corporate officers that required further investigation.

8. Many securities and transactions are expressly exempted from the 1933 Securities Act.
9. 15 U.S.C. Section 77k(a).
10. 15 U.S.C. Section 77k(b)(3).

Other Defenses to Liability. Besides proving that they have acted with due diligence, accountants can raise the following defenses to Section 11 liability:

1. There were no misstatements or omissions.
2. The misstatements or omissions were not of material facts.
3. The misstatements or omissions had no causal connection to the plaintiff's loss.
4. The plaintiff-purchaser invested in the securities knowing of the misstatements or omissions.

Which federal agency can bring criminal actions against professionals who commit willful violations under Section 12(2) of the Securities Act of 1933?

Liability under Section 12(2) Section 12(2) of the 1933 Securities Act imposes civil liability for fraud in relation to offerings or sales of securities.[11] Liability arises when an oral statement to an investor or a written prospectus[12] includes an untrue statement or omits a material fact. Some courts have applied Section 12(2) to accountants who aided and abetted (assisted) the seller or the offeror of the securities in violating Section 12(2).

Those who purchase securities and suffer harm as a result of a false or omitted statement, or some other violation, may bring a suit in a federal court to recover their losses and other damages. The U.S. Department of Justice brings criminal actions against those who commit willful violations. The penalties include fines of up to $10,000, imprisonment for up to five years, or both. The SEC is authorized to seek an injunction against a willful violator to prevent further violations. The SEC can also ask a court to grant other relief, such as an order to a violator to refund profits derived from an illegal transaction.

33–3c The Securities Exchange Act of 1934

Under Sections 18 and 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act and SEC Rule 10b-5, an accountant may be found liable for fraud. A plaintiff has a substantially heavier burden of proof under the 1934 act than under the 1933 act because an accountant does not have to prove due diligence to escape liability under the 1934 act.

Liability under Section 18 Section 18 of the 1934 act imposes civil liability on an accountant who makes or causes to be made in any application, report, or document a statement that at the time and in light of the circumstances was false or misleading with respect to any material fact.[13]

Section 18 liability is narrow in that it applies only to applications, reports, documents, and registration statements filed with the SEC. This remedy is further limited in that it applies only to sellers and purchasers. Under Section 18, a seller or purchaser must prove one of the following:

1. That the false or misleading statement affected the price of the security.
2. That the purchaser or seller relied on the false or misleading statement in making the purchase or sale and was not aware of the inaccuracy of the statement.

Good Faith Defense. Accountants will not be liable for violating Section 18 if they acted in good faith in preparing the financial statement. To demonstrate good faith, they must show that they had no knowledge that the financial statement was false and misleading. In addition, they must have had no intent to deceive, manipulate, defraud, or seek unfair advantage over another party.

Note that "mere" negligence in preparing a financial statement does not lead to liability under the 1934 act. This differs from the 1933 act, under which an accountant is liable for all negligent acts.

Other Defenses. In addition to the good faith defense, accountants can escape liability by proving that the buyer or seller of the security in question knew that the financial statement was false and misleading. Also, the statute of limitations may be asserted as a defense to liability under the 1934 act.

Liability under Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5 Accountants additionally face potential legal liability under the antifraud provisions contained in the Securities Exchange Act and SEC Rule 10b-5. The scope of these antifraud provisions is very broad and allows private parties to bring civil actions against violators.

Prohibited Conduct. Section 10(b) makes it unlawful for any person, including an accountant, to use, in connection with the purchase or sale of any security, any manipulative or deceptive device or contrivance in contravention of SEC rules and regulations.[14] Rule 10b-5 further makes it unlawful for any person, by use of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, to do the following:

1. Employ any device, scheme, or artifice (pretense) to defraud.
2. Make any untrue statement of a material fact or omit a material fact necessary to ensure that the statements made were not misleading, in light of the circumstances.
3. Engage in any act, practice, or course of business that operates or would operate as a fraud or deceit on any person, in connection with the purchase or sale of any security.[15]

Extent of Liability. Accountants may be held liable only to sellers or purchasers of securities under Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5. Privity is not necessary for a recovery.

An accountant may be found liable not only for fraudulent misstatements of material facts in written material filed with the SEC, but also for any fraudulent oral statements or omissions made in connection with the purchase or sale of any security. In some situations, accountants may also have the duty to correct misstatements that they discover in previous financial statements. For plaintiffs to succeed in recovering damages under these antifraud provisions, they must prove intent (scienter) to commit the fraudulent or deceptive act. Ordinary negligence is not enough.

33–3d The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act

The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act made some changes to the potential liability of accountants and other professionals in securities fraud cases. Among other things, the act imposed a statutory obligation on accountants. An auditor must use adequate procedures in an audit to detect any illegal acts of the company being audited. If something illegal is detected, the auditor must disclose it to the company's board of directors, the audit committee, or the SEC, depending on the circumstances.[16]

Proportionate Liability The act provides that, in most situations, a party is liable only for the proportion of damages for which that party is responsible.[17] An accountant who participates in, but is unaware of, illegal conduct may not be liable for the entire loss caused by the illegality.

Example 33.9 Nina, an accountant, helps the president and owner of Midstate Trucking company draft financial statements. The statements misrepresent Midstate's financial condition, but Nina is not aware of the fraud. Nina might be held liable, but the amount of her liability could be proportionately less than the entire loss.

Andrey_Popov/Shutterstock.com

If an accountant is unaware of a company officer's fraud, will he still be held fully liable for any losses caused by the misstatements?

Aiding and Abetting The act also made it a separate crime to aid and abet a violation of the Securities Exchange Act. Aiding and abetting might include knowingly participating in such an act, assisting in it, or keeping quiet about it. If an accountant knowingly aids and abets a primary violator, the SEC can seek an injunction or monetary damages.

Example 33.10 Smith & Jones, an accounting firm, performs an audit for ABC Sales Company that is so inadequate as to constitute gross negligence. ABC uses the materials provided by Smith & Jones as part of a scheme to defraud investors. When the scheme is uncovered, the SEC can bring an action against Smith & Jones for aiding and abetting on the ground that the firm knew or should have known of the material misrepresentations that were in its audit and on which investors were likely to rely.

33–4 Potential Criminal Liability

An accountant may be found criminally liable for violations of securities laws and tax laws. In addition, most states make it a crime to (1) knowingly certify false reports, (2) falsify, alter, or destroy books of accounts, and (3) obtain property or credit through the use of false financial statements.

33–4a Criminal Violations of Securities Laws

Accountants may be subject to criminal penalties for willful violations of U.S. securities laws. If convicted under the 1933 Securities Act, as noted earlier, they face imprisonment for up to five years and/or a fine of up to $10,000. Under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, if an accountant's false or misleading certified audit statement is used in a securities filing, the accountant may be held criminally liable. The accountant may be fined up to $5 million, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both.

33–4b Criminal Violations of Tax Laws

Focus Question 4

What crimes might an accountant commit under the Internal Revenue Code?

The Internal Revenue Code makes it a felony to willfully make false statements in a tax return or to willfully aid or assist others in preparing a false tax return. Felony violations are punishable by a fine of $100,000 ($500,000 in the case of a corporation) and imprisonment for up to three years.[18] This provision applies to anyone who prepares tax returns for others for compensation—not just to accountants.[19]

For a negligent understatement of a client's tax liability, the tax preparer is subject to a penalty of $1,000 or 50 percent of the income the preparer derived from the faulty return, whichever is greater. For a willful understatement of tax liability or reckless or intentional disregard of rules or regulations, the penalty is the greater of either $5,000 or 75 percent of the income so derived.[20] A tax preparer may also be subject to penalties for failing to furnish the taxpayer with a copy of the return, failing to sign the return, or failing to furnish the appropriate tax identification numbers.

In addition, a tax preparer may be fined $1,000 per document for aiding and abetting another's understatement of tax liability (the penalty is increased to $10,000 in corporate cases).[21] The tax preparer's liability is limited to one penalty per taxpayer per tax year.

33–5 Confidentiality and Privilege

Professionals are restrained by the ethical tenets of their professions to keep all communications with their clients confidential.

33–5a Attorney-Client Relationships

Focus Question 5

What is protected by the attorney-client privilege?

The confidentiality of attorney-client communications is protected by law, which confers a privilege on such communications. This privilege exists because of the client's need to fully disclose the facts of the case to the attorney.

To encourage frankness, confidential attorney-client communications relating to representation are normally held in strictest confidence and protected by law. The attorney and the attorney's employees may not discuss the client's case with anyone—even under court order—without the client's permission. The client holds the privilege, and only the client may waive it—by disclosing privileged information to someone outside the privilege, for instance.

Note, however, that the SEC has implemented rules requiring attorneys who become aware that a client has violated securities laws to report the violation to the SEC. Because reporting a client's misconduct can be a breach of the attorney-client privilege, these rules have created potential conflicts for some attorneys.

Once an attorney-client relationship arises, all communications between the parties are privileged. The question in the following case was whether communications between an attorney and an individual before that individual was informed that the attorney was not his counsel were privileged.

Case 33.3

Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Schultz

Superior Court of Pennsylvania, 133 A.3d 294 (2016).

Facts An investigation into allegations of sexual misconduct involving minors and Jerry Sandusky, a former defensive coordinator for the Pennsylvania State University football team, led a grand jury to subpoena Gary Schultz. Schultz, a retired vice president of the university, had overseen the campus police at the time of the alleged events.

Before testifying, Schultz met with Cynthia Baldwin, counsel for Penn State. He told her that he did not have any documents relating to the two incidents, believing this disclosure to be in the strictest confidence between attorney and client. Baldwin, however, saw her role as counsel only for Penn State, representing Schultz as an agent of the university, not personally. She did not explain this to him, and she appeared with him during his testimony.

Later, a file was found in Schultz's office containing notes pertaining to the two incidents. When Baldwin was called to testify, she revealed what he had told her at their meeting. On the basis of this testimony, the grand jury charged Schultz with the crimes of perjury, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy. Before a trial was held on these charges, Schultz filed a motion to preclude Baldwin's testimony and quash (suppress) the charges, arguing that her testimony violated the attorney-client privilege. The court denied the motion. Schulz appealed.

Issue Could an attorney who represented Penn State University testify about statements that Schultz made to her at a time when he believed that the attorney was representing him?

Decision No. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the order of the lower court regarding Schultz's pretrial motion. Baldwin was precluded from testifying about Schultz's privileged communications with her, and the charges of perjury, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy against Schultz were quashed.

Reason Baldwin claimed that she had offered only limited representation to Schultz before and during a grand jury investigation. She argued that attorneys who represent corporations are allowed to divulge communications made by persons in the firm because they represent the entity, not the individual. The court concluded that this situation was different because Baldwin had not informed Schultz that she was not his personal attorney. Baldwin had neglected to adequately explain the distinction between personal representation and agency representation to Schultz. Therefore, all communications between Schultz and Baldwin were protected by the attorney-client privilege and could not be divulged to third parties or to the court.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that a hearing had been held on the question of the attorney-client privilege before Baldwin testified. Would the result have been different?

33–5b Accountant-Client Relationships

In a few states, accountant-client communications are privileged by state statute. In these states, accountant-client communications may not be revealed even in court or in court-sanctioned proceedings without the client's permission.

The majority of states, however, abide by the common law, which provides that, if a court so orders, accountants must disclose information about their clients to the court. Physicians and other professionals may similarly be compelled to disclose in court information given to them in confidence by patients or clients.

Communications between professionals and their clients—other than those between attorneys and their clients—are not privileged under federal law. In cases involving federal law, state-provided rights to confidentiality of accountant-client communications are not recognized. Thus, in those cases, an accountant must provide all information requested in a court order.

Practice and Review

Superior Wholesale Corporation planned to purchase Regal Furniture, Inc., and wished to determine Regal's net worth. Superior hired Lynette Shuebke, of the accounting firm Shuebke Delgado, to review an audit that had been prepared by Norman Chase, the accountant for Regal. Shuebke advised Superior that Chase had performed a high-quality audit and that Regal's inventory on the audit dates was stated accurately on the general ledger. As a result of these representations, Superior went forward with its purchase of Regal.

After the purchase, Superior discovered that the audit by Chase had been materially inaccurate and misleading, primarily because the inventory had been grossly overstated on the balance sheet. Later, a former Regal employee who had begun working for Superior exposed an e-mail exchange between Chase and former Regal chief executive officer Buddy Gantry. The exchange revealed that Chase had cooperated in overstating the inventory and understating Regal's tax liability. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. If Shuebke's review was conducted in good faith and conformed to generally accepted accounting principles, could Superior hold Shuebke Delgado liable for negligently failing to detect material omissions in Chase's audit? Why or why not?
2. According to the rule adopted by the majority of courts to determine accountants' liability to third parties, could Chase be liable to Superior? Explain.
3. Generally, what requirements must be met before Superior can recover damages under Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5? Can Superior meet these requirements?
4. Suppose that a court determined that Chase had aided Regal in willfully understating its tax liability. What is the maximum penalty that could be imposed on Chase?

Chapter Summary: Liability of Accountants and Other Professionals

Potential Liability to Clients

1. Breach of contract—A professional who fails to fulfill contractual obligations can be held liable for breach of contract and resulting damages.
2. Negligence—An accountant, attorney, or other professional, in performing professional duties, must use the care, knowledge, and judgment generally used by professionals in the same or similar circumstances. Failure to do so is negligence. An accountant's violation of generally accepted accounting principles or generally accepted auditing standards is prima facie evidence of negligence.
3. Fraud—Intentionally misrepresenting a material fact to a client, when the client relies on the misrepresentation, is fraud. Gross negligence in performance of duties is constructive fraud.

Potential Liability to Third Parties	An accountant may be liable for negligence to any third person the accountant knows or should have known will benefit from the accountant's work. The standard for imposing this liability varies, but generally courts follow one of the following rules (see Exhibit 33–1): 1. Ultramares* rule—Liability will be imposed only if the accountant is in privity, or near privity, with the third party. 2. Restatement* rule—Liability will be imposed only if the third party's reliance is foreseen or known, or if the third party is among a class of foreseen or known users. The majority of courts have adopted this rule. 3. "Reasonably foreseeable users" rule—Liability will be imposed if the third party's reliance was reasonably foreseeable.
Liability of Accountants under Federal Laws	1. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act—The act imposes requirements on public accounting firms that provide auditing services to companies whose securities are sold to public investors. It created the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit of public companies that are subject to securities laws. The act requires accountants to maintain working papers relating to an audit or review for seven years from the end of the fiscal period in which the audit or review was concluded. 2. The Securities Act of 1933— a. Section 11—An accountant who makes a false statement or omits a material fact in audited financial statements required for registration of securities under the act may be liable to anyone who acquires securities covered by the registration statement. The accountant's defense is basically the use of due diligence and the reasonable belief that the work was complete and correct. The burden of proof is on the accountant. Willful violations of this act may be subject to criminal penalties. b. Section 12(2)—An accountant may be liable when a prospectus or other communication presented to an investor contained an untrue statement or omitted a material fact. 3. The Securities Exchange Act of 1934— a. Section 18—Accountants may be held liable for false and misleading applications, reports, and documents filed with the SEC. The burden is on the plaintiff, and the accountant has numerous defenses, including good faith and lack of knowledge that what was submitted was false. Negligence alone does not lead to liability under the 1934 act. b. Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5—Provisions allow private parties to bring civil actions against violators. Accountants may be held liable only to sellers or purchasers of securities. Privity is not necessary for recovery. 4. The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act—An auditor must use adequate procedures to detect any illegal acts of the company being audited and disclose any illegalities detected. Parties are liable only for the proportion of damages for which they are responsible.
Potential Criminal Liability	1. Willful violations of the Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 may be subject to criminal penalties. 2. Willfully making false statements in a tax return or willfully aiding or assisting in the preparation of a false tax return is a felony. Aiding and abetting an individual's understatement of tax liability is a separate crime.
Confidentiality and Privilege	Communications other than those between attorneys and clients are not privileged under federal law. 1. Attorney-client relationships—Communications relating to representation are normally held in the strictest confidence and protected by law. Only the client may waive the privilege. The SEC, however, has implemented rules requiring attorneys who learn that a client has violated securities laws to report the violation to the SEC. 2. Accountant-client relationships—The majority of states follow the common law. If a court so orders, an accountant must disclose information about the client to the court.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

33–1. The Ultramares Rule. Larkin, Inc., retains Howard Perkins to manage its books and prepare its financial statements. Perkins, a certified public accountant, lives in Indiana and practices there. After twenty years, Perkins has become a bit bored with generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP) and has adopted more creative accounting methods. Now, though, Perkins has a problem. He is being sued by Molly Tucker, one of Larkin's creditors. Tucker alleges that Perkins either knew or should have known that Larkin's financial statements would be distributed to various individuals. Furthermore, she asserts that these financial statements were negligently prepared and seriously inaccurate. What are the consequences of Perkins's failure to follow GAAP? Under the traditional Ultramares rule, can Tucker recover damages from Perkins? Explain. (See Potential Liability to Third Parties.)

33–2. The Restatement Rule. The accounting firm of Goldman, Walters, Johnson & Co. prepared financial statements for Lucy's Fashions, Inc. After reviewing the financial statements, Happydays State Bank agreed to loan Lucy's Fashions $35,000 for expansion. When Lucy's Fashions declared bankruptcy under Chapter 11 six months later, Happydays State Bank filed an action against Goldman, Walters, Johnson & Co., alleging negligent preparation of financial statements. Assuming that the court has abandoned the Ultramares approach, what is the result? What are the policy reasons for holding accountants liable to third parties with whom they are not in privity? (See Potential Liability to Third Parties.)

33–3. Accountant's Liability under Rule 10b-5. In early 2018, Bennett, Inc., offered a substantial number of new common shares to the public. Harvey Helms had a long-standing interest in Bennett because his grandfather had once been president of the company. On receiving Bennett's prospectus, Helms was dismayed by the pessimism it embodied, so he decided to delay purchasing stock in the company. Later, Helms asserted that the prospectus prepared by the accountants had been overly pessimistic and had contained materially misleading statements. Discuss fully how successful Helms would be in bringing a suit under Rule 10b-5 against Bennett's accountants. (See Liability of Accountants under Federal Laws.)

33–4. Professional's Liability. Soon after Teresa DeYoung's husband died, her mother-in-law also died, leaving an inheritance of more than $400,000 for DeYoung's children. DeYoung hired John Ruggiero, an attorney, to ensure that her children would receive it. Ruggiero advised her to invest the funds in his real estate business. She declined. A few months later, $300,000 of the inheritance was sent to Ruggiero. Without telling DeYoung, he deposited the $300,000 in his account and began to use the funds in his real estate business. Nine months later, $109,000 of the inheritance was sent to Ruggiero. He paid this to DeYoung. She asked about the remaining amount. Ruggiero lied to hide his theft. Unable to access these funds, DeYoung's children changed their college plans to attend less expensive institutions. Nearly three years later, DeYoung learned the truth. Can she bring a suit against Ruggiero? If so, on what ground? If not, why not? Did Ruggiero violate any standard of professional ethics? Discuss. [DeYoung v. Ruggiero, 2009 VT 9, 971 A.2d 627 (2009)] (See Potential Liability to Clients.)

33–5. Professional Malpractice. Jeffery Guerrero hired James McDonald, a certified public accountant, to represent him and his business in an appeal to the Internal Revenue Service. The appeal concerned audits that showed Guerrero owed more taxes. When the appeal failed, McDonald assisted in preparing materials for an appeal to the Tax Court, which was not successful. Guerrero then sued McDonald for professional negligence in the preparation of his evidence for the court. Specifically, Guerrero claimed that he would have won the case if McDonald had adequately prepared witnesses and had presented all the arguments that could have been made on his behalf. Guerrero contended that McDonald was liable for all of the additional taxes he was required to pay. Is Guerrero's claim likely to result in liability on McDonald's part? What factors would the court consider? [Guerrero v. McDonald, 302 Ga.App. 164, 690 S.E.2d 486 (2010)] (See Potential Liability to Clients.)

33–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Potential Liability to Third Parties. In 2006, twenty-seven parties became limited partners in two hedge funds that had invested with Bernard Madoff and his investment firm. The partners' investment adviser gave them various investment information, including a memorandum indicating that an independent certified public accountant, KPMG, LLP, had audited the hedge funds' annual reports. Since 2004, KPMG had also prepared annual reports addressed to the funds' "partners." Each report stated that KPMG had investigated the funds' financial statements, had followed generally accepted auditing principles, and had concluded that the statements fairly summarized the funds' financial conditions. Moreover, KPMG used the information from its audits to prepare individual tax statements for each fund partner.

In 2008, Madoff was charged with securities fraud for running a massive Ponzi scheme. In a 2009 report, the Securities and Exchange Commission identified numerous "red flags" that should have been discovered by investment advisers and auditors. Unfortunately, they were not, and the hedge funds' partners lost millions of dollars. Is KPMG potentially liable to the funds' partners under the Restatement (Third) of Torts? Why or why not? [Askenazy v. Tremont Group Holdings, Inc., 2012 WL 440675 (Mass.Super. 2012)] (See Potential Liability to Third Parties.)

33–7. Attorney's Duty of Care. Luis and Maria Rojas contracted to buy a house in Westchester County, New York, from Andrew and Karen Paine. The house was on property designated as "Lot No. 8" on a subdivision map filed in the county clerk's office. The Paines had acquired the property in two parts by the transfer of two separate deeds. At the closing, they delivered a deed stating that it covered "the same property." In fact, however, the legal description attached to the deed covered only the portion of Lot No. 8 described in one of the two previous deeds. Attorney Paul Herrick represented the Rojases in the deal with the Paines. When the Rojases sought to sell the property two years later, the title search revealed that they owned only part of Lot No. 8, and the buyer refused to go through with the sale. Is Herrick liable for malpractice? Explain. [Rojas v. Paine, 125 A.D.3d 745, 4 N.Y.S.3d 223 (2 Dept. 2015)] (See Potential Liability to Clients.)

33–8. Attorney Misconduct. Solomons One, LLC, was formed to develop waterfront property in Maryland. Vernon Donnelly was a member of the LLC and served as the company's counsel. The state denied Solomons's request for a permit to build a pier. Donnelly appealed the denial. Meanwhile, he assigned Solomons's potential right to build a pier to a trust, appointed himself trustee, and changed his fee arrangement with the company. These steps were taken without Solomons's authorization, but there was no financial harm to the LLC and no additional evidence that Donnelly engaged in dishonesty or deceit. On learning of Donnelly's actions, however, a majority of the LLC members voted to terminate his representation. Despite the vote, he pursued the pier case until the LLC ultimately gained the right to build a pier. Donnelly had not previously been disciplined for misconduct. Should he be disciplined in this case? Why or why not? [Attorney Grievance Commission of Maryland v. Donnelly, 458 Md. 237, 182 A.3d 743 (2018)] (See Potential Liability to Clients.)

33–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Attorney Misconduct. Brandy Sutton was the sole owner of the law firm Pendleton & Sutton in Lawrence, Kansas. Sutton offered a retirement plan as a benefit to the members of her staff. Employees could contribute up to 3 percent of their salaries. Sutton withheld the contributions from the employees' paychecks, which indicated that the amounts were deposited into the plan. For a period of years, however, she failed to make the deposits, using the funds to cover her professional expenses instead. An associate attorney with the firm discovered the discrepancy and filed a complaint with the state disciplinary office. In response, Sutton argued that the misconduct was caused by financial difficulties, including "several items" involving the associate who filed the complaint. Sutton expressed remorse, and within sixteen months properly funded all of the employees' accounts. [In the Matter of Sutton, 307 Kan. 95, 405 P.3d 1205 (2017)] (See Potential Liability to Clients.)

1. When a business experiences financial difficulties, can it withhold amounts owed to its employees to pay more immediate obligations? Consider this question from an ethical perspective, using the IDDR approach.
2. Should a sanction be imposed on Sutton in this case? If so, what should it be? Possibilities include suspension from the practice of law for a limited time or an indefinite period, and probation. Explain.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

33–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Attorney-Client Privilege. Napster, Inc., offered a service that allowed its users to browse digital music files on other users' computers and download selections for free. Music industry principals sued Napster for copyright infringement, and the court ordered Napster to remove files that were identified as infringing from its service. When Napster failed to comply, it was shut down.

A few months later, Bertelsmann, a German corporation, loaned Napster $85 million to fund its anticipated transition to a licensed digital music distribution system. The terms allowed Napster to spend the loan on "general, administrative and overhead expenses." In an e-mail, Napster's chief executive officer referred to a "side deal" under which Napster could use up to $10 million of the loan to pay litigation expenses. Napster failed to launch the new system before declaring bankruptcy. The plaintiffs filed a suit against Bertelsmann, alleging that its loan had prolonged Napster's infringement. The plaintiffs asked the court to order the disclosure of all attorney-client communications related to the loan. (See Confidentiality and Privilege.)

1. The first group will identify the principle that Bertelsmann could assert to protect these communications and outline the purpose of this protection.
2. The second group will decide whether this principle should protect a client who consults an attorney for advice that will help the client commit fraud.
3. A third group will determine whether the court should grant the plaintiffs' request.

Unit Six—Task-Based Simulation

StockPhoto.com/Yuri_Arcurs

Alpha Software, Inc., and Beta Products Corporation—both small firms—are competitors in the business of software research, development, and production.

1. Antitrust Law. Alpha and Beta form a joint venture to research, develop, and produce new software for a particular line of computers. Does this business combination violate the antitrust laws? If so, is it a per se violation, or is it subject to the rule of reason? Alpha and Beta decide to merge. After the merger, Beta is the surviving firm. What aspect of this firm's presence in the market will be assessed to decide whether this merger is in violation of any antitrust laws?
2. Consumer Law. To market its products profitably, Beta considers a number of advertising and labeling proposals. One proposal is that Beta suggest in its advertising that one of its software products has a certain function, even though the product does not actually have that capability. Another suggestion is that Beta sell half of a certain program in packaging that misleads the buyer into believing the entire program is included. To obtain the entire program, customers would need to buy a second product. Can Beta implement these suggestions or otherwise market its products in any way it likes? If not, why not?
3. Environmental Law. The production part of Beta's operations generates hazardous waste. Gamma Transport Company transports the waste to Omega Waste Corporation, which owns and operates a hazardous waste disposal site. At the site, some containers leak hazardous waste, and the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) cleans it up. From whom can the EPA recover the cost of the cleanup?
4. Liability of Accountants. Beta hires a certified public accountant, Aaron Schleger, to prepare its financial reports and issue opinion letters based on those reports. One year, Beta falls into serious financial trouble, but this is not reflected in Schleger's reports and opinion letters. Relying on Schleger's portrayal of the company's fiscal health, Beta borrows substantial amounts to develop a new product. The bank, in lending funds to Beta, relies on an opinion letter from Schleger, and Schleger is aware of the bank's reliance. Assuming that Schleger was negligent but did not engage in intentional fraud, what is his potential liability in this situation? Discuss fully.

34 Personal Property and Bailments

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is real property? What is personal property?
2. What are the three necessary elements for an effective gift?
3. How does lost property differ from mislaid property? Does a finder of such property acquire title to it?
4. What are the three elements of a bailment?

"The great . . . end . . . of men's uniting into commonwealths, and putting themselves under government, is the preservation of their property."

John Locke
1632–1704
(English political philosopher)

Property consists of the legally protected rights and interests a person has in anything with an ascertainable value that is subject to ownership. For instance, digital property has become quite valuable in today's world. When a couple divorces, they might dispute who owns the virtual world assets they have acquired, their Internet accounts, or the data stored on their devices. Property would have little value, however, if the law did not define owners' rights to use their property, to sell or dispose of it, and to prevent trespass on it. Indeed, John Locke, as indicated in the chapter-opening quotation, considered the preservation of property to be the primary reason for the establishment of government.

In this chapter, we first examine the differences between personal and real property. We then look at the methods of acquiring ownership of personal property and consider issues relating to mislaid, lost, and abandoned personal property. In the remainder of the chapter, we discuss bailment relationships. A bailment is created when personal property is temporarily delivered into the care of another without a transfer of title, such as when a person takes an item of clothing to the dry cleaners.

34–1 Personal Property versus Real Property

Real Property Land and everything permanently attached to it, such as trees and buildings.

Property is divided into real property and personal property. Real property (sometimes called realty or real estate) consists of land and everything permanently attached to it, including structures and anything permanently attached to the structures. Everything else is personal property, or personalty. Attorneys sometimes refer to personal property as chattel, a term used under the common law to denote all forms of personal property.

Personal property can be tangible or intangible. Tangible personal property, such as an 8K TV, heavy construction equipment, or a car, has physical substance. Intangible personal property represents some set of rights and interests but has no physical substance. Stocks and bonds, patents, trademarks, and copyrights—as well as digital property—are examples of intangible personal property.

Both personal property and real property can be owned by an individual person or by some other entity, such as an organization. When two or more persons own real or personal property together, concurrent ownership exists. (The different types of concurrent ownership will be discussed in the real property chapter.)

Personal Property Property that is movable. Any property that is not real property.

Chattel Personal property.

Focus Question 1

What is real property? What is personal property?

34–1a Why Is the Distinction Important?

The distinction between real and personal property is important for several reasons. How property is taxed and what is required to transfer or acquire the property is determined by whether the property is classified as real or personal.

Taxation The two types of property are usually subject to different types of taxes. Generally, each city and county assesses property taxes on real property. Typically, the tax rate is based on the market value of the real property and the various services provided by the city and county in which the property is located. For instance, higher taxes may be imposed on real property located within the city limits to pay for schools, roads, and libraries.

Businesses often also pay taxes on the personal property they own, use, or lease, including office or farm equipment and supplies. Individuals may pay sales tax when purchasing personal property, but generally they are not required to pay annual taxes on personal property that is not used for business.

Acquisition Another reason for distinguishing between real and personal property has to do with the way the property is acquired or transferred. Personal property can be transferred with a minimum of formality—such as by selling goods on eBay or at a garage sale. In contrast, real property transfers generally involve a written sales contract and a deed that is recorded with the state.

Similarly, establishing ownership rights is simpler for personal property than for real property. Example 34.1 If Mia gives Shawn an iPad as a gift, Shawn does not need to have any paperwork evidencing title, as he would if she had given him real property. ■ The ways to acquire ownership of personal property will be discussed shortly.

34–1b Conversion of Real Property to Personal Property

Sometimes, real property can be turned into personal property by detaching it from the land. For instance, the trees, bushes, and plants growing on land are considered part of the real property (with the exception of crops that must be planted every year, such as wheat). If the property is sold, all the vegetation growing on the land normally is transferred to the new owner of the real property.

Once the items are severed (removed) from the land, however, they become personal property. If the trees are cut from the land, the timber is personal property. If apples, grapes, or raspberries are picked from trees or vines growing on real property, they become personal property. Similarly, if land contains minerals (including oil) or other natural resources (such as marble), the resources are part of the real property. But once removed, they become personal property.

Conversely, personal property may be converted into real property by permanently attaching it to the real property. Personal property that is affixed to real property in a permanent way, such as tile installed in a house, is known as a fixture.

34–2 Acquiring Ownership of Personal Property

monkeybusinessimages/iStock/Getty Images

What is the most common way to acquire ownership rights in personal property?

The most common way of acquiring personal property is by purchasing it. (Today, even virtual property is often purchased—see this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion.)

We reviewed the purchase and sale of goods (which are personal property) in earlier chapters. Often, property is acquired by will or inheritance, as we will discuss in a later chapter. Here, we look at additional ways in which ownership of personal property can be acquired, including acquisition by possession, production, gifts, accession, and confusion.

34–2a Possession

Sometimes, a person can become the owner of personal property merely by possessing it. An example of acquiring ownership by possession is the capture of wild animals. Wild animals belong to no one in their natural state, and the first person to take possession of a wild animal normally owns it. A hunter who kills a deer, for instance, has assumed ownership of it (unless the hunter acted in violation of the law). Those who find lost or abandoned property can also acquire ownership rights through mere possession of the property, as will be discussed later in this chapter.

34–2b Production

Production—the fruits of labor—is another means of acquiring ownership of personal property. For instance, writers, inventors, and manufacturers produce personal property and thereby acquire title to it. (In some situations, as when a researcher is hired to develop a new product, the researcher-producer may not own what is produced.)

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

The Exploding World of Digital Property

Using the same blockchain technology as do cryptocurrencies such as Bitcoin, online enthusiasts can now create one-of-a-kind digital merchandise. Known as NFTs (non-fungible tokens), these digital assets have single owners and, like real-world goods, can be bought or sold based on their relative scarcity and worth. CryptoKitties, an online game involving the breeding of digital cats, showed the potential of this market when an NFT named Dragon—created by one of the game's players—sold for approximately $170,000.

If the prospect of paying real funds for virtual cartoon cats seems disconcerting, remember that property does not have to be tangible. Property consists of a bundle of rights in anything that has an ascertainable value and is subject to ownership. This definition encompasses virtual pets, land, and art, as well as all the intangible products used in virtual worlds such as Entropia Universe and Fortnite.

Digital Goods Have Value, Too

Digital goods include virtual goods. More importantly, they include digital books, music libraries, and movie downloads, as well as domain names and expensively created websites. This digital property has real value. Some digital music libraries, for example, cost thousands of dollars.

Who Keeps the Digital Goods?

The growing value of digital goods raises some legal questions. For instance, what are the respective rights of the creator/owner of a virtual-world website and the players at that site? What happens when a husband and wife decide to divorce after they have purchased virtual real estate or digital goods (or a beloved virtual cat) with real-world dollars? The couple—or a court—will have to figure out a way to divide the goods. Property and divorce laws will have to adapt to take this emerging world of digital property into account.

Critical Thinking

How might a couple who enjoy purchasing digital goods together avoid property division issues in the event of a divorce?

34–2c Gifts

A gift is another fairly common means of acquiring and transferring ownership of real and personal property. A gift is essentially a voluntary transfer of property ownership for which no consideration is given. The absence of consideration is what distinguishes a gift from a contractual obligation to transfer ownership of property.

Gift A voluntary transfer of property made without consideration, past or present.

For a gift to be effective, the following three elements are required:

1. Donative intent on the part of the donor (the one giving the gift).
2. Delivery.
3. Acceptance by the donee (the one receiving the gift).

Until these three requirements are met, no effective gift has been made. Example 34.2 Your aunt tells you that she intends to give you a new BMW for your next birthday. This is simply a promise to make a gift. It is not considered a gift until the BMW is delivered and accepted.

Focus Question 2

What are the three necessary elements for an effective gift?

Ethical Issue

Who owns the engagement ring? Often, when two people decide to marry, one party (traditionally the man in an opposite-sex relationship) gives the other an engagement ring. What if the engagement is called off? Etiquette authorities routinely counsel that if the woman breaks the engagement, she should return the ring, but if the man calls the wedding off, the woman is entitled to keep the ring. When the party who gave the ring (the donor) sues for its return after a breakup, the courts are split.

Courts in a majority of states, including Kansas, Michigan, New York, and Ohio, hold that an engagement ring is not a real gift. Rather, it is a "conditional gift" that becomes final only if the marriage occurs. If the marriage does not take place, the ring is returned to the donor regardless of who broke the engagement. This position is similar to the law of ancient Rome, which mandated that when an engagement was broken, the woman had to return the ring, as a penalty, regardless of who was at fault. Some judges, however, disagree with the conditional-gift theory and contend that an engagement ring is a gift and, as such, it belongs to the donee, even if the engagement is broken.

Donative Intent When a gift is challenged in court, the court will determine whether donative intent exists by looking at the language of the donor and the surrounding circumstances. A court may look at the relationship between the parties and the size of the gift in relation to the donor's other assets. When a person has given away a suspiciously large amount of assets, the court will scrutinize the transaction closely to determine the donor's mental capacity and to look for indications of fraud or duress.

Spotlight Case Example 34.3 Over a period of three months, Jean Knowles Goodman, who was eighty-five years old, gave Steven Atwood several checks that totaled $56,100. Atwood was a veterinarian who had cared for Goodman's dogs for nearly twenty years, and he and Goodman had become friends. Shortly after writing the last check, Goodman was hospitalized and diagnosed with dementia (loss of brain function) and alcohol dependency.

The guardian who was appointed to represent Goodman filed a lawsuit to invalidate the gifts, claiming that Goodman had lacked mental capacity and donative intent. At trial, a psychiatrist who had examined Goodman testified on behalf of Atwood that while Goodman lacked the capacity to care for herself, she would have understood that she was giving away her funds. Therefore, the court concluded that Goodman had donative intent to make the gifts to Atwood.[1]

Delivery The gift must be delivered to the donee. Delivery may be accomplished by means of a third person who is the agent of either the donor or the donee. Naturally, no delivery is necessary if the gift is already in the hands of the donee. Delivery is obvious in most cases, but some objects cannot be relinquished physically. Then the question of delivery depends on the surrounding circumstances.

Constructive Delivery A symbolic delivery of property that cannot be physically delivered.

Constructive Delivery. When the object itself cannot be physically delivered, a symbolic, or constructive, delivery will be sufficient. Constructive delivery confers the right to take possession of the object in question. Example 34.4 Angela wants to make a gift of various rare coins that she has stored in a safe-deposit box. She obviously cannot deliver the box itself to the donee, and she does not want to take the coins out of the bank. Angela can simply deliver the key to the box to the donee and authorize the donee's access to the box and its contents. This action constitutes a constructive delivery of the contents of the box.

Constructive delivery is always necessary for gifts of intangible property, such as stocks, bonds, insurance policies, and contracts. What will be delivered are documents that represent rights and are not, in themselves, the true property. (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for an illustration.)

Effective Gift of a Brokerage Account

John Weider opened a brokerage account with Quick and Reilly, Inc., in the name of his son James. Twelve years later, when the balance was $52,085, John closed the account and transferred the funds to a joint account in John's name and the name of his other son, James's brother. James did not learn of the existence of the account in his name until the transfer, when he received a tax form for the account's final year. James filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Quick and Reilly, alleging breach of contract and seeking to recover the account's principal and interest. What are the elements of a valid gift? Did John's opening of the account in James's name with Quick and Reilly constitute a gift to James?

