CENGAGE

13th EDITION

BUSINESS LAW TODAY

STANDARD EDITION
TEXT & SUMMARIZED CASES

Roger LeRoy Miller

BUSINESS LAW TODAY SERIES

13th EDITION

BUSINESS LAW TODAY

STANDARD EDITION
TEXT & SUMMARIZED CASES

Roger LeRoy Miller
Institute for University Studies
Arlington, Texas

CENGAGE

Australia • Brazil • Canada • Mexico • Singapore • United Kingdom • United States

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

This is an electronic version of the print textbook. Due to electronic rights restrictions, some third party content may be suppressed. Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. The publisher reserves the right to remove content from this title at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it. For valuable information on pricing, previous editions, changes to current editions, and alternate formats, please visit www.cengage.com/highered to search by ISBN#, author, title, or keyword for materials in your areas of interest.

Important Notice: Media content referenced within the product description or the product text may not be available in the eBook version.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

CENGAGE

Business Law Today, Standard Edition, Text & Summarized Cases* 13th Edition
Roger LeRoy Miller

SVP, Higher Education & Skills Product: Erin Joyner

VP, Higher Education & Skills Product: Michael Schenk

Product Director: Joe Sabatino

Associate Product Manager: Abbie Schultheis

Senior Content Manager: Julia Chase

Cengage Subject Matter Expert: Lisa Elliott

Learning Designers: Cazzie Reyes and Liz Harnage

Digital Delivery Lead: Steven McMillian

Product Assistant: Nick Perez

Marketing Director: Kristen Hurd

Marketing Manager: Andrew Stock

Intellectual Property Analyst: Ashley Maynard

Intellectual Property Project Manager: Nick Barrows

Production Service: SPi Global

Designer: Erin Griffin

Cover Image Credits: Kolonko/ShutterStock.com

Interior Image Credits: iStockPhoto.com/metamorworks; Alexander Supertramp/ShutterStock.com; Kolonko/ShutterStock.com; silvae/Shutterstock.com; Orhan Cam/Shutterstock.com; Kozlik/Shutterstock.com; Hekla/Shutterstock.com; Kamil Fazrin Rauf/Shutterstock.com; Artem Samokhvalov/Shutterstock.com; Yuriy Kulik/Shutterstock.com; winui/Shutterstock.com; Creative Images/Shutterstock.com; iDEARReplay/Shutterstock.com; Gary Lanfer/Shutterstock.com; Rawpixel.com/Shutterstock.com

© 2022, 2020 Cengage Learning, Inc.

WCN: 02-300

Unless otherwise noted, all content is © Cengage.

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. No part of this work covered by the copyright herein may be reproduced or distributed in any form or by any means, except as permitted by U.S. copyright law, without the prior written permission of the copyright owner.

For product information and technology assistance, contact us at Cengage Customer & Sales Support, 1-800-354-9706 or support.cengage.com.

For permission to use material from this text or product, submit all requests online at www.cengage.com/permissions.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2020949409

Soft-cover Edition ISBN: 978-0-357-63485-1
Loose-leaf Edition ISBN: 978-0-357-63486-8

Cengage
200 Pier 4 Boulevard
Boston, MA 02210
USA

Cengage is a leading provider of customized learning solutions with employees residing in nearly 40 different countries and sales in more than 125 countries around the world. Find your local representative at www.cengage.com.

To learn more about Cengage platforms and services, register or access your online learning solution, or purchase materials for your course, visit www.cengage.com.

Printed in the United States of America
Print Number: 01 Print Year: 2021

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Contents in Brief

Unit 1 The Legal Environment of Business 1

1 Law and Legal Reasoning 2
2 Constitutional Law 31
3 Ethics in Business 56
4 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution 85
5 Tort Law 119
6 Product Liability 146
7 Intellectual Property Rights 166
8 Internet Law, Social Media, and Privacy 192
9 Criminal Law and Cyber Crime 214

Unit 2 Contracts and E-Contracts 243

10 Nature and Classification 244
11 Agreement 262
12 Consideration, Capacity, and Legality 285
13 Defenses to Contract Enforceability 310
14 Third Party Rights and Discharge 333
15 Breach and Remedies 357

Unit 3 Commercial Transactions 377

16 Sales and Lease Contracts 378
17 Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts 408
18 Negotiable Instruments 438
19 International and Space Law 469
20 Banking 490
21 Security Interests and Creditors' Rights 512
22 Bankruptcy 540

Unit 4 Agency and Employment Law 567

23 Agency Relationships in Business 568
24 Employment, Immigration, and Labor Law 596
25 Employment Discrimination 624

Unit 5 Business Organization 651

26 Sole Proprietorships and Franchises 652
27 All Forms of Partnership 668
28 Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms 691
29 Corporation 708
30 Investor Protection, Insider Trading, and Corporate Governance 743

Unit 6 Government Regulation 771

31 Antitrust Law and Promoting Competition 772
32 Consumer and Environmental Law 794
33 Liability of Accountants and Other Professionals 822

Unit 7 Property and Its Protection 845

34 Personal Property and Bailments 846
35 Real Property and Landlord-Tenant Law 868
36 Insurance, Wills, and Trusts 891

APPENDICES

A How to Brief Cases and Analyze Case Problems A–1
B The Constitution of the United States A–3
C The Uniform Commercial Code (Excerpts) A–3
D Answers to Issue Spotters A–4
E Sample Answers for Business Case Problems with Sample Answer A–10

Glossary G–1
Table of Cases TC–1
Index I–1

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Contents

Unit 1 The Legal Environment of Business 1

Chapter 1
Law and Legal Reasoning 2

Business Activities and the Legal Environment 3
Sources of American Law 4
The Common Law 8
- Managerial Strategy: The Power of Precedent 10
- Landmark in the Law: Equitable Maxims 15

Classifications of Law 15
Appendix to Chapter 1 21
Finding and Analyzing the Law 21
Finding Statutory and Administrative Law 21
Finding Case Law 22
Reading and Understanding Case Law 24
Exhibit 1A–3 A Sample Court Case 28
Adelman's Truck Parts Corp. v. Jones Transport 28
- Business Law Analysis: Case Briefing and IRAC Legal Reasoning 29

Chapter 2
Constitutional Law 31

The Constitutional Powers of Government 32
Case 2.1: Classy Cycles, Inc. v. Panama City Beach 33
- Landmark in the Law: Gibbons v. Ogden (1824) 35

Classic Case 2.2: Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States 36
Business and the Bill of Rights 38
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Social Media and the Constitution 40

Spotlight on Beer Labels: Case 2.3: Bad Frog Brewery, Inc. v. New York State Liquor Authority 43
- Business Law Analysis: Determining When Public Religious Displays Violate the Establishment Clause 45

Due Process and Equal Protection 47
Privacy Rights 49
- Cybersecurity and the Law: Should Apple Help Law Enforcement? 49

Chapter 3
Ethics in Business 56

Ethics and the Role of Business 57
- Business Web Log: Bogus Bank and Credit Card Accounts at Wells Fargo Bank 58
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Should Employees Have a "Right of Disconnecting"? 60

Case 3.1: Al-Dabagh v. Case Western Reserve University 62
Ethical Principles and Philosophies 63
- Managerial Strategy: The Stakeholder Capitalism Movement 68

Sources of Ethical Issues in Business Decisions 68
Case 3.2: Watson Laboratories, Inc. v. State of Mississippi 69
Making Ethical Business Decisions 72
- Business Law Analysis: Applying the IDDR Framework 76

Business Ethics on a Global Level 76
Appendix to Chapter 3: 84
Costco Code of Ethics 84

Chapter 4
Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution 85

The Judiciary's Role in American Government 86
- Landmark in the Law: Marbury v. Madison (1803) 86

Basic Judicial Requirements 87
Spotlight on Gucci: Case 4.1: Gucci America, Inc. v. Wang Huoqing 92
The State and Federal Court Systems 93
Case 4.2: Oxford Tower Apartments, LP v. Frenchie's Hair Boutique 95

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Following a State Court Case 98
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Using Social Media for Service of Process 99

Case 4.3: Klipsch Group, Inc. v. ePRO E-Commerce Limited 104

Courts Online 107

Alternative Dispute Resolution 108
- Business Web Log: Samsung and Forced Arbitration 111

Chapter 5

Tort Law 119

The Basis of Tort Law 119

Intentional Torts against Persons 121
- Business Law Analysis: Analyzing Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress Claims 123

Case 5.1: Sky v. Van Der Westhuizen 125
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Revenge Porn and Invasion of Privacy 128

Intentional Torts against Property 132

Negligence 134

Case 5.2: Bogenberger v. Pi Kappa Alpha Corporation, Inc. 135
- Landmark in the Law: Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad Co. (1928) 138

Spotlight on the Seattle Mariners: Case 5.3: Taylor v. Baseball Club of Seattle, L.P. 140

Strict Liability 141

Chapter 6

Product Liability 146

Product Liability Claims 146
- Business Web Log: Johnson & Johnson Faces Continuing Lawsuits Over Its Talcum Powder 147
- Landmark in the Law: MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co. (1916) 148

Case 6.1: Primal Vantage Co. v. O'Bryan 149

Strict Product Liability 150
- Cybersecurity and the Law: The Internet of Things 151
- Business Law Analysis: How State Legislation Can Limit Recovery for Design Defects 153

Case 6.2: Stange v. Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. 155
- Managerial Strategy: When Is a Warning Legally Bulletproof? 156

Defenses to Product Liability 158

Spotlight on Injuries from Vaccinations: Case 6.3: Bruesewitz v. Wyeth, LLC 159

Chapter 7

Intellectual Property Rights 166

Trademarks 167
- Managerial Strategy: Trademarks and Service Marks 167

Classic Case 7.1: Coca-Cola Co. v. Koke Co. of America 168
- Business Web Log: Amazon Faces Fake Products 173

Patents 175
- Business Law Analysis: The Impact of Patent Time Limits 175

Copyrights 178

Case 7.2: LEGO A/S v. ZURU Inc. 180
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Beyoncé, Sampling, and a $20 Million Lawsuit 183

Case 7.3: Oracle USA, Inc. v. Rimini Street, Inc. 184

Trade Secrets 185

International Protections 186

Chapter 8

Internet Law, Social Media, and Privacy 192

Internet Law 193

Spotlight on Internet Porn: Case 8.1: Hasbro, Inc. v. Internet Entertainment Group, Ltd. 196

Copyrights in Digital Information 197
- Landmark in the Law: The Digital Millennium Copyright Act 198
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Riot Games, Inc., Protects Its Online Video Game Copyrights 199

Case 8.2: BMG Rights Management (US), LLC v. Cox Communications, Inc. 200

Social Media 201

Online Defamation 204
- Business Law Analysis: Immunity of ISPs under the Communications Decency Act 206

Privacy 206

Case 8.3: Campbell v. Facebook, Inc. 207

Chapter 9

Criminal Law and Cyber Crime 214

Civil Law and Criminal Law 214

Criminal Liability 217
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Should Bitcoin Be Illegal? 217

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 9.1: United States v. Crabtree 218
- Managerial Strategy: The Criminalization of American Business 220

Types of Crimes 221
Spotlight on White-Collar Crime: Case 9.2: People v. Sisuphan 224
Defenses to Criminal Liability 228
Constitutional Safeguards 230
Cyber Crime 233
- Landmark in the Law: Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 234
- Cybersecurity and the Law: Counter-Strike: Global Offensive 236

Unit 2 Contracts and E-Contracts 243

Chapter 10
Nature and Classification 244

An Overview of Contract Law 244
Elements of a Contract 246
Case 10.1: Credible Behavioral Health, Inc. v. Johnson 247
Types of Contracts 248
Case 10.2: Boswell v. Panera Bread Co. 250
Quasi Contracts 253
- Business Law Analysis: Deciding If a Court Would Impose a Quasi Contract 254

Interpretation of Contracts 255
Spotlight on Columbia Pictures: Case 10.3: Wagner v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc. 256

Chapter 11
Agreement 262

Offer 262
Classic Case 11.1: Lucy v. Zehmer 263
Spotlight on Amazon.com: Case 11.2: Basis Technology Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc. 265
- Business Law Analysis: Offers of a Reward 267

Acceptance 269
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Can Your E-Mails Create a Valid Contract? 270

E-Contracts 273
Case 11.3: Bailey v. Kentucky Lottery Corp. 276
The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act 279

Chapter 12
Consideration, Capacity, and Legality 285

Consideration 285
- Landmark in the Law: Hamer v. Sidway (1891) 286

Case 12.1: Cincinnati Reds, L.L.C. v. Testa 287
Spotlight on Nike: Case 12.2: Already, LLC v. Nike, Inc. 292
Promissory Estoppel 293
Contractual Capacity 294
Legality 297
- Business Law Analysis: Determining If a Contract with an Unlicensed Party Is Enforceable 298

Case 12.3: Kennedy v. Shave Barber Co. 300
- Managerial Strategy: Creating Liability Waivers That Are Not Unconscionable 303

The Effect of Illegality 304

Chapter 13
Defenses to Contract Enforceability 310

Mistakes 310
Fraudulent Misrepresentation 313
Case 13.1: McCullough v. Allstate Property and Casualty Insurance Co. 314
- Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: The Problem of "Contract Cheating" 317

Undue Influence and Duress 318
The Writing Requirement 319
Case 13.2: Sloop v. Kiker 320
The Parol Evidence Rule 325
Case 13.3: Habel v. Estate of Capelli 326

Chapter 14
Third Party Rights and Discharge 333

Assignments 333
Delegations 337
Case 14.1: Mirandette v. Nelnet, Inc. 339
Third Party Beneficiaries 339

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 14.2: Bozzio v. EMI Group, Ltd. 340
Contract Discharge 343
■ Business Law Analysis: Determining When a Breach Is Material 347
Case 14.3: Chalk Supply LLC v. Ribbe Real Estate LLC 348

Chapter 15

Breach and Remedies 357

Damages 358
■ Cybersecurity and the Law: Arby's Restaurant Group, Inc. 359
Case 15.1: HDAV Outdoor, LLC v. Red Square Holdings, LLC 361
■ Landmark in the Law: Hadley v. Baxendale (1854) 362
Spotlight on Liquidated Damages: Case 15.2: Kent State University v. Ford 364
Equitable Remedies 365
■ Business Law Analysis: Enforceability of Liquidated Damages Provisions 365
Case 15.3: Cipriano Square Plaza Corp. v. Munawar 366
Recovery Based on Quasi Contract 369
Contract Provisions Limiting Remedies 370

Unit 3 Commercial Transactions 377

Chapter 16

Sales and Lease Contracts 378

■ Landmark in the Law: The Uniform Commercial Code 379
The Scope of Articles 2 and 2A 379
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Taxing Web Purchases 381
The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts 383
Case 16.1: Toll Processing Services, LLC v. Kastalon, Inc. 384
■ Business Law Analysis: Additional Terms between Merchants 388
Classic Case 16.2: Jones v. Star Credit Corp. 393
Title and Risk of Loss 394
■ Managerial Strategy: Commercial Use of Drones 396
Case 16.3: Total Quality Logistics, LLC v. Balance Transportation, LLC 398
Contracts for the International Sale of Goods 401

Chapter 17

Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts 408

Obligations of the Seller or Lessor 409
Case 17.1: All the Way Towing, LLC v. Bucks County International, Inc. 411
Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee 414
Remedies of the Seller or Lessor 416
Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee 419
Spotlight on Baseball Cards: Case 17.2: Fitl v. Strek 423
Warranties 425
Classic Case 17.3: Webster v. Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc. 428
■ Business Law Analysis: Implied Warranties 430

Chapter 18

Negotiable Instruments 438

Formation of Negotiable Instruments 439
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Pay with Your Smartphone 441
Case 18.1: OneWest Bank, FSB v. Nunez 445
■ Business Law Analysis: Deciding If an Instrument Is Negotiable 446
Case 18.2: Collins Asset Group, LLC v. Alialy 447
Transfer of Instruments 450
Holder in Due Course (HDC) 452
Case 18.3: Jarrell v. Conerly 454
Signature and Warranty Liability 456
Defenses, Limitations, and Discharge 461

Chapter 19

International and Space Law 469

International Law 469
Case 19.1: Rubin v. Islamic Republic of Iran 473
■ Business Law Analysis: Sovereign Immunity Claims 474
Doing Business Internationally 475
Regulation of Specific Business Activities 477

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 19.2: Changzhou Trina Solar Energy Co. v. International Trade Commission 479
U.S. Laws in a Global Context 481
Spotlight on International Torts: Case 19.3: Daimler AG v. Bauman 482
Space Law 483
■ Cybersecurity and the Law: Safe Satellites 484

Chapter 20

Banking 490

Checks and the Bank-Customer Relationship 491
The Bank's Duty to Honor Checks 493
Case 20.1: Legg v. West Bank 494
Case 20.2: Horton v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A. 497
The Bank's Duty to Accept Deposits 499
■ Landmark in the Law: Check Clearing for the 21st Century Act (Check 21) 500
Electronic Fund Transfers 502
Case 20.3: Binns v. Truist Bank 504
Banking in the Digital Age 505
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Open Banking 506

Chapter 21

Security Interests and Creditors' Rights 512

Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest 512
Spotlight on Wedding Rings: Case 21.1: Royal Jewelers, Inc. v. Light 514
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Secured Transactions Online 515
■ Business Law Analysis: Perfecting a Security Interest 517
Scope of a Security Interest 521
Priorities, Rights, and Duties 523
Case 21.2: Lewis v. Chris Carbine, Inc. 524
Default 526
Case 21.3: SunTrust Bank v. Monroe 528
Other Laws Assisting Creditors 530

Chapter 22

Bankruptcy 540

The Bankruptcy Code 540
■ Business Web Log: Online Competition, Bankruptcy, and the "Retail Apocalypse" 541
■ Landmark in the Law: The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act 542
Chapter 7—Liquidation 543
■ Business Law Analysis: Violations of the Automatic Stay 547
Case 22.1: In re Anderson 552
Case 22.2: In re Dykes 555
Chapter 11—Reorganization 556
Bankruptcy Relief under Chapter 13 and Chapter 12 559
Case 22.3: In re Chamberlain 561

Unit 4 Agency and Employment Law 567

Chapter 23

Agency Relationships in Business 568

Agency Law 569
Formation of an Agency 572
Duties of Agents and Principals 574
Spotlight on Taser International: Case 23.1: Taser International, Inc. v. Ward 576
Agent's Authority 578
Case 23.2: Dearborn West Village Condominium Association v. Makki 580
Liability in Agency Relationships 582
■ Business Law Analysis: Liability of Disclosed Principals 582
■ Landmark in the Law: The Doctrine of Respondeat Superior 585
Case 23.3: Simon v. Farm Bureau Insurance Co. 587 Termination of an Agency 588

Chapter 24

Employment, Immigration, and Labor Law 596

Employment at Will 597

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Wages, Hours, and Leave 598
Case 24.1: Encino Motorcars, LLC v. Navarro 600
Health, Safety, Income Security, and Privacy 602
Case 24.2: Packers Sanitation Services, Inc. v. Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission 603
■ Business Law Analysis: Workers' Compensation Claims 605
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Social Media in the Workplace Come of Age 609
Immigration Law 610
Labor Law 612
■ Managerial Strategy: Union Organizing Using a Company's E-Mail System 615
Case 24.3: Contemporary Cars, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board 616

Chapter 25
Employment Discrimination 624
Title VII of the Civil Rights Act 625
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Hiring Discrimination Based on Social Media Posts 629
Case 25.1: Young v. United Parcel Service, Inc. 630
■ Business Law Analysis: Retaliation Claims 634
Case 25.2: Franchina v. City of Providence 635
Discrimination Based on Age, Disability, or Military Status 636
Case 25.3: Kassa v. Synovus Financial Corp. 641
Defenses to Employment Discrimination 643
Affirmative Action 645

Unit 5 Business Organizations 651

Chapter 26
Sole Proprietorships and Franchises 652
Sole Proprietorships 653
Case 26.1: Port Orchard Airport, Inc. v. Wagner 653
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: "Doing Business As" a Sole Proprietor 655
Franchises 656
The Franchise Contract 658
■ Cybersecurity and the Law: Brinker International, Inc. 660
Franchise Termination 661
Case 26.2: S&P Brake Supply, Inc. v. Daimler Trucks North America, LLC 661
Spotlight on Holiday Inns: Case 26.3: Holiday Inn Franchising, Inc. v. Hotel Associates, Inc. 663

Chapter 27
All Forms of Partnership 668
Basic Partnership Concepts 669
Case 27.1: Harun v. Rashid 670
Formation and Operation 672
Classic Case 27.2: Meinhard v. Salmon 675
Dissociation and Termination 678
Case 27.3: Guenther v. Ryerson 681
Limited Liability Partnerships 682
Limited Partnerships 683

Chapter 28
Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms 691
The Limited Liability Company 691
■ Landmark in the Law: Limited Liability Company (LLC) Statutes 692
Case 28.1: Nesset, Inc. v. Jones 695
LLC Operation and Management 696
■ Managerial Strategy: Can a Person Who Is Not a Member of a Protected Class Sue for Discrimination? 697
Case 28.2: Schaefer v. Orth 698
Dissociation and Dissolution of an LLC 699
Case 28.3: Reese v. Newman 700
■ Business Law Analysis: When Will a Court Order the Dissolution of an LLC? 701
Special Business Forms 702

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Chapter 29

Corporations 708

Nature and Classification 708
Case 29.1: Wulf v. Bravo Brio Restaurant Group, Inc. 710
Case 29.2: Greenfield v. Mandalay Shores Community Association 714
Formation and Powers 715
■ Cybersecurity and the Law: The CLOUD Act 720
■ Business Law Analysis: Piercing the Corporate Veil 722
Directors and Officers 722
Classic Case 29.3: Guth v. Loft, Inc. 727
Shareholders 728
Major Business Forms Compared 735

Chapter 30

Investor Protection, Insider Trading, and Corporate Governance 743

Securities Act of 1933 744
Case 30.1: Securities and Exchange Commission v. Scoville 744
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Investment Crowdfunding—Regulations and Restrictions 748
■ Landmark in the Law: Changes to Regulation A: "Reg A+" 749
Securities Exchange Act of 1934 752
Classic Case 30.2: Securities and Exchange Commission v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co. 754 Case 30.3: Singer v. Reali 758
State Securities Laws 760
Corporate Governance 761

Unit 6 Government Regulation 771

Chapter 31

Antitrust Law and Promoting Competition 772

The Sherman Antitrust Act 773
■ Landmark in the Law: The Sherman Antitrust Act 773
Case 31.1: United States v. Vega-Martínez 775
Section 1 of the Sherman Act 775
Section 2 of the Sherman Act 779
The Clayton Act 782
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Big Tech's Monopoly Problem 782
Case 31.2: Candelore v. Tinder, Inc. 784
Enforcement and Exemptions 786
Case 31.3: TransWeb, LLC v. 3M Innovative Properties Co. 787
U.S. Antitrust Laws in the Global Context 788

Chapter 32

Consumer and Environmental Law 794

Advertising, Marketing, Sales, and Labeling 795
Spotlight Case 32.1: POM Wonderful, LLC v. Federal Trade Commission 796
Case 32.2: Haywood v. Massage Envy Franchising, LLC 798
Protection of Health and Safety 802
Credit Protection 805
Case 32.3: Manuel v. Merchants and Professional Bureau, Inc. 808
Protecting the Environment 809
Air and Water Pollution 811
Toxic Chemicals and Hazardous Waste 814

Chapter 33

Liability of Accountants and Other Professionals 822

Potential Liability to Clients 823
Case 33.1: Suarez v. Fernandez 827
Potential Liability to Third Parties 828
Liability of Accountants under Federal Laws 830
Case 33.2: Laccetti v. Securities and Exchange Commission 832
Potential Criminal Liability 836
Confidentiality and Privilege 837
Case 33.3: Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Schultz 838

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unit 7 Property and Its Protection 845

Chapter 34

Personal Property and Bailments 846

Personal Property versus Real Property 846
Acquiring Ownership of Personal Property 848
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: The Exploding World of Digital Property 848
■ Business Law Analysis: Effective Gift of a Brokerage Account 850
Classic Case 34.1: In re Estate of Piper 851
Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property 853
Case 34.2: Zephier v. Agate 855
Bailments 855
Case 34.3: Zissu v. IH2 Property Illinois, L.P. 860

Chapter 35

Real Property and Landlord-Tenant Law 868

The Nature of Real Property 868
Ownership Interests and Leases 870
Case 35.1: In the Matter of the Estate of Nelson 871
Transfer of Ownership 876
Spotlight on Sales of Haunted Houses: Case 35.2: Stambovsky v. Ackley 877
■ Business Law Analysis: When Possession of Property Is Not "Adverse" 880
Case 35.3: A2 Creative Group, LLC v. Anderson 881 Landlord-Tenant Relationships 883

Chapter 36

Insurance, Wills, and Trusts 891

Insurance 891
Case 36.1: Breeden v. Buchanan 894
Wills 899
Case 36.2: In the Matter of the Estate of Thorn 902
■ Adapting the Law to the Online Environment: Online Asset Estate Planning 905
Trusts 907
Case 36.3: Dowdy v. Dowdy 909

Appendices

A How to Brief Cases and Analyze Case Problems A–1
B The Constitution of the United States A–3
C The Uniform Commercial Code (Excerpts) A–3
D Answers to Issue Spotters A–4
E Sample Answers for Business Case Problems with Sample Answer A–10

Glossary G–1
Table of Cases TC–1
Index I–1

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Preface

The present world landscape poses numerous challenges for students planning careers in the business world. It also offers limitless opportunities. To take advantage of those opportunities, prospective entrepreneurs—whether they aspire to work on Wall Street or Main Street—need to have a solid understanding of business law and the legal environment of corporate America. The most up-to-date text on the market, Business Law Today: Standard Edition, Thirteenth Edition, provides the perfect platform to achieve this goal.

Instructors have come to rely on the coverage, accuracy, and applicability of Business Law Today. This best-selling text engages your students, solidifies their understanding of legal concepts, and provides the best teaching tools available. Working on this edition, my objective was to make its pages more interesting, to the point, and visually compelling than ever before. I put particular focus on pedagogical devices within the text that focus on legal, ethical, and corporate issues, while never losing sight of the course's core curriculum.

The Thirteenth Edition incorporates the latest legal developments, from United States Supreme Court decisions to state-level legislation. It also includes nearly forty new and updated features and more than thirty new cases from 2019 and 2020, over one hundred new Examples and Case Examples, along with an extensive array of exhibits, Focus Questions, margin definitions, and case problems.

New and Updated Features

The Thirteenth Edition of Business Law Today: Standard Edition is filled with stimulating new and updated features designed to cover current high-interest legal topics.

1. Entirely new *Cybersecurity and the Law features shed light on the risks that go with the many rewards offered by technology in the global marketplace. These features recount how some of the most important brands in corporate America are protecting themselves and their customers from the threats lurking in cyberspace. Some topics include:
   - Should Apple Help Law Enforcement? (Chapter 2)
   - Counter Strike: Global Offensive (Chapter 9)
   - The CLOUD Act (Chapter 29)
2. Entirely new hypotheticals in selected chapter introductions provide a real-world link that generates student interest and highlights specific legal concepts that will be discussed in the chapter. These hypotheticals—often based on real cases or business situations—help to introduce and illustrate legal issues facing managers, companies, and even industries.
3. Business Web Log features underscore the importance of the text material to real-world businesses. Each of these features discusses a major U.S. company that is engaged in a dispute involving a topic covered in the chapter. Some topics include
   - Samsung and Forced Arbitration (Chapter 4)
   - Johnson & Johnson Faces Continuing Lawsuits over Its Talcum Powder (Chapter 6)
   - Online Competition, Bankruptcy, and the "Retail Apocalypse" (Chapter 22)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4. Adapting the Law to the Online Environment features examine cutting-edge cyberlaw topics, such as:
   - The Problem of "Contract Cheating" (Chapter 13)
   - Open Banking (Chapter 20)
   - Big Tech's Monopoly Problem (Chapter 31)
5. Business Law Analysis features appear in numerous chapters of the text. These features are useful tools to help students master the legal analysis skills that they will need to answer questions and case problems in the book, on exams, and in everyday business situations. Topics include:
   - The Impact of Patent Time Limits (Chapter 7)
   - Deciding If a Court Would Impose a Quasi Contract (Chapter 10)
   - Workers' Compensation Claims (Chapter 24)
6. Ethical Issue features focus on the ethical aspects of a topic being discussed in order to emphasize that ethics is an integral part of a business law course. Examples include:
   - Even Though Corporation Can Restrict the Speech of Their Employees, Should They Do So? (Chapter 2)
   - Does the Gig Economy Take Advantage of Independent Contractors? (Chapter 23)
   - Does Corporate America Need Board Of Director Gender Quotas? (Chapter 30)
7. Managerial Strategy features emphasize the management aspects of business law and the legal environment. Topics include:
   - The Power of Precedents (Chapter 1)
   - The Stakeholder Capitalism Movement (Chapter 3)
   - Can a Person Who Is Not a Member of a Protected Class Sue for Discrimination? (Chapter 28)
8. Landmark in the Law features discuss a landmark case, statute, or development that has significantly affected business law. Examples include:
   - Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad Co. (Chapter 5)
   - The Digital Millennium Copyright Act (Chapter 8)
   - Federal Trade Commission Rule 433 (Chapter 18)

Making Ethical Business Decisions—The IDDR Approach

The Thirteenth Edition of Business Law Today boasts its own framework for helping students (and businesspersons) make ethical decisions—the IDDR Approach, which is presented in Chapter 3. This systematic approach provides students with a clear step-by-step process to analyze the legal and ethical implications of decisions that are in everyday business operations. The IDDR Approach uses four logical steps:

- Step 1: Inquiry
- Step 2: Discussion
- Step 3: Decision
- Step 4: Review

Students can remember the first letter of each step easily by using the phrase "I Desire to Do Right." Material in Chapter 3 (Ethics in Business) details the goals of each IDDR step and then provides a Sample Scenario to show students how to apply this new approach to ethical decision making. The text now focuses on real-life application of ethical principles.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

After Chapter 3, to reinforce the application of the IDDR Approach, students are asked to use its various steps when answering each chapter's A Question of Ethics. In addition, the Thirteenth Edition retains the Ethical Issue feature in most chapters, several of which have been refreshed with timely topics involving the ever-evolving technologies and trends in business.

New Cases and Case Problems

The Thirteenth Edition of Business Law Today has new cases and case problems from 2019 and 2020 in nearly every chapter. The new cases have been carefully selected to illustrate important points of law and to be of high interest to students and instructors. I have made it a point to find recent cases that enhance learning and are straightforward enough for business law students to understand. At the end of each chapter, additional scenarios are presented as case problems that require students to apply concepts learned from the text.

Certain cases and case problems have been carefully chosen as good teaching cases and are designated as Spotlight Cases and Spotlight Case Problems. Some examples include Spotlight on Gucci, Spotlight on Beer Labels, Spotlight on Nike, and Spotlight on the Seattle Mariners. Instructors will find these Spotlight decisions useful to illustrate the legal concepts under discussion, and students will enjoy studying the cases because they involve interesting and memorable facts. Other cases have been chosen as Classic Cases because they establish a legal precedent in a particular area of law.

Each case concludes with a section, called Critical Thinking, which includes at least one question. Each question is labeled Ethical, Economic, Legal Environment, Political, Social, or What If the Facts Were Different? In addition, Classic Cases include an Impact of This Case on Today's Law section that clarifies how the case has affected the legal environment. Suggested answers to all case-ending questions can be found in the Answers Manual for this text.

Many New Highlighted and Numbered Case Examples

Many instructors use cases and examples to illustrate how the law applies to business. This edition of Business Law Today offers hundreds of new 2019 and 2020 highlighted and consecutively numbered Examples and Case Examples. Examples illustrate how the law applies in a specific situation, and Case Examples present the facts and issues of an actual case and then describe the court's decision and rationale.

In addition, this edition presents Spotlight Case Examples, which deal with especially high-interest cases, and Classic Case Examples, which discuss older, landmark decisions. The numbered Examples and Case Examples features are integrated throughout the text to help students better understand how courts apply legal principles in the real world.

Critical Thinking and Legal Reasoning Elements

For this edition of Business Law Today, I have included a discussion of legal reasoning in Chapter 1. The Business Law Analysis features that can be found throughout the text emphasize legal reasoning skills as well. Critical Thinking questions conclude most of the features and cases in this text. At the end of each chapter, a Debate This question requires students to think critically about the rationale underlying the law on a particular topic.

Answers to all Critical Thinking questions, as well as to the Business Scenarios and Case Problems at the end of every chapter, are presented in the Thirteenth Edition's Answers Manual. In addition, the answers to one case problem in each chapter, called the Business Case Problem with Sample Answer, appear in Appendix E.

The chapter-ending materials also include a separate section of questions that focus on critical thinking and writing. This section always includes a Time-Limited Group Assignment and may also include a Critical Legal Thinking question requiring students to think critically about some aspect of the law discussed in the chapter or a Business Law Writing question requiring students to compose a written response.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Other Pedagogical Devices within Each Chapter

- Focus Questions (questions listed at the beginning of each chapter and repeated in the margins of the text provide a framework of main chapter concepts for the student).
- Margin definitions of each boldfaced Key Term.
- Know This (margin features).
- Exhibits (in most chapters).
- Photographs (with critical-thinking questions).

Chapter-Ending Pedagogy

- Practice and Review (in every chapter).
- Debate This (a statement or question at the end of Practice and Review).
- Key Terms (with appropriate page references to their margin definitions).
- Chapter Summary (in table format).
- Issue Spotters (in every chapter with answers in Appendix D).
- Business Scenarios and Case Problems (including in every chapter, a Business Case Problem with Sample Answer that is answered in Appendix E; in selected chapters, a Spotlight Case Problem; and in every chapter, a A Question of Ethics that applies this textbook's unique IDDR Approach to business ethics).
- Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments (including a Time-Limited Group Assignment in every chapter, and a Business Law Writing or a Critical Legal Thinking question in selected chapters).

Unit-Ending Pedagogy

Each of the seven units in the Thirteenth Edition of Business Law Today concludes with a Task-Based Simulation. This feature presents a hypothetical business situation and then asks a series of questions about how the law applies to various actions taken by the firm. To answer the questions, the student must apply the laws discussed throughout the unit. (Answers are provided in the Answers Manual.)

Supplements

Business Law Today, Thirteenth Edition, provides a comprehensive supplements package designed to make the tasks of teaching and learning more enjoyable and efficient. The following supplements are available for instructors.

MindTap Business Law for Business Law Today, Thirteenth Edition

Today's leading digital platform, MindTap, gives you complete control of your course—equipping you to craft unique learning experiences that challenge students, build confidence and elevate performance.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Use MindTap as-is or customize it to meet your specific needs. You can even integrate it easily into your institution's Learning Management System (LMS).

A streamlined learning path and redesigned assessments minimize reader distraction, while dual-pane assignments for students pair readings side-by-side with assessments. MindTap presents complex concepts using a blend of engaging narrative and media assets clearly linked to assessments. So, students can start applying concepts to real-world situations from the beginning of your course with content that progresses from understanding core concepts to critical thinking and, ultimately, application.

Exclusive Instructor Tools allow you to customize course content to your needs and tailor assessments to match the specific language and style of your course. New Instructor Reports provide actionable insights into student performance and present opportunities for just-in-time intervention.

Product Features

MindTap's outcomes-based learning design propels students from memorization to mastery. It's the only platform today that gives you complete ownership of your course. With MindTap you can challenge every student, build confidence and empower today's learners to be unstoppable.

Anchor Learning With Improved Learning Path Design

MindTap helps students focus by dividing the Learning Path into groups of bite-size activities that are anchored to a single concept. MindTap presents concepts by pairing instructional content with assessment in a visually captivating side-by-side format.

Provide Learning on the Go

Offer your students the flexibility they need to fit learning into their day—wherever they are and using whatever approach works best for them. Bite-size content and activities that students can complete on a smartphone or tablet keep learning engaging, even on the go.

Quick Lesson Videos Present Complex Topics Visually

MindTap contains a variety of new and existing Quick Lesson Videos, placed within Learn It activities and in the Additional Resources, Quick Lessons folder in the MindTap, to reach all types of learners.

Access Everything You Need in One Place

Cut down on prep with preloaded, organized course materials in MindTap. Teach more efficiently with interactive multimedia, assignments, quizzes and focused resources all on one screen. With MindTap you give your students the power to read, listen and study on their phones—so they can learn on their own terms.

Empower Students to Reach Their Potentials

Gain actionable insights into student engagement with MindTap's twelve distinct metrics. Identify topics troubling your entire class and instantly communicate with struggling students. You can track your class' performance down to the learning objective and curate your lectures in real-time to respond to distinct class-wide needs. Students can track their scores and take the guesswork out of studying with performance reports and personalized study materials that help them progress toward their goals.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Control Your Course, Your Content

Only MindTap gives you complete control of your course. You have the flexibility to reorder textbook chapters, add your own notes and embed a variety of content, including OER. Personalize course content to your students' needs by editing question text or answer choices. They can even read your notes, add their own and highlight key text to aid their progress.

Count on Our Dedicated Team, Whenever You Need Them

MindTap is not simply a comprehensive tool—it's a network of support from a personalized team eager to further your success. We're ready to help—from setting up your course to tailoring MindTap resources to meet your specific objectives. You'll be ready to make an impact from day one. And, we'll be right here to help you and your students throughout the semester—and beyond.

MindTap Table of Contents

Why Does [Topic] Matter to Me?

Immediately engage students with new activities that connect the upcoming chapter to an authentic, real-world scenario designed to pique engagement and emphasize relevance. Use these activities to ensure students read material before class and to trigger lively in-class discussion.

Chapter-Level Ebook

Immediately engage students with a dynamic eBook that brings the value, concepts and applications of the printed text to life. Students open an active learning experience as each chapter provides opportunities to interact with content using the approach that's best for the individual learner.

Learn It Activities

Easily add multimedia instruction to your course to supplement textbook learning. MindTap's Learn It activities offer small sections of instruction in the form of narrative, images, and/or Quick Lesson Videos that highlight the most important concepts in each chapter. Learn It activities reinforce the text's instruction and even approach concepts in a different way to promote student choice and autonomy with personalizing learning. You can assign Learn It activities to ensure that students have read and understand key concepts before class.

Check Your Understanding—Chapter Quizzes

Use MindTap's Check Your Understanding quizzes to assess student performance and immediately identify class-wide learning needs.

Apply It Activities

Assign any of MindTap's carefully designed, practically focused application activities to ensure your students know how to make business decisions through the lens of the law.

- Case Problem Analyses offer a multi-step activity that asks students to identify the facts in a scenario through a series of questions that promote a critical-thinking process so that students can arrive at the decision of the court. In the second part, the facts are changed, and students apply the same critical-thinking process on their own.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

- Brief Hypotheticals help students spot the issue and apply the law in the context of a short, fictional scenario.

Additional Resources (found at the part level)

- Business Cases develop students' skills to apply critical-thinking and legal reasoning through relevant real-world business scenarios.
- Quick Lesson Videos highlight the most important concepts in each chapter.
- PowerPoint Slides edited for student use offer visual outlines of each chapter.

Cengage Testing Powered by Cognero

Cengage Testing Powered by Cognero is a flexible online system that allows instructors to do the following:

- Author, edit, and manage Test Bank content from multiple Cengage Learning solutions.
- Create multiple test versions in an instant.
- Deliver tests from their Learning Management System (LMS), classroom, or wherever they want.

Start Right Away! Cengage Testing Powered by Cognero works on any operating system or browser.

- Use your standard browser; no special installs or downloads are needed.
- Create tests from school, home, the coffee shop—anywhere with Internet access.

What Instructors Will Find

- Simplicity at every step. A desktop-inspired interface features drop-down menus and familiar, intuitive tools that take instructors through content creation and management with ease.
- Full-featured test generator. Create ideal assessments with a choice of fifteen question types—including true/false, multiple choice, opinion scale/Likert, and essay. Multi-language support, an equation editor, and unlimited metadata help ensure instructor tests are complete and compliant.
- Cross-compatible capability. Import and export content into other systems.

Instructor Companion Website

The Instructor's Companion Website is an all-in-one resource for class preparation, presentation, and testing. Accessible through www.cengage.com/login with your faculty account, you will find available for download:

- Instructor's Manual. Includes activities and assessments for each chapter and their correlation to specific learning objectives, an outline, key terms with definitions, a chapter summary, and several ideas for engaging with students with discussion questions, ice breakers, case studies, and social learning activities that may be conducted in an on-ground, hybrid, or online modality.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

- Answers Manual. Provides answers to all questions presented in the text, including the Focus Questions, the questions in each case and feature, the Issue Spotters, the Business Scenarios and Case Problems, Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments, and the unit-ending Task-Based Simulation features.
- Test Bank. A comprehensive test bank, offered in Blackboard, Moodle, Desire2Learn, and Canvas formats, contains learning objective-specific true-false, multiple-choice and essay questions for each chapter. Import the test bank into your LMS to edit and manage questions, and to create tests.
- PowerPoint Slides. Presentations are closely tied to the Instructor Manual, providing ample opportunities for generating classroom discussion and interaction. They offer ready-to-use, visual outlines of each chapter, which may be easily customized for your lectures.
- Guide to Teaching Online. Presents technological and pedagogical considerations and suggestions for teaching the Business Law course when you can't be in the same room with students.
- Transition Guide. Highlights all of the changes in the text and in the digital offerings from the previous edition to this edition.
- Educator Guide. Walks you through what the unique activities are in the MindTap, where you'll find them and how they're built for easier curriculum integration.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Acknowledgments

Since I began this project many years ago, numerous business law professors and users of Business Law Today have been kind enough to help me revise the book and digital offerings, including the following:

John J. Balek
Morton College, Illinois

John Jay Ballantine
University of Colorado, Boulder

Lorraine K. Bannai
Western Washington University

Marlene E. Barken
Ithaca College, New York

Laura Barnard
Lakeland Community College, Ohio

Denise A. Bartles, J.D.
Missouri Western State University

Daryl Barton
Eastern Michigan University

Merlin Bauer
Mid State Technical College, Wisconsin

Donna E. Becker
Frederick Community College, Maryland

Richard J. Bennet
Three Rivers Community College, Connecticut

Dr. Anne Berre
Schreiner University, Texas

Robert C. Bird
University of Connecticut

Bonnie S. Bolinger
Ivy Tech Community College, Wabash Valley Region, Indiana

Brad Botz
Garden City Community College, Kansas

Teresa Brady
Holy Family College, Pennsylvania

Dean Bredeson
University of Texas at Austin

Lee B. Burgunder
California Polytechnic University, San Luis Obispo

Thomas D. Cavenagh
North Central College, Illinois

Bradley D. Childs
Belmont University, Tennessee

Corey Ciocchetti
University of Denver, Colorado

Peter Clapp
St. Mary's College, California

Dale Clark
Corning Community College, New York

Tammy W. Cowart
University of Texas, Tyler

Stanley J. Dabrowski
Hudson County Community College, New Jersey

Sandra J. Defebaugh
Eastern Michigan University

Patricia L. DeFrain
Glendale College, California

M. Yvonne Demory, J.D., LL.M.
George Mason University

Julia G. Derrick
Brevard Community College, Florida

Joe D. Dillsaver
Northeastern State University, Oklahoma

Claude W. Dotson
Northwest College, Wyoming

Larry R. Edwards
Tarrant County Junior College, South Campus, Texas

Jacolin Eichelberger
Hillsborough Community College, Florida

George E. Eigsti
Kansas City, Kansas, Community College

Florence E. Elliott-Howard
Stephen F. Austin State University, Texas

Tony Enerva
Lakeland Community College, Ohio

Benjamin C. Fassberg
Prince George's Community College, Maryland

Joseph L. Flack
Washtenaw Community College, Michigan

Jerry Furniss
University of Montana

Joan Gabel
Florida State University

Elizabeth J. Guerriero Northeast Louisiana University

Phil Harmeson
University of South Dakota

Nancy L. Hart
Midland College, Texas

Mo Hassan
Cabrillo College, California

Andy E. Hendrick
Coastal Carolina University, South Carolina

Janine S. Hiller
Virginia Polytechnic Institute & State University

Karen A. Holmes
Hudson Valley Community College, New York

Fred Ittner
College of Alameda, California

Susan S. Jarvis
University of Texas, Pan American

Jack E. Karns
East Carolina University, North Carolina

Sarah Weiner Keidan
Oakland Community College, Michigan

Richard N. Kleeberg
Solano Community College, California

Bradley T. Lutz
Hillsborough Community College, Florida

Diane MacDonald
Pacific Lutheran University, Washington

Darlene Mallick
Anne Arundel Community College, Maryland

John D. Mallonee
Manatee Community College, Florida

Joseph D. Marcus
Prince George's Community College, Maryland

Woodrow J. Maxwell
Hudson Valley Community College, New York

Diane May Winona State University, Minnesota

Beverly McCormick
Morehead State University, Kentucky

William J. McDevitt
Saint Joseph's University, Pennsylvania

John W. McGee
Aims Community College, Colorado

James K. Miersma
Milwaukee Area Technical Institute, Wisconsin

Susan J. Mitchell
Des Moines Area Community College, Iowa

Jim Lee Morgan
West Los Angeles College, California

Jack K. Morton
University of Montana

Annie Laurie I. Myers
Northampton Community College, Pennsylvania

Solange North
Fox Valley Technical Institute, Wisconsin

Jamie L. O'Brien
South Dakota State University

Ruth R. O'Keefe
Jacksonville University, Florida

Robert H. Orr
Florida Community College at Jacksonville

George Otto
Truman College, Illinois

Thomas L. Palmer
Northern Arizona University

David W. Pan
University of Tulsa, Oklahoma

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Victor C. Parker, Jr.
North Georgia College and State University

Jane Patterson
Ozarks Technical Community College and Missouri State University

Donald L. Petote
Genesee Community College, New York

Francis D. Polk
Ocean County College, New Jersey

Gregory Rabb
Jamestown Community College, New York

Brad Reid
Abilene Christian University, Texas

Anne Montgomery Ricketts
University of Findlay, Ohio

Donald A. Roark
University of West Florida

Joey Robertson
Sam Houston State University

Hugh Rode
Utah Valley State College

Gerald M. Rogers
Front Range Community College, Colorado

Dr. William J. Russell
Northwest Nazarene University, Idaho

William M. Rutledge
Macomb Community College, Michigan

Roberto Sandoval
University of Texas at El Paso

Martha Wright Sartoris
North Hennepin Community College, Minnesota

Kurt M. Saunders
California State University, Northridge

Anne W. Schacherl
Madison Area Technical College, Wisconsin

Edward F. Shafer
Rochester Community College, Minnesota

Lance Shoemaker, J.D., M.C.P., M.A.
West Valley College, California

Lou Ann Simpson
Drake University, Iowa

Anthony A. Smith
Ithaca College

Denise Smith
Missouri Western State College

Hugh M. Spall
Central Washington University

Elisabeth "Lisa" Sperow
California Polytechnic State University, San Luis Obispo

Catherine A. Stevens
College of Southern Maryland

Nicole Forbes Stowell, Esquire
University of Southern Florida, St. Petersburg

Andrea Studzinski
College of DuPage

Maurice Tonissi
Quinsigamond Community College, Massachusetts

James D. Van Tassel
Mission College, California

Russell A. Waldon
College of the Canyons, California

Frederick J. Walsh
Franklin Pierce College, New Hampshire

James E. Walsh, Jr.
Tidewater Community College, Virginia

Randy Waterman
Richland College, Texas

Jerry Wegman
University of Idaho

Edward L. Welsh, Jr.
Phoenix College, Arizona

Whitney B. Westrich
University of Cincinnati

Clark W. Wheeler
Santa Fe Community College, Florida

Lori Whisenant
University of Houston, Texas

Kay O. Wilburn
The University of Alabama at Birmingham

John G. Williams, J.D.
Northwestern State University, Louisiana

Shallin S. Williams
Tri-County Technical College

James L. Wittenbach
University of Notre Dame, Indiana

Abby A. Wood, Esq.
Mt. San Antonio College

Margaret M. Wright, J.D. LL.M.
University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign

Eric D. Yordy
Northern Arizona University

Joseph Zavaglia, Jr.
Brookdale Community College, New Jersey

Alexandria Zylstra, J.D., LL.M.
George Mason University

In addition, I give my thanks to the staff at Cengage especially Abbie Schultheis, Associate Product Manager; Joe Sabatino, Product Director; Julia Chase, Senior Content Manager; Cazzie Reyes and Liz Harnage, Learning Designers; Lisa Elliot, Subject Matter Expert; Steven McMillian, Digital Delivery Lead; Nick Perez, Product Assistant; Ashley Maynard, Permissions Analyst; and Nick Barrows, Permissions Project Manager. I also thank Andrew Stock in Marketing. Additionally, I would like to thank my project manager Ann Borman at SPi Global, the compositor, for accurately generating pages for the text and making it possible for me to meet my ambitious schedule for the print and digital products.

I give special thanks to Katherine Marie Silsbee for managing the project and providing exceptional research and editorial skills. I also thank William Eric Hollowell, co-author of the Answers Manual for his excellent research efforts. I am grateful for the copyediting services of Beverly Peavler and proofreading services of Maureen Johnson. I also thank Vickie Reierson and Suzanne Jasin for their many efforts on this project.

Roger LeRoy Miller

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Dedication

To Lorraine,

The journey continues to more delightful times.
It's nice to be part of it with you.

R.L.M.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unit 1
The Legal Environment of Business

1 Law and Legal Reasoning
2 Constitutional Law
3 Ethics in Business
4 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution
5 Tort Law
6 Product Liability
7 Intellectual Property Rights
8 Internet Law, Social Media, and Privacy
9 Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

Sergii Gnatiuk/Shutterstock.com

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1 Law and Legal Reasoning

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What are four primary sources of law in the United States?
2. What is a precedent? When might a court depart from precedent?
3. What is the difference between remedies at law and remedies in equity?
4. What are some important differences between civil law and criminal law?

Law A body of enforceable rules governing relationships among individuals and between individuals and their society.

"Laws should be like clothes. They should be made to fit the people they are meant to serve."

Clarence Darrow
1857–1938
(American lawyer)

In the chapter-opening quotation, Clarence Darrow asserts that law should be created to serve the public. Because you are part of that public, the law is important to you. In particular, those entering the world of business will find themselves subject to numerous laws and government regulations. A basic knowledge of these laws and regulations is beneficial—if not essential—to anyone contemplating a successful career in today's business environment.

Although the law has various definitions, all of them are based on the general observation that law consists of enforceable rules governing relationships among individuals and between individuals and their society. In some societies, these enforceable rules consist of unwritten principles of behavior. In other societies, they are set forth in ancient or contemporary law codes. In the United States, our rules consist of written laws and court decisions created by modern legislative and judicial bodies. Regardless of how such rules are created, they all have one feature in common: they establish rights, duties, and privileges that are consistent with the values and beliefs of a society or its ruling group.

In this introductory chapter, we look at how business law and the legal environment affect business decisions. For instance, suppose that Mototron, Inc., plans to introduce a driverless car equipped with lidar, a radar system that relies on lasers, and artificially intelligent cameras. Even if its technicians put the vehicles through two million miles of testing on closed courses and deem them low risk, Mototron cannot simply start selling rides to consumers. The company must first test the cars on public roads, which requires permission from state governments. It must also establish safety rules with federal regulators and negotiate sustainable insurance rates. At each step, Mototron will have to adjust its bottom line to take account of the legal costs of introducing cutting-edge but potentially dangerous technology into the American marketplace.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

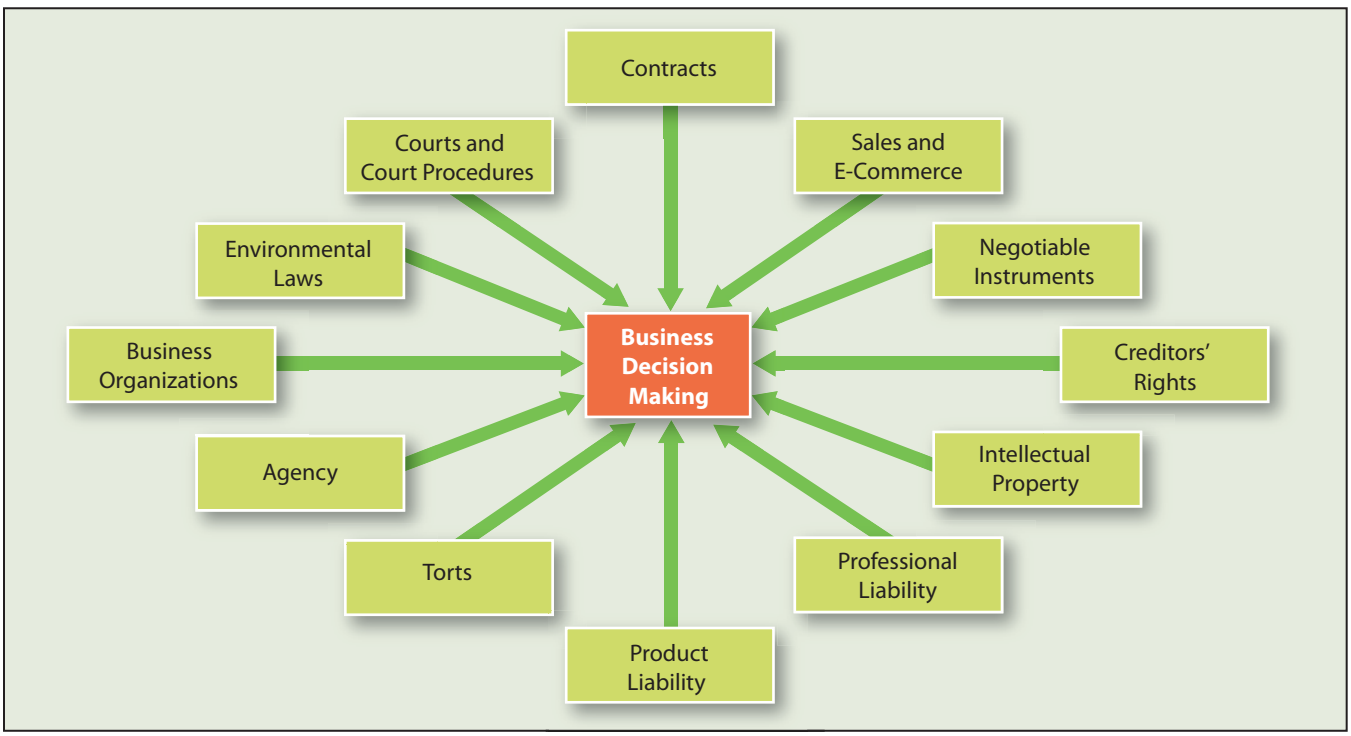
Our goal in this text is not only to teach you about specific laws, but also to teach you how to think about the law and legal environment, and to develop your critical-thinking and legal reasoning skills. The laws may change, but the ability to analyze and evaluate the legal (and ethical) ramifications of situations as they arise is an invaluable and lasting skill.

1–1 Business Activities and the Legal Environment



Laws and government regulations affect almost all business activities—from hiring and firing decisions to workplace safety, the manufacturing and marketing of products, business financing, and more. To make good business decisions, businesspersons need to understand the laws and regulations governing these activities.

Realize also that in today's business world, simply being aware of what conduct can lead to legal liability is not enough. Businesspersons must develop critical-thinking and legal reasoning skills so that they can evaluate how various laws might apply to a given situation and determine the best course of action. Businesspersons are also pressured to make ethical decisions. Thus, the study of business law necessarily involves an ethical dimension.

Liability The state of being legally responsible (liable) for something, such as a debt or obligation.

As you will note, each chapter in this text covers a specific area of the law and shows how the legal rules in that area affect business activities. Although compartmentalizing the law in this fashion facilitates learning, it does not indicate the extent to which many different laws may apply to just one transaction. Exhibit 1–1 illustrates the various areas of the law that may influence business decision making.

Exhibit 1–1 Areas of the Law That May Affect Business Decision Making

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Example 1.1 Soon after it launched, YouTube faced a potentially catastrophic $1 billion copyright infringement lawsuit. Entertainment conglomerate Viacom claimed that the video-hosting platform was not taking sufficient steps to remove unlicensed use of Viacom's content on its site. A federal judge ensured YouTube's survival by ruling that the company was in compliance with federal copyright law as long as it responded reasonably to "take-down" requests from Viacom and other content providers.

Not surprisingly, with five hundred hours of video uploaded to its site each minute, YouTube has remained under constant legal pressure ever since. Liberal and conservative groups have sued the company for discriminating against their political viewpoints. It has faced regulatory scrutiny for, among other things, failing to protect users from sexual and racist harassment and hosting misleading election-related video content. At one point, the Federal Trade Commission fined the company $170 million for collecting personal information from children without their parents' consent. ■

1–2 Sources of American Law

Primary Source of Law A source that establishes the law on a particular issue, such as a constitution, a statute, an administrative rule, or a court decision.

Focus Question 1

What are four primary sources of law in the United States?

There are numerous sources of American law. A source that establishes the law on a particular issue is called a primary source of law. Primary sources include the following:

- The U.S. Constitution and the constitutions of the various states.
- Statutory law—including laws passed by Congress, state legislatures, and local governing bodies.
- Regulations created by administrative agencies, such as the federal Food and Drug Administration.
- Case law (court decisions).

We describe each of these important primary sources of law in the following pages. (See the appendix at the end of this chapter for a discussion of how to find statutes, regulations, and case law.)

Secondary Source of Law A publication that summarizes or interprets the law, such as a legal encyclopedia, a legal treatise, or an article in a law review.

A secondary source of law is a book or article that summarizes and clarifies a primary source of law. Legal encyclopedias, compilations (such as Restatements of the Law, which summarize court decisions on a particular topic), official comments to statutes, treatises, articles in law reviews published by law schools, and articles in other legal journals are examples of secondary sources of law. Courts often refer to secondary sources of law for guidance in interpreting and applying the primary sources of law discussed here.

1–2a Constitutional Law

Constitutional Law The body of law derived from the U.S. Constitution and the constitutions of the various states.

The federal government and the states have written constitutions that set forth the general organization, powers, and limits of their respective governments. Constitutional law, which deals with the fundamental principles by which the government exercises its authority, is the law as expressed in these constitutions.

The U.S. Constitution is the basis of all law in the United States. It provides a framework for statutes and regulations, and thus is the supreme law of the land. A law in violation of the U.S. Constitution, if challenged, will be declared unconstitutional and will not be enforced, no matter what its source.

The Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution reserves to the states all powers not granted to the federal government. Each state in the union has its own constitution. Unless it conflicts with the U.S. Constitution or a federal law, a state constitution is supreme within that state's borders.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1–2b Statutory Law

Laws enacted by legislative bodies at any level of government, such as the statutes passed by Congress or by state legislatures, make up the body of law generally referred to as statutory law. When a legislature passes a statute, that statute ultimately is included in the federal code of laws or the relevant state code of laws.

Whenever a particular statute is mentioned in this text, we usually provide a footnote showing its citation (a reference to a publication in which a legal authority—such as a statute or a court decision—or other source can be found). In the appendix following this chapter, we explain how you can use these citations to find statutory law.

Statutory Law The body of law enacted by legislative bodies (as opposed to constitutional law, administrative law, or case law).

Citation A reference to a publication in which a legal authority—such as a statute or a court decision—or other source can be found.

Ordinance A regulation enacted by a city or county legislative body that becomes part of that city's or county's statutory law.

Local Ordinances Statutory law also includes local ordinances. An ordinance is a regulation passed by a municipal or county governing unit to deal with matters not covered by federal or state law. Ordinances commonly have to do with city or county land use (zoning ordinances), building and safety codes, and other matters affecting only the local governing unit.

Applicability of Statutes A federal statute, of course, applies to all states. A state statute, in contrast, applies only within the state's borders. State laws thus may vary from state to state. No federal statute may violate the U.S. Constitution, and no state statute or local ordinance may violate the U.S. Constitution or the relevant state constitution.

Example 1.2 The tension between federal, state, and local laws is evident in the national debate over so-called sanctuary cities—cities that limit their cooperation with federal immigration authorities. Normally, law enforcement officials are supposed to alert federal immigration authorities when they come into contact with an undocumented immigrant. Then, immigration officials request the state and local authorities to detain the individual for possible deportation.