Analysis: A gift is a transfer of property without consideration. To make a valid gift, the donor must have "donative intent" (an intent that title to the property will pass to the donee). The donor must also hand over control of the property to the recipient of the gift. The three requirements for an effective gift are (1) the donor's donative intent, (2) delivery of the property, and (3) the donee's acceptance.

Result and Reasoning: John's use of James's name to open the account may indicate donative intent. But the most significant element in this situation is delivery, which requires the donor to part with possession of the property and relinquish control. Delivery may be actual or constructive. Notice to James of the account's existence might have been sufficient to constitute constructive delivery, but in this scenario, James never received actual delivery of the funds in the account. As for constructive delivery, James was not even aware of the existence of the account (or his right to the funds) until after the funds had been withdrawn and the account had been closed. Without actual or constructive delivery, there is no way for James to prove that the account constituted a valid gift.

Relinquishing Dominion and Control. An effective delivery also requires giving up complete control and dominion (ownership rights) over the subject matter of the gift. The outcome of disputes often turns on whether control has actually been relinquished. The Internal Revenue Service carefully examines transactions between relatives, especially when one claims to have given income-producing property to another who is in a lower marginal tax bracket. Unless complete control over the property has been relinquished, the "donor"—not the family member who received the "gift"—will have to pay taxes on the income from that property.

Dominion Ownership rights in property, including the right to possess and control the property.

In the following Classic Case, the court focused on the requirement that a donor must relinquish complete control and dominion over property given to the donee before a gift can be effectively delivered.

Classic Case 34.1

In re Estate of Piper

Missouri Court of Appeals, 676 S.W.2d897 (1984).

Facts Gladys Piper died intestate (without a will) in 1982. At her death, she owned miscellaneous personal property worth $5,000 and had in her purse $200 in cash and two diamond rings. Wanda Brown, Piper's niece, took the contents of the purse, allegedly to preserve the items for the estate. Clara Kaufmann, a friend of Piper's, filed a claim against the estate for $4,800. From October 1974 until Piper's death, Kaufmann had taken Piper to the doctor, beauty shop, and grocery store. Kaufmann had also written Piper's checks to pay her bills and had helped her care for her home.

How can two diamond rings have been gifted if they remained in the owner's purse after her death?

Kaufmann maintained that Piper had promised to pay her for these services and had given her the diamond rings as a gift. A Missouri state trial court denied her request for payment. The court found that her services had been voluntary. Kaufmann then filed a petition for delivery of personal property—the rings—which was granted by the trial court. Brown, other heirs, and the administrator of Piper's estate appealed.

Issue Had Gladys Piper made an effective gift of the rings to Clara Kaufmann?

Decision No. The state appellate court reversed the judgment of the trial court on the ground that Piper had never delivered the rings to Kaufmann.

Reason Kaufmann claimed that the rings belonged to her by reason of a "consummated gift long prior to the death of Gladys Piper." Two witnesses testified at the trial that Piper had told them that she was going to wear the rings until she died but that the rings belonged to Kaufmann. The appellate court, however, found "no evidence of any actual delivery." The court pointed out that the essentials of a gift are (1) a present intention to make a gift on the part of the donor, (2) a delivery of the property by the donor to the donee, and (3) an acceptance by the donee. Here, the evidence showed only an intent to make a gift. Because there was no delivery—either actual or constructive—no valid gift was made.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Gladys Piper had told Clara Kaufmann that she was giving the rings to Clara but wished to keep them in her possession for a few more days. Would this have affected the court's decision in this case? Explain.

- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This case clearly illustrates the delivery requirement when making a gift. Assuming that Piper did, indeed, intend for Kaufmann to have the rings, it was unfortunate that Kaufmann had no right to receive them after Piper's death. Yet the alternative could lead to perhaps even more unfairness. The policy behind the delivery requirement is to protect property owners and their heirs from fraudulent claims based solely on parol evidence. If not for this policy, a person could easily claim that a gift had been made when, in fact, it had not.

Acceptance The final requirement of a valid gift is acceptance by the donee. This rarely presents any problem, as most donees readily accept their gifts. The courts generally assume acceptance unless the circumstances indicate otherwise.

Gifts Inter Vivos and Gifts Causa Mortis A gift made during one's lifetime is termed a gift *inter vivos. A gift *causa mortis (a so-called deathbed gift) is made in contemplation of imminent death. To be effective, a gift causa mortis must meet not only the three requirements discussed earlier—donative intent, delivery, and acceptance—but also some additional conditions.

Gift Inter Vivos. A gift made during one's lifetime and not in contemplation of imminent death, in contrast to a gift causa mortis.

Gift Causa Mortis A gift made in contemplation of imminent death. The gift is revoked if the donor does not die as contemplated.

Automatically Revoked if Donor Recovers. A gift causa mortis does not become absolute until the donor dies from the contemplated event, and it is automatically revoked if the donor survives. Example 34.5 Yang, who is about to undergo surgery to remove a cancerous tumor, delivers an envelope to Chao, a close business associate. The envelope contains a letter saying, "I want to give you this check for $1 million in the event of my death from this operation." Chao cashes the check. The surgeon performs the operation and removes the tumor. Yang recovers fully. Several months later, Yang dies from a heart attack that is totally unrelated to the operation.

If the administrator of Yang's estate tries to recover the $1 million, she will normally succeed. The gift causa mortis to Chao is automatically revoked if Yang recovers. The specific event that was contemplated in making the gift was death from a particular operation. Because Yang's death was not the result of this event, the gift is revoked, and the $1 million passes to Yang's estate.

UfaBizPhoto/shutterstock.com

Before undergoing surgery, a patient gives a large gift to a friend in the event of the patient's death from the surgery. What is the effect on the gift if the patient recovers?

Automatically Revoked if Donee Dies. A gift causa mortis is also revoked if the prospective donee dies before the donor. Therefore, even if Yang in Example 34.5 had died during the operation, the gift would have been revoked if Chao had died a few minutes earlier. In that event, the $1 million would have passed to Yang's estate, and not to Chao's heirs.

34–2d Accession

Accession means "something added." Accession occurs when someone adds value to an item of personal property by the use of either labor or materials.

Accession The addition of value to personal property by the use of labor or materials.

Generally, there is no dispute about who owns the property after an accession occurs, especially when the accession is accomplished with the owner's consent. Example 34.6 Harvey buys all the materials necessary to customize his Corvette. He hires Zach, a customizing specialist, to come to his house to perform the work. Harvey pays Zach for the value of the labor, obviously retaining title to the property.

If an improvement is made wrongfully—without the permission of the owner—the owner retains title to the property and normally does not have to pay for the improvement. This is true even if the accession increases the value of the property substantially. Example 34.7 Colton steals a truck and puts expensive new tires on it. If the rightful owner later recovers the truck, the owner obviously will not be required to compensate Colton, a thief, for the value of the new tires.

34–2e Confusion

Confusion The mixing together of goods belonging to two or more owners to such an extent that the separately owned goods cannot be identified.

Confusion is the commingling (mixing together) of goods to such an extent that one person's personal property cannot be distinguished from another's. Confusion frequently occurs with fungible goods, such as grain or oil, which consist of identical units.

If confusion occurs as a result of agreement, an honest mistake, or the act of some third party, the owners share ownership and will share any loss in proportion to their ownership interests in the property. Example 34.8 Five farmers in a small Iowa community enter into a cooperative arrangement. Each fall, the farmers harvest the same amount of number 2–grade yellow corn and store it in silos that are held by the cooperative. Each farmer thus owns one-fifth of the total corn in the silos. If a fire burns down one of the silos, each farmer will bear one-fifth of the loss. If goods are confused due to an intentional wrongful act, then the innocent party ordinarily acquires title to the whole.

34–3 Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property

As already mentioned, one of the methods of acquiring ownership of property is to possess it. Simply finding something and holding on to it, however, does not necessarily give the finder any legal rights in the property. Different rules apply, depending on whether the property was mislaid, lost, or abandoned. Exhibit 34-1 summarizes the distinctions among these types of property, which are discussed in the following subsections.

34–3a Mislaid Property

Property that has been voluntarily placed somewhere by the owner and then inadvertently forgotten is mislaid property. A person who finds mislaid property does not obtain title to it. Instead, the owner of the place where the property was mislaid becomes the caretaker of the property because it is highly likely that the true owner will return.[2] Example 34.9 Maya goes to a movie theater. While paying for popcorn at the concessions stand, she sets her iPhone on the counter and then leaves it there. The phone is mislaid property, and the theater owner is entrusted with the duty of reasonably caring for it.

Mislaid Property Property that the owner has voluntarily parted with and then has inadvertently forgotten.

Lost Property Property that the owner has involuntarily parted with and then cannot find or recover.

34–3b Lost Property

Property that is involuntarily left is lost property. A finder of the property can claim title to the property against the whole world—except the true owner.[3] If the true owner is identified and demands that the lost property be returned, the finder must return it. In contrast, if a third party attempts to take possession of the lost property, the finder will have a better title than the third party.

Example 34.10 Kayla works in a large library at night. As she crosses the courtyard on her way home, she finds a gold bracelet set with what seem to be precious stones. She takes the bracelet to a jeweler to have it appraised.

When a person leaves a smartphone at a movie theater, is it mislaid, lost, or abandoned property?

2. For a classic English case establishing this principle, see Armory v. Delamirie, 93 Eng.Rep. 664 (K.B. [King's Bench] 1722).
3. The finder of mislaid property is an involuntary bailee.

Exhibit 34–1 Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property

Mislaid Property	Property that is placed somewhere voluntarily by the owner and then inadvertently forgotten. A finder of mislaid property will not acquire title to the goods, and the owner of the place where the property was mislaid becomes a caretaker of the mislaid property.
Lost Property	Property that is involuntarily left by the owner. A finder of lost property can claim title to the property against the whole world except the true owner.
Abandoned Property	Property that has been discarded by the true owner, who has no intention of reclaiming title to the property in the future. A finder of abandoned property can claim title to it against the whole world, including the original owner.

Focus Question 3

How does lost property differ from mislaid property? Does a finder of such property acquire title to it?

While pretending to weigh the bracelet, the jeweler's employee removes several of the stones. If Kayla brings an action to recover the stones from the jeweler, she normally will win, because she found lost property and holds title against everyone except the true owner.

Conversion of Lost Property When a finder of lost property knows the true owner and fails to return the property to that person, the finder has committed the tort of conversion (the wrongful taking of another's property). Example 34.11 Mike finds a bicycle lying on the sidewalk in front of his house. He knows that the bicycle belongs to Geneva. If Mike does not return the bicycle, he can be held liable for conversion. Many states require the finder to make a reasonably diligent search to locate the true owner of lost property.

Estray Statutes Statutes defining finders' rights in property when the true owners are unknown.

Estray Statutes Many states have estray statutes, which encourage and facilitate the return of property to its true owner and reward the finder for honesty if the property remains unclaimed. These laws provide an incentive for finders to report their discoveries by making it possible for them, after a specified period of time, to acquire legal title to the property they have found.

Generally, the item must be lost property, not merely mislaid property, for estray statutes to apply. Estray statutes usually require the finder or the county clerk to advertise the property in an attempt to help the owner recover it.

Spotlight Case Example 34.12 Drug smugglers often enter the United States illegally from Canada via a frozen river that flows through Van Buren, Maine. When two railroad employees walking near the railroad tracks in Van Buren found a duffel bag that contained $165,580 in cash, they reported their find to U.S. Customs agents, who took custody of the bag and cash. A drug-sniffing dog gave a positive alert on the bag for the scent of drugs. The federal government filed a lawsuit claiming title to the property under criminal forfeiture laws (because the property was involved in illegal drug transactions).

The two employees argued that they were entitled to the $165,580 under Maine's estray statute. That statute required finders to (1) provide written notice to the town clerk within seven days after finding the property, (2) post a public notice in the town, and (3) advertise in the town's newspaper for one month. Because the employees had not fulfilled these requirements, the court ruled that they had not acquired title to the property. Thus, the federal government had a right to seize the cash.[4]

Abandoned Property Property that has been discarded by the owner, who has no intention of reclaiming it.

34–3c Abandoned Property

Property that has been discarded by the true owner, who has no intention of reclaiming title to it, is abandoned property. Someone who finds abandoned property acquires title to it that is good against the whole world, including the original owner. If a person finds abandoned property while trespassing on the property of another, however, the owner of the land, not the finder, will acquire title to the property.

An owner of lost property who eventually gives up any further attempt to find it is frequently held to have abandoned the property. Example 34.13 As Alekis is hiking in the redwoods, her expensive watch falls off her wrist. She retraces her route and searches for the watch but cannot find it. She finally gives up her search and returns home some five hundred miles away. When Frye later finds the watch, he acquires title to it that is good even against Alekis. By completely giving up her search, Alekis abandoned the watch just as effectively as if she had intentionally discarded it.

Companion pets—including dogs—are personal property. Because a dog is personal property, a court may be tasked with determining whether a dog's owner abandoned it by leaving it with a friend, as in the following case.

Case 34.2

Zephier v. Agate

Court of Appeals of Minnesota, 2020 WL 1845251 (2020).

Facts Dannielle Zephier, who lived in Minnesota, had a pet dog named Oliver. On moving to California to attend school, where her housing situation did not allow dogs, Zephier arranged with Derrick Agate, a close friend in Minnesota, to care for Oliver. Over the next several years, Agate and Zephier communicated often, and she sometimes returned to visit the dog. Eventually, however, Agate refused to allow any more visits. After her attempts to contact Agate and reclaim Oliver were unsuccessful, Zephier filed a suit in a Minnesota state court to recover the dog.

The court, applying the common law of abandonment, found that Zephier had abandoned Oliver and denied her recovery. Zephier appealed.

Issue Did the trial court err by concluding that Zephier had abandoned Oliver?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's judgment, allowing Zephier to recover Oliver.

Reason A Minnesota state statute "lays out a clear, concise process to obtain ownership of abandoned tangible personal property." The statute imposes a time period for abandonment and requires notice to the prior owner of the property before ownership can transfer to the possessor. Six months must pass before the property can be deemed abandoned. Thirty days' notice that the time has elapsed, and that ownership will be transferred at the end of the thirty days, must then be given to the prior owner "personally or by certified mail."

Notice gives the prior owner an opportunity to retrieve her property before she loses all claim to it. This notice is central to the application of the statute. The appellate court reasoned that "because permitting the common law to persist would render the notice provisions of the statute superfluous, the statute necessarily abrogates [overrides] the common law."

In this case, at the trial, Agate admitted that he had not told Zephier that he considered her to have abandoned Oliver, nor had he notified her to either take Oliver or lose her right to ownership. And Zephier testified that she had no knowledge or notice that Agate believed she had abandoned Oliver. "Because Agate failed to provide this statutory notice, Zephier remains the legal owner of Oliver."

34–4 Bailments

Many routine personal and business transactions involve bailments. A bailment is formed by the delivery of personal property without transfer of title by one person, called a bailor, to another, called a bailee. Usually, a bailment is formed for a particular purpose—for instance, to loan, lease, store, repair, or transport the property. What distinguishes a bailment from a sale or a gift is that there is no passage of title and no intent to transfer title. On completion of the purpose, the bailee is obligated to return the bailed property in the same or better condition to the bailor or a third person or to dispose of it as directed.

Although bailments typically arise by contract, not all of the elements of a contract must necessarily be present for a bailment to be created. Example 34.14 If Amy lends her bicycle to a friend, a bailment is created, but not by contract, because there is no consideration. Many commercial bailments, such as the delivery of clothing to the cleaners for dry cleaning, are based on contract, though.

Bailment A situation in which the personal property of one person (a bailor) is entrusted to another (a bailee), who is obligated to return the bailed property to the bailor or dispose of it as directed.

Bailor One who entrusts goods to a bailee.

Bailee One to whom goods are entrusted by a bailor.

Focus Question 4

What are the three elements of a bailment?

34–4a Elements of a Bailment

Not all transactions involving the delivery of property from one person to another create a bailment. For such a transfer to become a bailment, the following three elements must be present:

1. Personal property.
2. Delivery of possession without title.
3. Agreement that the property will be returned to the bailor or otherwise disposed of according to its owner's directions.

Olena Yakobchuk/Shutterstock.com

A passenger checks her luggage onto an airplane. Has a bailment been created? Why or why not?

Personal Property Requirement Only personal property, not real property or persons, can be the subject of a bailment. Example 34.15 When Jai checks her bags at the airport, a bailment of Jai's luggage is created because the luggage is personal property. When Jai boards the plane as a passenger, no bailment is created. ■ Although bailments commonly involve tangible items—jewelry, cattle, automobiles, and the like—intangible personal property, such as promissory notes and shares of stock, may also be bailed.

Delivery of Possession Delivery of possession means the transfer of possession of the property to the bailee. For delivery to occur, the bailee must be given exclusive possession and control over the property, and the bailee must knowingly accept the personal property.[5] In other words, the bailee must intend to exercise control over it.

If either delivery of possession or knowing acceptance is lacking, there is no bailment relationship. Example 34.16 Sophia goes to a five-star restaurant and checks her coat at the door. She forgets that there is a $20,000 diamond necklace in the coat pocket. In accepting the coat, the bailee does not knowingly also accept the necklace. Thus, a bailment of the coat exists—because the restaurant has exclusive possession and control over the coat and has knowingly accepted it—but not a bailment of the necklace. ■

Physical versus Constructive Delivery. Either physical or constructive delivery will result in the bailee's exclusive possession of and control over the property. As discussed earlier, in the context of gifts, constructive delivery is a substitute, or symbolic, delivery. What is delivered to the bailee is not the actual property bailed (such as a car) but something so related to the property (such as the car keys) that the requirement of delivery is satisfied.

Involuntary Bailments. In certain situations, a bailment is found despite the apparent lack of the requisite elements of control and knowledge. One instance occurs when the bailee acquires the property accidentally or by mistake—as in finding someone else's lost or mislaid property. A bailment is created even though the bailor did not voluntarily deliver the property to the bailee. Such bailments are called constructive or involuntary bailments.

Example 34.17 Several corporate managers attend a meeting at the law office of Jacobs & Matheson. One of the corporate officers, Gustafson, inadvertently leaves his briefcase at the office at the conclusion of the meeting. In this situation, a court may find that an involuntary bailment has been created, even though Gustafson has not voluntarily delivered the briefcase and the law firm has not intentionally accepted it. If an involuntary bailment exists, the firm is responsible for taking care of the briefcase and returning it to Gustafson. ■

Bailment Agreement A bailment agreement can be express or implied. Although a written contract is not required for bailments of less than one year (that is, the Statute of Frauds does not apply), it is a good idea to have one, especially when valuable property is involved.

The bailment agreement expressly or impliedly provides for the return of the bailed property to the bailor or to a third person, or for the disposal of the property by the bailee. It is assumed that the bailee will return the identical goods originally given by the bailor. In certain types of bailments, such as bailments of fungible goods, however, the property returned need only be equivalent property.

Example 34.18 A bailment is created when Holman stores his grain (fungible goods) in Joe's Warehouse. At the end of the storage period, however, the warehouse is not obligated to return to Holman exactly the same grain that he stored. As long as the warehouse returns grain of the same type, grade, and quantity, the warehouse—the bailee—has performed its obligation.

34–4b Ordinary Bailments

Bailments are either ordinary or special (extraordinary). There are three types of ordinary bailments. They are distinguished according to which party receives a benefit from the bailment. This factor will dictate the rights and liabilities of the parties, and the courts use it to determine the standard of care required of the bailee in possession of the personal property.

The three types of ordinary bailments are as follows:

1. Bailment for the sole benefit of the bailor. This is a gratuitous bailment (a bailment that involves no consideration) for the convenience and benefit of the bailor. Basically, the bailee is caring for the bailor's property as a favor. Therefore, the bailee owes only a slight duty of care and will be liable only if grossly negligent in caring for the property.

   Example 34.19 Allen asks his friend Sumi to store his car in her garage while he is away. If Sumi agrees to do so, a gratuitous bailment will be created, because the bailment will be for the sole benefit of the bailor (Allen). If the car is damaged while in Sumi's garage, Sumi will not be responsible for the damage unless it is caused by her gross negligence.

2. Bailment for the sole benefit of the bailee. This type of bailment typically occurs when one person lends an item to another person (the bailee) solely for the bailee's convenience and benefit. Because the bailee is borrowing the item for personal benefit, the bailee owes a duty to exercise the utmost care and will be liable for even slight negligence.

   Example 34.20 Allen asks to borrow Sumi's boat so that he can go sailing over the weekend. The bailment of the boat is for Allen's (the bailee's) sole benefit. If Allen fails to pay attention and runs the boat aground, damaging its hull, he is liable for the costs of repairing the boat.

3. Bailment for the mutual benefit of the bailee and the bailor. This is the most common kind of bailment and involves some form of compensation for storing property or holding property while it is being serviced. It is a contractual bailment and may be referred to as a bailment for hire or a commercial bailment. In this type of bailment, the bailee owes a duty to exercise a reasonable degree of care.

   Example 34.21 Allen leaves his car at Quick Lube for an oil change. Because Quick Lube will be paid to change Allen's oil, this is a mutual-benefit bailment. If Quick Lube fails to put the correct amount of oil back into Allen's car and the engine is damaged as a result, Quick Lube will be liable for failure to exercise reasonable care.

What kind of bailment is created when someone lends a sailboat to a friend for the weekend? Who is responsible for the repair costs if the friend damages the sailboat? Why?

Rights of the Bailee Certain rights are implicit in the bailment agreement. Generally, the bailee has the right to take possession of the property and to use it to accomplish the purpose of the bailment. Bailees also have a right to receive compensation (unless otherwise agreed), and to limit their liability for the bailed goods. These rights are present (with some limitations) in varying degrees in all bailment transactions.

Right of Possession. A hallmark of the bailment agreement is that the bailee acquires the right to control and possess the property temporarily. The bailee's right of possession permits the bailee to recover damages from any third person for damage or loss of the property.

Example 34.22 No-Spot Dry Cleaners sends all suede leather garments to Cleanall Company for special processing. If Cleanall loses or damages any leather goods, No-Spot has the right to recover against Cleanall. In addition, if the bailed property is stolen, the bailee has a legal right to regain possession of it.

Right to Use Bailed Property. The extent to which bailees can use the property entrusted to them depends in part on the terms of the bailment contract. When no provision is made, the extent of use depends on how necessary it is for the goods to be at the bailee's disposal for the ordinary purpose of the bailment to be carried out.

Example 34.23 If Lauren borrows a car to drive Devin to the airport, she, as the bailee, will obviously be expected to use the car. In contrast, if Devin drives his own car to the airport and places it in long-term storage nearby, the storage company, as the bailee, will not be expected to use the car. The ordinary purpose of a storage bailment does not include use of the property. The bailee will, however, be expected to use or move the car if necessary in an emergency (such as a hurricane or flood) to protect it from harm.

Right of Compensation. Except in a gratuitous bailment, a bailee has a right to be compensated as provided for in the bailment agreement. The bailee also has a right to be reimbursed for services rendered and costs incurred in keeping the bailed property (even in a gratuitous bailment).

To enforce the right of compensation, the bailee has a right to place a possessory lien on the bailed property until full payment has been made. A lien on bailed property is referred to as a bailee's lien, or an artisan's lien. If the bailor refuses to pay or cannot pay the charges, in most states the bailee is entitled to foreclose on the lien and sell the property to recover the amount owed.

Bailee's Lien A possessory (artisan's) lien that a bailee entitled to compensation can place on the bailed property to ensure payment for the services provided.

Example 34.24 Liam leaves his car at Annette's Automotive for repairs. Annette's informs Liam that the car needs a new transmission, and Liam authorizes Annette's to perform the work. When Liam returns to pick up the car, he refuses to pay the amount due for the transmission work. Annette's has a right to keep the car and place a lien on it until Liam pays for the repairs. If Liam continues to refuse to pay, Annette's can follow the state statutory process for foreclosing on the lien by selling the car to recover what is owed.

Right to Limit Liability. In ordinary bailments, bailees have the right to limit their liability, provided that both of the following are true:

1. The limitations are called to the attention of the bailor. It is essential that the bailor be informed of the limitation in some way. Example 34.25 A sign in Nikolai's garage states that Nikolai will not be responsible "for loss due to theft, fire, or vandalism." Whether the sign will constitute notice will depend on the size of the sign, its location, and any other circumstances affecting the likelihood that customers will see it. (In most cases, the owner will still be held liable.)
2. The limitations are not against public policy. Even when the bailor knows of the limitation, courts consider certain types of disclaimers of liability to be against public policy and therefore illegal. The courts carefully scrutinize exculpatory clauses, which limit a party's liability for the party's own wrongful acts. In bailments, especially mutual-benefit bailments, exculpatory clauses are often held to be illegal. Example 34.26 A receipt from Al's Parking Garage expressly disclaims liability for any damage to parked cars, regardless of the cause. Because the bailee (the garage) has attempted to exclude liability for the bailee's own negligence, the clause will likely be deemed unenforceable because it is against public policy.

Duties of the Bailee

The bailee's duties are based on a mixture of tort law and contract law and include two basic responsibilities:

1. To take appropriate care of the property.
2. To surrender the property to the bailor or dispose of it in accordance with the bailor's instructions at the end of the bailment.

The Duty of Care. The bailee must exercise reasonable care in preserving the bailed property. What constitutes reasonable care in a bailment situation normally depends on the nature and specific circumstances of the bailment.

The courts determine the appropriate standard of care on the basis of the type of bailment involved. As mentioned earlier, in a bailment for the sole benefit of the bailor, the bailee need exercise only a slight degree of care. In a mutual-benefit bailment, courts normally impose a reasonable standard of care. In a bailment for the sole benefit of the bailee, the bailee must exercise great care. Exhibit 34-2 illustrates these concepts.

Determining whether a bailee exercised an appropriate degree of care is usually a question of fact for the jury or (in a nonjury trial) the judge. A bailee's failure to exercise appropriate care in handling the bailor's property results in tort liability.

Case Example 34.27 Toll Processing Services bought a secondhand pickle line, equipment used to remove impurities and rust from steel, but had nowhere to put it. Kastalon, Inc., a company that services pickle lines, agreed to store the machinery until Toll Processing filed a reconditioning purchase order. Kastalon would then perform any necessary repairs on the pickle line and return it to Toll Processing. No specific time frame for this process was discussed, but both sides assumed that the storage would last several months. After more than two years, not having heard from Toll Processing, a Kastalon employee assumed that the other company had gone out of business.

Based on this assumption and the pickle line's state of disrepair, Kastalon had it scrapped. Six months later, Toll Processing learned of this and sued Kastalon for negligence. A lower court dismissed the case, holding that Kastalon, the bailee, had met its duty of care by reasonably concluding that, after more than two and a half years with no contact, Toll Processing had abandoned the pickle line. An appeals court reversed, citing the lower court's failure to determine whether Kastalon had taken reasonable steps to protect the bailed property. Why, for example, didn't someone from Kastalon simply contact Toll Processing to learn its intentions regarding the pickle line?[6]

Duty to Return Bailed Property. At the end of the bailment, the bailee normally must hand over the bailed property to the bailor or to someone the bailor designates, or must otherwise dispose of it as directed. Failure to give up possession at the time the bailment ends is a breach of contract and can result in a tort lawsuit for conversion or negligence.

A bailee may be liable for conversion if the goods being held are delivered to the wrong person. Hence, the bailee should verify that the person (other than the bailor) to whom the goods are given is authorized to take possession.

Case Example 34.28 SANY America, Inc., loaned a crane to Turner Brothers, LLC, a construction contractor, for demonstration purposes. SANY wanted to sell the crane to Turner and continued to allow Turner to use it during their negotiations, but the parties never came to an agreement on a price. After the negotiations ended, SANY asked Turner for the crane's location to arrange retrieval. Before SANY retrieved the crane from Turner, however, it was severely damaged while being operated at Turner's construction site.

Why did an appeals court overrule a lower court's decision that a bailee had exercised reasonable care when it destroyed steel production machinery owned by a bailor?

Know This

A finder who appropriates the personal property of another, knowing who the true owner is, can be held liable for the tort of conversion.

Turner removed the inoperable crane from the site at its own expense and then notified SANY that it expected compensation for the transportation expenses. In addition, Turner refused to return the crane to SANY and began billing SANY for daily storage costs. SANY sued for conversion, and Turner counterclaimed. A federal district court held that the parties' transaction was a bailment. Because Turner had wrongfully retained the crane after SANY demanded its return, SANY was entitled to summary judgment for conversion.[7]

Lost or Damaged Property. If the bailed property has been lost or is returned damaged, a court will presume that the bailee was negligent. The bailee's obligation is excused, however, if the property was destroyed, lost, or stolen through no fault of the bailee (or claimed by a third party with a superior claim). In other words, the bailee can rebut the presumption of negligence by showing that due care was exercised.

Case Example 34.29 Hornbeck Offshore Service engaged R&R Marine, Inc., to repair the ship Erie Service at R&R's shipyard on Lake Sabine in Port Arthur, Texas. While repairs were being made, a tropical storm warning was issued for Port Arthur. R&R's personnel left the shipyard without securing or preparing the Erie Service for the storm. During the night, rain and water from Lake Sabine swamped the vessel. R&R's insurer, National Liability & Fire Insurance Company, asked a federal district court to declare that it was not required to pay the salvage cost. Hornbeck filed a counterclaim with the court alleging that R&R had been negligent. The lower court issued a decision in Hornbeck's favor, and R&R appealed.

A federal appellate court affirmed the lower court's ruling. The ship had been delivered to R&R afloat, R&R had full custody of the vessel, and it sank while in R&R's care. This gave rise to a presumption of negligence. The severity of the weather conditions in Port Arthur had been foreseeable, and R&R showed no evidence that it had exercised ordinary care. The court held that R&R—not the insurer—was liable for the salvage cost because R&R had been negligent in failing to protect the ship from damage from the storm.[8]

In the following case, the court had to determine whether a constructive bailment existed with respect to the personal property of tenants who were evicted. If so, was the landlord-bailor negligent for removing the tenants' personal property and leaving it outside?

Zissu v. IH2 Property Illinois, L.P.

United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 157 F.Supp.3d 797 (2016).

Facts Pavel and Aise Zissu lived in an apartment in Chicago, Illinois, owned by IH2 Property Illinois, L.P. IH2 obtained an order from an Illinois state court allowing it to evict the Zissus. IH2 entered the apartment and moved the Zissus' personal property outside, placing it on the curb. The property, which included jewelry, furniture, and personal documents, was then either stolen or damaged. The Zissus filed a suit in a federal district court against IH2. The tenants alleged that IH2's taking possession of their property had constituted a bailment, and that the company had been negligent in its care of the bailed property. IH2 filed a motion to dismiss the suit.

Issue Could IH2 be held liable for the damage and loss of the Zissus' personal property?

Decision Yes. The U.S. District Court held that IH2 could be held liable and denied IH2's motion to dismiss.

Reason A constructive, or implied, bailment "may be found where the property of one person is voluntarily received by another for some purpose other than that of obtaining ownership." IH2's taking possession of the apartment's contents—the Zissus' personal property—created a constructive bailment. A duty of care arises when a landlord chooses to act as a bailee with respect to a tenant's property. The Zissus alleged sufficient facts to state a claim for negligence.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that instead of putting the Zissus' personal property outside, IH2 had taken it to a storage facility. Would the result have been different? Why or why not?

Duties of the Bailor The duties of a bailor are essentially the same as the rights of a bailee. A bailor has a duty to compensate the bailee as agreed and to reimburse the bailee for costs incurred by the bailee in keeping the bailed property. A bailor also has an all-encompassing duty to provide the bailee with goods or chattels that are free from known defects that could cause injury to the bailee.

Bailor's Duty to Reveal Defects. The bailor's duty to reveal defects to the bailee translates into two rules:

1. In a mutual-benefit bailment, the bailor must notify the bailee of all known defects and any hidden defects that the bailor knows of or could have discovered with reasonable diligence and proper inspection.
2. In a bailment for the sole benefit of the bailee, the bailor must notify the bailee of any known defects.

The bailor's duty to reveal defects is based on a negligence theory of tort law. A bailor who fails to give the appropriate notice is liable to the bailee and to any other person who might reasonably be expected to come into contact with the defective article.

Example 34.30 Rentco (the bailor) rents a tractor to Hal Iverson. Unknown to Rentco, the brake mechanism on the tractor is defective at the time the bailment is made. Rentco could have discovered the defect on reasonable inspection. Iverson uses the defective tractor without knowledge of the brake problem and is injured, along with two other field workers, when the tractor rolls downhill out of control after failing to stop. In this situation, Rentco is liable for the injuries sustained by Iverson and the other workers because it negligently failed to discover the defect and notify Iverson. ■

Warranty Liability for Defective Goods. A bailor can also incur warranty liability (discussed in an earlier chapter) based on contract law for injuries resulting from the bailment of defective articles. Property that is leased from a bailor must be fit for the intended purpose of the bailment. Warranties of fitness arise by law in sales contracts and leases, and courts have held that these warranties apply to bailments "for hire." Article 2A of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) extends the implied warranties of merchantability and fitness for a particular purpose to bailments that include rights to use the bailed goods.[9]

34–4c Special Types of Bailments

A business is likely to engage in some special types of bailment transactions in which the bailee's duty of care is extraordinary and the bailee's liability for loss or damage to the property is absolute. These situations usually involve common carriers and hotel operators. Warehouse companies have a higher duty of care than ordinary bailees but are not subject to strict liability. Like carriers, warehouse companies are subject to extensive regulation under federal and state laws, including Article 7 of the UCC.

Common Carriers Common carriers are publicly licensed to transport goods or passengers on regular routes at set rates. They are legally bound to carry all passengers or freight as long as there is enough space, the fee is paid, and there are no reasonable grounds to refuse service. Common carriers differ from private carriers, which operate transportation facilities for only a select clientele. A private carrier is not required to provide service to every person or company making a request.

Strict Liability Applies. The delivery of goods to a common carrier creates a bailment relationship between the shipper (bailor) and the common carrier (bailee). Unlike ordinary bailees, the common carrier is held to a standard of care based on strict liability, rather than reasonable care, in protecting the bailed personal property. This means that the common carrier is absolutely liable, regardless of due care, for all loss or damage to goods except when damage was caused by a natural disaster or war.

Limitations on Liability. Common carriers cannot contract away their liability for damaged goods. Subject to government regulations, however, they are permitted to limit their dollar liability to an amount stated on the shipment contract or rate filing.

Example 34.31 A jewelry store (Martinez Daughters) uses UPS to ship a diamond ring worth $200,000. The owner of the jewelry store, Julie Martinez, arranges for the shipment on UPS's website, which requires her to click on two on-screen boxes to agree to "My UPS Terms and Conditions." In these terms, UPS and its insurer limit their liability and the amount of insurance coverage on packages to $50,000 and refuse to ship items worth more than $50,000. Both UPS and its insurer disclaim liability entirely for such items. Nevertheless, Martinez purchases $50,000 in insurance for the package.

If the ring is subsequently lost in shipping, the jewelry store cannot recover any amount from UPS under the insurance policy. UPS's disclaimer of liability is enforceable, and the jewelry store breached the contract by indicating that the shipment was worth less than $50,000. ■

A jewelry storeowner ships a $200,000 diamond ring knowing that the shipper's maximum shipment value is only $50,000. What happens if the ring never arrives at its destination?

Warehouse Companies Warehousing is the business of storing property for compensation. Like ordinary bailees, warehouse companies are liable for loss or damage to property resulting from negligence. But because a warehouse company is a professional bailee, it is expected to exercise a high degree of care to protect and preserve the goods.

Limitations on Liability. A warehouse company can limit the dollar amount of its liability. Under the UCC, however, it must give the bailor the option of paying a higher storage rate for an increase in the liability limit.[10]

Warehouse Receipts. Warehouse companies often issue documents of title—in particular, warehouse receipts.[11] A warehouse receipt describes the bailed property and the terms of the bailment contract. It can be negotiable or nonnegotiable, depending on how it is written. It is negotiable if its terms provide that the warehouse company will deliver the goods "to the bearer" of the receipt or "to the order of" a person named on the receipt.[12]

10. UCC 7–204(1), (2).

11. A document of title is defined in UCC 1-201(15) as any "document which in the regular course of business or financing is treated as adequately evidencing that the person in possession of it is entitled to receive, hold, and dispose of the document and the goods it covers." A warehouse receipt is a document of title issued by a person engaged for hire in the business of storing goods for hire.

The warehouse receipt represents the goods (that is, it indicates title) and hence has value and utility in financing commercial transactions. Example 34.32 Ossip delivers 6,500 cases of canned corn to Chaney, the owner of a warehouse. Chaney issues a negotiable warehouse receipt payable "to bearer" and gives it to Ossip. Ossip sells and delivers the warehouse receipt to Better Foods, Inc. Better Foods is now the owner of the corn and has the right to obtain the cases by simply presenting the warehouse receipt to Chaney. ■

Hotel Operators At common law, hotel owners were strictly liable for the loss of any cash or property that guests brought into their rooms. Today, state statutes continue to apply strict liability to hotel operators for any loss or damage to their guests' personal property. In many states, however, hotel operators can avoid strict liability by providing a safe in which to keep guests' valuables and notifying guests that a safe is available.

In addition, state statutes often limit the liability of hotels with regard to articles that are not kept in the safe and may limit the availability of damages in the absence of negligence. Most statutes require that the hotel post these limitations on the doors of the rooms or otherwise notify guests. The failure of the hotel to follow the state statutory requirements can lead to liability.

Example 34.33 A guest at Crown Place hotel is traveling with jewelry valued at $1 million. She puts the jewelry in the safe in her room, but someone comes into the room and removes the jewelry from the safe without the use of force. The woman sues the hotel, which claims that it is not liable under the state statute. If Crown Place did not comply with statutory requirements that it post the legal limitations in the guest rooms, it will not be protected from liability. Crown Place will be strictly liable for the loss of the woman's jewelry. ■

Vanessa Denai owned forty acres of land in rural Louisiana. On the property were a 1,600-square-foot house and a metal barn. Denai met Lance Finney, who had been seeking a small plot of rural property to rent. After several meetings, Denai invited Finney to live on a corner of her land in exchange for Finney's assistance in cutting wood and tending her property. Denai agreed to store Finney's sailboat in her barn.

With Denai's consent, Finney constructed a concrete and oak foundation on Denai's property and purchased a 190-square-foot dome from Dome Baja for $3,395. The dome was shipped by Doty Express, a transportation company licensed to serve the public. When it arrived, Finney installed the dome frame and fabric exterior so that the dome was detachable from the foundation. A year after Finney installed the dome, Denai wrote Finney a note stating, "I've decided to give you four acres of land surrounding your dome as drawn on this map." This gift violated no local land-use restrictions. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Is the dome real property or personal property? Explain.
2. Is Denai's gift of land to Finney a gift causa mortis or a gift inter vivos?
3. What type of bailment relationship was created when Denai agreed to store Finney's boat? What degree of care was Denai required to exercise in storing the boat?
4. What standard of care applied to the shipment of the dome by Doty Express?

Chapter Summary: Personal Property and Bailments

PERSONAL PROPERTY
Personal Property versus Real Property	Personal property (personalty or chattel) includes all property not classified as real property (realty). Personal property can be tangible (such as a car) or intangible (such as stocks or bonds). The two types of property are usually subject to different types of taxes. In addition, acquiring or transferring real property requires a greater degree of formality than acquiring or transferring personal property.
Acquiring Ownership of Personal Property	The most common way of acquiring ownership in personal property is by purchasing it. The following are additional methods of acquiring personal property: 1. Possession—Property may be acquired by possession if no other person has title to the property (for instance, capturing wild animals). 2. Production—Any item produced by an individual (with minor exceptions) becomes the property of that individual. 3. Gifts—A gift is effective under the following conditions: a. There is evidence of intent to make a gift of the property in question. b. The gift is delivered (physically or constructively) to the donee or the donee's agent. c. The gift is accepted by the donee. 4. Accession—When value is added to personal property by the use of labor or materials, the owner of the original property generally retains title to the property and benefits from the added value. 5. Confusion—If confusion of fungible goods occurs as a result of agreement, an honest mistake, or the act of some third party, the owners share ownership as tenants in common. If goods are confused due to an intentional wrongful act, the innocent party ordinarily acquires title to the whole.
Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property	The finder of property acquires different rights depending on whether the property was mislaid, lost, or abandoned. 1. Mislaid property—Property that is placed somewhere voluntarily by the owner and then inadvertently forgotten. The finder does not acquire title. 2. Lost property—Property that the owner has involuntarily parted with and then cannot find or recover. The finder can claim title to the property against the whole world except the true owner. 3. Abandoned property—Property that is discarded by the owner, who has no intention of reclaiming it in the future. The finder can claim title to the property against the whole world, including the original owner.
BAILMENTS
Elements of a Bailment	1. Personal property—Bailments involve only personal property. 2. Delivery of possession without title—For an effective bailment to exist, the bailee (the one receiving the property) must be given exclusive possession and control over the property. In a voluntary bailment, the bailee must knowingly accept the personal property. 3. The bailment agreement—The agreement expressly or impliedly provides for the return of the bailed property to the bailor or a third party, or for the disposal of the bailed property by the bailee.

Ordinary Bailments	1. Types of bailments— a. Bailment for the sole benefit of the bailor—A gratuitous bailment undertaken for the sole benefit of the bailor (for example, as a favor to the bailor). b. Bailment for the sole benefit of the bailee—A gratuitous loan of an article to a person (the bailee) solely for the bailee's benefit. c. Mutual-benefit (contractual) bailment—This is the most common kind of bailment and involves compensation between the bailee and bailor for the service provided. 2. Rights of a bailee (duties of a bailor)— a. The right of possession—Allows a bailee to sue any third persons for damage or loss of the bailed property. b. The right to use the property—Allowed to the extent necessary to carry out the purpose of the bailment. c. The right to be compensated and reimbursed for expenses—In the event of nonpayment, the bailee has the right to place a possessory (bailee's) lien on the bailed property until fully compensated. d. The right to limit liability—An ordinary bailee can limit liability for loss or damage, provided proper notice is given and the limitation is not against public policy. In special bailments, limitations on liability for negligence or on types of losses usually are not allowed, but limitations on the monetary amount of liability are permitted. e. Duty to reveal defects—A bailor must notify the bailee of any known defects and, in mutual-benefit bailments, hidden defects as well. f. Warranty liability—A bailor can incur warranty liability for injuries resulting from the bailment of defective articles. 3. Duties of a bailee (rights of a bailor)— a. Bailees must exercise appropriate care over property entrusted to them. What constitutes appropriate care normally depends on the nature and circumstances of the bailment. See Exhibit 34–2. b. Bailed goods in a bailee's possession must be either returned to the bailor or disposed of according to the bailor's directions. A bailee's failure to return the bailed property creates a presumption of negligence and constitutes a breach of contract or the tort of conversion.
Special Types of Bailments	1. Common carriers—Carriers that are publicly licensed to provide transportation services to the general public are held to a standard of care based on strict liability. 2. Warehouse companies—Because a warehouse company is a professional bailee, it is expected to exercise a high degree of care to protect and preserve the bailed goods. Warehouse companies often issue documents of title (warehouse receipts) for goods, which may be negotiable or nonnegotiable. 3. Hotel operators—Operators of hotels are subject to strict liability for any loss or damage to their guests' personal property. State statutes may limit liability if the hotel provides a safe and properly notifies its guests.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

34–1. Duties of the Bailee. Discuss the standard of care traditionally required of the bailee for the bailed property in each of the following situations, and determine whether the bailee breached that duty. (See Bailments.)

1. Ricardo borrows Steve's lawn mower because his own lawn mower needs repair. Ricardo mows his front yard. To mow the backyard, he needs to move some hoses and lawn furniture. He leaves the mower in front of his house while doing so. When he returns to the front yard, he discovers that the mower has been stolen.
2. Alicia owns a valuable speedboat. She is going on vacation and asks her neighbor, Maureen, to store the boat in one stall of Maureen's double garage. Maureen consents, and the boat is moved into the garage. Maureen needs some grocery items for dinner and drives to the store. She leaves the garage door open while she is gone, as is her custom, and the speedboat is stolen during that time.

34–2. Gifts. Jaspal has a severe heart attack and is taken to the hospital. He is aware that he is not expected to live. Because he is a bachelor with no close relatives nearby, Jaspal gives his car keys to his close friend Friedrich, telling Friedrich that he is expected to die and that the car is Friedrich's. Jaspal survives the heart attack, but two months later he dies from pneumonia. Sam, Jaspal's uncle and the executor of his estate, wants Friedrich to return the car. Friedrich refuses, claiming that the car was a gift from Jaspal. Discuss whether Friedrich will be required to return the car to Jaspal's estate. (See Acquiring Ownership of Personal Property.)

34–3. Lost Property. Sara Simon misplaced her Galaxy cell phone in Manhattan, Kansas. Days later, Shawn Vargo contacted her, claiming to have bought the phone from someone else. He promised to mail it to Simon if she would wire $100 to him through a third party, Mark Lawrence. When Simon spoke to Lawrence about the wire transfer, she referred to the phone as hers and asked, "Are you going to send my phone to me?" Simon paid, but she did not get the phone. Instead, Lawrence took it to a Best Buy store and traded it in for credit. Charged with the theft of lost property, Lawrence claimed that he did not know Simon was the owner of the phone. Was Simon's phone lost, mislaid, or abandoned? What is the finder's responsibility with respect to this type of property? Can Lawrence successfully argue that he did not know the phone was Simon's? Explain. [State of Kansas v. Lawrence, 347 P.3d 240 (Kan.App. 2015)] (See Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property.)

34–4. Bailments. Christie's Fine Art Storage Services, Inc. (CFASS), is in the business of storing fine works of art at its warehouse in Brooklyn, New York. The warehouse is next to the East River in a flood zone. Boyd Sullivan owns works of art by Alberto Vargas, including Beauty and the Beast and Miss Universe. Sullivan contracted to store the works at CFASS's facility under an agreement that limited the warehouser's liability for damage to the goods to $200,000. A few months later, as Hurricane Sandy approached, CFASS was warned, along with the other businesses in the flood zone, of the potential for damage from the storm. CFASS e-mailed its clients that extra precautions were being taken. Despite this assurance, Sullivan's works were left exposed on a ground floor and sustained severe damage in the storm. Who is most likely to suffer the loss? Why? [Sullivan v. Christie's Fine Art Storage Services, Inc., 2016 WL 427615 (Sup. N.Y. County 2016)] (See Bailments.)

34–5. Duties of the Bailee. James Heal owned a vehicle salvage yard in Homestead, Iowa. Brian Anderson contracted with Heal to run the business. Anderson cleaned up the property, removed trash, installed heat and fixed the plumbing in the buildings, and brought in tools and equipment. He used his own resources to rebuild the aging inventory. Anderson reinvested all of the profits in the business. When Anderson sold a 2004 Ford F-150 that he had bought with his own money for his own use, however, Heal pocketed the proceeds and locked Anderson out of the business. Heal filed a suit in an Iowa state court against Anderson, alleging breach of contract, and obtained an injunction to keep him off the property. Do these circumstances create a bailment? What is the appropriate standard of care if there is a bailment? Discuss. [Heal v. Anderson, 900 N.W.2d 617 (Iowa App. 2017)] (See Bailments.)

34–6. The Nature of Personal Property. American Multi-Cinema, Inc. (AMC), owns movie theaters. To determine the amount of taxes it owed to Texas, AMC subtracted its cost of goods sold (COGS) from its total revenue. AMC included the cost of showing movies in its COGS. In other words, it treated showing movies as a "good." Texas, however, refused to allow AMC to claim this cost. AMC protested, arguing it was in the business of showing movies. Specifically, AMC sold its "product"—the right to watch films in its theaters—to moviegoers. The state countered that this right is intangible "non-property," arguing that an AMC customer exits a theater with memories but not a copy of the film. Thus, AMC's product is not considered a "good" for the purpose of COGS. Does the right to watch a film in a movie theater constitute property? Discuss. [American Multi-Cinema, Inc. v. Hegar, 2017 WL 74416 (Tex.App.— Austin 2017)] (See Personal Property versus Real Property.)

34–7. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Duties of the Bailee. KZY Logistics, LLC, transported a load of Mrs. Ressler's Food Products from New Jersey to California. When KZY's driver delivered the cargo, the customer rejected it—its temperature was higher than expected, making it unsafe. Mrs. Ressler's filed a suit against KZY in a federal district court. KZY contended that the temperature in its refrigerated trailer was proper and that Mrs. Ressler's had delivered a "hot" product for transport. KZY supplemented its allegations with temperature readings from the unit during the time in question. In transporting the cargo, what level of care did KZY owe Mrs. Ressler's? Did KZY meet this standard? Explain. [Mrs. Ressler's Food Products v. KZY Logistics, LLC, 675 Fed.Appx. 136 (3d Cir. 2017)] (See Bailments.)

34–8. Bailor's Duty to Reveal Defects. Anastasio Guerra agreed to loan his pick-up truck to Gina Mandujano so that she could go grocery shopping in exchange for her making him lunch. When Mandujano drove out of the store's parking lot, the truck's power steering failed. Her wrist was caught in the spokes of the steering wheel, and she was severely injured. Guerra knew that there was a problem with his truck's steering, but he thought he had fixed the problem by replenishing the steering fluid. He did not believe that the issue was dangerous and had not told Mandujano. What type of bailment existed between Guerra and Mandujano? What standard of care did the bailor owe the bailee? Was the duty breached? Who is liable for the cost of Mandujano's injury? Explain. [Mandujano v. Guerra, 2018 WL 1611458 (Md. 2018)] (See Bailments.)

34–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Abandoned Property. Mansoor Akhtar lived rent-free in the basement of Anila Dairkee's duplex in Minneapolis, Minnesota, for more than a year. When Dairkee asked Akhtar to move out, he refused. She changed the locks and advised him to remove his property from the duplex. But he did not. About a year later, while Dairkee was staying in New York, her father had the basement cleaned out. When Dairkee returned four months later, she learned that her father had disposed of Akhtar's property. Akhtar filed a suit in a Minnesota state court against Dairkee, alleging that she had wrongfully disposed of his property. [Akhtar v Dairkee, 2017 WL 1210140 (Minn.App. 2017)] (See Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property.)

1. Dairkee contended that Akhtar had abandoned his property. Is she correct? Explain.
2. Using the Review step of the IDDR approach, consider whether Dairkee's handling of Akhtar's property was ethical.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

34–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Bailments. On learning that Sébastien planned to travel abroad, Roslyn asked him to deliver $25,000 in cash to her family in Mexico. During a customs inspection at the border, Sébastien told the customs inspector that he carried less than $10,000. The officer discovered the actual amount of cash that Sébastien was carrying, seized it, and arrested Sébastien. Roslyn asked the government to return what she claimed were her funds, arguing that the arrangement with Sébastien was a bailment and that she still held title to the cash. (See Bailments.)

1. The first group will argue that Roslyn is entitled to the cash.
2. The second group will take the position of the government and develop an argument that Roslyn's agreement with Sébastien does not qualify as a bailment.
3. The third group will assume that a bailment was created, identify what type of bailment it was, and explain the degree of care required of the bailee.

35 Real Property and Landlord-Tenant Law

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is a fixture, and how does it relate to real property rights?
2. What is the difference between a joint tenancy and a tenancy in common?
3. What are the requirements for acquiring property by adverse possession?
4. What are the duties of the landlord and the tenant with respect to the use and maintenance of leased property?

"The right of property is the most sacred of all the rights of citizenship."

Jean-Jacques Rousseau
1712–1778
(French writer and philosopher)

From earliest times, property has provided a means for survival. Primitive peoples lived off the fruits of the land, eating the vegetation and wildlife. Later, as the vegetation was cultivated and the wildlife domesticated, property provided farmland and pasture.

Throughout history, property has continued to be an indicator of family wealth and social position. Indeed, an individual's right to ownership of property has become, in the words of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, one of the "most sacred of all the rights of citizenship."

In this chapter, we examine the nature of real property and the ways in which it can be owned and transferred. We even consider whether the buyer of a haunted house can rescind the sale in this chapter's Spotlight Case. We also discuss leased property and landlord-tenant relationships.

35–1 The Nature of Real Property

Real property consists of land and the buildings, plants, and trees that are on it. Real property also includes subsurface and airspace rights, as well as personal property that has become permanently attached to the real property. Whereas personal property is movable, real property—also called real estate or realty—is immovable.

35–1a Land and Structures

Land includes the soil on the surface of the earth and the natural or artificial structures that are attached to it. It further includes all the waters contained on or under the surface and much, but not necessarily all, of the airspace above it. The exterior boundaries of land extend down to the center of the earth and up to the farthest reaches of the atmosphere (subject to certain qualifications).

35–1b Airspace and Subsurface Rights

The owner of real property has rights to the airspace above the land, as well as to the soil and minerals underneath it. Limitations on either airspace rights or subsurface rights normally must be indicated on the document that transfers title at the time of purchase. When no such limitations, or encumbrances, are noted, a purchaser generally can expect to have an unlimited right to possession of the property.

Airspace Rights Disputes concerning airspace rights may involve the right of commercial and private planes to fly over property and the right of individuals and governments to seed clouds and produce rain artificially. Flights over private land normally do not violate property rights unless the flights are so low and so frequent that they directly interfere with the owner's enjoyment and use of the land. Leaning walls or buildings and projecting eave spouts or roofs may also violate the airspace rights of an adjoining property owner.

Subsurface Rights In many states, land ownership may be separated, in that the surface of a piece of land and the subsurface may have different owners. Subsurface rights can be extremely valuable, as these rights include the ownership of minerals, oil, and natural gas. Subsurface rights would be of little value, however, if the owner could not use the surface to exercise those rights. Hence, a subsurface owner has a right (called a profit, to be discussed later in this chapter) to go onto the surface of the land to, for instance, discover and mine minerals.

When ownership is separated into surface and subsurface rights, the owner of one set of rights can pass title without the consent of the other owner. Of course, conflicts can arise between the surface owner's use of the property and the subsurface owner's need to extract minerals, oil, or natural gas. In that situation, one party's interest may become subservient (secondary) to the other party's interest either by statute or by case law.

If the owners of the subsurface rights excavate (dig), they are absolutely liable if their excavation causes the surface to collapse. Many states have statutes that also make the excavators liable for any damage to structures on the land. Typically, these statutes provide precise requirements for excavations of various depths.

35–1c Plant Life and Vegetation

Plant life, both natural and cultivated, is also considered to be real property. In many instances, the natural vegetation, such as trees, adds greatly to the value of the realty. When a parcel of land is sold and the land has growing crops on it, the sale includes the crops, unless otherwise specified in the sales contract. When crops are sold by themselves, however, they are considered to be personal property, or goods. Consequently, the sale of crops is a sale of goods and thus is governed by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) rather than by real property law.[1]

Focus Question 1

What is a fixture, and how does it relate to real property rights?

35–1d Fixtures

Fixture An item of personal property that has become so closely associated with real property that it is legally regarded as part of that real property.

Certain personal property can become so closely associated with the real property to which it is attached that the law views it as real property. Such property is known as a fixture—an item affixed to realty, meaning that it is attached to the real property in a permanent way. The item may be embedded in the land or permanently attached to the property or to another fixture on the property by means of cement, mortar, bolts, nails, roots, or screws. An item, such as a statue, may even sit on the land without being attached, as long as the owner intends the property to be a fixture.

Fixtures are included in the sale of land if the sales contract does not provide otherwise.[2] The sale of a house includes the land and the house and any detached garage on the land, as well as the cabinets, plumbing, and windows. Because these are permanently affixed to the property, they are considered to be a part of it. Certain items, such as drapes and window-unit air conditioners, are difficult to classify. Thus, a contract for the sale of a house or commercial realty should indicate which items of this sort are included in the sale.

Example 35.1 Rosemary & Sage Farm has an eight-tower center-pivot irrigation system that is bolted to a cement slab and connected to an underground well. The bank holds a mortgage note on the farm secured by "all buildings, improvements, and fixtures." Later, when Rosemary & Sage files for bankruptcy, a dispute arises between the bank and another creditor over the irrigation system. In this situation, a court is likely to find that the irrigation system is a fixture because it is firmly attached to the land and integral to the operation of the farm. Therefore, the bank's security interest will have priority over the other creditor's interest.

Under what circumstances is an industrial-quality irrigation system considered a fixture?

35–2 Ownership Interests and Leases

Ownership of real property is abstract and differs from ownership of personal property. No one can actually possess or hold a piece of land, the airspace above it, the earth below it, and all the water contained on it. The legal system therefore recognizes certain rights and duties that constitute ownership interests in real property.

Traditionally, ownership interests in real property were referred to as estates in land, which include fee simple estates, life estates, and leasehold estates. We examine estates in land, forms of concurrent ownership, and certain other interests in real property in the following subsections.

As you will see, ownership of real property (as well as personal property) can be viewed as a bundle of rights, including the right to possess the property and to dispose of it by sale, gift, lease, or other means. A person can own either the whole bundle of rights (a fee simple) or only a part of the rights. When only some of the rights are transferred, the effect is to limit the ownership rights of both the transferor of the rights and the recipient.

35–2a Ownership in Fee Simple

Fee Simple An ownership interest in land in which the owner has the greatest possible aggregation of rights, privileges, and power.

One who possesses the entire bundle of rights is said to hold the property in fee simple (usually referring to fee simple absolute), which is the most complete form of ownership. Owners in fee simple are entitled to use, possess, or dispose of the property as they choose during their lifetimes. The owners have the rights of exclusive possession and use of the property. They can give the property away, sell it, or lease it.

Duration On the fee simple owner's death, the interests in the property descend (pass down) to the owner's heirs, even in the absence of a will. Thus, a fee simple is potentially infinite in duration and is assigned forever to individuals and their heirs without limitation or condition.

2. Trade fixtures, which are items installed by a tenant for a commercial purpose (such as a walk-in cooler for a restaurant), are an exception and do not become part of the landowner's real property.

Limitations on Use The rights that accompany a fee simple include the right to use the land for whatever purpose the owner sees fit. Of course, other laws, including applicable zoning regulations, noise regulations, and environmental laws, may limit the owner's ability to use the property in certain ways. A fee simple owner cannot build a manufacturing plant on the property if doing so would violate applicable city or county rules and regulations, for instance. Also, a person who uses property in a manner that unreasonably interferes with others' right to use or enjoy their own property can be liable for the tort of nuisance.

Spotlight Case Example 35.2 Nancy and James Biglane owned and lived in a building in Natchez, Mississippi. Next door to the couple's property was the Under the Hill Saloon, a popular bar that featured live music. During the summer, the Saloon, which had no air-conditioning, opened its windows and doors, and live music echoed up and down the street.

Although the Biglanes installed extra insulation, thicker windows, and air-conditioning units in their building, the noise from the Saloon kept them awake at night. Eventually, the Biglanes sued the owners of the Saloon for nuisance. The court held that the noise from the bar unreasonably interfered with the Biglanes' right to enjoy their property and prohibited the Saloon from opening its windows and doors while playing music.[3]

35–2b Life Estates

A life estate is an estate that lasts for the life of some specified individual. A conveyance, or transfer of real property, "to Alex Munson for his life" creates a life estate. In a life estate, the life tenant's ownership rights cease to exist on the life tenant's death.

Life Estate An interest in land that exists only for the duration of the life of a specified individual, usually the holder of the estate.

Conveyance The transfer of title to real property from one person to another by deed or other document.

Waste The use of real property in a manner that damages or destroys its value.

Life tenants have the right to use the land provided that they commit no waste (injury to the land). In other words, a life tenant cannot use the land in a manner that would adversely affect its value. Example 35.3 Julian, a life tenant on Blazin Acres, can use the land to harvest crops. If mines and oil wells are already on the land, Julian can extract minerals and oil from it, but he cannot drill new oil wells or excavate mines on the property.

Life tenants also have the right to create liens, easements (discussed shortly), and leases, but none can extend beyond the life of the tenants. In addition, with a few exceptions, owners of life estates have an exclusive right to possession during their lifetimes.

Along with these rights, life tenants also have some duties. They must keep the property in repair and pay property taxes. In short, the owners of life estates have the same rights as a fee simple owner, except that life tenants must maintain the value of the property during their tenancy. Also, life tenants cannot sell the property or leave it to their heirs.

The distinction between a life estate and a fee simple determined the result in the following case.

3. Biglane v. Under the Hill Corp., 949 So.2d 9 (Miss.Sup.Ct. 2007).

Case 35.1

In the Matter of the Estate of Nelson

North Dakota Supreme Court, 2018 ND 118, 910 N.W.2d 856, (2018).

Facts When Sidney Solberg died, 100 mineral acres—that is, the right to all of the minerals under a certain 100 acres—and other real property in his estate were distributed to his widow, Lillian, for her life. The remainder interest (the right of ownership after Lillian's interest ended) was conveyed to their four children, including Glenn Solberg.

Later, Lillian married Lyle Nelson. When Lillian passed away, a codicil (addition) to her will allegedly gave the 100 mineral acres to Glenn. The codicil also purported to create for Glenn an option to buy the other real property she had inherited from Sidney. When Lyle Nelson died, Glenn filed a claim in a North Dakota state court against Nelson's estate. Glenn claimed that under the terms of the codicil to Lillian's will, he was entitled to the ownership of the 100 mineral acres and the right to buy the other property. The court dismissed Glenn's claim. He appealed to the state supreme court.

Issue Did Lillian's interest in the 100 mineral acres and the option property terminate with her death?

Decision Yes. The North Dakota Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of Glenn's claim. "The [lower] court properly concluded that, with certainty, it would be impossible for Glenn Solberg to obtain the relief he requested from the Lyle Nelson Estate."

Reason The owner of a life estate has an interest in the possession and use of the property of the estate for the duration of the life that determines the period of the right. The owner may transfer her interest, but the transferee's interest in the property cannot exceed the duration of the life estate. Lillian had a life estate in the 100 mineral acres and the other property measured by the duration of her own life. As the owner of the estate, she could transfer an interest in the property only during her life, and that interest would end when her life ended. Lillian's attempt to convey her interests to Glenn in the codicil to her will was thus invalid.

On Lillian's death, her life estate ended, and the 100 mineral acres and the other property became the property of her four children as the holders of the remainder interest. Glenn could not recover the property from the Nelson estate because the estate did not have an interest in the property.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Sidney Solberg had disposed of his entire estate in fee simple before his death. Would the result have been different? Discuss.

35–2c Concurrent Ownership

Concurrent Ownership Joint ownership.

Persons who share ownership rights simultaneously in particular property (including real property and personal property) are said to have concurrent ownership. There are two principal types of concurrent ownership: tenancy in common and joint tenancy. Concurrent ownership rights can also be held in a tenancy by the entirety or as community property, but these types of concurrent ownership are less common.

Tenancy in Common Joint ownership of property in which each party owns an undivided interest that passes to the party's heirs at death.

Tenancy in Common The term tenancy in common refers to a form of co-ownership in which each of two or more persons owns an undivided interest in the property. The interest is undivided because each tenant shares rights in the whole property. On the death of a tenant in common, that tenant's interest in the property passes to the tenant's heirs.

Example 35.4 Four friends purchase a condominium unit in Hawaii together as tenants in common. This means that each of them has a one-fourth ownership interest in the whole. If one of the four owners dies a year after the purchase, his ownership interest passes to his heirs (his wife and children, for instance) rather than to the other tenants in common.

Unless the co-tenants have agreed otherwise, a tenant in common can transfer ownership interest in the property to anyone without the consent of the remaining co-owners. In most states, it is presumed that a co-tenancy is a tenancy in common unless there is specific language indicating the intent to establish a joint tenancy (discussed next).

Joint Tenancy Joint ownership of property in which each co-owner owns an undivided portion of the property. On the death of one of the joint tenants, that tenant's interest automatically passes to the surviving joint tenant(s).

Joint Tenancy In a joint tenancy, each of two or more persons owns an undivided interest in the property, but a deceased joint tenant's interest passes to the surviving joint tenant or tenants.

Right of Survivorship. The right of a surviving joint tenant to inherit a deceased joint tenant's ownership interest—referred to as a right of survivorship—distinguishes a joint tenancy from a tenancy in common. Example 35.5 Jerrold and Eva are married and purchase a house as joint tenants. The title to the house clearly expresses the intent to create a joint tenancy because it says "to Jerrold and Eva as joint tenants with right of survivorship." Jerrold has three children from a prior marriage. If Jerrold dies, his interest in the house automatically passes to Eva rather than to his children from the prior marriage.

Termination of a Joint Tenancy. Joint tenants can transfer their rights by sale or gift to another without the consent of the other joint tenants. Doing so terminates the joint tenancy. A person who purchases property from a joint tenant or receives it as a gift becomes a tenant in common, not a joint tenant. Example 35.6 Three brothers, Brody, Saul, and Jacob, own land as joint tenants. Brody is experiencing financial difficulties and sells his interest in the property to Beth. The sale terminates the joint tenancy, and now Beth, Saul, and Jacob hold the property as tenants in common.

A joint tenant's interest can also be levied against (seized by court order) to satisfy the tenant's judgment creditors. If this occurs, the joint tenancy terminates, and the remaining owners hold the property as tenants in common. (Judgment creditors can also seize the interests of tenants in a tenancy in common.)

Focus Question 2

What is the difference between a joint tenancy and a tenancy in common?

Tenancy by the Entirety A less common form of shared ownership of real property by married persons is a tenancy by the entirety. It differs from a joint tenancy in that neither spouse may separately transfer interest in the property unless the other spouse consents. In some states in which statutes give the wife the right to convey her property, this form of concurrent ownership has effectively been abolished. A divorce, either spouse's death, or mutual agreement will terminate a tenancy by the entirety.

Tenancy by the Entirety Joint ownership of property by a married couple in which neither spouse can transfer any interest in the property without the consent of the other.

Community Property A limited number of states[4] allow married couples to own property as community property. If property is held as community property, each spouse technically owns an undivided one-half interest in the property. This type of ownership applies to most property acquired by either spouse during the course of the marriage. It generally does not apply to property acquired prior to the marriage or to property acquired by gift or inheritance as separate property during the marriage. After a divorce, community property is divided equally in some states and according to the discretion of the court in other states.

Community Property A form of concurrent property ownership in which each spouse owns an undivided one-half interest in property acquired during the marriage.

35–2d Leasehold Estates

A leasehold estate is created when a real property owner or lessor (landlord) agrees to convey the right to possess and use the property to a lessee (tenant) for a certain period of time. The tenant has a qualified right to exclusive possession. It is qualified because the landlord has a right to enter onto the premises to ensure that no waste (damage or destruction) is being committed.

Leasehold Estate An interest in real property that gives a tenant a qualified right to possess and/or use the property for a limited time under a lease.

The temporary nature of possession under a lease is what distinguishes a tenant from a purchaser, who acquires title to the property. The tenant can use the land—for instance, by harvesting crops—but cannot injure it by such activities as cutting down timber for sale or extracting oil.

Fixed-Term Tenancy A fixed-term tenancy, also called a tenancy for years, is created by an express contract by which property is leased for a specified period of time. Signing a one-year lease to occupy an apartment, for instance, creates a fixed-term tenancy. Note that the term need not be specified by date and can be conditioned on the occurrence of an event, such as leasing a cabin for the summer or an apartment in New Orleans during Mardi Gras.

Fixed-Term Tenancy A type of tenancy under which property is leased for a specified period of time, such as a month, a year, or a period of years. It is also called a tenancy for years.

At the end of the period specified in the lease, the lease ends (without notice), and possession of the property returns to the lessor. If the tenant dies during the period of the lease, the lease interest passes to the tenant's heirs as personal property. Often, leases include renewal or extension provisions.

4. These states include Alaska, Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin. Puerto Rico allows property to be owned as community property as well.

Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Periodic Tenancy A lease interest for an indefinite period involving payment of rent at fixed intervals, such as week to week, month to month, or year to year.

Periodic Tenancy

A periodic tenancy is created by a lease that does not specify how long it is to last but does specify that rent is to be paid at certain intervals. This type of tenancy is automatically renewed for another rental period unless properly terminated. Example 35.7 Kayla enters into a lease with Capital Properties. The lease states, "Rent is due on the tenth day of every month." This provision creates a periodic tenancy from month to month. This type of tenancy can also extend from week to week or from year to year.

Under the common law, to terminate a periodic tenancy, the landlord or tenant must give at least one period's notice to the other party. If the tenancy extends from month to month, for instance, one month's notice must be given prior to the last month's rent payment. Today, however, many states' statutes require a different period for notice of termination in a periodic tenancy.

Tenancy at Will A type of tenancy that either the landlord or the tenant can terminate without notice.

Tenancy at Will

With a tenancy at will, either party can terminate the tenancy without notice. This type of tenancy can arise if a landlord allows a person to live on the premises without paying rent or rents property to a tenant "for as long as both agree." Tenancies at will are rare today because most state statutes require a landlord to provide some period of notice to terminate a tenancy. States may also require a landowner to have sufficient cause to end a residential tenancy.

Tenancy at Sufferance A tenancy that arises when a tenant wrongfully continues to occupy leased property after the lease has terminated.

Tenancy at Sufferance

The mere possession of land without right is called a tenancy at sufferance. A tenancy at sufferance is not a true tenancy because it is created when a tenant wrongfully retains possession of property. Whenever a tenancy for years or a periodic tenancy ends and the tenant continues to retain possession of the premises without the owner's permission, a tenancy at sufferance is created.

35–2e Nonpossessory Interests—Easements, Profits, and Licenses

Nonpossessory Interest In the context of real property, an interest that involves the right to use land but not the right to possess it.

Easement A nonpossessory right, established by express or implied agreement, to make limited use of another's property without removing anything from the property.

Profit In real property law, the right to enter onto another's property and remove something of value from that property.

In contrast to the types of property interests just described, some interests in land do not include any rights to possess the property. Such an interest is known as a nonpossessory interest and includes easements, profits, and licenses.

An easement is the right of a person to make limited use of another person's real property without taking anything from the property. An easement, for instance, can be the right to walk or drive across another's property. In contrast, a profit[5] is the right to go onto land owned by another and take away some part of the land itself or some product of the land. Example 35.8 Steve owns The Dunes. Steve gives Carmen the right to go there to remove all the sand and gravel that she needs for her cement business. Carmen has a profit.

Easements and profits can be classified as either appurtenant or in gross. Because easements and profits are similar and the same rules apply to both, we discuss them together.

Easement or Profit Appurtenant

An easement or profit appurtenant arises when the owner of one piece of land has a right to go onto or remove something from an adjacent piece of land owned by another. The land that is benefited by the easement or profit is called the dominant estate, and the land that is burdened is called the servient estate.

Because easements appurtenant are intended to benefit the land, they run (are conveyed) with the land when it is transferred. Example 35.9 Taylor has a right to drive his car across Green's land, which is adjacent to Taylor's land. This right-of-way over Green's property is an easement appurtenant to Taylor's property and can be used only by Taylor. If Taylor sells his land, the easement runs with the land to benefit the new owner.

Easement or Profit in Gross

In an easement or profit in gross, the right to use or take things from another's land is given to one who does not own an adjacent tract of land. These easements or profits are intended to benefit a particular person or business, not a particular piece of land, and cannot be transferred.

---

5. As used here, the term profit does not refer to the profits made by a business firm. Rather, it means a gain or an advantage.

Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Example 35.10 Avery owns a parcel of land with a marble quarry. Avery conveys (transfers) to Classic Stone Corporation the right to come onto her land and remove up to five hundred pounds of marble per day. Classic Stone owns a profit in gross and cannot transfer this right to another. Similarly, when a utility company is granted an easement to run its power lines across another's property, it obtains an easement in gross.

Creation of an Easement or Profit Most easements and profits are created by an express grant in a contract, a deed, or a will. This allows the parties to include terms defining the extent and length of time of use. In some situations, an easement or profit can also be created without an express agreement.

An easement or profit may arise by implication when the circumstances surrounding the division of a parcel of property imply its existence. Example 35.11 Mathews divides a parcel of land that has only one well for drinking water. If Mathews conveys the half without a well to Dean, a profit by implication arises because Dean needs drinking water.

An easement or profit may also be created by necessity. An easement by necessity does not require a division of property for its existence. A person who rents an apartment, for instance, has an easement by necessity in the private road leading up to the apartment building.

An easement or profit may arise by prescription when one person uses another person's land without the landowner's consent. The use must be apparent and continue for the length of time required by the applicable statute of limitations. (In much the same way, title to property may be obtained by adverse possession, discussed later in this chapter.)

Case Example 35.12 From 1993 to 2016, Charles and Mary Fee used a roadway located on the property of their neighbors Richard and Gail Cheatham to haul livestock to and from a nearby highway and for deliveries of products such as feed, fertilizer, and lime. In July 2016, Richard told the Fees that the road was now off limits and erected a gate to block their passage. The Fees filed a lawsuit claiming that they had a right to access the roadway by prescriptive easement. A Kentucky statute holds that such an easement is created if the use is "unobstructed, open, peaceable, [and] continuous" without express permission of the landowner for at least fifteen years.

The trial court ruled in favor of the Cheathams based on its mistaken view that the relevant time period started when the gate was erected in July 2016. A state appellate court corrected this error, noting that the Fees had used the roadway for more than twenty years before the gate was built. Given Richard's testimony that he had seen the Fees' vehicles on the roadway "every now and then" at least once a year during that entire time, the appeals court found that the Fees had met the statutory requirements for easement by prescription.[6]

Termination of an Easement or Profit An easement or profit can be terminated in several ways. The simplest way is to deed it back to the owner of the land that is burdened by it. Similarly, if the owner of an easement or profit becomes the owner of the property burdened by it, then it is merged into the property.

Another way to terminate an easement or profit is to abandon it and create evidence of intent to relinquish the right to use it. Mere nonuse will not extinguish an easement or profit unless the nonuse is accompanied by an overt act showing the intent to abandon.

License In the context of real property, a license is the revocable right to enter onto another person's land. It is a personal privilege that arises from the consent of the owner of the land and can be revoked by the owner. A ticket to attend a movie at a theater or a concert is an example of a license.

In essence, a license grants a person the authority to enter the land of another and perform a specified act or series of acts without obtaining any permanent interest in the land. When a person with a license exceeds the authority granted and undertakes an action that is not permitted, the property owner can sue that person in tort law for trespass.

An easement appurtenant requires two adjacent pieces of land owned by two different persons, but an easement in gross needs only one piece of land owned by someone other than the owner of the easement.

Why was a landowner's admission that he had seen a neighbor's truck using a road on his property crucial for establishing the neighbor's easement by prescription?

License In the context of real property, a revocable right or privilege to enter onto another person's land.

Case Example 35.13 Richard and Mary Orman purchased real property owned at one time by Sandra Curtis. Part of the garage extended nine feet onto Curtis's neighboring property. In an agreement on file with the deed, Curtis had given the Ormans permission to use the garage as long as it continued to be used as a garage. After the Ormans moved in, they converted the garage's workshop into guest quarters but continued to use the garage as a garage.

A dispute arose over the driveway shared by Curtis and the Ormans, which straddled the property line. The Ormans filed a suit claiming that Curtis left "junk objects" near the driveway that impeded their access. Curtis countered that the permission she had given the buyers to use the garage was a license. She claimed that the Ormans, by converting the workshop into living quarters, had exceeded their authority under the license, which she could therefore revoke. The court looked at the agreement's wording, which clearly gave the Ormans the right to use the garage but did not mention the workshop. The court concluded that because the Ormans were continuing to use the garage as a garage, Curtis could not revoke their right to do so.[7]

Exhibit 35–1 illustrates the various interests in property discussed in this chapter.

35–3 Transfer of Ownership

Ownership interests in real property are frequently transferred (conveyed) by sale, and the terms of the transfer are specified in a real estate sales contract.