But a number of cities across the United States have adopted either local ordinances or explicit policies that do not follow this procedure. Police in these cities often do not ask or report the immigration status of individuals with whom they come into contact. Other places refuse to detain undocumented immigrants who are accused of low-level offenses. ■

Michael Dwyer/Alamy

How have local "sanctuary cities" frustrated federal immigration procedures?

Uniform Laws During the 1800s, the differences among state laws frequently created difficulties for businesspersons conducting trade and commerce among the states. To counter these problems, a group of legal scholars and lawyers formed the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL, online at www.uniformlaws.org) in 1892 to draft uniform laws ("model statutes") for the states to consider adopting. The NCCUSL still exists today and continues to issue uniform laws.

Uniform Laws Model laws developed by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws for the states to consider enacting into statute.

Each state has the option of adopting or rejecting a uniform law. Only if a state legislature adopts a uniform law does that law become part of the statutory law of that state. Furthermore, a state legislature may choose to adopt only part of a uniform law or to rewrite the sections that are adopted. Hence, even though many states may have adopted a uniform law, those laws may not be entirely "uniform."

The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) One of the most important uniform acts is the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which was created through the joint efforts of the NCCUSL and the American Law Institute.[1] The UCC was first issued in 1952 and has been adopted in all fifty states,[2] the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The UCC facilitates commerce among the states by providing a uniform, yet flexible, set of rules governing commercial transactions. Because of its importance in the area of commercial law, we cite the UCC frequently in this text. From time to time, the NCCUSL revises the articles contained in the UCC and submits the revised versions to the states for adoption.

1–2c Administrative Law

Administrative Law The body of law created by administrative agencies in order to carry out their duties and responsibilities.

Administrative Agency A federal, state, or local government agency created by the legislature to perform a specific function, such as to make and enforce rules pertaining to the environment.

Another important source of American law is administrative law, which consists of the rules, orders, and decisions of administrative agencies. An administrative agency is a federal, state, or local government agency established to perform a specific function.

Rules issued by various administrative agencies affect almost every aspect of a business's operations. Regulations govern a business's capital structure and financing, its hiring and firing procedures, its relations with employees and unions, and the way it manufactures and markets its products.

Federal Agencies At the national level, numerous executive agencies exist within the cabinet departments of the executive branch. The Food and Drug Administration, for example, is an agency within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Executive agencies are subject to the authority of the president, who has the power to appoint and remove their officers.

There are also major independent regulatory agencies at the federal level, including the Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission. The president's power is less pronounced in regard to independent agencies, whose officers serve for fixed terms and cannot be removed without just cause.

State and Local Agencies There are administrative agencies at the state and local levels as well. Commonly, a state agency (such as a state pollution-control agency) is created as a parallel to a federal agency (such as the Environmental Protection Agency).

Just as federal statutes take precedence over conflicting state statutes, so do federal agency regulations take precedence over conflicting state regulations. Because the rules of state and local agencies vary widely, we focus here exclusively on federal administrative law.

Agency Creation Because Congress cannot possibly oversee the actual implementation of all the laws it enacts, it delegates such tasks to agencies. Congress creates an administrative agency by enacting enabling legislation, which specifies the name, composition, purpose, and powers of the agency being created.

Enabling Legislation A statute enacted by Congress that authorizes the creation of an administrative agency and specifies the name, composition, purpose, and powers of the agency being created.

Example 1.3 The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) was created in 1914 by the Federal Trade Commission Act.[3] This act prohibits unfair and deceptive trade practices. It also describes the procedures the agency must follow to charge persons or organizations with violations of the act, and it provides for judicial review (review by the courts) of agency orders.

Other portions of the act grant the agency powers to "make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the Act," and to conduct investigations of business practices. In addition, the FTC can obtain reports from interstate corporations concerning their business practices, investigate possible violations of the act, publish findings of its investigations, and recommend new legislation. The act also empowers the FTC to hold trial-like hearings and to adjudicate (resolve judicially) certain kinds of disputes involving its regulations.

Adjudicate To render a judicial decision. Adjudication is the trial-like proceeding in which an administrative law judge hears and resolves disputes involving an administrative agency's regulations.

1. This institute was formed in the 1920s and consists of practicing attorneys, legal scholars, and judges.
2. Louisiana has adopted only Articles 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, and 9.
3. 15 U.S.C. Sections 45–58.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Note that the powers granted to the FTC incorporate functions associated with the legislative branch of government (rulemaking), the executive branch (investigation and enforcement), and the judicial branch (adjudication). Taken together, these functions constitute the administrative process, which is the administration of law by administrative agencies. The administrative process involves rulemaking, enforcement, and adjudication.

Administrative Process The procedure used by administrative agencies in fulfilling their three basic functions: rulemaking, enforcement, and adjudication.

Rulemaking A major function of an administrative agency is rulemaking—formulating new regulations or amending old ones. When Congress enacts an agency's enabling legislation, it confers the power to make legislative rules, or substantive rules, which are legally binding on all businesses.

The Administrative Procedure Act (APA)[4] imposes strict procedural requirements that agencies must follow in legislative rulemaking and other functions. Example 1.4 The Occupational Safety and Health Act authorized the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) to develop and issue rules governing safety in the workplace. When OSHA wants to formulate rules regarding safety in the steel industry, it has to follow specific procedures outlined by the APA. If an agency fails to follow the APA's rulemaking procedures, the resulting rule may not be binding.

Terry J/iStock/Getty Images Plus

Which federal agency oversees worker safety?

Legislative Rules. Legislative rulemaking under the APA typically involves the following three steps (referred to as notice-and-comment rulemaking).

1. Notice of the proposed rulemaking. The notice must be published in the Federal Register, a daily publication of the U.S. government.
2. A comment period. The agency must allow ample time for interested parties to comment in writing on the proposed rule. The agency takes these comments into consideration when drafting the final version of the regulation.
3. The final rule. Once the agency has drafted the final rule, it is published in the Federal Register. (See the appendix at the end of this chapter for an explanation of how to find agency regulations.)

Rulemaking The process by which an administrative agency formally adopts a new regulation or amends an old one.

Legislative Rules Administrative agency rules that carry the same weight as congressionally enacted statutes.

Interpretive Rules. Administrative agencies also issue interpretive rules that are not legally binding but simply indicate how an agency plans to interpret and enforce its statutory authority. The APA does not apply to interpretive rulemaking. Example 1.5 The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission periodically issues interpretive rules indicating how it plans to interpret the provisions of certain statutes, such as the Americans with Disabilities Act. These informal rules provide enforcement guidelines for agency officials.

Interpretive Rules Nonbinding rules or policy statements issued by an administrative agency that explain how it interprets and intends to apply the statutes it enforces.

Enforcement and Investigation Agencies often enforce their own rules and have both investigatory and prosecutorial powers. Agencies investigate a wide range of activities, including coal mining, automobile manufacturing, and the industrial discharge of pollutants into the environment.

In an investigation, an agency can request that individuals or organizations hand over specified books, papers, electronic records, or other documents. In addition, agencies may conduct on-site inspections, although a search warrant is normally required for such inspections.[5] Sometimes, a search of a home, an office, or a factory is the only means of obtaining evidence needed to prove a regulatory violation.

After investigating a suspected rule violation, an agency may decide to take action against an individual or a business. Most administrative actions are resolved through negotiated

4. 5 U.S.C. Sections 551–706.
5. In some heavily regulated industries, such as the sale of firearms or liquor, agencies can conduct searches without obtaining a warrant.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

settlement at their initial stages without the need for formal adjudication. If a settlement cannot be reached, though, the agency may issue a formal complaint and proceed to adjudication.

Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) One who presides over an administrative agency hearing and has the power to administer oaths, take testimony, rule on questions of evidence, and make determinations of fact.

Adjudication Agency adjudication involves a trial-like hearing before an administrative law judge (ALJ). Hearing procedures vary widely from agency to agency. After the hearing, the ALJ renders a decision in the case. The ALJ can fine the charged party or prohibit the party from carrying on some specified activity.

Either the agency or the charged party may appeal the ALJ's decision to the commission or board that governs the agency. If the party fails to get relief there, appeal can be made to a federal court. Courts give significant weight (deference) to an agency's judgment and interpretation of its rules, though, and typically uphold the ALJ's decision unless it is unreasonable. If neither side appeals the case, the ALJ's decision becomes final.

Ethical Issue

Do administrative agencies exercise too much authority? Administrative agencies, such as the Federal Trade Commission, combine in a single governmental entity functions normally divided among the three branches of government. They create rules, conduct investigations, and prosecute and pass judgment on violators. Yet administrative agencies' powers often go unchecked by the other branches. Some businesspersons have suggested that it is unethical for agencies—which are not even mentioned in the U.S. Constitution—to wield so many powers.

Although agency rulemaking must comply with the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act (APA), the act applies only to legislative, not interpretive, rulemaking. In addition, the APA is largely procedural and aimed at preventing arbitrariness. It does little to ensure that the rules passed by agencies are fair or correct—or even cost-effective. On those rare occasions when an agency's ruling is challenged and later reviewed by a court, the court cannot reverse the agency's decision unless the agency exceeded its authority or acted arbitrarily. Courts typically are reluctant to second-guess an agency's rules, interpretations, and decisions. Moreover, once an agency has final regulations in place, it is difficult to revoke or alter them.

1–2d Case Law and Common Law Doctrines

Case Law The rules of law announced in court decisions. Case law interprets statutes, regulations, and constitutional provisions, and governs all areas not covered by statutory or administrative law.

The rules of law announced in court decisions constitute another basic source of American law. These rules of law include interpretations of constitutional provisions, of statutes enacted by legislatures, and of regulations created by administrative agencies.

Today, this body of judge-made law is referred to as case law. Case law—the doctrines and principles announced in cases—governs all areas not covered by statutory law or administrative law and is part of our common law tradition. We look at the origins and characteristics of the common law tradition in some detail in the discussion that follows.

1–3 The Common Law

Because of our colonial heritage, much American law is based on the English legal system. Knowledge of this system is crucial to understanding our legal system today because judges in the United States still apply common law principles when deciding cases.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1–3a Early English Courts

After the Normans conquered England in 1066, William the Conqueror and his successors began the process of unifying the country under their rule. One of the means they used to do this was the establishment of the king's courts, or curiae regis. Before the Norman Conquest, disputes had been settled according to the local legal customs and traditions in various regions of the country. The king's courts sought to establish a uniform set of rules for the country as a whole. What evolved in these courts was the beginning of the common law—a body of general rules that applied throughout the entire English realm. Eventually, the common law tradition became part of the heritage of all nations that were once British colonies, including the United States.

Common Law The body of law developed from custom or judicial decisions in English and U.S. courts, not attributable to a legislature.

Courts developed the common law rules from the principles underlying judges' decisions in actual legal controversies. Judges attempted to be consistent, and whenever possible, they based their decisions on the principles suggested by earlier cases. They sought to decide similar cases in a similar way and considered new cases with care because they knew that their decisions would make new law. Each interpretation became part of the law on the subject and served as a legal precedent—that is, a court decision that furnished an example or authority for deciding subsequent cases involving identical or similar legal principles or facts.

Focus Question 2

What is a precedent? When might a court depart from precedent?

Precedent A court decision that furnishes an example or authority for deciding subsequent cases involving identical or similar facts.

In the early years of the common law, there was no single place or publication where court opinions, or written decisions, could be found. Beginning in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, however, portions of significant decisions from each year were gathered together and recorded in Year Books. The Year Books were useful references for lawyers and judges. In the sixteenth century, the Year Books were discontinued, and other reports of cases became available. (See the appendix to this chapter for a discussion of how cases are reported, or published, in the United States today.)

1–3b Stare Decisis

The practice of deciding new cases with reference to former decisions, or precedents, eventually became a cornerstone of the English and U.S. judicial systems. The practice forms a doctrine called stare decisis [6] (a Latin phrase meaning "to stand on decided cases").

Stare Decisis A common law doctrine under which judges are obligated to follow the precedents established in prior decisions.

Under the doctrine of stare decisis, judges are obligated to follow the precedents established within their jurisdictions. (The term jurisdiction refers to a geographic area in which a court or courts have the power to apply the law.) Once a court has set forth a principle of law as being applicable to a certain set of facts, that court must apply the principle in future cases involving similar facts. Courts of lower rank (within the same jurisdiction) must do likewise. Thus, stare decisis has two aspects:

1. A court should not overturn its own precedents unless there is a strong reason to do so.
2. Decisions made by a higher court are binding on lower courts.

Controlling Precedents Precedents that must be followed within a jurisdiction are known as controlling precedents. Controlling precedents are binding authorities. A binding authority is any source of law that a court must follow when deciding a case. Binding authorities include constitutions, statutes, and regulations that govern the issue being decided, as well as court decisions that are controlling precedents within the jurisdiction. United States Supreme Court case decisions, no matter how old, remain controlling until they are overruled by a subsequent decision of the Supreme Court, by a constitutional amendment, or by congressional legislation.

Binding Authority Any source of law that a court must follow when deciding a case.

Know This

Courts normally must follow the rules set forth by higher courts in deciding cases with similar fact patterns.

Stare Decisis* and Legal Stability The doctrine of stare decisis helps the courts to be more efficient because if other courts have carefully reasoned through a similar case, their legal

6. Pronounced stahr-ee dih-si-sis.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Managerial Strategy

The Power of Precedent

Roberta owns and manages an independent auto repair shop in Boise City, Oklahoma. Over the past several years, business has been booming, thanks to an influx of people moving to Boise City from California. To take advantage of this population boom, Roberta is considering opening a used car dealership on an abandoned lot next to her repair shop.

Working Overtime

Knowing that used car dealerships operate on extremely thin margins, Roberta and her accountant attempt to come up with a list of all the costs to include in the new business plan. Roberta learns that other used car dealerships in the area are often open from 8 A.M. to 7 P.M., presumably to take advantage of customers who visit outside normal work hours. Most of the dealerships are also open on weekends, meaning that any salespeople that Roberta hires will work more than the normal forty-hour workweek. To determine her labor costs, Roberta needs to know if she must pay these employees overtime for the extra hours.

Relying on Stare Decisis

With auto repairs, the customer is charged a certain amount of "booked" hours per job, no matter how long the repair takes. Roberta's auto mechanics are paid per "booked" hour, also regardless of how long the actual repair takes. Consequently, the issue of overtime does not apply. Roberta knows she won't be able to pay her salespeople using this system. To get more information on her options, she calls Fran, a local labor lawyer, for advice.

Fran tells Roberta that, under the federal Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), employers are not required to pay overtime for any "sales[person] . . . primarily engaged in selling or servicing any automobiles." Furthermore, in a recent case, the United States Supreme Court upheld this segment of the FLSA, holding that the "plain language" of the federal law should determine the outcome of any overtime pay dispute. So, under federal law, the salespeople at Roberta's used car dealership would be exempt from overtime pay. Furthermore, explains Fran, thanks to the doctrine of stare decisis, should the salespeople sue Roberta seeking overtime pay, she could reasonably rely on the Supreme Court's decision as binding precedent on this matter.

Business Questions

1. "When faced with a clearly erroneous precedent, my rule is simple," writes Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. "We should not follow it." How do these words offer a cautionary tale for managers relying on stare decisis to make business decisions?

2. Should Roberta consider paying her salespeople overtime even though it is not required by federal law? Why or why not?

reasoning and opinions can serve as guides. Stare decisis also makes the law more stable and predictable. If the law on a given subject is well settled, someone bringing a case to court can usually rely on the court to make a decision based on what the law has been. (See this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature to learn how this stability can help business managers in their decision-making process.)

Departures from Precedent Although courts are obligated to follow precedents, sometimes a court will depart from the rule of precedent. If a court decides that a precedent is simply incorrect or that technological or social changes have rendered the precedent inapplicable, the court may rule contrary to the precedent. Cases that overturn precedent often receive a great deal of publicity.

Classic Case Example 1.6 In Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka,[7] the United States Supreme Court expressly overturned precedent. The Court concluded that separate educational facilities for whites and blacks, which had previously been upheld as constitutional,[8] were inherently unequal. The Supreme Court's departure from precedent in the Brown decision received a tremendous amount of publicity as people began to realize the ramifications of this change in the law.

7. 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954).
8. See Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

When There Is No Precedent Occasionally, courts must decide cases for which no precedents exist, called cases of first impression. For instance, as you will read throughout this text, the Internet and certain other technologies have presented many new and challenging issues for the courts to decide.

When deciding cases of first impression, courts often look at persuasive authorities. A persuasive authority is a legal authority that a court may consult for guidance but that is not binding on the court. A court may consider precedents from other jurisdictions, for instance, although those precedents are not binding. A court may also consider legal principles and policies underlying previous court decisions or existing statutes. Additionally, a court might look at fairness, social values and customs, and public policy (governmental policy based on widely held societal values). Federal courts can also look at unpublished opinions (those not intended for publication in a printed legal reporter) as sources of persuasive authority.[9]

Persuasive Authority Any legal authority or source of law that a court may look to for guidance but need not follow when making its decision.

Stare Decisis and Legal Reasoning In deciding what law applies to a given dispute and then applying that law to the facts or circumstances of the case, judges rely on the process of legal reasoning. Through the use of legal reasoning, judges harmonize their decisions with those that have been made before, as the doctrine of stare decisis requires.

Legal Reasoning The process of reasoning by which judges harmonize their opinions with the judicial opinions in previous cases.

Students of business law and the legal environment also engage in critical thinking and legal reasoning. For instance, you may be asked to provide answers for some of the case problems that appear at the end of every chapter in this text. Each problem describes the facts of a particular dispute and the legal question at issue. If you are assigned a case problem, you will be asked to determine how a court would answer that question, and why. In other words, you will need to give legal reasons for whatever conclusion you reach.

Basic Steps in Legal Reasoning. At times, the legal arguments set forth in court opinions are relatively simple and brief. At other times, the arguments are complex and lengthy. Regardless of the length of a legal argument, however, the basic steps of the legal reasoning process remain the same. These steps, which you can also follow when analyzing cases and case problems, form what is commonly referred to as the IRAC method of legal reasoning. IRAC is an acronym formed from the first letters of the words Issue, Rule, Application, and Conclusion. To apply the IRAC method, ask the following questions:

1. Issue—*What are the key facts and issues? This may sound obvious, but before you can analyze or apply the relevant law to a specific set of facts, you must clearly understand those facts. In other words, you should read through the case problem carefully—more than once, if necessary. Make sure that you understand the identities of the plaintiff (the one who initiates the lawsuit) and the defendant (the one being sued) in the case, and the progression of events that led to the lawsuit.

   Suppose that a plaintiff, Anna, comes before the court claiming assault (words or acts that wrongfully and intentionally make another person apprehensive of harmful or offensive contact). Anna claims that the defendant, Bryce threatened her while she was sleeping. Although the plaintiff was unaware that she was being threatened, her roommate, Jan, heard the defendant make the threat. So, in this scenario, the identities of the parties are obvious. Anna is the plaintiff, and Bryce is the defendant.

   The legal issue in this case is whether the defendant's action constitutes the tort of assault even though the plaintiff was unaware of that threat at the time it occurred. (A tort is a wrongful act brought under civil rather than criminal law.)

Plaintiff One who initiates a lawsuit.

Defendant One against whom a lawsuit is brought or the accused person in a criminal proceeding.

9. Rule 32.1 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

2. Rule—*What rule of law applies to the case? A rule of law may be a rule stated by the courts in previous decisions, by a state or federal statute, or by a state or federal administrative agency regulation. Often, more than one rule of law will be applicable to a case.

   In our hypothetical case, Anna and her attorney allege (claim) that Bryce committed a tort. Therefore, the applicable law is the common law of torts—specifically, tort law governing assault. Case precedents involving similar facts and issues thus would be relevant.

Allege To state, recite, assert, or charge.

3. Application—*How does the rule of law apply to the particular facts and circumstances of this case? This step is often the most difficult because each case presents a unique set of facts, circumstances, and parties. Although cases may be similar, no two cases are ever identical in all respects.

   Normally, judges (and lawyers and law students) try to find previously decided cases that are as similar as possible to the one under consideration. Such a case is called a case on point. In this situation, there might be case precedents showing that if a victim is unaware of the threat of harmful or offensive contact, then no assault occurred. These would be cases on point that tend to prove that the defendant did not commit assault and should win the case.

Case on Point A previous case involving factual circumstances and issues that are similar to those in the case before the court.

   There might, however, also be cases showing that a sexual assault, at least, can occur even if the victim is asleep. These would be cases on point in the plaintiff's favor. You will need to carefully analyze if there are any missing facts in Anna's claim. For instance, you might want to know the specific threat that Bryce made (and Anna's roommate overheard). Did he threaten to rape, kill, or beat her? Did he know that she was asleep when he made the threat? Did he know that her roommate heard the threat and would relay it to her when she awoke? Sometimes, you will want to obtain additional facts before analyzing which case precedents should apply and control the outcome of the case.

4. Conclusion—*What conclusion should be drawn? This step normally presents few problems. Usually, the conclusion is evident if the previous three steps have been followed carefully. In our sample problem, for instance, you may determine that Bryce did not commit a tort because Anna could not prove all of the required elements of assault.

There Is No One "Right" Answer. Many people believe that there is one "right" answer to every legal question. In many legal controversies, however, there is no single correct result. Good arguments can usually be made to support either side of a legal controversy. Quite often, a case does not involve a "good" person suing a "bad" person. In many cases, both parties have acted in good faith in some measure or in bad faith to some degree. Additionally, each judge has her or his own personal beliefs and philosophy. To some extent, these personal factors shape the legal reasoning process.

Remedy The relief given to an innocent party to enforce a right or compensate for the violation of a right.

1–3c Equitable Remedies and Courts of Equity

A remedy is the means given to a party to enforce a right or to compensate for the violation of a right. Example 1.7 Elena is injured because of Rowan's wrongdoing. If Elena files a lawsuit and is successful, a court can order Rowan to compensate Elena for the harm by paying her a certain amount. The compensation is Elena's remedy.

Focus Question 3

What is the difference between remedies at law and remedies in equity?

The kinds of remedies available in the early king's courts of England were severely restricted. If one person wronged another, the king's courts could award either money or property, including land, as compensation. These courts became known as courts of law, and the remedies were called remedies at law. Even though this system introduced uniformity in the settling of disputes, when a person wanted a remedy other than property or economic compensation, the courts of law could do nothing, so "no remedy, no right."

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Remedies in Equity Equity is a branch of law—founded on notions of justice and fair dealing—that seeks to supply a remedy when no adequate remedy at law is available. When individuals could not obtain an adequate remedy in a court of law, they petitioned the king for relief. Most of these petitions were referred to the chancellor, an adviser to the king who had the power to grant new and unique remedies. Eventually, formal chancery courts, or courts of equity, were established. The remedies granted by the chancery courts were called remedies in equity.

Plaintiffs (those bringing lawsuits) had to specify whether they were bringing an "action at law" or an "action in equity," and they chose their courts accordingly. A plaintiff might ask a court of equity to order the defendant to perform within the terms of a contract. A court of law could not issue such an order because its remedies were limited to the payment of money or property as compensation for damages.

A court of equity, however, could issue a decree for specific performance—an order to perform what was promised. A court of equity could also issue an injunction, directing a party to do or refrain from doing a particular act. In certain cases, a court of equity could allow for the rescission (cancellation) of the contract, thereby returning the parties to the positions that they held prior to the contract's formation. Equitable remedies will be discussed in greater detail in the chapters covering contracts.

The Merging of Law and Equity Today, in most states, the courts of law and equity have merged, and thus the distinction between the two courts has largely disappeared. A plaintiff may now request both legal and equitable remedies in the same action, and the trial court judge may grant either form—or both forms—of relief.

The distinction between legal and equitable remedies remains significant, however, because a court normally will grant an equitable remedy only when the remedy at law (property or monetary damages) is inadequate. To request the proper remedy, a businessperson (or her or his attorney) must know what remedies are available for the specific kinds of harms suffered. Exhibit 1–2 summarizes the procedural differences (applicable in most states) between an action at law and an action in equity.

Know This

Even though courts of law and equity have merged, the principles of equity still apply, and courts will not grant an equitable remedy unless the remedy at law is inadequate.

Equitable Maxims Over time, the courts have developed a number of equitable maxims that provide guidance in deciding whether plaintiffs should be granted equitable relief. Because of their importance, both historically and in our judicial system today, these maxims are set forth in this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature.

Equitable Maxims General propositions or principles of law that have to do with fairness (equity).

Exhibit 1–2 Procedural Differences between an Action at Law and an Action in Equity

PROCEDURE	ACTION AT LAW	ACTION IN EQUITY
Initiation of lawsuit	By filing a complaint	By filing a petition
Decision	By jury or judge	By judge (no jury)
Result	Judgment	Decree
Remedy	Monetary damages or property	Injunction, specific performance, or rescission

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1–3d Schools of Legal Thought

How judges apply the law to specific cases, including disputes relating to the business world, depends on their philosophical approaches to law, among other things. The study of law, often referred to as jurisprudence, includes learning about different schools of legal thought and discovering how each school's approach to law can affect judicial decision making.

Jurisprudence The science or philosophy of law.

Natural Law The oldest school of legal thought, based on the belief that the legal system should reflect universal ("higher") moral and ethical principles that are inherent in human nature.

The Natural Law School According to the natural law theory, a higher, or universal, law exists that applies to all human beings. Each written law should reflect the principles inherent in natural law. If it does not, then it loses its legitimacy and need not be obeyed.

The natural law tradition is one of the oldest and most significant schools of jurisprudence. It dates back to the days of the Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 B.C.E.), who distinguished between natural law and the laws governing a particular nation. According to Aristotle, natural law applies universally to all humankind.

Science History Images/Alamy Stock Photo

What is the basic premise of Aristotle's natural law theory?

The notion that people have "natural rights" stems from the natural law tradition. Those who claim that certain nations, such as China and North Korea, are depriving many of their citizens of their human rights are implicitly appealing to a higher law that has universal applicability.

The question of the universality of basic human rights also comes into play in the context of international business operations. For instance, U.S. companies that have operations abroad often hire foreign workers as employees. Should the same laws that protect U.S. employees apply to these foreign employees? This question is rooted implicitly in a concept of universal rights that has its origins in the natural law tradition.

Legal Positivism Positive law, or national law, is the written law of a given society at a particular point in time. In contrast to natural law, it applies only to the citizens of that nation or society. Those who adhere to legal positivism believe that there can be no higher law than a nation's positive law.

Legal Positivism A school of legal thought centered on the assumption that there is no law higher than the laws created by a national government. Laws must be obeyed, even if they are unjust, to prevent anarchy.

According to the positivist school, there is no such thing as "natural rights." Rather, human rights exist solely because of laws. If the laws are not enforced, anarchy will result. Thus, whether a law is morally "bad" or "good" is irrelevant. The law is the law and must be obeyed until it is changed—in an orderly manner through a legitimate lawmaking process. A judge who takes this view will probably be more inclined to defer to an existing law than would a judge who adheres to the natural law tradition.

Historical School A school of legal thought that looks to the past to determine what the principles of contemporary law should be.

The Historical School The historical school of legal thought emphasizes the evolutionary process of law by concentrating on the origin and history of the legal system. This school looks to the past to discover what the principles of contemporary law should be. The legal doctrines that have withstood the passage of time—those that have worked in the past—are deemed best suited for shaping present laws. Hence, law derives its legitimacy and authority from adhering to the standards that historical development has shown to be workable. Followers of the historical school are more likely than those of other schools to adhere strictly to decisions made in past cases.

Legal Realism A school of legal thought that holds that the law is only one factor to be considered when deciding cases, and that social and economic circumstances should also be taken into account.

Legal Realism In the 1920s and 1930s, a number of jurists and scholars, known as legal realists, rebelled against the historical approach to law. Legal realism is based on the idea that law is just one of many institutions in society and that it is shaped by social forces and needs. This school reasons that because the law is a human enterprise, judges should look beyond the law and take social and economic realities into account when deciding cases.

Legal realists also believe that the law can never be applied with total uniformity. Given that judges are human beings with unique experiences, personalities, value systems, and

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Equitable Maxims

In medieval England, courts of equity were expected to use discretion in supplementing the common law. Even today, when the same court can award both legal and equitable remedies, it must exercise discretion.

Students of business law and the legal environment should know that courts often invoke equitable maxims when making their decisions. Here are some of the most significant equitable maxims:

1. Whoever seeks equity must do equity. (Anyone who wishes to be treated fairly must treat others fairly.)
2. Where there is equal equity, the law must prevail. (The law will determine the outcome of a controversy in which the merits of both sides are equal.)
3. One seeking the aid of an equity court must come to the court with clean hands. (Plaintiffs must have acted fairly and honestly.)
4. Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy. (Equitable relief will be awarded when there is a right to relief and there is no adequate remedy at law.)
5. Equity regards substance rather than form. (Equity is more concerned with fairness and justice than with legal technicalities.)
6. Equity aids the vigilant, not those who rest on their rights. (Equity will not help those who neglect their rights for an unreasonable period of time.)

The last maxim has come to be known as the equitable doctrine of laches. The doctrine arose to encourage people to bring lawsuits while the evidence was fresh. If they failed to do so, they would not be allowed to bring a lawsuit. What constitutes a reasonable time, of course, varies according to the circumstances of the case.

Time periods for different types of cases are now usually fixed by statutes of limitations—that is, statutes that set the maximum time period during which a certain action can be brought. After the time allowed under a statute of limitations has expired, no action can be brought, no matter how strong the case was originally.

Application to Today's World The equitable maxims listed here underlie many of the legal rules and principles that are commonly applied by the courts today—and that you will read about in this book.

For instance, in the contracts materials, you will read about the doctrine of promissory estoppel. Under this doctrine, a person who has reasonably and substantially relied on the promise of another may be able to obtain some measure of recovery, even though no enforceable contract exists. The court will estop (bar) the one making the promise from asserting the lack of a valid contract as a defense. The rationale underlying the doctrine of promissory estoppel is similar to that expressed in the fourth and fifth maxims just listed.

intellects, different judges will obviously bring different reasoning processes to the same case. Female judges, for instance, might be more inclined than male judges to consider whether a decision might have a negative impact on the employment of women or minorities.

1–4 Classifications of Law

The law may be broken down according to several classification systems. One classification system divides law into substantive law (all laws that define, describe, regulate, and create legal rights and obligations) and procedural law (all laws that establish the methods of enforcing the rights established by substantive law).

Substantive Law Law that defines, describes, regulates, and creates legal rights and obligations.

Procedural Law Law that establishes the methods of enforcing the rights established by substantive law.

Example 1.8 A state law that provides employees with the right to workers' compensation benefits for any on-the-job injuries they sustain is a substantive law because it creates legal rights. Procedural laws, in contrast, establish the method by which an employee must notify the employer about an on-the-job injury, prove the injury, and periodically submit additional proof to continue receiving workers' compensation benefits. ■ Note that a law may contain both substantive and procedural provisions.

Other classification systems divide law into federal law and state law, and private law (dealing with relationships between persons) and public law (addressing the relationship between persons and their governments). Frequently, people use the term cyberlaw to refer to the emerging body of law that governs transactions conducted via the Internet, but cyberlaw is not really a classification of law. Rather, it is an informal term used to refer to both new laws and modifications of traditional legal principles that relate to the online environment.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Cyberlaw An informal term used to refer to all laws governing electronic communications and transactions, particularly those conducted via the Internet.

Focus Question 4

What are some important differences between civil law and criminal law?

1–4a Civil Law and Criminal Law

Civil law spells out the rights and duties that exist between persons and between persons and their governments, as well as the relief available when a person's rights are violated. Typically, in a civil case, a private party sues another private party who has failed to comply with a duty. Much of the law that we discuss in this text—including contract law and tort law—is civil law.

Civil Law The branch of law dealing with the definition and enforcement of all private or public rights, as opposed to criminal matters.

Criminal law has to do with wrongs committed against society for which society demands redress. Criminal acts are proscribed by local, state, or federal government statutes. Thus, criminal defendants are prosecuted by public officials, such as a district attorney (D.A.), on behalf of the state, not by their victims or other private parties.

Criminal Law The branch of law that defines and punishes wrongful actions committed against the public.

Whereas in a civil case the object is to obtain a remedy (such as monetary damages) to compensate the injured party, in a criminal case the object is to punish the wrongdoer in an attempt to deter others from similar actions. Penalties for violations of criminal statutes consist of fines and/or imprisonment—and, in some cases, death.

1–4b Common Law and Civil Law Systems

Two types of legal systems predominate around the globe today. One is the common law system of England and the United States, which we discussed earlier. In a common law system, the body of law derives from custom and judicial decisions and depends on the importance of legal precedent.

Civil Law System A system of law derived from Roman law that is based on codified laws (rather than on case precedents).

The other, known as a civil law system, is based on Roman civil law, or "code law," which relies on legal principles enacted into law by a legislature or governing body. Thus, in a civil law system, the primary source of law is a statutory code, and case precedents are not judicially binding, as they normally are in a common law system. Although judges in a civil law system often refer to previous decisions as sources of legal guidance, those decisions are not binding. (Note that a civil law system is not the same as civil law, discussed in the previous section.)

Generally, countries that were once colonies of Great Britain have retained their English common law heritage. The civil law system, which is used in most continental European nations, has been retained in countries that were once colonies of those nations (see Exhibit 1–3). In the United States, the state of Louisiana, because of its historical ties to France, is heavily influenced by principles of civil law systems. A third, less prevalent legal system is widespread in Islamic countries, where the law is often influenced by sharia, the religious law of Islam.

1–4c National and International Law

U.S. businesspersons increasingly engage in transactions that extend beyond our national borders. For this reason, those who pursue a career in business today should have an understanding of the global legal environment.

National Law Law that pertains to a particular nation (as opposed to international law).

The law of a particular nation, such as Japan or Germany, is national law. National law, of course, varies from country to country because each country's law reflects the interests, customs, activities, and values that are unique to that nation's culture. Even though the laws and legal systems of various countries differ substantially, broad similarities do exist.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 1–3 The Legal Systems of Selected Nations

CIVIL LAW		COMMON LAW
Argentina	Indonesia	Australia	Nigeria
Austria	Iran	Bangladesh	Singapore
Brazil	Italy	Canada	United Kingdom
Chile	Japan	Ghana	United States
China	Mexico	India	Zambia
Egypt	Poland	Israel
Finland	South Korea	Jamaica
France	Sweden	Kenya
Germany	Tunisia	Malaysia
Greece	Venezuela	New Zealand

In contrast, international law applies to more than one nation. International law can be defined as a body of written and unwritten laws observed by independent nations and governing the acts of individuals as well as governments. It is a mixture of rules and constraints derived from a variety of sources, including the laws of individual nations, customs developed among nations, and international treaties and organizations.

International Law Law that governs relations among nations.

The key difference between national law and international law is that government authorities can enforce national law. If a nation violates an international law, however, enforcement is up to other countries or international organizations, which may or may not choose to act. If persuasive tactics fail, the only option is to take coercive actions against the violating nation. Coercive actions range from the severance of diplomatic relations and boycotts to sanctions and, as a last resort, war.

Practice and Review

Suppose that the California legislature passes a law that severely restricts carbon dioxide emissions of automobiles in that state. A group of automobile manufacturers files a suit against the state of California to prevent enforcement of the law. The automakers claim that a federal law already sets fuel economy standards nationwide and that these standards are essentially the same as carbon dioxide emission standards. According to the automobile manufacturers, it is unfair to allow California to impose more stringent regulations than those set by the federal law. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Who are the parties (the plaintiffs and the defendant) in this lawsuit?
2. Are the plaintiffs seeking a legal remedy or an equitable remedy? Why?
3. What is the primary source of the law that is at issue here?
4. Read through the appendix that follows this chapter, and then answer the following question: Where would you look to find the relevant California and federal laws?

Debate This

Under the doctrine of stare decisis*, courts are obligated to follow the precedents established in their jurisdiction unless there is a compelling reason not to do so. Should U.S. courts continue to adhere to this common law principle, given that our government now regulates so many areas by statute?*

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

adjudicate 6 administrative agency 6 administrative law 6 administrative law judge (ALJ) 8 administrative process 7 allege 12 binding authority 9 case law 8 case on point 12 citation 5 civil law 16
civil law system 16 common law 9 concurring opinion 27
constitutional law 4
criminal law 16 cyberlaw 16 defendant 11 dissenting opinion 27 enabling legislation 6 equitable maxims 13
historical school 14
international law 17 interpretive rules 7 jurisprudence 14 law 2 legal positivism 14
legal realism 14
legal reasoning 11 legislative rules 7 liability 3 majority opinion 27 national law 16 natural law 14 ordinance 5 per curiam* opinion 27 persuasive authority 11 plaintiff 11 plurality opinion 27 precedent 9 primary source of law 4 procedural law 15 remedy 12 rulemaking 7 secondary source of law 4 stare decisis 9 statutory law 5 substantive law 15 uniform laws 5

Chapter Summary: Law and Legal Reasoning

Sources of American Law	1. Constitutional law—The law as expressed in the U.S. Constitution and the various state constitutions. The U.S. Constitution is the supreme law of the land. State constitutions are supreme within state borders to the extent that they do not violate the U.S. Constitution or a federal law. 2. Statutory law—Laws or ordinances created by federal, state, and local legislatures. None of these laws can violate the U.S. Constitution, and no state statute or local ordinance can violate the relevant state constitution. Uniform laws, when adopted by a state legislature, become statutory law in that state. 3. Administrative law—The rules, orders, and decisions of federal or state government administrative agencies. Federal administrative agencies are created by enabling legislation enacted by the U.S. Congress. Agency functions include rulemaking, investigation and enforcement, and adjudication. 4. Case law and common law doctrines—Judge-made law, including interpretations of constitutional provisions, of statutes enacted by legislatures, and of regulations created by administrative agencies. Case law governs all areas not covered by statutory law or administrative law, and is part of our common law tradition.
The Common Law	1. Common law—Law that originated in medieval England with the creation of the king's courts, or curiae regis, and the development of a body of rules that were common to (or applied in) all regions of the country. 2. Stare decisis—A doctrine under which judges "stand on decided cases"—or follow the rule of precedent—in deciding cases. Stare decisis is the cornerstone of the common law tradition. 3. Stare decisis* and legal reasoning—Judges use legal reasoning to harmonize their decisions with those that have been made before, as required by the doctrine of stare decisis. The basic steps of legal reasoning form what is often referred to as the IRAC method of legal reasoning. IRAC stands for Issue, Rule, Application, and Conclusion. First, clearly grasp the relevant facts and identify the issue. Second, determine the rule of law that applies to the case. Third, analyze (using cases on point) how the rule of law applies to the particular facts of the dispute, and fourth, arrive at a conclusion.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

	4. Remedies—A remedy is the means by which a court enforces a right or compensates for a violation of a right. Courts typically grant legal remedies (monetary damages or property) but may also grant equitable remedies (specific performance, injunction, or rescission) when the legal remedy is inadequate or unavailable. 5. Schools of legal thought—Judges' decision making is influenced by their philosophy of law. The following are four important schools of legal thought, or legal philosophies: a. Natural law—One of the oldest and most significant schools of legal thought. Those who believe in natural law hold that there is a universal law applicable to all human beings and that this law is of a higher order than positive, or national, law. b. Legal positivism—A school of legal thought centered on the assumption that there is no law higher than the laws created by the government. Laws must be obeyed, even if they are unjust, to prevent anarchy. c. Historical school—A school of legal thought that stresses the evolutionary nature of law and looks to doctrines that have withstood the passage of time for guidance in shaping present laws. d. Legal realism—A school of legal thought that generally advocates a less abstract and more realistic approach to the law. This approach takes into account customary practices and the social and economic circumstances in which transactions take place.
Classifications of Law	The law may be broken down according to several classification systems, such as substantive or procedural law, federal or state law, and private or public law. Three broad classifications are civil and criminal law, common law systems, and civil law systems, and national and international law. Cyberlaw is not really a classification of law but a term that refers to the growing body of case and statutory law that applies to Internet transactions.

Issue Spotters

1. The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides protection for the free exercise of religion. A state legislature enacts a law that outlaws all religions that do not derive from the Judeo-Christian tradition. Is this law valid within that state? Why or why not? (See Sources of American Law.)
2. Apex Corporation learns that a federal administrative agency is considering a rule that will have a negative impact on the firm's ability to do business. Does the firm have any opportunity to express its opinion about the pending rule? Explain. (See Sources of American Law.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

1–1. Binding versus Persuasive Authority. A county court in Illinois is deciding a case involving an issue that has never been addressed before in that state's courts. The Iowa Supreme Court, however, recently decided a case involving a very similar fact pattern. Is the Illinois court obligated to follow the Iowa Supreme Court's decision on the issue? If the United States Supreme Court had decided a similar case, would that decision be binding on the Illinois court? Explain. (See The Common Law.)

1–2. Sources of Law. This chapter discussed a number of sources of American law. Which source of law takes priority in the following situations, and why? (See Sources of American Law.)

1. A federal statute conflicts with the U.S. Constitution.
2. A federal statute conflicts with a state constitutional provision.
3. A state statute conflicts with the common law of that state.
4. A state constitutional amendment conflicts with the U.S. Constitution.

1–3. Remedies. Arthur Rabe is suing Xavier Sanchez for breaching a contract in which Sanchez promised to sell Rabe a Van Gogh painting for $150,000. (See The Common Law.)

1. In this lawsuit, who is the plaintiff, and who is the defendant?
2. If Rabe wants Sanchez to perform the contract as promised, what remedy should Rabe seek?
3. Suppose that Rabe wants to cancel the contract because Sanchez fraudulently misrepresented the painting as an original Van Gogh when in fact it is a copy. In this situation, what remedy should Rabe seek?
4. Will the remedy Rabe seeks in either situation be a remedy at law or a remedy in equity?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1–4. Philosophy of Law. After World War II ended in 1945, an international tribunal of judges convened at Nuremberg, Germany. The judges convicted several Nazi war criminals of "crimes against humanity." Assuming that the Nazis who were convicted had not disobeyed any law of their country and had merely been following their government's (Hitler's) orders, what law had they violated? Explain. (See The Common Law.)

1–5. Spotlight on AOL—Common Law. AOL, LLC, mistakenly made public the personal information of 650,000 of its members. The members filed a suit, alleging violations of California law. AOL asked the court to dismiss the suit on the basis of a "forum-selection" clause in its member agreement that designates Virginia courts as the place where member disputes will be tried. Under a decision of the United States Supreme Court, a forum-selection clause is unenforceable "if enforcement would contravene a strong public policy of the forum in which suit is brought." California has declared in other cases that the AOL clause contravenes a strong public policy. If the court applies the doctrine of stare decisis, will it dismiss the suit? Explain. [Doe 1 v. AOL, LLC, 552 F.3d 1077 (9th Cir. 2009)] (See The Common Law.)

1–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Reading Citations. Assume that you want to read the entire court opinion in the case of Friends of Buckingham v. State Air Pollution Control Board, 947 F.3d 68 (4th Cir. 2020).

Refer to the appendix to this chapter, and then explain specifically where you would find the court's opinion. (See Finding Case Law.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 1–6, go to Appendix E.

1–7. A Question of Ethics—The Doctrine of Precedent. Sandra White operated a travel agency. To obtain lower airline fares for her nonmilitary clients, she booked military-rate travel by forwarding fake military identification cards to the airlines. The government charged White with identity theft, which requires the "use" of another's identification. The trial court had two cases that represented precedents.

In the first case, David Miller obtained a loan to buy land by representing that certain investors had approved the loan when, in fact, they had not. Miller's conviction for identity theft was overturned because he had merely said that the investors had done something when they had not. According to the court, this was not the "use" of another's identification.

In the second case, Kathy Medlock, an ambulance service operator, had transported patients for whom there was no medical necessity to do so. To obtain payment, Medlock had forged a physician's signature. The court concluded that this was "use" of another person's identity. [United States v. White, 846 F.3d 170 (6th Cir. 2017)] (See Sources of American Law.)

1. Which precedent—the Miller case or the Medlock case—is similar to White's situation, and why?
2. In the two cases cited by the court, were there any ethical differences in the actions of the parties? Explain your answer.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

1–8. Business Law Writing. John's company is involved in a lawsuit with a customer, Beth. John argues that for fifty years higher courts in that state have decided cases involving circumstances similar to his case in a way that indicates he can expect a ruling in his company's favor. Write at least one paragraph discussing whether this is a valid argument. Write another paragraph discussing whether the judge in this case must rule as those other judges did, and why. (See The Common Law.)

1–9. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Court Opinions. Go to the section entitled Reading and Understanding Case Law in the appendix at the end of this chapter, and read through the subsection entitled "Decisions and Opinions."

1. One group will explain the difference between a concurring opinion and a majority opinion.
2. Another group will outline the difference between a concurring opinion and a dissenting opinion.
3. The third group will explain why judges and justices write concurring and dissenting opinions, given that these opinions will not affect the outcome of the case at hand, which has already been decided by majority vote.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Appendix to Chapter 1

Finding and Analyzing the Law

This text includes numerous references, or citations, to primary sources of law—federal and state statutes, the U.S. Constitution and state constitutions, regulations issued by administrative agencies, and court cases. A citation identifies the publication in which a legal authority—such as a statute or court decision—can be found. In this appendix, we explain how you can use citations to find primary sources of law. Note that in addition to being published in sets of books, as described next, most federal and state laws and case decisions are available online.

Finding Statutory and Administrative Law

When Congress passes laws, they are collected in a publication titled United States Statutes at Large. When state legislatures pass laws, they are collected in similar state publications. Most frequently, however, laws are referred to in their codified form—that is, the form in which they appear in the federal and state codes. In these codes, laws are compiled by subject.

United States Code

The United States Code (U.S.C.) arranges all existing federal laws of a public and permanent nature by subject. Each of the fifty-two subjects into which the U.S.C. arranges the laws is given a title and a title number. For example, laws relating to commerce and trade are collected in "Title 15, Commerce and Trade." Titles are subdivided by sections.

A citation to the U.S.C. includes title and section numbers. Thus, a reference to "15 U.S.C. Section 1" means that the statute can be found in Section 1 of Title 15. ("Section" may be designated by the symbol §, and "Sections" by §§.) In addition to the print publication of the U.S.C., the federal government also provides a searchable online database of the United States Code at www.gpo.gov (click on "Libraries" and then "Core Documents of Our Democracy" to find the United States Code).

Commercial publications of these laws are available and are widely used. For example, Thomson Reuters publishes the United States Code Annotated (U.S.C.A.). The U.S.C.A. contains the complete text of laws included in the U.S.C., notes of court decisions that interpret and apply specific sections of the statutes, and the text of presidential proclamations and executive orders. The U.S.C.A. also includes research aids, such as cross-references to related statutes, historical notes, and other references. A citation to the U.S.C.A. is similar to a citation to the U.S.C.: "15 U.S.C.A. Section 1."

State Codes

State codes follow the U.S.C. pattern of arranging laws by subject. The state codes may be called codes, revisions, compilations, consolidations, general statutes, or statutes, depending on the state.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

In some codes, subjects are designated by number. In others, they are designated by name. For example, "13 Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes Section 1101" means that the statute can be found in Title 13, Section 1101, of the Pennsylvania code. "California Commercial Code Section 1101" means the statute can be found in Section 1101 under the subject heading "Commercial Code" of the California code. Abbreviations may be used. For example, "13 Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes Section 1101" may be abbreviated "13 Pa. C.S. § 1101," and "California Commercial Code Section 1101" may be abbreviated "Cal. Com. Code § 1101."

Administrative Rules

Rules and regulations adopted by federal administrative agencies are initially published in the Federal Register, a daily publication of the U.S. government. Later, they are incorporated into the Code of Federal Regulations (C.F.R.).

Like the U.S.C., the C.F.R. is divided into titles. Rules within each title are assigned section numbers. A full citation to the C.F.R. includes title and section numbers. For example, a reference to "17 C.F.R. Section 230.504" means that the rule can be found in Section 230.504 of Title 17.

Finding Case Law

Before discussing the case reporting system, we need to look briefly at the court system. There are two types of courts in the United States: federal courts and state courts.

Both the federal and the state court systems consist of several levels, or tiers, of courts. Trial courts, in which evidence is presented and testimony is given, are on the bottom tier (which also includes lower courts handling specialized issues). Decisions from a trial court can be appealed to a higher court, which commonly is an intermediate court of appeals, or an appellate court. Decisions from these intermediate courts of appeals may be appealed to an even higher court, such as a state supreme court or the United States Supreme Court.

State Court Decisions

Most state trial court decisions are not published (except in New York and a few other states, which publish selected trial court opinions). Decisions from state trial courts are typically filed in the office of the clerk of the court, where the decisions are available for public inspection. (Increasingly, they can be found online as well.)

Written decisions of the appellate, or reviewing, courts, however, are published and distributed (in print and online). Many of the state court cases presented in this book are from state appellate courts. The reported appellate decisions are published in volumes called reports or reporters, which are numbered consecutively. State appellate court decisions are found in the state reporters of that particular state. Official reports are published by the state, whereas unofficial reports are published by nongovernment entities.

Regional Reporters State court opinions appear in regional units of the National Reporter System, published by Thomson Reuters. Most lawyers and libraries have these reporters because they report cases more quickly and are distributed more widely than the state-published reports. In fact, many states have eliminated their own reporters in favor of the National Reporter System.

The National Reporter System divides the states into the following geographic areas: Atlantic (A., A.2d, or A.3d), North Eastern (N.E., N.E.2d, or N.E.3d), North Western (N.W. or N.W.2d), Pacific (P., P.2d, or P.3d), South Eastern (S.E. or S.E.2d), South Western (S.W., S.W.2d, or S.W.3d), and Southern (So., So.2d, or So.3d). (The 2d and 3d in the abbreviations refer to Second Series and Third Series, respectively.) The states included in each of these regional divisions are indicated in Exhibit 1A–1, which illustrates the National Reporter System.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 1A–1 The National Reporter System—Regional/Federal

Regional Reporters	Coverage Beginning	Coverage
Atlantic Reporter (A., A.2d, or A.3d)	1885	Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Maine, Maryland, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont.
North Eastern Reporter (N.E., N.E.2d, or N.E.3d)	1885	Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, New York, and Ohio.
North Western Reporter (N.W. or N.W.2d)	1879	Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.
Pacific Reporter (P., P.2d, or P.3d)	1883	Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.
South Eastern Reporter (S.E. or S.E.2d)	1887	Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia.
South Western Reporter (S.W., S.W.2d, or S.W.3d)	1886	Arkansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, and Texas.
Southern Reporter (So., So.2d, or So.3d)	1887	Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi.
Federal Reporters
Federal Reporter (F., F.2d, or F.3d)	1880	U.S. Circuit Courts from 1880 to 1912; U.S. Commerce Court from 1911 to 1913; U.S. District Courts from 1880 to 1932; U.S. Court of Claims (now called U.S. Court of Federal Claims) from 1929 to 1932 and since 1960; U.S. Courts of Appeals since 1891; U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals since 1929; U.S. Emergency Court of Appeals since 1943.
Federal Supplement (F.Supp., F.Supp.2d, or F.Supp.3d)	1932	U.S. Court of Claims from 1932 to 1960; U.S. District Courts since 1932; U.S. Customs Court since 1956.
Federal Rules Decisions (F.R.D.)	1939	U.S. District Courts involving the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure since 1939 and Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure since 1946.
Supreme Court Reporter (S.Ct.)	1882	United States Supreme Court since the October term of 1882.
Bankruptcy Reporter (Bankr.)	1980	Bankruptcy decisions of U.S. Bankruptcy Courts, U.S. District Courts, U.S. Courts of Appeals, and the United States Supreme Court.
Military Justice Reporter (M.J.)	1978	U.S. Court of Military Appeals and Courts of Military Review for the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard.

NATIONAL REPORTER SYSTEM MAP

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case Citations After appellate decisions have been published, they are normally referred to (cited) by the name of the case and the volume, name, and page number of the reporter(s) in which the opinion can be found. The citation first lists information from the state's official reporter (if different from the National Reporter System), then the National Reporter, and then any other selected reporter. (Citing a reporter by volume number, name, and page number, in that order, is common to all citations.) When more than one reporter is cited for the same case, each reference is called a parallel citation.

Note that some states have adopted a "public domain citation system" that uses a somewhat different format for the citation. For example, in Oklahoma, an Oklahoma court decision might be designated "2020 OK 4," meaning that the decision was the 4th decision issued by the Oklahoma Supreme Court in 2020. A parallel citation to the Pacific Reporter is included after the public domain citation.

Consider the following citation: NetScout Systems, Inc. v. Gartner, Inc., 334 Conn. 396, 223 A.3d 37 (2020). We see that the opinion in this case can be found in Volume 334 of the official Connecticut Reports, on page 396. The parallel citation is to Volume 223 of the Atlantic Reporter, Third Series, page 37.

When we present opinions in this text (starting in Chapter 2), in addition to the reporter, we give the name of the court hearing the case and the year of the court's decision. Sample citations to state court decisions are listed and explained in Exhibit 1A–2.

Federal Court Decisions

Federal district (trial) court decisions are published unofficially in the Federal Supplement (F.Supp., F.Supp.2d, or F.Supp.3d), and opinions from the circuit courts of appeals (federal reviewing courts) are reported unofficially in the Federal Reporter (F., F.2d, or F.3d). Cases concerning federal bankruptcy law are published unofficially in the Bankruptcy Reporter (Bankr. or B.R.).

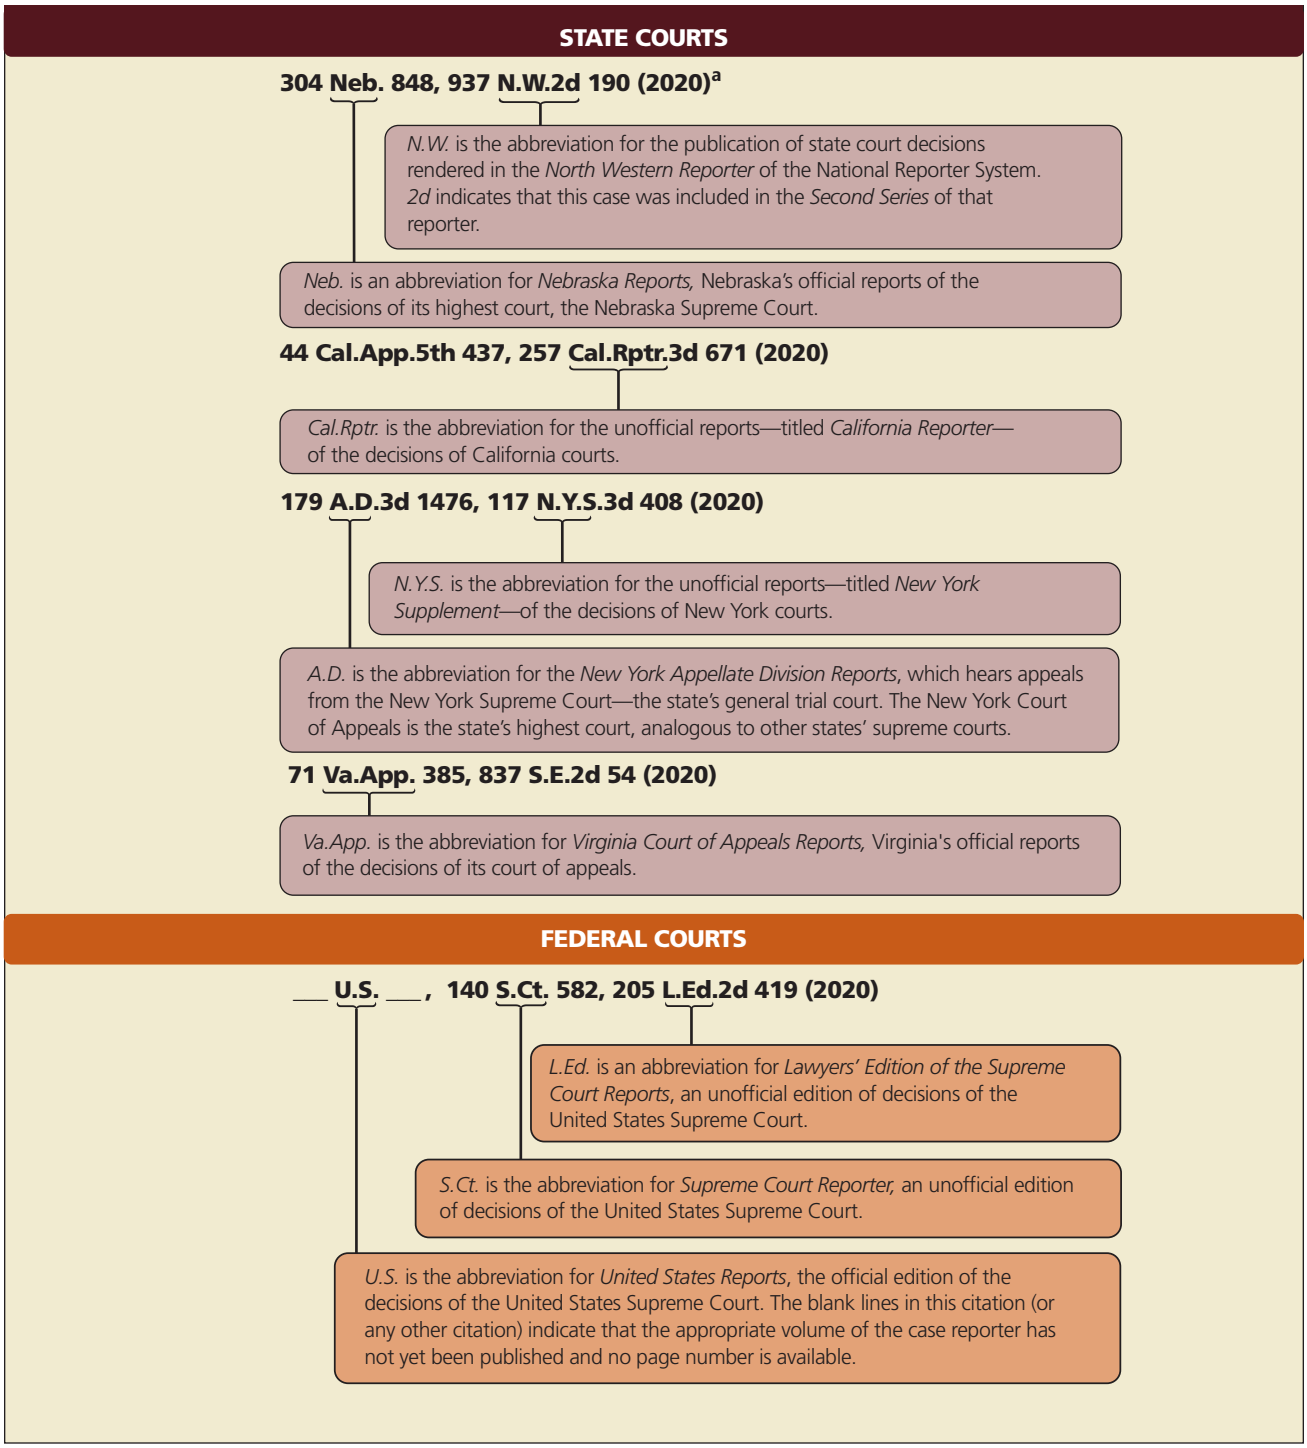
The official edition of United States Supreme Court decisions is the United States Reports (U.S.), which is published by the federal government. Unofficial editions of Supreme Court cases include the Supreme Court Reporter (S.Ct.) and the Lawyers' Edition of the Supreme Court Reports (L.Ed. or L.Ed.2d). Sample citations for federal court decisions are also listed and explained in Exhibit 1A–2.

Unpublished Opinions

Many court opinions that are not yet published or that are not intended for publication can be accessed through Westlaw® (abbreviated in citations as "WL"), an online legal database. When no citation to a published reporter is available for cases cited in this text, we give the WL citation (such as 2020 WL 399117, which means it was case number 399117 decided in the year 2020).

Sometimes, both in this text and in other legal sources, you will see blanks left in a citation. This occurs when the decision will be published, but the particular volume number or page number is not yet available.

Old Cases



On a few occasions, this text cites opinions from old, classic cases dating to the nineteenth century or earlier. Some of these cases are from the English courts. The citations to these cases may not conform to the descriptions given above.