Real property ownership can also be transferred by deed, by will or inheritance, by adverse possession, or by eminent domain. When ownership rights in real property are transferred, the type of interest being transferred and the conditions of the transfer normally are set forth in a deed executed by the person who is conveying the property.

35–3a Real Estate Sales Contracts

In some ways, a sale of real estate is similar to a sale of goods, because it involves a transfer of ownership, often with specific warranties. A sale of real estate, however, is a more complicated transaction that involves certain formalities that are not required in a sale of goods. In part because of these complications, real estate brokers or agents who are licensed by the state generally assist the buyers and sellers during a real estate sales transaction.

Leasehold Estates	1. Fixed-term tenancy (tenancy for years) 2. Periodic tenancy 3. Tenancy at will 4. Tenancy at sufferance

Usually, the parties to a sale of real estate enter into a detailed contract setting forth their agreement. A contract for a sale of land includes such terms as the purchase price, the type of deed the buyer will receive, the condition of the premises, and any items that will be included.

A buyer who does not pay cash for the property must obtain financing through a mortgage loan. Real estate sales contracts can be made contingent on the buyer's ability to obtain financing at or below a specified rate of interest. The contract may also be contingent on certain events, such as the completion of a land survey or the property's passing one or more inspections. Normally, the buyer is responsible for having the premises inspected for physical or mechanical defects and for insect infestation.

Implied Warranties in the Sale of New Homes Most states recognize a warranty—the implied warranty of habitability—in the sale of new homes. Because the warranty is implied, it need not be included in the contract of sale or the deed to be effective.

Implied Warranty of Habitability An implied promise by a seller of a new house that the house is fit for human habitation. Also, the implied promise by a landlord that rented residential premises are habitable.

Under this warranty, the seller of a new home essentially warrants that it is in reasonable working order and is of reasonably sound construction. Thus, the seller is in effect a guarantor of the home's fitness. In some states, the warranty protects not only the first purchaser but any subsequent purchaser as well.

Seller's Duty to Disclose Hidden Defects In most jurisdictions, courts impose on sellers a duty to disclose any known defect that materially affects the value of the property and that the buyer could not reasonably discover. Failure to disclose such a material defect gives the buyer the right to rescind the contract and to sue for damages based on fraud or misrepresentation. The buyer generally must bring such a suit within a specified time.

Example 35.14 Matthew partially renovates a house in Louisiana and sells it to the Morelands for $68,000. Two months after the Morelands move in, they discover rotten wood behind the tile in the bathroom and experience problems with the plumbing. A state statute specifies that the Morelands have one year from the date of the sale or the discovery of the defect to file a lawsuit. Therefore, the Morelands must file suit within twelve months of discovering the defects (which would be fourteen months from the date of the sale). ■

In the following Spotlight Case, the court had to decide whether the buyer of a "haunted" house had the right to rescind the sales contract.

Spotlight on Sales of Haunted Houses: Case 35.2

Stambovsky v. Ackley

Supreme Court, Appellate Division, New York, 572 N.Y.S.2d 672, 169 A.D.2d 254 (1991).

Facts Jeffrey Stambovsky signed a contract to buy Helen Ackley's house in Nyack, New York. After the contract was signed, Stambovsky discovered that the house was widely reputed to be haunted. The Ackley family claimed to have seen poltergeists on numerous occasions over the previous nine years. The Ackleys had been interviewed about the house in both a national publication (Reader's Digest) and the local newspaper. The house was included on a walking tour of Nyack, New York, as "a riverfront Victorian (with ghost)."

When Stambovsky learned of the house's reputation, he sued to rescind the contract, alleging that Ackley and her real estate agent had made material misrepresentations when they failed to disclose Ackley's belief that the house was haunted. Ackley argued that she was under no duty to disclose to the buyer the home's haunted reputation. The trial court dismissed Stambovsky's case, and Stambovsky appealed.

Issue Was the failure to inform Stambovsky that the house was supposedly haunted a material misrepresentation that would allow him to rescind the contract?

Continued

Decision Yes. The New York appellate court found that the seller did have a duty to disclose. The court allowed Stambovsky to rescind the contract.

Reason Ackley and her family had created the house's reputation as haunted and had profited from that reputation over a number of years. That reputation harmed the resale value of the home, however. Because the Ackleys had created the impairment and knew that it was not likely to be discovered by a purchaser from out of town, they had an obligation to disclose it. They should have brought the impairment to the attention of all prospective buyers, including Stambovsky. Even though the Ackleys did not actively mislead Stambovsky, they allowed him to sign the contract knowing that he was unaware of the home's haunted reputation. Because they unfairly took advantage of his ignorance, they could not enforce the contract.

When will a buyer of a house that is allegedly haunted have the right to rescind the deal?

Critical Thinking

- Ethical Assuming that Ackley's behavior was unethical, was it unethical because she failed to tell Stambovsky something about the house that he did not know, or was it unethical because of the nature of the information she omitted? What if Ackley had failed to mention that the roof leaked or that the well was dry—conditions that a buyer would normally investigate? Explain your answer.

35–3b Deeds

Deed A document by which title to real property is passed.

Possession and title to land are passed from person to person by means of a deed—the instrument of conveyance of real property. Unlike a contract, a deed does not have to be supported by legally sufficient consideration. To be valid, a deed must include the following elements:

1. The names of the grantor (the giver or seller) and the grantee (the donee or buyer).
2. Words evidencing the intent to convey the property (such as, "I hereby bargain, sell, grant, or give"). No specific words are necessary. If the deed does not specify the type of estate being transferred, it is presumed to transfer the property in fee simple absolute.
3. A legally sufficient description of the land. The description must include enough detail to distinguish the property being conveyed from every other parcel of land. The property can be identified by reference to an official survey or recorded plat map, or each boundary can be described by metes and bounds. Metes and bounds is a system of measuring boundary lines by the distance between two points, often using physical features of the local geography—for instance, "beginning at the southwesterly intersection of Court and Main Streets, then West 40 feet to the fence, then South 100 feet, then Northeast approximately 120 feet back to the beginning."
4. The signature of the grantor' (and often the grantor's spouse).
5. Delivery of the deed.

Know This

Gifts of real property are common, and they require deeds even though there is no consideration for the gift.

Different types of deeds provide different degrees of protection against defects of title. A defect of title exists, for instance, if an undisclosed third person has an ownership interest in the property.

Warranty Deed A deed that provides the greatest amount of protection for the grantee. The grantor promises that he or she has title to the property conveyed in the deed, that there are no undisclosed encumbrances on the property, and that the grantee will enjoy quiet possession of the property.

Warranty Deeds A warranty deed contains the greatest number of covenants, or promises, of title and thus provides the greatest protection against defects of title. In most states, special language is required to create a general warranty deed. Warranty deeds commonly include the following covenants:

1. A covenant that the grantor has the title to, and the power to convey, the property.
2. A covenant of quiet enjoyment (a warranty that the buyer's possession of the land will not be disturbed).

Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3. A covenant that transfer of the property is made without knowledge of adverse claims of third parties.

Generally, the warranty deed makes the grantor liable for all defects of title during the time that the property was held by the grantor and previous titleholders. Example 35.15 Mandal sells a two-acre lot and office building by warranty deed to Flash Technologies, LLC. Subsequently, Perkins shows that he has better title to the property than Mandal had and evicts Flash Technologies. Here, Flash Technologies can sue Mandal for breaching the covenant of quiet enjoyment. Flash Technologies can recover the purchase price of the land, plus any other damages incurred as a result.

Special Warranty Deeds A special warranty deed, or limited warranty deed, in contrast, warrants only that grantors, or sellers, held good title during their ownership of the property. In other words, the grantor does not warrant that there were no defects of title when the property was held by previous owners.

Special Warranty Deed A deed that warrants only that the grantor held good title during the grantor's ownership of the property and does not warrant that there were no defects of title when the property was held by previous owners.

If the special warranty deed discloses all liens and other encumbrances, the seller will not be liable to the buyer if a third person subsequently interferes with the buyer's ownership. If the third person's claim arises out of, or is related to, some act of the seller, though, the seller will be liable to the buyer for damages.

Quitclaim Deeds A quitclaim deed offers the least amount of protection against defects of title. Basically, a quitclaim deed conveys to the grantee whatever interest the grantor had. Therefore, if the grantor had no interest, then the grantee receives no interest.

Quitclaim Deed A deed that conveys only whatever interest the grantor had in the property and therefore offers the least amount of protection against defects of title.

Quitclaim deeds are often used when sellers, or grantors, are uncertain as to the extent of their rights in the property. These deeds may also be used to release a party's interest in a particular parcel of property, such as in divorce settlements or business dissolutions when the grantors are dividing up their interests in real property.

Recording Statutes Every state has a recording statute, which allows a deed to be recorded for a fee. Deeds are recorded in the county where the property is located. Recording a deed gives notice to the public that a certain person is now the owner of a particular parcel of real estate. By putting everyone on notice as to the true owner, recording a deed prevents the previous owners from fraudulently conveying the land to other purchasers. Thus, prospective buyers can check the public records to see whether there have been earlier transactions creating interests or rights in specific parcels of real property.

Recording Statute A statute that allows deeds, mortgages, and other real property transactions to be recorded so as to provide notice to future purchasers or creditors of an existing claim on the property.

35–3c Will or Inheritance

Property that is transferred on an owner's death is passed either by will or by state inheritance laws. If the owner of land dies with a will, the land passes in accordance with the terms of the will. If the owner dies without a will, state inheritance statutes prescribe how and to whom the property will pass.

35–3d Adverse Possession

A person who wrongfully possesses the real property of another (by occupying or using it) may eventually acquire title to it through adverse possession. Adverse possession is a means of obtaining title to land without delivery of a deed and without the consent of—or payment to—the true owner. Thus, adverse possession is a method of involuntarily transferring title to the property from the true owner to the adverse possessor.

Adverse Possession The acquisition of title to real property through open occupation, without the consent of the owner, for a period of time specified by state statute. The occupation must be actual, exclusive, open, continuous, and in opposition to all others, including the owner.

Essentially, when one person possesses the property of another for a certain statutory period, that person acquires title to the land. The statutory period varies from three to thirty years, depending on the state, with ten years being the most common.

Focus Question 3

What are the requirements for acquiring property by adverse possession?

Requirements for Adverse Possession For property to be held adversely, four elements must be satisfied:

1. Possession must be actual and exclusive. The possessor must physically occupy the property. This requirement is clearly met if the possessor lives on the property, but it may also be met if the possessor builds fences, erects structures, plants crops, or even grazes animals on the land.
2. Possession must be open, visible, and notorious, not secret or clandestine. The possessor must occupy the land for all the world to see. The obviousness requirement ensures that the true owner is on notice that someone is possessing the owner's property wrongfully.
3. Possession must be continuous and peaceable for the required period of time. This requirement means that the possessor must not be interrupted in the occupancy by the true owner or by the courts. Continuous does not mean constant. It simply means that the possessor has continuously occupied the property in some fashion for the statutory time. Peaceable means that no force was used to possess the land.
4. Possession must be hostile and adverse. In other words, the possessor cannot be living on the property with the owner's permission and must claim the property as against the whole world. (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for an illustration.)

When Possession of Property Is Not "Adverse"

The McKeag family operated a marina on their lakefront property in Bolton, New York. For more than forty years, the McKeags used a section of property belonging to their neighbors, the Finleys, as a beach for the marina's customers. The McKeags also stored a large float on the beach during the winter months, built their own retaining wall, and planted bushes and flowers there.

The McKeags prevented others from using the property, including the Finleys. Nevertheless, the families always had a friendly relationship, and one of the Finleys gave the McKeags permission to continue using the beach. He also reminded them of his ownership several times, to which they said nothing. The McKeags also asked for permission to mow grass on the property and once apologized for leaving a jet ski there. Can the McKeags establish adverse possession over the statutory period of ten years?

Analysis: There are four requirements to acquire title to property through adverse possession. The possession must be (1) actual and exclusive, (2) open and obvious, (3) continuous for the required period of time, and (4) hostile and adverse.

Result and Reasoning: The McKeags satisfied the first three requirements for adverse possession:

1. Their possession was actual and exclusive because they used the beach and prevented others from doing so, including the Finleys.
2. Their possession was open and visible because they made improvements to the beach and regularly kept their belongings there.
3. Their possession was continuous and peaceable for the required ten years. They possessed the property for more than four decades, and they even kept a large float there during the winter months.

Nevertheless, the McKeags' possession was not hostile and adverse, which is the fourth requirement. The Finleys provided substantial evidence that they had given the McKeags permission to use the beach. Rather than reject the Finleys' permission as unnecessary, the McKeags sometimes said nothing and other times seemingly affirmed that the property belonged to the Finleys (by asking permission to mow grass, for instance). Thus, because the McKeags did not satisfy all four requirements, they cannot establish adverse possession.

A claim of adverse possession was at the center of the following case, which involved a dispute between the owners of neighboring properties.

Case 35.3

A2 Creative Group, LLC v. Anderson

Missouri Court of Appeals, Western District, 596 S.W.3d 214 (2020).

Facts Gary and Cristina Worden owned the Main Street Inn, a bed and breakfast, in Parkville, Missouri. A stone wall ran the length of the property behind the Inn. A driveway and walkway along the wall was used to access the service entrance to the Inn for the delivery of supplies and equipment. The Wordens also maintained the landscaping on their side of the wall—for example, they cut the grass, planted flowers, put down paver and edging stones, and removed dying trees.

After owning the Inn for eleven years, the Wordens sold the business to A2 Creative Group, LLC, whose principals, Jason and Kathy Ayers, lived in the Inn and had been operating it for the sellers. At about the same time, Soheil Anderson, owner of the property on the other side of the stone wall, obtained a survey of her property. The survey revealed that a 400-square-foot tract on the Inn's side of the stone wall was actually Anderson's property.

A2 filed a petition in a Missouri state court against Anderson to establish its title to the tract based on a claim of adverse possession. The trial court ruled in favor of A2, concluding that its possession of the disputed property was "(1) hostile; (2) actual; (3) open and notorious; (4) exclusive; and (5) continuous for at least 10 years," the requisite period for adverse possession under Missouri's statute.

Anderson appealed, claiming that A2 had not proved that its possession was exclusive and continuous.

Issue Was A2's possession exclusive and continuous?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the trial court's judgment.

Reason With respect to exclusivity, the appellate court concluded that "A2 and the Wordens demonstrated visible acts of ownership over the premises." A2 and the Wordens possessed the land for themselves, and not for others, and they wholly excluded the true owner, Anderson, from the property. The evidence that A2 and the Wordens maintained and used the tract for themselves, and not for their neighbor, was sufficient to demonstrate that their possession of the property was exclusive.

The appellate court also concluded that A2 had proved the "continuous" element of adverse possession. The court explained that the requisite ten years of possession must be consecutive, and once the time has run, "the possessor is vested with title and the record owner is divested." To meet the ten-year requirement and succeed on a claim for adverse possession, a possessor can add its time of possession to that of its predecessors. In this case, "there was evidence of occupancy, upkeep, and no intent to abandon the disputed property" by A2 and the Wordens for the required period.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Would an adverse possessor satisfy the element of "exclusive" on showing only that disputed property was not jointly possessed with the previous owner? Explain.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that for a year during the Wordens' ownership of the Inn, they closed it for remodeling. Would the result in this case have been different? Discuss.

Purpose of the Doctrine There are a number of public-policy reasons for the adverse possession doctrine. These include society's interest in resolving boundary disputes, determining title when title to property is in question, and ensuring that real property remains in the stream of commerce. More fundamentally, the doctrine punishes owners who do not take action when they see adverse possession and rewards possessors for putting land to productive use.

35–3e Eminent Domain

No ownership rights in real property can ever really be absolute. Even ownership in fee simple absolute is limited by a superior ownership. In the United States, the government has an ultimate ownership right in all land. This right, known as eminent domain, Eminent Domain The power of a government to take land from private citizens for public use on the payment of just compensation.

is sometimes referred to as the condemnation power of government to take land for public use. It gives the government the right to acquire possession of real property in the manner directed by the U.S. Constitution and the laws of each state whenever the public interest requires it. Property normally may be taken only for public use, not for private benefit.

Condemnation Proceedings The judicial procedure by which the government exercises its power of eminent domain. It generally involves two phases: a taking and a determination of fair value.

The power of eminent domain generally is invoked through condemnation proceedings that occur before a judge. For instance, when a new public highway is to be built, the government must decide where to build it and how much land it needs. After the government determines that a particular parcel of land is necessary for public use, it will first offer to buy the property. If the owner refuses the offer, the government brings a judicial (condemnation) proceeding to obtain title to the land.

Condemnation proceedings usually involve two distinct phases—the first to establish the government's right to take the property, and the second to determine the fair value of the property.

Taking The taking of private property by the government for public use through the power of eminent domain.

The Taking When the government takes land owned by a private party for public use, it is referred to as a taking. Under the takings clause of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the government may take private property for public use with just compensation to the property owner. State constitutions contain similar provisions. In the first phase of condemnation proceedings, the government must prove that it needs to acquire privately owned property for a public use.

Example 35.16 Franklin County, Iowa, engages Bosque Systems to build a liquefied natural gas pipeline across the property of more than two hundred landowners. Some property owners consent to this use and accept Bosque's offer of compensation. Others refuse the firm's offer. A court will likely deem Bosque's pipeline to be a public use. Therefore, the government can exert its eminent domain power to "take" the land, provided that it pays just compensation to the property owners. ■

drnadig/E+/Getty Images

Why does the U.S. Constitution require that a government taking, such as the acquisition of private land for a gas pipeline, be for "public use"?

The Compensation The U.S. Constitution and state constitutions require that the government pay just compensation to the landowner when invoking its condemnation power. Just compensation means fair value. In the second phase of the condemnation proceeding, the court determines the fair value of the land, which usually is approximately equal to its market value.

Economic Development The United States Supreme Court has ruled that the power of eminent domain can be used to further "economic development."[8] This ruling may apply in cases where, for instance, a city government decides that it is in the public interest to have a larger parking lot for a privately owned sports stadium or to have a manufacturing plant located in the city to create more jobs. The government may condemn certain tracts of existing housing or business property and then convey the land to the privately owned stadium or manufacturing plant.

Such actions may bring in private developers and businesses that provide jobs and increase tax revenues, thus revitalizing communities. Opponents of the practice, however, dispute that the land is being taken for "public use," as required by the Fifth Amendment. The Supreme Court recognizes the right of individual states to pass laws that prohibit takings for economic development, and most states have done so. Still, some states do allow takings for the redevelopment of economically stressed neighborhoods and, controversially, the promotion of recreational activities.

Ethical Issue

Should eminent domain be used to take private land for recreational uses? Across the country, state and local governments are showing a willingness to take land for hiking paths, bike trails, and other recreational purposes. Public officials and nature enthusiasts argue that this use of eminent domain is justified because of the many benefits these projects bestow on the community. Bike trails, for instance, reduce automobile traffic and provide transportation options for low-income residents. Supporters also point to the general physical and emotional rewards of recreational activities for those who take part.

Others—particularly those who own the land in question—have a different view of the situation. Farmers in Mahoning County, Ohio, went to court to fight a park service's efforts to take control of an abandoned railway that runs through their property. The farmers argued that the proposed recreational bike path would cut their farms in half, making it difficult for livestock and heavy machinery to move freely. They also worried about liability if trail users wandered onto their property and were injured. Plaintiffs in Iowa and Massachusetts have taken similar legal actions to keep recreational trails off private land. A Wisconsin legislator, defending his state's ban on the use of eminent domain for such purposes, says, "Somebody else's recreational opportunity should not be forced on my property."

35–4 Landlord-Tenant Relationships

Know This
Sound business practice dictates that a lease for commercial property should be written carefully and should clearly define the parties' rights and obligations.

A landlord-tenant relationship is established by a lease contract. In most states, statutes require leases for terms exceeding one year to be in writing. The lease should describe the property and indicate the length of the term, the amount of the rent, and how and when it is to be paid.

State or local law often dictates permissible lease terms, particularly in residential leases. For instance, a statute or ordinance might prohibit the leasing of a structure that is not in compliance with local building codes. As in other areas of law, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has issued a model act to create more uniformity in the laws governing landlord-tenant relationships. The Uniform Residential Landlord and Tenant Act (URLTA), which was issued in 1972, has been adopted in some form by many states. A revised version of the act was issued in 2015.

35–4a Rights and Duties

Focus Question 4
What are the duties of the landlord and the tenant with respect to the use and maintenance of leased property?

The rights and duties of landlords and tenants generally pertain to four broad areas of concern—the possession, use, and maintenance of the leased property and, of course, rent.

Possession A landlord is obligated to give a tenant possession of the property that the tenant has agreed to lease. After obtaining possession, the tenant retains the property exclusively until the lease expires, unless the lease states otherwise.

Quiet Enjoyment. The covenant of quiet enjoyment mentioned previously also applies to leased premises. Under this covenant, the landlord promises that during the lease term, neither the landlord nor anyone having a superior title to the property will disturb the tenant's use and enjoyment of the property. This covenant forms the essence of the landlord-tenant relationship, and if it is breached, the tenant can terminate the lease and sue for damages.

Eviction A landlord's act of depriving a tenant of possession of the leased premises.

Constructive Eviction A form of eviction that occurs when a landlord fails to perform adequately any of the duties required by the lease, thereby making the tenant's further use and enjoyment of the property exceedingly difficult or impossible.

Eviction. If the landlord deprives the tenant of possession of the leased property or interferes with the tenant's use or enjoyment of it, an eviction occurs. A constructive eviction occurs when the landlord wrongfully performs or fails to perform any of the duties the lease requires, thereby making the tenant's further use and enjoyment of the property exceedingly difficult or impossible. Examples of constructive eviction include a landlord's failure to provide heat in the winter, electricity, or other essential utilities.

Use of the Premises The tenant normally may make any use of the leased property, provided the use is legal and does not injure the landlord's interest. The parties are free to limit by agreement the uses to which the property may be put.

Maintenance of the Premises Tenants are responsible for any damage to the premises that they cause, intentionally or negligently, and may be held liable for the cost of returning the property to the physical condition it was in when the lease began. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, tenants are not responsible for ordinary wear and tear and the property's consequent depreciation in value.

In some jurisdictions, landlords of residential property are required by statute to maintain the premises in good repair. Landlords must also comply with any applicable state statutes and city ordinances regarding maintenance and repair of buildings.

Know This

Options that may be available to a tenant on a landlord's breach of the implied warranty of habitability include repairing the defect and deducting the cost from the rent, canceling the lease, and suing for damages.

In addition, the implied warranty of habitability discussed earlier may apply to residential leases. The warranty requires a landlord who leases residential property to ensure that the premises are habitable—that is, a safe and suitable place for people to live. Also, the landlord must make repairs to maintain the premises in that condition for the lease's duration.

Generally, this warranty applies to major, or substantial, physical defects that the landlord knows or should know about and has had a reasonable time to repair—such as a large hole in the roof or a broken heating system. Example 35.17 The Galprins own a house within the city limits of Redmond. A city regulation states that a residence must be connected to the city sewer system before anyone, including tenants, can live in the residence. The Galprins' house is not connected to the city system. Thus, it is not legally habitable, and they cannot lease it to tenants. ■

Rent Rent is the tenant's payment to the landlord for the tenant's occupancy or use of the landlord's real property. Usually, tenants must pay the rent even if they refuse to occupy the property or move out, as long as the refusal or the move is unjustified and the lease is in force.

Example 35.18 Lifetime Insurance Agency enters into a lease with Mallory for a suite of offices in Mallory's building. Lifetime's revenue is less than managers had projected, however, and the rent is now more than they want to pay. Lifetime vacates the offices before the end of the lease. In terms of the landlord-tenant relationship, the move is unjustified, and the lease remains in force. Lifetime must continue to pay the rent. ■

Under the common law, if the leased premises were destroyed by fire or flood, the tenant still had to pay rent. Today, however, if an apartment building is destroyed, most states' laws do not require tenants to continue to pay rent.

In some situations, such as when a landlord breaches the implied warranty of habitability, a tenant may be allowed to withhold rent as a remedy. When rent withholding is authorized under a statute, the tenant usually must put the amount withheld into an escrow account. The funds are held in the name of the tenant and are returned to the tenant if the landlord fails to make the premises habitable.

Commercial Lease Terms State statutes often allow tenants and landlords more flexibility in negotiating the terms of a commercial lease. Case Example 35.19 Constellation-F, LLC, leased warehouse space to World Trading 23, Inc., a retailer of drones and remote-controlled toys. By the terms of the agreement, World Trading's rent would increase by 150 percent if it still occupied the warehouse after the lease expired. When World Trading overstayed its lease by more than two months, Constellation sued to recover the holdover rent at the higher rate.

The trial court ruled in World Trading's favor after determining that the holdover rate was too high and therefore, under California law, an unenforceable penalty for breach of contract. A state appeals court reversed, reasoning that World Trading had chosen to accept the lease agreement with full understanding of the consequences of remaining on the premises after the expiration date. Because this choice was in no way coerced, World Trading was required to meet its obligations under the contract and pay Constellation the holdover rent.[9]

Why did a California court require a retailer to pay what seemed to be unreasonably high rent for several months' use of a warehouse?

35–4b Transferring Rights to Leased Property

Either the landlord or the tenant may wish to transfer the rights to leased property during the term of the lease. If a landlord transfers complete title to the leased property to another, the tenant becomes the tenant of the new owner. The new owner may collect subsequent rent but must abide by the terms of the existing lease.

Assignment Tenants who transfer their entire interest in the leased property to a third person have agreed to an assignment of the lease. Many leases require the landlord's written consent for an assignment to be valid. The landlord can nullify (avoid) an assignment made without the required consent and evict the assignee. State statutes may specify that the landlord may not unreasonably withhold consent, however. Also, a landlord who knowingly accepts rent from the assignee may be held to have waived the consent requirement.

When an assignment is valid, the assignee acquires all of the tenant's rights under the lease. Nevertheless, an assignment does not release the original tenant (the assignor) from the obligation to pay rent should the assignee default. In addition, if the assignee exercises an option under the original lease to extend the term, the assignor remains liable for the rent during the extension, unless the landlord agrees otherwise.

Subleases The tenant's transfer of all or part of the premises for a period shorter than the lease term is a sublease. Many leases also require the landlord's written consent for a sublease. If the landlord's consent is required, a sublease without such permission is ineffective. Also, like an assignment, a sublease does not release tenants from their obligations under the lease.

Sublease A tenant's transfer of all or part of the leased premises to a third person for a period shorter than the lease term.

Example 35.20 Derek, a student, leases an apartment for a two-year period. Although Derek had planned on attending summer school, he decides to accept a job offer in Europe for the summer months instead. Derek therefore obtains his landlord's consent to sublease the apartment to Ava. Ava is bound by the same terms of the lease as Derek, and the landlord can hold Derek liable if Ava violates the lease terms.

35–4c Termination of the Lease

Usually, a lease terminates when its term ends. The tenant surrenders the property to the landlord, who retakes possession. If the lease states the time it will end, the landlord is not required to give the tenant notice. The lease terminates automatically.

A lease can also be terminated in several other ways. If the tenant purchases the leased property from the landlord during the term of the lease, for instance, the lease will be terminated. The parties may also agree to end a tenancy before it would otherwise terminate. In addition, the tenant may abandon the premises—move out completely with no intention of returning before the lease term expires.

At common law, a tenant who abandoned leased property was still obligated to pay the rent for the full term of the lease. The landlord could let the property stand vacant and charge the tenant for the remainder of the term. This is still the rule in some states. In most states today, however, landlords have a duty to mitigate their damages—that is, to make a reasonable attempt to lease the property to another party. Consequently, the tenant's liability for unpaid rent is restricted to the period of time that the landlord would reasonably need to lease the property to another tenant. Damages may also be allowed for the landlord's costs in leasing the property again.

Practice and Review

Vern Shoepke bought a two-story home in Roche, Maine. The warranty deed did not specify what covenants would be included in the conveyance. The property was adjacent to a public park that included a popular Frisbee golf course. (Frisbee golf is a sport similar to golf but using Frisbees.) Wayakichi Creek ran along the north end of the park and along Shoepke's property. The deed allowed Roche citizens the right to walk across a five-foot-wide section of the lot beside Wayakichi Creek as part of a two-mile public trail system. Teenagers regularly threw Frisbee golf discs from the walking path behind Shoepke's property over his yard to the adjacent park. Shoepke habitually shouted and cursed at the teenagers, demanding that they not throw the discs over his yard.

Two months after moving into his Roche home, Shoepke leased the second floor to Lauren Slater for nine months. The lease agreement did not specify that Shoepke's consent would be required to sublease the second floor. After three months of tenancy, Slater sublet the second floor to a local artist, Javier Indalecio. Over the remaining six months, Indalecio's use of oil paints damaged the carpeting in Shoepke's home. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What is the term for the right of Roche citizens to walk across Shoepke's land on the trail?
2. What covenants would most courts infer were included in the warranty deed that Shoepke received when he bought his house?
3. Can Shoepke hold Slater financially responsible for the damage to the carpeting caused by Indalecio? Explain.
4. Could the fact that teenagers continually throw Frisbees over Shoepke's yard outside the second-floor windows arguably be a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment? Why or why not?

Chapter Summary: Real Property and Landlord-Tenant Law

The Nature of Real Property	Real property (also called real estate or realty) includes land and structures, subsurface and airspace rights, plant life and vegetation, and fixtures.
Ownership Interests and Leases	1. Fee simple—The most complete form of ownership. Owners can use, possess, or dispose of the property as they choose during their lifetimes and pass on the property to their heirs at death. 2. Life estate—An estate that lasts for the life of a specified individual, during which time the individual is entitled to possess, use, and benefit from the estate. The life tenant cannot use the land in a manner that would adversely affect its value. The life tenant's ownership rights cease to exist at death. 3. Concurrent ownership—When two or more persons hold title to property together, concurrent ownership exists. a. A tenancy in common exists when two or more persons own an undivided interest in property. On a tenant's death, that tenant's property interest passes to the heirs. b. A joint tenancy exists when two or more persons own an undivided interest in property, with a right of survivorship. On the death of a joint tenant, that tenant's property interest transfers to the remaining tenant(s), not to the heirs of the deceased. c. A tenancy by the entirety is a form of co-ownership between married persons that is similar to a joint tenancy, except that a spouse cannot separately transfer interest unless the other spouse consents. d. Community property is a form of co-ownership between married persons in which each spouse technically owns an undivided one-half interest in property acquired during the marriage. This type of ownership exists in only a few states. 4. Leasehold estates—A leasehold estate is an interest in real property that is held for only a limited period of time, as specified in the lease agreement. Types of tenancies relating to leased property include the following: a. Fixed-term tenancy (tenancy for years)—Tenancy for a period of time stated by express contract. b. Periodic tenancy—Tenancy for a period determined by the frequency of rent payments. It is automatically renewed unless proper notice is given. c. Tenancy at will—Tenancy for as long as both parties agree. No notice of termination is required. d. Tenancy at sufferance—Possession of land without legal right. 5. Nonpossessory interest—An interest that involves the right to use real property but not to possess it. Easements, profits, and licenses are nonpossessory interests.
Transfer of Ownership	1. By sales contract—A contract for the sale of land includes the purchase price, the type of deed the buyer will receive, the condition of the premises, and any items that will be included. It is often contingent on the buyer's ability to obtain financing and on certain events, such as satisfactory inspections. 2. By deed—When real property is sold or transferred as a gift, title to the property is conveyed by means of a deed. A deed must meet specific legal requirements. A warranty deed provides the most extensive protection against defects of title. A quitclaim deed conveys to the grantee only whatever interest the grantor had in the property. A deed may be recorded in the manner prescribed by recording statutes in the appropriate jurisdiction to give third parties notice of the owner's interest. 3. By will or inheritance—If the owner dies after having made a valid will, the land passes as specified in the will. If the owner dies without having made a will, the heirs inherit according to state inheritance statutes. 4. By adverse possession—When a person possesses the property of another for a statutory period of time (ten years is the most common), that person acquires title to the property, provided the possession is actual and exclusive, open and visible, continuous and peaceable, and hostile and adverse (without the permission of the owner). 5. By eminent domain—The government can take land for public use, with just compensation, when the public interest requires the taking.

Landlord-Tenant Relationships

The landlord-tenant relationship is created by a lease agreement. State or local laws may dictate whether the lease must be in writing and what lease terms are permissible.

1. Rights and duties—The rights and duties of landlords and tenants that arise under a lease agreement generally pertain to the following areas:
   a. Possession—The tenant has an exclusive right to possess the leased premises. Under the covenant of quiet enjoyment, the landlord promises that during the lease term, neither the landlord nor anyone having superior title to the property will disturb the tenant's use and enjoyment of the property.
   b. Use of the premises—Unless the parties agree otherwise, the tenant may make any legal use of the property.
   c. Maintenance of the premises—Tenants are responsible for any damage that they cause. Landlords must comply with laws that set specific standards for the maintenance of real property. The implied warranty of habitability requires that landlords furnish and maintain residential premises in a habitable condition (that is, in a condition safe and suitable for human life).
   d. Rent—The tenant must pay the rent as long as the lease is in force, unless the tenant justifiably refuses to occupy the property or withholds the rent because of the landlord's failure to maintain the premises properly.
2. Transferring rights to leased property—
   a. If the landlord transfers complete title to the leased property, the tenant becomes the tenant of the new owner. The new owner may collect the rent but must abide by the existing lease.
   b. Generally, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, tenants may assign their rights (but not their duties) under a lease contract to a third person. Tenants may also sublease leased property to a third person, but the original tenant is not relieved of any obligations to the landlord under the lease. In either situation, the landlord's consent may be required, but statutes may prohibit the landlord from unreasonably withholding consent.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

35–1. Property Ownership. Twenty-two years ago, Lorenz was a wanderer. At that time, he decided to settle down on an unoccupied, three-acre parcel of land that he did not own. People in the area told him that they had no idea who owned the property. Lorenz built a house on the land, got married, and raised three children while living there. He fenced in the land, installed a gate with a sign above it that read "Lorenz's Homestead," and removed trespassers. Lorenz is now confronted by Joe Reese, who has a deed in his name as owner of the property. Reese, claiming ownership of the land, orders Lorenz and his family off the property. Discuss who has the better "title" to the property. (See Transfer of Ownership.)

35–2. Deeds. Wiley and Gemma are neighbors. Wiley's lot is extremely large, and his present and future use of it will not involve the entire area. Gemma wants to build a single-car garage and driveway along the present lot boundary. Because the placement of her existing structures makes it impossible for her to comply with an ordinance requiring buildings to be set back fifteen feet from an adjoining property line, Gemma cannot build the garage. Gemma contracts to purchase ten feet of Wiley's property along their boundary line for $3,000. Wiley is willing to sell but will give Gemma only a quitclaim deed, whereas Gemma wants a warranty deed. Discuss the differences between these deeds as they would affect the rights of the parties if the title to this ten feet of land later proves to be defective. (See Transfer of Ownership.)

35–3. Implied Warranty of Habitability. Sarah has rented a house from Frank. The house is only two years old, but the roof leaks every time it rains. The water that has accumulated in the attic has caused stucco to fall off ceilings in the upstairs bedrooms, and one ceiling has started to sag. Sarah has complained to Frank and asked him to have the roof repaired. Frank says that he has caulked the roof, but the roof still leaks. Frank claims that because Sarah has sole control of the leased premises, she has the duty to repair the roof. Sarah insists that repairing the roof is Frank's responsibility. Discuss fully who is responsible for repairing the roof and, if the responsibility belongs to Frank, what remedies are available to Sarah. (See Landlord-Tenant Relationships.)

35–4. Rent. Flawlace, LLC, leased unfinished commercial real estate in Las Vegas, Nevada, from Francis Lin to operate a beauty salon. The lease required Flawlace to obtain a "certificate of occupancy" from the city to commence business. This required the installation of a fire protection system. The lease did not allocate responsibility for the installation to either party. Lin voluntarily undertook to install the system. After a month of delays, Flawlace moved out. Three months later, the installation was complete, and Lin leased the premises to a new tenant. Did Flawlace owe rent for the three months between the time that it moved out and the time that the new tenant moved in? Explain. [Tri-Lin Holdings, LLC v. Flawlace, LLC, 2014 WL 1101577 (Nev. Sup.Ct. 2014)] (See Landlord-Tenant Relationships.)

35–5. Landlord-Tenant Relationships. Bhanmattie Kumar was walking on a sidewalk in Flushing, New York, when she tripped over a chipped portion of the sidewalk and fell. The defective sidewalk was in front of a Pretty Girl store—one of a chain of apparel stores headquartered in Brooklyn—on premises leased from PI Associates, LLC. Kumar filed a claim in a New York state court against PI, seeking to recover damages for her injuries. PI filed a cross-claim against Pretty Girl. On what basis would the court impose liability on PI? In what situation would Pretty Girl be the liable party? Is there any circumstance in which Kumar could be at least partially responsible for her injury? Discuss. [Bhanmattie Rajkumar Kumar v. PI Associates, LLC, 125 A.D.3d 609, 3 N.Y.S.3d 372 (2 Dept. 2015)] (See Landlord-Tenant Relationships.)

35–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Joint Tenancies. Arthur and Diana Ebanks owned three properties in the Cayman Islands in joint tenancy. With respect to joint tenancies, Cayman law is the same as U.S. law. When the Ebanks divorced, the decree did not change the tenancy in which the properties were held. On the same day as the divorce filing, Arthur executed a will providing that "any property in my name and that of another as joint tenants … will pass to the survivor, and I instruct my Personal Representative to make no claim thereto." Four years later, Arthur died. His brother Curtis, the personal representative of his estate, asserted that Arthur's interest in the Cayman properties was part of the estate. Diana said that the sole interest in the properties was hers. To whom do the Cayman properties belong? Why? [Ebanks v. Ebanks, 41 Fla. L. Weekly D291, 198 So.3d 716 (2 Dist. 2016)] (See Ownership Interests and Leases.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 35–6, go to Appendix E.