Reading and Understanding Case Law

The cases in this text have been condensed from the full text of the courts' opinions and paraphrased by the authors. For those wishing to review court cases for future research projects or to gain additional legal information, the following sections will provide useful insights into how to read and understand case law.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 1A–2 How to Read Citations

a. The case names have been deleted from these citations to emphasize the publications. It should be kept in mind, however, that the name of a case is as important as the specific page numbers in the volumes in which it is found. If a citation is incorrect, the correct citation may be found in a publication's index of case names. In addition to providing a check on errors in citations, the date of a case is important because the value of a recent case as an authority is likely to be greater than that of older cases from the same court.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 1A–2 How to Read Citations—Continued

FEDERAL COURTS (Continued)

951 F.3d 728 (6th Cir. 2020)

6th Cir. is an abbreviation denoting that this case was decided in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2020 WL 614653 (W.D.Wash. 2020)

W.D.Wash. is an abbreviation indicating that the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington decided this case.

WESTLAW® CITATIONS[b]

2020 WL 1286224

WL is an abbreviation for Westlaw. The number 2020 is the year of the document that can be found with this citation in the Westlaw database. The number 1286224 is a number assigned to a specific document. A higher number indicates that a document was added to the Westlaw database later in the year.

STATUTORY AND OTHER CITATIONS

18 U.S.C. Section 1961(1)(A)

U.S.C. denotes United States Code, the codification of United States Statutes at Large. The number 18 refers to the statute's U.S.C. title number and 1961 to its section number within that title. The number 1 in parentheses refers to a subsection within the section, and the letter A in parentheses to a subsection within the subsection.

UCC 2–206(1)(b)

UCC is an abbreviation for Uniform Commercial Code. The first number 2 is a reference to an article of the UCC, and 206 to a section within that article. The number 1 in parentheses refers to a subsection within the section, and the letter b in parentheses to a subsection within the subsection.

Restatement (Third) of Torts*, Section 6

Restatement (Third) of Torts refers to the third edition of the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law of Torts. The number 6 refers to a specific section.

17 C.F.R. Section 230.505

C.F.R. is an abbreviation for Code of Federal Regulations, a compilation of federal administrative regulations. The number 17 designates the regulation's title number, and 230.505 designates a specific section within that title.

b. Many court decisions that are not yet published or that are not intended for publication can be accessed through Westlaw, an online legal database.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case Titles and Terminology

The title of a case, such as Adams v. Jones, indicates the names of the parties to the lawsuit. The v. in the case title stands for versus, which means "against." In the trial court, Adams was the plaintiff—the person who filed the suit. Jones was the defendant.

If the case is appealed, however, the appellate court will sometimes place the name of the party appealing the decision first, so the case may be called Jones v. Adams. Because some reviewing courts retain the trial court order of names, it is often impossible to distinguish the plaintiff from the defendant in the title of a reported appellate court decision. You must carefully read the facts of each case to identify the parties.

The following terms and phrases are frequently encountered in court opinions and legal publications. Because it is important to understand what these terms and phrases mean, we define and discuss them here.

Parties to Lawsuits The party initiating a lawsuit is referred to as the plaintiff or petitioner, depending on the nature of the action, and the party against whom a lawsuit is brought is the defendant or respondent. Lawsuits frequently involve more than one plaintiff and/or defendant.

When a case is appealed from the original court or jurisdiction to another court or jurisdiction, the party appealing the case is called the appellant. The appellee is the party against whom the appeal is taken. (In some appellate courts, the party appealing a case is referred to as the petitioner, and the party against whom the suit is brought or appealed is called the respondent.)

Judges and Justices The terms judge and justice are usually synonymous and are used to refer to the judges in various courts. All members of the United States Supreme Court, for instance, are referred to as justices. Justice is the formal title usually given to judges of appellate courts, although this is not always the case. In New York, a justice is a judge of the trial court (which is called the Supreme Court), and a member of the Court of Appeals (the state's highest court) is called a judge. The term justice is commonly abbreviated to J., and justices to JJ. A Supreme Court case might refer to Justice Sotomayor as Sotomayor, J., or to Chief Justice Roberts as Roberts, C.J.

Decisions and Opinions Most decisions reached by reviewing, or appellate, courts are explained in written opinions. The opinion contains the court's reasons for its decision, the rules of law that apply, and the judgment. You may encounter several types of opinions as you read appellate cases, including the following:

- When all the judges (or justices) agree, a unanimous opinion is written for the entire court.
- When there is not unanimous agreement, a majority opinion is generally written. It outlines the views of the majority of the judges deciding the case.
- A judge who agrees (concurs) with the majority opinion as to the result but not as to the legal reasoning often writes a concurring opinion. In it, the judge sets out the reasoning that he or she considers correct.
- A dissenting opinion presents the views of one or more judges who disagree with the majority view.
- Sometimes, no single position is fully supported by a majority of the judges deciding a case. In this situation, we may have a plurality opinion. This is the opinion that has the support of the largest number of judges, but the group in agreement is less than a majority.
- Finally, a court occasionally issues a per curiam* opinion (per curiam is Latin for "of the court"), which does not indicate which judge wrote the opinion.

Majority Opinion A court opinion that represents the views of the majority (more than half) of the judges or justices deciding the case.

Concurring Opinion A court opinion by one or more judges or justices who agree with the majority but want to make or emphasize a point that was not made or emphasized in the majority's opinion.

Dissenting Opinion A court opinion that presents the views of one or more judges or justices who disagree with the majority's decision.

Plurality Opinion A court opinion that is joined by the largest number of the judges or justices hearing the case, but less than half of the total number.

Per Curiam* Opinion A court opinion that does not indicate which judge or justice authored the opinion.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

A Sample Court Case

Knowing how to read and analyze a court opinion is an essential step in undertaking accurate legal research. The cases within this text have already been analyzed and briefed by the authors, and the essential aspects of each case are presented in a convenient format consisting of four sections: Facts, Issue, Decision, and Reason. This format is illustrated in the sample court case in Exhibit 1A–3, which is explained further in this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature.

In addition to this basic format, each case is followed by one or two critical-thinking questions regarding some issue raised by the case. We offer these questions as tools to help you develop your critical-thinking and legal reasoning skills. What If the Facts Were Different? questions alter the facts slightly and ask you to consider how this would change the outcome. A section entitled Impact of This Case on Today's Law concludes each Classic Case in this text to indicate the significance of the case for today's legal landscape.

Exhibit 1A–3 A Sample Court Case

Adelman's Truck Parts Corp. v. Jones Transport

United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, __ Fed.Appx. __, 2020 WL 238534 (2020).

Facts Don Jones, the owner and operator of Jones Transport, a small trucking company, ordered a used a Caterpillar C-7 motor from Adelman's Truck Parts Corporation. The purchase agreement did not specify the motor's horsepower. Expecting that it would be capable of 250 horsepower, Jones was disappointed to find that the motor delivered was capable of only 190 horsepower. Jones's mechanic also found a broken piston in the oil pan and a badly scored cylinder wall in the engine block. Jones contacted Adelman's and was told that it did not have a 250-horsepower Caterpillar C-7 motor in stock. Under the purchase agreement, Jones's only option was to return the motor for a refund, minus a 20 percent restocking fee, which Adelman's offered to waive. Jones refused the offer and filed a claim in a federal district court against Adelman's for breach of contract. The court issued a summary judgment in Adelman's favor. Jones appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, arguing that the remedy provision in the purchase agreement was unenforceable.

Issue Did Adelman's afford Jones the remedy that he was due?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment. "Because Jones was afforded the remedy that he was due . . . we agree with the district court."

Reason A seller may legitimately limit a buyer's remedies to the return of purchased goods and a repayment of the purchase price, or to the repair and replacement of goods that do not conform to the parties' contract. Here, the purchase agreement between Adelman's and Jones states, "BUYER'S EXCLUSIVE REMEDY RELATING TO THE GOODS SHALL BE LIMIITED SOLELY TO EITHER SELLER'S RETURN OF THE PURCHASE AMOUNT UPON [BUYER'S] RETURN OF THE NONCONFORMING GOODS OR SELLER'S REPAIR, CORRECTION AND/OR REPLACEMENT OF ANY OF THE GOODS WHICH ARE . . . NONCONFORMING." Adelman's gave Jones the remedy provided in the purchase agreement by offering Jones the opportunity to return the motor. The agreement's exclusive-remedy provision would have been unenforceable if it had deprived Jones of the value of the deal by leaving him without a remedy. But Jones was not left without a remedy—he could have returned the motor to Adelman's as the agreement specified. He chose not to.

Critical Thinking

- Economic For a federal district court to hear a case, the "amount in controversy" must be at least $75,000. Jones paid $5,000 for the motor and $304 in freight charges. What other losses or injuries might Jones claim in order to cross the "amount in controversy" threshold? Explain.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

How to Brief Cases

Knowing how to read and understand court opinions and the legal reasoning used by the courts is an essential step in performing legal research. A further step is "briefing," or summarizing, the case. Briefing cases facilitates the development of critical-thinking skills that are crucial for businesspersons when evaluating relevant business law.

Legal researchers routinely brief cases by reducing the texts of the opinions to their essential elements. Generally, when you brief a case, you first summarize the background and facts of the case, as the authors have done for most of the cases presented in this text. You then indicate the issue (or issues) before the court. An important element in the case brief is, of course, the court's decision on the issue and the legal reasoning used by the court in reaching that decision.

There is a fairly standard procedure that you follow to "brief" any court case. You must first read the case opinion carefully. When you feel that you understand the case, you can prepare a brief of it. Although the format of the brief may vary, typically it will present the essentials of the case under headings such as the following:

1. Citation. Give the full citation for the case, including the name of the case, the court that decided it, and the year it was decided.
2. Facts. Briefly indicate (a) the reasons for the lawsuit, (b) the identity and arguments of the plaintiff(s) and defendant(s), respectively, and (c) the lower court's decision—if the decision is from a reviewing court.
3. Issue. Concisely phrase, in the form of a question, the essential issue before the court. (If more than one issue is involved, you may have two—or even more—questions.)
4. Decision. Indicate here—with a "yes" or "no," if possible—the court's answer to the question (or questions) in the Issue section.
5. Reason. Summarize as briefly as possible the reasons given by the court for its decision (or decisions) and the case or statutory law relied on by the court in arriving at its decision.

See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for a sample case brief and a discussion of how the brief relates to the IRAC method of legal reasoning.

Case Briefing and IRAC Legal Reasoning

Here is a sample case brief of the opinion shown in Exhibit 1A–3.

1. Citation. Adelman's Truck Parts Corp. v. Jones Transport, United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 797 Fed. Appx. 997, 2020 WL 238534 (2020). Fed.Appx. is the abbreviation for Federal Appendix, a case law reporter that includes judicial opinions of the U.S. courts of appeals that are not selected for publication in the Federal Reporter.
2. Facts. Don Jones, the owner and operator of Jones Transport, a small trucking company, ordered a used Caterpillar C-7 motor from Adelman's Truck Parts Corporation. The purchase agreement did not specify the motor's horsepower. Expecting that it would be capable of 250 horsepower, Jones was disappointed to find that the motor delivered was capable of only 190 horsepower. Jones's mechanic also found a broken piston in the oil pan and a badly scored cylinder wall in the engine block. Jones contacted Adelman's and was told that it did not have a 250-horsepower Caterpillar C-7 motor in stock. Under the purchase agreement, Jones's only option was to return the motor for a refund, minus a 20 percent restocking fee, which Adelman's offered to waive. Jones refused the offer and filed a claim in a federal district court against Adelman's for breach of contract. The court issued a summary judgment in Adelman's favor. Jones appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, arguing that the remedy provision in the purchase agreement was unenforceable.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3. Issue. Did Adelman's afford Jones the remedy that he was due?
4. Decision. Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment. "Because Jones was afforded the remedy that he was due . . . we agree with the district court."
5. Reason. A seller may legitimately limit a buyer's remedies to the return of purchased goods and a repayment of the purchase price, or to the repair and replacement of goods that do not conform to the parties' contract. Here, the purchase agreement between Adelman's and Jones states, "BUYER'S EXCLUSIVE REMEDY RELATING TO THE GOODS SHALL BE LIMIITED SOLELY TO EITHER SELLER'S RETURN OF THE PURCHASE AMOUNT UPON [BUYER'S] RETURN OF THE NONCONFORMING GOODS OR SELLER'S REPAIR, CORRECTION AND/OR REPLACEMENT OF ANY OF THE GOODS WHICH ARE . . . NONCONFORMING." Adelman's gave Jones the remedy provided in the purchase agreement by offering Jones the opportunity to return the motor. The agreement's exclusive-remedy provision would have been unenforceable if it had deprived Jones of the value of the deal by leaving him without a remedy. But Jones was not left without a remedy—he could have returned the motor to Adelman's as the agreement specified. He chose not to.

Analysis: The sections in a case brief include the information necessary to perform IRAC legal reasoning. (IRAC stands for Issue, Rule of Law, Application, and Conclusion.) The first step in applying the IRAC legal reasoning method is to frame the issue. You need to understand the relevant facts, identify the parties, and determine the specific issue presented in the case. You will find this information in the first two sections of the brief. The Facts section identifies the plaintiff and the defendant. On the claim highlighted in this brief, the plaintiff is Don Jones, and Adelman's Truck Parts Corporation is the defendant. The Facts section also describes the events that underlie the parties' dispute and the allegations that one or both parties assert to support their request for a favorable resolution. Because this case is a decision of one of the U.S. courts of appeals, the lower court's ruling, the party appealing, and the appellant's contention on appeal are included.

It is important to carefully state the issue so that you can look for the appropriate Rule of Law that will guide the court's decision. In this case, the court considers whether Jones was afforded the remedy that he was due under the parties' agreement.

Result and Reasoning: The Reason section includes references to the relevant laws and judicial principles that the court applied in coming to the conclusion arrived at in the case. In this case, the Rule of Law included the principles of contract law that define the legitimate limits a seller may place on a buyer's remedies in their purchase agreement. The Reason section also explains the court's Application of the law to the facts in the case. The purchase agreement between Adelman's and Jones included a limit on the buyer's remedies to a refund of the price on a return of nonconforming goods to the seller. This provision would have been unenforceable if it had left Jones without a remedy, but the court reasoned that this was not the case. This reasoning led the court to arrive at the Conclusion that Adelman's had given Jones the remedy provided in the agreement by offering him the opportunity to return the motor for a full refund.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Janerc Filippo/Shutterstock.com

2

Constitutional Law

"The United States Constitution has proved itself the most marvelously elastic compilation of rules of government ever written."

Franklin D. Roosevelt 1882–1945 (Thirty-second president of the United States, 1933–1945)

The U.S. Constitution is brief. It contains only about seven thousand words—less than one-third as many as the average state constitution. Its brevity explains, in part, why the Constitution has proved to be so "marvelously elastic," as Franklin Roosevelt described it in the chapter-opening quotation. It might also explain why the U.S. Constitution has survived for more than two hundred years—longer than any other written constitution in the world.

Laws that govern business have their origin in the law-making authority granted by the Constitution. Neither Congress nor any state can enact a law that conflicts with the Constitution.

Disputes over constitutional rights frequently come before the courts. Suppose Rebecca visits the Boutique Bakery in Eugene, Oregon, to order a wedding cake for her upcoming marriage to Sheryl. Albert, who owns the bakery, refuses to take the order because of religious objections to same-sex marriage. Rebecca then sues Albert in a state court for violating an Oregon law that prohibits discrimination against customers based on their sexual orientation.

Albert counters that compelling him to bake the cake would violate his First Amendment right to freely exercise his religious beliefs. He also argues that the state

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What constitutional clause gives the federal government the power to regulate commercial activities among the states?
2. What is the Bill of Rights? What freedoms does the First Amendment guarantee?
3. Where in the Constitution can the due process clause be found?
4. Which constitutional amendments have been interpreted as implying a right to privacy?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

cannot force him to express a message with which he disagrees—a message in favor of same-sex marriage. How should the court balance Rebecca's right to be free from discrimination against Albert's rights to freedom of religion and expression? In this chapter, we will examine the impact of the Constitution on America's business landscape, as well as the courts' role in resolving the conflicts that inevitably arise when constitutional rights are at stake.

2–1 The Constitutional Powers of Government

Following the Revolutionary War, the United States created a confederal form of government in which the states had the authority to govern themselves and the national government could exercise only limited powers. When problems arose because the nation was facing an economic crisis and state laws interfered with the free flow of commerce, a national convention was called. The delegates drafted the U.S. Constitution. This document, after its ratification by the states in 1789, became the basis for an entirely new form of government.

Federal Form of Government A system of government in which the states form a union and the sovereign power is divided between the central government and the member states.

Sovereignty The power of a state to do what is necessary to govern itself. Individual state sovereignty is determined by the U.S. Constitution.

Police Powers Powers possessed by the states as part of their inherent sovereignty. These powers may be exercised to protect or promote the public order, health, safety, morals, and general welfare.

2–1a A Federal Form of Government

The new government created by the Constitution reflected a series of compromises made by the convention delegates on various issues. Some delegates wanted sovereign power to remain with the states, whereas others wanted the national government alone to exercise sovereign power. The end result was a compromise—a federal form of government in which the national government and the states share sovereign power.

Federal Powers The Constitution sets forth specific powers that can be exercised by the national government, generally referred to as the federal government. It also provides that the federal government has the implied power to undertake actions necessary to carry out its expressly designated powers. All other powers are "reserved" to the states.

elenaleonova/iStock/Getty Images

Under the U.S. Constitution, states and municipalities have the power to regulate many types of local commercial activities, including the imposition of building codes. What is the general term used to describe these powers?

Regulatory Powers of the States As part of their inherent sovereignty (power to govern themselves), state governments have the authority to regulate certain affairs within their borders. This authority stems, in part, from the Tenth Amendment, which reserves all powers not delegated to the federal government to the states or to the people.

State regulatory powers are often referred to as police powers. The term encompasses more than just the enforcement of criminal laws. Police powers also give a state government broad rights to regulate private activities to protect or promote the public order, health, safety, morals, and general welfare. Fire and building codes, antidiscrimination laws, parking regulations, zoning restrictions, licensing requirements, and thousands of other state statutes have been enacted pursuant to states' police powers. Local governments, such as cities, also exercise police powers.

In the following case, the question was whether a pair of municipal ordinances regulating the rental of motorized scooters constituted a reasonable exercise of police powers.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 2.1

Classy Cycles, Inc. v. Panama City Beach

District Court of Appeal of Florida, First District, 44 Fla. L. Weekly D2729, _ So.3d _, 2019 WL 5945495 (2019).

Facts Panama City Beach, Florida, enacted two ordinances—the first to prohibit the overnight rental of motorized scooters, and the second to prohibit the rental of the scooters in the city effective at a future date. Both ordinances included an extensive rationale for their adoption, stating essentially that a geographically small city has the right to restrict a business from operating within the city when the restriction is for the safety of the city's citizens and visitors. Classy Cycles, Inc., filed a suit in a Florida state court against Panama City Beach, seeking to have the ordinances declared invalid. Classy Cycles argued that the city did not have the power to ban a business unless the business was a nuisance. Because the rental of scooters to the public was not a nuisance, the city could not completely prohibit it. The city countered that it could prohibit any activity, provided the reasoning supporting the prohibition was not arbitrary or unreasonable. The court entered a judgment in the city's favor. Classy Cycles appealed.

Issue Were the ordinances reasonably related to accomplishing the city's goal of protecting the safety of its citizens and visitors?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the trial court's judgment. The city's ordinances regulating motorized scooters were a reasonable exercise of police powers.

Reason The appellate court recognized that municipalities have the authority to regulate activities affecting the public's health, safety, and welfare. To the extent that Classy Cycles argues otherwise, the "argument is without merit." Furthermore, explained the court, "our job is not to determine whether the City used the best method or least intrusive means" to regulate those activities, but whether the regulation was "reasonably related to accomplishing its goal." Under this analysis, a regulation must not be arbitrary or unreasonable, but needs to bear only a reasonable relationship to a legitimate state interest. In this case, the court noted that the rationale for the regulation is provided in the ordinances. They state that "the dangerous conditions" created by the irresponsible driving behavior of scooter renters, especially at night, amplified by the lack of training, supervision, and oversight practiced by the rental scooter businesses, "existed throughout the entire city." According to the court, this was sufficient to support a finding that the ordinances were neither arbitrary nor unreasonable.

Critical Thinking

- Cultural What "dangerous conditions" might have prompted the city to enact the ordinances at issue in this case? Why?
- Economic What is the likely economic impact of the ordinances on the businesses in the city? Discuss

2–1b Relations among the States

The U.S. Constitution also includes provisions concerning relations among the states in our federal system. Particularly important are the privileges and immunities clause and the full faith and credit clause.

The Privileges and Immunities Clause Article IV, Section 2, of the Constitution provides that the "Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States." This clause is often referred to as the interstate privileges and immunities clause. It prevents a state from imposing unreasonable burdens on citizens of another state—particularly with regard to means of livelihood or doing business.

When a citizen of one state engages in basic and essential activities in another state (the "foreign state"), the foreign state must have a substantial reason for treating the nonresident differently than its own residents. Basic activities include transferring property, seeking employment, and accessing the court system. The foreign state must also establish that its reason for the discrimination is substantially related to the state's ultimate purpose in adopting the legislation or regulating the activity. Thus, if Missouri wants to charge out-of-state real estate agents higher licensing fees than those required of Missouri resident agents, it will need to come up with a constitutionally acceptable reason for doing so.

Privileges and Immunities Clause Article IV, Section 2, of the U.S. Constitution requires states not to discriminate against one another's citizens. A resident of one state, when in another state, cannot be denied the privileges and immunities of citizens of that state.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Full Faith and Credit Clause A provision in Article IV, Section 1, of the U.S. Constitution that ensures that rights established under deeds, wills, contracts, and similar instruments in one state will be honored by other states and that judicial decisions will be honored and enforced in all states.

The Full Faith and Credit Clause Article IV, Section 1, of the U.S. Constitution provides that "Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State." This clause, which is referred to as the full faith and credit clause, applies only to civil matters. It ensures that rights established under deeds, wills, contracts, and similar instruments in one state will be honored by other states. It also ensures that any judicial decision with respect to such property rights will be honored and enforced in all states.

The full faith and credit clause has contributed to the unity of American citizens because it protects their legal rights as they move about from state to state. It also protects the rights of those to whom they owe obligations, such as persons who have been awarded monetary damages by courts. The ability to enforce such rights is extremely important for the conduct of business in a country with a very mobile citizenry.

2–1c The Separation of Powers

To make it difficult for the federal government to use its power arbitrarily, the Constitution divided the federal government's powers among three branches of government. The legislative branch makes the laws, the executive branch enforces the laws, and the judicial branch interprets the laws. Each branch performs a separate function, and no branch may exercise the authority of another branch.

Checks and Balances The system under which the powers of the federal government are divided among three separate branches—the executive, legislative, and judicial branches—each of which exercises a check on the actions of the others.

Additionally, a system of checks and balances allows each branch to limit the actions of the other two branches, thus preventing any one branch from exercising too much power. The following are examples of these checks and balances:

1. The legislative branch (Congress) can enact a law, but the executive branch (the president) has the constitutional authority to veto that law.
2. The executive branch is responsible for foreign affairs, but treaties with foreign governments require the advice and consent of the Senate.
3. Congress determines the jurisdiction of the federal courts, and the president appoints federal judges, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The judicial branch has the power to hold actions of the other two branches unconstitutional.

2–1d The Commerce Clause

To prevent states from establishing laws and regulations that would interfere with trade and commerce among the states, the Constitution explicitly gave the federal government the power to regulate interstate commerce. Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution expressly permits Congress "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." This clause, referred to as the commerce clause, has had a greater impact on business than any other provision in the Constitution.

Commerce Clause The provision in Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution that gives Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce.

Initially, the commerce power was interpreted as being limited to interstate commerce (commerce among the states) and not applicable to intrastate commerce (commerce within a state). In 1824, however, the United States Supreme Court decided the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (see this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature). The Court ruled that commerce within a state could also be regulated by the federal government as long as the commerce substantially affected commerce involving more than one state.

Focus Question 1

What constitutional clause gives the federal government the power to regulate commercial activities among the states?

The Expansion of Federal Powers under the Commerce Clause As the nation grew and faced new kinds of problems, the commerce clause became a vehicle for the additional expansion of the federal government's regulatory powers. Even activities that seemed purely local came under the regulatory reach of the federal government if those activities were

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Gibbons v. Ogden (1824)

The commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution gives Congress the power "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." Before the commerce clause came into existence, states tended to restrict commerce within and beyond their borders, which made trade more costly and inefficient. The goal of the clause was to unify the states' commerce policies and improve the efficiency of exchanges.

The problem was that although the commerce clause gave Congress some authority to regulate trade among the states, the extent of that power was unclear. What exactly does "to regulate commerce" mean? What does "commerce" entail? These questions came before the United States Supreme Court in 1824 in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden.[a] Background In 1803, Robert Fulton, the inventor of the steamboat, and Robert Livingston, who was the ambassador to France, secured a monopoly from the New York legislature on steam navigation on the waters in the state of New York. Their monopoly extended to interstate waters—waterways between New York and another state. Fulton and Livingston licensed Aaron Ogden, a former governor of New Jersey and a U.S. senator, to operate steam-powered ferryboats between New York and New Jersey.

Thomas Gibbons already operated a ferry service between New Jersey and New York, which had been licensed by Congress under a 1793 act regulating trade along the coast. Although the federal government had licensed Gibbons to operate boats in interstate waters, he did not have the state of New York's permission to compete with Ogden in that area. Ogden sued Gibbons. The New York state courts granted Ogden's request for an injunction—an order prohibiting Gibbons from operating in New York waters. Gibbons appealed the decision to the United States Supreme Court.

Marshall's Decision The issue before the Court was whether the law regulated commerce that was "among the several states." The chief justice on the Supreme Court was John Marshall, an advocate of a strong federal government. Marshall defined the word commerce as used in the commerce clause to mean all commercial intercourse—that is, all business dealings that affect more than one state. This broader definition included navigation.

In addition to expanding the definition of commerce, Marshall also validated and increased the power of the federal legislature to regulate commerce. Said Marshall, "What is this power? It is the power . . . to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed."

Marshall held that the power to regulate interstate commerce is an exclusive power of the federal government. This power includes the power to regulate any intrastate commerce that substantially affects interstate commerce. Accordingly, the Court decided in favor of Gibbons.

Application to Today's World

Marshall's broad definition of the commerce power established the foundation for the expansion of federal powers in the years to come. Today, the federal government continues to rely on the commerce clause for its constitutional authority to regulate business activities.

Marshall's conclusion that the power to regulate interstate commerce was an exclusive power of the federal government has also had significant consequences. By implication, it means that a state cannot regulate activities that extend beyond its borders, such as out-of-state online gambling operations that affect the welfare of in-state citizens. It also means that state regulations over in-state activities normally will be invalidated if the regulations substantially burden interstate commerce.

a. 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 6 L.Ed. 23 (1824).

deemed to substantially affect interstate commerce. In 1942, the Supreme Court held that wheat production by an individual farmer intended wholly for consumption on his own farm was subject to federal regulation.[1]

The following Classic Case involved a challenge to the scope of the federal government's constitutional authority to regulate local activities.

1. Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 63 S.Ct. 82, 87 L.Ed. 122 (1942).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Classic Case 2.2

Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States

Supreme Court of the United States, 379 U.S. 241, 85 S.Ct. 348, 13 L.Ed.2d 258 (1964).

Facts In the 1950s, the United States Supreme Court ruled that racial segregation imposed by the states in school systems and other public facilities violated the Constitution. Privately owned facilities were not affected until Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibited racial discrimination in "establishments affecting interstate commerce."

LBJ Library photo by Cecil Stoughton

President Lyndon Johnson signs the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The owner of the Heart of Atlanta Motel, in violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, refused to rent rooms to African Americans. The motel owner brought an action in a federal district court to have the Civil Rights Act declared unconstitutional on the ground that Congress had exceeded its constitutional authority to regulate commerce by enacting the statute.

The owner argued that his motel was not engaged in interstate commerce but was "of a purely local character." The motel, however, was accessible to state and interstate highways. The owner advertised nationally, maintained billboards throughout the state, and accepted convention trade from outside the state (75 percent of the guests were residents of other states).

The district court ruled that the act did not violate the Constitution and enjoined (prohibited) the owner from discriminating on the basis of race. The owner appealed. The case ultimately went to the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Did Congress exceed its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce by enacting the Civil Rights Act of 1964?

Decision No. The United States Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the act.

Reason The Court noted that the act was passed to correct "the deprivation of personal dignity" accompanying the denial of equal access to "public establishments." Testimony before Congress leading to the passage of the act indicated that African Americans in particular experienced substantial discrimination in attempting to secure lodging while traveling. This discrimination impeded interstate travel and thus impeded interstate commerce.

As for the owner's argument that his motel was "of a purely local character," the Court said that even if this was true, the motel affected interstate commerce. According to the Court, "if it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation that applies the squeeze." Therefore, under the commerce clause, "the power of Congress to promote interstate commerce also includes the power to regulate the local incidents thereof, including local activities."

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? If this case had involved a small, private retail business that did not advertise nationally, would the result have been the same? Why or why not?
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law If the United States Supreme Court had invalidated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the legal landscape of the United States would be much different today. The act prohibits discrimination based on race, color, national origin, religion, or gender in all "public accommodations," including hotels and restaurants. The act also prohibits discrimination in employment based on these criteria. Although state laws now prohibit many of these forms of discrimination as well, the protections available vary from state to state—and it is not certain whether such laws would have been passed had the outcome in this case been different.

The Commerce Clause Today Today, at least theoretically, the power over commerce authorizes the federal government to regulate almost every commercial enterprise in the United States. The breadth of the commerce clause permits the federal government to legislate in areas in which Congress has not explicitly been granted power. Only occasionally has the Supreme Court curbed the federal government's regulatory authority under the commerce clause.

The Supreme Court has, for instance, allowed the federal government to regulate noncommercial activities relating to medical marijuana that take place wholly within a state's borders. Spotlight Case Example 2.1 More than thirty states, including California, have adopted laws that legalize marijuana for medical purposes, and a significant number of states now permit the recreational use of marijuana. Marijuana possession, however, is illegal under the federal Controlled Substances Act (CSA).[2]

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

After the federal government seized the marijuana that two seriously ill California women were using on the advice of their physicians, the women filed a lawsuit. They argued that it was unconstitutional for the federal statute to prohibit them from using marijuana for medical purposes that were legal within the state.

The Supreme Court, though, held that Congress has the authority to prohibit the intra-state possession and noncommercial cultivation of marijuana as part of a larger regulatory scheme (the CSA).[3] In other words, the federal government may still prosecute individuals for possession of marijuana regardless of whether they reside in a state that allows the use of marijuana.

The "Dormant" Commerce Clause The United States Supreme Court has interpreted the commerce clause to mean that the federal government has the exclusive authority to regulate commerce that substantially affects trade and commerce among the states. This express grant of authority to the federal government, which is often referred to as the "positive" aspect of the commerce clause, implies a negative aspect—that the states do not have the authority to regulate interstate commerce. This negative aspect of the commerce clause is often referred to as the "dormant" (implied) commerce clause.

The dormant commerce clause comes into play when state regulations affect interstate commerce. In this situation, the courts normally weigh the state's interest in regulating a certain matter against the burden that the state's regulation places on interstate commerce. Because courts balance the interests involved, predicting the outcome in a particular case can be extremely difficult.

Case Example 2.2 Tennessee law imposed a two-year residency requirement on any business entity that wanted to acquire a state liquor license. As a result, Total Wine, a retail liquor chain, was blocked from opening a store in Nashville. Defending this action in court, Tennessee officials claimed that the residency requirement was justified under the Twenty-first Amendment, which gives states the responsibility of regulating alcohol for public benefit. The United States Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the law was primarily designed to shield state businesses from out-of-state competition. Without any realistic connection to health and safety measures, the Court ruled, the residency requirement did not "advance a legitimate local purpose" and therefore violated the dormant commerce clause.[4]

2–1e The Supremacy Clause

Article VI of the Constitution provides that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are "the supreme Law of the Land." This article, commonly referred to as the supremacy clause, is important in the ordering of state and federal relationships.

Supremacy Clause The provision in Article VI of the U.S. Constitution that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are "the supreme Law of the Land."

Preemption Under the supremacy clause, when there is a direct conflict between a federal law and a state law, the state law is rendered invalid. Because some powers are concurrent (shared by the federal government and the states), however, it is necessary to determine which law governs in a particular circumstance.

Preemption occurs when Congress chooses to act exclusively in a concurrent area. In this circumstance, a valid federal statute or regulation will take precedence over a conflicting state or local law or regulation on the same general subject.

Preemption A doctrine under which certain federal laws preempt, or take precedence over, conflicting state or local laws.

2. 21 U.S.C. Sections 801 et seq.
3. Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1, 125 S.Ct. 2195, 162 L.Ed.2d 1 (2005).
4. Tennessee Wine and Spirits Retailers Associations v. Thomas, 588 U.S. _, 139 S.Ct. 2440, 204 L.Ed.2d 801 (2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Congressional Intent Often, it is not clear whether Congress, in passing a law, intended to preempt an entire subject area against state regulation. In these situations, the courts determine whether Congress intended to exercise exclusive power.

Generally, congressional intent to preempt will be found if a federal law regulating an activity is so pervasive, comprehensive, or detailed that the states have little or no room to regulate in that area. Also, when a federal statute creates an agency—such as the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA)—to enforce the law, the agency's decisions in matters that come within its jurisdiction will likely preempt state laws.

Classic Case Example 2.3 A man who alleged that he had been injured by a faulty medical device (a balloon catheter that had been inserted into his artery following a heart attack) sued the manufacturer. The case ultimately came before the United States Supreme Court. The Court noted that the relevant federal law (the Medical Device Amendments) included a preemption provision.

Furthermore, the device had passed the FDA's rigorous premarket approval process. Therefore, the Court ruled that the federal regulation of medical devices preempted the man's state law claims for negligence, strict liability, and implied warranty.[5]

2–2 Business and the Bill of Rights

Focus Question 2

What is the Bill of Rights? What freedoms does the First Amendment guarantee?

Bill of Rights The first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

The importance of having a written declaration of the rights of individuals eventually caused the first Congress of the United States to enact twelve amendments to the Constitution and submit them to the states for approval. The first ten of these amendments, commonly known as the Bill of Rights, were adopted in 1791.

The Bill of Rights embodies a series of protections for the individual against various types of conduct by the federal government.[6] Some constitutional protections apply to business entities as well. For example, corporations exist as separate legal entities, or legal persons, and enjoy many of the same rights and privileges as natural persons do.

Summarized next are the protections guaranteed by the first ten amendments:

1. The First Amendment guarantees the freedoms of religion, speech, and the press and the rights to assemble peaceably and to petition the government.
2. The Second Amendment guarantees the right to keep and bear arms.
3. The Third Amendment prohibits, in peacetime, the lodging of soldiers in any house without the owner's consent.
4. The Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures of persons or property.
5. The Fifth Amendment guarantees the rights to indictment (formal accusation) by a grand jury, to due process of law, and to fair payment when private property is taken for public use. The Fifth Amendment also prohibits compulsory self-incrimination and double jeopardy (prosecution for the same crime twice).
6. The Sixth Amendment guarantees the accused in a criminal case the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury and with counsel. Accused defendants have the right to cross-examine witnesses against them and to solicit testimony from witnesses in their favor.
7. The Seventh Amendment guarantees the right to a trial by jury in a civil (noncriminal) case involving at least twenty dollars.[7]

---

5. Riegel v. Medtronic, Inc., 552 U.S. 312, 128 S.Ct. 999, 169 L.Ed.2d 892 (2008); see also Mink v. Smith & Nephew, Inc., 860 F.3d 1319 (11th Cir. 2017).

6. One of the proposed amendments was ratified more than two hundred years later (in 1992) and became the Twenty-seventh Amendment to the Constitution.

7. Twenty dollars was forty days' pay for the average person when the Bill of Rights was written.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

8. The Eighth Amendment prohibits excessive bail and fines, as well as cruel and unusual punishment.
9. The Ninth Amendment establishes that the people have rights in addition to those specified in the Constitution.
10. The Tenth Amendment establishes that those powers neither delegated to the federal government nor denied to the states are reserved for the states.

We will look more closely at several of these amendments in a later chapter. In this chapter, we examine two important guarantees of the First Amendment—freedom of speech and freedom of religion. First, though, we look at how the Bill of Rights puts certain limits on government.

2–2a Limits on Federal and State Governmental Actions

Know This
Although most of the rights in the Bill of Rights apply to actions of the states, some of them apply only to actions of the federal government.

As originally intended, the Bill of Rights limited only the powers of the federal government. Over time, however, the United States Supreme Court "incorporated" most of these rights into the protections against state actions afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

The Fourteenth Amendment Passed in 1868 after the Civil War, the Fourteenth Amendment provides, in part, that "[n]o State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

Starting in 1925, the Supreme Court began to define various rights and liberties guaranteed in the federal Constitution as constituting "due process of law," which was required of state governments under the Fourteenth Amendment. Today, most of the rights and liberties set forth in the Bill of Rights apply to state governments as well as to the federal government.

Judicial Interpretation The rights secured by the Bill of Rights are not absolute. Many of the rights guaranteed by the first ten amendments are described in very general terms. For instance, the Second Amendment states that people have a right to keep and bear arms, but it does not explain the extent of this right. As the Supreme Court once stated, the right does not extend so far that people can "keep and carry any weapon whatsoever in any manner whatsoever and for whatever purpose."[8] Legislatures can prohibit the carrying of concealed weapons or certain types of weapons, such as machine guns. Ultimately, the Supreme Court, as the final interpreter of the Constitution, gives meaning to constitutional rights and determines their boundaries.

2–2b The First Amendment—Freedom of Speech

A democratic form of government cannot survive unless people can freely voice their political opinions and criticize government actions or policies. Freedom of speech, particularly political speech, is thus a prized right, and traditionally the courts have protected this right to the fullest extent possible. (See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature to learn how social media have flourished under the protection of the First Amendment.)

Symbolic speech—gestures, movements, articles of clothing, and other forms of expressive conduct—is also given substantial protection by the courts. The burning of the American flag to protest government policies, for instance, is a constitutionally protected form of expression. Similarly, wearing a T-shirt with a photo of a presidential candidate or taking a knee during the national anthem at a sporting event is a constitutionally protected form of expression.

Symbolic Speech Nonverbal expressions of beliefs. Symbolic speech, which includes gestures, movements, and articles of clothing, is given substantial protection by the courts.

8. District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 128 S.Ct. 2783, 171 L.Ed.2d 637 (2008).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Social Media and the Constitution

Everyone, it seems, uses social media. And everyone, it seems, complains about social media. The complaints highlight a wide variety of objectionable content online, from hate speech to harassment to misinformation to offensive photos and videos. What steps, if any, should the U.S. government take to remedy the situation?

First Amendment Protections

In a business context, the term social media covers (1) those people or companies that generate opinions and other material, (2) those that consume this content, (3) those that host this content, and (4) those that sell advertising linked to this content. Except under very limited circumstances, the First Amendment protects the right of these groups to operate without government interference. This protection reflects the importance that Americans have always placed on allowing free speech in the public sphere.

The Communications Decency Act (CDA) offers an additional defense for social media speech. This federal law protects social media platforms from being held liable for user-generated content.[a] That is, Facebook cannot be sued or charged criminally for something that users do on their Facebook pages. Proponents of greater social media regulation have called for this section of the CDA to be repealed, but any such effort would certainly be challenged on First Amendment grounds.

Access Denied

In the face of government inaction, many social media companies have opted for self-regulation. Facebook, for example, bans attacks against people or groups based on race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, or religion affiliation. Similarly, Twitter prohibits statements that promote violence or hate, and YouTube tries to block any video that promotes a discriminatory ideology.

a. 47 U.S.C. Section 230.

The targets of these efforts inevitably claim that they are being censored, but this is incorrect. Generally speaking, the Bill of Rights protects citizens against government measures, not those taken by private companies. So, while the exclusion policies of social medial giants such as Facebook and Twitter may frustrate and anger users, they do not violate those users' First Amendment rights.

Critical Thinking

One observer has said that the American legal system should evaluate social media companies based on how "they affect us as citizens, not only [on how] they affect us as consumers." What is your opinion of this statement?

Alan Budman/Alamy Stock Photo

Is this inflatable rat an expression of symbolic speech?

The test is whether a reasonable person would interpret the conduct as conveying some sort of message. Example 2.4 Union members set up an inflatable rat outside a construction site they are protesting for using non-union labor. If a reasonable person would interpret this conduct as conveying a message, then it will likely be a protected form of symbolic speech.

Reasonable Restrictions Expression—oral, written, or symbolized by conduct—is subject to reasonable restrictions. A balance must be struck between a government's obligation to protect its citizens and those citizens' exercise of their rights. Reasonableness is analyzed on a case-by-case basis. American courts have, for example, ruled that it is unreasonable for states to prohibit convicted sex offenders from accessing social media but reasonable for states to prohibit juvenile offenders from doing so.[9]

9. Packingham v. North Carolina, 582 U.S. _, 137 S.Ct. 1730, 198 L.Ed.2d. 273 (2017); and In Re A.A., 30 Cal.App.5th 596 (2018).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Content-Neutral Laws. Laws that regulate the time, manner, and place, but not the content, of speech receive less scrutiny by the courts than do laws that restrict the content of expression. If a restriction imposed by the government is content neutral, then a court may allow it. To be content neutral, the restriction must be aimed at combating some secondary societal problem, such as crime, and not be aimed at suppressing the expressive conduct or its message.

Courts have often protected nude dancing as a form of symbolic expression. Nevertheless, the courts typically allow content-neutral laws that ban all public nudity. Case Example 2.5 Ria Ora was charged with dancing nude at an annual "anti-Christmas" protest in Harvard Square in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Ora argued that the statute was overly broad and unconstitutional, and a trial court agreed. On appeal, a state appellate court reversed. The court found that the statute was constitutional because it banned public displays of open and gross lewdness in situations in which there was an unsuspecting or unwilling audience.[10]

Laws That Restrict the Content of Speech. If a law regulates the content of the expression, it must serve a compelling state interest and must be narrowly written to achieve that interest. Under the compelling government interest test, the government's interest is balanced against the individual's constitutional right to be free of government interference. For the statute to be valid, there must be a compelling governmental interest that can be furthered only by the law in question.

Compelling Government Interest A test of constitutionality that requires the government to have convincing reasons for passing any law that restricts fundamental rights, such as free speech, or distinguishes between people based on a suspect trait.

The United States Supreme Court has historically been dubious of government actions intended to restrict "offensive" speech. Spotlight Case Example 2.6 The Consolidated Edison Company placed documents celebrating nuclear power in its billing envelopes. The New York Public Service Commission responded by barring all utilities from discussing public policy in communications with customers. The majority of the United States Supreme Court could not find any compelling reason for New York to restrict Consolidated Edison's free speech in this manner. The Court reasoned that the possibility that content may offend some customers does not justify its prohibition. This is particularly true, the Court noted, given how easy it is for customers to throw any offending documents in the trash.[11]

Corporate Political Speech Political speech by corporations also falls within the protection of the First Amendment. Many years ago, the United States Supreme Court reviewed a Massachusetts statute that prohibited corporations from making political contributions or expenditures that individuals were permitted to make. The Court ruled that the Massachusetts law was unconstitutional because it violated the right of corporations to freedom of speech.[12]

Corporate political speech continues to be given significant protection under the First Amendment. Classic Case Example 2.7 In Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission,[13] the Supreme Court overturned a twenty-year-old precedent on campaign financing. The case involved Citizens United, a nonprofit corporation.

Citizens United had produced a film called Hillary: The Movie that was critical of Hillary Clinton, who was seeking the Democratic presidential nomination. Campaign-finance law prohibited Citizens United from broadcasting the movie, however. The Court ruled that the restrictions were unconstitutional and that the First Amendment prevents limits from being placed on independent political expenditures by corporations.

---

10. Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Ora, 451 Mass. 125, 883 N.E.2d 1217 (2008).
11. Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 530, 100 S.Ct. 2326, 65 L.Ed.2d 319 (1980).
12. First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 98 S.Ct. 1407, 55 L.Ed.2d 707 (1978).
13. Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, 558 U.S. 310, 130 S.Ct. 876, 175 L.Ed.2d 753 (2010).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Ethical Issue

Even though corporations can restrict the speech of their employees, should they do so? Federal law protects the right of workers to discuss some topics, such as forming a union, without fear of punishment from their employers. In general, however, while corporations may enjoy the protections of the First Amendment, their employees do not. (Remember, the Bill of Rights applies primarily to government actions, not those taken by private entities.) For years, such concerns seemed irrelevant at Google LLC. Indeed, the tech conglomerate told its 100,000 employees to "bring your whole self to work" and trumpeted "lively discussion" as a hallmark of its "workplace culture."

Eventually, however, Google managers began to worry about the impact of so much unpoliced speech at the company. A set of guidelines was instituted that required employees to refrain from discussing politics and other non-work-related issues at work. After that, Google fired a software engineer who posted an internal memo suggesting that men were better suited for tech work than women. Employees with conservative viewpoints were dismayed to learn that a manager had referred to them as "poisonous aholes" who should be fired. Leftward leaning "Googlers" felt they had been retaliated against after protesting lucrative payouts to company executives who had been fired for sexual misconduct. "People need to be able to discuss what's going on in the world," said one skeptical management expert of the changes at Google. "Communities are where you do that and the community where people spend most of their waking time is at the office."

smontgom65/iStock Editorial/Getty Images

The U.S. Supreme Court decision in Citizens United allows corporations to spend to elect or defeat candidates for president and Congress. Why did this decision upset some people?

Commercial Speech The courts also give substantial protection to commercial speech, which consists of communications—primarily advertising and marketing—made by business firms that involve only their commercial interests. The protection given to commercial speech under the First Amendment is not as extensive as that afforded to noncommercial speech, however.

Generally, a restriction on commercial speech will be considered valid as long as it (1) seeks to implement a substantial government interest, (2) directly advances that interest, and (3) goes no further than necessary to accomplish its objective. A substantial government interest exists when the government has an important stake in the matter at hand.

A state may restrict certain kinds of advertising, for instance, in the interest of protecting consumers from being misled. States also have a legitimate interest in the beautification of roadsides, and this interest allows states to place restraints on billboard advertising. Example 2.8 Café Erotica, a nude dancing establishment, sues the state after being denied a permit to erect a billboard along an interstate highway in Florida. Because of the state's legitimate interest in highway beautification and safety, a court will likely rule that it is not an unconstitutional restraint on commercial speech.

At issue in the following Spotlight Case was whether a government agency had unconstitutionally restricted commercial speech when it prohibited the use of a certain illustration on beer labels.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Spotlight on Beer Labels: Case 2.3

Bad Frog Brewery, Inc. v. New York State Liquor Authority

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 134F.3d 87 (1998).

Facts Bad Frog Brewery, Inc., makes and sells alcoholic beverages. Some of the beverages feature labels with a drawing of a frog making the gesture generally known as "giving the finger." Renaissance Beer Company was Bad Frog's authorized New York distributor. Renaissance applied to the New York State Liquor Authority (NYSLA) for brand label approval, as required by state law before the beer could be sold in New York. The NYSLA denied the application, in part, because "the label could appear in grocery and convenience stores, with obvious exposure on the shelf to children of tender age." Bad Frog filed a suit in a federal district court against the NYSLA, asking for, among other things, an injunction against the denial of the application. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the NYSLA. Bad Frog appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Eric Isselee/ShutterStock.com

Can a label be too offensive?

Issue Was the NYSLA's ban of Bad Frog's beer labels a reasonable restriction on commercial speech?

Decision No. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the judgment of the district court and remanded the case for judgment to be entered in favor of Bad Frog.

Reason The appellate court held that the NYSLA's denial of Bad Frog's application violated the First Amendment. The ban on the use of the labels lacked a "reasonable fit" with the state's interest in shielding minors from vulgarity. In addition, the NYSLA did not adequately consider alternatives to the ban. The court acknowledged that the NYSLA's interest "in protecting children from vulgar and profane advertising" was "substantial." The question was whether banning Bad Frog's labels "directly advanced" that interest. "In view of the wide currency of vulgar displays throughout contemporary society, including comic books targeted directly at children, barring such displays from labels for alcoholic beverages cannot realistically be expected to reduce children's exposure to such displays to any significant degree."

The court concluded that a commercial speech limitation must be "part of a substantial effort to advance a valid state interest, not merely the removal of a few grains of offensive sand from a beach of vulgarity." Finally, as to whether the ban on the labels was more extensive than necessary to serve this interest, the court pointed out that there were "numerous less intrusive alternatives." For example, the NYSLA could have placed restrictions on the permissible locations where the appellant's products could be displayed in stores.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Whose interests are advanced by the banning of certain types of advertising?
- What If the Facts Were Different? If Bad Frog had sought to use the label to market toys instead of beer, would the court's ruling likely have been the same? Explain your answer.

Unprotected Speech The United States Supreme Court has made it clear that certain types of speech will not be given any protection under the First Amendment. Speech that harms the good reputation of another, or defamatory speech (defamation is discussed in the torts chapter), will not be protected. In addition, speech that violates criminal laws (such as threatening or obscene speech) is not constitutionally protected.

Threatening Speech. Note that in the case of threatening speech, the speaker must have posed a "true threat." In other words, the speaker must have meant to communicate a serious intent to commit an unlawful, violent act against a particular person or group. Case Example 2.9 While awaiting trial on various firearm and drug charges, James Knox appeared in a YouTube music video called "F the Police." In the video, Knox identified two Pittsburgh law enforcement officers involved in his arrest and rapped that he was going to "jam this rusty knife" into one of the officer's "guts" and "chop his feet." Knox was eventually convicted of making terroristic threats. On appeal, he argued that his video was a piece of artistic expression protected by the First Amendment.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court rejected this defense. Knox's lyrics, the court found, went well beyond a general animosity toward the police. Besides referring to the two law enforcement officers by name, Knox claimed to know when they went off duty. He also pledged to murder one of the officer's confidential informants and bragged about making fake 911 calls and killing any police officer who responded. According to the court, this level of specificity differentiated Knox's words from "mere" violent lyrics, which would have been protected speech. Instead, they were "true threats," which were not protected.[14]

Obscene Speech. The First Amendment, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, also does not protect obscene speech. Numerous state and federal statutes make it a crime to disseminate and possess obscene materials. Objectively defining obscene speech has proved difficult, however. It is even more difficult to prohibit the dissemination of obscenity and pornography online.

Most of Congress's attempts to pass legislation protecting minors from pornographic materials on the Internet have been struck down on First Amendment grounds when challenged in court. One exception is a law that requires public schools and libraries to install filtering software on computers to keep children from accessing adult content.[15] Such software is designed to prevent persons from viewing certain websites based on their Internet addresses or meta tags, or key words. This act does not unconstitutionally burden free speech because it is flexible and libraries can disable the filters for any patrons who ask.

Filtering Software A computer program that is designed to block access to certain websites, based on their content. The software blocks the retrieval of a site whose URL or key words are on a list within the program.

Meta Tags Key words in a document that can serve as index references to the document. On the Web, search engines return results based, in part, on the tags in Web documents.

2–2c The First Amendment—Freedom of Religion

The First Amendment states that the government may neither establish any religion nor prohibit the free exercise of religious practices. The first part of this constitutional provision is referred to as the establishment clause, and the second part is known as the free exercise clause. Government action, both federal and state, must be consistent with this constitutional mandate.

The Establishment Clause The establishment clause prohibits the government from establishing a state-sponsored religion, as well as from passing laws that promote (aid or endorse) religion or show a preference for one religion over another. Although the establishment clause involves the separation of church and state, it does not require a complete separation.

Establishment Clause The provision in the First Amendment that prohibits the government from establishing any state-sponsored religion or enacting any law that promotes religion or favors one religion over another.

Know This

The free exercise clause applies only to the actions of the state and federal governments, not to private employers. Private employers may nonetheless be required to accommodate their employees' religious beliefs.

Applicable Standard. Establishment clause cases often involve such issues as the legality of allowing or requiring school prayers, using state-issued vouchers to pay tuition at religious schools, and teaching creation theories versus evolution in public schools. Federal or state laws that do not promote or place a significant burden on religion are constitutional even if they have some impact on religion. For a government law or policy to be constitutional, it must not have the primary effect of promoting or inhibiting religion.

Religious Displays. Religious displays on public property have often been challenged as violating the establishment clause. The United States Supreme Court has ruled on a number of such cases, often focusing on the proximity of the religious display to nonreligious symbols or on the balance of symbols from different religions. The Supreme Court eventually decided that public displays having historical, as well as religious, significance do not necessarily violate the establishment clause.

Case Example 2.10 Mount Soledad is a prominent hill near San Diego. There has been a forty-foot cross on top of Mount Soledad since 1913. In the 1990s, a war memorial was 14. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Knox, 647 Pa. 593, 190 A.3d 1146 (2018).

15. Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA), 17 U.S.C. Sections 1701–1741.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

constructed next to the cross that included six walls listing the names of veterans. The site was privately owned until 2006, when Congress authorized the property's transfer to the federal government "to preserve a historically significant war memorial."

Steve Trunk and the Jewish War Veterans filed lawsuits claiming that the cross display violated the establishment clause because it endorsed the Christian religion. A federal appellate court agreed, finding that the primary effect of the memorial as a whole sent a strong message of endorsement and exclusion (of non-Christian veterans). The court noted that although not all cross displays at war memorials violate the establishment clause, the cross in this case physically dominated the site. Additionally, the cross was originally dedicated to religious purposes, had a long history of religious use, and was the only portion visible to drivers on the freeway below.[16]

To gain a better understanding of how courts analyze whether public displays violate the establishment clause, see this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature.

The Free Exercise Clause The free exercise clause guarantees that people can hold any religious beliefs they want or can have no religious beliefs. The constitutional guarantee of personal religious freedom restricts only the actions of the government, however, and not those of individuals or private businesses.

Free Exercise Clause The provision in the First Amendment that prohibits the government from interfering with people's religious practices or forms of worship.

Restrictions Must Be Necessary. The government must have a compelling state interest for restricting the free exercise of religion, and the restriction must be the only way to further that interest. Case Example 2.11 Gregory Holt, an inmate in an Arkansas state prison, was a devout Muslim who wished to grow a beard in accord with his religious beliefs. The 16. Trunk v. City of San Diego, 629 F.3d 1099 (9th Cir. 2011).

Business Law Analysis

Determining When Public Religious Displays Violate the Establishment Clause

Judge James DeWeese hung a poster in his courtroom showing the Ten Commandments. The poster also included a number of editorial statements made by DeWeese, such as "God is the final authority, and we acknowledge His unchanging standards of behavior."

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) filed a suit, alleging that the poster violated the establishment clause. DeWeese responded that his purpose was not to promote religion but to educate others about two conflicting legal philosophies—moral relativism and moral absolutism. DeWeese expressed his view that "our legal system is based on moral absolutes from divine law handed down by God through the Ten Commandments." Does displaying this poster in a courtroom violate the establishment clause?

Analysis: The establishment clause prohibits the government from passing laws or taking actions that promote religion or show a preference for one religion over another. In assessing a government action (in this case, displaying a religious poster in a courtroom), the courts look at the predominant purpose for the action and ask whether the action has the effect of endorsing religion. Although DeWeese claimed to have a nonreligious (educational) purpose for displaying the poster of the Ten Commandments, his own statements showed a religious purpose. DeWeese was trying to teach others to believe as he believed, that our legal system is based on moral truths handed down by God.

Result and Reasoning: DeWeese's statements reflected his views about "warring" legal philosophies and his belief that "our legal system is based on moral absolutes from divine law handed down by God through the Ten Commandments." Based on his statements, DeWeese's poster had the religious purpose of endorsing Judeo-Christian religious views, which violated the establishment clause.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

menonstocks/iStock/Getty Images

Can prison policy prevent a devout Muslim from keeping a short beard?

state corrections department prohibited inmates from growing beards. Holt asked for an exemption to grow a half-inch beard on religious grounds, and prison officials denied his request. Holt filed a suit in a federal court against Ray Hobbs, the director of the department, and others. A federal statute prohibits the government from taking any action that substantially burdens the religious exercise of a prisoner unless it is the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest.

The defendants argued that beards compromise prison safety—a compelling government interest—because contraband can be hidden in them and because an inmate can quickly shave his beard to disguise his identity. The case ultimately reached the United States Supreme Court, which noted that "an item of contraband would have to be very small indeed to be concealed by a 1/2-inch beard." Furthermore, the Court reasoned, the department could simply search the beard, the way it already searched prisoners' hair and clothing. Therefore, the department's policy, which prevented Holt from growing a half-inch beard, violated his right to exercise his religious beliefs.[17]

Restrictions Must Not Be a Substantial Burden. To comply with the free exercise clause, a government action must not be a substantial burden on religious practices. A burden is substantial if it pressures individuals to modify their behavior and to violate their beliefs.

Case Example 2.12 The Affordable Care Act (ACA) requires employer-sponsored health plans to provide contraceptives and pregnancy "preventive services" to employees.[18] A company that objects to this rule for religious reasons can "opt out" by filing notice with the federal government. For Steven Hotze, the owner of Braidwood Management, the very act of filling out this paperwork went against the principles of his religious faith. To keep from having to do so, he and several other plaintiffs brought a lawsuit against the government claiming that their free exercise of religion was being violated.

A federal court in Texas agreed and issued an injunction against the ACA's contraception orders. The court found that as long as corporate entities or business owners sincerely believe that filling out paperwork makes them complicit in providing contraceptives, that belief can be considered religious. Therefore, to require them to complete the paperwork is a substantial burden on their free exercise rights. As a result of this decision, the government would have to find another, less restrictive, way to ensure employee access to contraceptives.[19]

Public Welfare Exception. When religious practices work against public policy and the public welfare, the government can act. For instance, the government can require that a child receive certain types of vaccinations or receive medical treatment when the child's life is in danger—regardless of the child's or parent's religious beliefs.

In other words, when public safety is an issue, an individual's religious beliefs often must give way to the government's interests in protecting the public. Example 2.13 In public, a woman of the Muslim faith may choose to wear a scarf, known as a hijab, over her head. Nevertheless, due to public safety concerns, many courts today do not allow the wearing of any headgear (hats or scarves) in courtrooms.

17. Holt v. Hobbs, 574 U.S. 352, 135 S.Ct. 853, 190 L.Ed.2d 747 (2015).
18. Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, Section 1001(a)(5), 42 U.S.C.A Section 300gg-13(a)(4). See also Burwell v. Hobby Lobby Stores, Inc., 573 U.S. 682, 134 S.Ct. 2751, 189 L.Ed.2d 675 (2014).
19. Deotte v. Azar, 332 F.R.D. 173, 104 Fed. R. Serv. 3d 566 (N.D.Tex. 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

2–3 Due Process and Equal Protection

Two other constitutional guarantees of great significance to Americans are mandated by the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Focus Question 3
Where in the Constitution can the due process clause be found?

2–3a Due Process

Both the Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments provide that no person shall be deprived "of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The due process clause of each of these constitutional amendments has two aspects—procedural and substantive. Note that the due process clause applies to "legal persons," such as corporations, as well as to individuals.

Due Process Clause The provisions in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments that guarantee that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. State constitutions often include similar clauses.

Procedural Due Process Procedural due process requires that any government decision to take life, liberty, or property must be made fairly. This means that the government must give a person proper notice and an opportunity to be heard. The government must also use fair procedures in determining whether individuals will be subjected to punishment or have some burden imposed on them.

Fair procedure has been interpreted as requiring that the person have at least an opportunity to object to a proposed action before a fair, neutral decision maker (who need not be a judge). Example 2.14 Doyle, a nursing student in Kansas, poses for a photograph standing next to a placenta used as a lab specimen. Although she quickly deletes the photo from her library, it ends up on Facebook. When the director of nursing sees the photo, Doyle is expelled. She sues for reinstatement and wins. The school violated Doyle's due process rights by expelling her from the nursing program for taking a photo without giving her an opportunity to present her side to school authorities. ■

Substantive Due Process Substantive due process focuses on the content of the legislation rather than the fairness of the procedures. Substantive due process limits what the government may do in its legislative and executive capacities. Legislation must be fair and reasonable in content and must further a legitimate governmental objective.