35–7. Eminent Domain. In Tarrytown, New York, Citibank operated a branch that included a building and a parking lot with thirty-six spaces. Tarrytown leased twenty-one of the spaces from Citibank for use as public parking. When Citibank closed the branch and decided to sell the building, the public was denied access to the parking lot. After a public hearing, the city concluded that it should exercise its power of eminent domain to acquire the twenty-one spaces to provide public parking. Is this an appropriate use of the power of eminent domain? Suppose that Citibank opposes the plan and alternative sites are available. Should Tarrytown be required to acquire those sites instead of Citibank's property? In any event, what is Tarrytown's next step? Explain. [Citibank, N.A. v. Village of Tarrytown, 149 A.D.3d 931, 52 N.Y.S.3d 398 (2 Dept. 2017)] (See Transfer of Ownership.)

35–8. Transfer of Ownership. Craig and Sue Shaffer divided their real property into two lots. They enclosed one lot with a fence and sold it to the Murdocks. The other lot was sold to the Cromwells. All of the parties orally agreed that the fence marked the property line. Over the next three decades, each lot was sold three more times. Houses were built, and the lots were landscaped, including lilac bushes planted against the fence. Later, one of the owners removed the fence, and another built a shed next to where it had been. On the lot with the shed, the Talbots erected a carport abutting the lilac bushes. The Nielsons bought the adjacent lot from the Parkers and measured it according to the legal description in the deed. They discovered that the Talbots' carport encroached on the Nielsons' property by about thirteen feet. Are the Nielsons entitled to damages for their "lost" property from any party? Explain. [Nielson v. Talbot, 163 Idaho 480, 415 P.3d 348 (2018)] (See Transfer of Ownership.)

35–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach to Easements. Two organizations, Class A Investors Post Oak, LP, and Cosmopolitan Condominium VP, L.P., owned adjacent pieces of property in Houston, Texas. Each owner organization planned to build a high-rise tower on its lot. The organizations signed an agreement that granted each of them an easement in the other's property to "facilitate the development." Cosmopolitan built its residential high-rise first. Later, Class A began moving forward with its plan for a mixed-use high-rise. Cosmopolitan objected that the proposed tower would "be vastly oversized for its proposed location; situated perilously close to [Cosmopolitan's] building; create extraordinary traffic hazards; impede fire protection and other emergency vehicles in the area, and substantially interfere with the use and enjoyment of [Cosmopolitan's] property." [Cosmopolitan Condominium Owners Association v. Class A Investors Post Oak, LP, 2017 WL 1520448 (Tex.App.—Houston 2017)] (See Ownership Interests.)

1. On what basis can Class A proceed with its plan? Explain, using the IDDR approach.
2. On what ethical ground might Cosmopolitan continue to oppose its neighbor's project? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

35–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Adverse Possession. The Wallen family owned a cabin on Lummi Island in the state of Washington. A driveway ran from the cabin across their property to South Nugent Road. Floyd Massey bought the adjacent lot and built a cabin on it in 1985. To gain access to his property, Massey used a bulldozer to extend the driveway, without the Wallens' permission but also without their objection. In 2010, the Wallens sold their property to Wright Fish Company. Massey continued to use and maintain the driveway without permission or objection. In 2016, Massey sold his property to Robert Drake. Drake and his employees continued to use and maintain the driveway without permission or objection, although Drake knew it was located largely on Wright's property. In 2018, Wright sold its lot to Robert Smersh. The next year, Smersh told Drake to stop using the driveway. Drake filed a suit against Smersh, claiming an easement by prescription (which is created by meeting the same requirements as adverse possession). (See Transfer of Ownership.)

1. The first group will decide whether Drake's use of the driveway meets all of the requirements for adverse possession (easement by prescription).
2. The second group will determine how the court should rule in this case and why. Does it matter that Drake knew the driveway was located largely on Wright's (and then Smersh's) property? Should it matter?
3. The third group will evaluate the underlying policy and fairness of adverse possession laws. Should the law reward persons who take possession of someone else's land for their own use? Does it make sense to punish owners who allow someone else to use their land without complaint?
4. The fourth team will consider how the laws governing adverse possession (easement by prescription) vary from state to state. To acquire title through adverse possession, a person might be required to possess the property for five years in one state, for instance, and for twenty years in another. Are there any legitimate reasons for such regional differences? Would it be better if all states had the same requirements? Explain your answers.

Insurance, Wills, and Trusts

Most individuals insure their real and personal property (as well as their lives). As Calvin Coolidge asserted in the chapter-opening quotation, insurance is "all common sense"—by insuring our property, we protect ourselves against damage and loss. In the first part of this chapter, we focus on insurance, which is a foremost concern of all property owners.

> "Insurance is part charity and part business, but all common sense."
> Calvin Coolidge
> 1872–1933
> (Thirtieth president of the United States, 1923–1929)

In the remainder of the chapter, we examine how property is transferred on the death of its owner. Certainly, the laws governing such transfers are a necessary corollary to the concept of private ownership of property. Our laws require that on death, title to the property of the decedent (the one who has died) must be delivered in full somewhere. This can be done through wills, trusts, or state laws prescribing distribution of property among heirs or next of kin.

In today's world, a person's property may include digital assets and social media. We discuss this aspect of estate planning later in the chapter.

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is an insurable interest? When must an insurable interest exist?
2. What are the basic requirements for executing a will?
3. What is the difference between a per stirpes distribution and a per capita distribution of an estate to the grandchildren of the deceased?
4. What are the four essential elements of a trust?

36–1 Insurance

Many precautions may be taken to protect against the hazards of life. For instance, an individual may wear a seat belt to protect against injuries from automobile accidents and install smoke detectors to guard against injury from fire. Of course, no one can predict whether an accident or a fire will ever occur, but individuals and businesses must establish plans to protect their personal and financial interests should some event threaten to undermine their security.

Insurance A contract by which the insurer promises to reimburse the insured or a beneficiary in the event that the insured is injured, dies, or sustains damage to property as a result of particular, stated contingencies.

Risk Management In the context of insurance, the transfer of certain risks from the insured to the insurance company by contractual agreement.

Risk A prediction concerning potential loss based on known and unknown factors.

Insurance is a contract by which the insurance company (the insurer) promises to pay an amount or to give something of value to another (either the insured or the beneficiary) in the event that the insured is injured, dies, or sustains damage to property as a result of particular, stated contingencies. Basically, insurance is an arrangement for transferring and allocating risk—that is, for risk management. In many instances, risk can be described as a prediction concerning potential loss based on known and unknown factors.

Risk management normally involves the transfer of certain risks from the individual to the insurance company by a contractual agreement. The insurance contract and its provisions will be examined shortly. First, however, we look at the different types of insurance that can be obtained, insurance terminology, and the concept of insurable interest.

36–1a Classifications of Insurance

Insurance is classified according to the nature of the risk involved. For instance, fire insurance, casualty insurance, life insurance, and title insurance apply to different types of risk and protect different interests. This is reasonable because the types of losses that are expected and that are foreseeable or unforeseeable vary with the nature of the activity. Exhibit 36–1 presents a list of selected insurance classifications.

Exhibit 36–1 Selected Insurance Classifications

TYPE OF INSURANCE	COVERAGE
Accident	Covers expenses, losses, and suffering incurred by the insured because of accidents causing physical injury and any consequent disability; sometimes includes a specified payment to heirs of the insured if death results from an accident.
All-risk	Covers all losses that the insured may incur except those that are specifically excluded. Typical exclusions are war, pollution, earthquakes, and floods.
Automobile	May cover damage to automobiles resulting from specified hazards or occurrences (such as fire, vandalism, theft, or collision); normally provides protection against liability for personal injuries and property damage resulting from the operation of the vehicle.
Casualty	Protects against losses incurred by the insured as a result of being held liable for personal injuries or property damage sustained by others.
Disability	Replaces a portion of the insured's monthly income from employment in the event that illness or injury causes a short- or long-term disability. Benefits typically last a set period of time, such as six months or five years.
Fire	Covers losses incurred by the insured as a result of fire.
Floater	Covers movable property, as long as the property is within the territorial boundaries specified in the contract.
Homeowners'	Protects homeowners against some or all risks of loss to their residences and the residences' contents or liability arising from the use of the property.
Key-person	Protects a business in the event of the death or disability of a key employee.
Liability	Protects against liability imposed on the insured as a result of injuries to the person or property of another.
Life	Covers the death of the policyholder. On the death of the insured, the insurer pays the amount specified in the policy to the insured's beneficiary.
Major medical	Protects the insured against major hospital, medical, or surgical expenses.
Malpractice	Protects professionals (physicians, lawyers, and others) against malpractice claims brought against them by their patients or clients; a form of liability insurance.
Term life	Provides life insurance for a specified period of time (term) with no cash surrender value; usually renewable.

36–1b Insurance Terminology

An insurance contract is called a policy, the consideration paid to the insurer is called a premium, and the insurance company is sometimes called an underwriter. The parties to an insurance policy are the insurer (the insurance company) and the insured (the person covered by its provisions or the holder of the policy).

Insurance contracts are usually obtained through an agent, who typically works for the insurance company, or through a broker, who is ordinarily an independent contractor. When a broker deals with an applicant for insurance, the broker is, in effect, the applicant's agent and not an agent of the insurance company. In contrast, an insurance agent is an agent of the insurance company, not of the applicant. Thus, the agent owes fiduciary duties to the insurance company, but not to the person who is applying for insurance. As a general rule, the insurance company is bound by the acts of its agents when they act within the scope of the agency relationship.

Policy In insurance law, the contract between the insurer and the insured.

Premium In insurance law, the price paid by the insured for insurance protection for a specified period of time.

Underwriter In insurance law, the insurer, or the one assuming a risk in return for the payment of a premium.

36–1c Insurable Interest

Individuals can insure anything in which they have an insurable interest. Without an insurable interest, there is no enforceable insurance contract, and a transaction to purchase insurance coverage would have to be treated as a wager.

Insurable interest An interest that exists when a person benefits from the preservation of the health or life of the insured or the property to be insured.

Life Insurance In regard to life insurance, a person must have a reasonable expectation of benefit from the continued life of another in order to have an insurable interest in that person's life. The insurable interest must exist at the time the policy is obtained. The benefit may be pecuniary (monetary), or it may be founded on the relationship between the parties (by blood or affinity).

Key-person insurance is a type of life insurance obtained by an organization on the life of a person (such as a talented executive) who is important to that organization. Because the organization expects to experience some financial gain from the continuation of the key person's life or some financial loss from the key person's death, the organization has an insurable interest.

Property Insurance In regard to real and personal property, an insurable interest exists when the insured derives a pecuniary (monetary) benefit from the preservation and continued existence of the property. Put another way, a person has an insurable interest in property when the person would sustain a financial loss from its destruction. For property insurance, the insurable interest must exist at the time the loss occurs but need not exist when the policy is purchased.

Focus Question 1

What is an insurable interest? When must an insurable interest exist?

The existence of an insurable interest is a primary concern in determining liability under an insurance policy. Spotlight Case Example 36.1 ABM Industries, Inc., leased office and storage space in the World Trade Center (WTC) in New York City in 2001. ABM also ran the building's heating, ventilation, and air-conditioning systems, and maintained all of the WTC's common areas. At the time, ABM employed more than eight hundred workers at the WTC. Zurich American Insurance Company insured ABM against losses resulting from "business interruption" caused by direct physical loss or damage "to property owned, controlled, used, leased or intended for use" by ABM.

After the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001, ABM filed a claim with Zurich to recover for the loss of all income derived from ABM's WTC operations. Zurich argued that ABM's recovery should be limited to the income lost as a result of the destruction of ABM's office and storage space and supplies. A court, however, ruled that ABM was entitled to compensation for the loss of all of its WTC operations. The court reasoned that the "policy's scope expressly includes real or personal property that the insured 'used,' 'controlled,' or 'intended for use.'" Because ABM's income depended on "the common areas and leased premises in the WTC complex," it had an insurable interest in that property at the time of the loss.[1]

In the following case, the plaintiff sought to retain his insurable interest in a home he no longer owned.

Breeden v. Buchanan

Court of Appeals of Mississippi, 164 So.3d 1057 (2015).

Facts Donald Breeden and Willie Buchanan were married in Marion County, Mississippi. They lived in a home in Sandy Hook. Nationwide Property & Casualty Insurance Company insured the home under a policy bought by Breeden that named him as the insured. The policy provided that the spouse of the named insured was covered as an insured. After eight years of marriage, Breeden and Buchanan divorced. Breeden transferred his interest in the home to Buchanan as part of the couple's property settlement. Less than a year later, a fire completely destroyed the home. A claim was filed with Nationwide. Nationwide paid Buchanan. Breeden filed a suit in a Mississippi state court against Buchanan and Nationwide, asserting claims for breach of contract and bad faith, and seeking to recover the proceeds under the policy. The court dismissed the suit. Breeden appealed.

satori13/iStock/Getty Images

A year after a couple divorces, fire destroys their house. Who should obtain the insurance proceeds?

Issue Did Breeden's one-time right to the proceeds continue after he transferred his interest in the home to his spouse on their divorce?

Decision No. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's dismissal of Breeden's suit. Buchanan, not Breeden, was entitled to the proceeds of the claim filed with Nationwide.

Reason Breeden's claims against Nationwide were based on the insurance policy. The policy provided that the spouse of the named insured who resided at the premises was also covered. At the beginning of the policy period, both Breeden and Buchanan had an insurable interest in the home because they were married and lived together in it. Later, Breeden transferred his interest in the insured property to Buchanan as part of a property settlement agreement on their divorce. This occurred several months before the fire that caused the loss of the property. For this reason, the lower court ruled that Breeden did not have an "insurable interest" in the property at the time of the loss and thus had no right to the proceeds of the policy. Because Breeden had no insurable interest in the property, Nationwide did not breach the insurance contract or act in bad faith by failing to pay Breeden the insurance proceeds. Based on these circumstances, "there was simply nothing further that Nationwide owed under the insurance policy."

Critical Thinking

- Economic Why is an insurable interest required for the enforcement of an insurance contract?

36–1d The Insurance Contract

An insurance contract is governed by the general principles of contract law, although the insurance industry is heavily regulated by the states.[2] Customarily, a party offers to purchase insurance by submitting an application to the insurance company. The company can either accept or reject the offer. For the contract to be binding, consideration (in the form of a premium) must be given, and the parties forming the contract must have the required contractual capacity to do so.

1. Zurich American Insurance Co. v. ABM Industries, Inc., 397 F.3d 158 (2d Cir. 2005).
2. The states were given authority to regulate the insurance industry by the McCarran-Ferguson Act of 1945, 15 U.S.C. Sections 1011–1015.

Application The filled-in application form for insurance is usually attached to the policy and made a part of the insurance contract. The person applying for insurance normally is bound by any false statements that appear in the application (subject to certain exceptions). Because the insurance company evaluates the risk factors based on the information included in the insurance application, misstatements or misrepresentations can void a policy. This is particularly true if the insurance company can show that it would not have extended insurance if it had known the true facts.

Know This

The federal government has the power to regulate the insurance industry under the commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution. Instead of exercising this power itself, Congress allows the states to regulate insurance.

Effective Date The effective date of an insurance contract—the date on which the insurance coverage begins—is important. In some situations, the insurance applicant is not protected until a formal written policy is issued. In other situations, the applicant is protected between the time the application is received and the time the insurance company either accepts or rejects it. Four facts should be kept in mind:

1. As stated earlier, a broker is an agent of the applicant, not an agent of the insurance company. Therefore, if a person hires a broker to obtain insurance, and the broker fails to procure a policy, the applicant normally is not insured.
2. A person who seeks insurance from an insurance company's agent is usually protected from the moment the application is made, provided—for life insurance—that some form of premium has been paid. Usually, the agent will write a memorandum, or binder, indicating that a policy is pending and stating its essential terms.
3. If the parties agree that the policy will be issued and delivered at a later time, the contract is not effective until the policy is issued and delivered. Thus, any loss sustained between the time of application and the delivery of the policy is not covered.
4. Parties may agree that a life insurance policy will be binding at the time the insured pays the first premium, or the policy may be expressly contingent on the applicant's passing a physical examination. If the applicant pays the premium and passes the examination, then the policy coverage is continuously in effect.

Binder A written, temporary insurance policy.

If the applicant pays the premium but dies before having the physical examination, the policy may still be effective. Then, in order to collect, the applicant's estate normally must show that the applicant would have passed the examination.

Coinsurance Clauses Often, when taking out fire insurance policies, property owners insure their property for less than full value because most fires do not result in a total loss. To encourage owners to insure their property for an amount as close to full value as possible, fire insurance policies commonly include a coinsurance clause.

Typically, a coinsurance clause provides that if an owner insures the property up to a specified percentage—usually 80 percent—of its value, the owner will recover any loss up to the face amount of the policy. If the insurance is for less than the specified percentage, the owner is responsible for a proportionate share of the loss.

Coinsurance applies only in instances of partial loss. The amount of the recovery is calculated by using the following formula:

Example 36.2 Madison, who owns property valued at $200,000, takes out a policy in the amount of $100,000. If Madison then suffers a loss of $80,000, her recovery will be $50,000. Madison will be responsible for (coinsure) the balance of the loss, or $30,000, which is the amount of loss ($80,000) minus the amount of recovery ($50,000).

$$$80{,}000 \times \left(\frac{$100{,}000}{0.8 \times $200{,}000} \right) = $50{,}000$$

If Madison had taken out a policy in the amount of 80 percent of the value of the property, or $160,000, then according to the same formula, she would have recovered the full amount of the loss.

Incontestability Clause A clause in a policy for life or health insurance stating that after the policy has been in force for a specified length of time (usually two or three years), the insurer cannot contest statements made in the policyholder's application.

Incontestability Clauses Statutes commonly require that a policy for life or health insurance include an incontestability clause. Under this clause, after the policy has been in force for a specified length of time—often two or three years—the insurer cannot contest statements made in the application. Once a policy becomes incontestable, the insurer cannot later avoid a claim on the basis of, for instance, fraud on the part of the insured, unless the clause provides an exception for that circumstance.

Some important provisions and clauses that are frequently included in insurance contracts are described in Exhibit 36–2.

Interpreting the Insurance Contract The courts recognize that most people do not have the special training necessary to understand the intricate terminology used in insurance policies. Therefore, when disputes arise, the courts will interpret the words used in an insurance contract according to their ordinary meanings in light of the nature of the coverage involved.

When there is an ambiguity in the policy, the provision generally is interpreted against the insurance company. Also, when it is unclear whether an insurance contract actually exists because the written policy has not been delivered, the uncertainty normally is resolved against the insurance company. The court presumes that the policy is in effect unless the company can show otherwise. Similarly, an insurer must make sure that the insured is adequately notified of any change in coverage under an existing policy.

Disputes over insurance often focus on the application of exclusions in the policy. Case Example 36.3 Kevon Taylor walked into Cole's Place, a Louisville, Kentucky, nightclub, and began shooting. Six of the patrons injured in this attack sued Cole's Place for negligence. The nightclub filed a claim with its insurer, United Specialty Insurance Company (USIC), to provide a defense against the lawsuits. USIC refused, based in part on an exclusion in Cole's Place's liability policy stating that coverage did not apply to "bodily injury . . . arising out of or resulting from [any] assault or battery."

Exhibit 36–2 Insurance Contract Provisions and Clauses

TYPE OF CLAUSE	DESCRIPTION
Antilapse clause	An antilapse clause provides that the policy will not automatically lapse if no payment is made on the date due. Ordinarily, under such a provision, the insured has a grace period of thirty or thirty-one days within which to pay an overdue premium before the policy is canceled.
Appraisal clause	Insurance policies frequently provide that if the parties cannot agree on the amount of a loss covered under the policy or the value of the property lost, an appraisal, or estimate, by an impartial and qualified third party can be demanded.
Arbitration clause	Many insurance policies include clauses that call for arbitration of any disputes that arise between the insurer and the insured concerning the settlement of claims.
Incontestability clause	An incontestability clause provides that after a policy has been in force for a specified length of time—usually two or three years—the insurer cannot contest statements made in the application.
Multiple insurance policies clause	Many insurance policies include a clause providing that if the insured has multiple insurance policies that cover the same property and the amount of coverage exceeds the loss, the loss will be shared proportionately by the insurance companies.

During the litigation of the dispute, USIC argued that the terms assault and battery in the policy should be given their ordinary meaning. Cole's Place countered that the terms should be given their legal meaning. An appeals court reasoned that, whether in common parlance or under criminal law, what happened at the nightclub was obviously an "assault or battery." Therefore, the language in the policy excluding coverage for such actions was clear and unambiguous, and USIC was not required to defend Cole's Place.[3]

Cancellation The insured can cancel a policy at any time, and the insurer can cancel under certain circumstances. When an insurance company can cancel its insurance contract, the policy or a state statute usually requires that the insurer give advance written notice of the cancellation to the insured. The same requirement applies when only part of a policy is canceled. Any premium paid in advance may be refundable on the policy's cancellation. The insured may also be entitled to a life insurance policy's cash surrender value.

The insurer may cancel an insurance policy for various reasons, depending on the type of insurance. Following are some examples:

1. Automobile insurance can be canceled for nonpayment of premiums or suspension of the insured's driver's license.
2. Property insurance can be canceled for nonpayment of premiums or for other reasons, including the insured's fraud or misrepresentation, gross negligence, or conviction for a crime that increases the risk assumed by the insurer.
3. Life and health policies can be canceled because of false statements made by the insured in the application, but the cancellation must take place before the effective date of an incontestability clause.

An insurer cannot cancel—or refuse to renew—a policy for discriminatory reasons or other reasons that violate public policy. Also, an insurer cannot cancel a policy because the insured has appeared as a witness in a case brought against the company.

What exclusions might be in a nightclub's liability policy?

Duties and Obligations of the Parties Both parties to an insurance contract are responsible for the obligations they assume under the contract. In addition, both the insured and the insurer have an implied duty to act in good faith.

Duties of the Insured. Good faith requires the party who is applying for insurance to reveal everything necessary for the insurer to evaluate the risk. The applicant must disclose all material facts, including all facts that an insurer would consider in determining whether to charge a higher premium or to refuse to issue a policy altogether. Many insurance companies today require that an applicant give the company permission to access other information, such as private medical records and credit ratings, for the purpose of evaluating the risk.

Once the insurance policy is issued, the insured has three basic duties under the contract:

1. To pay the premiums as stated in the contract.
2. To notify the insurer within a reasonable time if an event occurs that gives rise to a claim.
3. To cooperate with the insurer during any investigation or litigation.

Duties of the Insurer. Once the insurer has accepted the risk, and some event occurs that gives rise to a claim, the insurer has a duty to investigate to determine the facts. When a policy provides insurance against third party claims, the insurer is obligated to make reasonable efforts to settle such a claim.

If a settlement cannot be reached, then regardless of the claim's merit, the insurer has a duty to defend any suit against the insured. Usually, a policy provides that in this situation the insured must cooperate in the defense and attend hearings and trials if necessary. An insurer has a duty to provide or pay an attorney to defend its insured when a complaint alleges facts that could, if proved, impose liability on the insured within the policy's coverage.

Spotlight Case Example 36.4 Dentist Robert Woo installed implants for one of his employees, Tina Alberts, whose family raised potbellied pigs. As a joke, while Alberts was anesthetized, Woo installed a set of "flippers" (temporary partial bridges) shaped like boar tusks and took photos. A month later, Woo's staff showed the photos to Alberts at a party. Alberts refused to return to work. She filed a suit against Woo for battery.

Woo's insurance company refused to defend him in the suit, and he ended up paying Alberts $250,000 to settle her claim. Woo then sued the insurance company and won. The court held that the insurance company had a duty to defend Woo under the professional liability provision of his policy because Woo's practical joke took place during a routine dental procedure.[4]

Bad-Faith Actions. Although insurance law generally follows contract law, most states now recognize a "bad-faith" tort action against insurers. Thus, if an insurer in bad faith denies coverage of a claim, the insured may recover in tort in an amount exceeding the policy's coverage limits and may also recover punitive damages. Some courts have held insurers liable for bad-faith refusals to settle claims for reasonable amounts within the policy limits.

Defenses against Payment An insurance company can raise any of the defenses that would be valid in an ordinary action on a contract, as well as some defenses that do not apply in ordinary contract actions.

1. Fraud or misrepresentation. If the insurance company can show that the policy was procured by fraud or misrepresentation, it may have a valid defense for not paying on a claim. (The insurance company may also have the right to disaffirm or rescind the insurance contract.)
2. Lack of an insurable interest. An absolute defense exists if the insurer can show that the insured lacked an insurable interest—thus rendering the policy void from the beginning.
3. Illegal actions of the insured. Improper actions, such as those that are against public policy or that are otherwise illegal, can also give the insurance company a defense against the payment of a claim or allow it to rescind the contract.

Case Example 36.5 Charles Pendleton, an antique vehicle collector, bought a 1956 Mercedes-Benz and insured it with Foremost Insurance Company. Two weeks later, Pendleton filed a claim saying that the car had been destroyed in a collision with a Ford truck on an icy road. Foremost refused to pay the claim because it believed that Pendleton was lying about how the car was destroyed. Foremost sued, seeking a court declaration releasing it from liability.

At trial, Foremost provided enough evidence to show that Pendleton had towed the antique, inoperative Mercedes onto an icy road and then pushed it into a tree using the truck. A jury found that Pendleton had intentionally destroyed the Mercedes and issued a verdict in favor of Foremost. Pendleton appealed, but the reviewing court affirmed the jury's verdict. The insurance company did not have to pay for the damage to the Mercedes.[5]

Charlie Edward/Shutterstock.com

Is an insurer of an antique car liable for damages when the insured lies about how the damage occurred? Why or why not?

An insurance company can be prevented, or estopped, from asserting some defenses that are usually available. For instance, an insurance company normally cannot escape payment on the death of an insured on the ground that the person's age was stated incorrectly on the application. Also, incontestability clauses prevent the insurer from asserting certain defenses.

36–2 Wills

Not only do the owners of property want to protect it during their lifetime through insurance coverage, but they typically also wish to transfer it to their loved ones at the time of their death. Often, they accomplish this by making wills. A will carries out the maker's final wishes regarding property distribution after death. It is a formal instrument that must follow exactly the requirements of state law to be effective. A will is referred to as a testamentary disposition of property, and one who dies after having made a valid will is said to have died testate.

Will An instrument made by a testator directing what is to be done with the testator's property after death.

Testate Having left a will at death.

A will can serve other purposes besides the distribution of property. It can appoint a guardian for minor children or incapacitated adults. It can also appoint a personal representative to settle the affairs of the deceased. Exhibit 36–3 presents excerpts from the Exhibit 36–3 Excerpts from Michael Jackson's Will

LAST WILL OF MICHAEL JOSEPH JACKSON

will of Michael Jackson, the "King of Pop," who died from cardiac arrest at the age of fifty. Jackson held a substantial amount of tangible and intangible property, including the publishing rights to most of the Beatles' music catalogue. The will is a "pour-over" will, meaning that it transfers all of Jackson's property (that is not already held in the name of the trust) into the Michael Jackson Family Trust (trusts are discussed later in this chapter). Jackson's will also appoints his mother, Katherine Jackson, as the guardian of his three minor children.

36–2a Terminology of Wills

Testator One who makes and executes a will.

Executor A person appointed by a testator in a will to administer the testator's estate.

Administrator One who is appointed by a court to administer a person's estate if the decedent died without a valid will or if the executor named in the will cannot serve.

Intestate As a noun, one who has died without having created a valid will. As an adjective, the state of having died without a will.

Intestacy laws State statutes that specify how property will be distributed when a person dies intestate (without a valid will).

Devise A gift of real property by will, or the act of giving real property by will.

Bequest A gift of personal property by will (from the verb to bequeath).

Legacy A gift of personal property under a will.

Devisee One designated in a will to receive a gift of real property.

Legatee One designated in a will to receive a gift of personal property.

A person who makes out a will is known as a testator (from the Latin testari, "to make a will"). The court responsible for administering any legal problems surrounding a will is called a probate court.

When a person dies, a personal representative administers the estate and settles all of the decedent's affairs. An executor is a personal representative named in the will, whereas an administrator is a personal representative appointed by the court for a decedent who dies without a will. The court will also appoint an administrator if the will does not name an executor or if the named person lacks the capacity to serve as an executor.

A person who dies without having created a valid will is said to have died intestate. In this situation, state intestacy laws (sometimes referred to as laws of descent) prescribe the distribution of the property among heirs or next of kin (relatives). If no heirs or kin can be found, title to the property will be transferred to the state.

A gift of real estate by will is generally called a devise, and a gift of personal property by will is called a bequest, or legacy. The recipient of a gift by will is a devisee or a legatee, depending on whether the gift was a devise or a legacy.

36–2b Types of Gifts

Gifts by will can be specific, general, or residuary. If a decedent's assets are not sufficient to cover all the gifts identified in the will, an abatement is necessary.

Specific and General Devises A specific devise or bequest (legacy) describes particular property (such as "Eastwood Estate" or "my gold pocket watch") that can be distinguished from all the rest of the testator's property.

A general devise or bequest (legacy) does not single out any particular item of property to be transferred by will. For instance, "I devise all my lands" is a general devise. A general bequest may specify the property's value in monetary terms (such as "two diamonds worth $10,000") or simply state a dollar amount (such as "$30,000 to my nephew, Carleton").

Residuary Clause Sometimes, a will provides that any assets remaining after the estate's debts have been paid and specific gifts have been made are to be distributed in a specific way through a residuary clause. Residuary clauses are often used when the exact amount to be distributed cannot be determined until all of the other gifts and payouts have been made. If the testator has not indicated what party or parties should receive the residuary of the estate, the residuary passes according to state laws of intestacy.

Abatement If the assets of an estate are insufficient to pay in full all general bequests provided for in the will, an abatement takes place. In an abatement, the legatees receive reduced benefits. Example 36.6 Julie's will leaves $15,000 each to her children, Tamara and Stan. On Julie's death, only $10,000 is available to honor these bequests. By abatement, each child will receive $5,000. ■ If bequests are more complicated, abatement may be more complex. The testator's intent, as expressed in the will, controls.

36–2c Requirements for a Valid Will

monkeybusinessimages/iStock/Getty Images

If this couple leaves a sum of money to each of their children, but there are not enough assets to pay the amounts specified in the will, what happens?

A will must comply with statutory formalities designed to ensure that the testator understood the actions taken at the time the will was made. These formalities are intended to help prevent fraud. Unless they are followed, the will is declared void, and the decedent's property is distributed according to the laws of intestacy of that state, as discussed later in this chapter.

Although the required formalities vary among jurisdictions, most states have certain basic requirements for executing a will. The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has issued the Uniform Probate Code (UPC) to govern various aspects of wills, inheritance, and estates. Almost half of the states have enacted some part of the UPC and incorporated it into their own probate codes.

For a valid will, most states require proof of (1) the testator's capacity, (2) testamentary intent, (3) a written document, (4) the testator's signature, and (5) the signatures of persons who witnessed the testator's signing of the will.

Testamentary Capacity and Intent To have testamentary capacity, a testator must be of legal age and sound mind at the time the will is made. The minimum legal age for executing a will in most states and under the UPC is eighteen years [UPC 2–501]. Thus, the will of a twenty-one-year-old decedent written when the person was sixteen is invalid if, under state law, the legal age for executing a will is eighteen.

Focus Question 2

What are the basic requirements for executing a will?

The concept of "being of sound mind" refers to the testator's ability to formulate and to comprehend a personal plan for the disposition of property. Persons who have been declared incompetent in a legal proceeding do not meet the sound mind requirement.

Related to the requirement of capacity is the concept of intent. A valid will is one that represents the maker's intention to transfer and distribute property in a certain manner. Generally, a testator must:

1. Know the nature of the act (of making a will).
2. Comprehend and remember the "natural objects of his or her bounty"—that is, the people to whom the testator would naturally leave the estate (such as family members and friends).
3. Know the nature and extent of the property involved.
4. Understand the distribution of assets called for by the will.

Undue Influence. When it can be shown that the decedent's plan of distribution was the result of fraud or of undue influence, the will is declared invalid. A court may sometimes infer undue influence when the named beneficiary was in a position to influence the making of the will. If the testator ignored blood relatives and named as a beneficiary a nonrelative who was in constant close contact with the testator, for instance, a court might infer undue influence.

Case Example 36.7 Laura and Marvin Farmer had four children—Gary, Rita, Roger, and Sharon. The year that Marvin died, Laura underwent triple bypass surgery and moved in with Sharon, who lived nearby.

Sharon took control of most of Laura's daily life. She refused to allow her brothers and sister to visit their mother. She convinced Laura that they stole from her and wanted to put her in a nursing home. Neither of these beliefs was true, but they affected Laura's decision making. Laura revoked her will—which named all four of her children as beneficiaries—and executed a new will leaving most of her estate to Sharon. After Laura died, Sharon offered the new will for probate. Her siblings contested the will. Sharon argued that it was the product of Laura's "free and independent judgment." The court dismissed the siblings' claim and affirmed the will. Gary, Rita, and Roger appealed.

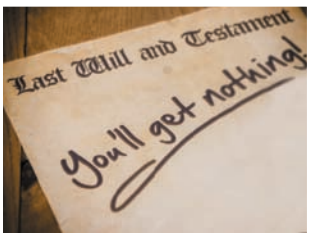
A state intermediate appellate court vacated the lower court's decision and remanded the case. Sharon had not presented "clear and convincing evidence" that Laura had exercised "free and independent judgment" in making the second will. Thus, the will was not valid, because Laura's intent was in doubt. It was possible that Sharon had exercised undue influence over Laura.[6]



Disinheritance. Although a testator must be able to remember the persons who would naturally be heirs to the estate, there is no requirement that testators give their estates to the natural heirs. A testator may decide to disinherit, or leave nothing to, an individual for various reasons. Most states have laws that attempt to prevent accidental disinheritance, however. There are also laws that protect minor children from loss of the family residence. Therefore, the testator's intent to disinherit needs to be clear.

Spotlight Case Example 36.8 In 1975, William Melton executed a will that, among other things, stated that his daughter, Vicki Palm, was to receive nothing. In 1979, he added a handwritten note to the will, saying that his friend Alberta Kelleher was to receive a small portion of his estate.

In 1995, Melton sent a signed, handwritten letter to Kelleher. The letter said that Melton wanted to put "something in writing" leaving Kelleher his "entire estate." Melton also said, "I do not want my brother Larry J. Melton or Vicki Palm or any of my other relatives to have one penny of my estate."

When Melton died in 2008, Kelleher had already passed away, and Melton's daughter, Vicki Palm, was his only natural heir. The state of Nevada argued that it should receive everything because Palm had been disinherited. Nevertheless, the trial court applied the state's intestacy laws and distributed the entire estate to Palm. The state appealed. The Nevada Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the lower court. It held that the disinheritance clause was clear and enforceable and that Melton's estate should therefore go to the state of Nevada.[7]

One method of disinheritance is to include an in terrorem clause in a will to provide that anyone who challenges the admission of the will to probate will be disinherited and receive nothing under the will.[8] The enforcement of an in terrorem clause prompted an appeal in the following case.

7. In re Estate of Melton, 272 P.3d 668 (Nev.Sup.Ct. 2012).
8. In terrorem clauses vary from state to state. In some states, they are not enforceable. Under the UPC, an in terrorem clause will stand as long as the challenger does not have probable cause for bringing the challenge.

Case 36.2

In the Matter of the Estate of Thorn

Court of Appeals of Kansas, __ Kan.App.2d __, 461 P.3d 84 (2020).

Facts James Thorn experienced health-related issues, resulting in several hospital stays. During this time, he visited Jennifer Stultz, an experienced estate-planning attorney, to draft and execute a will.

Thorn had two daughters, Kimberly Tolley and Jamea Wilson. He expressed concerns to Stultz that Wilson was irresponsible—several creditors had outstanding judgments against her. He wanted her share of the estate held in trust, to be paid at $500 per month, protected from her creditors.

Thorn was also concerned that Wilson might contest his will. After a discussion with Stultz, he agreed to add an in terrorem clause that would disinherit anyone who contested the will unless that person had probable cause to do so. The witnesses to Thorn's execution of his will were Scott Lawrence, Stultz's administrative assistant, and Virginia Rowsey, the manager of the facility where Thorn was living.

Less than two months later, Thorn died. Tolley petitioned a Kansas state court to admit Thorn's will to probate. Wilson filed an objection, claiming in part that Thorn lacked testamentary capacity. The court admitted the will to probate and enforced the in terrorem clause. Wilson appealed.

Issue Did the court properly admit Thorn's will to probate and enforce the in terrorem clause?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate court affirmed the trial court's judgment.

Reason Thorn objected to the trial's court finding of capacity. The appellate court, however, cited the testimony of Stultz, an experienced lawyer, which indicated that Thorn had capacity at the time the will was discussed, drafted, and executed. Lawrence and Rowsey, the witnesses, corroborated Stultz's observations. Because Wilson did not show that the trial court ignored contrary evidence or that its decision was based on "bias, passion, or prejudice," she failed to show that it erred in admitting Thorn's will to probate.

As to probable cause, the court defined the term as "the existence, at the time of the initiation of the proceeding, of evidence which would lead a reasonable person, properly informed and advised, to conclude that there is a substantial likelihood that the contest or attack will be successful." Wilson argued that "all reasonable persons would conclude that the competency of James Thorn . . .was at issue" but was not able to support that position.

Wilson claimed that she had not had enough time to obtain "all the relevant medical information" before entering her objection to admission of the will. She did not explain why she could not have obtained the records before entering her objection, however. Furthermore, she had made no attempt to contact the witnesses as to their testimony, which was directly contrary to her claim of lack of capacity. The appellate court reasoned that she had failed "to frame her argument within the probable cause standard" to challenge the will.

The court concluded that "the record contains substantial competent evidence to support the . . . finding Wilson lacked probable cause to object to the admission of the Will to probate." Under the in terrorem clause, because she contested Thorn's will without probable cause, Wilson was disinherited.

Writing Requirements Generally, a will must be in writing. The writing itself can be informal as long as it substantially complies with the statutory requirements. In some states, a will can be handwritten in crayon or ink. It can be written on a sheet or scrap of paper, on a paper bag, or on a piece of cloth. A will that is completely in the handwriting of the testator is called a holographic will (sometimes referred to as an olographic will).

A nuncupative will is an oral will made before witnesses. Oral wills are not permitted in most states. Where authorized by statute, such wills are generally valid only if made during the last illness of the testator and are therefore sometimes referred to as deathbed wills. Normally, only personal property can be transferred by a nuncupative will. Statutes may also permit members of the military to make nuncupative wills when on active duty.

Holographic Will A will written entirely in the testator's handwriting.

Nuncupative Will An oral will (often called a deathbed will) made before witnesses. Usually, such wills are limited to transfers of personal property.

Signature Requirements A fundamental requirement is that the testator's signature must appear on the will, generally at the end. Each jurisdiction dictates by statute and court decision what constitutes a signature. Initials, an X or other mark, and words such as "Mom" have all been upheld as valid when it was shown that the testators intended them to be signatures.

Witness Requirements A will usually must be attested (sworn to) by two, and sometimes three, witnesses. The number of witnesses, their qualifications, and the manner in which the witnessing must be done are generally set out in a statute. A witness can be required to be disinterested—that is, not a beneficiary under the will. The UPC, however, allows even interested witnesses to attest to a will [UPC 2–505]. There are no age requirements for witnesses, but they must be mentally competent.

The purpose of the witnesses is to verify that the testator actually executed (signed) the will and had the requisite intent and capacity at the time. A witness does not have to read the contents of the will. Usually, the testator and all witnesses sign in the sight or the presence of one another. The UPC does not require all parties to sign in the presence of one another, however, and deems it sufficient if the testator acknowledges having signed [UPC 2–502]. The UPC also provides an alternative to traditional witnesses—the signature may be acknowledged by the testator before a notary public.

36–2d Revocation of Wills

A testator can revoke a will at any time, either by a physical act or by a subsequent writing. Wills can also be revoked by operation of law. Revocation can be partial or complete, and must follow certain strict formalities.

Sorapop Udomsri/Shutterstock.com

Is tearing up a will a legally recognized method of revoking that will?

Revocation by a Physical Act A testator can revoke a will by intentionally burning, tearing, canceling, obliterating, or otherwise destroying it.[9] A testator can also revoke a will by intentionally having someone else destroy it in the testator's presence and at the testator's direction.

In some states, a testator can partially revoke a will by the physical act of crossing out some provisions in the will. Then, those portions that are crossed out are dropped, and the remaining parts of the will are valid. In no circumstances, however, can a provision be crossed out and an additional or substitute provision written in its place. Such altered portions require reexecution (re-signing) and reattestation (rewitnessing).

To revoke a will by physical act, it is necessary to follow the mandates of a state statute exactly. When a state statute prescribes the specific methods for revoking a will by physical act, only those methods can be used to revoke the will.

Codicil A written supplement or modification to a will. A codicil must be executed with the same formalities as a will.

Revocation by a Subsequent Writing A will may be wholly or partially revoked by a codicil, a written instrument separate from the will that amends or revokes provisions in the will. A codicil eliminates the necessity of redrafting an entire will merely to add to it or amend it. It can also be used to revoke an entire will. The codicil must be executed with the same formalities required for a will, and it must refer expressly to the will. In effect, it updates a will, because the will is "incorporated by reference" into the codicil.

A new will (second will) can be executed that may or may not revoke the first or a prior will, depending on the language used. To revoke a prior will, the second will must use language specifically revoking other wills, such as "This will hereby revokes all prior wills." If the express declaration of revocation is missing, then both wills are read together. If there are any discrepancies between the wills, the second will controls.

Revocation by Operation of Law Revocation by operation of law occurs when marriage, divorce or annulment, or the birth of a child takes place after a will has been executed.

Marriage and Divorce. In most states, when a testator marries after executing a will that does not include the new spouse, the spouse can still receive a share of the testator's estate. On the testator's death, the surviving spouse can receive the amount that would have been received had the testator died intestate (intestacy laws will be discussed shortly). The rest of the estate is passed under the will [UPC 2–301, 2–508].

If, however, a new spouse is otherwise provided for in the will (or by transfer of property outside the will), the new spouse will not be given an intestate amount. Also, if the parties had a valid prenuptial agreement (a contract made prior to marriage), its provisions dictate what the surviving spouse receives.

Divorce or annulment does not necessarily revoke the entire will. Rather, a divorce or an annulment occurring after a will has been executed revokes those dispositions of property made under the will to the former spouse [UPC 2–508].

9. The destruction cannot be inadvertent. The testator must have the intent to revoke the will.

Children. If a child is born after a will has been executed, that child may be entitled to a portion of the estate. Most state laws allow a child of the deceased to receive some portion of a parent's estate even if no provision is made in the parent's will. This is true unless it is clear from the will's terms that the testator intended to disinherit the child (see Spotlight Case Example 36.8). Under the UPC, the rule is the same.

36–2e Probate Procedures and Estate Planning

Probate The process of proving and validating a will and settling all matters pertaining to an estate.

To probate a will means to establish its validity and to carry the administration of the estate through a court process. Probate laws vary from state to state. Typically, the procedure depends on the size and complexity of the decedent's estate.

People commonly engage in estate planning in an attempt to avoid formal probate procedures and to maximize the value of their estate by reducing taxes and other expenses. Individuals should also consider formulating online asset estate plans, as discussed in this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.

Informal Probate For smaller estates, most state statutes provide for the distribution of assets without formal probate proceedings. Faster and less expensive methods are then used. Property can be transferred by affidavit (a written statement taken before a person who has authority to affirm it). Problems or questions can be handled during an administrative hearing. Some state statutes allow car titles, savings and checking accounts, and certain other property to be transferred simply by filling out forms.

Online Asset Estate Planning

The scams are devious and upsetting. Perpetrators will steal information from a deceased person's Facebook profile and then use it to set up a new account. Or they will simply hack into the deceased person's account and take it over. These "zombie" profiles are used to send friend requests that lead to fake advertising sites, used to sell counterfeit products and harvest credit card numbers.

Online Executors

To protect against such scams, Facebook allows the accounts of users who have died to be "memorialized"—making the profile an inactive space for remembrance—or deactivated entirely. However, a Facebook profile is only one part of a person's online existence, which includes not only other social media activities but also e-mails, passwords for money-management and other important accounts, and blogs. As a result, estate planning may now require an online executor to manage the deceased's social media profiles and much more.

Access Versus Privacy

To provide legal guidelines for this process, the Uniform Law Commission developed the Revised Uniform Fiduciary Access to Digital Assets Act (RUFADAA),[a] which has been enacted by most states. RUFADAA gives online executors certain powers to manage digital assets, but it also provides privacy protections for the owners of the assets. Thus, for instance, an online executor does not have authority over e-mails and social media posts unless by express consent. To access other types of digital assets, the online executor may have to petition a probate court and explain why the asset is part of the estate.

To negotiate the many restrictions imposed by the RUFADAA, individuals must be thorough in managing their online estates. Experts suggest creating a document listing usernames and passwords and providing explicit directions telling online executors how to proceed with each account. What should be done with stored photos? Should they be shared with family and friends, or deleted? Should blogs be archived and saved? What about old tweets? These few examples illustrate the scope of an estate planning challenge that will only become more complex as we experience more aspects of our lives online.

Critical Thinking

In an earlier version of the RUFADAA, an online executor had the same rights to the deceased person's Internet accounts as did the deceased person when alive. Why do you think these guidelines met strong opposition?

A majority of states also provide for family settlement agreements, which are private agreements among the beneficiaries. Once a will is admitted to probate, the family members can agree among themselves on how to distribute the decedent's assets. Although a family settlement agreement speeds the settlement process, a court order is still needed to protect the estate from future creditors and to clear title to the assets involved.

Formal Probate For larger estates, formal probate proceedings normally are undertaken, and the probate court supervises every aspect of the process. Additionally, in some situations—such as when a guardian for minor children must be appointed—more formal probate procedures cannot be avoided.

Formal probate proceedings may take several months or several years to complete, depending on the size and complexity of the estate and whether the will is contested. As a result, a sizable portion of the decedent's assets (as much as 10 percent) may go toward payment of court costs and fees charged by attorneys and personal representatives.

Property Transfers outside the Probate Process Often, people can avoid the cost of probate by employing various will substitutes. Examples include living trusts (discussed later in this chapter), life insurance policies, and individual retirement accounts (IRAs) with named beneficiaries.

Will Substitutes Various instruments, such as living trusts and life insurance plans, that may be used to avoid the formal probate process.

One way to transfer property outside the probate process is to make gifts to children or others while one is still living. Another way is to own property in a joint tenancy. As previously discussed, in a joint tenancy, when one joint tenant dies, the other joint tenant or tenants automatically inherit the deceased tenant's share of the property. This is true even if the deceased tenant has provided otherwise in a will. Not all alternatives to formal probate administration are suitable to every estate, however.

36–2f Intestacy Laws

As mentioned, each state regulates by statute how property will be distributed when a person dies intestate (without a valid will). Intestacy laws attempt to carry out the likely intent and wishes of the decedent. These laws assume that deceased persons would have intended that their natural heirs (spouses, children, grandchildren, or other family members) inherit their property. Therefore, intestacy statutes set out rules and priorities under which these heirs inherit the property. If no heirs exist, the state will assume ownership of the property. The rules of descent vary widely from state to state.

Surviving Spouse and Children Usually, state statutes provide that the estate must be used first to satisfy the debts of the decedent. Then, the remaining assets pass to the surviving spouse and to the children. A surviving spouse usually receives only a share of the estate—one-half if there is also a surviving child and one-third if there are two or more children. Only if no children or grandchildren survive the decedent will a surviving spouse be entitled to the entire estate.

New Africa/Shutterstock.com

When a person dies without a will (intestate), how do states distribute the property of the deceased person?

Example 36.9 Allen dies intestate and is survived by his wife, Beth, and his children, Duane and Tara. Allen's property passes according to intestacy laws. After his outstanding debts are paid, Beth will receive the family home (either in fee simple or as a life estate) and ordinarily a one-third interest in all other property. The remaining real and personal property will pass to Duane and Tara in equal portions. ■

Under most state intestacy laws and under the UPC, in-laws do not share in an estate. Thus, if a child dies before the parents, the child's spouse will not receive an inheritance on the parents' death. For instance, if Duane had died before his father (Allen) in Example 36.9, Duane's spouse would not inherit Duane's share of Allen's estate.

When There Is No Surviving Spouse or Child When there is no surviving spouse or child, the order of inheritance is grandchildren, then brothers and sisters, and, in some states, parents of the decedent. These relatives are usually called lineal descendants.

If there are no lineal descendants, then collateral heirs—nieces, nephews, aunts, and uncles of the decedent—make up the next group to share. If there are no survivors in any of these groups, most statutes provide for the property to be distributed among the next of kin of the collateral heirs.

Stepchildren, Adopted Children, and Illegitimate Children Under intestacy laws, stepchildren are not considered kin. Legally adopted children, however, are recognized as lawful heirs of their adoptive parents (as are children who are in the process of being adopted at the time of the parents' death).

Statutes vary from state to state in regard to the inheritance rights of illegitimate children (children born out of wedlock). In some states, an illegitimate child has the right to inherit only from the mother and her relatives, unless the father's paternity has been established by a legal proceeding. In the majority of states, however, a child born of any union that has the characteristics of a formal marriage relationship (such as unmarried parents who cohabit) is considered to be legitimate.

Under the revised UPC, a child is the child of both natural (biological) parents, regardless of their marital status, as long as each natural parent has openly treated the child as such [UPC 2–114]. Although illegitimate children may have inheritance rights in most states, their rights are not necessarily identical to those of legitimate children.

Grandchildren Usually, a decedent's will provides for how the estate will be distributed to descendants of deceased children—that is, to the decedent's grandchildren. If a will does not include such a provision—or if a person dies intestate—the question arises as to what share the grandchildren of the decedent will receive. Each state uses one of two methods of distributing the assets of intestate decedents—per stirpes or per capita.

Focus Question 3

What is the difference between a per stirpes distribution and a per capita distribution of an estate to the grandchildren of the deceased?

Per Stirpes Distribution. Under the per stirpes[10] method, within a class or group of distributees (such as grandchildren), the children of a descendant take the share that their deceased parent would have been entitled to inherit. Thus, grandchildren with no siblings inherit all of their parent's share, while grandchildren with siblings divide their parent's share.

Per Stirpes A method of distributing an intestate's estate so that each heir in a certain class (such as grandchildren) takes the share to which the heir's deceased ancestor (such as a mother or father) would have been entitled.

Example 36.10 Michael, a widower, has two children, Scott and Jonathan. Scott has two children (Becky and Holly), and Jonathan has one child (Paul). Scott and Jonathan die before their father, and then Michael dies. If Michael's estate is distributed per stirpes, Becky and Holly each receive one-fourth of the estate (dividing Scott's one-half share). Paul receives one-half of the estate (taking Jonathan's one-half share). ■ Exhibit 36–4 illustrates the per stirpes method of distribution.

Per Capita Distribution. An estate may also be distributed on a per capita[11] basis, which means that each person in a class or group takes an equal share of the estate. In Example 36.10, if Michael's estate is distributed per capita, Becky, Holly, and Paul each receive a one-third share. Exhibit 36–5 illustrates the per capita method of distribution.

Per Capita A method of distributing an intestate's estate so that each heir in a certain class (such as grandchildren) receives an equal share.

36–3 Trusts

A trust is any arrangement through which property is transferred from one person to a trustee to be administered for the transferor's or another party's benefit. It can also be defined as a right of property held by one party for the benefit of another. A trust can be created for any purpose that is not illegal or against public policy, and it can be express or implied.

Trust An arrangement in which title to property is held by one person (a trustee) for the benefit of another (a beneficiary).

10. Per stirpes is a Latin term meaning "by the roots" or "by stock." When used in estate law, it means proportionally divided among beneficiaries according to their deceased ancestor's share.
11. Per capita is a Latin term meaning "per person" or "for each head." When used in estate law, it means equally divided among beneficiaries.

Exhibit 36–4 Per Stirpes Distribution

Under this method of distribution, an heir takes the share that his or her deceased parent would have been entitled to inherit had the parent lived. This may mean that a class of distributees—the grandchildren in this example—will not inherit in equal portions. Note that Becky and Holly receive only one-fourth of Michael's estate while Paul inherits one-half.

Exhibit 36–5 Per Capita Distribution

Under this method of distribution, all heirs in a certain class—in this example, the grandchildren—inherit equally. Note that Becky and Holly in this situation each inherit one-third, as does Paul.

Focus Question 4
What are the four essential elements of a trust?

The essential elements of a trust are as follows:

1. A designated beneficiary.
2. A designated trustee.
3. A fund sufficiently identified to enable title to pass to the trustee.
4. Actual delivery by the grantor (or settlor, the person creating the trust) to the trustee with the intention of passing title.

36–3a Express Trusts

An express trust is created or declared in explicit terms, usually in writing. There are many types of express trusts, each with its own special characteristics.

Living (Inter Vivos) Trust A trust created by the grantor (settlor) and effective during the grantor's lifetime.

Living Trusts A living (inter vivos) trust—inter vivos is Latin for "between or among the living"—is a trust created by a grantor while the grantor is still alive. Living trusts have become a popular estate-planning option because at the grantor's death, assets held in a living trust can pass to the heirs without going through probate.

Note, however, that living trusts do not shelter assets from estate taxes. Furthermore, the grantor may have to pay income taxes on trust earnings, depending on whether the trust is revocable or irrevocable.

Revocable Living Trusts. Living trusts can be revocable or irrevocable. In a revocable living trust, which is the most common type, the grantor retains control over the trust property. The grantor deeds the property to the trust but retains the power to amend, alter, or revoke the trust.

Grantors may also serve as trustees or co-trustees and can arrange to receive income earned by the trust assets during their lifetimes. Because grantors are in control of the funds, they are required to pay income taxes on the trust earnings. Unless the trust is revoked, the principal of the trust is transferred to the trust beneficiary or beneficiaries on the grantor's death.

Example 36.11 James Cortez owns and operates a large farm. After his wife dies, James contacts his attorney to create a living trust for the benefit of his three children, Alicia, Emma, and Jayden. The attorney prepares the documents creating the trust. James then executes a deed conveying the farm to the trust and transfers the farm's bank accounts into the name of the trust.

The trust designates James as the trustee and names his son, Jayden, as the successor trustee, who will take over the management of the trust when James dies or becomes incapacitated. Each of the children and James (as income beneficiaries) will receive income from the trust while James is alive. When James dies, the farm will pass to them without having to go through probate. By holding the property in a revocable living trust, James retains control over the farm during his life (and can make changes to the trust at any time). This trust arrangement is illustrated in Exhibit 36–6.

The following case involved a revocable living trust that included the phrase, "death of each." The resolution of the dispute turned on whether, in the context, "each" meant "either" or "both."

Case 36.3

Dowdy v. Dowdy

District Court of Appeal of Florida, Second District, 41 Fla.L.Weekly D85, 182 So.3d 807 (2016).

Facts Betty and Dennis Dowdy created the Dowdy Family Trust. The property of the trust comprised two parcels of real estate. The trust document identified Betty and Dennis as the settlors, the initial trustees, and the initial beneficiaries. The trust document provided for the revocation or amendment of the trust and for distributions to the settlors. It also appointed one of each settlor's children as co-successor trustees and, following the settlors' deaths, provided for liquidation and distribution to all of their children.

Dennis had three children, and Betty had two—they did not have any children in common. After Dennis died, Betty amended the trust to remove Dennis's children as successor trustees and as beneficiaries. Betty also sold the trust's property.

If a married couple holds this house in a revocable family trust, can one spouse sell the property after the other spouse dies?

Dennis's son, Michael, who was named as a co-successor trustee in the trust document along with Betty's daughter, Deborah, learned of the sale and filed a petition in a Florida state court against Betty. Michael maintained that Betty's amendment was invalid because it had been executed after Dennis's death. He argued that when Dennis died, the trust became irrevocable, and he succeeded Dennis as co-trustee. The court ordered Betty to deposit the proceeds of the sale with the court pending its construction of the trust. Betty appealed.

Issue When a husband and a wife create a revocable family trust in which both are trustees, does the death of one spouse mean that the surviving spouse can no longer amend the trust terms?

Decision No. The state intermediate appellate court reversed the order of the lower court. The court found that Michael's petition had no likelihood of success and that he thus was not entitled to the injunction preventing Betty from using the proceeds of the sale of trust property.

Reason Article III of the trust provided that successor trustees (one child of each spouse) would be appointed "in the event of the death of each of the Initial Trustees." Michael argued that the phrase "death of each" meant the death of either initial trustee, thereby making him a co-trustee with Betty upon his father's death. The court rejected this argument, holding that the succession of trustees occurred only upon the death of both initial trustees. The court reasoned that "the phrase 'death of each' must mean the death of both. Otherwise, the article's direction to liquidate the trust estate and immediately distribute it" to the beneficiaries "or the survivor" would make no sense. "Indeed, upon the death of one settlor it would altogether nullify the survivor's status as beneficiary." Under the appellate court's interpretation of the trust, Betty had been the sole trustee and beneficiary of the trust at all times since her husband's death. As such, she had sole authority and discretion to sell the remaining trust property for her own benefit.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the Dowdy Family Trust had provided for a specific child to become co-trustee on the death of that child's parent—Deborah to succeed Betty, for example. How would the result have been different?

Exhibit 36–6 A Revocable Living Trust Arrangement

Irrevocable Living Trusts. In an irrevocable living trust, the grantor permanently gives up control over the property to the trustee. The grantor executes a trust deed, and legal title to the trust property passes to the named trustee. The trustee has a duty to administer the property as directed by the grantor for the benefit and in the interest of the beneficiaries.

The trustee must preserve the trust property and make it productive. If required by the terms of the trust agreement, the trustee must pay income to the beneficiaries in accordance with the terms of the trust. Because the grantors have, in effect, given over the property for the benefit of the beneficiaries, they are no longer responsible for paying income taxes on the trust earnings.

Testamentary Trust A trust that is created by will and therefore does not take effect until the death of the testator.

Testamentary Trusts A testamentary trust is created by will and comes into existence on the grantor's death. Although a testamentary trust has a trustee who maintains legal title to the trust property, the trustee's actions are subject to judicial approval. This trustee can be named in the will or be appointed by the court (if not named in the will). The legal responsibilities of the trustee are the same as in a living trust.

If a court finds that the will setting up a testamentary trust is invalid, then the trust will also be invalid. The property that was supposed to be in the trust will then pass according to intestacy laws, not according to the terms of the trust.

Charitable Trust A trust in which the property held by the trustee must be used for a charitable purpose, such as the advancement of health, education, or religion.

Charitable Trusts A charitable trust is an express trust designed for the benefit of a segment of the public or the public in general. It differs from other types of trusts in that the identities of the beneficiaries are uncertain and it can be established to last indefinitely. Usually, to be deemed a charitable trust, a trust must be created for charitable, educational, religious, or scientific purposes.

Spendthrift Trusts A spendthrift trust is created to provide for the maintenance of a beneficiary by preventing the beneficiary from being careless with the bestowed funds. Unlike the beneficiaries of other trusts, the beneficiary in a spendthrift trust is not permitted to transfer or assign the right to the trust's principal or future payments from the trust. Essentially, beneficiaries can withdraw only a certain portion of the total amount to which they are entitled at any one time. The majority of states allow spendthrift trust provisions that prohibit creditors from attaching such trusts.

Spendthrift Trust A trust in which only a certain portion of the total amount is given to the beneficiary at any one time; most states prohibit creditors from attaching assets of the trust.

Totten Trusts A Totten trust[12] is created when a grantor deposits funds in the grantor's name with instructions that on the grantor's death, whatever is in that account should go to a specific beneficiary. This type of trust is revocable at will until the depositor dies or completes the gift (by delivering the funds to the intended beneficiary, for instance). The beneficiary has no access to the funds until the depositor's death, when the beneficiary obtains property rights to the balance on hand.

Totten Trust A trust created when a grantor deposits funds in the grantor's own name for a specific beneficiary, who will receive the funds on the depositor's death. The trust is revocable at will until the depositor dies or completes the gift.

36–3b Implied Trusts

Sometimes, a trust will be imposed (implied) by law, even in the absence of an express trust. Implied trusts include constructive trusts and resulting trusts.

Constructive Trusts A constructive trust is an equitable trust imposed by a court in the interests of fairness and justice. In a constructive trust, the owner of the property is declared to be a trustee for the parties who are, in fairness, actually entitled to the benefits that flow from the property.

Constructive Trust An equitable trust that is imposed in the interests of fairness and justice when someone wrongfully holds legal title to property.

Courts often impose constructive trusts when someone who is in a confidential or fiduciary relationship with another person, such as a guardian to a ward, has breached a duty to that person. A court may also impose a constructive trust when someone wrongfully holds legal title to property—because the property was obtained through fraud or in breach of a legal duty, for instance.

Case Example 36.12 When Yvonne Ryan died, her daughter Ruby Revell—as a beneficiary of a trust set up by Ryan's mother—was entitled to 50 percent of the trust's assets. Revell was unaware that the trust existed. The same could not be said for Bret Lovett, who was working for Revell on an unrelated matter. Without telling her why, Lovett had Revell initial an "Agreement" under which he would receive 85 percent of the value of any real property "left behind" by her mother that he was able to recover for Revell.

Revell later fired Lovett, but he continued to misrepresent himself as Revell's attorney. Without Revell's knowledge, Lovett convinced the trustee to sell property controlled by the trust. He then conspired to place the proceeds from the sale—Revell's inheritance—in an escrow account from which he paid himself 85 percent, about $96,000. Given the level of bad faith involved, a court voided the escrow account and found that Lovett had been holding the proceeds from the sale of the property in a constructive trust for Revell's benefit.[13]

Resulting Trusts A resulting trust arises from the conduct of the parties. When circumstances raise an inference that one party holds legal title to the property for the benefit of another, a court may infer a resulting trust.

Resulting Trust An implied trust that arises when one party holds the legal title to another's property only for that other's benefit.

Example 36.13 Gabriela wants to put one acre of land she owns on the market for sale. Because she is going out of the country for two years and will not be able to deed the property to a buyer during that period, she conveys (transfers) the property to her good friend Oswald. Oswald can then attempt to sell the property while Gabriela is gone.

12. This type of trust derives its unusual name from the case In re Totten, 179 N.Y. 112, 71 N.E. 748 (1904).
13. Revell v. Burlison Law Group, 2020 WL 1227140 (Cal. Ct. App. 2020).

The transaction in which Gabriela conveyed the property to Oswald was intended to be neither a sale nor a gift. Consequently, Oswald will hold the property in a resulting trust for the benefit of Gabriela. When Gabriela returns, Oswald will be required either to deed the property back to her or, if the property has been sold, to turn over the proceeds (held in trust) to her.

36–3c The Trustee

The trustee is the person holding the trust property. Anyone legally capable of holding title to, and dealing in, property can be a trustee. If a trust fails to name a trustee, or if a named trustee cannot or will not serve, the trust does not fail—an appropriate court can appoint a trustee.

Trustee's Duties A trustee must act with honesty, good faith, and prudence in administering the trust and must exercise a high degree of loyalty toward the trust beneficiary. The general standard of care is the degree of care prudent individuals would exercise in their personal affairs.[14] The duty of loyalty requires that the trustee act in the exclusive interest of the beneficiary.

Hero Images/Getty Images

What are some specific duties of a trustee?

A trustee's specific duties include the following:

1. Maintain clear and accurate accounts of the trust's administration.
2. Furnish complete and correct information to the beneficiary.
3. Keep trust assets separate from the trustee's own assets.
4. Pay to an income beneficiary the net income of the trust assets at reasonable intervals.
5. Limit the risk of loss from investments by reasonable diversification, and dispose of assets that do not represent prudent investments. (Prudent investment choices might include federal, state, or municipal bonds and some corporate bonds and stocks.)

Trustee's Powers When creating a trust, a grantor may set forth the trustee's powers and performance. State law governs in the absence of specific terms in the trust, and the states often restrict the trustee's investment of trust funds.

Typically, statutes confine trustees to investments in conservative debt securities such as government, utility, and railroad bonds. Frequently, though, a grantor gives a trustee discretionary investment power. In that circumstance, any statute may be considered only advisory, with the trustee's decisions subject in most states to the prudent person rule.

Of course, a trustee is responsible for carrying out the purposes of the trust. A trustee who fails to comply with the terms of the trust or the controlling statute is personally liable for any loss.

Allocations between Principal and Income Often, a grantor will provide one beneficiary with a life estate and another beneficiary with the remainder interest in a trust. A farmer, for instance, may create a testamentary trust providing that the farm's income be paid to the surviving spouse and that on the surviving spouse's death, the farm be given to their children. In this situation, the surviving spouse has a life estate in the farm's income, and the children have a remainder interest in the farm (the principal).

When a trust is set up in this manner, questions may arise as to how the receipts and expenses for the farm's management and the trust's administration should be allocated between income and principal. When a trust instrument does not provide instructions, a trustee must refer to applicable state law.

The general rule is that ordinary receipts and expenses are chargeable to the income beneficiary, whereas extraordinary receipts and expenses are allocated to the principal beneficiaries.[15] The receipt of rent from trust realty would be ordinary, as would the expense of paying the property's taxes. The cost of long-term improvements and proceeds from the property's sale would be extraordinary.

36–3d Trust Termination

The terms of a trust should expressly state the event on which the grantor wishes it to terminate—for instance, the beneficiary's or the trustee's death. If the trust instrument does not provide for termination on the beneficiary's death, the beneficiary's death will not end the trust. Similarly, without an express provision, a trust will not terminate on the trustee's death.

Typically, a trust instrument specifies a termination date. For instance, a trust created to educate the grantor's child may provide that the trust ends when the beneficiary reaches the age of twenty-five. If the trust's purpose is fulfilled before that date, a court may order the trust's termination. If no date is specified, a trust will terminate when its purpose has been fulfilled. Of course, if a trust's purpose becomes impossible or illegal, the trust will terminate.

Practice and Review

In June 2018, Bernard Ramish set up a $48,000 trust fund through West Plains Credit Union to provide tuition for his nephew, Nathan Covacek, to attend Tri-State Polytechnic Institute. The trust was established under Ramish's control and went into effect that August. In December, Ramish suffered a brain aneurysm that caused frequent, severe headaches but no other symptoms. In August 2019, Ramish developed heat stroke and collapsed on the golf course at La Prima Country Club.

After recuperating at the clubhouse, Ramish quickly wrote his will on the back of a wine list. It stated, "My last will and testament: Upon my death, I give all of my personal property to my friend Bernard Eshom and my home to Lizzie Johansen." He signed the will at the bottom in the presence of five men in the La Prima clubhouse, and all five men signed as witnesses.

A week later, Ramish suffered a second aneurysm and died in his sleep. He was survived by his mother (Dorris Ramish), his nephew (Nathan Covacek), his son-in-law (Bruce Lupin), and his granddaughter (Tori Lupin). Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Does Ramish's testament on the back of the wine list meet the requirements for a valid will?
2. Suppose that after Ramish's first aneurysm in 2018, Covacek contacted an insurance company to obtain a life insurance policy on Ramish's life. Would Covacek have had an insurable interest in his uncle's life? Why or why not?
3. What would the order of inheritance have been if Ramish had died intestate?
4. What will most likely happen to the trust fund established for Covacek on Ramish's death?

Any changes to existing, fully witnessed wills should also have to be witnessed.

Chapter Summary: Insurance, Wills, and Trusts

INSURANCE
Classifications	See Exhibit 36–1 for a list of types of insurance.
Terminology	1. Policy—The insurance contract. 2. Premium—The consideration paid to the insurer for a policy. 3. Underwriter—The insurance company. 4. Parties—Include the insurer (the insurance company), the insured (the person covered by insurance), and an agent (a representative of the insurance company) or a broker (ordinarily an independent contractor). Certain types of insurance also include a beneficiary (a person to receive proceeds under the policy) other than the insured.
Insurable Interest	An insurable interest exists whenever an individual or entity benefits from the preservation of the health or life of the insured or the property to be insured. For life insurance, an insurable interest must exist at the time the policy is issued. For property insurance, an insurable interest must exist at the time of the loss.
The Insurance Contract	1. Laws governing—The general principles of contract law are applied. The insurance industry is also heavily regulated by the states. 2. Application—An insurance applicant is bound by any false statements that appear in the application (subject to certain exceptions), which is part of the insurance contract. Misstatements or misrepresentations may be grounds for voiding the policy. 3. Effective date—Coverage on an insurance policy can begin when a binder (a written memorandum indicating that a formal policy is pending and stating its essential terms) is written; when the policy is issued and delivered; depending on the terms of the contract, when certain conditions are met (such as payment of the premium). 4. Provisions and clauses—See Exhibit 36–2 for specific provisions. Words will be given their ordinary meanings, and any ambiguity in the policy will be interpreted against the insurance company. When the written policy has not been delivered and it is unclear whether an insurance contract actually exists, the uncertainty will be resolved against the insurance company. The court will presume that the policy is in effect unless the company can show otherwise. 5. Cancellation—The insured can cancel a policy at any time, and the insurer can cancel under certain circumstances. 6. Duties and obligations of the parties— a. Duties of the insured—Once the policy has been issued, the insured must pay the premiums, notify the insurer within a reasonable time if an event gives rise to a claim, and cooperate with the insurer during any investigation or litigation. b. Duties of the insurer—The insurer has a duty to investigate any event that gives rise to a claim and is obligated to make reasonable efforts to settle any third-party claims. The insurer also has a duty to defend any suit against the insured. 7. Defenses against payment to the insured—Defenses include misrepresentation or fraud by the applicant, lack of an insurable interest, and the illegal actions of the insured.

WILLS
Terminology	1. Testator—A person who makes out a will. 2. Executor—A person named in a will to settle the affairs of a decedent. 3. Administrator—A personal representative appointed by the court to settle the affairs of an intestate decedent. 4. Intestate—One who dies without a valid will. 5. Devise—A gift of real estate by will; may be general or specific. The recipient of a devise is a devisee. 6. Bequest, or legacy—A gift of personal property by will; may be general or specific. The recipient of a bequest (legacy) is a legatee.
Requirements for a Valid Will	1. The testator must have testamentary capacity (be of legal age and sound mind at the time the will is made). 2. Testators must have the necessary intent to transfer and distribute their property. 3. A will must be in writing (except for nuncupative wills). A holographic will is completely in the handwriting of the testator. 4. A will must be signed by the testator. What constitutes a signature varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. 5. A nonholographic will (an attested will) must be witnessed in the manner prescribed by state statute.
Revocation of Wills	1. By physical act of the maker—Intentionally burning, tearing up, canceling, obliterating, or otherwise destroying a will. 2. By subsequent writing— a. Codicil—A formal, separate document to amend or revoke an existing will. b. Second will or new will—A new, properly executed will expressly revoking the existing will. 3. By operation of law— a. Marriage—Generally revokes part of a will written before the marriage. b. Divorce or annulment—Revokes dispositions of property made under a will to a former spouse. c. Subsequently born child—Most states allow the child to receive a portion of the estate.
Probate Procedures and Estate Planning	To probate a will means to establish its validity and to carry the administration of the estate through a state court process. Probate procedures may be informal or formal, depending on the size of the estate and other factors, such as whether a guardian for minor children must be appointed.
Intestacy Laws	1. Intestacy laws vary widely from state to state. Usually, the law provides that the surviving spouse and children inherit the property of the decedent (after the decedent's debts are paid). The spouse usually inherits the entire estate if there are no children, one-half of the estate if there is one child, and one-third of the estate if there are two or more children. 2. If there is no surviving spouse or child, then, in order, lineal descendants (grandchildren, brothers and sisters, and—in some states—parents of the decedent) inherit. If there are no lineal descendants, then collateral heirs (nieces, nephews, aunts, and uncles of the decedent) inherit. 3. Each state uses one of two methods to distribute assets of the decedent. Under the per stirpes method, within a class or group of distributees (such as grandchildren), the children of a descendant take the share that their deceased parent would have been entitled to inherit (see Exhibit 36–4). Under the per capita method, each person in a class or group takes an equal share of the estate (see Exhibit 36–5).
TRUSTS
Definition and Elements	A trust is any arrangement through which property is transferred from one person to a trustee to be administered for the transferor's or another party's benefit. The essential elements of a trust are (1) a designated beneficiary, (2) a designated trustee, (3) a fund sufficiently identified to enable title to pass to the trustee, and (4) actual delivery by the grantor to the trustee with the intention of passing title.
Express Trusts	Express trusts are created by explicit terms, usually in writing, and include the following: 1. Living (inter vivos) trust—A trust created by a grantor during the grantor's lifetime. 2. Testamentary trust—A trust that is created by will and comes into existence on the death of the grantor. 3. Charitable trust—A trust designed for the benefit of a public group or the public in general. 4. Spendthrift trust—A trust created to provide for a beneficiary by allowing the beneficiary to withdraw only a certain amount at any one time. 5. Totten trust—A trust created when the grantor deposits funds in the grantor's own name as a trustee for a specific beneficiary.

Implied Trusts	Implied trusts, which are imposed by law in the interests of fairness and justice, include the following: 1. Constructive trust—Arises by operation of law when a person wrongfully takes title to property. A court may require the owner to hold the property in trust for those who, in equity, are entitled to the benefits from the trust. 2. Resulting trust—Arises from the conduct of the parties when an apparent intention to create a trust is present.
Trustee	A trustee must act with honesty, good faith, and prudence in administering the trust, and must exercise a high degree of loyalty toward the trust beneficiary.
Termination	Typically, a trust instrument specifies a termination date. If no date is specified, a trust will terminate when its purpose has been fulfilled.

1. Sheila makes out a will leaving her property in equal thirds to Toby and Uma, her children, and Velda, her niece. Two years later, Sheila is adjudged mentally incompetent, and that same year, she dies. Can Toby and Uma have Sheila's will revoked on the ground that she did not have the capacity to make a will? Why or why not? (See Wills.)
2. When Ralph dies, he has not made a will and is survived by many relatives—a spouse, children, adopted children, sisters, brothers, uncles, aunts, cousins, nephews, and nieces. What determines who inherits what? (See Wills.)

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

36–1. Timing of Insurance Coverage. On October 10, Joleen Vora applied for a $50,000 life insurance policy with Magnum Life Insurance Co. She named her husband, Jay, as the beneficiary. Joleen paid the insurance company the first year's premium on making the application. Two days later, before she had a chance to take the physical examination required by the insurance company and before the policy was issued, Joleen was killed in an automobile accident. Jay submitted a claim to the insurance company for $50,000. Can Jay collect? Explain. (See Insurance.)

36–2. Wills and Intestacy Laws. Benjamin is a widower who has two married children, Edward and Patricia. Patricia has two children, Perry and Paul. Edward has no children. Benjamin makes a will leaving his property equally to Edward and Patricia. The will provides that should a child predecease him, the grandchildren are to take per stirpes. The will is witnessed by Patricia and by Benjamin's lawyer and is signed by Benjamin in their presence. Benjamin dies, and Patricia has predeceased him. Edward claims the will is invalid. (See Wills.)

1. Discuss whether the will is valid.
2. Discuss the distribution of Benjamin's estate if the will is invalid.
3. Discuss the distribution of Benjamin's estate if the will is valid.

36–3. Undue Influence. Louise Kane executed a will that left her entire estate to her grandson. When her grandson died, Louise executed a new will that named her great-grandson as her sole beneficiary and specifically disinherited her son, Tommy. At the time, Tommy's ex-wife was living with Louise. After Louise died, Tommy filed a suit, claiming that her will was the product of undue influence on the part of his ex-wife. Several witnesses testified that Louise had been mentally competent when she executed her will. Does undue influence appear likely based on these facts? Why or why not? (See Wills.)