If a law or other governmental action limits a fundamental right, the courts will hold that it violates substantive due process unless it promotes a compelling state interest. Fundamental rights include interstate travel, privacy, voting, marriage and family, and all First Amendment rights. Thus, for instance, a state must have a substantial reason for taking any action that infringes on a person's free speech rights.

In situations not involving fundamental rights, a law or action does not violate substantive due process if it rationally relates to any legitimate governmental end. It is almost impossible for a law or action to fail the "rationality" test. Under this test, almost any government regulation of business will be upheld as reasonable.

2–3b Equal Protection

Under the Fourteenth Amendment, a state may not "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The United States Supreme Court has used the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment to make the equal protection clause applicable to the federal government as well. Equal protection means that the government must treat similarly situated individuals in a similar manner.

Equal Protection Clause The provision in the Fourteenth Amendment that requires state governments to treat similarly situated individuals in a similar manner.

Equal protection, like substantive due process, relates to the substance of the law or other governmental action. When a law or action limits the liberty of all persons to do something, it may violate substantive due process. When a law or action limits the liberty of some persons but not others, it may violate the equal protection clause. Example 2.15 If a law prohibits all advertising on the sides of trucks, it raises a substantive due process question. If the law makes an exception to allow truck owners to advertise their own businesses, it raises an equal protection issue.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

In an equal protection inquiry, when a law or action distinguishes between or among individuals, the basis for the distinction—that is, the classification—is examined. Depending on the classification, the courts apply different levels of scrutiny, or "tests," to determine whether the law or action violates the equal protection clause. The courts use one of three standards: strict scrutiny, intermediate scrutiny, or the "rational basis" test.

Strict Scrutiny If a law or action prohibits or inhibits some persons from exercising a fundamental right, the law or action will be subject to "strict scrutiny" by the courts. A classification based on a suspect trait—such as race, national origin, or citizenship status—will also be subject to strict scrutiny. Under this standard, the classification must be necessary to promote a compelling government interest.

Compelling state interests include remedying past unconstitutional or illegal discrimination, but do not include correcting the general effects of "society's discrimination." Example 2.16 For a city to give preference to minority applicants in awarding construction contracts, it normally must identify past unconstitutional or illegal discrimination against minority construction firms. Because the policy is based on suspect traits (race and national origin), it will violate the equal protection clause unless it is necessary to promote a compelling state interest. Generally, few laws or actions survive strict-scrutiny analysis by the courts.

Intermediate Scrutiny Another standard, that of "intermediate scrutiny," is applied in cases involving discrimination based on gender or legitimacy. Laws using these classifications must be substantially related to important government objectives. Example 2.17 A state law prohibits the sale of low-alcohol beer (less than 0.5 percent "alcohol by volume") to any male under the age of eighteen and to any female under the age of twenty-one. Suppose a retail liquor chain challenges this law, claiming that it unfairly exposes the chain to sanctions and loss of liquor license. Because it does not seem to further any important government objective, the law would not survive intermediate scrutiny by a court.

The state also has an important objective in establishing time limits (called statutes of limitation) for how long after an event a particular type of action can be brought. Nevertheless, the limitation period must be substantially related to the important objective of preventing fraudulent or outdated claims. Example 2.18 A federal law requires employees to file gender discrimination complaints within 180 days of the employer's discriminatory conduct. A court will likely reject a complaint that relies on evidence of discrimination that occurred outside this 180-day period, even if that discrimination directly caused low wages within the proper time frame. If this result is unfair, it will be up to the U.S. Congress, not the courts, to amend the statute of limitations.

The "Rational Basis" Test In matters of economic and social welfare, a classification will be considered valid if there is any conceivable "rational basis" on which the classification might relate to a legitimate government interest. It is almost impossible for a law or action to fail the rational basis test.

Case Example 2.19 A Chicago ordinance prohibits food trucks from parking within two hundred feet of the entrance of any "brick and mortar" establishment that serves food, including convenience stores with hot dog rollers. Violators of the ordinance face a fine of up to $2,000 for each day that the truck is parked within the restricted area. The owner of the Cupcakes for Courage food truck filed suit against the city, alleging that, contrary to the state constitution, the ordinance unfairly favored restaurants over "mobile food vehicles."

Applying the rational basis test, the Illinois Supreme Court rejected this claim. The court ruled that Chicago's ordinance was rationally related to the legitimate government interest of protecting the city's restaurants. To a greater degree than food trucks, the court found restaurants contribute to Chicago's economic well-being by paying property taxes and encouraging neighborhood retail activity.[20]

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

2–4 Privacy Rights

Focus Question 4
Which constitutional amendments have been interpreted as implying a right to privacy?

The U.S. Constitution does not explicitly mention a general right to privacy. In a 1928 Supreme Court case, Olmstead v. United States,[21] Justice Louis Brandeis stated in his dissent that the right to privacy is "the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men." The majority of the justices at that time, however, did not agree with Brandeis.

It was not until the 1960s that a majority on the Supreme Court endorsed the view that the Constitution protects individual privacy rights. In a landmark 1965 case, Griswold v. Connecticut,[22] the Supreme Court invalidated a Connecticut law that effectively prohibited the use of contraceptives on the ground that it violated the right to privacy. The Supreme Court held that a constitutional right to privacy was implied by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments.

Today, privacy rights receive protection under various federal statutes as well as the U.S. Constitution. State constitutions and statutes also secure individuals' privacy rights, often to a significant degree. In addition, privacy rights are protected to an extent under tort law, consumer law, and employment law. This chapter's Cybersecurity and the Law feature explores the challenges of a corporate strategy that emphasizes privacy rights in an industry marked by cyber insecurity.

20. LMP Services, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 2019 IL 123123, _ N.E.3d _ (2019).
21. 277 U.S. 438, 48 S.Ct. 564, 72 L.Ed. 944 (1928).
22. 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965).

Should Apple Help Law Enforcement?

In one of its company statements, Apple, Inc., emphasized that its products are designed "to protect your privacy and give you control over your information," but that this goal was "not always easy." The difficulty comes from a pressure that today's technology companies cannot avoid—the tension between the individual's desire for privacy and society's desire for security.

The Encryption Debate

Each iPhone produced by Apple is encrypted so that it can be unlocked only with a password. This encryption is so strong that even Apple's technicians cannot access an iPhone without the owner's consent. This level of privacy causes problems when law enforcement needs evidence from a smartphone whose owner will not, or cannot, provide the password.

For example, Mohammed Alshamrani was killed by sheriffs' deputies after fatally shooting three people at a naval base in Pensacola, Florida. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) wanted access to Alshamrani's two iPhones to determine whether he had been in contact with other potential domestic terrorists. Apple refused to help "break into" Alshamrani's devices. Similarly, the company has declined to build "backdoor" access into iPhones, for fear that any entry point will eventually be breached by hackers.

Apple's position angers those who believe that tech companies should prioritize helping law enforcement protect society from crime over protecting a phone user's privacy. Indeed, the U.S. Constitution allows the government to infringe on an individual's privacy to investigate a probable crime. Nevertheless, Apple's stance has earned the company a reputation for consumer advocacy. "It's brilliant marketing," says one observer. "They're so concerned with your privacy that they're willing to wave the finger at the FBI."

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

iPhones Can Be Hacked

Despite its air of invincibility, the iPhone is not hackproof. Several years before the Pensacola shooting, the FBI paid hackers to break into an iPhone owned by Syed Farook. (In tandem with his wife, Farook had fatally shot fourteen people in a terrorist attack in Southern California before being killed by law enforcement.) At least two software security companies, Cellebrite and Grayshift, have managed to bypass encryption codes on older iPhone models. On one occasion, Apple used federal copyright law to force Twitter to remove a tweet that contained a coded "key" that would unlock the company's encryption secrets. With each new iPhone, Apple closes these loopholes. Nonetheless, some in the security industry believe that it is fighting a "losing battle" against the twin privacy threats of individual hackers and government surveillance.

Critical Thinking

Tim Cook, Apple's chief operating officer, has suggested that the United States Congress should pass a law limiting the ability of Apple and other tech companies to keep consumer data private. Why would a business executive make such a request?

czardases/iStock/Getty Images

Most medical records are being put online. What law protects patients' right to privacy with respect to their online medical files?

2–4a Federal Privacy Legislation

Congress has enacted a number of statutes that protect the privacy of individuals in various areas of concern. Most of these statutes deal with personal information collected by governments or private businesses.

In the 1960s, Americans were sufficiently alarmed by the accumulation of personal information in government files that they pressured Congress to pass laws permitting individuals to access their files. Congress responded by passing the Freedom of Information Act, which allows individuals to request copies of any information on them contained in federal government files. Congress later enacted the Privacy Act, which also gives persons the right to access such information.

In the 1990s, responding to the growing need to protect the privacy of individuals' health records—particularly computerized records—Congress passed the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA).[23] This act defines and limits the circumstances in which an individual's "protected health information" may be used or disclosed by health care providers, health care plans, and others. These and other major federal laws protecting privacy rights are listed and briefly described in Exhibit 2–1.

2–4b The USA Patriot Act

The USA Patriot Act was passed by Congress in the wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and then reauthorized twice.[24] The Patriot Act has given government officials increased authority to monitor Internet activities (such as e-mail and website visits) and to gain access to personal financial information and student information. Law enforcement officials can track the telephone and e-mail communications of one party to find out the identity of the other party or parties. Privacy advocates argue that this law adversely affects the constitutional rights of all Americans, and it has been widely criticized in the media.

To gain access to these communications, the government must certify that the information likely to be obtained is relevant to an ongoing criminal investigation, but it does not need to provide proof of any wrongdoing. Example 2.20 General David Petraeus, who ran the wars

23. HIPAA was enacted as Pub. L. No. 104-191 (1996) and is codified in 29 U.S.C.A. Sections 1181 et seq.

24. The Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001, also known as the USA Patriot Act, was enacted as Pub. L. No. 107-56 (2001), and last reauthorized by Pub. L. No. 112-114 (2011).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 2–1 Federal Legislation Relating to Privacy

TITLE OF ACT	PROVISIONS CONCERNING PRIVACY
Freedom of Information Act (1966)	Provides that individuals have a right to access information about them collected in government files.
Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (1974)	Limits access to computer-stored records of education-related evaluations and grades in private and public colleges and universities.
Privacy Act (1974)	Protects the privacy of individuals about whom the federal government has information. Regulates agencies' use and disclosure of data, and gives individuals access to and a means to correct inaccuracies.
Electronic Communications Privacy Act (1986)	Prohibits the interception of information communicated by electronic means.
Driver's Privacy Protection Act (1994)	Prevents states from disclosing or selling a driver's personal information without the driver's consent.
Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (1996)	Requires health care providers and health care plans to inform patients of their privacy rights and of how their personal medical information may be used. States that medical records may not be used for purposes unrelated to health care or disclosed without permission.
Financial Services Modernization Act (Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act) (1999)	Prohibits the disclosure of nonpublic personal information about a consumer to an unaffiliated third party unless strict disclosure and opt-out requirements are met.

in Iraq and Afghanistan, resigned as director of the Central Intelligence Agency after his extramarital affair with Paula Broadwell, his biographer, became public. Apparently, after Petraeus broke off the affair with Broadwell, she sent harassing e-mails to another woman, who reported the harassment. The FBI investigated, accessed Petraeus's e-mail accounts, and discovered that he had communicated with Broadwell via messages left in a draft folder on his e-mail account. Although there was no evidence that Petraeus had done anything illegal, he was urged to resign and did so.

Practice and Review

A state legislature enacted a statute that required any motorcycle operator or passenger on the state's highways to wear a protective helmet. Jim Alderman, a licensed motorcycle operator, sued the state to block enforcement of the law. Alderman asserted that the statute violated the equal protection clause because it placed requirements on motorcyclists that were not imposed on other motorists. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Why does this statute raise equal protection issues instead of substantive due process concerns?
2. What are the three levels of scrutiny that the courts use in determining whether a law violates the equal protection clause?
3. Which level of scrutiny or test would apply to this situation? Why?
4. Under this standard or test, is the helmet statute constitutional? Why or why not?

Debate This

Legislation aimed at protecting people from themselves concerns the individual as well as the public in general. Protective helmet laws are just one example of such legislation. Should individuals be allowed to engage in unsafe activities if they choose to do so?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

Bill of Rights 38
checks and balances 34 commerce clause 34 compelling government interest 41 due process clause 47 equal protection clause 47 establishment clause 44 federal form of government 32 filtering software 44 free exercise clause 45 full faith and credit clause 34 meta tags 44 police powers 32
preemption 37 privileges and immunities clause 33 sovereignty 32 supremacy clause 37
symbolic speech 39

Chapter Summary: Constitutional Law

The Constitutional Powers of Government	The U.S. Constitution established a federal form of government, in which government powers are shared by the national government and the state governments. At the national level, generally referred to as the federal level, government powers are divided among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. The Tenth Amendment reserves to the states all powers not expressly delegated to the federal government. Under their police powers, state governments may regulate private activities in order to protect or promote the public order, health, safety, morals, and general welfare.
The Commerce Clause	1. The expansion of federal powers—The commerce clause expressly permits Congress to regulate commerce. Over time, courts expansively interpreted this clause, thereby enabling the federal government to wield extensive powers over the economic life of the nation. 2. The commerce clause today—Today, the commerce clause authorizes the federal government, at least theoretically, to regulate almost every commercial enterprise in the United States. 3. The "dormant" commerce clause—If state regulations substantially interfere with interstate commerce, they will be held to violate the "dormant" commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution. The positive aspect of the commerce clause, which gives the federal government the exclusive authority to regulate interstate commerce, implies a "dormant" aspect—that the states do not have this power.
The Supremacy Clause	The U.S. Constitution provides that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are "the supreme Law of the Land." Whenever a state law directly conflicts with a federal law, the state law is rendered invalid.
Business and the Bill of Rights	The Bill of Rights, which consists of the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution, embodies a series of protections for individuals—and, in some instances, business entities—against various types of interference by the federal government. Today, most of the protections apply against state governments as well. Freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment that affect businesses include the following: 1. Freedom of speech—Speech, including symbolic speech, is given the fullest possible protection by the courts. Corporate political speech and commercial speech also receive substantial protection under the First Amendment. Certain types of speech, such as defamatory speech and obscene speech, are not protected under the First Amendment. Government attempts to regulate unprotected forms of speech in the online environment have, to date, met with numerous challenges. 2. Freedom of religion—Under the First Amendment, the government may neither establish any religion (the establishment clause) nor prohibit the free exercise of religion (the free exercise clause).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Due Process and Equal Protection	1. Due process—Both the Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments provide that no person shall be deprived of "life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Procedural due process requires that any government decision to take life, liberty, or property must be made fairly, using fair procedures. Substantive due process focuses on the content of legislation. Generally, a law that limits a fundamental right violates substantive due process unless the law promotes a compelling state interest, such as public safety. 2. Equal protection—Under the Fourteenth Amendment, a law or action that limits the liberty of some persons but not others may violate the equal protection clause. Such a law may be upheld, however, if there is a rational basis for the discriminatory treatment of a given group or if the law substantially relates to an important government objective.
Privacy Rights	The Constitution does not contain a specific guarantee of a right to privacy, but such a right has been derived from guarantees found in several constitutional amendments. A number of federal statutes protect privacy rights. Privacy rights are also protected by many state constitutions and statutes, as well as under tort law, consumer law, and employment law.

Issue Spotters

1. South Dakota wants its citizens to conserve energy. To help reduce consumer consumption of electricity, the state passes a law that bans all advertising by power utilities within the state. What argument could the power utilities use as a defense to the enforcement of this state law? (See Business and the Bill of Rights.)
2. Suppose that a state imposes a higher tax on out-of-state companies doing business in the state than it imposes on in-state companies. Is this a violation of the equal protection clause if the only reason for the tax is to protect the local firms from out-of-state competition? Explain. (See Due Process and Equal Protection.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

2–1. The Free Exercise Clause. Thomas worked in the nonmilitary operations of a large firm that produced both military and nonmilitary goods. When the company discontinued the production of nonmilitary goods, Thomas was transferred to the plant producing military equipment. Thomas left his job, claiming that it violated his religious principles to participate in the manufacture of goods to be used in destroying life. In effect, he argued, the transfer to the military equipment plant forced him to quit his job. He was denied unemployment compensation by the state because he had not been effectively "discharged" by the employer but had voluntarily terminated his employment. Did the state's denial of unemployment benefits to Thomas violate the free exercise clause of the First Amendment? Explain. (See Business and the Bill of Rights.)

2–2. Spotlight on Plagiarism—Due Process. The Russ College of Engineering and Technology of Ohio University announced in a press conference that it had found "rampant and flagrant plagiarism" in the theses of mechanical engineering graduate students. Faculty singled out for "ignoring their ethical responsibilities" included Jay Gunasekera, chair of the department. Gunasekera was prohibited from advising students. He filed a suit against Dennis Irwin, the dean of Russ College, for violating his due process rights. What does due process require in these circumstances? Why? [Gunasekera v. Irwin, 551 F.3d 461 (6th Cir. 2009)] (See Due Process and Equal Protection.)

2–3. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Freedom of Speech. Mark Wooden sent an e-mail to an alderwoman for the city of St. Louis. Attached was a nineteen-minute audio that compared her to the biblical character Jezebel—she was a "bitch in the Sixth Ward," spending too much time with the rich and powerful and too little time with the poor. In a menacing, maniacal tone, Wooden said that he was "dusting off a sawed-off shotgun," called himself a "domestic terrorist," and referred to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, the murder of a federal judge, and the shooting of Congresswoman Gabrielle Giffords. Feeling threatened, the alderwoman called the police. Wooden was convicted of harassment under a state criminal statute. Was this conviction unconstitutional under the First Amendment? Discuss. [State of Missouri v. Wooden, 388 S.W.3d 522 (Mo. 2013)] (See Business and the Bill of Rights.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

—For a sample answer to Problem 2-3, go to Appendix E.

2–4. Equal Protection. Abbott Laboratories licensed SmithKline Beecham Corp. to market an Abbott human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) drug in conjunction with one of SmithKline's drugs. Abbott then increased the price of its drug fourfold, forcing SmithKline to increase its prices and thereby driving business to Abbott's own combination drug. SmithKline filed a suit in a federal district court against Abbott. During jury selection, Abbott struck the only self-identified gay person among the potential jurors. (The pricing of HIV drugs is of considerable concern in the gay community.) Could the equal protection clause be applied to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation in jury selection? Discuss. [SmithKline Beecham Corp. v. Abbott Laboratories, 740 F.3d 471 (9th Cir. 2014)] (See Due Process and Equal Protection.)

2–5. Procedural Due Process. Robert Brown applied for admission to the University of Kansas School of Law. Brown answered "no" to questions on the application asking if he had a criminal history and acknowledged that a false answer constituted "cause for . . . dismissal." In fact, Brown had criminal convictions for domestic battery and driving under the influence. He was accepted for admission to the school. When school officials discovered his history, however, he was notified of their intent to dismiss him and given an opportunity to respond in writing. He demanded a hearing. The officials refused to grant Brown a hearing and then expelled him. Did the school's actions deny Brown due process? Discuss. [Brown v. University of Kansas, 599 Fed.Appx. 833 (10th Cir. 2015)] (See Due Process and Equal Protection.)

2–6. The Commerce Clause. Regency Transportation, Inc., operates a freight business throughout the eastern United States. Regency maintains its corporate headquarters, four warehouses, and a maintenance facility and terminal location for repairing and storing vehicles in Massachusetts. All of the vehicles in Regency's fleet were bought in other states. Massachusetts imposes a use tax on all taxpayers subject to its jurisdiction, including those that do business in interstate commerce, as Regency does. When Massachusetts imposed the tax on the purchase price of each tractor and trailer in Regency's fleet, the trucking firm challenged the assessment as discriminatory under the commerce clause. What is the chief consideration under the commerce clause when a state law affects interstate commerce? Is Massachusetts's use tax valid? Explain. [Regency Transportation, Inc. v. Commissioner of Revenue, 473 Mass. 459, 42 N.E.3d 1133 (2016)] (See The Constitutional Powers of Government.)

2–7. Freedom of Speech. Wandering Dago, Inc. (WD) operates a food truck in Albany, New York. WD brands itself and the food it sells with language generally viewed as ethnic slurs. Owners Andrea Loguidice and Brandon Snooks, however, view the branding as giving a "nod to their Italian heritage" and "weakening the derogatory force of the slur." Twice, WD applied to participate as a vendor in a summer lunch program in a state-owned plaza. Both times, the New York State Office of General Services (OGS) denied the application because of WD's branding. WD filed a suit in a federal district court against RoAnn Destito, the commissioner of OGS, contending that the agency had violated WD's right to free speech. What principles apply to the government's regulation of the content of speech? How do those principles apply in WD's case? Explain. [Wandering Dago, Inc. v. Destito, 879 F.3d 20 (2d Cir. 2018)] (See Business and the Bill of Rights.)

2–8. A Question of Ethics—Free Speech. Michael Mayfield, the president of Mendo Mill and Lumber Co., in California, received a "notice of a legal claim" from Edward Starski. The "claim" alleged that a stack of lumber had fallen on a customer as a result of a Mendo employee's "incompetence." The "notice" presented a settlement offer on the customer's behalf in exchange for a release of liability for Mendo. In a follow-up phone conversation with Mayfield, Starski said that he was an attorney—which, in fact, he was not. Starski was arrested and charged with violating a state criminal statute that prohibited the unauthorized practice of law. [People v. Starski, 7 Cal.App.5th 215, 212 Cal. Rptr.3d 622 (1 Dist. Div. 2 2017)] (See Business and the Bill of Rights.)

1. Starski argued that "creating an illusion" that he was an attorney was protected by the First Amendment. Is Starski correct? Explain.
2. Identify, discuss, and resolve the conflict between the right to free speech and the government's regulation of the practice of law.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

2–9. Business Law Writing. Puerto Rico enacted a law that required specific labels on cement sold in Puerto Rico and imposed fines for any violations of these requirements. The law prohibited the sale or distribution of cement manufactured outside Puerto Rico that does not carry a required label warning and barred that cement from being used in government-financed construction projects.

Antilles Cement Corp., a Puerto Rican firm that imports foreign cement, filed a complaint in federal court. Antilles claimed that this law violated the dormant commerce clause. (The dormant commerce clause doctrine applies not only to commerce among the states and U.S. territories, but also to international commerce.) Write three paragraphs discussing whether the Puerto Rican law violates the dormant commerce clause. Explain your reasons. (See The Constitutional Powers of Government.)

2–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Free Speech and Equal Protection. For many years, New York City has had to deal with the vandalism and defacement of public property caused by unauthorized graffiti. In an effort to stop the damage, the city banned the sale of aerosol spray-paint cans and broad-tipped indelible markers to persons under twenty-one years of age. The new rules also prohibited people from possessing these items on property other than their own. Within a year, five people under age twenty-one were cited for violations of these regulations, and nearly nine hundred individuals were arrested for actually making graffiti.

Lindsey Vincenty and other artists wished to create graffiti on legal surfaces, such as canvas, wood, and clothing. Unable to buy supplies in the city or to carry them in the city if they were bought elsewhere, Vincenty and others filed a lawsuit on behalf of themselves and other young artists against Michael Bloomberg, the city's mayor, and others. The plaintiffs claimed that, among other things, the new rules violated their right to freedom of speech. (See The Constitutional Powers of Government.)

1. One group will argue in favor of the plaintiffs and provide several reasons why the court should hold that the city's new rules violate the plaintiffs' freedom of speech.
2. Another group will develop a counterargument that outlines the reasons why the new rules do not violate free speech rights.
3. A third group will argue that the city's ban violates the equal protection clause because it applies only to persons under age twenty-one.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3D generator/Shutterstock.com

3 Ethics in Business

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What are two different views of the role of business in society?
2. How do duty-based ethical standards differ from outcome-based ethical standards?
3. What is short-term profit maximization, and why does it lead to ethical problems?
4. What are the four steps in the IDDR approach to ethical decision making?
5. What ethical issues might arise in the context of global business transactions?

"New occasions teach new duties."

James Russell Lowell
1819–1891 (American editor, poet, and diplomat)

One of the most complex issues that businesspersons and corporations face is ethics. Ethics is not as clearly defined as the law, and yet it can substantially impact a firm's finances and reputation, especially when the firm is involved in a well-publicized scandal. Some scandals arise from conduct that is legal but ethically questionable. At other times, the conduct is both illegal and unethical. Business law and legal environment students must be able to think critically about both legal and ethical issues. As noted in the chapter-opening quotation, "New occasions teach new duties."

Suppose that Finn dropped out of Harvard University to start a company in Silicon Valley that developed and sold finger-prick blood-test kits. Finn raised millions from investors by claiming that his new technology would revolutionize blood testing by providing a full range of laboratory tests from a few drops of blood. The kits were marketed as a better alternative to traditional, more expensive lab tests ordered by physicians. They were sold at drugstores for a few dollars each and touted as a way for consumers to test their blood type and monitor their cholesterol, iron, and many other conditions. Within six years, Finn and his company were making millions. But complaints started rolling in that the test kits didn't work and the results were not accurate (because more blood was needed). Numerous consumers, drugstores, and government agencies sued the company for fraudulent and misleading marketing practices. Finn's profitable start-up now faces an uncertain future.

The goal of business ethics is not to stifle innovation. There is nothing unethical about a company selling an idea or technology that is still being developed. In fact, that's exactly what many successful start-ups do—take a promising idea and develop it into a reality. But businesspersons also need to consider what will happen if new technologies do not work. Do they go ahead with production and sales? What are the ethical problems with putting a product on the market that does not function as advertised? To be sure, there is not always one clear answer to an ethical question. What is clear is that rushing to production and not thinking through the ethical ramifications of decisions can be disastrous for a business.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3–1 Ethics and the Role of Business

Ethics Moral principles and values applied to social behavior.

Business Ethics The application of moral principles and values in a business context.

At the most basic level, the study of ethics is the study of what constitutes right or wrong behavior. It is a branch of philosophy focusing on morality and the way moral principles are derived and implemented. Ethics has to do with the fairness, justness, rightness, or wrongness of an action.

The study of business ethics typically looks at the decisions businesses make or have to make and whether those decisions are right or wrong. It has to do with how businesspersons apply moral principles in making their decisions. Those who study business ethics also evaluate what duties and responsibilities exist or should exist for businesses.

In this textbook, we include Ethical Issues in most chapters to emphasize the importance of ethics in business law. In addition, at the end of every chapter is a case problem, called A Question of Ethics, that relates to that chapter's contents.

3–1a The Relationship of Law and Ethics

The government has institutionalized some ethical rights and duties through the passage of laws and regulations. Many laws are designed to prevent fraudulent (misleading, deceptive) conduct in various contexts, including contracts, health care, financial reporting, mortgages, and sales. Example 3.1 The Fraud Reduction and Data Analytics Act was passed by Congress in 2016 to identify and assess fraud risks in federal government agencies. The purpose of the law is to prevent, detect, and respond to fraud (including improper payments) in federal programs. ■ (This chapter's Business Web Log feature outlines a well-publicized fraud scandal.)

Sometimes, major legislation is passed after well-publicized ethical transgressions by industries or companies result in harm to the public. Example 3.2 After alleged ethical lapses on Wall Street contributed to a financial crisis, Congress passed the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act.[1] Dodd-Frank made sweeping changes to the United States' financial regulatory environment in an attempt to promote financial stability and protect consumers from abusive financial services practices.

Similarly, Congress enacted the Sarbanes-Oxley Act[2] (SOX) after Enron, a major energy company, engaged in risky financial maneuvers that resulted in the loss of billions of dollars to shareholders. SOX was designed to help reduce corporate fraud and unethical management decisions by setting up accountability measures for publicly traded companies. Company heads must verify that they have read quarterly and annual reports and vouch for their accuracy. SOX also requires companies to set up confidential systems so that employees and others can "raise red flags" about suspected illegal or unethical auditing and accounting practices.[3] Laws cannot, however, codify all ethical requirements. ■

Gray Areas in the Law For a number of reasons, laws may sometimes be difficult to interpret and apply. When legislatures draft laws, they typically use broad language so that the provisions will apply in a variety of circumstances. It can be hard to determine how such broad provisions apply to specific situations. In addition, laws intended to address one situation may apply to other situations as well. And the legislative body that passes a law may not give clear guidance on the purpose of the law or the definition of terms in the law.

1. Pub. L. No. 111–203, 124 Stat. 1376, July 21, 2010, 12 U.S.C. Sections 5301 et seq.
2. 15 U.S.C. Sections 7201 et seq.
3. In one such system, employees can click on an on-screen icon that anonymously links them with NAVEX Global to report suspicious accounting practices, sexual harassment, and other possibly unethical behavior.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Bogus Bank and Credit Card Accounts at Wells Fargo Bank

Wells Fargo Bank discovered that its employees had opened 2 million fake bank and credit card accounts for current customers without their authorization. The scam occurred over a period of five years. The bogus accounts generated extra fees for the bank and helped employees artificially inflate their sales figures to meet company goals and earn bonuses.

Wells Fargo fired 5,300 employees who were involved, paid $185 million in fines to the government, and refunded $5 million to customers. No executives were terminated initially, but the bank later fired four mid-level executives, and took stock awards and bonuses away from four other executives. Wells Fargo's accreditation rating with the Better Business Bureau dropped, and a number of state and local governments (as well as consumers) pulled their business from the bank. After an internal investigation, Wells Fargo announced that it would take back an additional $75 million in compensation from two top executives.

Angry customers filed lawsuits against Wells Fargo alleging fraud, invasion of privacy, negligence, and breach of contract. They claimed that Wells Fargo managers had acted unethically and pushed employees into committing fraud by requiring them to meet unreasonably high sales quotas. Federal and state governments and agencies continued to investigate the wrongdoing. Eventually, federal government regulators decided on an additional punishment: Until Wells Fargo makes significant improvements in its risk management and overall governance, the bank will operate under an "asset cap." That is, its growth will be limited by regulators.

Key Point

- The employees' conduct was both unethical and illegal, but Wells Fargo's managers may not have acted illegally (assuming that they had no knowledge of the fraud). Nonetheless, management may have acted unethically by fostering a culture that encouraged questionable, and even illegal, sales practices. Not all unethical conduct is illegal.

Know This:

When it is not entirely clear how a law applies, a company's best defense to allegations of misconduct is to show that the firm acted honestly and responsibly under the circumstances.

Moral Minimum The minimum level of ethical behavior expected by society, which is usually defined as compliance with the law.

Other issues arise because laws are created through the political process. They therefore often involve compromises among competing interests and industries. As a result, a law's provisions may be ambiguous, may be weaker than intended by the original drafters, or may lack a means of enforcement. In short, the law is not always clear, and these "gray areas" in the law make it difficult to predict with certainty how a court will apply a given law to a particular action.

The Moral Minimum Compliance with the law is sometimes called the moral minimum. If people and entities merely comply with the law, they are acting at the lowest ethical level that society will tolerate.

Failure to meet the moral minimum can have significant consequences, especially in the context of litigation. A businessperson who fails to respond to a lawsuit can be held liable. Case Example 3.3 Rick Scott deposited $2 million into an escrow account maintained by a company owned by Salvatore Carpanzano. Immediately after the deposit was made, the funds were withdrawn in violation of the escrow agreement. When Scott was unable to recover his money, he filed a suit against Salvatore Carpanzano and others. Salvatore failed to cooperate with discovery and did not respond to attempts to contact him by certified mail, regular mail, and e-mail. He also refused to make an appearance in court and did not finalize a settlement negotiated between the parties' attorneys. The court found that the defendant had intentionally failed to respond to the litigation and issued a judgment for more than $6 million in Scott's favor. On appeal, a federal appellate court affirmed the district court's judgment against Salvatore.[4]

4. Scott v. Carpanzano, 556 Fed.Appx. 288 (5th Cir. 2014).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Although the moral minimum is important, the study of ethics goes well beyond these legal requirements to evaluate what is right for society. Businesspersons must remember that an action that is legal is not necessarily ethical. For instance, a company can legally refuse to negotiate liability claims for injuries allegedly caused by a faulty product. But if the company's refusal is meant to increase the injured party's legal costs and force the party to drop a legitimate claim, the company is not acting ethically.

Private Company Codes of Ethics Most companies attempt to link ethics and law through the creation of internal codes of ethics. (We present the code of ethics of Costco Wholesale Corporation as an example in the appendix following this chapter.) Company codes are not laws. Instead, they are rules that the company sets forth and that it can enforce (by terminating an employee who does not follow them, for instance). Codes of conduct typically outline the company's policies on particular issues and indicate how employees are expected to act.

Example 3.4 Google's code of conduct starts with the motto "Don't be evil." The code then makes general statements about how Google promotes integrity, mutual respect, and the highest standard of ethical business conduct. Google's code also provides specific rules on a number of issues, such as privacy, drugs and alcohol, conflicts of interest, co-worker relationships, and confidentiality—it even includes a dog policy. The company takes a stand against employment discrimination that goes further than the law requires. It prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, and veteran status.

Industry Ethical Codes Numerous industries have also developed codes of ethics. The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants (AICPA) has a comprehensive Code of Professional Conduct for the ethical practicing of accounting. The American Bar Association (ABA) has model rules of professional conduct for attorneys, and the American Nurses Association (ANA) has a code of ethics that applies to nurses. These codes can give guidance to decision makers facing ethical questions. Violation of a code may result in the discipline of an employee or sanctions against a company from the industry organization. Remember, though, that these internal codes are not laws, so their effectiveness is determined by the commitment of the industry or company leadership to enforcing the codes.

3–1b The Role of Business in Society

Focus Question 1

What are two different views of the role of business in society?

Over the last two hundred years, public perception has moved toward expecting corporations to participate in society as corporate citizens. Originally, though, the only perceived duty of a corporation was to maximize profits and generate revenues for its owners. Although many people today may view this idea as greedy or ruthless, the rationale for the profit-maximization theory is still valid.

Business as a Pure Profit Maximizer In theory, if all firms strictly adhere to the goal of maximizing profits, resources flow to where they are most highly valued by society. Corporations can focus on their strengths. Other entities that are better suited to deal with social problems and perform charitable acts can specialize in those activities. The government, through taxes and other financial allocations, can shift resources to those other entities to perform public services. Thus, profit maximization can lead to the most efficient allocation of scarce resources.

Even when profit maximization is the goal, companies benefit by behaving ethically. For instance, customer satisfaction with a company is key to its profitability. Repeat customers are good for business. When customers are happy, word gets around, and it generates more business for the firm. Unsatisfied customers go elsewhere for the goods or services that the firm provides. When a business behaves badly, customers quickly report this online by posting bad reviews on such sites as Angie's List, Yelp, and TripAdvisor. Bad reviews obviously hurt a business's profits, while good reviews lead to higher profits.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Triple Bottom Line A measure that includes a corporation's profits, its impact on people, and its impact on the planet.

Business as a Corporate Citizen Over the years, many people became dissatisfied with profit-maximization theory. Investors and others began to look beyond profits and dividends and to consider the triple bottom line—a corporation's profits, its impact on people, and its impact on the planet. Magazines and websites began to rank companies based on their environmental impacts and their ethical decisions. Corporations came to be viewed as "citizens" that were expected to participate in bettering communities and society.

A Four-Part Analysis Whether one believes in profit-maximization theory or corporate citizenship, ethics is important in business decision making. When making decisions, a business should evaluate each of the following:

1. The legal implications of each decision.
2. The public relations impact.
3. The safety risks for consumers and employees.
4. The financial implications.

This four-part analysis will assist the firm in making decisions that not only maximize profits but also reflect good corporate citizenship.

3–1c Ethical Issues in Business

Ethical issues can arise in numerous aspects of doing business. A fundamental ethical issue for business is developing integrity and trust. Businesspersons should exhibit integrity in their dealings with other people in the company, other businesses, clients, and the community. By being honest and treating people fairly, businesspersons will earn their trust.

Businesses should also ensure that the workplace respects diversity and enforces equal opportunity employment and civil rights laws. In addition, businesses must comply with a host of federal and state laws and regulations, including those pertaining to the environment, financial reporting, and safety standards. Compliance with these rules can involve ethical issues. See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion of an ethical issue that has arisen from employees' work-related use of digital technology after work hours.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Should Employees Have a "Right of Disconnecting"?

Almost all jobs today involve digital technology, whether it be e-mails, Internet access, or smartphone use. Most employees, when interviewed, say that digital technology increases their productivity and flexibility. The downside is what some call an "electronic leash"— employees are constantly connected and therefore end up working when they are not "at work." Over one-third of full-time workers, for example, say that they frequently check e-mails outside normal working hours.

Do Workers Have the Right to Disconnect?

Because the boundaries between being "at work" and being "at leisure" can be so hazy, some labor unions in other countries have attempted to pass rules that allow employees to disconnect from e-mail and other work-related digital communication during nonworking hours. For example, a French labor union representing high-tech workers signed an agreement with a large business association recognizing a "right of disconnecting."

In Germany, Volkswagen and BMW no longer forward e-mail to staff from company servers after the end of the working day. Other German firms have declared that workers are not expected to check e-mail on weekends and holidays. The government is considering legislating such restrictions nationwide.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Thorny Issue of Overtime and the Fair Labor Standards Act

In the United States, payment for overtime work is strictly regulated under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). According to the Supreme Court, in this context, work is "physical or mental exertion (whether burdensome or not) controlled or required by the employer and pursued necessarily for the benefit of the employer and his business."[a] This definition was extended to off-duty work if such work is an "integral and indispensible part of [employees'] activities."[b] For example, a court ruled that Hormel Foods Corporation had to pay its factory workers for the time it took them to change into and out of the required white clothes before and after their shifts.[c]

Today's modern digital connectivity raises issues about the definition of work. Employees at several major companies, including Black & Decker, T-Mobile, and Verizon, have sued for unpaid overtime related to smartphone use. In another case, a police sergeant sued the city of Chicago, claiming that he should have been paid overtime for hours spent using his personal digital assistant (PDA). The police department had issued PDAs to officers and required them to respond to work-related communications even while off duty. The court agreed that some of the officers' off-duty PDA activities were compensable. Nevertheless, it ruled in favor of the city because the officers had failed to follow proper procedures for filing overtime claims.[d]

Not All Employees Demand the "Right to Disconnect"

In one Gallup poll, 79 percent of full-time employees had either strongly positive or somewhat positive views of using computers, e-mail, tablets, and smartphones to work remotely outside of normal business hours. According to the same poll, 17 percent of them report "better overall lives" because of constant online connectivity with their work. Working remotely after business hours apparently does not necessarily result in additional work-related stress.

Critical Thinking

From an ethical point of view, is there any difference between calling subordinates during off hours for work-related questions and sending them e-mails or text messages?

a. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Muscoda Local No. 123, 321 U.S. 590, 64 S.Ct. 698, 8 L.Ed. 949 (1944). Although Congress later passed a statute that superseded the holding in this case, the statute gave the courts broad authority to interpret the FLSA's definition of work. 29 U.S.C. Section 251(a). See Integrity Staffing Solutions, Inc. v. Busk, 574 U.S. 27, 135 S.Ct. 513, 190 L.Ed.2d 410 (2014).

b. Steiner v. Mitchell, 350 U.S. 247, 76 S.Ct. 330, 100 L.Ed. 267 (1956).

c. United Food & Commercial Workers Union, Local 1473 v. Hormel Food Corp., 367 Wis.2d 131, 876 N.W.2d 99 (2016).

d. Allen v. City of Chicago, 865 F.3d 167 (7th Cir. 2017).

The most difficult aspect of ethics that businesses face is in decision making, which is the focus of this text. Businesspersons must learn to recognize ethical issues, get the pertinent facts, evaluate the alternatives, and then make a decision. Decision makers should also test and reflect on the outcome of their decisions.

3–1d The Importance of Ethical Leadership

In ethics, as in other areas, employees take their cues from management. Talking about ethical business decision making is meaningless if management does not set standards. Furthermore, managers must apply the same standards to themselves as they do to the company's employees. This duty starts with top management.

Attitude of Top Management One of the most important ways to create and maintain an ethical workplace is for top management to demonstrate its commitment to ethical decision making. A manager who is not totally committed to an ethical workplace will rarely succeed in creating one. More than anything else, top management's behavior sets the ethical tone of a firm.

Managers have found that discharging even one employee for ethical reasons has a tremendous impact as a deterrent to unethical behavior in the workplace. This is true even if the company has a written code of ethics. If management does not enforce the company code, the code is essentially nonexistent.

The administration of a university may have had this concept in mind in the following case when it applied the school's professionalism standard to a student who had engaged in serious misconduct.

Know This:

One of the best ways to encourage good business ethics at a workplace is to take immediate corrective action in response to any unethical conduct.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 3.1

Al-Dabagh v. Case Western Reserve University

United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit,777 F.3d 355 (2015).

Facts The curriculum at Case Western Reserve University School of Medicine identifies nine "core competencies." At the top of the list is professionalism, which includes "ethical, honest, responsible and reliable behavior." The university's Committee on Students determines whether a student has met the professionalism requirements. Amir Al-Dabagh enrolled at the school and did well academically. But he sexually harassed fellow students, often asked an instructor not to mark him late for class, received complaints from hospital staff about his demeanor, and was convicted of driving while intoxicated. The Committee on Students unanimously refused to certify him for graduation and dismissed him from the university. He filed a suit in a federal district court against Case Western, alleging a breach of good faith and fair dealing. The court ordered the school to issue a diploma. Case Western appealed.

ARLOU_ANDREI/Shutterstock.com

Under what circumstances can a medical school withhold a diploma from one of its students?

Issue Should a court defer to a university's determination that a student lacks the professionalism required to graduate?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed the lower court's order to issue a diploma. The appellate court found nothing to indicate that Case Western had "impermissible motives," acted in bad faith, or dealt unfairly with Al-Dabagh.

Reason The Committee on Students' refusal to approve Al-Dabagh for graduation was an academic judgment. The court explained that it would overturn such a decision only if it substantially departed from accepted academic norms. There was nothing to indicate that such a departure occurred in Al-Dabagh's case. The plaintiff argued that the committee's decision was a "punitive disciplinary measure" unrelated to academics. But Case Western placed a high value on professionalism in the school's academic curriculum. Al-Dabagh also argued that the university defined professionalism too broadly and that it should be linked only to test scores and similar academic performance. "That is not how we see it or for that matter how the medical school sees it. . . . Our own standards indicate that professionalism does not end at the courtroom door. Why should hospitals operate any differently?"

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Case Western had tolerated Al-Dabagh's conduct and awarded him a diploma. What impact might that have had on other students at the school? Why?

Unrealistic Goals for Employees Certain types of behavior on the part of managers and owners contribute to unethical behavior among employees. Managers who set unrealistic production or sales goals increase the probability that employees will act unethically. If a sales quota can be met only through high-pressure, unethical sales tactics, employees will try to act "in the best interest of the company" and behave unethically. Managers who look the other way when they know about employees' unethical behavior also set an example—one indicating that ethical transgressions will be accepted.

Note that even when large companies have policies against sales incentives, individual branches may still promote them. Case Example 3.5 The financial firm Morgan Stanley Smith Barney, LLC, has an internal policy barring sales contests. Nevertheless, Morgan Stanley branches in Massachusetts and Rhode Island held a sales contest in which brokers were given cash incentives of up to $5,000 for selling securities-based loans, or SBLs (loans that allow clients to borrow against their investments). Thirty financial advisers participated in the sales contest for almost a year until Morgan Stanley's compliance office noticed and halted the practice. One regional branch reportedly tripled its loans as a result of the contest. Eventually, Morgan Stanley paid a $1 million fine to the state of Massachusetts for, among other things, violating state securities rules and "failing to observe high standards of commercial honor."[5]

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Fostering of Unethical Conduct Business owners and managers sometimes take more active roles in fostering unethical and illegal conduct, with negative consequences for their businesses. Case Example 3.6 Rachel Maddox purchased a home on a hillside in Nashville. After heavy rains, Maddox noticed cracks in the basement. She also noticed that if a tennis ball was placed on the floor, it would roll toward the front of the house. Maddox contacted Olshan Foundation Repair and Waterproofing Co., who sent Kevin Hayman to inspect her property. Hayman—described on work orders as a "certified structural technician"—suggested $27,000 of repairs. Maddox agreed, in part because of Olshan's promise of a lifetime warranty.

Several years later, further rain caused new cracks in the foundation of the house, which had again begun to tilt. After several unsuccessful attempts to correct these problems, Olshan employees stopped coming to the property or returning Maddox's calls. An independent engineer told Maddox that Olshan's "repairs" had made the house foundation issues worse. Eventually, a local building inspector noted that the house appeared to be "sliding off the hill" and was unsafe for inhabitation. Maddox sued Olshan for fraud. At trial, a company executive admitted that Hayman's "certification" was based on a three-week course administered by the company. The court awarded Maddox $187,000 for the fair market value of her home, plus $15,000 in punitive damages because of Olshan's egregiously unethical behavior. This judgment was affirmed on appeal.[6]

3–2 Ethical Principles and Philosophies

How do business decision makers decide whether a given action is the "right" one for their firms? What ethical standards should be applied? Broadly speaking, ethical reasoning—the application of moral convictions or ethical standards to a situation—applies to businesses just as it does to individuals. As businesses make decisions, they must analyze the alternatives in a variety of ways, one of which is from an ethical perspective. In analyzing alternatives in this way, businesses may take one of two approaches.

Generally, the study of ethics is divided into two major categories—duty-based ethics and outcome-based ethics. Duty-based ethics is rooted in the idea that every person (and business) has certain duties to others, including humans and the planet. Outcome-based ethics determines what is ethical by looking at the consequences, or outcomes, of any given action. Most companies have written codes or policies that outline their approach to ethics.

Focus Question 2

How do duty-based ethical standards differ from outcome-based ethical standards?

Ethical Reasoning A reasoning process in which individuals link their moral convictions or ethical standards to the situation at hand.

Duty-Based Ethics An ethical philosophy rooted in the idea that every person (and every business) has certain duties to others, including both humans and the planet.

Outcome-Based Ethics An ethical philosophy that focuses on the consequences of any given action in order to maximize benefits and minimize harms.

3–2a Duty-Based Ethics

Duty-based ethics focuses on the obligations of the corporation. It deals with standards for behavior that traditionally were derived from revealed truths, religious authorities, and philosophical reasoning. These standards involve concepts of right and wrong, duties owed, and rights to be protected. Corporations today often describe these values or duties in their mission statements or strategic plans. Some companies base their statements on a nonreligious rationale. Others derive their values from religious doctrine.

Religious Ethical Principles Nearly every religion has principles or beliefs about how one should treat others. In the Judeo-Christian tradition, which is the dominant religious tradition in the United States, the Ten Commandments of the Old Testament establish these

5. In re Morgan Stanley Smith Barney, LLC, Docket No. E-2016-0055. www.sec.state.ma.us. 10 April 2017. Web.
6. Maddox v Olshan Foundation Repair and Waterproofing Co. of Nashville, L.P., 2019 WL 4464816 (Tenn. Ct. App. 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Leena Robinson/Shutterstock.com

How can religious beliefs complicate or enhance a business owner's operations and decisions?

fundamental rules for moral action. The principles of the Muslim faith are set out in the Qur'an, and Hindus find their principles in the four Vedas.

Religious rules generally are absolute with respect to the behavior of their adherents. Example 3.7 The commandment "Thou shalt not steal" is an absolute mandate for a person who believes that the Ten Commandments reflect revealed truth. Even a benevolent motive for stealing (such as Robin Hood's) cannot justify the act, because the act itself is inherently immoral and thus wrong.

For businesses, religious principles can be a unifying force for employees or a rallying point to increase employee motivation. They can also present problems, however, when owners, suppliers, employees, and customers have varying religious backgrounds. Taking an action based on religious principles, especially when those principles address socially or politically controversial topics, can lead to negative publicity and even to protests or boycotts.

Example 3.8 Bright Futures, a family-owned educational supply business in California, hires Jamie as a bookkeeper. When Jamie tells the owners that she is transgender, she is fired because of their religious beliefs. When Jamie's story is published in the local media, Bright Futures loses many customers. Eventually, Bright Futures closes down.

The Principle of Rights

Another view of duty-based ethics focuses on basic rights. The principle that human beings have certain fundamental rights (to life, freedom, and the pursuit of happiness, for instance) is deeply embedded in Western culture. This view embraces the concept that certain actions (such as killing another person) are morally wrong because they violate the fundamental rights of others.

Principle of Rights The belief that human beings have certain fundamental rights.

Those who adhere to the principle of rights, or "rights theory," believe that a key factor in determining whether a business decision is ethical is how that decision affects the rights of others. These others include the firm's owners, its employees, the consumers of its products or services, its suppliers, the community in which it does business, and society as a whole.

Conflicting Rights. A potential dilemma for those who support rights theory is that they may disagree on which rights are most important. When considering all those affected by a business decision to downsize a firm, for instance, how much weight should be given to employees relative to shareholders? Which employees should be laid off first—those with the highest salaries or those who have worked for the firm for a shorter time (and have less seniority)? How should the firm weigh the rights of customers relative to the community, or of employees relative to society as a whole?

Resolving Conflicts. In general, rights theorists believe that whichever right is stronger in a particular circumstance takes precedence. Example 3.9 Murray Chemical Corporation has to decide whether to keep a chemical plant in Utah open, thereby saving the jobs of a hundred and fifty workers, or shut it down. Closing the plant will prevent the contamination of a river with pollutants that would endanger the health of tens of thousands of people. In this situation, a rights theorist can easily choose which group to favor because the value of the right to health and well-being is obviously stronger than the basic right to work. Not all choices are so clear-cut, however.

Kantian Ethical Principles

Duty-based ethical standards may be derived solely from philosophical reasoning. The German philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) identified some general guiding principles for moral behavior based on what he thought to be the fundamental nature of human beings. Kant believed that human beings are qualitatively different from other physical objects and are endowed with moral integrity and the capacity to reason and conduct their affairs rationally.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

People Are Not a Means to an End. Based on his view of human beings, Kant said that when people are treated merely as a means to an end, they are being treated as the equivalent of objects and are being denied their basic humanity. For instance, a manager who treats subordinates as mere profit-making tools is less likely to retain motivated and loyal employees than a manager who respects subordinates. Management research has shown that employees who feel empowered to share their thoughts, opinions, and solutions to problems are happier and more productive.

The Categorical Imperative. When a business makes unethical decisions, it often rationalizes its actions by saying that the company is "just one small part" of the problem or that its decision would have "only a small impact." A central theme in Kantian ethics is that individuals should evaluate their actions in light of the consequences that would follow if everyone in society acted in the same way. This categorical imperative can be applied to any action.

Categorical Imperative An ethical guideline developed by Immanuel Kant under which an action is evaluated in terms of what would happen if everybody else in the same situation, or category, acted the same way.

Example 3.10 CHS Fertilizer is deciding whether to invest in expensive equipment that will decrease profits but will also reduce pollution from its factories. If CHS has adopted Kant's categorical imperative, the decision makers will consider the consequences if every company invested in the equipment (or if no company did so). If the result of purchasing the equipment would make the world a better place (less polluted), CHS's decision would be clear.

3–2b Outcome-Based Ethics: Utilitarianism

In contrast to duty-based ethics, outcome-based ethics focuses on the consequences of an action, not on the nature of the action itself or on any set of preestablished moral values or religious beliefs. Outcome-based ethics looks at the impacts of a decision in an attempt to maximize benefits and minimize harms.

The premier philosophical theory for outcome-based decision making is utilitarianism, a philosophical theory developed by Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832) and modified by John Stuart Mill (1806–1873)—both British philosophers. "The greatest good for the greatest number" is a paraphrase of the major premise of the utilitarian approach to ethics.

Utilitarianism An approach to ethical reasoning in which an action is evaluated in terms of its consequences for those whom it will affect. A "good" action is one that results in the greatest good for the greatest number of people.

Cost-Benefit Analysis Under a utilitarian model of ethics, an action is morally correct, or "right," when, among the people it affects, it produces the greatest amount of good for the greatest number (or creates the least amount of harm). When an action affects the majority adversely, it is morally wrong. Applying the utilitarian theory thus requires the following steps:

1. A determination of which individuals will be affected by the action in question.
2. A cost-benefit analysis, which involves an assessment of the negative and positive effects of alternative actions on these individuals.
3. A choice among alternative actions that will produce maximum societal utility (the greatest positive net benefits for the greatest number of individuals).

Cost-Benefit Analysis A decision-making technique that involves weighing the costs of a given action against the benefits of that action.

For instance, assume that expanding a factory would provide hundreds of jobs but generate pollution that could endanger the lives of thousands of people. A utilitarian analysis would find that saving the lives of thousands creates greater good than providing jobs for hundreds.

Problems with the Utilitarian Approach There are problems with a strict utilitarian analysis. In some situations, an action that produces the greatest good for the most people may not seem to be the most ethical.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Example 3.11 Phazim Company is producing a drug that will cure a disease in 99 percent of patients, but the other 1 percent will experience agonizing side effects and a horrible, painful death. A quick utilitarian analysis would suggest that the drug should be produced and marketed because the majority of patients will benefit. Many people, however, have significant concerns about manufacturing a drug that will cause serious harm to anyone.

3–2c Corporate Social Responsibility

Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) The idea that corporations can and should act ethically and be accountable to society for their actions.

In pairing duty-based concepts with outcome-based concepts, strategists and theorists developed the idea of the corporate citizen, which we touched on earlier, and the concept of corporate social responsibility. Corporate social responsibility (CSR) combines a commitment to good citizenship with a commitment to making ethical decisions, improving society, and minimizing environmental impact. CSR is not imposed on a corporation by law but is instead a form of self-regulation by the company.

CSR is a relatively new concept in the history of business, but it is a concept that becomes more important every year. A survey of U.S. executives undertaken by the Boston College Center for Corporate Citizenship found that more than 70 percent of those polled agreed that corporate citizenship must be treated as a priority. More than 60 percent said that good corporate citizenship added to their companies' profits.

CSR can be a successful strategy for companies, but corporate decision makers must not lose track of the two descriptors in the title: corporate and social. The company must link the responsibility of citizenship with the strategy and key principles of the business. Incorporating both the social and the corporate components of CSR and making ethical decisions can help companies grow and prosper.

CSR is most successful when a company undertakes activities that are significant and related to its business operations. Some types of activities that businesses are practicing today include the following:

1. Environmental efforts, such as using efficient building materials and reducing the size of the firm's carbon footprint.
2. Ethical labor practices, including treating all employees fairly and ethically in international as well as domestic operations.
3. Charitable donations to local and national causes.
4. Volunteering for specific issues and organizations. As an incentive, many companies now pay employees to perform volunteer work.

Citizen of the Planet/Education Images/Universal Images Group/Getty Images

What benefits are there to constructing a LEED-compliant office building?

The Corporate Aspects of CSR Arguably, any socially responsible activity will benefit a corporation. A corporation may see an increase in goodwill from the local community for creating a sports park, for instance. A corporation that is viewed as a good citizen may see a rise in sales. Example 3.12 Sales have increased for Ben & Jerry's ice cream since the 1980s, when the company became known for its socially responsible business practices. The company uses only fair trade ingredients and opposes the use of growth hormones in cows. It promotes sustainability programs for dairy farmers and supports family farms.

At times, the benefit may not be immediate. It may cost more initially to construct a new plant that meets the high standards necessary to be certified as environmentally friendly by the LEED program, for example. (LEED stands for Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design.) Nevertheless, over the life of the building, the savings in maintenance and utilities may more than make up for the extra cost of construction.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Surveys of college students about to enter the job market confirm that young people are looking for socially responsible employers. While socially responsible activities may cost a corporation now, they may also lead to more talented and more committed employees. Corporations that engage in meaningful social activities retain workers longer, particularly younger ones. Example 3.13 Google's focus on social responsibility attracts many young workers. Google has worked to reduce its carbon footprint and to make its products and services better for the environment. The company promotes green commuting, recycling, and reducing energy consumption at its data centers.

The Social Aspects of CSR Because business controls so much of the wealth and power in this country, it has a responsibility to use that wealth and power in socially beneficial ways. Thus, the social aspect requires that corporations demonstrate that they are promoting goals that society deems worthwhile and are moving toward solutions to social problems. Companies may be judged on how much they donate to social causes, as well as how they conduct their operations with respect to employment discrimination, human rights, environmental concerns, and similar issues. Millennials, in particular, are concerned about corporate social responsibility.

Some corporations publish annual social responsibility reports, which may also be called citizenship or sustainability reports. Example 3.14 The multinational technology company Cisco Systems, Inc., issues corporate responsibility reports to demonstrate its focus on people, society, and the planet. In a recent report, Cisco outlined its commitment to developing its employees' skills, ethical conduct, and charitable donations (including matching employee contributions and giving employees time off for volunteer work). Cisco also reported on the social and economic impact of its business globally, in the areas of human rights, labor, privacy and data security, and responsible manufacturing. The report indicated that Cisco had completed more than a hundred energy-efficient projects and was on track to meet its goals of reducing emissions from its worldwide operations by 40 percent.

Stakeholders and CSR One view of CSR stresses that corporations have a duty not just to shareholders, but also to other groups affected by corporate decision making, called stakeholders. The rationale for this "stakeholder view" is that, in some circumstances, one or more of these groups may have a greater stake in company decisions than the shareholders do.

Stakeholders Groups that are affected by corporate decisions. Stakeholders include employees, customers, creditors, suppliers, and the community in which the corporation operates.

A corporation's stakeholders include its employees, customers, creditors, suppliers, and the community in which it operates. Advocacy groups, such as environmental groups and animal rights groups, may also be stakeholders. Under the stakeholder approach, a corporation considers the impact of its decision on these stakeholders, which helps it to avoid making a decision that may appear unethical and may result in negative publicity. In this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature, we take a closer look at an offshoot of CSR known as "stakeholder capitalism."

The most difficult aspect of the stakeholder analysis is determining which group's interests should receive greater weight if the interests conflict. For instance, companies that are struggling financially sometimes lay off workers to reduce labor costs. But some corporations have found ways to avoid slashing their workforces and to prioritize their employees' interests. Companies finding alternatives to layoffs include Dell (extended unpaid holidays), Cisco (four-day end-of-year shutdowns), Motorola (salary cuts), and Honda (voluntary unpaid vacation time). These alternatives not only benefit the employees who get to keep their jobs, but also the community as whole. Working people can afford to go out to local restaurants and shops and use local service providers. Thus, other businesses in the community benefit.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Stakeholder Capitalism Movement

Fortune 500 companies are lining up help to fight climate change. PepsiCo has promised to cut carbon emissions from its business operations 20 percent by 2030. Amazon has pledged to become carbon neutral, with no emissions, by 2040. Not to be outdone, Microsoft has vowed to remove carbon from the atmosphere, erasing its entire "historical footprint" by 2050. These are examples of stakeholder capitalism, in which managers make decisions based not only on maximizing profits for investors, but also on contributing to the well-being of society.

Corporate Power

Managerial behavior impacts a wide array of stakeholders, as described in the text. Proponents of stakeholder capitalism believe that it is unethical to ignore these stakeholders in the corporate decision-making process, particularly given the benefits that corporations derive from operating in a stable society.

Critics of stakeholder capitalism point to some corporate laws that recognize the duty of directors, executives, and managers to act in the best interests of investors.[a] Managers, they say, should be hired because they are skilled at maximizing profits and minimizing losses, not at solving society's ills. "I don't want American capitalists [to define] the country's political and social values," says one executive. "I think the answers to these questions should be determined by the citizenry—publicly through debate and privately at the ballot box."

Star Power

The practical challenges of managerial activism are evident in Nike's decision to employ professional football player Colin Kaepernick as a commercial spokesperson. Kaepernick is a controversial figure because of his refusal to stand for the national anthem in protest of racial inequality. The day Nike announced his hiring, customers posted videos of themselves burning its products, and the company's stock price fell 3.17 percent.

Several years later, Kaepernick's comments caused Nike to recall a line of sneakers emblazoned with a 13-star "Betsy Ross" American flag, which he said was offensive because of its connections to the nation's slave era. Avoiding this kind of turmoil is what marketers had in mind when, in a poll, only one in five said it was appropriate for their brand to take a stance on politically charged issues.

a. See eBay Domestic Holdings, Inc. v. Newmark, 16 A.3d 1 (Court of Chancery of Delaware, 2010).

Business Questions

1. After a school shooting, Dick's Sporting Goods stopped selling certain firearms at its stores. What are the potential benefits and drawbacks of this form of corporate social responsibility?

2. Why might a state law require corporate managers to maximize company profits?

3–3 Sources of Ethical Issues in Business Decisions

A key to avoiding unethical conduct is to recognize how certain situations may lead individuals to act unethically. In this section, we first consider some specific areas in which ethical decisions may often arise. We then discuss some additional problems in making ethical business decisions.

Focus Question 3

What is short-term profit maximization, and why does it lead to ethical problems?

3–3a Short-Term Profit Maximization

Businesspersons often commit ethical violations because they are too focused on one issue or one needed result, such as increasing profits or outperforming the competition. Some studies indicate that top-performing companies may actually be more likely to behave unethically than less successful companies, because employees feel they are expected to continue performing at a high level. Thus, abnormally high profits and stock prices may lead to unethical behavior.

In attempting to maximize profits, corporate executives and employees have to distinguish between short-run and long-run profit maximization. In the short run, a company may increase its profits by continuing to sell a product even though it knows that the product is defective. In the long run, though, because of lawsuits, large settlements, and bad publicity, such unethical conduct will cause profits to suffer. An overemphasis on short-run profit maximization is perhaps the most common reason that ethical problems occur in business.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case Example 3.15 Volkswagen's corporate executives were accused of cheating on the pollution emissions tests of millions of vehicles that were sold in the United States. Volkswagen (VW) eventually admitted that it had installed "defeat device" software in its diesel models. The software detected when the car was being tested and changed its performance to improve the test outcome. As a result, the diesel cars showed low emissions—a feature that made the cars more attractive to today's consumers.

Ultimately, Volkswagen agreed to plead guilty to criminal charges and pay $2.8 billion in fines. The company also agreed to pay $1.5 billion to the Environmental Protection Agency to settle the federal investigation into its "clean diesel" emissions fraud. Overall, the scandal has cost VW nearly $15 billion (in fines and to compensate consumers or buy back their vehicles). Even though the company has settled, six top executives at VW were charged with criminal wire fraud, conspiracy, and violations of the Clean Air Act. In the end, the company's focus on maximizing profits in the short run (with increased sales) led to unethical conduct that will hurt profits in the long run.[7]

In the following case, a drug manufacturer was accused of fabricating the "average wholesale prices" for its drugs to maximize its profits and receive an overpayment from Medicaid.

7. In re Volkswagen "Clean Diesel" Marketing, Sales Practices, and Product Liability Litigation, 229 F.Supp.3d 1052, 2017 WL 66281 (N.D.Cal. 2017).

Case 3.2

Watson Laboratories, Inc. v. State of Mississippi

Supreme Court of Mississippi, 241 So.3d 573, 2018 WL 372297 (2018).

Facts Watson Laboratories, Inc., makes generic drugs, which are provided by pharmacies to Medicaid patients. In the state of Mississippi, a claim is submitted for the cost of the drug to Mississippi Medicaid. The claim is paid according to a percentage of the drug's average wholesale price (AWP). Like other drug makers, Watson published its products' AWPs. But for more than a dozen years, Watson set each AWP to meet the requirements to obtain a generic designation for the drug, without regard to the actual price.

When Mississippi Medicaid learned that the actual prices were much lower than the published AWPs, the state filed a suit in a Mississippi state court against Watson. The court concluded that Watson caused the state to overpay for the drugs, and ordered the payment of more than $30 million in penalties, damages, and interest. Watson appealed.

Issue Did Watson commit fraud regarding the AWPs of its generic drugs?

Decision Yes. The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's order. Watson falsely misrepresented its AWPs, "knew that Mississippi Medicaid would rely on its false statements, and benefitted from this reliance."

Reason The elements of fraud are (1) the misrepresentation of facts with the knowledge that they are false, (2) an intent to induce another to rely on the misrepresentation, (3) justifiable reliance by the deceived party, (4) damage suffered as a result, and (5) a causal connection between the misrepresentation and the injury. The facts in this case established all of these elements. For years, Watson published AWPs that were fabricated numbers, knowing and intending that Mississippi Medicaid would rely on them to make its reimbursements. Mississippi Medicaid did not know that the numbers had no rational relationship to the actual prices and accepted the AWPs as a proper starting point for determining reimbursement rates. Evidence showed that determining reimbursements on this basis led to overpayment for the drugs in question. The evidence also supported the extent of the damage suffered at the expense of the taxpayers of the state of Mississippi.

Critical Thinking

- Economic What marketing tool did Watson gain by inflating its AWPs?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Watson argued that AWP was a "term of art" in the pharmaceutical industry that meant "suggested price." Suppose that the court had accepted this argument. What might have been the effect of this decision?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3–3b Social Media

Advancements in technology have created various new ethical issues for companies. Here, we focus on those involving social media. Most people think of social media—Facebook, Flickr, Instagram, Snapchat, Tumblr, Twitter, Pinterest, WhatsApp, LinkedIn, and the like—as simply ways to communicate rapidly. But everyone knows that they can quickly encounter ethical and legal disputes for posting statements that others interpret as harassing, inappropriate, insulting, or racist. Businesses often face ethical issues with respect to these social media platforms.

The Use of Social Media to Make Hiring Decisions In the past, to learn about a prospective employee, an employer would ask the candidate's former employers for references. Today, employers are likely to also conduct Internet searches to discover what job candidates have posted on their Facebook pages, blogs, and tweets.

On the one hand, job candidates may be judged by what they post on social media. On the other hand, though, they may be judged because they do not participate in social media. Given that the vast majority of younger people use social media, some employers have decided that the failure to do so raises a red flag. In either case, many people believe that judging job candidates based on what they do outside the work environment is unethical.

The Use of Social Media to Discuss Work-Related Issues Because so many Americans use social media daily, they often discuss work-related issues there. Numerous companies have strict guidelines about what is appropriate and inappropriate for employees to say when posting on their own or others' social media accounts. A number of companies have fired employees for such activities as criticizing other employees or managers through social media outlets. Until recently, such disciplinary measures were considered ethical and legal.

The Responsibility of Employers. A ruling by the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB—the federal agency that investigates unfair labor practices) has changed the legality of such actions. Example 3.16 At one time, Costco's social media policy specified that its employees should not make statements that would damage the company, harm another person's reputation, or violate the company's policies. Employees who violated these rules were subject to discipline and could be fired.

The NLRB ruled that Costco's social media policy violated federal labor law, which protects employees' right to engage in "concerted activities." Employees can freely associate with each other and have conversations about common workplace issues without employer interference. This right extends to social media posts. Therefore, an employer cannot broadly prohibit its employees from criticizing the company or co-workers, supervisors, or managers via social media. ■

The Responsibility of Employees. While most of the discussion in this chapter concerns the ethics of business management, employee ethics is also an important issue. For instance, is it ethical for employees to make negative posts in social media about other employees or, more commonly, about managers? After all, negative comments about managers reflect badly on those managers, who often are reluctant to respond via social media to such criticism. Disgruntled employees may exaggerate the negative qualities of managers whom they do not like.

Some may consider the decision by the National Labor Relations Board outlined in Example 3.16 to be too lenient toward employees and too stringent toward management. There is likely to be an ongoing debate about how to balance employees' right to free expression against employers' right to prevent the spreading of inaccurate negative statements online.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3–3c Awareness

lumen-digital/Shutterstock.com

Takata Corporation knew about its defective airbags, yet it continued to use them in production. How can business managers learn from Takata's situation?

Regardless of the context in which a decision is called for, sometimes businesspersons are not even aware that the decision has ethical implications. Perhaps they are focused on something else, for instance, or perhaps they do not take the time to think through their actions.

Case Example 3.17 Japanese airbag maker Takata Corporation manufactured some airbags that used an ammonium nitrate-based propellant without a chemical drying agent. It was later discovered that these airbags tended to deploy explosively, especially in higher temperatures, higher humidity, and older vehicles. When the airbags deployed, metal inflator cartridges inside them sometimes ruptured, sending metal shards into the passenger cabin.

By the beginning of 2017, these defective airbags had caused 11 deaths and 180 injuries in the United States. The federal government ordered recalls of the devices in nearly 42 million vehicles nationwide. Takata executives likely did not intend to hurt consumers and may not even have considered the ethics of their decision. Takata, however, continued to produce airbags with this defect for years. The company, which declared bankruptcy, agreed to pay $1 billion in fines and restitution and another $650 million to settle a class-action lawsuit that resulted from its actions.[8]

3–3d Rationalization

Sometimes, businesspersons make a decision that benefits them or their company that they know is ethically questionable. Afterward, they rationalize their bad behavior. For instance, a generally honest employee who normally does not steal might rationalize that it is acceptable to take company property for personal use or to lie to a client just this one time. An executive might rationalize that unethical conduct directed against a certain competitor is acceptable because that company deserves it. Individuals might rationalize that their conduct is simply a part of doing business and is not personal or unethical.

One suggestion that is useful in counteracting rationalization is for businesspersons to first decide the right thing to do on an ethical level before making a business decision. Then they can figure out how to mitigate the costs of doing the right thing. This works much better to prevent unethical conduct than making decisions based solely on a financial or business basis and then trying to make that result seem ethical (by rationalizing).

3–3e Uncertainty

One common denominator identified by businesspersons who have faced ethical problems is the feeling of uncertainty. They may be uncertain as to what they should do, what they should have done, or (as mentioned) whether there is even an ethical issue or ethical breach involved. Such uncertainty is practically unavoidable, but it should be treated as an indicator of a potential ethical problem.

When employees or executives express uncertainty about a particular decision, it is therefore best to treat the situation as involving an ethical issue. Decision makers should try to identify what the ethical dilemma is and why the individual or group is feeling uneasy. They should also take the time to think through the decision completely and discuss various options. They might want to consider whether the company would be pleased if the decision were reported to its clients or to the public. Building a process that supports and assists those facing ethical dilemmas can be key to avoiding unethical business practices (and any corresponding negative publicity).

8. In re Takata Airbag Products Liability Litigation, 255 F.Supp.3d 1241 (2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3–4 Making Ethical Business Decisions

Even if officers, directors, and others in a company want to make ethical decisions, it is not always clear what is ethical in a given situation. Thinking beyond things that are easily measured, such as profits, can be challenging. Although profit projections are not always accurate, they may be more objective than considering the personal impacts of decisions on employees, shareholders, customers, and the community. But this subjective component of decision making can be equally important to a company's long-run profits.

Individuals entering the global corporate community, even in entry-level positions, must be prepared to make hard decisions. Sometimes, there is no "good" answer to the questions that arise. Therefore, it is important to have tools to help in the decision-making process and a framework for organizing those tools.

Several frameworks exist to help businesspersons make ethical decisions. Some frameworks, for instance, focus more on legal than ethical implications. This approach tends to be primarily outcome-based and, as such, may not be appropriate for a company that is values driven or committed to corporate social responsibility (or has a consumer or investor base that is focused on CSR). Other models, such as the Business Process Pragmatism™ procedure developed by ethics consultant Leonard H. Bucklin, set out a series of steps to follow. In this text, we present a modified version of this system that we call IDDR. ("I Desire to Do Right" is a useful mnemonic device for remembering the name.)

Focus Question 4

What are the four steps in the IDDR approach to ethical decision making?

3–4a A Systematic Approach: IDDR ("I Desire to Do Right")

Using the IDDR approach involves organizing the issues and approaching them systematically. This process can help eliminate various alternatives and identify the strengths and weaknesses of the remaining alternatives. Often, the best approach is for a group (rather than an individual) to carry out the process, which comprises the following steps. Thus, when individual employees face an ethical issue, they should talk with their supervisors, and then the parties should perform the following steps together.

Step 1: Inquiry The first step in making an ethical decision is to understand the problem. If an employee feels uneasy about a particular decision, decision makers should pay attention and ask questions. People generally know when something does not "feel" right, and this is often a good indicator that there may be an ethical problem. The decision makers must identify the ethical problem and all the parties involved—the stakeholders. It is important that they not frame the issue in a way that gives them the answer they might prefer. After gathering the relevant facts, the decision makers can also consider which ethical theories can help them analyze the problem thoroughly. Making a list of the ethical principles that will guide the decision may be helpful at this point.

Step 2: Discussion Once the ethical problem or problems have been clarified, a list of possible actions can be compiled. In discussing these alternatives, the decision makers should take time to think through each alternative completely and analyze its potential impact on various groups of stakeholders. They must evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of each option, along with its ethical and legal consequences. It is helpful to discuss with management the ultimate goals for the decision. At this point, too, the decision makers need to consider what they should do (what is the most ethical) before considering what they can or will do.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Step 3: Decision With all the relevant facts collected and the alternatives thoroughly analyzed and discussed, it's time to make a decision. Those participating in the decision-making process now work together to craft a consensus decision or plan of action for the company. Once the decision has been made, the decision makers should use the analysis from the discussion step to articulate the reasons they arrived at the decision. This results in documentation that can be shared with stakeholders to explain why the course of action is an ethical solution to the problem.

Step 4: Review After the decision has been made and implemented, it is important for the decision makers to review the outcome to determine whether the solution was effective. Did the action solve the ethical problem? Were the stakeholders satisfied with the result? Could anything have been handled better? The results of this evaluation can be used in making future decisions. Successful decision makers learn from their mistakes and continue to improve.

3–4b Applying the IDDR Approach—A Sample Scenario

To really understand the IDDR approach, it is helpful to work through the process by analyzing an ethical problem. Here, as a sample, we present a scenario that is based on a real story but contains fictional elements as well. The conversations and analyses included in the scenario are fictional. Because any discussions that may have happened took place behind closed doors, we cannot know if any ethical analysis or discussions about ethics occurred.

Example 3.18 Assume that you are an intern working on a social media campaign for Duane Reade, a New York pharmacy chain. As part of your internship, you follow several celebrity gossip Web pages and do regular Internet searches looking for any picture or mention of the stores. In the course of these searches, you find a picture of Katherine Heigl leaving a Duane Reade store carrying bags imprinted with the company logo. (Katherine Heigl is a recognizable actress from television's Grey's Anatomy and several major movies.) You can easily copy the picture to the company's Twitter account and add a caption about her shopping at one of the stores. Having customers or potential customers seeing this well-known person carrying Duane Reade bags and leaving the store could increase store visits and sales.

The question is this: Is it appropriate to use Heigl's photo without her permission as part of an advertising campaign? Use the IDDR approach to analyze what you should do. Assume that you, your supervisor, and a few other members of the marketing department engage in this analysis. ■

Step 1: Inquiry To begin, clarify the nature of the problem. You want to use a picture of Heigl from a celebrity gossip Web page to potentially increase profits for the company. The problem could be phrased in this way: "Is it ethical to use a picture of a famous person to try to improve sales without contacting her or the photographer first?" Note that the way you frame the question will affect how you answer it. For example, if the question was phrased, "Should we steal this picture?" the answer would be obvious. Remember not to frame the issue in a way that gives you the answer you might want.

You also need to identify the stakeholders. Here, the stakeholders include Heigl, the photographer who took the picture, Heigl's fans, and the potential customers of Duane Reade. Other stakeholders include your boss (who will get credit if sales increase due to the marketing campaign), Duane Reade stockholders, and store employees (who might see an increase in customers).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

When gathering the facts, determine whether there are any legal issues. Given these facts, there may be state and federal laws that would guide a decision. For instance, reproducing a photograph without the owner's permission might violate federal copyright laws. In addition, most states have laws (sometimes called right to publicity laws) that protect a person's name, voice, or likeness (image or picture) from being used for advertising without the person's consent.

You can also consider which ethical theories can help you analyze the problem. The ethical theories may include religious values, rights theory, the categorical imperative, and utilitarianism. Ask yourself whether it is right, or ethical, to use Heigl's name or face without her permission as part of an advertising campaign.

Step 2: Discussion Several actions could be taken in this sample situation. Each action should be thoroughly analyzed using the various ethical approaches identified by the decision makers. The ultimate goals for the decision are to increase sales and do the least amount of harm to the business and its reputation without compromising the values of the business. We will analyze three alternatives here, though it is important as a decision maker to brainstorm and find as many options as possible. Exhibit 3–1 shows how our three alternatives could be analyzed.

It is important to note that different ethical perspectives will be more or less helpful in different situations. In the sample scenario, a strong argument can be made that Heigl's rights to privacy and to control her image are very important. Under other circumstances, however, the right to privacy might be outweighed by some other right, such as another person's right to safety. Using multiple theories will help ensure that the decision maker can work through the analytical process and find a result.

Step 3: Decision After a lively discussion concerning Heigl's rights to privacy and to compensation for the use of her image, the decisions makers come to a consensus. Given the potential for increased income, the company decides to use the picture. It will be posted on the company's Twitter account with a caption that reads, "Love a quick #DuaneReade run? Even @KatieHeigl can't resist shopping #NYC's favorite drugstore."

Make sure to articulate the reasons you arrived at the decision to serve as documentation explaining why the plan of action was ethical. In this meeting, the persuasive evidence was the projection for increased revenue balanced by the minimal harm to Heigl. Because the picture was taken on a public street, the people in the room did not feel that it involved a violation of any privacy right. The company would not have paid Heigl to do an advertisement. Also, because only people who followed Duane Reade on Twitter could view the tweet, the group felt the likelihood of any damage to Heigl was small. Most people felt that the worst that could happen would be that Heigl would ask them to remove it.

Step 4: Review You and the other decision makers at Duane Reade need to review the effectiveness of your decision. Assume that after the picture and caption are posted on Twitter, Heigl sees it and sues Duane Reade for "no less than $6 million." She argues that the company violated her rights by falsely claiming that she had endorsed its stores and that it misappropriated her name and likeness for a profit. The case is settled out of court, with Duane Reade paying an undisclosed amount to a foundation that Heigl created.

Here, the decision did not solve the ethical problem and, in fact, led to liability. Decision makers need to determine what they could have done better. Perhaps they should change

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 3–1 An Analysis of Ethical Approaches to the Sample Dilemma

ALTERNATIVE	LEGAL IMPLICATIONS	RELIGIOUS VALUES	CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE	RIGHTS THEORY	UTILITARIANISM
1. Use the Picture without Permission	How does this alternative comply with copyright law? Are there any exceptions to copyright law that would allow this use?	Is this stealing? If so, it violates religious principles. Is it stealing to use a picture taken on a public street?	If everyone did this, then the images and names of famous people would often be used to promote products. Is this a good thing or not?	Using the picture may negatively impact the Webpage or Heigl's ability to make money using her image. It also may violate some right to privacy.	If we use the picture, we may see an increase in sales and an improvement in reputation. We may, however, be sued for using the image without permission.
2. Contact the Webpage and/or Heigl for Permission	Are there any laws that would make this alternative illegal? Are there any precautions we should take when asking for permission to avoid any appearance of threat or intimidation?	This alternative clearly is not stealing and thus would align with religious principles.	If everyone asked for permission, then such material would not be used without permission. This would seem to make the world a better place.	Getting permission would not seem to violate anyone's rights. In fact, giving someone the opportunity to decide might enhance that person's rights.	If we contact the parties for permission, we may be able to use the image, make more money, and improve our reputation. But the parties might refuse to give permission or demand payment, which would cost the company money.
3. Do Not Use the Picture	There are no legal implications to not using the picture.	This alternative clearly is not stealing and thus would align with religious principles.	If companies never used public, candid images of famous people, then all advertising would be staged. This might not make the world a better place.	Not using the picture may damage the stockholders' right to maximum income or the company's right to advertise as it sees fit.	If we do not use the picture, we avoid potential lawsuits. Alternatively, we won't have the potential increase in sales associated with the use of the famous face.

their practices and obtain legal counsel for their marketing department—or at least hire a legal consultant when ethical issues arise. Perhaps they need to establish an internal process for getting permission to use pictures from social media or other sources. In any event, it is likely that the company should change some of its policies and practices related to social media marketing.

The decision-making process is not easy or precise. It may entail repeating steps as decision makers recognize new alternatives or as unforeseen stakeholders appear. Sometimes, the analysis will lead to a clear decision, and other times it will not. Even if it does not, the process will allow decision makers to enter the public phase of the decision (action) with a better idea of what consequences to expect.

For more on the IDDR approach to ethical decision making, see the accompanying Business Law Analysis feature.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Applying the IDDR Framework

Pfizer, Inc., developed a new antibiotic called Trovan (trovafloxacinmesylate). Tests in animals showed that Trovan had life-threatening side effects, including joint disease, abnormal cartilage growth, liver damage, and a degenerative bone condition. Pfizer was seeking approval from the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) to market Trovan for use in the United States when an epidemic of bacterial meningitis swept across Nigeria.

Pfizer sent three U.S. physicians to test Trovan on children who were patients in Nigeria's Infectious Disease Hospital. Pfizer's representatives obtained all necessary approvals from the Nigerian government and had Nigerian nurses explain the details of the study to parents and inform them that participation was voluntary. They did not, however, alert the parents or patients about the serious risks involved, or tell them about an effective conventional treatment that Doctors without Borders was providing at the same site. The results of the study showed that Trovan had a success rate of 94.4 percent in treating the children's condition. Nevertheless, eleven children died in the experiment, and others were left blind, deaf, paralyzed, or brain damaged. Rabi Abdullahi and other Nigerian children filed a suit in a U.S. federal court against Pfizer, alleging a violation of a customary international law norm prohibiting involuntary medical experimentation on humans.

Analysis: Pfizer could have applied the IDDR approach to review the ethical conflicts in a test of Trovan. (1) In the inquiry step, decision makers ask questions to understand the ethical dilemma, identify the stakeholders, gather relevant facts, and articulate the ethical principles at issue. (2) In the discussion step, the decision makers further explore potential actions and their effects. (3) The next step is to come to a consensus decision as to what to do. This consensus should withstand moral scrutiny and fulfill corporate, community, and individual values. (4) The last step is to review the outcome to determine whether it was effective and what the company could do better. In this instance, for example, fully informing the patients and their parents about the risks of the treatment would have been a better course of action.

Result and Reasoning: It seems unlikely that a proposed Trovan test on children, based on the facts described here, would have survived an IDDR analysis, under either a duty-based or an outcome-based ethical standard. It also would appear that Pfizer was rushing to test and market Trovan as soon as possible. This focus on short-run profit maximization took precedence over any ethical considerations. It is often easier to see ethical lapses in retrospect than it is to identify potential ethical problems in advance, however.

Focus Question 5

What ethical issues might arise in the context of global business transactions?

3–5 Business Ethics on a Global Level

Just as individual religions have different moral codes, individual countries and regions have different ethical expectations and priorities. Some of these differences are based on religious values, whereas others are cultural in nature. Such differences can make it even more difficult to determine what is ethical in a particular situation.

3–5a World Religions, Cultural Norms, and Ethics

Global businesses need to be conscious of the impact of different religious principles and cultural norms on ethics. For instance, in certain countries the consumption of alcohol is forbidden for religious reasons. It would be considered unethical for a U.S. business to produce alcohol in those countries and employ local workers to assist in alcohol production.

In other countries, women may not be treated as equals because of cultural norms or religion. In contrast, discrimination against employees on the basis of sex (or race, national origin, age, or disability) is prohibited in the United States. The varying roles of women can give rise to ethical issues regarding how women working for a U.S. company should dress or behave in certain regions of the world. Should female executives have to cover their heads? Should they avoid involvement in certain business transactions? How will various stakeholders react to whatever decisions companies make in these situations?

How far should companies go to cater to business partners in other nations? Going too far to please clients in another country can alienate a firm's employees and domestic customers and generate bad press. Decision makers in charge of global business operations should consider these ethical issues and make some decisions from the outset.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3–5b Outsourcing

Outsourcing is the practice by which a company hires an outside firm or individual to perform work rather than hiring employees to do it. Ethical problems involving outsourcing most often arise when global companies outsource work to other countries in an attempt to save on labor costs. This type of outsourcing elicits an almost automatic negative reaction in the U.S. public. Some people feel that companies should protect American jobs above all else. Furthermore, ethical questions often arise as to the employment practices of the foreign companies to which the work is outsourced.

Outsourcing The practice by which a company hires an outside firm or individual to perform work rather than hiring employees to do it.

Outsourcing covers a wide spectrum of ethical gray areas and is not always clearly unethical. Outsourcing domestically, for instance—such as when companies hire outside firms to transport goods—generally does not raise ethical issues. Nonetheless, companies involved in global operations need to be careful when outsourcing to make sure that employees in other nations are being treated fairly.

David Kashakhi/Alamy

Outsourcing cuts costs. But this nation's supply chain may suffer in a crisis, such as during the COVID 19 pandemic.

3–5c Avoiding Corruption

Another ethical problem in global business dealings has to do with corruption in foreign governments. Under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act,[9] U.S. businesses are prohibited from making payments to (bribing) foreign officials to secure beneficial contracts, with certain exceptions. If such payments are lawful within the foreign country, then they are permitted. It is also acceptable to pay small amounts to minor officials to facilitate or speed up the performance of administrative services (such as approval of construction). Payments to private foreign companies or other third parties are also permissible.

Corruption is widespread in some nations, however, and it can be the norm in dealing with both government and private businesses in certain locations. Global companies must take special care when doing business in countries where corruption is common. Decision makers should discuss potential ethical problems with employees in advance and again when situations arise. The company's goal should be to ensure that it supports management and employees in doing the right thing and following the firm's anticorruption policies.

3–5d Monitoring the Employment Practices of Foreign Suppliers

Many businesses contract with companies in developing nations to produce goods, such as shoes and clothing, because the wage rates in those nations are significantly lower than those in the United States. But what if one of those contractors hires women and children at below-minimum-wage rates or requires its employees to work long hours in a workplace full of health hazards? What if the company's supervisors routinely engage in workplace conduct that is offensive to women? What if factories located abroad routinely violate U.S. labor and environmental standards?

Wages and Working Conditions Allegations that a business allows its suppliers to engage in unethical practices hurt the firm's reputation. Example 3.19 Noi Supalai, a garment worker in Thailand, came forward with reports about how harshly she and other workers had been treated at Eagle Speed factory, which produced apparel for Nike Corporation. Because the 9. 15 U.S.C. Sections 78dd-1 et seq. This act will be discussed in more detail in the context of criminal law.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

workers did not produce all of the "Just Do the Right Thing" line of products by a set deadline, Nike fined the factory and barred it from paying its workers. The factory then forced some two thousand employees to work sixteen-hour days or longer, and to take turns going home to shower. Workers eventually formed a union and named Supalai as president, but they were unsuccessful in getting the conditions improved. A meeting was set up between Supalai and a Nike representative, but Nike did not even show up. Supalai later learned that Nike chose to use other suppliers.

Corporate Watch Groups Given today's global communications network, few companies can assume that their actions in other nations will go unnoticed by "corporate watch" groups that discover and publicize unethical corporate behavior. As a result, U.S. businesses today usually take steps to avoid such adverse publicity—either by refusing to deal with certain suppliers or by arranging to monitor their suppliers' workplaces to make sure that employees are not being mistreated.

Example 3.20 A Chinese factory supplied parts for certain Apple products. After Apple discovered that the factory had violated labor and environmental standards, it began evaluating the practices at all the companies in its supply chain. Apple's audits revealed numerous violations, such as withholding worker pay as a disciplinary measure, falsifying pay records, and forcing workers to use unsafe machines. Apple terminated its relationship with one foreign supplier and turned over its findings to the Fair Labor Association, a nonprofit organization that promotes adherence to national and international labor laws, for further inquiry.

Practice and Review

James Stilton is the chief executive officer (CEO) of RightLiving, Inc., a company that buys life insurance policies at a discount from terminally ill persons and sells the policies to investors. RightLiving pays the terminally ill patients a percentage of the future death benefit (usually 65 percent) and then sells the policies to investors for 85 percent of the value of the future benefit. The patients receive the cash to use for medical and other expenses, and the investors are "guaranteed" a positive return on their investment. The difference between the purchase and sale prices is Right Living's profit. Stilton is aware that some sick patients may obtain insurance policies through fraud (by not revealing their illness on the insurance application). An insurance company that discovers such fraud will cancel the policy and refuse to pay. Stilton believes that most of the policies he has purchased are legitimate, but he knows that some probably are not. Using the information presented in this chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would a person who adheres to the principle of rights consider it ethical for Stilton not to disclose the potential risk of cancellation to investors? Why or why not?
2. Using Immanuel Kant's categorical imperative, are the actions of RightLiving ethical? Why or why not?
3. Under utilitarianism, are Stilton's actions ethical? Why or why not? If most of the policies are, in fact, legitimate, does this make a difference in your analysis?
4. Using the IDDR approach, discuss the decision process Stilton should use in deciding whether to disclose the risk of fraudulent policies to potential investors.

Debate This

Executives in large corporations are ultimately rewarded if their companies do well, particularly as evidenced by rising stock prices. Consequently, shouldn't those who run corporations be able to decide what level of negative side effects is "acceptable" for their companies' products?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

business ethics 57
categorical imperative 65 corporate social responsibility (CSR) 66 cost-benefit analysis 65 duty-based ethics 63 ethical reasoning 63 ethics 57 moral minimum 58 outcome-based ethics 63 outsourcing 77 principle of rights 64 stakeholders 67 triple bottom line 60
utilitarianism 65

Chapter Summary: Ethics in Business

Ethics and the Role of Business

1. The relationship of law and ethics—The government has created some ethical rights and duties through the passage of laws and regulations. Many laws are designed to prevent fraudulent conduct, including the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.
   a. Gray areas in the law—Sometimes legislation includes language that is overly broad or provisions that are ambiguous. Such gray areas make it difficult to predict how the law will apply or should be applied to a situation, complicating determinations of what is legal or ethical.
   b. The moral minimum—Lawful behavior is the moral minimum. The law has its limits, though, and some actions may be legal but not ethical. The study of ethics goes beyond legal requirements to evaluate what is right for society.
   c. Codes of ethics—Most large firms have internal ethical codes. Many industry associations also have codes of ethics for their members. Because these internal codes are not laws, their effectiveness is determined by the commitment of the company leadership or industry to enforcing the codes.
2. The role of business in society—The public perception of corporations has changed from entities that primarily generate profits for their owners to entities that participate in society as corporate citizens. From either the profit maximization or corporate citizenship perspective, ethics is important in making business decisions. One ethical perspective looks to the triple bottom line, in which decision makers evaluate (a) the legal implications, (b) the public relations impact, (c) any safety risks, and (d) the financial implications of a decision.
3. Ethical issues in business—A fundamental ethical issue for business is developing integrity and trust. Businesspersons should exhibit integrity in their dealings with other people in the company, other businesses, clients, and the community.
4. The importance of ethical leadership—Management's commitment and behavior are essential in creating an ethical workplace. Management's behavior, more than anything else, sets the ethical tone of a firm and influences the behavior of employees.

Ethical Principles and Philosophies

1. Duty-based ethics—Ethics based on religious beliefs; the basic rights of human beings (the principle of rights); and philosophical reasoning, such as that of Immanuel Kant. A potential problem for those who support this ethical approach is deciding which rights are more important in a given situation. Management constantly faces ethical conflicts and trade-offs when considering all those affected by a business decision.
2. Outcome-based ethics (utilitarianism)—Ethics based on philosophical reasoning, such as that of Jeremy Bentham and John Stuart Mill. Applying this theory requires a cost-benefit analysis, weighing the negative effects against the positive and deciding which course of action produces the better outcome.
3. Corporate social responsibility—Corporate social responsibility (CSR) combines a commitment to good citizenship with a commitment to making ethical decisions, improving society, and minimizing environmental impact. Although there are different theories, the basic idea is that corporations can and should act ethically and be accountable to society for their actions. One view of CSR stresses that corporations have a duty not just to shareholders, but also to other groups affected by corporate decisions, called stakeholders.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Sources of Ethical Issues in Business Decisions	1. Short-term profit maximization—Executives should distinguish between short-run and long-run profit goals and focus on maximizing profits over the long run. An overemphasis on short-run profit maximization is perhaps the most common reason that ethical problems occur in business. 2. Social media—Advances in technology have created new ethical problems for companies. Issues involving social media include how to use social media in the hiring process and how to monitor employees' online activities. 3. Awareness—Whatever the context, businesspersons must be aware of the possibility that ethical issues will arise. 4. Rationalization—Sometimes, businesspersons make a decision that they know is not ethical but that will benefit them or their company. After the fact, they rationalize their unethical decision. 5. Uncertainty—When making a business decision, businesspersons may be uncertain as to what they should do, what they should have done, or whether an ethical issue or breach is even involved. Such uncertainty is unavoidable, but it should be treated as an indicator of a potential ethical problem.
Making Ethical Business Decisions	Making ethical business decisions is crucial in today's legal environment. Business decisions can be complex. Several frameworks exist to help businesspersons make ethical decisions. One such framework is the four-step IDDR ("I Desire to Do Right") approach. 1. I = Inquiry—Involves identifying the ethical problem and all of the stakeholders, gathering the relevant facts, and considering which ethical theories can help in analyzing the problem. 2. D = Discussion—Involves making a list of possible actions and evaluating the strengths and weaknesses of each option, including its ethical and legal consequences. 3. D = Decision—Involves crafting a consensus decision or a company's plan of action. Decision makers should use the analysis from Step 2 to articulate the reasons behind the decision. 4. R = Review—Involves reviewing the decision outcome to determine whether the solution was effective and satisfied the stakeholders. The results of this evaluation may be used in making future decisions.
Business Ethics on a Global Level	Global businesses need to be conscious of the impact of different religious principles and cultural norms on ethics. In addition, ethical concerns may arise in the areas of outsourcing, avoiding corruption, and monitoring the employment practices of foreign suppliers.

Issue Spotters

1. Acme Corporation decides to respond to what it sees as a moral obligation to correct for past discrimination by adjusting pay differences among its employees. Does this raise an ethical conflict between Acme and its employees? Between Acme and its shareholders? Explain your answers. (See Ethical Principles and Philosophies.)
2. Delta Tools, Inc., markets a product that under some circumstances is capable of seriously injuring consumers. Does Delta have an ethical duty to remove this product from the market, even if the injuries result only from misuse? Why or why not? (See Making Ethical Business Decisions.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

3–1. Business Ethics. Jason Trevor owns a commercial bakery in Blakely, Georgia, that produces a variety of goods sold in grocery stores. Trevor is required by law to perform internal tests on food produced at his plant to check for contamination. On three occasions, tests of food products containing peanut butter were positive for salmonella contamination. Trevor was not required to report the results to U.S. Food and Drug Administration officials, however, so he did not. Instead, Trevor instructed his employees to simply repeat the tests until the results were negative. Meanwhile, the products that had originally tested positive for salmonella were eventually shipped out to retailers. Five people who ate Trevor's baked goods that year became seriously ill, and one person died from a salmonella infection. Even though Trevor's conduct was legal, was it unethical for him to sell goods that had once tested positive for salmonella? Why or why not? (See Ethics and the Role of Business.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3–2. Ethical Conduct. Internet giant Zoidle, a U.S. company, generated sales of £2.5 billion in the United Kingdom (UK) in 2013 (roughly $4 billion in U.S. dollars). The U.K. corporate tax rate is usually between 20 percent and 24 percent, but Zoidle paid only 3 percent (£6 million). At a press conference, company officials touted how the company took advantage of tax loopholes and sheltered profits to avoid paying the full corporate income tax. They justified their practices as ethical, declaring that it would be verging on illegal to tell shareholders that the company paid more taxes than it should.

Zoidle receives significant benefits for doing business in the UK, including large sales tax exemptions and some property tax breaks. The UK relies on the corporate income tax to provide services to the poor and to help run the agency that regulates corporations. Is it ethical for Zoidle to avoid paying taxes? Why or why not? (See Ethics and the Role of Business.)

3–3. Consumer Rights. Best Buy, a national electronics retailer, offered a credit card that allowed users to earn "reward points" that could be redeemed for discounts on Best Buy goods. After reading a newspaper advertisement for the card, Gary Davis applied for, and was given, a credit card. As part of the application process, he visited a Web page containing Frequently Asked Questions as well as terms and conditions for the card. He clicked on a button affirming that he understood the terms and conditions. When Davis received his card, it came with seven brochures about the card and the reward point program. As he read the brochures, he discovered that a $59 annual fee would be charged for the card. Davis went back to the Web pages he had visited and found a statement that the card "may" have an annual fee. Davis sued, claiming that the company did not adequately disclose the fee. Is it unethical for companies to put terms and conditions, especially terms that may cost the consumer money, in an electronic document that is too long to read on one screen? Why or why not? Assuming that the Best Buy credit-card materials were legally sufficient, discuss the ethical aspects of businesses strictly following the language of the law as opposed to following the intent of the law. [Davis v. HSBC Bank Nevada, N.A., 691 F.3d 1152 (9th Cir. 2012)] (See Ethics and the Role of Business.)

3–4. Business Ethics. Mark Ramun worked as a manager for Allied Erecting and Dismantling Co., where he had a tense relationship with his father, who was Allied's president. After more than ten years, Mark left Allied, taking 15,000 pages of Allied's documents on DVDs and CDs, which constituted trade secrets. Later, he joined Allied's competitor, Genesis Equipment & Manufacturing, Inc. Genesis soon developed a piece of equipment that incorporated elements of Allied equipment. How might business ethics have been violated in these circumstances? Discuss. [Allied Erecting and Dismantling Co. v. Genesis Equipment & Manufacturing, Inc., 511 Fed.Appx. 398 (6th Cir. 2013)] (See Making Ethical Business Decisions.)

3–5. Ethical Principles. Stephen Glass made himself infamous as a dishonest journalist by fabricating material for more than forty articles for The New Republic magazine and other publications. He also fabricated supporting materials to delude The New Republic's fact checkers. At the time, he was a law student at Georgetown University. Once suspicions were aroused, Glass tried to avoid detection. Later, Glass applied for admission to the California bar. The California Supreme Court denied his application, citing "numerous instances of dishonesty and disingenuousness" during his "rehabilitation" following the exposure of his misdeeds. How do these circumstances underscore the importance of ethics? Discuss. [In re Glass, 58 Cal.4th 500, 316 P.3d 1199 (2014)] (See Ethical Principles and Philosophies.)

3–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Business Ethics. Operating out of an apartment in Secane, Pennsylvania, Hratch Ilanjian convinced Vicken Setrakian, the president of Kenset Corp., that he was an international businessman who could help turn around Kenset's business in the Middle East. At Ilanjian's insistence, Setrakian provided confidential business documents. Claiming that they had an agreement, Ilanjian demanded full, immediate payment and threatened to disclose the confidential information to a Kenset supplier if payment was not forthcoming. Kenset denied that there was a contract and filed a suit in a federal district court against Ilanjian, seeking return of the documents. During discovery, Ilanjian was uncooperative. Who behaved unethically in these circumstances? Explain. [Kenset Corp. v. Ilanjian, 600 Fed.Appx. 827 (3d Cir. 2015)] (See Making Ethical Business Decisions.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 3–6, go to Apppendix E.

3–7. Spotlight on Bed, Bath & Beyond—Ethics and the Role of Business. Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. sold a ceramic pot, called the "FireBurners" Pot, with a stainless steel fuel reservoir at its center and a bottle of gelled fuel for use with the fire pot called "FireGel." A red sticker on the fire pot warned, "DON'T REFILL UNTIL FLAME IS OUT & CUP IS COOL." "CARE AND USE INSTRUCTIONS" with the product cautioned, in a "WARNINGS" section, "Do not add fuel when lit and never pour gel on an open fire or hot surface." The label on the back of the fuel gel bottle instructed, "NEVER add fuel to a burning fire," and under a bold "WARNING" stated, "DANGER, FLAMMABLE LIQUID & VAPOR." M.H., a minor, was injured when a fire pot in one of the products—bought from Bed Bath & Beyond—was refueled with the gel and an explosion occurred. Safer alternatives for the design of the fire pot existed, but its manufacturer chose not to use them. In these circumstances, is Bed, Bath & Beyond ethically responsible for the injury to M.H.? Discuss. [M.H. v. Bed, Bath & Beyond, Inc., 156 A.D.3d 33, 64 N.Y.S.3d 205 (1 Dept. 2017)] (See Ethics and the Role of Business.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3–8. A Question of Ethics—Applying the IDDR Framework. Priscilla Dickman worked as a medical technologist at the University of Connecticut Health Center for twenty-eight years. Early in her career at the Health Center, Dickman sustained a back injury while at work. The condition eventually worsened, causing her significant back pain and disability. Her physician ordered restrictions on her work duties for several years. Then Dickman's supervisor received complaints that Dickman was getting personal phone calls and was frequently absent from her work area. Based on e-mails and other documents found on her work computer, it appeared that she had been running two side businesses (selling jewelry and providing travel agent services) while at work. The state investigated, and she was convicted of a civil ethics violation for engaging in "personal business for financial gain on state time utilizing state resources." Separate investigations resulted in criminal convictions for forgery and the filing of an unrelated fraudulent insurance claim. Dickman "retired" from her job (after she obtained approval for disability retirement) and filed a claim with the state of Connecticut against the health center. She alleged that her former employer had initiated the investigations to harass her and force her to quit. She claimed that the Health Center was unlawfully retaliating against her for being disabled and being put on workplace restrictions. [Dickman v. University of Connecticut Health Center, 162 Conn.App. 441, 132 A.3d 739 (2016)] (See Making Ethical Business Decisions.)

1. Assume that you are Dickman's supervisor and have been informed that she is frequently away from her desk and often makes personal phone calls. The first step of using the IDDR method is inquiry, so you start asking questions. Several people tell you that that Dickman has offered to sell them jewelry. Others say she has offered to make travel arrangements for them. You have not spoken to Dickman directly about the complaints and are not sure if you should. You know that the Health Center would need more evidence of wrongdoing to justify firing Dickman but are uncertain as to whether you can search her computer. Should you report your findings to management? Is there any ethical problem involved in investigating and possibly firing a long-term employee? Is it fair to terminate an employee who is under disability restrictions? How would you frame the ethical dilemma that the Health Center faced in this case, and who are the stakeholders? What ethical theories would you use to guide your decision?
2. Now suppose that you are Dickman. You have been a medical technologist for a long time but now experience severe back pain while at your desk at the Health Center. You find that you have less pain if you get up and move around during the day, rather than just sitting. That is why you are often away from your desk. You know that you will not be able to do this job much longer, and that is why you recently started a jewelry business and began providing travel services. Sure, you have made a few personal phone calls related to those businesses while at the Health Center, but other employees make personal calls, and they have not been fired. You feel that the Health Center's investigation was intended to force you to quit because you are disabled and cannot perform the tasks that you used to perform. Using the inquiry portion of the IDDR method, how might you frame the ethical issue you face, and who are the stakeholders? What ethical principles can help you analyze the problem thoroughly?

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

3–9. Business Law Writing. Assume that you are a high-level manager for a shoe manufacturer. You know that your firm could increase its profit margin by producing shoes in Indonesia, where you could hire women for $100 a month to assemble them. You also know that human rights advocates recently accused a competing shoe manufacturer of engaging in exploitative labor practices because the manufacturer sold shoes made by Indonesian women for similarly low wages. You personally do not believe that paying $100 a month to Indonesian women is unethical because you know that in their country, $100 a month is a better-than-average wage rate.

Write one page explaining whether you would have the shoes manufactured in Indonesia and make higher profits for the company, or avoid the risk of negative publicity and its potential adverse consequences for the firm's reputation. Are there other alternatives? Discuss fully. (See Business Ethics on a Global Level.)

3–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Corporate Social Responsibility. Methamphetamine (meth) is an addictive drug made chiefly in small toxic labs (STLs) in homes, tents, barns, and hotel rooms. The manufacturing process is dangerous, often resulting in explosions, burns, and toxic fumes. Government entities spend time and resources to find and destroy STLs, imprison meth dealers and users, treat addicts, and provide services for affected families.

Meth cannot be made without ingredients that are also used in cold and allergy medications. Arkansas has one of the highest numbers of STLs in the United States. To recoup the costs of fighting the meth epidemic, twenty counties in Arkansas filed a suit against Pfizer, Inc., which makes cold and allergy medications. They argued that it was Pfizer's ethical responsibility to either stop using ingredients in their cold and allergy medications that can be used to make meth or to compensate the government for the amount it spends closing down meth labs. (See Ethics and the Role of Business, Ethical Principles and Philosophies, and Making Ethical Business Decisions.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1. The first group will outline Pfizer's ethical responsibility under the corporate social responsibility doctrine. To whom does Pfizer owe duties?
2. The second group will formulate an argument on behalf of Pfizer that the company has not breached any of its ethical responsibilities.
3. The third group will assume that they work for Pfizer and that the company is trying to determine the best course of action to prevent its medications from being used to make meth. The group will apply the IDDR approach and explain the steps in the reasoning used.
4. The fourth group will adopt a utilitarian point of view and perform a cost-benefit analysis to determine what the company should do. Specifically, should the company pay compensation to the state, or should it stop using certain ingredients in its medications?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Appendix to Chapter 3:

Costco Code of Ethics

Costco Wholesale Corporation takes a strong position on behaving ethically in all transactions and relationships. It also expects employees to behave ethically, according to domestic ethical standards, in any country in which it operates. Costco's Code of Ethics outlines its commitment to business ethics.

COSTCO

CODE OF ETHICS

By Jim Sinegal

OBEY THE LAW

The law is irrefutable! Absent a moral imperative to challenge a law, we must our business in total compliance with the laws of every community where we do business.

- Comply with all statutes.
- Cooperate with authorities.
- Respect all public officials and their positions.
- Avoid all conflict of interest issues with public officials.
- Comply with all disclosure and reporting requirements.
- Comply with safety and security standards for all products sold.
- Exceed ecological standards required in every community where we do business.
- Comply with all applicable wage and hour laws.
- Comply with all applicable anti-trust laws.
- Protect "inside information" that has not been released to the general public.

TAKE CARE OF OUR MEMBERS

The member is our key to success. If we don't keep our members happy, little else that we do will make a difference.

- Provide top-quality products at the best prices in the market.
- Provide a safe shopping environment in our warehouses.
- Provide only products that meet applicable safety and health standards.
- Sell only products from manufacturers who comply with "truth in advertising/ packaging" standards.
- Provide our members with a 100% satisfaction guaranteed warranty on every product and service we sell, including their membership fee.
- Assure our members that every product we sell is authentic in make and in representation of performance.
- Make our shopping environment a pleasant experience by making our members feel welcome as our guests.
- Provide products to our members that will be ecologically sensitive.

Our member is our reason for being. If they fail to show up, we cannot survive. Our members have extended a "trust" to Costco by virtue of paying a fee to shop with us. We can't let them down or they will simply go away. We must always operate in the following manner when dealing with our members:

Rule #1 – The member is always right.
Rule #2 – In the event the member is ever wrong, refer to rule #1.

There are plenty of shopping alternatives for our members. We will succeed only if we do not violate the trust they have extended to us. We must be committed at every level of our company, with every once of energy and grain of creativity we have, to constantly strive to "bring goods to market at a lower price."

If we do these four things throughout our organization, we will realize our ultimate goal, which is to REWARD OUR SHAREHOLDERS.

TAKE CARE OF OUR EMPLOYEES

To claim "people are our most important asset" is true and an understatement. Each employee has been hired for a very important job. Jobs such as stocking the shelves, ringing members' orders, buying products, and paying our bills are jobs we would all choose to perform because of their importance. The employees hired to perform these jobs are performing as management's "alter egos." Every employee, whether they are in a Costco warehouse, or whether they work in the regional or corporate offices, is a Costco ambassador trained to give our members professional, courteous treatment.

Today we have warehouse managers who were once stockers and callers, and vice presidents who were once in clerical positions for Costco. We believe that Costco's future executive officers are currently working in our warehouses, depots, buying offices, and accounting departments, as well as in our home offices.

To that end, we are committed to these principles:

- Provide a safe work environment.
- Pay a fair wage.
- Make every job challenging, but make it fun!
- Consider the loss of any employee as a failure on the part of the company and a loss to the organization.
- Teach our people how to do their jobs and how to improve personally and professionally.
- Promote from within the company to achieve the goal of a minimum of 80% of management positions being filled by current employees.
- Create an "open door" attitude at all levels of the company that is dedicated to "fairness and listening."

RESPECT OUR VENDORS

Our vendors are our partners in business and for us to prosper as a company, they must proper with us. It is important that our vendors understand that we will be tough negotiators, but fair in our treatment of them.

- Treat all vendors and their representatives as you would expect to be treated if visiting their places of business.
- Pay all bills within the allocated time frame.
- Honor all commitments.
- Protect all vendor property assigned to Costco as though it were our own.
- Always be thoughtful and candid in negotiations.
- Provide a careful review process with at least two levels of authorization before terminating business with an existing vendor of more than two years.
- Do not accept gratuities of any kind from a vendor.

These guidelines are exactly that - guidelines, some common sense rules for the conduct of our business. Intended to simplify our jobs, not complicate our lives, these guidelines will not answer every question or solve every problem. At the core of our philosophy as a company must be the implicit understanding that not one of us is required to lie or cheat on behalf of PriceCostco. In fact, dishonest conduct will not be tolerated. To do any less would be unfair to the overwhelming majority of our employees who support and respect Costco's commitment to ethical business conduct.

If your are ever in doubt as to what course of action to take on a business matter that is open to varying ethical interpretations, take the high road and do what is right.

If you want our help, we are always available for advice and counsel. That's our job and we welcome your questions or comments.

Our continued success depends on you. We thank each of you for your contribution to our past success and for the high standards you have insisted upon in our company.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Heide Benser/Getty Images

Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

4

"An eye for an eye will make the whole world blind."

Mahatma Gandhi
1869–1948 (Indian political and spiritual leader)

Every society needs to have an established method for resolving disputes. Without one, as Mahatma Gandhi implied in the chapter-opening quotation, the biblical "eye for an eye" would lead to anarchy. This is particularly true in the business world—almost all businesspersons will face a lawsuit at some time in their careers. For this reason, anyone involved in business needs to have an understanding of court systems in the United States, as well as the various methods of dispute resolution that can be pursued outside the courts.

Assume that QuickDoor, a food delivery service, is entangled in a labor dispute with 5,000 workers who feel they are owed back pay. If an individual worker were to go to court and win, the award would be about two thousand dollars—not enough to interest most labor lawyers. So the workers would like to combine their grievances into a single, multi-million-dollar class action lawsuit. QuickDoor's employment contract, however, prohibits such lawsuits. Instead, it requires an alternative dispute resolution method called arbitration to settle any labor disagreements between the workers and the company.

This contract provision means that QuickDoor might have to engage in 5,000 separate arbitration hearings, costing the company about $12 million, an amount greater than the cost of the underlying dispute. Which would be most fair for all concerned? Requiring QuickDoor and its workers to engage in thousands of alternative dispute resolution hearings? Or allowing a single class action lawsuit, despite the contracts? In this chapter, we will discuss how such legal disagreements are resolved, along with the benefits and drawbacks of the various methods of resolving them.

Focus Questions

The six Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is judicial review? How and when was the power of judicial review established?
2. How are the courts applying traditional jurisdictional concepts to cases involving Internet transactions?
3. What is the difference between the focus of a trial court and that of an appellate court?
4. What is discovery, and how does electronic discovery differ from traditional discovery?
5. What is an electronic court filing system?
6. What are three alternative methods of resolving disputes?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4–1 The Judiciary's Role in American Government

The body of American law includes the federal and state constitutions, statutes passed by legislative bodies, administrative law, and the case decisions and legal principles that form the common law. These laws would be meaningless, however, without the courts to interpret and apply them. This is the essential role of the judiciary—the courts—in the American governmental system: to interpret and apply the law.

4–1a Judicial Review

Judicial Review The process by which a court decides on the constitutionality of legislative enactments and actions of the executive branch.

As the branch of government entrusted with interpreting the laws, the judiciary can decide, among other things, whether the laws or actions of the other two branches are constitutional. The process for making such a determination is known as judicial review.

The power of judicial review enables the judicial branch to act as a check on the other two branches of government, in line with the checks-and-balances system established by the U.S. Constitution. (Today, nearly all nations with constitutional democracies, including Canada, France, and Germany, have some form of judicial review.)

Focus Question 1

What is judicial review? How and when was the power of judicial review established?

4–1b The Origins of Judicial Review in the United States

The U.S. Constitution does not mention judicial review (although many constitutional scholars believe that the founders intended the judiciary to have this power). How was the doctrine of judicial review established? See this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature for the answer.

Marbury v. Madison (1803)

The power of judicial review was established in the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Marbury v. Madison.[a] Although the decision is widely viewed as a cornerstone of constitutional law, the case had its origins in early U.S. politics.

When Thomas Jefferson defeated the incumbent president, John Adams, in the presidential elections of 1800, Adams feared the Jeffersonians' antipathy toward business and toward a strong national government. Adams thus rushed to "pack" the judiciary with loyal Federalists (those who believed in a strong national government) by appointing what came to be called "midnight judges" just before he left office.

But Adams's secretary of state (John Marshall) was able to deliver only forty-two of the fifty-nine judicial appointment letters by the time Jefferson took over as president. Jefferson refused to order his secretary of state, James Madison, to deliver the remaining commissions.

Marshall's Dilemma William Marbury and three others to whom the commissions had not been delivered sought a writ of mandamus (an order directing a government official to fulfill a duty) from the United States Supreme Court, as authorized by the Judiciary Act in 1789.

As fate would have it, John Marshall had just been appointed as chief justice of the Supreme Court. Marshall faced a dilemma: If he ordered the commissions delivered, the new secretary of state (Madison) could simply refuse to deliver them—and the Court had no way to compel him to act. At the same time, if Marshall simply allowed the new administration to do as it wished, the Court's power would be severely eroded.

Marshall's Decision Marshall masterfully fashioned his decision to enlarge the power of the Supreme Court by affirming the Court's power of judicial review. He stated, "It is emphatically the province and duty of the Judicial Department to say what the law is. . . . If two laws conflict with each other, the Courts must decide on the operation of each. . . . [I]f both [a] law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, . . .the Court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case."

Marshall's decision did not require anyone to do anything. He concluded that the

a. 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

highest court did not have the power to issue a writ of mandamus in this particular case. Although the Judiciary Act specified that the Supreme Court could issue writs of mandamus as part of its original jurisdiction, Article III of the Constitution, which spelled out the Court's original jurisdiction, did not mention such writs. Because Congress did not have the right to expand the Supreme Court's jurisdiction, this section of the Judiciary Act was unconstitutional—and thus void. The Marbury decision stands to this day as a judicial and political masterpiece.

Application to Today's World Since the Marbury v. Madison decision, the power of judicial review has remained unchallenged and today is exercised by both federal and state courts. If the courts did not have the power of judicial review, the constitutionality of Congress's acts could not be challenged in court—a congressional statute would remain law unless changed by Congress. The courts of other countries that have adopted a constitutional democracy often cite this decision as a justification for judicial review.

4–2 Basic Judicial Requirements

Before a court can hear a lawsuit, certain requirements must be met. These requirements relate to jurisdiction, venue, and standing to sue. We examine each of these important concepts here.

4–2a Jurisdiction

In Latin, juris means "law," and diction means "to speak." Thus, "the power to speak the law" is the literal meaning of the term jurisdiction. Before any court can hear a case, it must have jurisdiction over the person or company against whom the suit is brought (the defendant) or over the property involved in the suit. The court must also have jurisdiction over the subject matter of the dispute.

Jurisdiction The authority of a court to hear and decide a specific case.

Jurisdiction over Persons or Property Generally, a court with jurisdiction over a particular geographic area can exercise personal jurisdiction (in personam jurisdiction) over any person or business that resides in that area. A state trial court, for instance, normally has jurisdictional authority over residents (including businesses) in a particular area of the state, such as a county or district. A state's highest court (often called the state supreme court)[1] has jurisdiction over all residents of that state.

A court can also exercise jurisdiction over property that is located within its boundaries. This kind of jurisdiction is known as in rem jurisdiction, or "jurisdiction over the thing." Example 4.1 A dispute arises over the ownership of a boat in dry dock in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. The boat is owned by an Ohio resident, over whom a Florida court normally cannot exercise personal jurisdiction. The other party to the dispute is a resident of Nebraska. In this situation, because the boat is in Florida, a lawsuit concerning the boat could be brought in a Florida state court on the basis of the court's in rem jurisdiction.

Long Arm Statutes. Under the authority of a state long arm statute, a court can exercise personal jurisdiction over certain out-of-state defendants based on activities that took place within the state. Before exercising long arm jurisdiction over a nonresident, however, the court must be convinced that the defendant had sufficient contacts, or minimum contacts, with the state to justify the jurisdiction.[2] Generally, this means that the defendant must have enough of a connection to the state for the judge to conclude that it is fair for the state to exercise power over the defendant.

Long Arm Statute A state statute that permits a state to exercise jurisdiction over nonresident defendants.

1. As will be discussed shortly, a state's highest court is frequently referred to as the state supreme court, but there are exceptions. For example, in New York, the supreme court is a trial court.
2. The minimum-contacts standard was established in International Shoe Co. v. State of Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 66 S.Ct. 154, 90 L.Ed. 95 (1945).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

If an out-of-state defendant caused an automobile accident or sold defective goods within the state, for instance, a court will usually find that minimum contacts exist to exercise jurisdiction over that defendant. Spotlight Case Example 4.2 An Xbox game system caught fire in Bonnie Broquet's home in Texas and caused substantial personal injuries. Broquet filed a lawsuit in a Texas court against Ji-Haw Industrial Company, a nonresident company that made the Xbox components. Broquet alleged that Ji-Haw's components were defective and had caused the fire. Ji-Haw argued that the Texas court lacked jurisdiction over it, but a state appellate court held that the Texas long arm statute authorized the exercise of jurisdiction over the out-of-state defendant.[3]

Similarly, a state may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant who is sued for breaching a contract that was formed within the state. This is true even when that contract was negotiated over the phone or through online correspondence.

Corporate Contacts. Because corporations are considered legal persons, courts use the same principles to determine whether it is fair to exercise jurisdiction over a corporation. A corporation normally is subject to personal jurisdiction in the state in which it is incorporated, has its principal office, and is doing business. Courts apply the minimum-contacts test to determine if they can exercise jurisdiction over out-of-state corporations.

In the past, corporations were usually subject to jurisdiction in states in which they were doing business, such as advertising or selling products. The United States Supreme Court decided that this situation made questions of jurisdiction too unpredictable. After all, many corporations do business in multiple states, and the Court concluded that it was unfair to expose them to costly legal proceedings in numerous different locations. Now, a corporation is subject to jurisdiction only in states where it does such substantial and continuous business that it is "at home" in that state.[4] The courts look at the amount of business the corporation does within the state relative to the amount it does elsewhere.

Rusla Ruseyn/Shutterstock.com

Is the presence of a railroad company's tracks in one state enough to satisfy the minimum-contacts requirement?

Case Example 4.3 Norfolk Southern Railway Company is a Virginia corporation. Russell Parker, a resident of Indiana and a former employee of Norfolk, filed a lawsuit against the railroad in Missouri. Parker claimed that while working for Norfolk in Indiana he had sustained a cumulative injury. Norfolk argued that Missouri courts did not have jurisdiction over the company. The Supreme Court of Missouri agreed. Simply having train tracks running through Missouri was not enough to meet the minimum-contacts requirement. Norfolk also had tracks and operations in twenty-one other states. The plaintiff worked and was allegedly injured in Indiana, not Missouri. Even though Norfolk did register its corporation in Missouri, the amount of business that it did in Missouri was not so substantial that it was "at home" in that state.[5]

Jurisdiction over Subject Matter Jurisdiction over subject matter is a limitation on the types of cases a court can hear. In both the federal and the state court systems, there are courts of general (unlimited) jurisdiction and courts of limited jurisdiction. An example of a court of general jurisdiction is a state trial court or a federal district court.

Probate Court A state court of limited jurisdiction that conducts proceedings relating to the settlement of a deceased person's estate.

An example of a state court of limited jurisdiction is a probate court. Probate courts are state courts that handle only matters relating to the transfer of a person's assets and obligations after that person's death, including matters relating to the custody and guardianship of

3. Ji-Haw Industrial Co. v. Broquet, 2008 WL 441822 (Tex.App.—San Antonio 2008).
4. Daimler AG v. Bauman, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S.Ct. 746, 187 L.Ed. 624 (2014). See also Frank v. P.N.K. (Lake Charles) LLC, 947 F.3d. 331 (5th Cir. 2020).
5. State ex rel. Norfolk Southern Railway Co. v. Dolan, 512 S.W.3d 41 (Sup.Ct. Mo. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

children and incompetent adults. An example of a federal court of limited subject-matter jurisdiction is a bankruptcy court. Bankruptcy courts handle only bankruptcy proceedings, which are governed by federal bankruptcy law.