36–4. Insurance Provisions and Clauses. Darling's Rent-a-Car carried property insurance on its cars under a policy issued by Philadelphia Indemnity Insurance Co. The policy listed Darling's as the "insured." Darling's rented a car to Joshuah Farrington. In the rental contract, Farrington agreed to be responsible for any damage to the car and declined the optional insurance. Later, Farrington collided with a moose. Philadelphia paid Darling's for the damage to the car and sought to collect this amount from Farrington. Farrington argued that he was an "insured" under Darling's policy. How should "insured" be interpreted in this case? Why? [Philadelphia Indemnity Insurance Co. v. Farrington, 37 A.3d 305 (Me. 2012)] (See Insurance.)

36–5. Requirements of a Will. Sherman Hemsley was a well-known actor from the 1970s. Most notably, he played George Jefferson on the television shows All in the Family and The Jeffersons. He was born to Arsena Chisolm and William Thornton. Thornton was married to another woman, and Hemsley never had a relationship with his father or that side of the family. Hemsley never married and had no children. He lived with Flora Bernal, his business manager. Diagnosed with cancer, Hemsley executed a will naming Bernal the sole beneficiary of his estate. At the signing, Hemsley indicated that he knew he was executing his will and that he had deliberately chosen Bernal, but he did not discuss his relatives or the nature of his property with his attorney or the witnesses. After his death, the Thorntons challenged the will. Was Hemsley of sound mind? Discuss. [In re Estate of Hemsley, 460 S.W.3d 629 (Tex.App.—El Paso 2014)] (See Wills.)

36–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Wills. Andrew Walker executed a will giving a certain parcel of real estate in fee simple to his three children from a previous marriage—Mark Walker, Michelle Peters, and Andrea Knox—with a "life use" in the property granted to his current spouse, Nora Walker. A year later, Andrew, who suffered from asbestosis, was discharged from a hospital to spend his last days at home. He told Nora that he wished to execute a new will to change the disposition of the property to devise half of it to her. Nora recorded his wish and took her notes to the office of attorney Frederick Meagher to have the document drafted. Meagher did not see Nora's notes, he did not talk to Walker, no one from his office was present at the signing of the document, and, when Walker signed it, he did not declare that it was his will, as required by state law. Is the document a valid will? Explain. [In re Estate of Walker, 124 A.D.3d 970, 2 N.Y.S.3d 628 (3 Dept. 2015)] (See Wills.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 36–6, go to Appendix E.

36–7. Defenses against Insurance Payment. American National Property and Casualty Co. issued an insurance policy to Robert Houston, insuring certain residential property and its contents against fire and other hazards. Twenty months later, Houston issued a quitclaim deed to the property to John and Judy Sykes, reserving a life estate for himself. Houston died two years after that, but John continued to renew the American policy in Houston's name. When a fire substantially damaged the property, John filed a claim with the insurer on behalf of Houston, whom John said was out of town and unavailable. On learning that Houston had died seven years earlier, American refused to pay, claiming that it had no liability. Who will suffer the loss under these circumstances? Why? How might this loss have been avoided? Explain. [American National Property and Casualty Co. v. Sykes, 2016 WL 390069 (S.D.Miss. E.Div. 2016)] (See Insurance.)

36–8. Testamentary Intent. When Larry Neal died, Gary, his brother and his estate's executor, applied to a Texas state court to probate Larry's will. The will provided, "I do give and bequeath to my niece, Valorie Jean (Neal) White, all my personal effects and all my tangible personal property, including automobiles, hangars, aircraft, fly-drive vehicles, patents, companies, and all other things owned by me at the time of my death," including bank accounts, securities, and other "intangibles." Gary interpreted this provision to entitle Valorie to all of Larry's personal and real property. Larry's daughter, Lori, objected, arguing that under the terms of the will, Larry's personal property passed to Valorie and his real property passed by intestacy to her and Larry's sons. Did Larry's will devise his real property to Valorie? Discuss. [Estate of Neal, 2018 WL 283780 (Tex.App.—Fort Worth 2018)] (See Wills.)

36–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Bad Faith. Bernd Moving Systems owned a warehouse in Yakima, Washington. American Guarantee & Liability Insurance Co. insured Bernd under a policy that included coverage of "Personal property of others in your care, custody and control." Before storing property in the warehouse, William and Colleen Merriman were told that their goods would be fully insured. Later, a fire destroyed the warehouse and the Merrimans' property. American Guarantee did not inform them of Bernd's coverage, however. Instead, they were advised to file a claim under their homeowner's insurance because there would most likely be no coverage under Bernd's policy. [Merriman v. American Guarantee & Liability Insurance Co., 198 Wash. App. 594, 396 P.3d 351 (Div. 3 2017)] (See Insurance.)

1. On what grounds might the Merrimans base a legal action against American Guarantee?
2. Are there sufficient grounds to argue that the insurer acted unethically? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

36–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Intestacy Laws. Three and a half years after Lauren and Warren Woodward were married, they were informed that Warren had leukemia. At the time, the couple had no children, and physicians told the Woodwards that the leukemia treatment might leave Warren sterile. The couple arranged for Warren's sperm to be collected and placed in a sperm bank for later use.

Two years after Warren died, Lauren gave birth to twin girls who had been conceived through artificial insemination using his sperm. The following year, Lauren applied for Social Security survivor benefits for the two children. Her application was rejected on the ground that she had not established that the twins were the husband's children within the meaning of the Social Security Act. Woodward then filed a paternity action in Massachusetts, and the probate court determined that Warren Woodward was the twins' father. She then filed an action in court to determine the inheritance rights of the twins. (See Wills.)

1. The first group will outline how a court should decide the inheritance rights of children conceived from the sperm of a deceased individual and his surviving spouse.
2. The second group will decide if children conceived after a parent's death (by means of artificial insemination or in vitro fertilization) still inherit under intestate succession laws, and will explain why or why not.
3. The third group will consider the inheritance rights of a child who was conceived by means of artificial insemination, in vitro fertilization, or a surrogate. Should they be different from the rights of a child conceived in the traditional manner? Assuming the biological parent is not part of the child's life, should the child still be able to inherit from the biological parent? Why or why not?

Unit Seven—Task-Based Simulation

StockPhoto.com/proxyminder

Dave graduates from State University with an engineering degree and goes into business as a self-employed computer programmer.

1. Ownership of Personal Property. To advertise his services on the Internet, Dave creates and produces a short digital video. Venture Films, Inc., sees the video and hires Dave to program the special effects for a short sequence in a Venture Films movie. Their contract states that all rights to the sequence belong to Venture Films. What belongs to Dave: the digital video, the movie sequence, both, or neither? Explain.

2. Landlord-Tenant Law. Dave leases an office in Carl's Riverside Plaza office building for a two-year term. What is Dave's obligation for the rent if he moves out before the end of the term? If Dave dies during the term, who is entitled to possession of the office? What is Dave's obligation for the rent if Carl sells the building to Commercial Investments, Inc., before Dave's lease is up?

3. Real Property Deeds. At the end of the lease term, Dave buys the office building from Carl, who gives Dave a warranty deed. Commercial Investments later challenges Dave's ownership of the building and presents its own allegedly valid deed. What will it mean if a court rules that Dave owns the building in fee simple? If Commercial Investments is successful, can Dave recover anything from Carl? Explain.

4. Insurance. Dave's programming business expands, and he hires Mary as an employee. Mary becomes invaluable to the business, and Dave obtains a key-person insurance policy on her life. She dies six years later. If the insurance company discovers that Dave understated Mary's age when applying for the policy (which includes an incontestability clause), can the insurer legitimately refuse payment? If Mary had resigned to start her own programming firm one year before she died, could Dave have collected payment under the policy? Why or why not?

5. Wills and Trusts. Over time, Dave acquires other commercial property, which eventually becomes the most lucrative part of his business. Dave wants his adult children, Frank and Terry, to get the benefit of this property when he dies. Dave does not think that Frank and Terry can manage the property, however, because they have their own careers and live in other states. How can Dave provide for them to get the benefit of the property under someone else's management? In his will, Dave designates Hal, his attorney, as executor. What does an executor do?

How to Brief Cases and Analyze Case Problems

How to Brief Cases

To fully understand the law with respect to business, you need to be able to read and understand court decisions. To make this task easier, you can use a method of case analysis that is called briefing. There is a fairly standard procedure that you can follow when you "brief" any court case. You must first read the case opinion carefully. When you feel you understand the case, you can prepare a brief of it.

Although the format of the brief may vary, typically it will present the essentials of the case under headings such as those listed below.

1. Citation. Give the full citation for the case, including the name of the case, the date it was decided, and the court that decided it.
2. Facts. Briefly indicate (a) the reasons for the lawsuit; (b) the identity and arguments of the plaintiff(s) and defendant(s), respectively; and (c) the lower court's decision—if appropriate.
3. Issue. Concisely phrase, in the form of a question, the essential issue before the court. (If more than one issue is involved, you may have two—or even more—questions here.)
4. Decision. Indicate here—with a "yes" or "no," if possible—the court's answer to the question (or questions) in the Issue section above.
5. Reason. Summarize as briefly as possible the reasons given by the court for its decision (or decisions) and the case or statutory law relied on by the court in arriving at its decision.

For a case-specific example of what should be included under each of the above headings when briefing a case, see the review of the sample court case presented in the appendix to Chapter 1 of this text.

Analyzing Case Problems

In addition to learning how to brief cases, students of business law and the legal environment also find it helpful to know how to analyze case problems. Part of the study of business law and the legal environment usually involves analyzing case problems, such as those included in this text at the end of each chapter.

For each case problem in this book, we provide the relevant background and facts of the lawsuit and the issue before the court. When you are assigned one of these problems, your job will be to determine how the court should decide the issue, and why. In other words, you will need to engage in legal analysis and reasoning. Here, we offer some suggestions on how to make this task less daunting. We begin by presenting a sample case problem:

> While Janet Lawson, a famous pianist, was shopping in Quality Market, she slipped and fell on a wet floor in one of the aisles. The floor had recently been mopped by one of the store's employees, but there were no signs warning customers that the floor in that area was wet. As a result of the fall, Lawson injured her right arm and was unable to perform piano concerts for the next six months. Had she been able to perform the scheduled concerts, she would have earned approximately $60,000 over that period of time. Lawson sued Quality Market for this amount, plus another $10,000 in medical expenses. She claimed that the store's failure to warn customers of the wet floor constituted negligence and therefore the market was liable for her injuries. Will the court agree with Lawson? Discuss.

Understand the Facts

This may sound obvious, but before you can analyze or apply the relevant law to a specific set of facts, you must clearly understand those facts. In other words, you should read through the case problem carefully—more than once, if necessary—to make sure you understand the identity of the plaintiff(s) and defendant(s) in the case and the progression of events that led to the lawsuit.

In the sample case problem just given, the identity of the parties is fairly obvious. Janet Lawson is the one bringing the suit; therefore, she is the plaintiff. Lawson is bringing the suit against Quality Market, so it is the defendant. Some of the case problems you work on may have multiple plaintiffs or defendants. Often, it is helpful to use abbreviations for the parties. To indicate a reference to a plaintiff, for example, the pi symbol—π—is often used, and a defendant is denoted by a delta—Δ—a triangle.

The events leading to the lawsuit are also fairly straightforward. Lawson slipped and fell on a wet floor, and she contends that Quality Market should be liable for her injuries because it was negligent in not posting a sign warning customers of the wet floor.

When you are working on case problems, realize that the facts should be accepted as they are given. For instance, in our sample problem, it should be accepted that the floor was wet and that there was no sign. In other words, avoid making conjectures, such as "Maybe the floor wasn't too wet," or "Maybe an employee was getting a sign to put up," or "Maybe someone stole the sign." Questioning the facts as they are presented only adds confusion to your analysis.

Legal Analysis and Reasoning

Once you understand the facts given in the case problem, you can begin to analyze the case. The IRAC method is a helpful tool to use in the legal analysis and reasoning process. IRAC is an acronym for Issue, Rule, Application, Conclusion. Applying this method to our sample problem would involve the following steps:

1. First, you need to decide what legal issue is involved in the case. In our sample case, the basic issue is whether Quality Market's failure to warn customers of the wet floor constituted negligence. Negligence is a tort—a civil wrong. In a tort lawsuit, the plaintiff seeks to be compensated for another's wrongful act. A defendant will be deemed negligent if he or she breached a duty of care owed to the plaintiff and the breach of that duty caused the plaintiff to suffer harm.
2. Once you have identified the issue, the next step is to determine what rule of law applies to the issue. To make this determination, you will want to carefully review the text discussion relating to the issue involved in the problem. Our sample case problem involves the tort of negligence. The applicable rule of law is the tort law principle that business owners owe a duty to exercise reasonable care to protect their customers (business invitees). Reasonable care, in this context, includes either removing—or warning customers of—foreseeable risks about which the owner knew or should have known. Business owners need not warn customers of "open and obvious" risks, however. If a business owner breaches this duty of care (fails to exercise the appropriate degree of care toward customers), and the breach of duty causes a customer to be injured, the business owner will be liable to the customer for the customer's injuries.
3. The next—and usually the most difficult—step in analyzing case problems is the application of the relevant rule of law to the specific facts of the case you are studying. In our sample problem, applying the tort law principle just discussed presents few difficulties. An employee of the store had mopped the floor in the aisle where Lawson slipped and fell, but no sign was present indicating that the floor was wet. That a customer might fall on a wet floor is clearly a foreseeable risk. Therefore, the failure to warn customers about the wet floor was a breach of the duty of care owed by the business owner to the store's customers.
4. Once you have completed Step 3 in the IRAC method, you should be ready to draw your conclusion. In our sample problem, Quality Market is liable to Lawson for her injuries because the market's breach of its duty of care caused Lawson's injuries.

The fact patterns in the case problems presented in this text are not always as simple as those presented in our sample problem. Often, a case has more than one plaintiff or defendant. A case may also involve more than one issue and have more than one applicable rule of law. Furthermore, in some case problems the facts may indicate that the general rule of law should not apply. Suppose that a store employee told Lawson about the wet floor and advised her not to walk in that aisle, but Lawson decided to walk there anyway. This fact could alter the outcome of the case because the store could then raise the defense of assumption of risk. Nonetheless, a careful review of the chapter should always provide you with the knowledge you need to analyze the problem thoroughly and arrive at accurate conclusions.

The Constitution of the United States

One of the primary sources of American law is the U.S. Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land. As such, it is the basis of all law in the United States. A law in violation of the U.S. Constitution, if challenged, will be declared unconstitutional and will not be enforced, no matter what its source.

The U.S. Constitution is available on many websites, including https://www.usa.gov/history.

Appendix C

The Uniform Commercial Code

One of the most important uniform acts is the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which was created through the joint efforts of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) and the American Law Institute. The UCC was first issued in 1952 and has been adopted in all fifty states (at least in part), the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands. The UCC facilitates commerce among the states by providing a uniform, yet flexible, set of rules governing commercial transactions. Because of its importance in the area of commercial law, we cite the UCC frequently in this text.

To view sections of the UCC, see the American Law Institute website at https://www.ali.org/ or the Uniform Law Commission website at http://www.uniformlaws.org/. Articles 1, 2, and 2A are the most pertinent to students of Business Law Today.

Appendix D

Answers to the Issue Spotters

Chapter 1

1. No. The U.S. Constitution is the supreme law of the land and applies to all jurisdictions. A law in violation of the Constitution (in this question, the First Amendment to the Constitution) will be declared unconstitutional.
2. Yes. Administrative rulemaking starts with the publication of a notice of the rulemaking in the Federal Register. Among other details, this notice states where and when the proceedings, such as a public hearing, will be held. Proponents and opponents can offer their comments and concerns regarding the pending rule. After reviewing all the comments from the proceedings, the agency's decision makers consider what was presented and draft the final rule.

Chapter 2

1. Even if commercial speech is neither related to illegal activities nor misleading, it may be restricted if a state has a substantial interest that cannot be achieved by less restrictive means. In this situation, the state's interest in energy conservation is substantial, but it could be achieved by less restrictive means. That would be the utilities' defense against the enforcement of this state law.
2. Yes. The tax would limit the liberty of some persons, such as out-of-state businesses, so it is subject to a review under the equal protection clause. Protecting local businesses from out-of-state competition is not a legitimate government objective. Thus, such a tax would violate the equal protection clause.

Chapter 3

1. When a corporation decides to respond to what it sees as a moral obligation to correct for past discrimination by adjusting pay differences among its employees, an ethical conflict is raised between the firm and its employees and between the firm and its shareholders. This dilemma arises directly out of the effect such a decision has on the firm's profits. If satisfying this obligation increases profitability, then the dilemma is easily resolved in favor of "doing the right thing."
2. Maybe. On the one hand, it is not the company's "fault" when a product is misused. Also, keeping the product on the market is not a violation of the law, and stopping sales would hurt profits. On the other hand, suspending sales could reduce suffering and could prevent negative publicity that might occur if sales continued.

Chapter 4

1. Tom could file a motion for a directed verdict. This motion asks the judge to direct a verdict for Tom on the ground that Sue presented no evidence that would justify granting her relief. The judge grants the motion if there is insufficient evidence to raise an issue of fact.
2. Yes. Submission of the dispute to mediation or nonbinding arbitration is mandatory, but compliance with the decision of the mediator or arbitrator is voluntary.

1. Probably. To recover on the basis of negligence, the injured party as a plaintiff must show that the truck's owner owed the plaintiff a duty of care, that the owner breached that duty, that the plaintiff was injured, and that the breach caused the injury. In this problem, the owner's actions breached the duty of reasonable care. The billboard falling on the plaintiff was the direct cause of the injury, not the plaintiff's own negligence. Thus, liability turns on whether the plaintiff can connect the breach of duty to the injury. This involves the test of proximate cause—the question of foreseeability. The consequences to the injured party must have been a foreseeable result of the owner's carelessness.
2. The company might defend against this electrician's claim by asserting that the electrician should have known of the risk and, therefore, the company had no duty to warn. According to the problem, the danger is common knowledge in the electrician's field and should have been apparent to this electrician, given his years of training and experience. In other words, the company most likely had no need to warn the electrician of the risk.

   The firm could also raise comparative negligence. Both parties' negligence, if any, could be weighed and the liability distributed proportionately. The defendant could furthermore assert assumption of risk, claiming that the electrician voluntarily entered into a dangerous situation, knowing the risk involved.

Chapter 6

1. Yes. Those who make, sell, or lease goods are liable for the harm or damages caused by those goods to a consumer, user, or bystander. The maker of component parts may also be liable. In this situation, Rim Corporation makes tires that Superior installs on its vehicles before selling them to dealers. Thus, Superior is the manufacturer, and Rim is the maker of component parts. A manufacturer is liable for its failure to exercise due care to any person who sustains an injury proximately caused by a negligently made (defective) product. Superior's failure to inspect and test the tires it installs is a failure to use due care. Thus, Superior is liable to the injured buyer, Uri. Rim Corporation may also be liable.
2. Bensing can assert the defense of preemption. An injured party may not be able to sue the manufacturer of defective products that are subject to comprehensive federal regulatory schemes (such as medical devices and vaccinations). In this situation, it is likely that a court would conclude that the federal regulations pertaining to drug labeling preempt Ohio's common law rules. Therefore, Bensing would not be liable to Rothfus for defective labeling if it complied with federal law.

Chapter 7

1. Yes, Roslyn has committed theft of trade secrets. Lists of suppliers and customers cannot be patented, copyrighted, or trademarked, but the information they contain is protected against appropriation by others as trade secrets. Most likely, Roslyn signed a contract agreeing not to use this information outside her employment by Organic. But even without this contract, Organic could make a convincing case against its ex-employee for a theft of trade secrets.
2. This is patent infringement. A software maker in this situation might best protect its product, save litigation costs, and profit from its patent by the use of a license. In the context of this problem, a license would grant permission to sell a patented item. (A license can be limited to certain purposes and to the licensee only.)

1. Karl may have committed trademark infringement. Search engines compile their results by looking through websites' key-word fields. A site that appropriates the key words of other sites with more frequent hits will appear in the same search engine results as the more popular sites. But using another's trademark as a key word without the owner's permission normally constitutes trademark infringement. Of course, some uses of another's trademark as a meta tag may be permissible if the use is reasonably necessary and does not suggest that the owner authorized or sponsored the use.
2. Yes. This may be an instance of trademark dilution. Dilution occurs when a trademark is used, without permission, in a way that diminishes the distinctive quality of the mark. Dilution does not require proof that consumers are likely to be confused by the use of the unauthorized mark. The products involved do not have to be similar. Dilution does require, however, that a mark be famous when the dilution occurs.

1. Yes. With respect to the gas station, Dana has obtained goods by false pretenses. She might also be charged with the crimes of larceny and forgery, and most states have special statutes covering illegal use of credit cards.
2. Yes. The Counterfeit Access Device and Computer Fraud and Abuse Act provides that a person who accesses a computer online, without permission, to obtain classified data—such as consumer credit files in a credit agency's database—is subject to criminal prosecution. The crime has two elements: accessing the computer without permission and taking data. It is a felony if done for private financial gain. Penalties include fines and imprisonment for up to twenty years. The victim of the theft can also bring a civil suit against the criminal to obtain damages and other relief.

Chapter 10

1. Under the objective theory of contracts, if a reasonable person would have thought that Joli had accepted Kerin's offer when she signed and returned the letter, then a contract was made, and Joli is obligated to buy the book. This depends, in part, on what was said in the letter and what was said in response. For instance, did the letter contain a valid offer, and did the response constitute a valid acceptance? Under any circumstances, the issue is not whether either party subjectively believed that a contract had been made.
2. No. This contract, although not fully executed, is for an illegal purpose and therefore is void. A void contract gives rise to no legal obligation on the part of any party. A contract that is void is no contract. There is nothing to enforce.

1. No. Revocation of an offer may be implied by conduct inconsistent with the offer. When Fidelity Corporation rehired Monica, and Ron learned of the hiring, the offer was revoked. His acceptance was too late.
2. First, it might be noted that the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) does not apply unless the parties to a contract agree to use e-commerce in their transaction. In this deal, of course, the parties used e-commerce. The UETA removes barriers to e-commerce by giving the same legal effect to e-records and e-signatures as to paper documents and signatures. The UETA itself does not include rules for e-commerce transactions, however.

1. Yes. Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, the promisee is entitled to payment of $5,000 from the promisor on graduation. There was a promise on which the promisee relied, the reliance was substantial and definite (the promisee went to college for the full term, incurring considerable expense, and will likely graduate), and it would only be fair to enforce the promise.
2. No. Generally, an exculpatory clause (a clause attempting to absolve a party of negligence or other wrongs) is not enforced if the party seeking its enforcement is involved in a business that is important to the public as a matter of practical necessity, such as an airline. Because of the essential nature of such services, the party would have an advantage in bargaining strength and could insist that anyone contracting for its services agree not to hold it liable.

1. Yes. Rescission may be granted on the basis of fraudulent misrepresentation. The elements of fraudulent misrepresentation include intent to deceive, or scienter. Scienter exists if a party makes a statement recklessly, without regard to whether it is true or false, or if a party says or implies that a statement is made on some basis such as personal knowledge or personal investigation when it is not.
2. The court might conclude that under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, the employer is estopped from claiming the lack of a written contract as a defense. The oral contract may be enforced because the employer made a promise on which the employee justifiably relied in moving to New York, the reliance was foreseeable, and injustice can be avoided only by enforcing the promise. If the court strictly enforces the Statute of Frauds, however, the employee may be without a remedy.

1. Yes. Generally, if a contract clearly states that a right is not assignable, no assignment will be effective, but there are exceptions. Assignment of the right to receive monetary payment cannot be prohibited.
2. This is a novation. Novation substitutes a new party for an original party by agreement of all the parties. The requirements are a previous valid obligation, an agreement of all the parties to a new contract, extinguishment of the old obligation, and a new, valid contract. Novation revokes and discharges the previous obligation. Here, C&D delegated its duties under its contract with Ace to Dean, with Ace's consent. Ace's obligation to pay C&D for the execution of those duties is discharged, but its obligation under the new contract to pay Dean for those services will not be discharged until Dean is paid. The novation did, however, discharge C&D's obligation under the contract.

Chapter 15

1. A nonbreaching party is entitled to the benefit of the bargain under the contract. Here, the innocent party is entitled to be put in the position she would have been in if the contract had been fully performed. The measure of the benefit is the cost to complete the work ($500). These are compensatory damages.
2. No. To recover damages that flow from the consequences of a breach but that are caused by circumstances beyond the contract (consequential damages), the breaching party must know, or have reason to know, that special circumstances will cause the nonbreaching party to suffer the additional loss. That was not the situation in this problem.

1. A shipment of nonconforming goods constitutes an acceptance and a breach, unless the seller reasonably notifies the buyer that the nonconforming shipment does not constitute an acceptance and is offered only as an accommodation. Thus, since there was no notification in this problem, the shipment was both an acceptance and a breach.
2. Yes. In a transaction between merchants, the requirement of a writing is satisfied if one of them sends to the other a signed written confirmation that indicates the terms of the agreement, and the merchant receiving it has reason to know of its contents. If the merchant who receives the confirmation does not object in writing within ten days after receipt, the writing will be enforceable against him or her even though he or she has not signed anything.

Chapter 17

1. Yes. A seller is obligated to deliver goods in conformity with a contract in every detail. This is the perfect tender rule. The exception of the seller's right to cure does not apply here because the seller delivered too little too late to take advantage of this exception.
2. Yes. When anticipatory repudiation occurs, a buyer (or lessee) can resort to any remedy for breach even if the buyer tells the seller (the repudiating party in this problem) that the buyer will wait for the seller's performance.

Chapter 18

1. A statement that "I.O.U." money (or anything else) or an instruction to a bank stating, "I wish you would pay," would render any instrument nonnegotiable. To be negotiable, an instrument must contain an express promise to pay. An I.O.U. is only an acknowledgment of indebtedness. An order stating, "I wish you would pay," is not sufficiently precise.

2. No. When a drawer's employee provides the drawer with the name of a fictitious payee (a payee whom the drawer does not actually intend to have any interest in an instrument), a forgery of the payee's name is effective to pass good title to subsequent transferees.

Chapter 19

1. Under the principle of comity, a U.S court would defer and give effect to foreign laws and judicial decrees that are consistent with U.S. law and public policy.
2. The practice described in this problem is known as dumping, which is regarded as an unfair international trade practice. Dumping is the sale of imported goods at "less than fair value." Based on the price of those goods in the exporting country, an extra tariff—known as an antidumping duty—can be imposed on the imports.

Chapter 20

1. Yes, to both questions. In a civil suit, a drawer (Lyn) is liable to a payee (Jan) or to a holder of a check that is not honored. If intent to defraud can be proved, the drawer (Lyn) can also be subject to criminal prosecution for writing a bad check.
2. The general rule is that the bank must recredit a customer's account when it pays on a forged signature. The bank has no right to recover from a holder who, without knowledge, cashes a check bearing a forged drawer's signature. Thus, the bank in this problem can collect from neither its customer nor the party who cashed the check. The bank's only recourse is to look for the thief.

1. When collateral consists of consumer goods, and the debtor has paid less than 60 percent of the debt or the purchase price, the creditor has the option of disposing of the collateral in a commercially reasonable manner. This generally requires notice to the debtor of the place, time, and manner of sale. A debtor can waive the right to notice, but only after default. Before the disposal, a debtor can redeem the collateral by tendering performance of all of the obligations secured by the collateral and by paying the creditor's reasonable expenses in retaking and maintaining the collateral.
2. The creditor (Midwest) can place a mechanic's lien on the debtor's property. If the debtor does not pay what is owed, the property can be sold to satisfy the debt. The only requirements are that the lien be filed within a specific time from the time of the work, depending on the state statute, and that notice of the foreclosure and sale be given to the debtor in advance.

1. No. Besides the claims listed in this problem, the debts that cannot be discharged in bankruptcy include amounts borrowed to pay back taxes, goods obtained by fraud, debts that were not listed in the petition, domestic support obligations, certain cash advances, and others.
2. Yes. A debtor's payment to a creditor made for a preexisting debt, within ninety days (one year in the case of an insider or fraud) of a bankruptcy filing, can be recovered if it gives a creditor more than he or she would have received in the bankruptcy proceedings. A trustee can recover this preference using his or her specific avoidance powers.

Chapter 23

1. No. Nadine, as an agent, is prohibited from taking advantage of the agency relationship to obtain property that the principal (Dimka Corporation) wants to purchase. This is the duty of loyalty that arises with every agency relationship.
2. Yes. A principal has a duty to indemnify (reimburse) an agent for liabilities incurred because of authorized and lawful acts and transactions and for losses suffered because of the principal's failure to perform his or her duties.

1. Workers' compensation laws establish a procedure for compensating workers who are injured on the job. Instead of suing to collect benefits, an injured worker notifies the employer of the injury and files a claim with the appropriate state agency. The right to recover is normally determined without regard to negligence or fault, but intentionally inflicted injuries are not covered. Unlike the potential for recovery in a lawsuit based on negligence or fault, recovery under a workers' compensation statute is limited to the specific amount designated in the statute for the employee's injury.
2. A closed shop (a company that requires union membership as a condition of employment) is illegal. A union shop (a company that does not require union membership as a condition of employment but requires workers to join the union after a certain time on the job) is illegal in a state with a right-to-work law, which makes it illegal in that state to require union membership for continued employment.

1. Yes. One type of sexual harassment occurs when a request for sexual favors is a condition of employment and the person making the request is a supervisor or acts with the authority of the employer. A tangible employment action, such as a promise of continued employment, may also lead to the employer's liability for the supervisor's conduct. That the injured employee is a male and the supervisor a female, instead of the other way around, would not affect the outcome. Same-gender harassment is also actionable.

2. Yes, Koko can succeed in a discrimination suit if she can show that she was not hired solely because of her disability. The other elements for a discrimination suit based on a disability are that the plaintiff (1) has a disability and (2) is otherwise qualified for the job. Both of these elements appear to be satisfied in this scenario.

Chapter 26

1. When a business is relatively small and is not diversified, employs relatively few people, has modest profits, and is not likely to expand significantly or require extensive financing in the immediate future, the most appropriate form for doing business may be a sole proprietorship.
2. Yes. Failing to meet a specified sales quota can constitute a breach of a franchise agreement. If the franchisor is acting in good faith, "cause" may also include the death or disability of the franchisee, the insolvency of the franchisee, and a breach of another term of the franchise agreement.

Chapter 27

1. No. A widow (or widower) has no right to take a dead partner's place. A partner's death causes dissociation, after which the partnership must purchase the dissociated partner's partnership interest. Therefore, the surviving partners must pay the decedent's estate (for his widow) the value of the deceased partner's interest in the partnership.
2. No. Under the partners' fiduciary duty, a partner must account to the partnership for any personal profits or benefits derived without the consent of all the partners in connection with the use of any partnership property. Here, the leasing partner may not keep the funds.

1. The members of a limited liability company (LLC) may designate a group to run their firm. In that situation, the firm would be a manager-managed LLC. The group may include only members, only nonmembers, or members and nonmembers. If, instead, all members participate in management, the firm would be a member-managed LLC. In fact, unless the members agree otherwise, all members are considered to participate in the management of the firm.
2. Although there are differences, all of these forms of business organization resemble corporations. A joint stock company, for example, is owned by shareholders, is managed by directors and officers, and has perpetual existence. A business trust, like a corporation, distributes profits to persons who are not personally responsible for the debts of the organization, and management of the business is in the hands of trustees, just as the management of a corporation is in the hands of directors and officers. An incorporated cooperative, which is subject to state laws covering nonprofit corporations, distributes profits to its owners.

Chapter 29

1. Yes. Small businesses that meet certain requirements can qualify as S corporations, created specifically to permit small businesses to avoid double taxation. The six requirements of an S corporation are (1) the firm must be a domestic corporation; (2) the firm must not be a member of an affiliated group of corporations; (3) the shareholders must be individuals, estates, or qualified trusts (or corporations in some cases); (4) the firm must have no more than one hundred shareholders; (5) there can be only one class of stock; and (6) no shareholder can be a nonresident alien.
2. Yes. A shareholder can bring a derivative suit on behalf of a corporation if some wrong is done to the corporation. Normally, any damages recovered go into the corporate treasury.

Chapter 30

1. The average investor is concerned not with minor inaccuracies but with facts that if disclosed would tend to deter him or her from buying the securities. These include material facts that have an important bearing on the condition of the issuer and its business—such as liabilities, loans to officers and directors, customer delinquencies, and pending lawsuits.
2. No. The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 extends liability to officers and directors in their personal transactions for taking advantage of inside information when they know it is unavailable to the persons with whom they are dealing.

1. Size alone does not determine whether a firm is a monopoly—size in relation to the market is what matters. A small store in a small, isolated town is a monopolist if it is the only store serving that market. Monopoly involves the power to affect prices and output. If a firm has sufficient market power to control prices and exclude competition, that firm has monopoly power. Monopoly power in itself is not a violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The offense also requires an intent to acquire or maintain that power through anticompetitive means.
2. This agreement is a tying arrangement. The legality of a tying arrangement depends on the purpose of the agreement, the agreement's likely effect on competition in the relevant markets (the market for the tying product and the market for the tied product), and other factors. Tying arrangements for commodities are subject to Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Tying arrangements for services can be agreements in restraint of trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

Chapter 32

1. Under an extensive set of procedures established by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, which administers the federal Food,

Drug, and Cosmetic Act, drugs must be shown to be effective as well as safe before they may be marketed to the public. In general, manufacturers are responsible for ensuring that the drugs they offer for sale are free of any substances that could injure consumers.

2. The Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA) regulates the cleanup of hazardous waste disposal sites. Any potentially responsible party can be charged with the entire cost of cleaning up a site. Potentially responsible parties include the party that generated the waste (ChemCorp), the party that transported the waste to the site (Disposal), the party that owned or operated the site at the time of the disposal (Eliminators), and the current owner or operator of the site (Fluid). A party held responsible for the entire cost may be able to recoup some of it in a lawsuit against other potentially responsible parties.

1. Yes. In these circumstances, when the accountant knows that the bank will use the statement, the bank is a foreseeable user. A foreseeable user is a third party within the class of parties to whom an accountant may be liable for negligence.
2. No. In the circumstances described, the accountant will not be held liable to a purchaser of the securities. Although an accountant may be liable under securities laws for including untrue statements in or omitting material facts from financial statements, due diligence is a defense to liability. Due diligence requires an accountant to conduct a reasonable investigation and to reasonably believe that the financial statements are accurate. The problem scenario specifies that the misstatement of material fact in Omega's financial statement was not attributable to any fraud or negligence on Nora's part. Therefore, Nora can show that she used due diligence and will not be held liable to Pat.

1. The ring is classified as lost property because it was discovered under circumstances indicating that the owner had not voluntarily placed it where it was found. The general rule is that the finder of the lost property has the right to possession (and eventual title) over all others except the true owner of the lost property. Therefore, Martin, as the true owner of the ring, is entitled to repossess the ring from Hunter.
2. Rosa de la Mar Corporation, the shipper, suffers the loss. A common carrier is liable for damage caused by the willful acts of third persons or by an accident. Other losses must be borne by the shipper (or the recipient, depending on the terms of their contract). In this situation, this shipment was lost due to an act of God.

1. This is a breach of the warranty deed's covenant of quiet enjoyment. Consuela can sue Bernie and recover the purchase price of the house, plus any damages.
2. Yes. An owner of a fee simple has the most rights possible—he or she can give the property away, sell it, transfer it by will, use it for almost any purpose, possess it to the exclusion of all the world, or, as in this case, transfer possession for any period of time. The party to whom possession is transferred can also transfer her or his interest (usually only with the owner's permission) for any lesser period of time.

Chapter 36

1. No. To have testamentary capacity, a testator must be of legal age and sound mind at the time the will is made. Generally, the testator must (1) know the nature of the act, (2) comprehend and remember the "natural objects of his or her bounty," (3) know the nature and extent of her or his property, and (4) understand the distribution of assets called for by the will. In this situation, Sheila had testamentary capacity at the time she made the will. The fact that she was ruled mentally incompetent two years after making the will does not provide sufficient grounds to revoke it.
2. The estate will pass according to the state's intestacy laws. Intestacy laws set out how property is distributed when a person dies without a will. Their purpose is to carry out the likely intent of the decedent. The laws determine which of the deceased's natural heirs (including, in this order, the surviving spouse, lineal descendants, parents, and collateral heirs) inherit his or her property.

Appendix E

Sample Answers for Business Case Problems with Sample Answer

1–6. Sample Answer—Reading Citations.

The court's opinion in the case Friends of Buckingham v. State Air Pollution Control Board can be found in volume 947 of the Federal Reporter, third series, on page 68. The Federal Reporter contains the decisions of all the United States Courts of Appeals, including, as is the case here, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. Also, this case was decided (though not necessarily filed) in 2020.

2–3. Sample Answer—Freedom of Speech.

No, Wooden's conviction was not unconstitutional. Certain speech is not protected under the First Amendment. Speech that violates criminal laws—threatening speech, for example— is not constitutionally protected. Other unprotected speech includes fighting words, or words that are likely to incite others to respond violently. And speech that harms the good reputation of another, or defamatory speech, is not protected under the First Amendment.

In his e-mail and audio notes to the alderwoman, Wooden referred to a sawed-off shotgun, domestic terrorism, and the assassination and murder of various politicians. He compared the alderwoman to the biblical character Jezebel, referring to her as a "bitch in the Sixth Ward." These references caused the alderwoman to feel threatened. The First Amendment does not protect such threats, which in this case violated a state criminal statute. There was nothing unconstitutional about punishing Wooden for this unprotected speech.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Wooden appealed his conviction, arguing that it violated his right to freedom of speech. Under the principles set out above, the Missouri Supreme Court affirmed the conviction.

3–6. Sample Answer—Business Ethics.

It seems obvious from the facts stated in this problem that Hratch Ilanjian behaved unethically. Ethics, of course, involves questions relating to the fairness, justness, rightness, or wrongness of an action. Business ethics focuses on how businesspersons apply moral and ethical principles in making their decisions and whether those decisions are right or wrong.