Bankruptcy Court A federal court of limited jurisdiction that handles only bankruptcy proceedings, which are governed by federal bankruptcy law.

A court's jurisdiction over subject matter is usually defined in the statute or constitution creating the court. In both the federal and the state court systems, a court's subject-matter jurisdiction can be limited by any of the following:

1. The subject of the lawsuit.
2. The sum in controversy.
3. Whether the case involves a felony (a more serious type of crime) or a misdemeanor (a less serious type of crime).
4. Whether the proceeding is a trial or an appeal.

Original and Appellate Jurisdiction The distinction between courts of original jurisdiction and courts of appellate jurisdiction normally lies in whether the case is being heard for the first time. Courts having original jurisdiction are courts of the first instance, or trial courts—that is, courts in which lawsuits begin, trials take place, and evidence is presented. In the federal court system, the district courts are trial courts. In the various state court systems, the trial courts are known by various names, as will be discussed shortly.

The key point here is that any court having original jurisdiction is normally known as a trial court. Courts having appellate jurisdiction act as reviewing courts, or appellate courts. In general, cases can be brought before appellate courts only on appeal from an order or a judgment of a trial court or other lower court.

Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts Because the federal government is a government of limited powers, the jurisdiction of the federal courts is limited. Federal courts have subject-matter jurisdiction in two situations: those involving federal questions and diversity of citizenship.

Federal Questions. Article III of the U.S. Constitution establishes the boundaries of federal judicial power. Section 2 of Article III states that "[t]he judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority." This clause means that whenever a plaintiff's cause of action is based, at least in part, on the U.S. Constitution, a treaty, or a federal law, then a federal question arises, and the federal courts have jurisdiction.

Federal Question A question that pertains to the U.S. Constitution, an act of Congress, or a treaty and provides a basis for federal jurisdiction in a case.

Any lawsuit involving a federal question, such as a person's rights under the U.S. Constitution, can originate in a federal court. Note that in a case based on a federal question, a federal court will apply federal law.

Diversity of Citizenship. Federal district courts can also exercise original jurisdiction over cases involving diversity of citizenship. The most common type of diversity jurisdiction requires both of the following:[6]

Diversity of Citizenship A basis for federal court jurisdiction over a lawsuit between citizens of different states or between a U.S. citizen and a citizen of a different country.

1. The plaintiff and defendant must be residents of different states.
2. The dollar amount in controversy must exceed $75,000.

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a corporation is a citizen of both the state in which it is incorporated and the state in which its principal place of business is located. A case involving diversity of citizenship can be filed in the appropriate federal district court. If the case starts in a state court, it can sometimes be transferred, or "removed," to a federal court. A large percentage of the cases filed in federal courts each year are based on diversity of citizenship.

6. Diversity jurisdiction also exists in cases between (1) a foreign country and citizens of a state or of different states and (2) citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign country. These bases for diversity jurisdiction are less commonly used.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The party seeking to move a case to federal court bears the burden of demonstrating that the grounds for diversity exist. Case Example 4.4 Elijah Ratcliff was involved in a civil lawsuit with Greyhound Bus Lines over luggage theft on one of the company's busses. Greyhound is headquartered in Dallas, Texas. Ratcliff sought to have the civil trial removed to a federal court in New York. To do so, he needed to convince the federal court that he was a resident of New York so that the case would meet the requirements of diversity of jurisdiction.

The facts were not in his favor. First, he had filed a complaint against Greyhound in Texas. His mailing address was in Texas. The luggage was stolen on a return trip he took to Texas from New York. He indicated that voter registration forms and tax returns would prove his New York residency, but did not produce either. The U.S. district court concluded that Ratcliff was principally based in Texas and dismissed his case for lack of diversity jurisdiction. A federal appeals court affirmed.[7]

As noted, a federal court will apply federal law in cases involving federal questions. In a case based on diversity of citizenship, in contrast, a federal court will apply the relevant state law (which is often the law of the state in which the court sits).

Concurrent Jurisdiction Jurisdiction that exists when two different courts have the power to hear a case.

Exclusive Jurisdiction Jurisdiction that exists when a case can be heard only in a particular court or type of court.

Exclusive versus Concurrent Jurisdiction

When both federal and state courts have the power to hear a case, as is true in lawsuits involving diversity of citizenship, concurrent jurisdiction exists. When cases can be tried only in federal courts or only in state courts, exclusive jurisdiction exists.

Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction in cases involving federal crimes, bankruptcy, most patent and copyright claims, suits against the United States, and some areas of admiralty law. State courts also have exclusive jurisdiction over certain subject matter—for instance, divorce and adoption.

When concurrent jurisdiction exists, a party may bring a suit in either a federal court or a state court. A number of factors can affect the decision of whether to litigate in a federal or a state court, such as the availability of different remedies, the distance to the respective courthouses, or the experience or reputation of a particular judge.

A resident of a state other than the one with jurisdiction might also choose a federal court over a state court if there is any concern that a state court might be biased against an out-of-state plaintiff. In contrast, a plaintiff might choose to litigate in a state court if it has a reputation for awarding substantial amounts of damages or if the judge is perceived as being pro-plaintiff. The concepts of exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction are illustrated in Exhibit 4–1.

7. Ratcliff v. Greyhound Bus Lines, 792 Fed.Appx. 121 (2nd Cir. 2020).

Exhibit 4-1 Exclusive and Concurrent Jurisdiction

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4–2b Jurisdiction in Cyberspace

Focus Question 2

How are the courts applying traditional jurisdictional concepts to cases involving Internet transactions?

The Internet's capacity to bypass political and geographic boundaries undercuts the traditional basis on which courts assert personal jurisdiction. As already discussed, for a court to compel a defendant to come before it, there must be at least minimum contacts—the presence of a salesperson within the state, for example. Today, however, courts frequently have to decide what constitutes sufficient minimum contacts when a defendant's only connection to a jurisdiction is through an ad on a website.

The "Sliding-Scale" Standard The courts have developed a standard—called a "sliding-scale" standard—for determining when the exercise of jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant is proper. The sliding-scale standard identifies three types of Internet business contacts and outlines the following rules of jurisdiction:

1. When the defendant conducts substantial business over the Internet (such as contracts and sales), jurisdiction is proper. This is true whether the business is conducted with traditional computers, smartphones, or other means of Internet access.
2. When there is some interactivity through a website, jurisdiction may be proper, depending on the circumstances. It is up to the courts to decide how much online interactivity is enough to satisfy the minimum-contacts requirement. Case Example 4.5 Dr. Arthur Delahoussaye, a Louisiana resident, bought a special racing bicycle he saw listed on eBay from Frederick Boelter, who lived in Wisconsin. Later, while Delahoussaye was riding the bike, he had to "bunny hop" (jump) over a gap in the pavement. When he landed, the front wheel disconnected, pushing the forks of the bicycle into the ground and propelling him over the handlebars and onto the pavement. Delahoussaye suffered serious injuries. He sued Boelter in a Louisiana court, alleging that Boelter had negligently removed the secondary retention devices designed to prevent the detachment of the front wheel.

   The Louisiana court ruled that the state did not have jurisdiction over Boelter, and a state appellate court affirmed. Boelter did not have any prior relationship with Delahoussaye, did not initiate communications with Delahoussaye, and discussed the transaction with Delahoussaye only over the Internet. Payment was made through an intermediary, PayPal, and Boelter shipped the bicycle to Louisiana. The sale of a single bicycle to Delahoussaye over eBay was not enough to give Louisiana state jurisdiction over Boelter, so the plaintiff's case was dismissed.[8]
3. When a defendant merely engages in passive advertising on the Web, jurisdiction is never proper.[9]

International Jurisdictional Issues Because the Internet is global in scope, it raises international jurisdictional issues. The world's courts seem to be developing a standard that echoes the minimum-contacts requirement applied by U.S. courts.

Most courts are indicating that minimum contacts—doing business within the jurisdiction, for instance—are enough to compel a defendant to appear. The effect of this standard is that a business firm has to comply with the laws in any jurisdiction in which it targets customers for its products. This situation is complicated by the fact that many countries' laws on particular issues—such as free speech—are very different from U.S. laws.

The following case illustrates how federal courts apply a sliding-scale standard to determine if they can exercise jurisdiction over a foreign defendant whose only contact with the United States is through a website.

---

8. Delahoussaye v. Boelter, 199 So.3d 633 (La.App. 2016).

9. For a leading case on this issue, see Zippo Manufacturing Co. v. Zippo Dot Com, Inc., 952 F.Supp. 1119 (W.D.Pa. 1997).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Spotlight on Gucci: Case 4.1

Gucci America, Inc. v. Wang Huoqing

United States District Court, Northern District of California, 2011 WL 30972 (2011).

Facts Wang Huoqing, a resident of the People's Republic of China, operated numerous websites. When Gucci discovered that Huoqing's websites were selling counterfeit goods—products that carried Gucci's trademarks but were not genuine Gucci articles—it hired a private investigator in San Jose, California, to buy goods from the websites. The investigator purchased a wallet that was labeled Gucci but was counterfeit.

narvikk/iStock Unreleased/Getty Images

Gucci luxury leather products are often counterfeited. Can Gucci sue an Asian company in the United States for selling counterfeit goods?

Gucci filed a trademark infringement lawsuit against Huoqing in a federal district court in California seeking damages and an injunction to prevent further infringement. Huoqing was notified of the lawsuit via e-mail but did not appear in court. Gucci asked the court to enter a default judgment—that is, a judgment entered when the defendant fails to appear. The court first had to determine whether it had personal jurisdiction over Huoqing based on the Internet sales.

Issue Could a U.S. federal court exercise personal jurisdiction over a resident of China whose only contact with the United States was through an interactive website that advertised and sold counterfeit goods?

Decision Yes. The U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California held that it had personal jurisdiction over the foreign defendant, Huoqing. The court entered a default judgment against Huoqing and granted Gucci an injunction.

Reason The court reasoned that the due process clause allows a federal court to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant who has had sufficient minimum contacts with the court's forum—the place where the court exercises jurisdiction. Specifically, jurisdiction exists when (1) the nonresident defendant engages in some act or transaction with the forum "by which he purposefully avails himself of the privilege of conducting activities in the forum, thereby invoking the benefits and protections of its laws; (2) the claim [is] one which arises out of or results from the defendant's forum-related activities; and (3) exercise of jurisdiction [is] reasonable."

To determine whether Huoqing had purposefully conducted business activities in California, the court used a sliding-scale analysis. Under this analysis, passive websites do not create sufficient contacts for such a finding, but interactive sites may do so. Huoqing's websites were fully interactive. In addition, Gucci presented evidence that Huoqing had advertised and sold the counterfeited goods within the court's district, and that he had made one actual sale within the district—the sale to Gucci's private investigator.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Gucci had not presented evidence that Huoqing made one actual sale through his website to a resident of the court's district (the private investigator). Would the court still have found that it had personal jurisdiction over Huoqing? Why or why not?

4–2c Venue

Venue The geographic district in which a legal action is tried and from which the jury is selected.

Jurisdiction has to do with whether a court has authority to hear a case involving specific persons, property, or subject matter. Venue [10] is concerned with the most appropriate physical location for a trial. Two state courts (or two federal courts) may have the authority to exercise jurisdiction over a case, but it may be more appropriate or convenient to hear the case in one court than in the other.

Basically, the concept of venue reflects the policy that a court trying a suit should be in the geographic neighborhood (usually the county) where the incident leading to the lawsuit occurred or where the parties involved in the lawsuit reside. Venue in a civil case typically is where the defendant resides, whereas venue in a criminal case normally is where the 10. Pronounced ven-yoo.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

crime occurred. Pretrial publicity or other factors, though, may require a change of venue to another community, especially in criminal cases when the defendant's right to a fair and impartial jury has been impaired.

Note that venue has lost some significance in today's world because of the Internet and 24/7 news reporting. Courts now rarely grant requests for a change of venue. Because everyone has instant access to the same information about a purported crime, courts reason that no community is more or less informed about the matter or prejudiced for or against the defendant.

4–2d Standing to Sue

Standing to Sue The legal requirement that an individual must have a sufficient stake in a controversy in order to bring a lawsuit.

Before a person can bring a lawsuit before a court, the party must have standing to sue, or a sufficient "stake" in the matter to justify seeking relief through the court system. Standing means that the party that filed the action in court has a legally protected interest at stake in the litigation. The party bringing the lawsuit must have suffered a harm, such as physical injury or economic loss, as a result of the action that will be the focus of the lawsuit. At times, a person can have standing to sue on behalf of another person, such as a minor (child) or a mentally incompetent person.

Case Example 4.6 Harold Wagner obtained a loan through M.S.T. Mortgage Group to buy a house in Texas. After the sale, M.S.T. transferred its interest in the loan to another lender, which assigned it to another lender, as is common in the mortgage industry. Eventually, when Wagner failed to make the loan payments, CitiMortgage, Inc., notified him that it was going to foreclose on the property and sell the house. Wagner filed a lawsuit claiming that the lenders had improperly assigned the mortgage loan. A federal district court ruled that Wagner lacked standing to contest the assignment. Under Texas law, only the parties directly involved in an assignment can challenge its validity. In this case, the assignment was between two lenders and did not directly involve Wagner.[11]

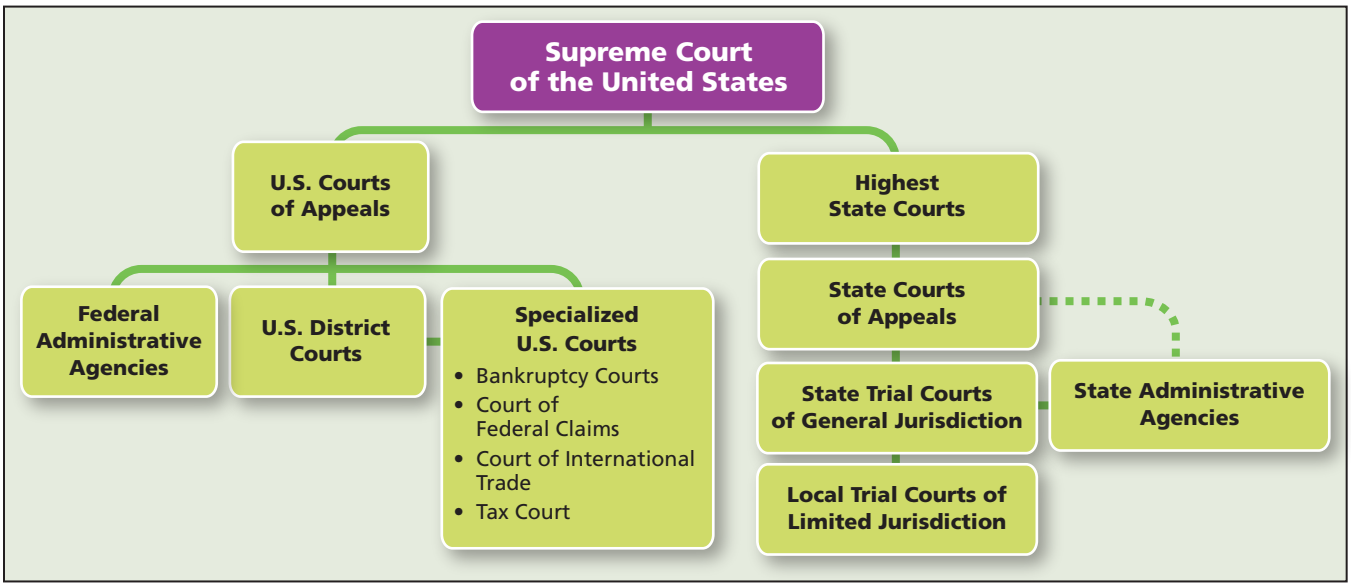
Justiciable Controversy A controversy that is not hypothetical or academic but real and substantial. It is a requirement that must be satisfied before a court will hear a case.

Another requirement to bring a lawsuit is that the controversy at issue be a justiciable controversy [12]—a controversy that is real and substantial, as opposed to hypothetical or academic. A court will not hear a case if the matter at issue is not justiciable.

4–3 The State and Federal Court Systems

Each state has its own court system. Additionally, there is a system of federal courts. Even though there are fifty-two court systems—one for each of the fifty states, one for the District of Columbia, and a federal system—similarities abound. Exhibit 4–2 illustrates the basic organizational structure characteristic of the court systems in many states. The exhibit also shows how the federal court system is structured.

Keep in mind that the federal courts are not superior to the state courts. They are simply an independent system of courts, which derives its authority from Article III, Sections 1 and 2, of the U.S. Constitution.



4–3a The State Court Systems

No two state court systems are exactly the same. Typically, a state court system will include several levels, or tiers, of courts. As indicated in Exhibit 4–2, state courts may include (1) trial courts of limited jurisdiction, (2) trial courts of general jurisdiction, (3) appellate courts, and (4) the state's highest court (often called the state supreme court).

11. Wagner v. CitiMortgage, Inc., 995 F.Supp.2d 621 (N.D.Tex. 2014).
12. Pronounced jus-tish-uh-bul.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 4–2 The State and Federal Court Systems

Generally, any person who is a party to a lawsuit has the opportunity to plead the case before a trial court and then, if that person loses, before at least one level of appellate court. If the case involves a federal statute or a federal constitutional issue, the decision of a state supreme court on that issue may be further appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Trial Courts Trial courts are courts in which trials are held and testimony taken. State trial courts have either general or limited jurisdiction. Trial courts that have general jurisdiction as to subject matter may be called county, district, superior, or circuit courts.[13] These courts have jurisdiction over a wide variety of subjects, including both civil disputes and criminal prosecutions. (In some states, trial courts of general jurisdiction may hear appeals from courts of limited jurisdiction.)

Courts of limited jurisdiction may be called special inferior trial courts or minor judiciary courts. Limited jurisdiction courts might include local municipal courts (which could include separate traffic courts and drug courts) and domestic relations courts (which handle divorce and child-custody disputes). A small claims court is an inferior trial court that hears only civil cases involving claims of less than a certain amount, such as $5,000 (the amount varies from state to state). Suits brought in small claims courts are generally conducted informally, and lawyers are not required (in a few states, lawyers are not even allowed). Decisions of small claims courts and municipal courts may sometimes be appealed to a state trial court of general jurisdiction.

Small Claims Court A special court in which parties can litigate small claims without an attorney.

Focus Question 3

What is the difference between the focus of a trial court and that of an appellate court?

Appellate, or Reviewing, Courts Every state has at least one court of appeals (appellate court, or reviewing court), which may be an intermediate appellate court or the state's highest court. About three-fourths of the states have intermediate appellate courts. Generally, courts of appeals do not conduct new trials, in which evidence is submitted and witnesses are examined. Rather, an appellate court panel of three or more judges reviews the record of the case on appeal, which includes a transcript of the trial proceedings, and determines whether the trial court committed an error.

13. The name in Ohio is court of common pleas, and the name in New York is supreme court.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus on Questions of Law. Appellate courts generally focus on questions of law, not questions of fact. A question of fact deals with what really happened in regard to the dispute being tried—such as whether a party actually burned a flag. A question of law concerns the application or interpretation of the law—such as whether flag-burning is a form of speech protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Only a judge, not a jury, can rule on questions of law.

Question of Fact In a lawsuit, an issue that involves only disputed facts, and not what the law is on a given point.

Question of Law In a lawsuit, an issue involving the application or interpretation of a law.

Defer to the Trial Court's Findings of Fact. Appellate courts normally defer (give significant weight) to a trial court's findings on questions of fact, because the trial court judge and jury were in a better position to evaluate testimony. The trial court could directly observe witnesses' gestures, demeanor, and nonverbal behavior during the trial. An appellate court cannot. At the appellate level, the judges review the written transcript of the trial.

An appellate court will challenge a trial court's finding of fact only when the finding is clearly erroneous (that is, when it is contrary to the evidence presented at trial or when no evidence was presented to support the finding). In the following case, an appellate court reviewed the trial record of a case between a landlord and a business tenant.

Case 4.2

Oxford Tower Apartments, LP v. Frenchie's Hair Boutique

Superior Court of Pennsylvania, 2020 PA Super _, _ A.3d _, 2020 WL 119595 (2020).

Facts Frenchie's Hair Boutique sells hair extensions, clothing, and accessories. Rolande Christophe, the owner of Frenchie's, entered into a three-year commercial lease with Oxford Tower Apartments, LP, for a small storefront. Less than two years later, Oxford filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Frenchie's and Christophe, alleging breach of contract and seeking unpaid rent. The defendants counterclaimed for damages. At the trial, Christophe testified that from the start of the lease, problems with the store, including a lack of heat in the building, interfered with her business. She complained to Oxford, to no avail. Fifteen months into the term, a pipe erupted, flooding the store with water and sewage. Frenchie's lost its inventory and was required to clear out so that the flooring could be replaced. Unable to reopen the store because of the lingering odor, Christophe stopped paying rent and gave Oxford the key. The court granted possession of the premises to Oxford and awarded damages for the loss of the inventory to Christophe. Oxford appealed, arguing that Christophe and Frenchie's were still obligated to pay the unpaid rent.

Iakov Filimonov/Shutterstock.com

Issue Were the decision and award of the trial court supported by competent evidence in the record?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's order. Oxford retained possession of the premises, and Christophe and Frenchie's were entitled to damages for the cost of the lost inventory.

Reason An appellate court will not reverse a finding of fact by a trial court if the finding is supported by competent evidence in the record. Witness testimony and other forms of evidence are to be assessed and resolved by the trial court. It is not within the province of an appellate court to examine evidence or to substitute its judgment for that of the fact finder. Christophe testified about the problems that interfered with her ability to do business and that the landlord failed to remedy, despite frequent complaints. Oxford argued that Frenchie's and Christophe had not vacated the premises. In the appellate court's view, this claim was clearly contradicted by the record. After the pipe erupted, and the floors were replaced, Christophe could not reopen her store due to "the foul odor of waste emanating from the floor." She gave her key to the premises to Oxford. "The trial court concluded that the evidence presented supported a finding in favor of Appellees. We deem the trial court's determination to be well-supported by the record."

Critical Thinking

- Economic Should an appellate court's review of the amount of damages awarded at trial be subject to the principle that limits appellate review of other evidence? Why or why not?
- Legal A judge or a jury can decide a question of fact, but only a judge can rule on a question of law. Why?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Highest State Courts The highest appellate court in a state is usually called the supreme court but may be called by some other name. For instance, in both New York and Maryland, the highest state court is called the court of appeals. The decisions of each state's highest court are final on all questions of state law. Only when issues of federal law are involved can a decision made by a state's highest court be overruled by the United States Supreme Court.

Example 4.7 A city enacts an ordinance that prohibits citizens from engaging in door-to-door advocacy without first registering with the mayor's office and receiving a permit. A religious group sues the city, arguing that the law violates the freedoms of speech and religion guaranteed by the First Amendment. If the state supreme court upholds the law, the group could appeal the decision to the United States Supreme Court, because a constitutional (federal) issue is involved.

4–3b The Federal Court System

The federal court system is basically a three-tiered model consisting of (1) U.S. district courts (trial courts of general jurisdiction) and various courts of limited jurisdiction, (2) U.S. courts of appeals (intermediate courts of appeals), and (3) the United States Supreme Court.

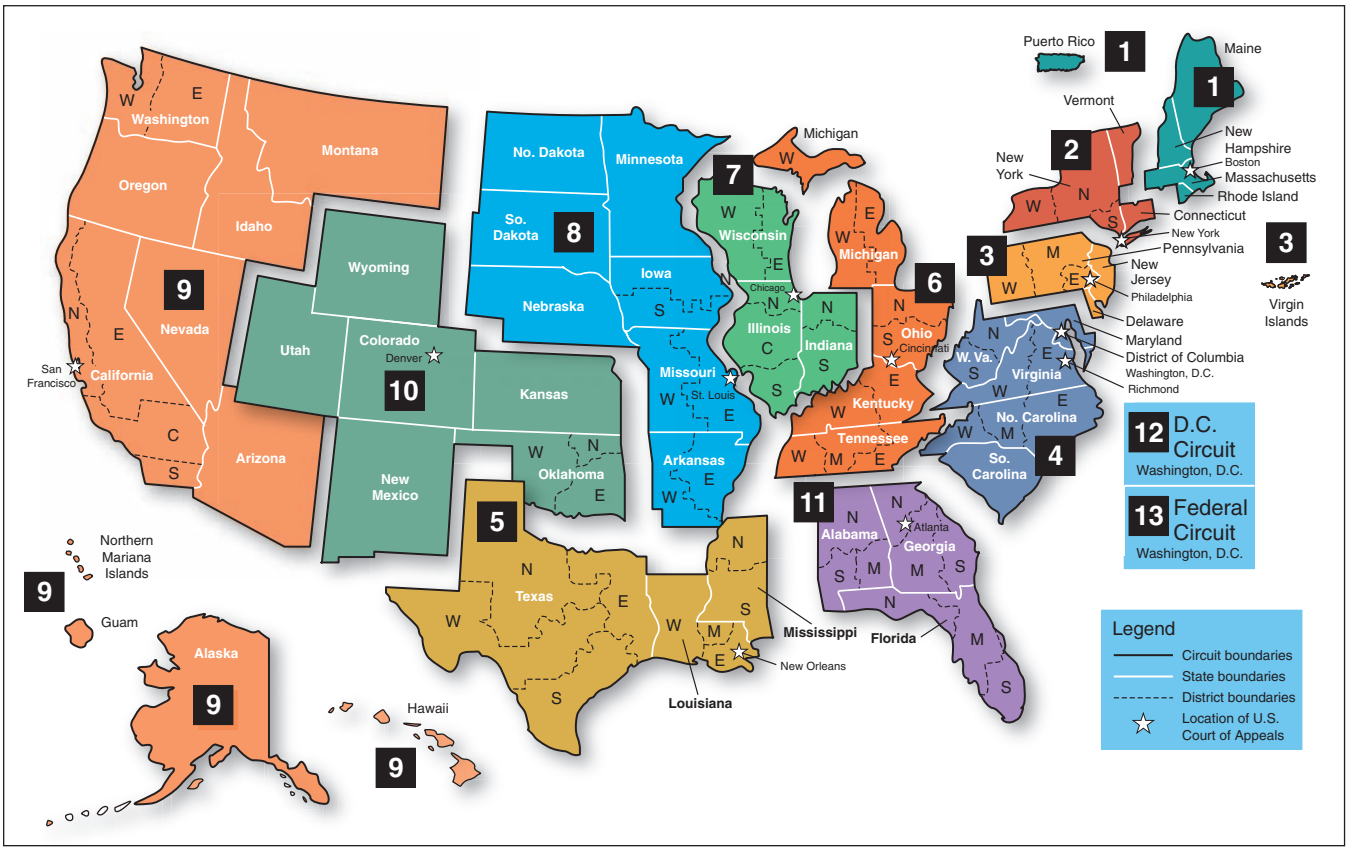
Unlike state court judges, who are usually elected, federal court judges—including the justices of the Supreme Court—are appointed by the president of the United States and confirmed by the U.S. Senate. Under Article III, federal judges "hold their offices during Good Behavior." In the entire history of the United States, only seven federal judges have been removed from office through impeachment proceedings.

U.S. District Courts At the federal level, the equivalent of a state trial court of general jurisdiction is the district court. There is at least one federal district court in every state. The number of judicial districts can vary over time, primarily owing to population changes and corresponding caseloads. Today, there are ninety-four federal judicial districts.

U.S. district courts have original jurisdiction in federal matters. Federal cases typically originate in district courts. Federal courts with original, but specialized (or limited), jurisdiction include the bankruptcy courts and others that were shown in Exhibit 4-2.

U.S. Courts of Appeals In the federal court system, there are thirteen U.S. courts of appeals—also referred to as U.S. circuit courts of appeals. The federal courts of appeals for twelve of the circuits, including the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, hear appeals from the federal district courts located within their respective judicial circuits.

The Court of Appeals for the Thirteenth Circuit is called the Federal Circuit. It has national appellate jurisdiction over certain types of cases, such as cases involving patent law and cases in which the U.S. government is a defendant.



The decisions of the circuit courts of appeals are final in most cases, but appeal to the United States Supreme Court is possible. Exhibit 4–3 shows the boundaries of both the district courts and the U.S. courts of appeals within each circuit.

The United States Supreme Court At the highest level of the three-tiered model of the federal court system is the United States Supreme Court. According to Article III of the U.S. Constitution, there is only one national Supreme Court. All other courts in the federal system are considered "inferior." Congress is empowered to create inferior courts as it deems necessary. The inferior courts that Congress has created include the second tier in our model—the U.S. courts of appeals—as well as the district courts and any other courts of limited, or specialized, jurisdiction.

The United States Supreme Court consists of nine justices. Although the Supreme Court has original, or trial, jurisdiction in rare instances (set forth in Article III, Section 2), most

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 4-3 Boundaries of the U.S. Courts of Appeals and U.S. District Courts of its work is as an appeals court. The Supreme Court can review any case decided by any of the federal courts of appeals, and it also has appellate authority over some cases decided in the state courts.

Source: Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

Appeals to the Supreme Court. To bring a case before the Supreme Court, a party requests that the Court issue a writ of certiorari. A writ of *certiorari [14] is an order issued by the Supreme Court to a lower court requiring that court to send the record of the case for review. Under the rule of four, the Court will not issue a writ unless at least four of the nine justices approve.

Whether the Court will issue a writ of certiorari is entirely within its discretion. The Court is not required to issue one, and most petitions for writs are denied. (Although thousands of cases are filed with the Supreme Court each year, it hears, on average, fewer than one hundred of these cases.)[15] A denial is not a decision on the merits of a case, nor does it indicate agreement with the lower court's opinion. Furthermore, a denial of the writ has no value as a precedent.

Petitions Granted by the Court. Typically, the Court grants petitions when cases raise important constitutional questions or when the lower courts are issuing conflicting decisions on a significant issue. The justices, however, never explain their reasons for hearing certain cases and not others, so it is difficult to predict which type of case the Court might select.

Writ of Certiorari A writ from a higher court asking a lower court for the record of a case.

Rule of Four A rule of the United States Supreme Court under which the Court will not issue a writ of certiorari unless at least four justices approve of the decision to issue the writ.

14. Pronounced sur-shee-uh-rah-ree.

15. From the mid-1950s through the early 1990s, the United States Supreme Court reviewed more cases per year than it has in the last few years. In the Court's 1982–1983 term, for instance, the Court issued opinions in 151 cases. In contrast, in its 2018–2019 term, the Court issued opinions in only 68 cases.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4–4 Following a State Court Case

To illustrate the procedures that would be followed in a civil lawsuit brought in a state court, we present a hypothetical case and follow it through the state court system. The case involves an automobile accident in which Kevin, driving a Lexus, struck Lisa, driving a Hyundai Genesis. The accident occurred at the intersection of Wilshire Boulevard and Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, California. Lisa suffered personal injuries and incurred medical and hospital expenses as a result, as well as lost wages for four months. Kevin and Lisa are unable to agree on a settlement, and Lisa sues Kevin. Lisa is the plaintiff, and Kevin is the defendant. Both are represented by lawyers.

Litigation The process of resolving a dispute through the court system.

During each phase of the litigation (the process of working a lawsuit through the court system), Lisa and Kevin will have to observe strict procedural requirements. A large body of law—procedural law—establishes the rules and standards for determining disputes in courts.

Procedural rules are very complex, and they vary from court to court and from state to state. In addition to the various sets of rules for state courts, the federal courts have their own rules of procedure. Additionally, the applicable procedures will depend on whether the case is a civil or criminal proceeding. Generally, the Lisa-Kevin civil lawsuit will involve the procedures discussed in the following subsections. Keep in mind that attempts to settle the case may be ongoing throughout the trial.

4–4a The Pleadings

Pleadings Statements by the plaintiff and the defendant that detail the facts, charges, and defenses of a case.

The complaint and answer (and other legal documents discussed here) are known as the pleadings. The pleadings inform each party of the other's claims and specify the issues (disputed questions) involved in the case. The style and form of the pleadings may be quite different in different states.

Complaint The pleading made by a plaintiff alleging wrongdoing on the part of the defendant. When filed with a court, the complaint initiates a lawsuit.

The Plaintiff's Complaint Lisa's suit against Kevin commences when her lawyer files a complaint with the appropriate court. The complaint contains statements alleging:

1. Jurisdiction. The facts necessary for the court to take jurisdiction.
2. Legal theory. A brief summary of the facts necessary to show that the plaintiff is entitled to relief (a remedy).[16]
3. Remedy. A statement of the remedy the plaintiff is seeking.

Complaints may be lengthy or brief, depending on the complexity of the case and the rules of the jurisdiction.

Service of Process The delivery of the complaint and summons to a defendant.

Summons A document informing defendants that a legal action has been commenced against them and that they must appear in court on a certain date to answer the plaintiffs' complaint.

Service of Process Before the court can exercise personal jurisdiction over the defendant (Kevin)—in effect, before the lawsuit can begin—the court must have proof that the defendant was notified of the lawsuit. Formally notifying the defendant of a lawsuit is called service of process. The plaintiff must deliver, or serve, a copy of the complaint and a summons (a notice requiring the defendant to appear in court and answer the complaint) to the defendant.

Default Judgment A judgment entered by a court against a defendant who has failed to appear in court to answer or defend against the plaintiff's claim.

The summons notifies Kevin that he must file an answer to the complaint within a specified time period (twenty days in the federal courts) or suffer a default judgment against him. A default judgment in Lisa's favor would mean that she would be awarded the damages alleged in her complaint because Kevin failed to respond to the allegations. In our legal system, no case can proceed to trial unless the plaintiff can prove that the defendant has been properly served.

---

16. The factual allegations in a complaint must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. They must plausibly suggest that the plaintiff is entitled to a remedy. See Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Method of Service. How service of process occurs depends on the rules of the court or jurisdiction in which the lawsuit is brought. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, anyone who is at least eighteen years of age and is not a party to the lawsuit can serve process in federal court cases. In state courts, the process server is often a county sheriff or an employee of an independent company that provides process service in the local area.

Usually, the server hands the summons and complaint to the defendant personally or leaves it at the defendant's residence or place of business. In cases involving corporate defendants, the summons and complaint may be served on an officer or on a registered agent (representative) of the corporation. The name of a corporation's registered agent can usually be obtained from the secretary of state's office in the state where the company incorporated its business. Process can be served by mail in some states if the defendant consents (accepts service). When the defendant cannot be reached, special rules provide for alternative means of service, such as publishing a notice in the local newspaper.

In some situations, courts allow service of process via e-mail, as long as it is reasonably calculated to provide notice and an opportunity to respond. Case Example 4.8 A county in New York filed a petition to remove a minor child, J.T., from his mother's care due to neglect. The child's father had been deported to Jordan, and the county sought to terminate the father's parental rights. Although the father's exact whereabouts were unknown, the county caseworker had been in contact with him via e-mail. Therefore, the court allowed the father to be served via e-mail because it was reasonably calculated to inform him of the proceedings and allow him an opportunity to respond.[17]

Today, some judges have allowed defendants to be served legal documents via social media, as discussed in this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.

Ievgen Chabanov/Alamy Stock Photo

Usually, a summons is hand-delivered to the defendant. What other ways could a summons be served using today's technologies?

17. In re J.T., 53 Misc.3d 888, 37 N.Y.S.3d 846 (2016).

Using Social Media for Service of Process

Historically, when process servers failed to reach a defendant at home, they attempted to serve process at the defendant's workplace, by mail, or by publication. In our digital age, does publication via social media qualify as legitimate service of process?

Facebook has over 2 billion active users per month. Assume that a man has a Facebook account and so does his spouse. He has moved out and is intentionally avoiding service of a divorce summons. Even a private investigator has not been able to deliver that summons. What to do? According to some courts today, the lawyer for the woman can serve the divorce summons through a private message from her Facebook account.

An Increasing Use of Social Media for Service of Process

More and more courts are allowing service of process via Facebook and other social media. One New York City family court judge ruled that a divorced man could serve his ex-wife through her active Facebook account. She had moved out of the house and provided no forwarding address. A U.S. District Court in California recognized the service of process on a defendant on Facebook, partially because the defendant, who claimed to live in Costa Rica, responded to that service notice soon after it was posted.[a] A federal judge a. Elson v. Black, 2019 WL 4673211 (U.S. District Court, C.D. California 2019).

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

in San Francisco allowed a plaintiff to use Twitter accounts to serve several defendants located in Kuwait who had allegedly financed terrorism using their Twitter accounts.[b]

The key requirement appears to be that the plaintiff has diligently and reasonably attempted to serve process by traditional means. Once the plaintiff has exhausted the usual means to effect service, then a court is likely to allow service via social media.[c]

Not All Courts Agree, Though

In spite of these examples, the courts have not uniformly approved of using social media to serve process. After all, it is relatively simple to create a fake Facebook account and nearly impossible to verify the true owner of that account. Some judges have voiced concerns that serving process via Facebook and other social media raises significant questions of whether that service comports with due process.[d]

Critical Thinking

In our connected world, is there any way a defendant could avoid service of process via social media?

b. St. Francis Assisi v. Kuwait Finance House, 2016 WL 5725002 (N.D.Cal. 2016).

c. E.L.V.H., Inc. v. Bennett, 2018 WL 3496105 (U.S. District Court, C.D. California 2018).

d. FTC v. PCCare247, Inc., 2013 WL 841037 (S.D.N.Y. 2013); and Asiacell Communications P.J.S.C. v. Doe, 2018 WL3496105 (U.S. District Court, N.D. California 2018).

Waiver of Formal Service of Process. In many instances, the defendant is already aware that a lawsuit is being filed and is willing to waive (give up) the right to be served personally. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP) and many states' rules allow defendants to waive formal service of process, provided that certain procedures are followed.

In the Lisa-Kevin case, for instance, Lisa's attorney could mail a copy of the complaint to defendant Kevin, along with "Waiver of Service of Summons" forms for Kevin to sign. If he signs and returns the forms within thirty days, formal service of process is waived.

Under the FRCP, defendants who agree to waive formal service of process receive additional time to respond to the complaint (sixty days, instead of twenty days). Some states provide similar incentives to encourage defendants to waive formal service of process and thereby reduce associated costs and foster cooperation between the parties.

Answer Procedurally, a defendant's response to the plaintiff's complaint.

Counterclaim A claim made by a defendant in a civil lawsuit against the plaintiff. In effect, the defendant is suing the plaintiff.

Reply Procedurally, a plaintiff's response to a defendant's answer.

Motion to Dismiss A pleading in which a defendant admits the facts as alleged by the plaintiff but asserts that the plaintiff's claim to state a cause of action has no basis in law.

The Defendant's Answer The defendant's answer either admits the statements or allegations set forth in the complaint or denies them and outlines any defenses that the defendant may have. If Kevin admits to all of Lisa's allegations in his answer, the court will enter a judgment for Lisa. If Kevin denies any of Lisa's allegations, the litigation will go forward.

Kevin can deny Lisa's allegations and set forth his own claim that Lisa was negligent and therefore owes him compensation for the damage to his Lexus. This is appropriately called a counterclaim. If Kevin files a counterclaim, Lisa will have to answer it with a pleading, normally called a reply, which has the same characteristics as an answer.

Kevin can also admit the truth of Lisa's complaint but raise new facts that may result in dismissal of the action. This is called raising an affirmative defense. For instance, Kevin could assert that Lisa was driving negligently at the time of the accident and thus was partially responsible for her own injuries. In some states, a plaintiff's contributory negligence operates as a complete defense, whereas in others it simply reduces the amount of damages that Lisa can recover.

Motion to Dismiss A motion is a procedural request submitted to the court by an attorney on behalf of a client. A motion to dismiss requests the court to dismiss the case for stated reasons. Grounds for dismissal of a case include improper delivery of the complaint and summons, improper venue, and the plaintiff's failure to state a claim for which a court could grant relief. For instance, suppose that Lisa had suffered no injuries or losses as a result of Kevin's negligence. In that situation, Kevin could move to have the case dismissed because Lisa would not have stated a claim for which relief could be granted.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

If the judge grants the motion to dismiss, the plaintiff generally is given time to file an amended complaint. If the judge denies the motion, the suit will go forward, and the defendant must then file an answer. Note that if Lisa wishes to discontinue the suit because, for instance, an out-of-court settlement has been reached, she can likewise move for dismissal. The court can also dismiss the case on its own motion.

Case Example 4.9 Espresso Disposition Corporation 1 entered into a contract with Santana Sales & Marketing Group, Inc. The agreement included a mandatory forum-selection clause, which was a provision designating that any disputes arising under the contract would be decided by a court in Illinois. When Santana Sales filed a lawsuit against Espresso in a Florida state court, Espresso filed a motion to dismiss based on the agreement's forum selection clause. Santana claimed that the forum-selection clause had been a mistake. The court denied Espresso's motion to dismiss. Espresso appealed. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the trial court's denial of Espresso's motion to dismiss and remanded the case to the lower court for the entry of an order of dismissal.[18]

4–4b Pretrial Motions

Either party may attempt to get the case dismissed before trial through the use of various pretrial motions. We have already mentioned the motion to dismiss. Two other important pretrial motions are the motion for judgment on the pleadings and the motion for summary judgment.

At the close of the pleadings, either party may make a motion for judgment on the pleadings, or on the merits of the case. The judge will grant the motion only when there is no dispute over the facts of the case and the sole issue to be resolved is a question of law. In deciding on the motion, the judge may consider only the evidence contained in the pleadings.

Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings A motion by either party to a lawsuit at the close of the pleadings requesting the court to decide the issue solely on the pleadings without proceeding to trial. The motion will be granted only if no facts are in dispute.

In contrast, in a motion for summary judgment, the court may consider evidence outside the pleadings, such as sworn statements (affidavits) by parties or witnesses, or other documents relating to the case. Either party can make a motion for summary judgment. Like the motion for judgment on the pleadings, a motion for summary judgment will be granted only if there are no genuine questions of fact and the sole question is a question of law. When a party appeals a court's grant or denial of a summary judgment motion, the appellate court engages in a de novo review, which means it applies the same standard that the trial court applied.

Motion for Summary Judgment A motion requesting the court to enter a judgment without proceeding to trial. The motion can be based on evidence outside the pleadings and will be granted only if no facts are in dispute.

4–4c Discovery

Before a trial begins, each party can use a number of procedural devices to obtain information and gather evidence about the case from the other party or from third parties. The process of obtaining such information is known as discovery. Discovery includes gaining access to witnesses, documents, records, and other types of evidence.

Discovery A method by which the opposing parties obtain information from each other to prepare for trial.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and similar rules in the states set forth the guidelines for discovery. Generally, discovery is allowed regarding any matter that is not privileged and is relevant to the claim or defense of any party. Discovery rules also attempt to protect witnesses and parties from undue harassment and to safeguard privileged or confidential material from being disclosed.

If a discovery request involves privileged or confidential business information, a court can deny the request and can limit the scope of discovery in a number of ways. For instance, a court can require the party to submit the materials to the judge in a sealed envelope so that the judge can decide if they should be disclosed to the opposing party.

Focus Question 4

What is discovery, and how does electronic discovery differ from traditional discovery?

18. Espresso Disposition Corp. 1 v. Santana Sales & Marketing Group, Inc., 105 So.3d 592 (Fla.App. 3 Dist. 2013).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Discovery prevents surprises at trial by giving parties access to evidence that might otherwise be hidden. This allows both parties to learn what to expect during a trial before they reach the courtroom. Discovery also gives parties the opportunity to file a motion for summary judgment based on the new information it reveals. Finally, discovery serves to narrow the issues so that trial time is spent on the main questions in the case.

Deposition The testimony of a party to a lawsuit or a witness taken under oath before a trial.

Depositions and Interrogatories Discovery can involve the use of depositions, interrogatories, or both. A deposition is sworn testimony by a party to the lawsuit or any witness. The person being deposed (the deponent) answers questions asked by the attorneys, and the questions and answers are recorded by an authorized court official and sworn to and signed by the deponent. (Occasionally, written depositions are taken when witnesses are unable to appear in person.) The answers given to depositions will, of course, help the attorneys prepare for the trial. They can also be used in court to impeach (challenge the credibility of) parties or witnesses who change their testimony at the trial. In addition, a witness's deposition can be used as testimony if that witness is not available for the trial.

Interrogatories A series of written questions for which written answers are prepared by a party to a lawsuit, usually with the assistance of the party's attorney, and then signed under oath.

Interrogatories are written questions for which written answers are prepared and then signed under oath. The main difference between interrogatories and written depositions is that interrogatories are directed to a party to the lawsuit (the plaintiff or the defendant), not to a witness, and the party can prepare answers with the aid of an attorney. In addition, the scope of interrogatories is broader because parties are obligated to answer the questions, even if that means disclosing information from their records and files (unless objected to).

Note that, as with other discovery requests, a court can impose sanctions on a party who fails to answer interrogatories. Case Example 4.10 Construction Laborers Trust Funds for Southern California Administrative Company (the plaintiff), which administers various Southern California employee benefit plans, sued Mario Miguel Montalvo in a federal district court in California. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, Montalvo, had failed to pay required benefit contributions for every hour that his employees worked (as required under federal law). The plaintiff also claimed that Montalvo had refused to allow an audit of his payroll and business records and had failed to submit monthly employment records needed to determine the amounts due.

Montalvo did not respond to plaintiff's interrogatories. On three occasions, the court ordered Montalvo to answer the interrogatories and produce the necessary documents. The defendant continued to disobey the court's orders and told the plaintiff's attorney that he was "too busy" to comply with the discovery requests. Eventually, the court entered a default judgment against Montalvo, noting that he had willfully disobeyed multiple court orders.[19]

Requests for Other Information A party can serve a written request on the other party for an admission of the truth on matters relating to the trial. Any matter admitted under such a request is conclusively established for the trial. For instance, Lisa can ask Kevin to admit that he was driving at a speed of forty-five miles an hour. A request for admission saves time at trial because the parties will not have to spend time proving facts on which they already agree.

Parties can also gain access to documents and other items not in their possession in order to inspect and examine them. Likewise, parties can gain "entry upon land" to inspect the premises. Kevin's attorney, for instance, normally can gain permission to inspect and photocopy Lisa's car repair bills.

When the physical or mental condition of one party is in question, the opposing party can ask the court to order a physical or mental examination, but the court will do so only if the need for the information outweighs the right to privacy of the person to be examined. If the court issues the order, the opposing party can obtain the results of the examination.

19. Construction Laborers Trust Funds for Southern California Administrative Co. v. Montalvo, 2011 WL 1195892 (C.D.Cal. 2011); see also, Loop AI Labs Inc. v. Gatti, 2017 WL 934599 (N.D.Cal. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Ethical Issue

Should the law require discovery on third-party litigation funding? Given the popularity of gambling in our society, it should come as no surprise that it's now possible to bet on lawsuits. Most of this "action" is placed by financing firms known as third-party litigation funding groups. For example, a third-party litigant might provide Plaintiff X with $300,000 to bring an age-discrimination suit against Company Z. If Plaintiff X prevails, the third-party litigant will get back its $300,000 plus a percentage of the settlement. If Plaintiff X fails, the third-party litigant loses its $300,000 "bet."

On the one hand, proponents of this multi-billion-dollar global enterprise insist that it provides individual plaintiffs and law firms with the funds they need to bring valid lawsuits. On the other hand, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, among other critics, worries that plaintiffs with deep-pocketed third-party backers will force business defendants to settle frivolous lawsuits rather than pay the costs of litigating them. Also, there is the ethical question of control. With a large financial stake in a trial's outcome, the third-party litigant might try to dictate legal strategy or influence the settlement amount. For American civil courts to function properly, these decisions must rest solely with plaintiffs and their legal representatives.

Usually, plaintiffs are not obliged by law to disclose third-party litigants during discovery. Several states have passed laws requiring such disclosure, thus allowing courts and juries to determine for themselves the impact of outside funding on the legal proceedings. In the face of strong opposition from the third-party litigation industry, attempts to pass similar federal legislation have yet to succeed.

Electronic Discovery

Any relevant material, including information stored electronically, can be the object of a discovery request. The federal rules and most state rules now specifically allow all parties to obtain electronic "data compilations." Electronic evidence, or e-evidence, includes all types of computer-generated or electronically recorded information. This might include e-mail, voice mail, tweets, blogs, social media posts, and spreadsheets, as well as documents and other data stored on computers.

E-Evidence A type of evidence that consists of computer-generated or electronically recorded information.

E-evidence can reveal significant facts that are not discoverable by other means. Computers, smartphones, cameras, and other devices automatically record certain information about files—such as who created a file and when, and who accessed, modified, or transmitted it—on their hard drives. This information is called metadata, which can be thought of as "data about data." Metadata can be obtained only from the file in its electronic format—not from printed-out versions.

Metadata Data that are automatically recorded by electronic devices and provide information about who created a file and when, and who accessed, modified, or transmitted the file. It can be described as data about data.

Example 4.11 John McAfee, the programmer responsible for creating McAfee antivirus software, was wanted for questioning in the murder of his neighbor in Belize. McAfee left Belize and was on the run from police, but he allowed a journalist to come with him and photograph him. When the journalist posted photos of McAfee online, some metadata were attached to a photo. The police used the metadata to pinpoint the latitude and longitude of the image and subsequently arrested McAfee in Guatemala.

E-Discovery Procedures. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure deal specifically with the preservation, retrieval, and production of electronic data. Although parties may still use traditional means, such as interrogatories and depositions, to find out about the e-evidence, they must usually hire an expert to retrieve evidence in its electronic format. The expert uses software to reconstruct e-mail exchanges and establish who knew what and when they knew it. The expert can even recover files that the user thought had been deleted from a computer.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Advantages and Disadvantages. E-discovery has significant advantages over paper discovery. Back-up copies of documents and e-mail can provide useful—and often quite damaging—information about how a particular matter progressed over several weeks or months. E-discovery can uncover the proverbial smoking gun that will win the lawsuit, but it is also time consuming and expensive, especially when lawsuits involve large firms with multiple offices. Many companies have found it challenging to fulfill their duty to preserve electronic evidence from a vast number of sources. Failure to do so, however, can lead to sanctions and even force companies to agree to settlements that are not in their best interests.

A failure to provide e-evidence in response to a discovery request does not always arise from an unintentional failure to preserve documents and e-mail. The following case involved a litigant that delayed a response to gain time to intentionally alter and destroy data. At issue were the sanctions imposed for this spoliation. (Spoliation of evidence occurs when a document or information that is required for discovery is destroyed or altered significantly.)

Case 4.3

Klipsch Group, Inc. v. ePRO E-Commerce Limited

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 880 F.3d 620 (2018).

Facts Klipsch Group, Inc. makes sound equipment, including headphones. Klipsch filed a suit in a federal district court against ePRO E-Commerce Limited, a Chinese corporation. Klipsch alleged that ePRO had sold $5 million in counterfeit Klipsch products. ePRO claimed that the sales of relevant products amounted to less than $8,000 worldwide. In response to discovery requests, ePRO failed to timely disclose the majority of the responsive documents in its possession. ePRO also restricted Klipsch's access to its e-data. The court directed ePRO to hold the data to preserve evidence, but the defendant failed to do so. This failure led to the deletion of thousands of documents and significant quantities of data. Klipsch spent $2.7 million on a forensic examination to determine what had been blocked, what had been lost, and what might and might not be recovered. The court concluded that ePRO willingly engaged in spoliation of e-evidence. For this misconduct, the court imposed sanctions, including an order to pay Klipsch the entire $2.7 million for its restorative discovery efforts. ePRO appealed.

Issue Was it appropriate to impose on ePRO the cost of Klipsch's corrective discovery efforts?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the imposition of the sanctions. "The district court's award properly reflects the additional costs ePRO imposed on its opponent by refusing to comply with its discovery obligations."

Reason ePRO failed to comply with its discovery obligations, which caused Klipsch to incur considerable additional expenses. A party's compliance with a discovery request is not optional. "The integrity of our civil litigation process requires that the parties . . . carry out their duties to maintain and disclose the relevant information in their possession in good faith." Discovery depends on the parties' voluntary preservation of evidence and disclosure of relevant information when asked. Noncompliance increases the cost of litigation. Discovery sanctions are appropriate to discourage delaying tactics and related misconduct. In this case, ePRO argued that the sanctions were "disproportionate." The court concluded, "The proportionality that matters here is that the amount of the sanctions was plainly proportionate—indeed, it was exactly equivalent—to the costs ePRO inflicted on Klipsch in its reasonable efforts to remedy ePRO's misconduct."

Critical Thinking

- Economic Should the cost of corrective discovery efforts be imposed on an uncooperative party if those efforts turn up nothing of real value to the case? Explain.
- Legal Environment Should it be inferred from a business's failure to keep backup copies of its database that the business must therefore have destroyed the data? Discuss.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4–4d Pretrial Conference

Either party or the court can request a pretrial conference, or hearing. Usually, the hearing consists of an informal discussion between the judge and the opposing attorneys after discovery has taken place. The purpose of the hearing is to explore the possibility of a settlement without a trial and, if this is not possible, to identify the matters that are in dispute and to plan the course of the trial.

4–4e Jury Selection

Know This

Picking the "right" jury is often an important aspect of litigation strategy, and a number of firms now specialize in jury-selection consulting services.

A trial can be held with or without a jury. The Seventh Amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees the right to a jury trial for cases in federal courts when the amount in controversy exceeds $20, but this guarantee does not apply to state courts. Most states have similar guarantees in their own constitutions (although the threshold dollar amount is higher than $20). The right to a trial by jury does not have to be exercised, and many cases are tried without a jury. In most states and in federal courts, one of the parties must request a jury in a civil case, or the judge presumes that the parties waive the right.

Before a jury trial commences, a jury must be selected. The jury selection process is known as voir dire.[20] During voir dire in most jurisdictions, attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant ask prospective jurors oral questions to determine whether a potential jury member is biased or has any connection with a party to the action or with a prospective witness. In some jurisdictions, the judge may do all or part of the questioning based on written questions submitted by counsel for the parties.

Voir Dire A part of the jury selection process in which the attorneys question prospective jurors about their backgrounds, attitudes, and biases to ascertain whether they can be impartial jurors.

During voir dire, a party may challenge a prospective juror peremptorily—that is, ask that an individual not be sworn in as a juror without providing any reason. Alternatively, a party may challenge a prospective juror for cause—that is, provide a reason why an individual should not be sworn in as a juror. If the judge grants the challenge, the individual is asked to step down. A prospective juror may not be excluded from the jury by the use of discriminatory challenges, such as those based on racial criteria or gender.

4–4f At the Trial

Once the trial begins, it follows the specific procedures discussed next.

Opening Arguments and Examination of Witnesses At the beginning of the trial, the attorneys present their opening arguments, setting forth the facts that they expect to prove during the trial. Then the plaintiff's case is presented. In our hypothetical case, Lisa's lawyer would introduce evidence (relevant documents, exhibits, and the testimony of witnesses) to support Lisa's position. The defendant has the opportunity to challenge any evidence introduced and to cross-examine any of the plaintiff's witnesses.

At the end of the plaintiff's case, the defendant's attorney has the opportunity to ask the judge to direct a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff has presented no evidence that would justify the granting of the plaintiff's remedy. This is called a motion for a directed verdict (known in federal courts as a motion for judgment as a matter of law).

Motion for a Directed Verdict A motion for the judge to take the decision out of the hands of the jury and to direct a verdict for the party making the motion on the ground that the other party has not produced sufficient evidence to support a claim.

If the motion is not granted (it seldom is granted), the defendant's attorney then presents the evidence and witnesses for the defendant's case. At the conclusion of the defendant's case, the defendant's attorney has another opportunity to make a motion for a directed verdict. The plaintiff's attorney can challenge any evidence introduced and cross-examine the defendant's witnesses.

20. Pronounced vwahr deehr.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Closing Arguments and Awards After the defense concludes its presentation, the attorneys present closing arguments supporting their clients. The judge instructs the jury in the law that applies to the case (these instructions are often called charges), and the jury retires to the jury room to deliberate a verdict. Typically, jurors are instructed that they must decide the case based only on the information that they learned during the trial.

In the Lisa-Kevin case, the jury will decide in favor of either the plaintiff or the defendant. In addition, if the jury finds for the plaintiff, it will decide on the amount of the award (the monetary compensation to be paid to her).

Award The monetary compensation given to a party at the end of a trial or other proceeding.

4–4g Posttrial Motions

After the jury has rendered its verdict, either party may make a posttrial motion. If Lisa wins and Kevin's attorney has previously moved for a directed verdict, Kevin's attorney may make a motion for judgment *n.o.v. (from the Latin non obstante veredicto, which means "notwithstanding the verdict"—called a motion for judgment as a matter of law in the federal courts). Such a motion will be granted only if the jury's verdict was unreasonable and erroneous. If the judge grants the motion, the jury's verdict will be set aside, and a judgment will be entered in favor of the opposite party (Kevin).

Motion for Judgment n.o.v. A motion requesting the court to grant judgment in favor of the party making the motion on the ground that the jury's verdict was unreasonable and erroneous.

Alternatively, Kevin could make a motion for a new trial, asking the judge to set aside the adverse verdict and to hold a new trial. The motion will be granted if, after looking at all the evidence, the judge is convinced that the jury was in error but does not feel that it is appropriate to grant judgment for the other side. A judge can also grant a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence, misconduct by the participants or the jury during the trial, or error by the judge.

Motion for a New Trial A motion asserting that the trial was so fundamentally flawed (because of error, newly discovered evidence, prejudice, or another reason) that a new trial is necessary to prevent a miscarriage of justice.

4–4h The Appeal

Assume here that any posttrial motion is denied and that Kevin appeals the case. (If Lisa wins but receives a smaller monetary award than she sought, she can appeal also.) Keep in mind, though, that a party cannot appeal a trial court's decision simply because of dissatisfaction with the outcome of the trial. A party must have legitimate grounds to file an appeal. In other words, the party must have a valid claim that the lower court committed an error. If Kevin has grounds to appeal the case, a notice of appeal must be filed with the clerk of the trial court within a prescribed time. Kevin now becomes the appellant, or petitioner, and Lisa becomes the appellee, or respondent.

Filing the Appeal Kevin's attorney files the record on appeal with the appellate court. The record includes the pleadings, the trial transcript, the judge's rulings on motions made by the parties, and other trial-related documents. Kevin's attorney will also provide the reviewing court with a brief. The brief is a formal legal document outlining the facts and issues of the case, the judge's rulings or jury's findings that should be reversed or modified, the applicable law, and arguments on Kevin's behalf (citing applicable statutes and relevant cases as precedents).

Brief A written summary or statement prepared by one side in a lawsuit to explain its case to the judge.

Lisa's attorney will file an answering brief. Kevin's attorney can file a reply to Lisa's brief, although it is not required. The reviewing court then considers the case.

Appellate Review As explained earlier, a court of appeals does not hear evidence. Instead, the court reviews the record for errors of law. Its decision concerning a case is based on the record on appeal and the attorneys' briefs. The attorneys can present oral arguments, after which the case is taken under advisement.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

After reviewing a case, an appellate court has the following options:

1. The court can affirm the trial court's decision.
2. The court can reverse the trial court's judgment if it concludes that the trial court erred or that the jury did not receive proper instructions.
3. The appellate court can remand (send back) the case to the trial court for further proceedings consistent with its opinion on the matter.
4. The court might also affirm or reverse a decision in part. For instance, the court might affirm the jury's finding that Kevin was negligent but remand the case for further proceedings on another issue (such as the extent of Lisa's damages).
5. An appellate court can also modify a lower court's decision. If the appellate court decides that the jury awarded an excessive amount in damages, for instance, the court might reduce the award to a more appropriate, or fairer, amount.

thepixelchef/E+/Getty Images

Do parties to a trial decision always have a right to appeal that decision?

Appeal to a Higher Appellate Court If the reviewing court is an intermediate appellate court, the losing party may decide to appeal to the state supreme court (the highest state court). Such a petition corresponds to a petition for a writ of certiorari from the United States Supreme Court. Although the losing party has a right to ask (petition) a higher court to review the case, the party does not have a right to have the case heard by the higher appellate court.

Appellate courts normally have discretionary power and can accept or reject an appeal. Like the United States Supreme Court, state supreme courts generally deny most appeals. If the appeal is granted, new briefs must be filed before the state supreme court, and the attorneys may be allowed or requested to present oral arguments. Like the intermediate appellate court, the supreme court may reverse or affirm the appellate court's decision or remand the case. At this point, the case typically has reached its end (unless a federal question is at issue and one of the parties has legitimate grounds to seek review by a federal appellate court).

4–4i Enforcing the Judgment

The uncertainties of the litigation process are compounded by the lack of guarantees that any judgment will be enforceable. Even if a plaintiff wins an award of damages in court, the defendant may not have sufficient assets or insurance to cover that amount. Usually, one of the factors considered before a lawsuit is initiated is whether the defendant will be able to pay the damages sought, should the plaintiff win the case.

4–5 Courts Online

Most courts today have websites. Of course, each court decides what to make available at its site. Some courts display only the names of court personnel and office phone numbers. Others add court rules and forms. Many appellate court sites include judicial decisions, although the decisions may remain online for only a limited time. In addition, in some states, including California and Florida, court clerks offer information about the court's docket (its schedule of cases to be heard) and other searchable databases online.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Docket The list of cases entered on a court's calendar and thus scheduled to be heard by the court.

Appellate court decisions are often posted online immediately after they are rendered. Recent decisions of the U.S. courts of appeals, for instance, are available online at their websites. The United States Supreme Court also has an official website and publishes its opinions there immediately after they are announced to the public. In fact, even decisions that are designated as "unpublished" opinions by the appellate courts are usually published (posted) online.

Focus Question 5

What is an electronic court filing system?

4–5a Electronic Filing

A number of state and federal courts allow parties to file litigation-related documents with the courts via the Internet or other electronic means. In fact, the federal court system has implemented its electronic filing system, Case Management/Electronic Case Files (CM/ECF), in nearly all federal courts. The system is available in federal district, appellate, and bankruptcy courts, as well as the U.S. Court of International Trade and the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. More than 41 million cases are on the CM/ECF system. Access to the electronic documents filed on CM/ECF is available through a system called PACER (Public Access to Court Electronic Records), which is a service of the U.S. courts.

A majority of the states have some form of electronic filing, although often it is not yet available in state appellate courts. Some states, including Arizona, California, Colorado, Delaware, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, and Nevada, offer statewide e-filing systems. Generally, when electronic filing is made available, it is optional. Nonetheless, some state courts have now made e-filing mandatory in certain types of disputes, such as complex civil litigation.

4–5b Cyber Courts and Proceedings

Eventually, litigants may be able to use cyber courts, in which judicial proceedings take place only on the Internet. The parties to a case could meet online to make their arguments and present their evidence. Cyber proceedings might use e-mail submissions, video cameras, designated chat rooms, closed sites, or other Internet facilities. The promise of these virtual proceedings is greater efficiency and lower costs.

Electronic courtroom projects have already been developed in some federal and state courts. The state of Michigan has cyber courts that hear cases involving technology issues and high-tech businesses. Other states that have introduced cyber courts include California, Delaware, Louisiana, and North Carolina. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure also authorize video conferencing, and some federal bankruptcy courts offer online chatting at their websites.

4–6 Alternative Dispute Resolution

Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) The resolution of disputes in ways other than those involved in the traditional judicial process, such as negotiation, mediation, and arbitration.

Litigation is expensive. It is also time consuming. Because of the backlog of cases pending in many courts, several years may pass before a case is actually tried. For these and other reasons, more and more businesspersons are turning to alternative dispute resolution (ADR) as a means of settling their disputes.

The great advantage of ADR is its flexibility. Methods of ADR range from the parties sitting down together and attempting to work out their differences to multinational corporations agreeing to resolve a dispute through a formal hearing before a panel of experts. Normally, the parties themselves can control how they will attempt to settle their dispute, what procedures will be used, whether a neutral third party will be present or make a decision, and whether that decision will be legally binding or nonbinding.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Today, more than 90 percent of cases filed with the courts are settled before trial through some form of ADR. Indeed, most states either require or encourage parties to undertake ADR prior to trial. Many federal courts have instituted ADR programs as well.

4–6a Negotiation

The simplest form of ADR is negotiation, in which the parties attempt to settle their dispute informally, with or without attorneys to represent them. Attorneys frequently advise their clients to negotiate a settlement voluntarily before they proceed to trial. Parties may even try to negotiate a settlement during a trial or after the trial but before an appeal.

Negotiation A process in which parties attempt to settle their dispute informally, with or without attorneys to represent them.

Negotiation traditionally involves just the parties themselves and (if attorneys are involved) their attorneys. The attorneys still act as advocates—they are obligated to put their clients' interests first. In contrast, other forms of ADR typically also involve neutral third parties.

4–6b Mediation

In mediation, a neutral third party acts as a mediator and works with both sides in the dispute to facilitate a resolution. The mediator talks with the parties separately as well as jointly and emphasizes their points of agreement in an attempt to help them evaluate their options. Although mediators may propose a solution (called a mediator's proposal), they do not make a decision resolving the matter. States that require parties to undergo ADR before trial often offer mediation as one of the ADR options or (as in Florida) the only option.

Mediation A method of settling disputes outside the courts by using the services of a neutral third party, who acts as a communicating agent between the parties and assists them in negotiating a settlement.

One of the biggest advantages of mediation is that it is not as adversarial as litigation. In a trial, the parties "do battle" with each other in the courtroom, trying to prove each other wrong, while the judge is usually a passive observer. In mediation, the mediator takes an active role and attempts to bring the parties together so that they can come to a mutually satisfactory resolution. The mediation process tends to reduce the hostility between the disputants, allowing them to resume their former relationship without bad feelings. For this reason, mediation is often the preferred form of ADR for disputes involving business partners, employers and employees, or other parties involved in long-term relationships.

Example 4.12 Two business partners, Mark and Charles, have a dispute over how the profits of their firm should be distributed. If the dispute is litigated, Mark and Charles will be adversaries, and their respective attorneys will emphasize how the parties' positions differ, not what they have in common. In contrast, if the dispute is mediated, the mediator will emphasize the common ground shared by Mark and Charles and help them work toward agreement. The two men can work out the distribution of profits without damaging their continuing relationship as partners.

Focus Question 6

What are three alternative methods of resolving disputes?

4–6c Arbitration

In arbitration, a more formal method of ADR, an arbitrator (a neutral third party or a panel of experts) hears a dispute and imposes a resolution on the parties. Arbitration differs from other forms of ADR in that the third party hearing the dispute makes a decision for the parties. Exhibit 4–4 outlines the basic differences among the three traditional forms of ADR.

Arbitration The settling of a dispute by submitting it to a disinterested third party (other than a court), who renders a decision.

Usually, the parties in arbitration agree that the third party's decision will be legally binding, although the parties can also agree to nonbinding arbitration. (Arbitration that is mandated by the courts often is nonbinding.) In nonbinding arbitration, the parties can go forward with a lawsuit if they do not agree with the arbitrator's decision.

In some respects, formal arbitration resembles a trial, although usually the procedural rules are much less restrictive than those governing litigation. In the typical arbitration, the parties present opening arguments and ask for specific remedies. Both sides present evidence and may call and examine witnesses. The arbitrator then renders a decision.

KLH49/E+/Getty Images

What are the steps in a typical arbitration proceeding?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 4-4 Basic Differences in the Traditional Forms of ADR

	Type of ADR
	Negotiation	Mediation	Arbitration
Description	Parties meet informally with or without their attorneys and attempt to agree on a resolution. This is the simplest and least expensive method of ADR.	A neutral third party meets with the parties and emphasizes points of agreement to bring them toward resolution of their dispute, reducing hostility between the parties.	The parties present their arguments and evidence before an arbitrator at a formal hearing. The arbitrator renders a decision to resolve the parties' dispute.
Neutral Third Party Present?	No	Yes	Yes
Who Decides the Resolution?	The parties themselves reach a resolution.	The parties, but the mediator may suggest or propose a resolution.	The arbitrator imposes a resolution on the parties that may be either binding or nonbinding.

The Arbitrator's Decision The arbitrator's decision is called an award. It is usually the final word on the matter. Although the parties may appeal an arbitrator's decision, a court's review of the decision will be much more restricted in scope than an appellate court's review of a trial court's decision. The general view is that because the parties were free to frame the issues and set the powers of the arbitrator at the outset, they cannot complain about the results. A court will set aside an award only in the event of one of the following:

1. The arbitrator's conduct or "bad faith" substantially prejudiced the rights of one of the parties.
2. The award violates an established public policy.
3. The arbitrator arbitrated issues that the parties did not agree to submit to arbitration.

Arbitration Clause A clause in a contract that provides that, in the event of a dispute, the parties will submit the dispute to arbitration rather than litigate the dispute in court.

Arbitration Clauses Just about any commercial matter can be submitted to arbitration. Parties can agree to arbitrate a dispute after it arises. Frequently, though, parties include an arbitration clause in a contract. The clause provides that any dispute that arises under the contract will be resolved through arbitration rather than through the court system.

Arbitration Statutes Most states have statutes (often based in part on the Uniform Arbitration Act) under which arbitration clauses will be enforced. Some state statutes compel arbitration of certain types of disputes, such as those involving public employees.

At the federal level, the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA) enforces arbitration clauses in contracts involving maritime activity and interstate commerce (though its applicability to employment contracts has been controversial, as discussed shortly). Because of the breadth of the commerce clause, arbitration agreements involving transactions only slightly connected to the flow of interstate commerce may fall under the FAA.

Case Example 4.13 Cable subscribers sued Cox Communications, Inc., in federal court. They claimed that Cox had violated antitrust law by tying premium cable service to the rental of set-top cable boxes. Cox filed a motion to compel arbitration based on an agreement it had sent to its subscribers. A district court granted the motion to compel, and the subscribers appealed. A federal appellate court affirmed, based on the Federal Arbitration Act. The subscribers' antitrust claims fell within the scope of the arbitration agreement.[21]

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Issue of Arbitrability The terms of an arbitration agreement can limit the types of disputes that the parties agree to arbitrate. Disputes can arise, however, when the parties do not specify limits or when the parties disagree on whether a particular matter is covered by their arbitration agreement.

When one party files a lawsuit to compel arbitration, it is up to the court to resolve the issue of arbitrability. That is, the court must decide whether the matter is one that must be resolved through arbitration. If the court finds that the subject matter in controversy is covered by the agreement to arbitrate, then it may compel arbitration. Usually, a court will allow the claim to be arbitrated if the court finds that the relevant statute (the state arbitration statute or the FAA) does not exclude such claims.

No party, however, will be ordered to submit a particular dispute to arbitration unless the court is convinced that the party has consented to do so. Additionally, the courts will not compel arbitration if it is clear that the arbitration rules and procedures are inherently unfair to one of the parties. (This chapter's Business Web Log feature deals with an arbitration clause Samsung sought to impose on buyers of its smartphones.)

21. In re Cox Enterprises, Inc. Set-top Cable Television Box Antitrust Litigation, 835 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2016).

Samsung and Forced Arbitration

Samsung, like other smartphone manufacturers, does not want to go to court to address every consumer complaint. Consequently, in each new smartphone box, it includes a Product Safety & Warranty Information brochure containing the following statement:

> ALL DISPUTES WITH SAMSUNG ARISING IN ANY WAY FROM THIS LIMITED WARRANTY OR THE SALE, CONDITION, OR PERFORMANCE OF THE PRODUCTS SHALL BE RESOLVED EXCLUSIVELY THROUGH FINAL AND BINDING ARBITRATION, AND NOT BY A COURT OR JURY.

In the same 101-page brochure, Samsung explains the procedures for arbitration and notes that purchasers can opt out of the arbitration agreement by calling a toll-free number or sending an e-mail within thirty days of purchase. The lead plaintiff in what became a class-action suit against Samsung did not take any steps to opt out.

The class-action suit alleged that the company misrepresented its smartphone's storage capacity and "rigged the phone to operate at a higher speed when it was being tested." Samsung moved to compel arbitration by invoking the arbitration provision in its Product Safety & Warranty Information brochure. A federal district court denied Samsung's motion to compel arbitration. On appeal, the trial court's reasoning was accepted. There was no evidence that the plaintiff had expressly agreed to submit to arbitration. The mere fact that an arbitration clause was included in the Product Safety & Warranty Information brochure did not create a binding contract between the plaintiff and Samsung. Further, even though the plaintiff had signed a Customer Agreement with the seller of the smartphone (Verizon Wireless), Samsung was not a signatory to that agreement.[a]

a. Norcia v. Samsung Telecommunications America, LLC, 845 F.3d 1279 (9th Cir. 2017).

Key Point

It is understandable that companies wish to avoid the high cost of going to court for every customer grievance. Binding arbitration offers businesses numerous advantages over litigation. A business must be certain, though, that a binding arbitration requirement is part of an actual contractual agreement between the business and its customers. Placing an arbitration clause, even in all capital letters, in a multi-page document that customers may never read is usually not sufficient.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Leszek Kobusinski/Shutterstock.com

Why would corporations such as Samsung want to settle disputes with consumers through arbitration rather than going to court?

Mandatory Arbitration in the Employment Context A significant question for businesspersons concerns mandatory arbitration clauses in employment contracts. Many employees claim they are at a disadvantage when they are forced, as a condition of being hired, to agree to arbitrate all disputes and thus waive their rights under statutes designed to protect employees. The United States Supreme Court, however, has held that mandatory arbitration clauses in employment contracts are generally enforceable.

Classic Case Example 4.14 In a landmark decision, Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp.,[22] the Supreme Court held that a claim brought under a federal statute prohibiting age discrimination could be subject to arbitration. The Court concluded that the employee had waived his right to sue when he agreed, as part of a required registration application to be a securities representative with the New York Stock Exchange, to arbitrate "any dispute, claim, or controversy" relating to his employment.

Since the Gilmer decision, some courts have refused to enforce one-sided arbitration clauses. Nevertheless, the policy favoring enforcement of mandatory arbitration agreements remains strong.[23]

4–6d Other Types of ADR

The three forms of ADR just discussed are the oldest and traditionally the most commonly used. In addition, a variety of newer types of ADR have emerged, including those described here.

1. In early neutral case evaluation, the parties select a neutral third party (generally an expert in the subject matter of the dispute) and then explain their respective positions to that person. The case evaluator assesses the strengths and weaknesses of each party's claims.
2. In a mini-trial, each party's attorney briefly argues the party's case before the other party and a panel of representatives from each side who have the authority to settle the dispute. Typically, a neutral third party (usually an expert in the area being disputed) acts as an adviser. If the parties fail to reach an agreement, the adviser renders an opinion as to how a court would likely decide the issue.
3. Numerous federal courts now hold summary jury trials (SJTs), in which the parties present their arguments and evidence and the jury renders a verdict. The jury's verdict is not binding, but it does act as a guide to both sides in reaching an agreement during the mandatory negotiations that immediately follow the trial.

Summary Jury Trial (SJT) A method of settling disputes by holding a trial in which the jury's verdict is not binding but instead guides the parties toward reaching an agreement during the mandatory negotiations that immediately follow.

4–6e Providers of ADR Services

ADR services are provided by both government agencies and private organizations. A major provider of ADR services is the American Arbitration Association (AAA), which handles more than 200,000 claims a year in its numerous offices worldwide. Most of the largest U.S. law firms are members of this nonprofit association. Cases brought before the AAA are heard by an expert or a panel of experts in the area relating to the dispute and are usually settled quickly. The AAA has a special team devoted to resolving large, complex disputes across a wide range of industries.

Hundreds of for-profit firms around the country also provide various dispute-resolution services. Typically, these firms hire retired judges to conduct arbitration hearings or otherwise assist parties in settling their disputes. The judges follow procedures similar to those of the federal courts and use similar rules. Usually, each party to the dispute pays a filing fee and a designated fee for a hearing session or conference.

22. 500 U.S. 20, 111 S.Ct. 1647, 114 L.Ed.2d 26 (1991).

23. See, for example, Cruise v. Kroger Co., 233 Cal.App.4th 390, 193 Cal.Rptr.3d 17 (2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4–6f Online Dispute Resolution

An increasing number of companies and organizations offer dispute-resolution services using the Internet. The settlement of disputes in these online forums is known as online dispute resolution (ODR). The disputes have most commonly involved disagreements over the rights to domain names or over the quality of goods sold via the Internet, including goods sold through Internet auction sites.

Online Dispute Resolution (ODR) The resolution of disputes with the assistance of organizations that offer dispute-resolution services via the Internet.

Rules being developed in online forums may ultimately become a code of conduct for everyone who does business in cyberspace. Most online forums do not automatically apply the law of any specific jurisdiction. Instead, results are often based on general, universal legal principles. As with most offline methods of dispute resolution, any party may appeal to a court at any time.

ODR may be best suited for resolving small- to medium-sized business liability claims, which may not be worth the expense of litigation or traditional ADR. In addition, some local governments are using ODR to resolve claims. Example 4.15 New York City has used Cybersettle.com to resolve auto accident, sidewalk, and other personal-injury claims made against the city. Parties with complaints submit their demands, and the city submits its offers confidentially online. If an offer exceeds a demand, the claimant keeps half the difference as a bonus. ■

Practice and Review

Stan Garner resides in Illinois and promotes boxing matches for SuperSports, Inc., an Illinois corporation. Garner created the promotional concept of the "Ages" fights—a series of three boxing matches pitting an older fighter (George Foreman) against a younger fighter, such as John Ruiz or Riddick Bowe. The concept included titles for each of the three fights ("Challenge of the Ages," "Battle of the Ages," and "Fight of the Ages"), as well as promotional epithets to characterize the two fighters ("the Foreman Factor").

Garner contacted George Foreman and his manager, who both reside in Texas, to sell the idea, and they arranged a meeting at Caesar's Palace in Las Vegas, Nevada. At some point in the negotiations, Foreman's manager signed a nondisclosure agreement prohibiting him from disclosing Garner's promotional concepts unless they signed a contract. Nevertheless, after negotiations between Garner and Foreman fell through, Foreman used Garner's "Battle of the Ages" concept to promote a subsequent fight. Garner filed a lawsuit against Foreman and his manager in a federal district court in Illinois, alleging breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. On what basis might the federal district court in Illinois exercise jurisdiction in this case?
2. Does the federal district court have original or appellate jurisdiction?
3. Suppose that Garner had filed his action in an Illinois state court. Could an Illinois state court have exercised personal jurisdiction over Foreman or his manager? Why or why not?
4. What if Garner had filed his action in a Nevada state court? Would that court have had personal jurisdiction over Foreman or his manager? Explain.

Debate This

In this age of the Internet, when people communicate via e-mail, tweets, social media, and Skype, is the concept of jurisdiction losing its meaning?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

alternative dispute resolution (ADR) 108 answer 100 arbitration 109 arbitration clause 110 award 106 bankruptcy court 89 brief 106 complaint 98 concurrent jurisdiction 90 counterclaim 100 default judgment 98 deposition 102 discovery 101 diversity of citizenship 89 docket 108
e-evidence 103 exclusive jurisdiction 90 federal question 89 interrogatories 102 judicial review 89 jurisdiction 87
justiciable controversy 93 litigation 98 long arm statute 87 mediation 109
metadata 103
motion for a directed verdict 105 motion for a new trial 106 motion for judgment n.o.v. 101 motion for judgment on the pleadings 101 motion for summary judgment 101 motion to dismiss 100 negotiation 109 online dispute resolution (ODR) 113 pleadings 98 probate court 88 question of fact 95 question of law 95 reply 100 rule of four 97 service of process 98 small claims court 94 standing to sue 93 summary jury trial (SJT) 112 summons 98 venue 92
voir dire 105
writ of certiorari 97

Chapter Summary: Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

The Judiciary's Role in American Government	The role of the judiciary—the courts—in the American governmental system is to interpret and apply the law. Through the process of judicial review—determining the constitutionality of laws—the judicial branch acts as a check on the executive and legislative branches of government.
Basic Judicial Requirements	1. Jurisdiction—Before a court can hear a case, it must have jurisdiction over the person against whom the suit is brought or the property involved in the suit, as well as jurisdiction over the subject matter. a. Limited versus general jurisdiction—Limited jurisdiction exists when a court is limited to specific subject matter, such as probate or divorce. General jurisdiction exists when a court can hear any kind of case. b. Original versus appellate jurisdiction—Original jurisdiction exists when courts have authority to hear a case for the first time (trial courts). Appellate jurisdiction is exercised by courts of appeals, or reviewing courts, which generally do not have original jurisdiction. c. Federal jurisdiction—Arises (1) when a federal question is involved (when the plaintiff's cause of action is based, at least in part, on the U.S. Constitution, a treaty, or a federal law), or (2) when a case involves diversity of citizenship (citizens of different states, for example) and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. d. Concurrent versus exclusive jurisdiction—Concurrent jurisdiction exists when both federal and state courts have authority to hear the same case. Exclusive jurisdiction exists when only state courts or only federal courts have authority to hear a case. 2. Jurisdiction in cyberspace—Because the Internet does not have physical boundaries, traditional jurisdictional concepts have been difficult to apply in cases involving activities conducted via the Web. Gradually, the courts are developing standards to use in determining when jurisdiction over an Internet business operator located in another state (or even another country) is proper. 3. Venue—Venue has to do with the most appropriate location for a trial, which is usually the geographic area where the event leading to the dispute took place or where the parties reside. 4. Standing to sue—A requirement that a party must have a legally protected interest at stake sufficient to justify seeking relief through the court system. The controversy at issue must also be a justiciable controversy—one that is real and substantial, as opposed to hypothetical or academic.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The State and Federal Court Systems

1. Trial courts—Courts of original jurisdiction, in which legal actions are initiated.
   a. State—Courts of general jurisdiction can hear any case. Courts of limited jurisdiction include domestic relations courts, probate courts, traffic courts, and small claims courts.
   b. Federal—The federal district court is the equivalent of the state trial court of general jurisdiction. Federal courts of limited jurisdiction include the U.S. Tax Court, the U.S. Bankruptcy Court, and the U.S. Court of Federal Claims.
2. Appellate courts—Courts of appeals, or reviewing courts, which generally do not have original jurisdiction. Every state has at least one court of appeals, and many have intermediate appellate courts. In the federal court system, the U.S. circuit courts of appeals are the intermediate appellate courts.
3. Supreme (highest) courts—Each state has a supreme court, although it may be called by some other name. Appeal from the state supreme court to the United States Supreme Court is possible only if the case involves a federal question. As the highest court in the federal court system, the United States Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the U.S. Constitution and federal law.

Following a State Court Case

Rules of procedure prescribe the way in which disputes are handled in the courts. Rules differ from court to court, and separate sets of rules exist for federal and state courts, as well as for criminal and civil cases. A civil court case in a state court would involve the following procedures:

1. The pleadings—
   a. Complaint—Filed by the plaintiff with the court to initiate the lawsuit. The complaint is served with a summons on the defendant.
   b. Answer—A response to the complaint in which the defendant admits or denies the allegations made by the plaintiff. The answer may assert a counterclaim or an affirmative defense.
   c. Motion to dismiss—A request to the court to dismiss the case for stated reasons, such as the plaintiff's failure to state a claim for which relief can be granted.
2. Pretrial motions (in addition to the motion to dismiss)—
   a. Motion for judgment on the pleadings—May be made by either party. It will be granted if the parties agree on the facts and the only question is how the law applies to the facts. The judge bases the decision solely on the pleadings.
   b. Motion for summary judgment—May be made by either party. It will be granted if the parties agree on the facts and the sole question is a question of law. The judge can consider evidence outside the pleadings when evaluating the motion.
3. Discovery—The process of gathering evidence concerning the case and obtaining information from the opposing party. Discovery involves depositions (sworn testimony by a party to the lawsuit or any witness), interrogatories (written questions and answers to these questions made by parties to the action with the aid of their attorneys), and various requests (for admissions, documents, and medical examinations, for instance). Discovery may also involve electronically recorded information, such as e-mail, voice mail, social media posts, and other data compilations. Although electronic discovery has significant advantages over paper discovery, it is also more time consuming and expensive and often requires the parties to hire experts.
4. Pretrial conference—Either party or the court can request a pretrial conference to identify the matters in dispute after discovery has taken place and to plan the course of the trial. Also, the conference may explore the possibility of a settlement without a trial.
5. Trial—Following jury selection (voir dire), the trial begins with opening statements from both parties' attorneys. The following events then occur:
   a. The plaintiff's introduction of evidence (including the testimony of witnesses) supporting the plaintiff's position. The defendant's attorney can challenge evidence and cross-examine witnesses.
   b. The defendant's introduction of evidence (including the testimony of witnesses) supporting the defendant's position. The plaintiff's attorney can challenge evidence and cross-examine witnesses.
   c. Closing arguments by the attorneys in favor of their respective clients, the judge's instructions to the jury, and the jury's verdict.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

	6. Posttrial motions— a. Motion for judgment n.o.v. ("notwithstanding the verdict")—Will be granted if the judge is convinced that the jury's verdict was in error. b. Motion for a new trial—Will be granted if the judge is convinced that the jury's verdict was in error. The motion can also be granted on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, misconduct by the participants during the trial, or error by the judge. 7. Appeal—Either party can appeal the trial court's judgment to an appropriate court of appeals. After reviewing the record on appeal, the abstracts, and the attorneys' briefs, the appellate court holds a hearing and renders its opinion.
Courts Online	Almost every court has a website offering information about the court and its procedures, and increasingly courts are publishing their opinions online. In the future, we may see cyber courts, in which all trial proceedings are conducted online. A number of state and federal courts allow parties to file litigation-related documents with the courts via the Internet or other electronic means. Nearly all of the federal appellate courts and bankruptcy courts and a majority of the federal district courts have implemented electronic filing systems.
Alternative Dispute Resolution	1. Negotiation—The parties come together, with or without attorneys to represent them, to try to reach a settlement without the involvement of a third party. 2. Mediation—The parties themselves reach an agreement with the help of a neutral third party, called a mediator. The mediator may propose a solution but does not make a decision resolving the matter. 3. Arbitration—The parties submit their dispute to a neutral third party, the arbitrator, who renders a decision. The decision may or may not be legally binding, depending on the circumstances. 4. Other types of ADR—These include early neutral case evaluation, mini-trials, and summary jury trials (SJTs). 5. Providers of ADR services—The leading nonprofit provider of ADR services is the American Arbitration Association. Hundreds of for-profit firms also provide ADR services. 6. Online dispute resolution—A number of organizations and firms are now offering negotiation, mediation, and arbitration services through online forums. These forums have been a practical alternative for the resolution of domain name disputes and e-commerce disputes in which the amount in controversy is relatively small.

Issue Spotters

1. At the trial, after Sue calls her witnesses, offers her evidence, and otherwise presents her side of the case, Tom has at least two choices between courses of action. Tom can call his first witness. What else might he do? (See Following a State Court Case.)
2. Lexi contracts with Theo to deliver a quantity of computers to Lexi's Computer Store. They disagree over the amount, the delivery date, the price, and the quality. Lexi files a suit against Theo in a state court. Their state requires that their dispute be submitted to mediation or nonbinding arbitration. If the dispute is not resolved, or if either party disagrees with the decision of the mediator or arbitrator, will a court hear the case? Explain. (See Alternative Dispute Resolution.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

4–1. Standing to Sue. Jack and Maggie Turton bought a house in Jefferson County, Idaho, located directly across the street from a gravel pit. A few years later, the county converted the pit to a landfill. The landfill accepted many kinds of trash that cause harm to the environment, including major appliances, animal carcasses, containers with hazardous content warnings, leaking car batteries, and waste oil. The Turtons complained to the county, but the county did nothing. The Turtons then filed a lawsuit against the county alleging violations of federal environmental laws pertaining to groundwater contamination and other pollution. Do the Turtons have standing to sue? Why or why not? (See Basic Judicial Requirements.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4–2. Discovery. Advance Technology Consultants, Inc. (ATC), contracted with RoadTrac, LLC, to provide software and client software systems for products using global positioning satellite (GPS) technology being developed by RoadTrac. RoadTrac agreed to provide ATC with hardware with which ATC's software would interface. Problems soon arose, however, and RoadTrac filed a lawsuit against ATC alleging breach of contract. During discovery, RoadTrac requested ATC's customer lists and marketing procedures. ATC objected to providing this information because RoadTrac and ATC had become competitors in the GPS industry. Should a party to a lawsuit have to hand over its confidential business secrets as part of a discovery request? Why or why not? What limitations might a court consider imposing before requiring ATC to produce this material? (See Following a State Court Case.)

4–3. Arbitration. Horton Automatics and the Industrial Division of the Communications Workers of America—the union that represented Horton's workers—negotiated a collective bargaining agreement. If an employee's discharge for a workplace-rule violation was submitted to arbitration, the agreement limited the arbitrator to determining whether the rule was reasonable and whether the employee had violated it. When Horton discharged its employee Ruben de la Garza, the union appealed to arbitration. The arbitrator found that de la Garza had violated a reasonable safety rule, but "was not totally convinced" that Horton should have treated the violation more seriously than other rule violations. The arbitrator ordered de la Garza reinstated to his job. Can a court set aside this order from the arbitrator? Explain. [Horton Automatics v. The Industrial Division of the Communications Workers of America, AFL-CIO, 506 Fed. Appx. 253 (5th Cir. 2013)] (See Alternative Dispute Resolution.)

4–4. Discovery. Jessica Lester died from injuries suffered in an auto accident caused by the driver of a truck owned by Allied Concrete Co. Jessica's widower, Isaiah, filed a suit against Allied for damages. The defendant requested copies of all of Isaiah's Facebook photos and other postings. Before responding, Isaiah "cleaned up" his Facebook page. Allied suspected that some of the items had been deleted, including a photo of Isaiah holding a beer can while wearing a T-shirt that declared "I [heart] hotmoms." Can this material be recovered? If so, how? What effect might Isaiah's "misconduct" have on the result in this case? Discuss. [Allied Concrete Co. v. Lester, 736 S.E.2d 699 (Va. 2013)] (See Following a State Court Case.)

4–5. Electronic Filing. Betsy Faden worked for the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. Faden was removed from her position in April 2012 and was given until May 29 to appeal the removal decision. She submitted an appeal through the Merit Systems Protection Board's e-filing system seven days after the deadline. Ordered to show good cause for the delay, Faden testified that she had attempted to e-file the appeal while the board's system was down. The board acknowledged that its system had not been functioning on May 27, 28, and 29. Was Faden sufficiently diligent in ensuring a timely filing? Discuss. [Faden v. Merit Systems Protection Board, 553 Fed.Appx. 991 (Fed. Cir. 2014)] (See Courts Online.)

4–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Corporate Contacts. LG Electronics, Inc., a South Korean company, and nineteen other foreign companies participated in the global market for cathode ray tube (CRT) products. CRTs were components in consumer goods, including television sets, and sold for many years in high volume in the United States, including the state of Washington. The state filed a suit against LG and the others, alleging a conspiracy to raise prices and set production levels in the market for CRTs in violation of a state consumer protection statute. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss the suit for lack of personal jurisdiction. Should this motion be granted? Explain your answer. [State of Washington v. LG Electronics, Inc., 185 Wash. App. 394, 341 P.3d 346 (2015)] (See Basic Judicial Requirements.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 4–6, go to Appendix E.

4–7. Appellate, or Reviewing, Courts. Angelica Westbrook was employed as a collector for Franklin Collection Service, Inc. During a collection call, Westbrook told a debtor that a $15 processing fee was an "interest" charge. This violated company policy, and Westbrook was fired. She filed a claim for unemployment benefits, which the Mississippi Department of Employment Security (MDES) approved. Franklin objected. At an MDES hearing, a Franklin supervisor testified that she had heard Westbrook make the false statement, although she admitted that there had been no similar incidents with Westbrook. Westbrook denied making the statement but added that, if she had said it, she did not remember it. The agency found that Franklin's reason for terminating Westbrook did not amount to the misconduct required to disqualify her for benefits and upheld the approval. Franklin appealed to a state intermediate appellate court. Is the court likely to uphold the agency's findings of fact? Explain. [Franklin Collection Service, Inc. v. Mississippi Department of Employment Security, 184 So.3d 330 (Miss.App. 2016)] (See The State and Federal Court Systems.)

4–8. Service of Process. Bentley Bay Retail, LLC, filed a suit in a Florida state court against Soho Bay Restaurant LLC, and its corporate officers, Luiz and Karine Queiroz, in their individual capacities. The charge against the Queirozes was for a breach of their personal guaranty for Soho Bay's debt to Bentley Bay. The plaintiff filed notices with the court to depose the Queirozes, who reside in Brazil. The Queirozes argued that they could not be deposed in Brazil. The court ordered them to appear in Florida to provide depositions in their corporate capacity. Witnesses appearing in court outside the jurisdiction of their residence are immune from service of process while in court.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

On the Queirozes' appearance in Florida, can they be served with process in their individual capacities? Explain. [Queiroz v. Bentley Bay Retail, LLC, 43 Fla.L.Weekly D85, 27 So.3d 1108 (3 Dist. 2018)] (See The State and Federal Court Systems.)

4–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Complaints. John Verble worked as a financial advisor for Morgan Stanley Smith Barney, LLC. After nearly seven years, Verble was fired. He filed a suit in a federal district court against his ex-employer. In his complaint, Verble alleged that he had learned of illegal activity by Morgan Stanley and its clients. He claimed that he had reported the activity to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and that he was fired in retaliation. His complaint contained no additional facts. [Verble v. Morgan Stanley Smith Barney LLC, 676 Fed.Appx. 421 (6th Cir. 2017)] (See Following a State Court Case.)

1. To avoid a dismissal of his suit, does Verble have a legal obligation to support his claims with more facts? Explain.
2. Does Verble owe an ethical duty to back up his claims with more facts? Use the IDDR approach to express your answer.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

4–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Access to Courts. Assume that a statute in your state requires that all civil lawsuits involving damages of less than $50,000 be arbitrated. Such a case can be tried in court only if a party is dissatisfied with the arbitrator's decision. The statute also provides that if a trial does not result in an improvement of more than 10 percent in the position of the party who demanded the trial, that party must pay the entire cost of the arbitration proceeding. (See Alternative Dispute Resolution.)

1. One group will argue that the state statute violates litigants' rights of access to the courts and trial by jury.
2. Another group will argue that the statute does not violate litigants' right of access to the courts.
3. A third group will evaluate how the determination on right of access would be changed if the statute was part of a pilot program that affected only a few judicial districts in the state.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Pixels/Shutterstock.com

Tort Law

5

"Two wrongs do not make a right."

English Proverb

Most of us agree with the chapter-opening quotation—two wrongs do not make a right. In this chapter, we consider a particular type of wrongful action called a tort (the word tort is French for "wrong").

Part of doing business today—and indeed, part of everyday life—is the risk of being involved in a lawsuit. The list of circumstances in which businesspersons can be sued is long and varied. Anytime one party's allegedly wrongful conduct causes injury to another, an action may arise under the law of torts. Through tort law, society compensates those who have suffered injuries as a result of the wrongful conduct of others.

The Apogee Health Center provides plant-based supplements and pharmaceuticals. It has just developed a cannabidiol (CBD) derived from hops rather than hemp or cannabis. Because hemp and cannabis are heavily regulated, while hops plants are not, Apogee Health's CBD is potentially extremely valuable. In a review on its website, PotTalk claims that it is scientifically impossible to produce a hops-derived CBD and condemns Apogee Health for "defrauding uninformed members of the alternative care community seeking pain relief." If PotTalk's accusation is false, has it committed a tort? As you will learn in this chapter, the tort of trade libel is one of many that can lead to liability for businesses. In this situation, Apogee Health could sue PotTalk—which also produces and sells CBD products—for intentionally interfering with its prospective economic advantage.

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What types of damages are available in tort lawsuits?
2. What is defamation? Name two types of defamation.
3. What conduct constitutes conversion?
4. Identify the five elements of negligence.
5. What is meant by strict liability? In what circumstances is strict liability applied?

5–1 The Basis of Tort Law

Two notions serve as the basis of all torts: wrongs and compensation. Tort law is designed to compensate those who have suffered a loss or injury due to another person's wrongful act. In a tort action, one person or group brings a personal suit against another person or group to obtain compensation (monetary damages) or other relief for the harm suffered.

Tort A wrongful act (other than a breach of contract) that results in harm or injury to another and leads to civil liability.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus Question 1

What types of damages are available in tort lawsuits?

5–1a The Purpose of Tort Law

Generally, the purpose of tort law is to provide remedies for the invasion of various protected interests. Society recognizes an interest in personal safety, and tort law provides remedies for acts that cause physical or emotional injury or interfere with physical or emotional security and freedom. Society also recognizes an interest in protecting property, and tort law provides remedies for acts that cause destruction of or damage to property.

Note that in legal usage, the singular noun damage is used to refer to harm or injury to persons or property. The plural noun damages is used to refer to monetary compensation for such harm or injury.

Damages A monetary award sought as a remedy for a breach of contract or a tortious action.

5–1b Damages Available in Tort Actions

Because the purpose of tort law is to compensate the injured party for the damage suffered, it is important to have a basic understanding of the types of damages that plaintiffs seek in tort actions.

Compensatory Damages A monetary award equivalent to the actual value of injuries or damage sustained by the aggrieved party.

Compensatory Damages Plaintiffs are awarded compensatory damages to compensate or reimburse them for actual losses. Thus, the goal is to make the plaintiffs whole and put them in the same position they would have been in had the tort not occurred. Compensatory damages awards are often broken down into special damages and general damages.

Special Damages In a tort case, an amount awarded to compensate the plaintiff for quantifiable monetary losses, such as medical expenses, property damage, and lost wages and benefits (now and in the future).

General Damages In a tort case, an amount awarded to compensate individuals for the nonmonetary aspects of the harm suffered, such as pain and suffering. Not available to companies.

Special damages compensate plaintiffs for quantifiable monetary losses, such as medical expenses, lost wages and benefits (now and in the future), extra costs, the loss of irreplaceable items, and the costs of repairing or replacing damaged property. General damages compensate individuals (not companies) for the nonmonetary aspects of the harm suffered, such as pain and suffering. A court might award general damages for physical or emotional pain and suffering, loss of companionship, loss of consortium (losing the emotional and physical benefits of a spousal relationship), disfigurement, loss of reputation, or loss or impairment of mental or physical capacity.

Case Example 5.1 While working as a seaman in Louisiana, Chedrick Starks was injured when a piece of equipment broke free and struck him. After undergoing several surgeries, Starks sued his employer for past and future medical expenses, and pain and suffering. At trial, a jury awarded him damages for past and future medical expenses and past pain and suffering, but did not award him damages for future pain and suffering. Starks appealed, claiming that the damages awarded were inadequate. A federal district court held that the jury's damages award was inconsistent. Starks had presented sufficient proof that his injuries and future medical treatment could result in future pain and suffering. Therefore, Starks was entitled to a new trial on the issue of damages.[1]

Punitive Damages Monetary damages that may be awarded to a plaintiff to punish the defendant and deter similar conduct in the future.

Punitive Damages Occasionally, the courts also award punitive damages in tort cases to punish the wrongdoers and deter others from similar wrongdoing. Punitive damages are appropriate only when the defendant's conduct was particularly egregious (flagrant) or reprehensible (blameworthy).

Thus, punitive damages are normally available mainly in intentional tort actions and only rarely in negligence lawsuits (intentional torts and negligence will be explained later in the chapter). They may be awarded, however, in suits involving gross negligence, which can be defined as an intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the effect on the life or property of another.

Courts exercise great restraint in granting punitive damages to plaintiffs in tort actions because punitive damages are subject to the limitations imposed by the due process clause of the U.S. Constitution. In a landmark decision, the United States Supreme Court held that when an award of punitive damages is grossly excessive, it furthers no legitimate purpose and violates due process requirements.[2] Consequently, an appellate court will sometimes reduce the amount of punitive damages awarded to a plaintiff because the amount was excessive.

1. Starks v. Advantage Staffing, LLC, 217 F.Supp.3d 917 (E.D.La. 2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Legislative Caps on Damages State laws may limit the amount of damages—both punitive and general—that can be awarded to the plaintiff. More than half of the states have placed caps ranging from $250,000 to $750,000 on noneconomic general damages (such as for pain and suffering), especially in medical malpractice suits. More than thirty states have limited punitive damages, with some imposing outright bans.

Know This
Damage refers to harm or injury to persons or property. Damages is a legal term that refers to the monetary compensation awarded to a plaintiff who has suffered such harm or injury.

5–1c Classifications of Torts

There are two broad classifications of torts: intentional torts and unintentional torts (torts involving negligence). Intentional torts result from the intentional violation of persons or property (fault with intent). Negligence results from the breach of a duty to act reasonably (fault without intent). The classification of a particular tort depends largely on how the tort occurs (intentionally or negligently) and the surrounding circumstances.

5–1d Defenses

Even if a plaintiff proves all the elements of a tort, the defendant can raise a legally recognized defense—a reason why the plaintiff should not obtain damages. The defenses available may vary depending on the specific tort involved. A successful defense releases the defendant from partial or full liability for the tortious act.

Defense A reason offered by a defendant in an action or lawsuit as to why the plaintiff should not prevail.

A common defense to intentional torts against persons, for instance, is consent. When a person consents to the damaging act, there is generally no tort liability. The most widely used defense in negligence actions is comparative negligence (discussed later in this chapter).

Most states also have a statute of limitations that establishes the time limit (often two years from the date of discovering the harm) within which a particular type of lawsuit can be filed. After that time period, the plaintiff can no longer file a claim.

5–2 Intentional Torts against Persons

An intentional tort, as just mentioned, requires intent. The tortfeasor (the one committing the tort) must intend to commit an act, the consequences of which interfere with the personal or business interests of another in a way not permitted by law. An evil or harmful motive is not required—in fact, the person committing the action may even have a beneficial motive for committing what turns out to be a tortious act.

Intentional Tort A wrongful act knowingly committed.

Tortfeasor One who commits a tort.

In tort law, intent means only that the person intended the consequences of the act or knew with substantial certainty that certain consequences would result from the act. The law generally assumes that individuals intend the normal consequences of their actions. Thus, forcefully pushing another—even if done in jest and without any evil motive—is an intentional tort if injury results, because the object of a strong push can ordinarily be expected to fall down.

Intent can be transferred when a defendant intends to harm one individual but unintentionally harms a different person. This is called transferred intent. Example 5.2 Alex swings a bat intending to hit Blake but misses and hits Carson instead. Carson can sue Alex for the tort of battery (discussed shortly) because Alex's intent to harm Blake can be transferred to Carson.

Transferred Intent A legal principle under which a person who intends to harm one individual, but unintentionally harms a different individual, can be liable to the second victim for an intentional tort.

2. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 123 S.Ct. 1513, 155 L.Ed.2d 585 (2003).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5–2a Assault

Assault Any word or action intended to make another person fearful of immediate physical harm—a reasonably believable threat.

An assault is any intentional and unexcused threat of immediate harmful or offensive contact—words or acts that create in another person a reasonable apprehension of harmful contact. An assault can be completed even if there is no actual contact with the plaintiff, provided the defendant's conduct causes the plaintiff to have a reasonable apprehension of imminent harm. Tort law aims to protect individuals from having to expect harmful or offensive contact.

5–2b Battery

Battery Physical contact with another that is unexcused, harmful or offensive, and intentionally performed.

If the act that created the apprehension is completed and results in harm to the plaintiff, it is a battery, which is defined as an unexcused and harmful or offensive physical contact intentionally performed. Example 5.3 Ivan threatens Jean with a gun and then shoots her. The pointing of the gun at Jean is an assault. The firing of the gun (if the bullet hits Jean) is a battery.

The contact can be harmful, or it can be merely offensive (such as an unwelcome kiss). Physical injury need not occur. The contact can be made by the defendant or by some force set in motion by the defendant, such as a rock thrown by the defendant. Whether the contact is offensive or not is determined by the reasonable person standard.[3]

If the plaintiff shows that there was contact, and the jury (or judge, if there is no jury) agrees that the contact was offensive, the plaintiff has a right to compensation. A plaintiff may be compensated for the emotional harm resulting from a battery, as well as for physical harm. Defendants may raise a number of legally recognized defenses to justify their conduct, including self-defense and defense of others.

5–2c False Imprisonment

False imprisonment is the intentional confinement or restraint of another person's activities without justification. False imprisonment interferes with the freedom to move without restraint. The confinement can be accomplished through the use of physical barriers, physical restraint, or threats of physical force. It is essential that the person under restraint does not wish to be restrained. (The plaintiff's consent to the restraint bars any liability.)

Businesspersons may face suits for false imprisonment after they have attempted to confine a suspected shoplifter for questioning. Under the "privilege to detain" granted to merchants in most states, a merchant can use reasonable force to detain or delay a person suspected of shoplifting the merchant's property. Although the details of the privilege vary from state to state, generally laws require that any detention be conducted in a reasonable manner and for only a reasonable length of time. Undue force or unreasonable detention can lead to liability for the business.

© Photobank gallery/Shutterstock.com

Under what circumstances can a person in jail sue for false imprisonment?

Case Example 5.4 Justin Mills was playing blackjack at the Maryland Live! Casino when two casino employees approached him, grabbed his arm, and led him into a back hallway. The employees (who were off-duty police officers moonlighting for the casino) accused Mills of counting cards and demanded his identification. They detained Mills and told him that they would not let him go unless he produced his ID so that the casino could ban him from the premises.

Mills gave the employees his passport and was eventually allowed to leave, but he secretly recorded the audio from the interaction using the smartphone in his pocket. Mills later filed a lawsuit alleging, in part, false imprisonment. A federal district court granted Mills a summary judgment on the false imprisonment claim, because the casino personnel had no legal justification for detaining him.[4] Cities and counties may also face liability for false imprisonment if they detain individuals without reason.

3. The reasonable person standard is an objective test of how a reasonable person would have acted under the same circumstances. See "The Duty of Care and Its Breach" later in this chapter.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5–2d Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

The tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) can be defined as extreme and outrageous conduct resulting in severe emotional distress to another. To be actionable (capable of serving as the ground for a lawsuit), the conduct must be so extreme and outrageous that it exceeds the bounds of decency accepted by society.

Actionable Capable of serving as the basis of a lawsuit. An actionable claim can be pursued in a lawsuit or other court action.

Outrageous Conduct Courts in most jurisdictions are wary of IIED claims and confine them to truly outrageous behavior. Generally, repeated annoyances (such as those experienced by a person who is being stalked), coupled with threats, are sufficient to support a claim. (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for details of how courts analyze these types of claims.) Acts that cause indignity or annoyance alone usually are not enough.

Defenses to IIED In many instances, as noted throughout this text, courts will accept the legal fiction of corporate personhood to provide companies with the same rights before the law as individuals. It seems, however, that this fiction does not extend to IIED claims. Case Example 5.5 Towerview Construction and Osprey Cove Real Estate worked out an agreement in which the real estate company loaned the construction company the funds to developed four residential lots. Once the lots were sold, Towerview would repay its loan. Eventually, Towerview came to believe that Osprey Cove was fraudulently taking steps to block the sale

4. Mills v. PPE Casino Resorts Maryland, LLC, 2017 WL 2930460 (D.Md. 2017).

Business Law Analysis

Analyzing Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress Claims

While living in her home country of Tanzania, Sophia Kiwanuka signed an employment contract with Anne Bakilana, a Tanzanian living in the United States. Kiwanuka came to Washington, D.C., to work as a babysitter and maid in Bakilana's house. When Kiwanuka arrived, Bakilana confiscated her passport, held her in isolation, and forced her to work long hours under threat of having her deported. Kiwanuka worked seven days a week without breaks and was subjected to regular verbal and psychological abuse by Bakilana.

Kiwanuka filed a complaint against Bakilana for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bakilana asked the court to dismiss the claim. Are Kiwanuka's allegations sufficient to show outrageous intentional conduct that resulted in severe emotional distress?

Analysis: In deciding whether the alleged conduct was sufficiently outrageous, a court would look at the repeated conduct of the purported tortfeasor. The complaint stated that Bakilana, on a daily basis, used her position of power and control over Kiwanuka to engage in an intentional pattern of outrageous verbal abuse against her. The complaint also alleged that Bakilana intentionally interfered with Kiwanuka's attempts to form relationships or acquaintances, which deepened Kiwanuka's suffering of isolation and distress.

Result and Reasoning: These allegations were sufficient to show extreme and outrageous conduct, intentionally committed, that resulted in severe emotional distress to Kiwanuka. Therefore, Kiwanuka was entitled to a trial on her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

of the lots and filed suit for, among other claims, IIED. Affirming the ruling of a trial court, the Georgia Court of Appeals dismissed the claim. Both courts agreed that corporations cannot recover for IIED because they lack the ability to experience emotions.[5]

Other defenses to IIED are more straightforward. If the plaintiff gives consent to the outrageous conduct that leads to an IIED claim, the lawsuit is unlikely to proceed. Context also matters. Seemingly outrageous conduct that is normal under the circumstances is usually not actionable. Neither is outrageous speech when it is directed against a public figure. In most instances, such speech enjoys First Amendment protection.

Ethical Issue

Can someone be found liable for a tort if that person ruins the plaintiff's marriage? Many American courts once held that a wife was the property of her husband. A remnant of this principle exists in the tort law of six states: Hawaii, Mississippi, New Mexico, North Carolina, South Dakota, and Utah. In these jurisdictions, a spouse of either sex can bring a lawsuit for "alienation of affections," a variation on the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Examples of defendants who were found liable for this sort of unethical behavior include a wealthy businessman who allegedly "stole" the wife of a plumber and a female secretary who supposedly ruined a "fairy tale marriage." Although it may seem somewhat humorous that courts would involve themselves in such salacious and seemingly personal affairs, the consequences are no joke. A Mississippi jury awarded the plumber $750,000, and a North Carolina appeals court upheld a $1 million payment to the harmed spouse in the "fairy tale marriage."

Case law highlights several defenses to alienation of affections. The defendant can show that there was no affection left in the failing marriage to alienate. Alternatively, the defendant can prove, through text messages, phone calls, and "hook-up" locations, that the alienating conduct took place in a different state in which such behavior did not violate the state's tort law.

Focus Question 2

What is defamation? Name two types of defamation.

5–2e Defamation

The freedom of speech guaranteed by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is not absolute. In interpreting the First Amendment, the courts must balance free speech rights against other strong social interests, including society's interest in preventing and redressing attacks on reputation.

The tort of defamation involves wrongfully hurting a person's good reputation. The law has imposed a general duty on all persons to refrain from making false, defamatory statements of fact about others. Breaching this duty in writing or another permanent form (such as a digital recording) constitutes the tort of libel. Breaching the duty orally is the tort of slander. The tort of defamation also arises when a false statement of fact is made about a person's product, business, or legal ownership rights to property.

Defamation Anything published or publicly spoken that causes injury to another's good name, reputation, or character.

Libel Defamation in writing or another permanent form (such as a digital recording).

Slander Defamation in oral form.

To establish defamation, a plaintiff normally must prove the following:

1. The defendant made a false statement of fact.
2. The statement was understood as being about the plaintiff and tended to harm the plaintiff's reputation.
3. The statement was published to at least one person other than the plaintiff.
4. In addition, plaintiffs who are public figures must prove actual malice.

5. Osprey Cove Real Estate, LLC v. Towerview Construction, LLC, 808 S.E.2d 425, 343 Ga.App. 436 (2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Statement of Fact Requirement Often at issue in defamation lawsuits (including online defamation) is whether the defendant made a statement of fact or a statement of opinion. Statements of opinion normally are not actionable because they are protected under the First Amendment. In other words, making a negative statement about another person is not defamation unless the statement is false and represents something as a fact. Example 5.6 Vickie's statement "Lane cheats on his taxes," if false, can lead to liability for defamation because it is a statement of fact. The statement "Lane is a jerk" cannot constitute defamation because it is clearly an opinion.

Publication Requirement The basis of the tort of defamation is the publication of a statement or statements that hold an individual up to contempt, ridicule, or hatred. Publication here means that the defamatory statements are communicated to persons other than the defamed party. Publication can be made via the Internet.

The courts have generally held that even dictating a letter to a secretary constitutes publication, although the publication may be privileged (as discussed shortly). If a third party overhears defamatory statements by chance, the courts usually hold that this also constitutes publication. Note also that anyone who republishes or repeats defamatory statements is liable even if that person reveals the source of the statements.

Case Example 5.7 Eddy Ramirez, a meat cutter at Costco Wholesale Corporation, was involved in a workplace incident with a co-worker, and Costco gave him a notice of suspension. After an investigation in which co-workers were interviewed, Costco fired Ramirez. Ramirez sued, claiming that the suspension notice was defamatory. The court ruled in Costco's favor. Ramirez could not establish defamation, because he had not shown that the suspension notice was published to any third parties. Costco did nothing beyond what was necessary to investigate the events that led to Ramirez's termination.[6]

Damages for Libel Once a defendant's liability for libel is established, a plaintiff is normally entitled to general damages. General damages are designed to compensate the plaintiff for nonspecific harms such as disgrace or dishonor in the eyes of the community, humiliation, injured reputation, and emotional distress—harms that are difficult to measure. In other words, to recover general damages in libel cases, plaintiffs need not prove that they were actually harmed in any specific way as a result of the libelous statement.

In the following case, the plaintiff alleged defamation by e-mail and online reviews. She sought damages for harm to her reputation, lost income, and emotional distress.

6. Ramirez v. Costco Wholesale Corp., 2014 WL 2696737 (Ct.Sup.Ct. 2014).

Case 5.1

Sky v. Van Der Westhuizen

Court of Appeals of Ohio, Fifth District, Stark County, 2019 -Ohio- 1960, 136 N.E.3d 820 (2019).

Facts Anastasia Sky, a psychotherapist, is a cat breeder and the owner of Skyhaven Birman Cattery. Sky exhibits her cats at shows, at which she has won many awards, and sells her cats to other breeders. Her cats and cattery are registered with the Cat Fanciers Association (CFA) in Ohio. E-mail purporting to be from Sky's employees and customers was sent to the CFA, alleging, among other things, that her cats were kept in deplorable conditions and treated cruelly and inhumanely. Reviews were posted online stating that Sky was "a crazy cat lady" whose medical license had been revoked due to drug abuse. The e-mail and posts were false. Sky filed a suit in an Ohio state court, alleging defamation and emotional distress. A response to a subpoena identified the author of the e-mail and the reviews as Hilde Van Der Westhuizen, a competing breeder. The court entered a judgment in Sky's favor and awarded her damages for the harm to her reputation, loss of income, and emotional distress. Van Der Westhuizen appealed, arguing that the evidence did not support the award.

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

Issue Was Sky entitled to damages for defamation?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment. "In light of the testimony . . . , we find that the record contains competent, credible evidence to support the trial court's damage awards."

Reason The appellate court reviewed the testimony and other evidence presented to the trial court and found that it supported the judgment and award of damages for the harm to Sky's reputation as a breeder and a doctor. Sky testified that after the e-mail was sent, she was shunned in the breeding community and lost revenue as a result of a decrease in the sales of her kittens. She also lost ten patients as a result of the damaging reviews posted online and received fewer physician referrals. These losses undercut her current and future income. On the claim for emotional distress, testimony described the changes in Sky's appearance, mood, and emotional state following the defamatory e-mail and reviews. Evidence showed that she sought therapy, and she testified to her humiliation and mental suffering. In sum, the evidence supported the lower court's award.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Punitive damages may be awarded in a tort action when a defendant's actions show malice—that is, when a person's conduct is characterized by hatred, ill will, or a spirit of revenge. Would an award of punitive damages be appropriate in this case? Explain.
- Ethical Should Van Der Westhuizen make an effort to remove all of the false online statements and reviews of Sky that she posted? Why or why not?

Damages for Slander In contrast to cases involving libel, in a case alleging slander, the plaintiff must prove special damages (defined earlier) to establish the defendant's liability. In other words, the plaintiff must show that the slanderous statement caused the plaintiff to suffer actual economic or monetary losses.

Unless this initial hurdle of proving special damages is overcome, a plaintiff alleging slander normally cannot go forward with the suit and recover any damages. This requirement is imposed in cases involving slander because slanderous statements have a temporary quality. In contrast, a libelous (written) statement has the quality of permanence, can be circulated widely, especially through social media, and usually results from some degree of deliberation on the part of the author.

Slander Per Se Exceptions to the burden of proving special damages in cases alleging slander are made for certain types of slanderous statements. If a false statement constitutes "slander per se," no proof of special damages is required for it to be actionable. The following four types of false utterances are considered to be slander per se:

1. A statement that another has a loathsome disease (such as a sexually transmitted disease) or a serious mental defect.
2. A statement that another has committed improprieties while engaging in a profession or trade.
3. A statement that another has committed or has been imprisoned for a serious crime.
4. A statement that a person is unchaste or has engaged in serious sexual misconduct. (This category of slander per se usually applies only to unmarried persons and sometimes only to women.)

Defenses to Defamation Truth is normally an absolute defense against a defamation charge. In other words, if the defendant in a defamation suit can prove that the allegedly defamatory statements were true, normally no tort has been committed.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Other defenses to defamation may exist if the statement is privileged or concerns a public figure. Note that the majority of defamation actions in the United States are filed in state courts, and the states may differ both in how they define defamation and in the particular defenses they allow, such as privilege.

Privileged Communications. In some circumstances, individuals will not be liable for defamatory statements because they enjoy a privilege, or immunity. Privileged communications are of two types: absolute and qualified.[7] Only in judicial proceedings and certain government proceedings is an absolute privilege granted. Thus, statements made in courtrooms by attorneys and judges during trials are absolutely privileged, as are statements made by government officials during legislative debate.

Privilege A special right, advantage, or immunity that enables a person or a class of persons to avoid liability for defamation.

In other situations, a person will not be liable for defamatory statements because that person has a qualified, or conditional, privilege. An employer's statements in written evaluations of employees are an example of a qualified privilege. Generally, if the statements are made in good faith and the publication is limited to those who have a legitimate interest in the communication, the statements fall within the area of qualified privilege. Example 5.8 Jorge has worked at Google for five years and is being considered for a management position. His supervisor, Lydia, writes an e-mail about Jorge's performance to those evaluating him for the management position. The message contains certain negative statements, which Lydia honestly believes are true. If Lydia limits the disclosure of the contents of the message to company representatives, her statements will likely be protected by a qualified privilege.

Public Figures. Politicians, entertainers, professional athletes, and other persons who are in the public eye are considered public figures. In general, public figures are considered fair game, and false and defamatory statements about them that appear in the media will not constitute defamation unless the statements are made with actual malice.[8] To be made with actual malice, a statement must be made with either knowledge of its falsity or a reckless disregard of the truth.

Actual Malice The deliberate intent to cause harm that exists when a person makes a statement with either knowledge of its falsity or reckless disregard of the truth. It is required to establish defamation against public figures.

Statements about public figures, especially when made via a public medium, are usually related to matters of general interest. They are made about people who substantially affect all of us. Furthermore, public figures generally have some access to a public medium for answering disparaging falsehoods about themselves, whereas private individuals do not. For these reasons, public figures have a greater burden of proof in defamation cases (they must prove actual malice) than do private individuals.

Case Example 5.9 John Tiegen is a former U.S. Marine who defended the United States consulate in Benghazi, Libya, from a well-publicized terrorist attack. On leaving the military, Tiegen became a public speaker and a brand ambassador for several companies. Frederic Slice posted comments about Tiegen on websites operated by these companies, stating that the ex-Marine was a "liar" and had committed perjury by lying to Congress about Benghazi. Tiegen, admitting that he was a public figure, sued Slice for libel. A Texas appeals court dismissed the case because Tiegen could not show that Slice had acted with actual malice. Whether or not Slice's comments were true, Tiegen produced no evidence that Slice had known the statements were false or had acted with reckless disregard for the truth.[9]

---

7. Note that the term privileged communication in this context is not the same as privileged communication between professionals, such as attorneys, and their clients.

8. The landmark case establishing the actual malice requirement is New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964).

9. Tiegen v. Slice, 2020 WL 728426 (Tex.App.—Dallas, 2020).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5–2f Invasion of the Right to Privacy and Appropriation

A person has a right to solitude and freedom from prying public eyes—in other words, to privacy. The Supreme Court has held that a fundamental right to privacy is implied by various amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Some state constitutions also explicitly provide for privacy rights. In addition, a number of federal and state statutes have been enacted to protect individual rights in specific areas.