In this problem, Ilanjian misrepresented himself to Vicken Setrakian, the president of Kenset Corporation, leading Setrakian to believe that Ilanjian was an international businessman who could help turn around Kenset's business in the Middle East. Ilanjian insisted that Setrakian provide him with confidential business documents. Then, claiming that they had an agreement, Ilanjian demanded full and immediate payment. He threatened to disclose the confidential information to a Kenset supplier if payment was not forthcoming. Kenset denied that they had a contract. In the ensuing litigation, during discovery, Ilanjian was uncooperative. Each of these acts was unethical.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, a trial court concluded that there was no contract, ordered the return of the confidential documents, and enjoined Ilanjian from using the information. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmed.

4–6. Sample Answer—Corporate Contacts.

No, the defendants' motion to dismiss the suit for lack of personal jurisdiction should not be granted. A corporation normally is subject to jurisdiction in a state in which it is doing business. A court applies the minimum-contacts test to determine whether it can exercise jurisdiction over an out-of-state corporation. This requirement is met if the corporation sells its products within the state or places them in the "stream of commerce" with the intention of selling them in the state.

In this problem, the state of Washington filed a suit in a Washington state court against LG Electronics, Inc., and nineteen other foreign companies that participated in the global market for cathode ray tube (CRT) products. The state alleged a conspiracy to raise prices and set production levels in the market for CRTs in violation of a state consumer protection statute. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss the suit for lack of personal jurisdiction. For many years, however, these companies had sold CRTs in high volume in the United States, including the state of Washington. In other words, the corporations had purposefully established minimum contacts in the state of Washington. This is a sufficient basis for a Washington state court to assert personal jurisdiction over the defendants.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the trial court dismissed the suit for lack of personal jurisdiction. On appeal, a state intermediate appellate court reversed based on the reasoning stated above.

5–4. Sample Answer—Negligence.

Negligence requires proof that (a) the defendant owed a duty of care to the plaintiff, (b) the defendant breached that duty, (c) the defendant's breach caused the plaintiff's injury, and (d) the plaintiff suffered a legally recognizable injury. With respect to the duty of care, a business owner has a duty to use reasonable care to protect business invitees. This duty includes an obligation to discover and correct or warn of unreasonably dangerous conditions that the owner of the premises should reasonably foresee might endanger an invitee. Some risks are so obvious that an owner need not warn of them. But even if a risk is obvious, a business owner may not be excused from the duty to protect the business's customers from foreseeable harm.

Because Lucario was the Weatherford's business invitee, the hotel owed her a duty of reasonable care to make its premises safe for her use. The balcony ran nearly the entire width of the window in Lucario's room. She could have reasonably believed that the window was a means of access to the balcony. The window/balcony configuration was dangerous, however, because the window opened wide enough for an adult to climb out, but the twelve-inch gap between one side of the window and the balcony was unprotected. This unprotected gap opened to a drop of more than three stories to a concrete surface below.

Should the hotel have anticipated the potential harm to a guest who opened the window in Room 59 and attempted to access the balcony? The hotel encouraged guests to "step out onto the balcony" to smoke. The dangerous window/ balcony configuration could have been remedied at a minimal cost. These circumstances could be perceived as creating an "unreasonably dangerous" condition. And it could be concluded that the hotel created or knew of the condition and failed to take reasonable steps to warn of it or correct it. Of course, the Weatherford might argue that the window/ balcony configuration was so obvious that the hotel was not liable for Lucario's fall.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the court concluded that the Weatherford did not breach its duty of care to Lucario. On McMurtry's appeal, a state intermediate appellate court held that this conclusion was in error, vacated the lower court's judgment in favor of the hotel on this issue, and remanded the case.

6–4. Sample Answer—Product Liability.

Here, the accident was caused by Jett's inattention, not by the texting device in the cab of his truck. In a product-liability case based on a design defect, the plaintiff has to prove that the product was defective at the time it left the hands of the seller or lessor. The plaintiff must also show that this defective condition made it "unreasonably dangerous" to the user or consumer. If the product was delivered in a safe condition and subsequent mishandling made it harmful to the user, the seller or lessor normally is not liable. To successfully assert a design defect, a plaintiff has to show that a reasonable alternative design was available and that the defendant failed to use it.

The plaintiffs could contend that the defendant manufacturer of the texting device owed them a duty of care because injuries to vehicle drivers and passengers, and others on the roads, were reasonably foreseeable due to the product's design that (1) required the driver to divert his eyes from the road to view an incoming text from the dispatcher, and (2) permitted the receipt of texts while the vehicle was moving. But manufacturers are not required to design a product incapable of distracting a driver. The duty owed by a manufacturer to the user or consumer of a product does not require guarding against hazards that are commonly known or obvious or protecting against injuries that result from a user's careless conduct. That is what happened here.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the court reached the same conclusion, based on the reasoning stated above, and an intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment.

7–5. Sample Answer—Patents.

One ground on which the denial of Raymond Gianelli's patent application in this problem could be reversed on appeal is that the design of his "Rowing Machine" is not obvious in light of the design of the "Chest Press Apparatus for Exercising Regions of the Upper Body."

To obtain a patent, an applicant must demonstrate to the satisfaction of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (PTO) that the invention, discovery, process, or design is novel, useful, and not obvious in light of current technology. In this problem, the PTO denied Gianelli's application for a patent for his "Rowing Machine"—an exercise machine on which a user pulls on handles to perform a rowing motion against a selected resistance to strengthen the back muscles. The PTO considered the device obvious in light of a patented "Chest Press Apparatus for Exercising Regions of the Upper Body"—a chest press exercise machine on which a user pushes on handles to overcome a selected resistance. But it can be easily argued that it is not obvious to modify a machine with handles designed to be pushed into one with handles designed to be pulled. In fact, anyone who has used exercise machines knows that a way to cause injury is to use a machine in a manner not intended by the manufacturer.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit reversed the PTO's denial of Gianelli's application for a patent based on the reasoning stated above.

8–5. Sample Answer—Social Media.

As stated in the text, law enforcement can use social media to detect and prosecute suspected criminals. But there must be an authenticated connection between the suspects and the posts. To make this connection, law enforcement officials can present the testimony or certification of authoritative representatives of the social media site or other experts. The posts can be traced from the pages on which they are displayed and the accounts of the "owners" of the pages to the posters through Internet Protocol (IP) addresses. An IP address can reveal the e-mail address, and even the mailing address, of an otherwise anonymous poster.

The custodians of Facebook, for example, can verify Facebook pages and posts because they maintain those items as business records in the course of regularly conducted business activities. From those sources, the prosecution in Hassan's case could have tracked the IP address to discover his identity.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, on Hassan's appeal of his conviction, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed.

9–3. Sample Answer—White-Collar Crime.

Yes, the acts committed by Matthew Simpson and the others constituted wire and mail fraud. Federal law makes it a crime to devise any scheme that uses the U.S. mail, commercial carriers (such as FedEx or UPS), or wire (such as telegraph, telephone, television, the Internet, or e-mail) with the intent to defraud the public.

Here, as stated in the facts, Simpson and his cohorts created and operated a series of corporate entities to defraud telecommunications companies, creditors, credit reporting agencies, and others. Through these entities, Simpson and the others used routing codes and spoofing services to make long distance calls appear to be local. They stole other firms' network capacity and diverted payments to themselves. They leased goods and services without paying for them. And they assumed false identities, addresses, and credit histories, and issued false bills, invoices, financial statements, and credit references, in order to hide their association with their entities and with each other. Through the use of this "scheme," the perpetrators defrauded telecommunications companies and other members of the public in order to gain goods and services for themselves. They used wire services—the Internet and, presumably, phones and other qualifying services—to further the scheme.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, a federal district court convicted Simpson of participating in a wire and mail fraud conspiracy (and other crimes). On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the conviction.

10–5. Sample Answer—Implied Contracts.

Yes, Allstate was liable under the homeowner's policy. A contract that is implied from the conduct of the parties. This type of contract differs from an express contract in that the conduct of the parties, rather than their words, creates and defines the terms of the contract. For an implied contract to exist, a party must furnish a service or property (which includes money), the party must expect to receive something in return for that property or service, and the other party must know or should know of that expectation and had a chance to reject the property or service but did not. Of course, a contract may be a mix of express and implied terms.

In this problem, the homeowner's policy was a mix of express and implied terms. As for the elements showing the existence of the implied terms, the payments for the premiums on the policy continued after Ralph's death, but the amounts were paid from Douglas's account. Undoubtedly, Douglas expected to receive coverage under the policy in return for his payments. The insurer Allstate must have known that Douglas expected the coverage—insurance has long been Allstate's business, and the company obviously understands the relationship between the payments of premiums and the expectation of insurance coverage. And Allstate had the opportunity to cancel the homeowner's policy—as it had with Ralph's auto insurance, which was canceled—but did not terminate it.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the court issued a judgment in Allstate's favor on the implied contract issue. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed this judgment—"A reasonable fact-finder could determine that [Allstate's] continuation of the premium payments constituted a contract implied in fact with Douglas."

11–6. Sample Answer—Requirement of the Offer.

No, TCP is not correct—the bonus plan was not too indefinite to be an offer. One of the requirements for an effective offer is that its terms must be reasonably definite. This enables a court to determine whether a breach has occurred and award an appropriate remedy. Generally, the offer's terms include an identification of the parties and the object or subject of the contract, the consideration to be paid, and the time of performance.

In this problem, TCP provided its employees, including Bahr, with the details of a bonus plan. A district sales manager such as Bahr who achieved 100 percent year-over-year sales growth and a 42 percent gross margin would earn 200 percent of his or her base salary. TCP added that it retained absolute discretion to modify the plan. Bahr exceeded the goal and expected a bonus commensurate with her performance. TCP paid her less than half what its plan promised, however. In the ensuing litigation, TCP claimed that the bonus plan was too indefinite to constitute an offer, but this was not, in fact, the case. The plan provided clear criteria to determine an employee's eligibility for a certain amount within a specific time. A court asked to apply the plan would have little or no doubt as to the amount an employee would be entitled to. The term that reserved discretion to TCP to modify the plan did not sufficiently undercut the clarity of the offer to prevent the formation of a contract.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the trial court concluded that the reservation of discretion to revoke a plan makes an offer too indefinite and issued a judgment in TCP's favor. A state intermediate appellate court reversed this judgment, holding that TCP's plan was a sufficiently definite offer.

12–4. Sample Answer—Agreements That Lack Consideration.

Yes, there was consideration to support the Telephone Deal. Consideration can consist of a promise, a performance, or a forbearance (refraining from an action that one has a legal right to undertake).

In this problem, Mark Garnett, an owner of Arkansas-Missouri Forest Products, LLC (Ark-Mo), and Stuart Lerner, an owner of Blue Chip Manufacturing (BCM), agreed to engage in wood-pallet enterprises together, with Ark-Mo to have a 30 percent ownership interest in their future projects. When Lerner formed Blue Chip Recycling, LLC (BCR), to manage a pallet repair facility in California, however, he allocated only a 5 percent interest to Ark-Mo. Garnett objected. In a "Telephone Deal," Lerner promised that Ark-Mo would receive a 30 percent interest in their future projects in the Midwest. Garnett then agreed to forego an ownership interest in BCR.

Acting on Ark-Mo's behalf, Garnett could have accepted the 5 percent allocation in BCR, but he refrained from doing so. Instead, he accepted Lerner's promise of a 30 percent share in their future projects in the Midwest and made no more demands regarding BCR. In other words, Garnett gave up the opportunity to have an ownership interest in BCR in exchange for Lerner's agreement that Ark-Mo would have a 30 percent ownership interest in certain future projects.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Ark-Mo filed a suit in a Missouri state court against Lerner, alleging breach of contract. The court issued a judgment in Lerner's favor. A state intermediate appellate court reversed, in part on the reasoning stated here. "Valid legal consideration supported the Telephone Deal."

13–5. Sample Answer—Fraudulent Misrepresentation.

Yes, the facts in this problem evidence fraud. There are three elements to fraud: (1) the misrepresentation of a material fact, (2) an intent to deceive, and (3) an innocent party's justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation. To collect damages, the innocent party must suffer an injury.

Here, Pervis represented to Pauley that no further commission would be paid by Osbrink. This representation was false—despite Pervis's statement to the contrary, Osbrink continued to send payments to Pervis. Pervis knew the representation was false, as shown by the fact that she made it more than once during the time that she was continuing to receive payments from Osbrink. Each time Pauley asked about commissions, Pervis replied that she was not receiving any. Pauley's reliance on her business associate's statements was justified and reasonable. And for the purpose of recovering damages, Pauley suffered an injury in the amount of her share of the commissions that Pervis received as a result of the fraud.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Pauley filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Pervis, who filed for bankruptcy in a federal bankruptcy court to stay the state action. The federal court held Pervis liable on the ground of fraud for the amount of the commissions that were not paid to Pauley and denied Pervis a discharge of the debt.

14–5. Sample Answer—Conditions of Performance.

The requirement that the contractor obtain an engineer's certificate of final completion before the final payment will be made is a condition precedent. In most contracts, promises of performance are not expressly conditioned—they are absolute and must be performed to avoid a breach of the contract. In some situations, however, performance is contingent on the occurrence of a certain event. If the condition is not satisfied, the obligations of the parties are discharged. A condition that must be fulfilled before a party's performance can be required is a condition precedent.

In this problem, H&J Ditching was hired to excavate and grade land for a residential construction project. Cornerstone Community Bank financed the project. As the work progressed, H&J received payments totaling 90 percent of the price on its contract. But the last payment was not forthcoming when H&J believed it was due. The contractor filed a suit in a Tennessee state court against the bank to recover the final payment. The bank responded that H&J did not receive the payment because it had failed to obtain an engineer's certificate of final completion, a condition under its contract. H&J argued that it had completed all the work it contracted to do.

H&J is not entitled to the final payment on the contract because it did not comply with the condition to obtain the engineer's certificate. This condition preceded the bank's obligation under the contract to make the final payment. Even assuming that H&J "completed all the work it contracted to do," the final payment need not be made without the certificate.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the trial court issued a judgment in the bank's favor. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed. "No certificate of substantial completion was ever issued, a condition precedent to final payment."

15–5. Sample Answer—Limitation-of-Liability Clauses.

Yes, the limitation-of-liability agreement that Eriksson signed is likely to be enforced in her parents' suit against Nunnink, their daughter's riding coach. And this would likely result in a judgment against them unless they can establish "direct, willful and wanton negligence" on Nunnink's part. A limitation-of-liability clause affects the availability of certain remedies. Under basic contract principles, to be enforceable, these clauses must be clear and unambiguous.

In this problem, Eriksson, a young horseback-riding competitor, signed an agreement that released Nunnink from all liability except for damages caused by Nunnink's "direct, willful and wanton negligence." During an event, Eriksson's horse struck a hurdle, causing her to fall from the horse. The horse fell on her, resulting in her death. Her parents filed a suit against Nunnink for wrongful death. The limitation-of-liability clause signed by Eriksson, however, was straightforward, clear, and unambiguous, and therefore enforceable. Nunnink would be liable only if Eriksson's death was caused by Nunnink's gross negligence. The facts do not state that Eriksson's parents proved that Nunnink was grossly negligent.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the trial court issued a judgment in Nunnink's favor. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment on the basis explained here.

16–5. Sample Answer—Goods and Services Combined.

A court will apply common law principles to a dispute over a contract that involves both goods and services when the court finds the services to be the dominant feature of the agreement. In contrast, a court will rule that the UCC should be applied when it finds the goods to be the dominant aspect of the deal. In either situation, the applicable law covers both the goods and services parts of the contract.

In this problem, because the trial court applied common law contract principles to rule in National's favor on both parties' claims, the court must have concluded that the services part of the contract was the dominant aspect.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, a state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's ruling in National's favor. The appellate court recognized that the contract was a hybrid involving goods and services and reasoned that the lower court must have found the services portion of the agreement to be the dominant factor. But the parties did not provide a trial transcript or a copy of the contract, so the appellate court could only affirm the lower court's order.

17–6. Sample Answer—Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee.

No, at this point the Morrises are not entitled to revoke their acceptance of the cabinets that IO delivered. Under the UCC, acceptance of a lot or a commercial unit can be revoked if a nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the lot or unit and acceptance was based on the reasonable assumption that the nonconformity would be cured, and it has not been cured within a reasonable period of time. One of the corollaries to this rule is, of course, that the seller must be given a reasonable time within which to effect a cure.

Here, the Morrises contracted with IO to rebuild the kitchen in their home on the Gulf coast of Mississippi after it was extensively damaged in a hurricane. As part of the deal, IO delivered new cabinets. Some defects were apparent, and as installation progressed, others emerged. IO ordered replacement parts to cure the defects and later offered to remove the cabinets and refund the price. The Morrises asked to be reimbursed for the installation fee as well. IO refused this request, but at all times, the seller emphasized that it was willing to fulfill its contractual obligations. The buyers then attempted to revoke their acceptance of the cabinets—before the replacement parts arrived and without attempting to negotiate any other accommodation.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the Morrises filed a suit in a Mississippi state court against IO. The court dismissed the complaint and entered a judgment in the defendant's favor. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed. "The Morrises were not entitled to recovery because they revoked acceptance of the cabinets before giving IO a reasonable opportunity to cure the defects."

18–6. Sample Answer—Signature Liability.

The parties who can be held liable for the loss on the unpaid checks in the Albarran case are R. Cleaning Impact, Inc. (RCI), and its owners, Guillermo, Guadalupe, Ruben, and Rolando Albarran.

Generally, when an indorsement is forged or unauthorized, the burden of loss falls on the first party to take the instrument with the forged or unauthorized indorsement. But this rule has an important exception that causes the loss to fall on the drawer of the check rather than the first party to take it—the fictitious payee rule. This rule applies when a person causes an instrument to be issued to a payee (fictitious or real) who will have no interest in it. In that situation, the payee's indorsement is not treated as a forgery, and an innocent holder can hold the maker or drawer liable on the instrument.

In this problem, Amba, a check-cashing service, and the Albarrans and their sons, owners of a cleaning company, established a regular check-cashing relationship between their respective businesses. The Albarrans often delivered a stack of their employees' paychecks for cashing through Amba. Later, the Albarrans' bank began refusing payment on some of the checks. Amba learned that the unpaid items were payable to fictitious payees with fictitious addresses, or for amounts more than the actual employees' pay. Under normal circumstances, Amba would be most likely to suffer the loss. But under the fictitious payee rule, RCI or its owners, as the drawers of the checks, could be held liable. Because RCI is insolvent, and its accounts are closed, and Guillermo and Guadalupe filed for bankruptcy protection, the parties most likely to be assessed with liability are Ruben and Rolando.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Amba filed a suit in a Maryland state court against the Albarrans to recover the amount of the unpaid checks. The defendants did not respond. The court entered a default judgment against them. On the defendants' later motion, the court vacated the award of damages with respect to the parents, because they had filed for bankruptcy, but not the sons, who remained liable. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed.

19–5. Sample Answer—Import Controls.

Yes, an antidumping duty can be assessed retrospectively (retroactively). But it does not seem likely that such a duty should be assessed here.

In this problem, the Wind Tower Trade Coalition (an association of domestic manufacturers of utility-scale wind towers) filed a suit in the U.S. Court of International Trade against the U.S. Department of Commerce. Wind Tower challenged the Commerce Department's decision to impose only prospective antidumping duties on imports of utility-scale wind towers from China and Vietnam. The Commerce Department had found that the domestic industry had not suffered any "material injury" or "threat of material injury" and that it would be protected by a prospective assessment. Because the domestic industry had not suffered discernible injury, any retrospective duties collected would not be payable to members of the industry. Thus, it does not seem likely that retroactive duties should be imposed.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the court denied the plaintiff's request for an injunction. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed the denial, holding that the lower court acted within its discretion in determining that retrospective duties were not appropriate.

20–4. Sample Answer—Consumer Fund Transfers.

Yes, the bank's refusal to reimburse Patterson more than $677.46 was justified. Under the Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA), if a customer's debit card is lost or stolen and used without her or his permission, the customer does not have to pay more than $50. But for this limit to apply, the customer must notify the bank of the loss or theft within two days of learning about it. Otherwise, the liability increases to $500. The customer may be liable for more than $500 if the unauthorized use is not reported within sixty days after it appears on the customer's statement.

In this problem, Stephen Patterson held an account with SunTrust Bank. He was briefly involved in a romantic relationship with Juanita Wehrman, who stole his debit card and used it for sixteen months (well beyond the length of their relationship), spending more than $30,000. When Patterson learned what was happening, he closed his account. But, of course, sixteen months is much more than sixty days, and the bank refused to reimburse him more than $677.46. This was the amount of unauthorized transactions that occurred within sixty days of the transmittal of the bank statement that revealed the first unauthorized transaction.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Patterson filed suit in a Tennessee state court against the bank to recover the rest of the spent funds. The court upheld the bank's refusal, and a state intermediate appellate court affirmed.

21–5. Sample Answer—Perfection of a Security Interest.

Yes, the description in PHI's financing statement was sufficient to perfect the creditor's security interest in the SURE payment. A financing statement must describe the collateral in which a secured party has a security interest in order to provide public notice of the fact that certain property of the debtor is subject to a security interest. The UCC permits broad, general descriptions in a financing statement, such as "all assets."

In this problem, G&K Farms was insured under the federal Supplemental Revenue Assistance Payments Program (SURE), which provides financial assistance for crop losses caused by natural disasters. PHI loaned G&K $6.6 million and filed a financing statement that described the collateral as G&K's interest in "Government Payments." The statement did not refer specifically to the farm's crops. G&K defaulted on the loan. When G&K received a SURE payment for crop losses and transferred some of the funds to its law firm, Johnston Law Office, PHI sought to recover the funds as a partial payment on its loan. Johnston argued that PHI did not have a perfected security interest in the SURE payment because PHI's financing statement did not identify the farm's crops.

Johnston's argument is faulty because the debtor's crops were not the collateral at issue. The government's SURE payment was the disputed collateral, and PHI's financing statement sufficiently described it with the general reference to "Government Payments." PHI's security interest was perfected.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, PHI filed its suit against Johnston in a North Dakota state court, which entered a judgment in the creditor's favor. The North Dakota Supreme Court affirmed on the issue highlighted in this problem based on the reasoning stated here.

22–4. Sample Answer—Discharge.

No, Michael is not entitled to a discharge of the debt to Dianne. The debt, comprising unpaid alimony, child support, and investment funds, qualifies as an exception to discharge. As far as a debtor is concerned, the primary purpose of a liquidation proceeding is to obtain a fresh start through a discharge of debts. But certain debts are not dischargeable in bankruptcy. These debts include domestic-support obligations and property settlements provided for in a divorce decree and claims based on willful or malicious conduct by the debtor toward another.

In this problem, on Michael and Dianne's divorce, a court ordered Michael to pay Dianne alimony and child support, as well as half of the $184,000 in their investment accounts. Instead of complying with the order, Michael withdrew half of the investment funds and spent them on himself. Meanwhile, the court repeatedly held him in contempt for failing to pay Dianne alimony, child support, and half of the investment funds. These items are nondischargeable because they are domestic-support obligations and part of the property settlement provided for in the parties' divorce decree. The unpaid investment funds also constitute a claim based on willful and malicious conduct. Michael deliberately defied multiple contempt orders, leaving Dianne uncompensated and thereby inflicting harm on her.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the court concluded that Michael's conduct was willful and malicious and that the debt to Dianne listed in the petition's schedule was therefore nondischargeable. On Michael's appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed.

23–5. Sample Answer—Determining Employee Status.

No, Cox is not liable to Cayer for the injuries or damages that she sustained in the accident with Ovalles. Generally, an employer is not liable for physical harm caused to a third person by the negligent act of an independent contractor in the performance of a contract. This is because the employer does not have the right to control the details of the performance. In determining whether a worker has the status of an independent contractor, how much control the employer can exercise over the details of the work is the most important factor weighed by the courts.

In this problem, Ovalles worked as a cable installer for Cox under an agreement with M&M. The agreement disavowed any employer-employee relationship between Cox and M&M's installers. Ovalles was required to designate his affiliation with Cox on his van, clothing, and an I.D. badge. But Cox had minimal contact with Ovalles and limited power to control the manner in which he performed his work. Cox supplied cable wire and other equipment, but these items were delivered to M&M, not Ovalles. These facts indicate that Ovalles was an independent contractor, not an employee. Thus, Cox was not liable to Cayer for the harm caused to her by Ovalles when his van rear-ended her car.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the court issued a judgment in Cox's favor. The Rhode Island Supreme Court affirmed, applying the principles stated above to arrive at the same conclusion.

24–5. Sample Answer—Unemployment Compensation.

Yes, Ramirez qualifies for unemployment compensation. Generally, to be eligible for unemployment compensation, a worker must be willing and able to work. Workers who have been fired for misconduct or who have voluntarily left their jobs are not eligible for benefits. In the facts of this problem, the applicable state statute disqualifies an employee from receiving benefits if he or she voluntarily leaves work without "good cause."

The issue is whether Ramirez left her job for "good cause." When her father in the Dominican Republic had a stroke, she asked her employer for time off to be with him. Her employer refused the request. But Ramirez left to be with her father and called to inform her employer. It seems likely that this family emergency would constitute "good cause," and Ramirez's call and return to work after her father's death indicated that she did not disregard her employer's interests.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the state of Florida denied Ramirez unemployment compensation. On Ramirez's appeal, a state intermediate appellate court reversed based on the reasoning stated above.

25–6. Sample Answer—Sexual Harassment.

Newton's best defense to Blanton's assertion of liability is the "Ellerth/Faragher affirmative defense." To establish this defense, an employer must show that it has taken reasonable care to prevent and promptly correct any sexually harassing behavior and that the plaintiff unreasonably failed to take advantage of any opportunity provided by the employer to avoid the harm.

In this problem, Blanton was subjected to sexual harassment by the general manager at their place of employment, a Pizza Hut restaurant operated by Newton. Blanton alerted low-level supervisors about the harassment, but they, like Blanton, were subordinate to the general manager and had no authority over her. Newton had a clear, straightforward antidiscrimination policy and complaint procedure, which provided that an employee should complain to the harasser's supervisor in such a situation. Once Blanton finally complained to a manager with authority over the general manager, Newton promptly and effectively responded to Blanton's complaint. His delay in reporting the harassment to the appropriate authority can be construed as an unreasonable failure to take advantage of the opportunity provided by the employer to avoid the harm.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Blanton filed suit against Newton seeking to hold it liable for the general manager's actions. A jury found that the plaintiff had been harassed as he claimed, but it also found that the defendant had proved the Ellerth/Faragher affirmative defense. The court issued a judgment in the employer's favor, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed.

26–4. Sample Answer—Quality Control.

Yes, Liberty can be held liable for the statements in its franchisees' ads. The validity of a provision permitting the franchisor to establish and enforce certain quality standards is unquestioned. The franchisor has a legitimate interest in maintaining the quality of the product or service to protect its name and reputation. If a franchisor exercises too much control over the operations of its franchisees, however, the franchisor risks potential liability. A franchisor may occasionally be held liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior for the tortious acts of a franchisee or the franchisees' employees.

In this problem, Liberty's agreement with its franchisees reserved the right to control their ads. In operations manuals, Liberty provided its franchisees with step-by-step instructions, directions, and limitations regarding their ads and retained the right to unilaterally modify the steps at any time. This seems to give the franchisor a great deal of control over its franchisees' marketing, which under the principles stated above, points to the franchisor's liability for the franchisees' misleading or deceptive ads.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the trial court issued a judgment in California's favor. Liberty appealed. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed. "Liberty retained the right to control, and in fact did seek to control, its franchisees' advertising and other marketing activities beyond that necessary to protect its marks and goodwill."

27–4. Sample Answer—Partnerships.

Yes, Sacco is entitled to 50 percent of the profits of Pierce Paxton Collections. The requirements for establishing a partnership are (1) a sharing of profits and losses, (2) a joint ownership of the business, and (3) an equal right to be involved in the management of the business.

The effort and time that Sacco expended in the business constituted a sharing of losses. His proprietary interest in the assets of the partnership consisted of his share of the profits, which he expressly left in the business to "grow the company" and "build sweat equity" for the future. He was involved in every aspect of the business. Although he was not paid a salary, he was reimbursed for business expenses charged to his personal credit card, which Paxton also used. These facts arguably meet the requirements for establishing a partnership.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Sacco filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Paxton, and the court awarded Sacco 50 percent of the profits. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed based generally on the reasoning stated above.

28–4. Sample Answer—LLC Operation.

No. One Bluewater member could not unilaterally "fire" another member without providing a reason. Part of the attractiveness of an LLC as a form of business enterprise is its flexibility. The members can decide how to operate the business through an operating agreement. For example, the agreement can set forth procedures for choosing or removing members or managers.

Here, the Bluewater operating agreement provided for a "super majority" vote to remove a member under circumstances that would jeopardize the firm's contractor status. Thus, one Bluewater member could not unilaterally "fire" another member without providing a reason. In fact, a majority of the members could not terminate the other's interest in the firm without providing a reason. Moreover, the only acceptable reason would be a circumstance that undercut the firm's status as a contractor.

The flexibility of the LLC business form relates to its framework, not to its members' capacity to violate its operating agreement. In the actual case on which this problem is based, Smith attempted to "fire" Williford without providing a reason. In Williford's suit, the court issued a judgment in his favor.

29–4. Sample Answer—Piercing the Corporate Veil.

Yes, there are sufficient grounds in the facts of this problem to support piercing the corporate veil and holding Kappeler personally liable to Snapp. First, in a case in which a plaintiff seeks to pierce a corporate veil, fraud or some other injustice must have taken place. In that situation, a court will consider whether the following factors were present: (1) a party was tricked or misled into dealing with the corporation rather than the individual; (2) the corporation had insufficient capital to meet its prospective debts or other potential liabilities; (3) corporate formalities, such as holding required corporate meetings, were not followed; and (4) personal and corporate interests were commingled.

In this problem, the amount that Snapp ultimately paid the builder exceeded the original estimate by nearly $1 million—and the project was still unfinished. Kappeler could not provide an accounting for the Snapp project— he could not explain double and triple charges nor whether the amount that Snapp paid had actually been spent on the project. These facts support a conclusion of fraud, and they also suggest that Kappeler may have tricked or misled Snapp into dealing with Castlebrook, the corporation, rather than with Kappeler as an individual. Castlebrook had issued no shares of stock, which points to insufficient capitalization. The minutes of the corporate meetings "all looked exactly the same," indicating that, in fact, the required corporate meetings had not been held. Finally, Kappeler had commingled personal and corporate funds.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Snapp filed suit against the builder seeking to pierce the corporate veil. The court did so and held Kappeler personally liable. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed.

30–4. Sample Answer—Disclosure under SEC Rule 10b-5.

Yes. Even if Goldman did not affirmatively misrepresent any facts about the CDOs, Dodona can recover if Goldman failed to disclose material facts. An omission is regarded as material if it is significant enough that it would have affected an investor's decision concerning the securities. Here, Dodona might recover by showing that Goldman did not fully disclose the risks of investing in the CDOs. Goldman may have misled Dodona by providing only boilerplate statements about investments that it knew were particularly risky.

31–4. Sample Answer—Price Discrimination.

Spa Steel satisfies most of the requirements for a price discrimination claim under Section 2 of the Clayton Act. Dayton Superior is engaged in interstate commerce, and it sells goods of like grade and quality to at least three purchasers. Moreover, Spa Steel can show that, because it sells Dayton Superior's products at a higher price, it lost business and thus suffered an injury. To recover, however, Spa Steel will also need to prove that Dayton Superior charged Spa Steel's competitors a lower price for the same product. Spa Steel cannot recover if its prices were higher for reasons related to its own business, such as having higher overhead or seeking a larger profit.

32–5. Sample Answer—Deceptive Advertising.

Yes, Ross can be held personally liable for a violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act's prohibition of deceptive acts or practices. Generally, deceptive advertising occurs if a reasonable consumer would be misled by the advertising claim. Advertising that appears to be based on factual evidence but that in fact cannot be supported will be deemed deceptive. An individual can be held personally liable under the act if the person (1) participated directly in the deceptive practices or had the authority to control them and (2) had or should have had knowledge of them.

In this problem, the facts indicate that IMI's ads were deceptive. Consumers were misled by the ads, which appeared to be based on factual evidence but were not supportable— the ads claimed that a scan of the consumers' computers had detected dangerous files, such as viruses, when in fact no scans were conducted. The issue is whether Ross can be held individually liable for these violations. She was an IMI co-founder and vice president, reviewed and edited the ads, and was aware of the many complaints about them. Thus, under the Federal Trade Commission Act, Ross met the standard for personal liability—she knew of the deceptive practices, she had the authority to control them, and she directly participated in them.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, the Federal Trade Commission filed suit against Ross, and a federal district court held her jointly and severally liable. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed.

33–6. Sample Answer—Potential Liability to Third Parties.

KPMG is potentially liable to the hedge funds' partners under the Restatement (Second) of Torts. Under Section 552 of the Restatement, an auditor owes a duty to "persons for whose benefit and guidance the accountant intends to supply … information."

In this case, KPMG prepared annual reports on the hedge funds and addressed them to the funds' "Partners." Additionally, KPMG knew who the partners were because it prepared individual tax forms for them each year. Thus, KPMG's annual reports were for the partners' benefit and guidance. The partners relied on the reports, including their representations that they complied with generally accepted accounting principles.

As a result, they lost millions of dollars, which exposes KPMG to possible liability under Section 552.

34–7. Sample Answer—Duties of the Bailee.

KZY owed Mrs. Ressler's a duty to exercise reasonable care. From an ethical perspective, KZY appears to have met this standard.

A bailee must exercise reasonable care in preserving bailed property. What constitutes reasonable care depends on the nature and circumstances of the bailment. A bailment for the mutual benefit of the bailee and the bailor involves compensation. The bailee must exercise ordinary care—the care that a reasonably careful person would use under the circumstances. A bailee who fails to exercise reasonable care will be liable for ordinary negligence. If bailed property is returned damaged, a bailee will be presumed to have been negligent. The bailee is excused, however, if the property was damaged through no fault of the bailee.

In this problem, KZY transported a load of Mrs. Ressler's Food Products. When KZY delivered the cargo, the customer rejected it because its temperature was higher than expected, making it unsafe. In Mrs. Ressler's suit against KZY, the defendant asserted that the temperature in its trailer was proper and that Mrs. Ressler's delivered a "hot" product for transport. KZY provided temperature readings from the refrigerated unit during the time in question. This would be a complete defense to a claim that the bailee was negligent in failing to maintain a proper temperature during the transport.

KZY's ethical duty was the same as the bailee's legal duty of care. In handling Mrs. Ressler's cargo, KZY was ethically bound to exercise the care that a reasonably careful person would use under the circumstances. If the temperature readings from the refrigerated unit would absolve the bailee from liability for negligence, the proof would also refute any charge that KZY had acted unethically.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, KZY failed to file a timely response to Mrs. Ressler's suit, and the court entered a default judgment against the defendant. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit reversed the lower court's decision. "KZY alleged a prima facie meritorious defense to the action" and "there was no direct evidence that KZY acted in bad faith."

35–6. Sample Answer—Joint Tenancies.

Under the law of the Cayman Islands, and according to Arthur's will, the three disputed Cayman properties became Diana's sole property when Arthur died. In a joint tenancy, each of two or more persons owns an undivided interest in the property. A deceased joint tenant's interest passes to the surviving joint tenant or tenants. The right of a surviving joint tenant to inherit a deceased joint tenant's ownership interest is referred to as a right of survivorship.

In this problem, Arthur and Diana owned three properties in the Cayman Islands in a joint tenancy. (For this purpose, Cayman law is the same as U.S. law.) When the couple divorced, the decree did not change the tenancy. Later, Arthur died. His will provided that any property he held in joint tenancy "will pass to the survivor, and I instruct my Personal Representative to make no claim thereto." Despite this provision, his brother Curtis, personal representative of his estate, asserted that Arthur's interest in the properties were part of the estate. Diana said that the properties were entirely hers. Clearly, Diana is correct. Under the applicable principles of ownership of property by joint tenancy, as the sole surviving joint tenant, Arthur's interest in the properties passed to her. And under the terms of Arthur's will, his interest passed to her (and Curtis was "to make no claim thereto.")

A joint tenant can transfer any personal rights to the property without the consent of the other joint tenants. The new owner becomes a tenant in common, however, not a joint tenant. Or a joint tenant's interest can be levied against to satisfy the tenant's judgment creditors. In either case, the joint tenancy terminates, and the remaining owners hold the property as tenants in common. Neither of these situations occurred in the facts of this problem, however.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Curtis asked the Florida state court that issued the couple's divorce to declare that Arthur's interest in the Cayman properties were part of his estate. The court ruled in the estate's favor and ordered Diana to sell the properties or buy Arthur's interest in them. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the order.

36–6. Sample Answer—Wills.

No, the document that Walker signed was not a valid will. A will is a person's final declaration of how his or her property is to be disposed of after death. It is a formal instrument that must follow exactly the requirements of state law. These formalities are intended to help prevent fraud. Unless they are followed, the will is void. Generally, a will must be attested to by two or three witnesses in a specified manner. The testator typically must either sign the will in the witnesses' presence or acknowledge that the signature on the document is his or hers. In some states, at the signing, the testator must declare that the document is his or her will.

Here, Andrew told Nora that he wished to change the disposition of his property provided for in a prior will by devising half of it to her in a new will. She noted his wish and took her notes to the office of attorney Meagher to have the document drafted. Meagher did not see Nora's notes, he did not talk to Walker, no one from his office was present at the signing of the document, and, when Walker signed it, he did not declare that it was his will, as required by state law. These facts indicate that formalities required by state law for the execution of a will were not followed strictly, undercutting the validity of the document as a will.

In the actual case on which this problem is based, Nora submitted this document to a New York state court as Walker's will. His children objected. The court denied the admission of the will to probate. "In light of the uncertainty surrounding the [will's] drafting and execution," a state intermediate appellate court affirmed.