Tort law also safeguards these rights through the torts of invasion of privacy and appropriation. Generally, to sue successfully for an invasion of privacy, a person must have a reasonable expectation of privacy, and the invasion must be highly offensive. (See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion of how invasion of privacy claims can arise when someone posts pictures or videos taken with digital devices.)

Invasion of Privacy Four acts qualify as an invasion of privacy:

1. Intrusion into an individual's affairs or seclusion. Invading someone's home or illegally searching someone's briefcase is an invasion of privacy. The tort has been held to extend to eavesdropping by wiretap, the unauthorized scanning of a bank account, compulsory blood testing, and window peeping. Example 5.10 Sharon, a Walgreen's pharmacist, shares Luanna's prescription history with William, who is married to Sharon and used to date Luanna. If Luanna sues, she will likely win an invasion of privacy lawsuit against Sharon and her employer, Walgreen's.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Revenge Porn and Invasion of Privacy

Nearly every digital device today takes photos and videos and has software that allows the recording of conversations. Many couples immortalize their "private moments" using such digital devices. One partner may take a racy selfie and send it as an attachment to a text message to the other partner, for instance.

Occasionally, after a relationship ends, one partner seeks a type of digital revenge. The result, called revenge porn, involves the online distribution of sexually explicit images of a nonconsenting individual with the intent to humiliate that person.

State Statutes

Thirty-five states have enacted statutes that make revenge porn a crime. But these state laws differ. (In some states, it is a misdemeanor with less serious consequences, and in other states, it is a felony with more serious penalties.) In addition, most of these criminal statutes do not provide victims with a right to obtain damages. Therefore, victims have sued in civil courts on the basis of (1) invasion of privacy, (2) public disclosure of private facts, and (3) intentional infliction of emotional distress.

A Case Example

Nadia Hussain had dated Akhil Patel on and off for seven years. After they broke up, Patel hounded her with offensive and threatening phone calls, texts, and e-mails—often twenty to thirty per day. He did this for several years. He even came to her workplace a few times. Hussain filed police reports and changed her phone number multiple times, but the harassment continued. Patel also hacked or attempted to hack into her accounts (she had received alerts).

Eventually, Patel posted secretly recorded sexual videos of Hussain on the Internet. (He had recorded, without her consent, a Skype conversation they once had in which Hussain had undressed and masturbated.) Hussain sued Patel claiming invasion of privacy, public disclosure of private facts, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. A jury found in her favor and awarded $500,000 in damages for mental anguish and damage to her reputation. An appellate court affirmed but reduced the damages to $345,000 (because the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim was not supported by the evidence).[a]

Critical Thinking

Why might the appellate court have decided that the evidence did not support Nadia Hussain's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim?

a. Patel v. Hussain, 485 S.W.3d 153 (Tex.App.—Houston 2016); also see Doe v. Doe, 2017 WL 3025885 (S.D.N.Y. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

2. False light. Publication of information that places a person in a false light is also an invasion of privacy. For instance, writing a story about a person that attributes ideas and opinions not held by that person is an invasion of privacy. (Publishing such a story could involve the tort of defamation as well.) Case Example 5.11 Police received a report from a customer of West Gate Bank that his debit card had been stolen and used to withdraw funds from his account at the bank's ATM. The ATM video depicted a female walking up to an ATM and using a debit card to withdraw cash. To identify the person, the police posted still images from the video on the Crime Stoppers website and Facebook page. The caption said, "This young lady doesn't look like your typical crook, but she is! She used someone's stolen credit card.… If you know who she is, leave us a tip here."

   Police received tips that the woman in the video was Shayla Funk. Funk, as it turned out, was not a criminal and was simply withdrawing funds with her own card from her own bank account. Nevertheless, as a result of the posting, she lost her job as an occupational therapist. Funk sued the city and Crime Stoppers organization for defamation and for violating her privacy by representing her in a false light, and won. The court awarded Funk more than $259,000 in damages, which was affirmed on appeal by the state's highest court.[10]
3. Public disclosure of private facts. This type of invasion of privacy occurs when a person publicly discloses private facts about an individual that an ordinary person would find objectionable or embarrassing. A newspaper account about a private citizen's sex life or financial affairs could be an actionable invasion of privacy, even if the information revealed is true, because it should not be a matter of public concern.
4. Appropriation of identity. Under the common law, using a person's name, picture, or other likeness for commercial purposes without permission is a tortious invasion of privacy. Individuals' right to privacy normally includes the right to the exclusive use of their identity. Example 5.12 An advertising agency asks a singer with a distinctive voice and stage presence to do a marketing campaign for a new automobile. The singer rejects the offer. If the agency then uses someone who imitates the singer's voice and dance moves in the ad, this would be actionable as an appropriation of identity.

Appropriation Most states today have codified the common law tort of appropriation of identity in statutes that establish the distinct tort of appropriation, or right of publicity. For example, the Illinois Right of Publicity Act (IRPA) defines a person's identity as "an attribute of an individual that serves to identify that individual to an ordinary, reasonable viewer or listener."[11] Under this law, a person's identity cannot be used for commercial purposes without consent.

Appropriation In tort law, the use by one person of another person's name, likeness, or other identifying characteristic without permission and for the benefit of the user.

Case Example 5.13 The online marketplace Groupon, Inc., uses an "Instagram Widget" to link publicly available photos from the social networking service to member businesses. All Instagram users identify themselves with a username. Christine Dancel took a photo of herself at Philly G's restaurant and posted it on Instagram. Because of the Widget, the photo and her username—"meowchristine"—automatically appeared on Philly G's Groupon page.

Dancel sued under the IRPA, claiming that she had not given consent to Groupon. She argued that a "reasonable viewer" would know that usernames are designed to identify individuals, just like actual names. The district court disagreed, holding that, in fact, many usernames, including "meowchristine," are too obscure to establish identity. A federal appellate court affirmed, noting that while some usernames might clearly identify an individual, it would place too great a burden on courts to determine if each one did under Illinois law.[12]

---

10. Funk v. Lincoln-Lancaster County Crime Stoppers, Inc., 294 Neb. 715, 885 N.W.2d 1 (2016).
11. 765 I.L.C.S 1075/5, 30.
12. Dancel v. Groupon, Inc., 949 F.3d 999 (7th Cir. 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5–2g Fraudulent Misrepresentation

A misrepresentation leads another to believe in a condition that is different from the condition that actually exists. This is often accomplished through a false or incorrect statement. Although persons sometimes make misrepresentations accidentally because they are unaware of the existing facts, the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation, or fraud, involves intentional deceit for personal gain. The tort includes several elements:

Fraudulent Misrepresentation Any misrepresentation, either by misstatement or by omission of a material fact, knowingly made with the intention of deceiving another and on which a reasonable person would and does rely to that person's detriment.

1. The misrepresentation of facts or conditions with knowledge that they are false or with reckless disregard for the truth.
2. An intent to induce another to rely on the misrepresentation.
3. Justifiable reliance by the deceived party.
4. Damage suffered as a result of the reliance.
5. A causal connection between the misrepresentation and the injury suffered.

Puffery A salesperson's exaggerated claims concerning the quality of property offered for sale. Such claims involve opinions rather than facts and are not legally binding promises or warranties.

For fraud to occur, more than mere puffery, or seller's talk, must be involved. Fraud exists only when a person represents as a fact something that person knows is untrue. For instance, it is fraud to claim that a roof does not leak when one knows it does. Facts are objectively ascertainable, whereas seller's talk (such as "I am the best accountant in town") is not.

Case Example 5.14 Joseph Guido bought nine rental houses in Stillwater, New York. The houses shared a waste disposal system that was not functioning. Guido hired someone to design and install a new system. When town officials later discovered sewage on the property, Guido had the system partially replaced. He then represented to prospective buyers of the property, including Danny Revell, that the "Septic system [was] totally new—each field totally replaced." In response to a questionnaire from the buyers' bank, Guido denied any knowledge of environmental problems.

A month after the sale of the houses, the septic system failed and required substantial repairs. The buyers sued Guido for fraud. A jury found in favor of the plaintiffs and awarded damages. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment on appeal. Guido knew that the septic system was not totally new and that sewage had been released on the property (an environmental problem). He had misrepresented these facts to the buyers. The buyers' reliance on Guido's statements was justifiable because a visual inspection of the property did not reveal any problems.[13]

Petegar/E+/Getty Images

If a home seller claims that a new septic system was installed when it wasn't, does that constitute fraud?

Statement of Fact versus Opinion

Normally, the tort of misrepresentation or fraud occurs only when there is reliance on a statement of fact. Sometimes, however, the tort may involve reliance on a statement of opinion if the individual making the statement has a superior knowledge of the subject matter. For instance, when a lawyer makes a statement of opinion about the law in a state in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, a court will treat it as a statement of fact.

Negligent Misrepresentation

Sometimes, a tort action can arise from misrepresentations that are made negligently rather than intentionally. The key difference between intentional and negligent misrepresentation is whether the person making the misrepresentation had actual knowledge of its falsity. Negligent misrepresentation requires only that the person making the statement or omission did not have a reasonable basis for believing its truthfulness.

Liability for negligent misrepresentation usually arises when the defendant who made the misrepresentation owed a duty of care to the plaintiff to supply correct information. Statements or omissions made by attorneys and accountants to their clients, for instance, can lead to liability for negligent misrepresentation.

13. Revell v. Guido, 124 A.D.3d 1006, 2 N.Y.S.3d 252 (3d Dept. 2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5–2h Wrongful Interference

The torts known as business torts generally involve wrongful interference with another's business rights. Business torts involving wrongful interference are generally divided into two categories: wrongful interference with a contractual relationship and wrongful interference with a business relationship.

Business Torts Wrongful interference with another's business rights and relationships.

Wrongful Interference with a Contractual Relationship Three elements are necessary for wrongful interference with a contractual relationship to occur:

1. A valid, enforceable contract must exist between two parties.
2. A third party must know that this contract exists.
3. The third party must intentionally induce a party to breach the contract.

Classic Case Example 5.15 A classic case involved an opera singer, Johanna Wagner, who was under contract to sing for a man named Lumley for a specified period of years. A man named Gye, who knew of this contract, nonetheless "enticed" Wagner to refuse to carry out the agreement, and Wagner began to sing for Gye. Gye's action constituted a tort because it wrongfully interfered with the contractual relationship between Wagner and Lumley.[14] (Of course, Wagner's refusal to carry out the agreement also entitled Lumley to sue Wagner for breach of contract.)

The body of tort law relating to intentional interference with a contractual relationship has expanded greatly in recent years. In principle, any lawful contract can be the basis for an action of this type. The contract could be between a firm and its employees or a firm and its customers. Sometimes, for instance, a competitor draws away one of a firm's key employees. Only if the original employer can show that the competitor knew of the contract's existence, and intentionally induced the breach, can damages be recovered from the competitor.

GARWOOD & VOIGT Fine & Rare Books Maps & Prints

Opera singer Johanna Wagner is shown here in one of her many roles. She was under contract to sing for one person, but was enticed to break the contract and sing for someone else. Was a tort committed? If so, by whom?

Wrongful Interference with a Business Relationship Businesspersons devise countless schemes to attract customers, but they are prohibited from unreasonably interfering with another's business in their attempts to gain a share of the market. There is a difference between competitive methods and predatory behavior—actions undertaken with the intention of unlawfully driving competitors completely out of the market. Attempting to attract customers in general is a legitimate business practice, whereas specifically targeting the customers of a competitor is more likely to be predatory.

Example 5.16 A shopping mall contains two athletic shoe stores: Joe's and Ultimate Sport. Joe's cannot station an employee at the entrance of Ultimate Sport to divert customers by telling them that Joe's will beat Ultimate Sport's prices. This type of activity constitutes the tort of wrongful interference with a business relationship, which is commonly considered to be an unfair trade practice. If this activity were permitted, Joe's would reap the benefits of Ultimate Sport's advertising.

Defenses to Wrongful Interference A person will not be liable for the tort of wrongful interference with a contractual or business relationship if it can be shown that the interference was justified or permissible. Bona fide competitive behavior is a permissible interference even if it results in the breaking of a contract.

Example 5.17 If Antonio's Meats advertises so effectively that it induces Sam's Restaurant to break its contract with Burke's Meat Company, Burke's will be unable to recover against Antonio's Meats on a wrongful interference theory. After all, the public policy that favors free competition in advertising outweighs any possible instability that such competitive activity might cause in contractual relations.

14. Lumley v. Gye, 118 Eng.Rep. 749 (1853).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This

What society and the law consider permissible often depends on the circumstances.

5–3 Intentional Torts against Property

Intentional torts against property include trespass to land, trespass to personal property, conversion, and disparagement of property. These torts are wrongful actions that interfere with individuals' legally recognized rights with regard to their land or personal property. The law distinguishes real property from personal property. Real property is land and things "permanently" attached to the land. Personal property consists of all other items, which are basically movable. Thus, a house and lot are real property, whereas the furniture inside the house is personal property. Cash, stocks, and bonds are also personal property.

5–3a Trespass to Land

Trespass to Land Entry onto, above, or below the surface of land owned by another without the owner's permission or legal authorization.

A trespass to land occurs anytime a person, without permission, does any of the following:

1. Enters onto, above, or below the surface of land that is owned by another.
2. Causes anything to enter onto land owned by another.
3. Remains on land owned by another or permits anything to remain on it.

Actual harm to the land is not an essential element of this tort, because the tort is designed to protect the right of an owner to exclusive possession.

Common types of trespass to land include walking or driving on another's land, shooting a gun over the land, and throwing rocks at a building that belongs to someone else. Another common form of trespass involves constructing a building so that part of it is on an adjoining landowner's property.

Konstantin L/Shutterstock.com

What are some common types of trespass to land?

Establishing Trespass Before a person can be a trespasser, the real property owner (or other person in actual and exclusive possession of the property) must establish that person as a trespasser. For instance, "posted" trespass signs expressly establish as a trespasser a person who ignores these signs and enters onto the property. Any person who enters onto property to commit an illegal act (such as a thief entering a lumberyard at night to steal lumber) is established impliedly as a trespasser, without posted signs. In contrast, a guest in your home is not a trespasser unless that guest has been asked to leave but refuses.

Liability for Harm At common law, a trespasser is liable for any damage caused to the property and generally cannot hold the owner liable for injuries sustained on the premises. This common law rule is being abandoned in many jurisdictions in favor of a reasonable duty of care rule that varies depending on the status of the parties.

For instance, a landowner may have a duty to post a notice that guard dogs patrol the property. Also, if young children are likely to be attracted to the property by some object, such as a swimming pool or a sand pile, and are injured, the landowner may be held liable under the attractive nuisance doctrine. An owner can normally use reasonable force to remove a trespasser from the premises—or detain the trespasser for a reasonable time—without liability for damages, however.

Defenses against Trespass to Land One defense to a claim of trespass to land is to show that the trespass was warranted. This may occur, for instance, when the trespasser entered the property to assist someone in danger.

Another defense is for trespassers to show that they had a license to come onto the land. A licensee is one who is invited (or allowed to enter) onto the property of another for the licensee's benefit. A person who enters another's property to read an electric meter, for example, is a licensee. Another example of a licensee is someone who is camping on another person's land with the owner's permission but without paying for the privilege.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Note that licenses to enter are revocable by the property owner. If a property owner asks a meter reader to leave and the meter reader refuses to do so, the meter reader at that point becomes a trespasser.

5–3b Trespass to Personal Property

Whenever an individual wrongfully takes or harms the personal property of another or otherwise interferes with the lawful owner's possession of personal property, trespass to personal property (also called trespass to chattels or trespass to personalty[15]) occurs. In this context, harm means not only destruction of the property, but also anything that diminishes its value, condition, or quality.

Trespass to Personal Property Wrongfully taking or harming the personal property of another or otherwise interfering with the lawful owner's possession of personal property.

Trespass to personal property involves intentional meddling with a possessory interest (the right to possess), including barring an owner's access to personal property. Example 5.18 Kelly takes Ryan's business law book as a practical joke and hides it so that Ryan is unable to find it for several days before the final examination. Here, Kelly has engaged in a trespass to personal property. (Kelly has also committed the tort of conversion—to be discussed next.)

If it can be shown that trespass to personal property was warranted, then a complete defense exists. Most states, for instance, allow automobile repair shops to retain a customer's car (under what is called an artisan's lien) when the customer refuses to pay for repairs already completed.

5–3c Conversion

Any act that deprives an owner of personal property or of the use of that property without the owner's permission and without just cause can constitute conversion. Even the taking of electronic records and data can form the basis of a conversion claim. Often, when conversion occurs, a trespass to personal property also occurs. The original taking of the personal property from the owner was a trespass, and wrongfully retaining the property is conversion.

Conversion Wrongfully taking or retaining possession of an individual's personal property and placing it in the service of another.

Focus Question 3

What conduct contitutes conversion?

Failure to Return Goods Conversion is the civil side of crimes related to theft, but it is not limited to theft. Even if the rightful owner consented to the initial taking of the property, so there was no theft or trespass, a failure to return the personal property may still be conversion. Example 5.19 Chen borrows Mark's iPad Pro to use while traveling home from school for the holidays. When Chen returns to school, Mark asks for his iPad Pro back. Chen tells Mark that she gave it to her little brother for Christmas. In this situation, Mark can sue Chen for conversion, and Chen will have to either return the iPad Pro or pay damages equal to its replacement value.

Intention Conversion can occur even when people who possess the goods of others mistakenly believe that they are entitled to the goods. In other words, good intentions are not a defense against conversion. Someone who buys stolen goods, for instance, can be sued for conversion even if the buyer did not know that the goods were stolen. If the true owner of the goods sues the buyer and wins, the buyer must either return the property to the owner or pay the owner the full value of the property.

Know This

It is the intent to do an act that is important in tort law, not the motive behind the intent.

Case Example 5.20 Nicholas Mora worked for Welco Electronics, Inc., but had also established his own company, AQM Supplies. Mora used Welco's credit card without permission and deposited more than $375,000 into AQM's account, which he then transferred to his personal account. Welco sued. A California court held that Mora was liable for conversion. The court reasoned that when Mora misappropriated Welco's credit card and used it, he took part of Welco's credit balance with the credit-card company.[16]

15. Pronounced per-sun-ul-tee.
16. Welco Electronics, Inc. v. Mora, 223 Cal.App.4th 202, 166 Cal.Rptr.3d 877 (2014).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Richard Levine/Alamy

How can a portable credit-card terminal be used for conversion?

Disparagement of property An economically injurious falsehood about another's product or property.

Slander of Quality (Trade Libel) The publication of false information about another's product, alleging that it is not what its seller claims.

Slander of Title The publication of a statement that denies or casts doubt on another's legal ownership of property, causing financial loss to that property's owner.

Negligence The failure to exercise the standard of care that a reasonable person would exercise in similar circumstances.

5–3d Disparagement of Property

Disparagement of property occurs when economically injurious falsehoods are made about another's product or property, rather than about another's reputation (as in the tort of defamation). Disparagement of property is a general term for torts specifically referred to as slander of quality or slander of title.

Publication of false information about another's product, alleging that it is not what its seller claims, constitutes the tort of slander of quality (trade libel). To establish trade libel, the plaintiff must prove that the improper publication caused a third party to refrain from dealing with the plaintiff and that the plaintiff sustained economic damages (such as lost profits) as a result. An improper publication may be both a slander of quality and a defamation of character. For instance a statement that disparages the quality of a product may also, by implication, disparage the character of the person who would sell such a product.

When a publication denies or casts doubt on another's legal ownership of property, and the property's owner suffers financial loss as a result, the tort of slander of title may exist. Usually, this is an intentional tort that occurs when someone knowingly publishes an untrue statement about property with the intent of discouraging a third party from dealing with the property's owner. For instance, a car dealer would have difficulty attracting customers if competitors publish a notice that the dealer's stock consists of stolen automobiles.

5–4 Negligence

The tort of negligence occurs when someone suffers injury because of another's failure to fulfill a required duty of care. In contrast to intentional torts, in torts involving negligence, the tortfeasor neither wishes to bring about the consequences of the act nor believes that they will occur. The person's conduct merely creates a risk of such consequences. If no risk is created, there is no negligence. Moreover, the risk must be foreseeable—that is, it must be such that a reasonable person engaging in the same activity would anticipate the risk and guard against it. In determining what is reasonable conduct, courts consider the nature of the possible harm.

Many of the actions giving rise to the intentional torts discussed earlier in the chapter constitute negligence if the element of intent is missing (or cannot be proved). Example 5.21 Juan walks up to Maya and intentionally shoves her. Maya falls and breaks an arm as a result. In this situation, Juan has committed an intentional tort (assault and battery). If Juan carelessly bumps into Maya, however, and she falls and breaks an arm as a result, Juan's action will constitute negligence. In either situation, Juan has committed a tort.

To succeed in a negligence action, the plaintiff must prove each of the following:

1. Duty. The defendant owed a duty of care to the plaintiff.
2. Breach. The defendant breached that duty.
3. Causation in fact. The plaintiff's injury would not have occurred without the defendant's breach.
4. Proximate causation. The connection between the defendant's breach and the plaintiff's injury is foreseeable and therefore justifies imposing liability.
5. Damages. The plaintiff suffered a legally recognizable injury.

We discuss each of these five elements of negligence next.

Focus Question 4

Identify the five elements of negligence.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5–4a The Duty of Care and Its Breach

Central to the tort of negligence is the concept of a duty of care. The basic principle underlying the duty of care is that people in society are free to act as they please so long as their actions do not infringe on the interests of others. When someone fails to comply with the duty to exercise reasonable care, a potentially tortious act may result.

Duty of Care The duty of all persons, as established by tort law, to exercise a reasonable amount of care in their dealings with others. Failure to exercise due care, which is normally determined by the reasonable person standard, constitutes the tort of negligence.

Failure to live up to a standard of care may be an act (setting fire to a building) or an omission (neglecting to put out a campfire). It may be a careless act or a carefully performed but nevertheless dangerous act that results in injury. In determining whether the duty of care has been breached, courts consider several factors:

1. The nature of the act (whether it is outrageous or commonplace).
2. The manner in which the act was performed (cautiously versus heedlessly).
3. The nature of the injury (whether it is serious or slight).

Creating even a very slight risk of a dangerous explosion might be unreasonable, whereas creating a distinct possibility of someone getting burnt fingers on a stove might be reasonable.

The question in the following case was whether a fraternity's local chapter and its officers owed a duty of care to their pledges.

Case 5.2

Bogenberger v. Pi Kappa Alpha Corporation, Inc.

Supreme Court of Illinois, 2018 IL 120951, 104 N.E.3d 1110 (2018).

Facts David Bogenberger attended a pledge event at the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity house at Northern Illinois University (NIU). The NIU Chapter officers planned an evening of hazing, during which the pledges were required to consume vodka provided by the members. By the end of the night, David's blood alcohol level was more than five times the legal limit. He lost consciousness. The NIU Chapter officers failed to seek medical attention. David died during the night. His father, Gary, filed a complaint in an Illinois state court against the NIU Chapter and its officers, on a theory of negligence. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants required the pledges, including David, to participate in the pledge event and to consume excessive and dangerous amounts of alcohol in violation of the state's hazing statute.[a] The court dismissed the complaint. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the dismissal. The defendants appealed to the Illinois Supreme Court.

Issue Did the NIU Chapter and its officers owe a duty of care to the pledges, including David, during the hazing event?

Decision Yes. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the intermediate appellate court's reversal of the trial court's dismissal. The plaintiff's "complaint . . . may proceed against the NIU Chapter [and] its officers."

Reason Each of us owes a duty of care to others to guard against injuries that are reasonably foreseeable consequences of our acts. The court reasoned that an injury due to hazing is reasonably foreseeable. This is indicated by the existence of the state's hazing statute, the university's rules, and the national Pi Kappa Alpha organization's policy against hazing. At hazing events involving the consumption of large amounts of alcohol, injuries are likely to occur. The magnitude of the burden of guarding against such injuries is small. In this case, then, it is reasonable to require the NIU Chapter and its officers to comply with the law and with the university's and fraternity's rules. It is further reasonable to place the consequences of that burden on the same parties—those who planned and carried out the pledge event. Thus "the NIU Chapter and the officers owed a duty to the pledges, including David, and plaintiff has sufficiently alleged a claim for negligence against them."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment The NIU Chapter invited nonmember sorority women to participate in the hazing event by filling the pledges' cups with vodka and directing them to drink it. Did these women owe a duty of care to the pledges? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the pledges' attendance at the hazing event had been optional, and the NIU Chapter had furnished alcohol, but not required its consumption. Would the result have been different? Explain.

a. As a result of the pledge event, the Pi Kappa Alpha national organization revoked the NIU Chapter's charter, and criminal charges were brought against those who participated in the hazing.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Reasonable Person Standard The standard of behavior expected of a hypothetical "reasonable person." It is the standard against which negligence is measured and that must be observed to avoid liability for negligence.

The Reasonable Person Standard Tort law measures duty by the reasonable person standard. In determining whether a duty of care has been breached, the courts ask how a reasonable person would have acted in the same circumstances. The reasonable person standard is said to be (though in an absolute sense it cannot be) objective. It is not necessarily how a particular person would act. It is society's judgment on how people should act. If the so-called reasonable person existed, that person would be careful, conscientious, even tempered, and honest.

The degree of care to be exercised varies, depending on the defendant's occupation or profession, relationship with the plaintiff, and other factors. Generally, whether an action constitutes a breach of the duty of care is determined on a case-by-case basis. The outcome depends on how the judge (or jury, in a jury trial) decides that a reasonable person in the position of the defendant would act in the particular circumstances of the case.

Note that the courts frequently use the reasonable person standard in other areas of law as well as in negligence cases. Indeed, the principle that individuals are required to exercise a reasonable standard of care in their activities is a pervasive concept in many areas of business law.

The Duty of Landowners Landowners are expected to exercise reasonable care to protect persons coming onto their property from harm. In some jurisdictions, landowners are held to owe a duty to protect even trespassers against certain risks. Landowners who rent or lease premises to tenants are expected to exercise reasonable care to ensure that the tenants and their guests are not harmed in common areas, such as stairways, entryways, and laundry rooms.

Duty to Warn Business Invitees of Risks. Retailers and other firms that explicitly or implicitly invite persons to come onto their premises have a duty to exercise reasonable care to protect these business invitees. The duty normally requires storeowners to warn business invitees of foreseeable risks, such as construction zones and wet floors, about which the owners knew or should have known.

Business Invitees Persons, such as customers or clients, who are invited onto business premises by the owner of those premises for business purposes.

Example 5.22 Liz enters a Crown Market, slips on a wet floor, and sustains injuries as a result. If there was no sign warning that the floor was wet when Liz slipped, the owner of Crown Market would be liable for damages. A court would hold that the business owner was negligent because the owner failed to exercise a reasonable degree of care in protecting the store's customers against foreseeable risks about which the owner knew or should have known. That a patron might slip on the wet floor and be injured was a foreseeable risk, and the owner should have taken care to avoid this risk or to warn the customer of it (by posting a sign or setting out orange cones, for instance). ■

The business owner also has a duty to discover and remove any hidden dangers that might injure a customer or other invitee. Hidden dangers might include uneven surfaces or defects in the pavement of a parking lot or walkway, or merchandise that has fallen off a store shelf.

© paichoom/Shutterstock.com

Does a "Wet Floor" sign relieve a restaurant owner from being held negligent if a customer slips?

Obvious Risks May Be an Exception. Some risks, of course, are so obvious that the owner need not warn of them. For instance, a business owner does not need to warn customers to open a door before attempting to walk through it. Other risks, however, may seem obvious to a business owner but may not be so to someone else, such as a child. In addition, even an obvious risk does not necessarily excuse a business owner from the duty to protect customers from foreseeable harm.

Case Example 5.23 During a trip to a Costco warehouse store in Nevada, Stephen Foster tripped and fell over a wooden pallet and sustained injuries. A Costco employee who was restocking the shelves had placed the pallet in the aisle without any barricades. When Foster sued Costco for negligence, Costco argued that it had not breached its duty by failing to warn customers because the pallet was open and obvious. A lower court agreed and granted a summary judgment in Costco's favor, but the Supreme Court of Nevada reversed. The court held that the open and obvious nature of a dangerous condition does not automatically relieve a business owner from the general duty of reasonable care. Every situation is different. Therefore, Foster was entitled to proceed to trial and argue that Costco should have used barricades or warnings to protect customers.[17]

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Duty of Professionals Persons who possess superior knowledge, skill, or training are held to a higher standard of care than others. Professionals—such as physicians, dentists, architects, engineers, accountants, and lawyers—are required to have a standard minimum level of special knowledge and ability. In determining what constitutes reasonable care, the law takes their training and expertise into account. Thus, an accountant's conduct is judged not by the reasonable person standard, but by the reasonable accountant standard.

If a professional violates the duty of care toward a client, the professional may be sued for malpractice, which is essentially professional negligence. For instance, a patient might sue a physician for medical malpractice. A client might sue an attorney for legal malpractice.

Malpractice Professional misconduct or the lack of the requisite degree of skill as a professional. Negligence on the part of a professional, such as a physician, is commonly referred to as malpractice.

5–4b Causation

Another element necessary in a negligence action is causation. If a person breaches a duty of care and someone suffers an injury, the wrongful act must have caused the harm for it to constitute the tort of negligence.

Courts Ask Two Questions In deciding whether there is causation, the court must address two questions:

1. Is there causation in fact? Did the injury occur because of the defendant's act, or would it have occurred anyway? If an injury would not have occurred without the defendant's act, then there is causation in fact.

   Causation in fact can usually be determined by the use of the but for test: "but for" the wrongful act, the injury would not have occurred. Theoretically, causation in fact is limitless. One could claim, for example, that "but for" the creation of the world, a particular injury would not have occurred. Thus, as a practical matter, the law has to establish limits, and it does so through the concept of proximate cause.

   Causation in Fact An act or omission without which an event would not have occurred.

2. Was the act the proximate cause of the injury? Proximate cause, or legal cause, exists when the connection between an act and an injury is strong enough to justify imposing liability. Courts use proximate cause to limit the scope of the defendant's liability to a subset of the total number of potential plaintiffs that might have been harmed by the defendant's actions.

   Example 5.24 Ackerman carelessly leaves a campfire burning. The fire not only burns down the forest but also sets off an explosion in a nearby chemical plant that spills chemicals into a river, killing all the fish for a hundred miles downstream and ruining the economy of a tourist resort. Should Ackerman be liable to the resort owners? To the tourists whose vacations were ruined? These are questions of proximate cause that a court must decide.

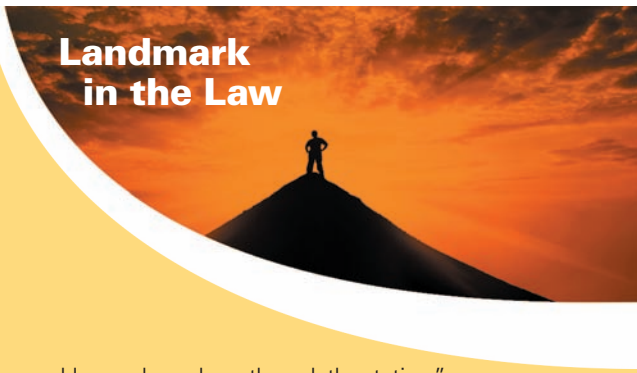
   Proximate Cause Legal cause. It exists when the connection between an act and an injury is strong enough to justify imposing liability.

Both questions concerning causation must be answered in the affirmative for tort liability to arise. If a defendant's action constitutes causation in fact but a court decides that the action was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, the causation requirement has not been met—and the defendant normally will not be liable to the plaintiff.

17. Foster v. Costco Wholesale Corp., 128 Nev.Adv.Op. 71, 291 P.3d 150 (2012).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This



Proximate cause can be thought of in terms of social policy. Should the defendant be made to bear the loss instead of the plaintiff?

Foreseeability Questions of proximate cause are linked to the concept of foreseeability. It would be unfair to impose liability on a defendant unless the defendant's actions created a foreseeable risk of injury. Probably the most cited case on proximate cause is the Palsgraf case, which is discussed in this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature. In determining the issue of proximate cause, the court addressed the following question: Does a defendant's duty of care extend only to those who may be injured as a result of a foreseeable risk, or does it also extend to a person whose injury could not reasonably have been foreseen?

5–4c The Injury Requirement and Damages

For a tort to have been committed, the plaintiff must have suffered a legally recognizable injury. To recover damages (receive compensation), the plaintiff must have suffered some loss, harm, wrong, or invasion of a protected interest. If no harm or injury results from a given negligent action, there is nothing to compensate—and no tort exists. Example 5.25 If you carelessly bump into a passerby, who stumbles and falls as a result, you may be liable in tort if the passerby is injured in the fall. If the person is unharmed, however, there normally cannot be a suit for damages because no injury was suffered. ■

Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad Co. (1928)

In 1928, the New York Court of Appeals (that state's highest court) issued its decision in Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad Co.,[a] a case that has become a landmark in negligence law and proximate cause.

The Facts of the Case The plaintiff, Helen Palsgraf, was waiting for a train on a station platform. A man carrying a small package wrapped in newspaper was rushing to catch a train that had begun to move away from the platform. As the man attempted to jump aboard the moving train, he seemed unsteady and about to fall. A railroad guard on the train car reached forward to grab him, and another guard on the platform pushed him from behind to help him board the train. In the process, the man's package fell on the railroad tracks and exploded, because it contained fireworks. The repercussions of the explosion caused scales at the other end of the train platform to fall on Palsgraf, who was injured as a result. She sued the railroad company for damages in a New York state court.

The Question of Proximate Cause At the trial, the jury found that the railroad guards were negligent in their conduct. On appeal, the question before the New York Court of Appeals was whether the conduct of the railroad guards was the proximate cause of Palsgraf's injuries. In other words, did the guards' duty of care extend to Palsgraf, who was outside the zone of danger and whose injury could not reasonably have been foreseen?

The court stated that the question of whether the guards were negligent with respect to Palsgraf depended on whether her injury was reasonably foreseeable by the railroad guards. Although the guards may have acted negligently with respect to the man boarding the train, this had no bearing on the question of their negligence with respect to Palsgraf. This was not a situation in which a person committed an act so potentially harmful (for example, firing a gun at a building) that there would automatically be liability for any harm that resulted. The court stated that here "there was nothing in the situation to suggest to the most cautious mind that the parcel wrapped in newspaper would spread wreckage through the station." The court thus concluded that the railroad guards were not negligent with respect to Palsgraf, because her injury was not reasonably foreseeable.

Application to Today's World The Palsgraf case established foreseeability as the test for proximate cause. Today, the courts continue to apply this test in determining proximate cause—and thus tort liability for injuries. Generally, if the victim of a harm or the consequences of a harm done are unforeseeable, there is no proximate cause. Note, though, that in the online environment, distinctions based on physical proximity, such as the "zone of danger" cited by the court in this case, are largely inapplicable.

a. 248 N.Y. 339, 162 N.E. 99 (1928).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Essentially, the purpose of tort law is to compensate for legally recognized injuries resulting from wrongful acts. Thus, compensatory damages are the norm in negligence cases. As noted earlier, a court will award punitive damages only if the defendant's conduct was grossly negligent, reflecting an intentional failure to perform a duty with reckless disregard of the consequences to others.

5–4d Good Samaritan Statutes

Most states now have what are called Good Samaritan statutes.[18] Under these statutes, someone who is aided voluntarily by another cannot turn around and sue the "Good Samaritan" for negligence. These laws were passed largely to protect physicians and medical personnel who volunteer their services in emergency situations to those in need, such as individuals hurt in car accidents.

Good Samaritan Statutes A state statute stipulating that persons who provide emergency services to, or rescue, someone in peril cannot be sued for negligence unless they act recklessly and cause further harm.

5–4e Dram Shop Acts

Many states have also passed dram shop acts,[19] under which a bar owner or bartender may be held liable for injuries caused by a person who became intoxicated while drinking at the bar. The owner or bartender may also be held responsible for continuing to serve a person who was already intoxicated. Some states' statutes also impose liability on social hosts (persons hosting parties) for injuries caused by guests who became intoxicated at the hosts' homes. Under these statutes, it is unnecessary to prove that the bar owner, bartender, or social host was negligent. Example 5.26 Monica hosts a Super Bowl party at which Brett, a minor, sneaks alcoholic drinks. Monica is potentially liable for damages resulting from Brett's drunk driving after the party, even if she was not negligent in serving the alcoholic beverages.

Dram Shop Acts A state statute that imposes liability on those who sell or serve alcohol for injuries resulting from accidents caused by intoxicated persons when the sellers or servers contributed to the intoxication.

5–4f Defenses to Negligence

Defendants often defend against negligence claims by asserting that the plaintiffs failed to prove the existence of one or more of the required elements for negligence. Additionally, there are three basic affirmative defenses in negligence cases (defenses that a defendant can use to avoid liability even if the facts are as the plaintiff states): (1) assumption of risk, (2) superseding cause, and (3) contributory or comparative negligence.

Assumption of Risk A plaintiff who voluntarily enters into a risky situation, knowing the risk involved, will not be allowed to recover. This is the defense of assumption of risk, which requires two elements:

1. Knowledge of the risk.
2. Voluntary assumption of the risk.

Assumption of Risk A defense to negligence that bars a plaintiff from recovering for injuries or damage suffered as a result of risks that were known and voluntarily assumed.

This defense is frequently asserted when a plaintiff is injured during recreational activities that involve known risk, such as skiing and skydiving. Courts do not apply the assumption of risk doctrine in certain situations, such as those involving emergencies, however.

Assumption of risk can apply not only to participants in sporting events, but also to spectators and bystanders who are injured while attending those events. In the following Spotlight Case, the issue was whether a spectator at a baseball game voluntarily assumed the risk of being hit by an errant ball thrown while the players were warming up before the game.

---

18. These laws derive their name from the Good Samaritan story in the Bible. In the story, a traveler who had been robbed and beaten lay along the roadside, ignored by those passing by. Eventually, a man from the region of Samaria (the "Good Samaritan") stopped to render assistance to the injured person.

19. Historically, a dram was a small unit of liquid, and spirits were sold in drams. Thus, a dram shop was a place where liquor was sold in drams.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Spotlight on the Seattle Mariners: Case 5.3

Taylor v. Baseball Club of Seattle, L.P.

Court of Appeals of Washington, 132 Wash.App. 32, 130 P.3d 835 (2006).

Facts Delinda Middleton Taylor went to a Mariners baseball game at Safeco Field with her boyfriend and two minor sons. Their seats were four rows up from the field along the right field foul line. They arrived more than an hour before the game began so that they could see the players warm up and get their autographs. When she walked in, Taylor saw that Mariners pitcher Freddy Garcia was throwing a ball back and forth with José Mesa right in front of their seats. As Taylor stood in front of her seat, she looked away from the field, and a ball thrown by Mesa got past Garcia and struck her in the face, causing serious injuries. Taylor sued the Mariners for the allegedly negligent warm-up throw. The Mariners filed a motion for a summary judgment in which they argued that Taylor, a Mariners fan, was familiar with baseball and the inherent risk of balls entering the stands, and had therefore assumed the risk of her injury. The trial court granted the motion and dismissed Taylor's case. Taylor appealed.

© Alan C. Heison/Shutterstock.com

Many fans arrive at baseball games early so they can watch the players warm up.

Issue Was the risk of injury from an errant baseball thrown during pregame warm-up foreseeable to a reasonable person with Taylor's familiarity with baseball?

Decision Yes. The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment. Taylor, as a spectator in an unprotected area of seats, voluntarily undertook the risk associated with being hit by an errant baseball thrown during warm-ups before the start of the game.

Reason The court observed that there was substantial evidence that Taylor was familiar with the game. She was a seasoned Mariners fan, and both of her sons had played baseball for at least six years. "She attended many of her sons' baseball games, she witnessed balls entering the stands, she had watched Mariners' games both at the Kingdome [the Mariners' former stadium] and on television, and she knew that there was no screen protecting her seats, which were close to the field. In fact, as she walked to her seat she saw the players warming up and was excited about being in an unscreened area where her party might get autographs from the players and catch balls."

It was not legally relevant that the injury occurred during the pregame warm-up because "it is the normal, every-day practice at all levels of baseball for pitchers to warm up in the manner that led to this incident." The Mariners had satisfied their duty to protect spectators from balls entering the stands by providing a protective screen behind home plate. Taylor chose not to sit in the protected area and thus knowingly put herself at risk.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Would the result in this case have been different if Taylor's minor son, rather than Taylor herself, had been struck by the ball? Should courts apply the doctrine of assumption of risk to children? Discuss.

Superseding Cause An unforeseeable intervening event may break the connection between a wrongful act and an injury to another. If so, the event acts as a superseding cause—that is, it relieves a defendant of liability for injuries caused by the intervening event. Example 5.27 While riding his bicycle, Derrick negligently hits Julie, who is walking on the sidewalk. As a result of the impact, Julie falls and fractures her hip. While she is waiting for help to arrive, a small plane crashes nearby and explodes, and some of the fiery debris hits her, causing her to sustain severe burns. Derrick will be liable for Julie's fractured hip because the risk of hitting her with his bicycle was foreseeable. Normally, though, Derrick will not be liable for the burns caused by the plane crash, because the risk of a plane's crashing nearby and injuring Julie was not foreseeable.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Contributory Negligence All individuals are expected to exercise a reasonable degree of care in looking out for themselves. In the past, under the common law doctrine of contributory negligence, a plaintiff who was also negligent (who failed to exercise a reasonable degree of care) could not recover anything from the defendant. Under this rule, no matter how insignificant the plaintiff's negligence was relative to the defendant's negligence, the plaintiff was precluded from recovering any damages. Today, only a few jurisdictions still follow this doctrine.

Contributory Negligence A rule in tort law, used in only a few states, that completely bars the plaintiff from recovering any damages if the harm suffered is partly the plaintiff's own fault.

Comparative Negligence In most states, the doctrine of contributory negligence has been replaced by a comparative negligence standard. Under this standard, both the plaintiff's and the defendant's negligence are computed, and the liability for damages is distributed accordingly.

Some jurisdictions have adopted a "pure" form of comparative negligence that allows a plaintiff to recover even if the extent of the plaitiff's fault is greater than that of the defendant. For instance, if a plaintiff was 80 percent at fault and the defendant 20 percent at fault, the plaintiff may recover 20 percent of the actual damages.

Many states' comparative negligence statutes, however, contain a "50 percent" rule that prevents a plaintiff who was more than 50 percent at fault from recovering any damages. Under this rule, a plaintiff who is 35 percent at fault could recover 65 percent of the actual damages, but a plaintiff who is 65 percent at fault could recover nothing.

Comparative Negligence A rule in tort law, used in the majority of states, that reduces the plaintiff's recovery in proportion to the plaintiff's degree of fault, rather than barring recovery completely.

5–5 Strict Liability

Another category of torts is called strict liability, or liability without fault. Intentional torts and torts of negligence involve acts that depart from a reasonable standard of care and cause injuries. Under the doctrine of strict liability, liability for injury is imposed for reasons other than fault.

Strict Liability Liability regardless of fault, which is imposed on those engaged in abnormally dangerous activities, on persons who keep dangerous animals, and on manufacturers or sellers that introduce into commerce defective and unreasonably dangerous goods.

5–5a Abnormally Dangerous Activities

Strict liability for damages proximately caused by an abnormally dangerous or exceptional activity is one application of this doctrine. Courts apply the doctrine of strict liability in such cases because of the extreme risk of the activity. For instance, even if blasting with dynamite is performed with all reasonable care, there is still a risk of injury. Because of the potential for harm, the person who is engaged in an abnormally dangerous activity—and benefits from it—is responsible for paying for any injuries caused by that activity. Although there is no fault, there is still responsibility because of the dangerous nature of the undertaking.

5–5b Other Applications of Strict Liability

The strict liability principle is also applied in other situations. Persons who keep wild animals, for instance, are strictly liable for any harm inflicted by the animals. In addition, an owner of domestic animals may be strictly liable for harm caused by those animals if the owner knew, or should have known, that the animals were dangerous or had a propensity to harm others.

A significant application of strict liability is in the area of product liability—liability of manufacturers and sellers for harmful or defective products. Liability here is a matter of social policy. Manufacturers and sellers can better bear the cost of injuries, and because they profit from making and selling the products, they should be responsible for the injuries the products cause.

Focus Question 5

What is meant by strict liability? In what circumstances is strict liability applied?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Practice and Review

Elaine Sweeney went to Ragged Mountain Ski Resort in New Hampshire with a friend. Elaine went snow tubing down a run designed exclusively for snow tubers. No Ragged Mountain employees were present in the snow-tube area to instruct Elaine on the proper use of a snow tube. On her fourth run down the trail, Elaine crossed over the center line between snow-tube lanes, collided with another snow tuber, and was injured. Elaine filed a negligence action against Ragged Mountain seeking compensation for the injuries that she sustained. Two years earlier, the New Hampshire state legislature had enacted a statute that prohibited a person who participates in the sport of skiing from suing a ski-area operator for injuries caused by the risks inherent in skiing. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What defense will Ragged Mountain probably assert?
2. The central question in this case is whether the state statute establishing that skiers assume the risks inherent in the sport applies to Elaine's suit. What would your decision be on this issue? Why?
3. Suppose that the court concludes that the statute applies only to skiing and not to snow tubing. Will Elaine's lawsuit be successful? Explain.
4. Now suppose that the jury concludes that Elaine was partly at fault for the accident. Under what theory might her damages be reduced in proportion to how much her actions contributed to the accident and her resulting injuries?

Debate This

Each time a state legislature enacts a law that applies the assumption of risk doctrine to a particular sport, participants in that sport suffer.

Key Terms

actionable 123 actual malice 127 appropriation 129 assault 122 assumption of risk 139 battery 122 business invitee 136 business tort 131 causation in fact 137 comparative negligence 141 compensatory damages 120 contributory negligence 141 conversion 133 damages 120
defamation 124 defense 121
disparagement of property 134 dram shop act 139 duty of care 135
fraudulent misrepresentation 130
general damages 120
Good Samaritan statute 139 intentional tort 121 libel 124
malpractice 137
negligence 134 privilege 127
proximate cause 137
puffery 130 punitive damages 120 reasonable person standard 136 slander 124 slander of quality (trade libel) 134 slander of title 134 special damages 120
strict liability 141 tort 119 tortfeasor 121 transferred intent 121 trespass to land 132
trespass to personal property 133

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Chapter Summary: Tort Law

Intentional Torts against Persons	1. Assault and battery—An assault is an unexcused and intentional act that causes another person to be apprehensive of immediate physical harm. A battery is an assault that results in actual physical contact. 2. False imprisonment—The intentional confinement or restraint of another person's movement without justification. 3. Intentional infliction of emotional distress—An extreme and outrageous act, intentionally committed, that results in severe emotional distress to another. 4. Defamation (libel or slander)—A false statement of fact, not made under privilege, that is communicated to a third person and that causes damage to a person's reputation. For public figures, the plaintiff must also prove actual malice. 5. Invasion of the right to privacy—Includes four types: wrongful intrusion into a person's private activities; publication of information that places a person in a false light; public disclosure of private facts that an ordinary person would find objectionable; and appropriation of identity, which involves the use of a person's name, likeness, or other identifying characteristic, without permission and for a commercial purpose. Most states have enacted statutes establishing appropriation of identity as the tort of appropriation, or right of publicity. Courts differ on the degree of likeness required. 6. Fraudulent misrepresentation—A false representation made by one party, through misstatement of facts or through conduct, with the intention of deceiving another and on which the other reasonably relies to the other's detriment. Negligent misrepresentation occurs when a person supplies information without having a reasonable basis for believing its truthfulness. 7. Wrongful interference—The knowing, intentional interference by a third party with an enforceable contractual relationship or an established business relationship between other parties for the purpose of advancing the economic interests of the third party.
Intentional Torts against Property	1. Trespass to land—The invasion of another's real property without consent or privilege. 2. Trespass to personal property—Unlawfully damaging or interfering with the owner's right to use, possess, or enjoy personal property. 3. Conversion—Wrongfully taking, retaining, or using the personal property of another without permission. 4. Disparagement of property—Any economically injurious falsehood that is made about another's product or property. The term includes the torts of slander of quality and slander of title.
Negligence	Negligence is the failure to exercise the standard of care that a reasonable person would apply in similar circumstances. A plaintiff must prove that a legal duty of care existed, that the defendant breached that duty, that the breach actually and proximately caused the plaintiff's injury, and that the plaintiff suffered a legally recognizable injury. 1. Good Samaritan statutes—State laws that protect those who voluntarily aid another from being sued for negligence. 2. Dram shop acts—State laws that impose liability on sellers and servers of alcohol for injuries caused by intoxicated persons when the sellers or servers contributed to the intoxication. 3. Defenses to negligence—The basic affirmative defenses in negligence cases are assumption of risk, superseding cause, and contributory or comparative negligence.
Strict Liability	Under the doctrine of strict liability, parties may be held liable, regardless of the degree of care exercised, for damages or injuries caused by their products or activities. Strict liability includes liability for harms caused by abnormally dangerous activities, by dangerous animals, and by defective products (product liability).

Issue Spotters

1. Jana leaves her truck's motor running while she enters a Kwik-Pik Store. The truck's transmission engages, and the vehicle crashes into a gas pump, starting a fire that spreads to a warehouse on the next block. The warehouse collapses, causing its billboard to fall and injure Lou, a bystander. Can Lou recover from Jana? Why or why not? (See Negligence.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

2. A water pipe bursts, flooding a Metal Fabrication Company utility room and tripping the circuit breakers on a panel in the room. Metal Fabrication contacts Nouri, a licensed electrician with five years' experience, to check the damage and turn the breakers back on. Without testing for short circuits, which Nouri knows that he should do, he tries to switch on a breaker. He is electrocuted, and his wife sues Metal Fabrication for damages, alleging negligence. What might the firm successfully claim in defense? (See Negligence.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

5–1. Defamation. Richard is an employee of the Dun Construction Corp. While delivering materials to a construction site, he carelessly backs Dun's truck into a passenger vehicle driven by Green. This is Richard's second accident in six months. When the company owner, Dun, learns of this latest accident, a heated discussion ensues, and Dun fires Richard. Dun is so angry that he immediately writes a letter to the union of which Richard is a member and to all other construction companies in the community. In it, Dun states that Richard is the "worst driver in the city" and that "anyone who hires him is asking for legal liability." Richard files a suit against Dun, alleging libel on the basis of the statements made in the letters. Discuss. (See Intentional Torts against Persons.)

5–2. Liability to Business Invitees. Kim went to Ling's Market to pick up a few items for dinner. It was a stormy day, and the wind had blown water through the market's door each time it opened. As Kim entered through the door, she slipped and fell in the rainwater that had accumulated on the floor. The manager knew of the weather conditions but had not posted any sign to warn customers of the water hazard. Kim injured her back as a result of the fall and sued Ling's for damages. Can Ling's be held liable for negligence? Discuss. (See Negligence.)

5–3. Spotlight on Intentional Torts—Defamation.  Sharon Yeagle was an assistant to the vice president of student affairs at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University (Virginia Tech). As part of her duties, Yeagle helped students participate in the Governor's Fellows Program. The Collegiate Times, Virginia Tech's student newspaper, published an article about the university's success in placing students in the program. The article's text surrounded a block quotation attributed to Yeagle with the phrase "Director of Butt Licking" under her name. Yeagle sued the Collegiate Times for defamation. She argued that the phrase implied the commission of sodomy and was therefore actionable. What is Collegiate Times's defense to this claim? [Yeagle v. Collegiate Times, 497 S.E.2d 136 (Va. 1998)] (See Intentional Torts against Persons.)

5–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Negligence.  At the Weatherford Hotel in Flagstaff, Arizona, in Room 59, a balcony extends across thirty inches of the room's only window, leaving a twelve-inch gap with a three-story drop to the concrete below. A sign prohibits smoking in the room but invites guests to "step out onto the balcony" to smoke. Toni Lucario was a guest in Room 59 when she climbed out of the window and fell to her death. Patrick McMurtry, her estate's personal representative, filed a suit against the Weatherford. Did the hotel breach a duty of care to Lucario? What might the Weatherford assert in its defense? Explain. [McMurtry v. Weatherford Hotel, Inc., 293 P.3d 520 (Ariz. App. 2013)] (See Negligence.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 5–4, go to Appendix E.

5–5. Negligence. Ronald Rawls and Zabian Bailey were in an auto accident in Bridgeport, Connecticut. Bailey rear-ended Rawls at a stoplight. Evidence showed it was more likely than not that Bailey failed to apply his brakes in time to avoid the collision, failed to turn his vehicle to avoid the collision, failed to keep his vehicle under control, and was inattentive to his surroundings. Rawls filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against his insurance company, Progressive Northern Insurance Co., to obtain benefits under an underinsured motorist clause, alleging that Bailey had been negligent. Could Rawls collect? Discuss. [Rawls v. Progressive Northern Insurance Co., 310 Conn. 768, 83 A.3d 576 (2014)] (See Negligence.)

5–6. Negligence. Charles Robison, an employee of West Star Transportation, Inc., was ordered to cover an unevenly loaded flatbed trailer with a 150-pound tarpaulin. The load included uncrated equipment and pallet crates of different heights, about thirteen feet off the ground at its highest point. While standing on the load, manipulating the tarpaulin without safety equipment or assistance, Robison fell headfirst and sustained a traumatic head injury. He filed a suit against West Star to recover for his injury. Was West Star "negligent in failing to provide a reasonably safe place to work," as Robison claimed? Explain. [West Star Transportation, Inc. v. Robison, 457 S.W.3d 178 (Tex.App.—Amarillo 2015)] (See Negligence.)

5–7. Negligence. DSC Industrial Supply and Road Rider Supply are located in North Kitsap Business Park in Seattle, Washington. Both firms are owned by Paul and Suzanne Marshall. The Marshalls had outstanding commercial loans from Frontier Bank. The bank dispatched one of its employees, Suzette Gould, to North Kitsap to "spread Christmas cheer" to the Marshalls as an expression of appreciation for their business. Approaching the entry to Road Rider, Gould tripped over a concrete "wheel stop" and fell, suffering a broken arm and a dislocated elbow. The stop was not clearly visible, it had not been painted a contrasting color, and it was not marked with a sign. Gould had not been aware of the stop before she tripped over it. Is North Kitsap liable to Gould for negligence? Explain. [Gould v. North Kitsap Business Park Management, LLC, 192 Wash.App. 1021 (2016)] (See Negligence.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5–8. Defamation. Jonathan Martin, an offensive lineman with the Miami Dolphins, abruptly quit the team and checked himself into a hospital seeking psychological treatment. Later, he explained that he left because of persistent taunting from other Dolphins players. The National Football League hired attorney Theodore Wells to investigate Martin's allegations of bullying. After receiving Wells's report, the Dolphins fired their offensive line coach, James Turner. Turner was a prominent person on the Dolphins team, and during his career he chose to thrust himself further into the public arena. He was the subject of articles discussing his coaching philosophy, and the focus of one season of HBO's "Hard Knocks," showcasing his coaching style. Turner filed a suit in a federal district court against Wells, alleging defamation. He charged that Wells had failed to properly analyze certain information. Is Turner likely to succeed on his claim? Explain. [Turner v. Wells, 879 F.3d 1254 (11th Cir. 2018)] (See Intentional Torts against Persons.)

5–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Wrongful Interference. Julie Whitchurch was an employee of Vizant Technologies, LLC. After she was fired, she created a website falsely accusing Vizant of fraud and mismanagement to discourage others from doing business with the company. Vizant filed a suit in a federal district court against her, alleging wrongful interference with a business relationship. The court concluded that Whitchurch's online criticism of Vizant adversely affected its employees and operations, forced it to accept reduced compensation to obtain business, and deterred outside investment. The court ordered Whitchurch to stop her online efforts to discourage others from doing business with Vizant. [Vizant Technologies, LLC v. Whitchurch, 675 Fed.Appx. 201 (3d Cir. 2017)] (See Intentional Torts against Persons.)

1. How does the motivation for Whitchurch's conduct differ from that in other cases involving wrongful interference? What does this suggest about the ethics in this situation? Discuss.
2. Another group will argue that the statute does not violate litigants' right of access to the courts. Using the IDDR approach, analyze and evaluate Vizant's decision to file a suit against Whitchurch.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

5–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Negligence. Donald and Gloria Bowden hosted a cookout at their home in South Carolina, inviting mostly business acquaintances. Justin Parks, who was nineteen years old, attended the party. Alcoholic beverages were available to all of the guests, even those who, like Parks, were between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one.

Parks consumed alcohol at the party and left with other guests. One of these guests detained Parks at the guest's home to give Parks time to "sober up." Parks then drove himself from this guest's home and was killed in a one-car accident. At the time of death, he had a blood alcohol content of 0.291 percent, which exceeded the state's limit for driving a motor vehicle. Linda Marcum, Parks's mother, filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against the Bowdens and others, alleging negligence. (See Negligence.)

1. The first group will present arguments in favor of holding the social hosts (Donald and Gloria Bowden) liable in this situation.
2. The second group will formulate arguments against holding the social hosts liable.
3. The states vary widely in assessing liability and imposing sanctions in the circumstances described in this problem. The third group will analyze the possible reasons why some courts treat social hosts who serve alcohol differently than parents who serve alcohol to their underage children.
4. The fourth group will decide whether the guest who detained Parks at his home to give Parks time to sober up could be held liable for negligence. What defense might this guest raise?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

6 Product Liability

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. Can a manufacturer be held liable to any person who suffers an injury proximately caused by the manufacturer's negligently made product?
2. What are the elements of a cause of action in strict product liability?
3. What are three types of product defects?
4. What defenses to liability can be raised in a product liability lawsuit?

Product Liability The legal liability of manufacturers, sellers, and lessors of goods for injuries or damage caused by the goods to consumers, users, or bystanders.

"You only have to do a very few things right in your life so long as you don't do too many things wrong."

Warren Buffett
1930–present (American businessman and the most successful investor in the twentieth century)

An area of tort law of particular importance to businesspersons is product liability. As Warren Buffett implies in the chapter-opening quote, to be successful, a business cannot make too many mistakes. This is especially true for businesses that make or sell products. The manufacturers and sellers of products may incur product liability when product defects cause injury or property damage to consumers, users, or bystanders (people in the vicinity of the product when it fails).

Suppose that Brandon is riding a Polaris all-terrain vehicle (ATV) that bursts into flame. Under product liability laws, he could sue Polaris. Indeed, Polaris is facing numerous product liability lawsuits from plaintiffs who were harmed when one of the company's ATVs caught fire. Despite claiming that riders contributed to their burns and other injuries by misusing its products, Polaris has recalled over 100,000 ATVs because of fire hazards.

In this chapter, you will learn about various theories of product liability under which plaintiffs can sue. Remember that although multimillion-dollar product liability lawsuits often involve big automakers, pharmaceutical companies, and the tobacco industry, many businesses face potential liability for the products they sell.

6–1 Product Liability Claims

Those who make, sell, or lease goods can be held liable for physical harm or property damage caused by those goods to a consumer, user, or bystander. This is called product liability. Product liability claims may be based on the tort theories of negligence,

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Johnson & Johnson Faces Continuing Lawsuits Over Its Talcum Powder

In 1892, the director of scientific affairs of Johnson & Johnson (J&J) invented scented talcum powder. Talcum, or talc, is a soft mineral found in rock deposits. This invention quickly became J&J's Baby Powder, known throughout the world. Over time, the product expanded beyond being used on babies after a diaper change. In the early 1900s, women began applying the powder to their bodies and undergarments for a fresh scent.

In the 1970s, several studies suggested that using talc around the female genital area increased a woman's risk of ovarian cancer. Despite these studies, J&J denied the findings and did not include any warning labels on its talc-based products. The company has faced numerous setbacks in court, including one New Jersey case in which four plaintiffs were awarded almost $225 million—80 percent of which was in the form of punitive damages. Why punitive damages? Because the jury was convinced that J&J had withheld critical information about a possible relationship between cancer and talcum powder for more than four decades. Still facing thousands of lawsuits claiming that its talcum powder caused cancer, in 2020 J&J announced that it would stop selling the product in North America.

J&J maintains that "thousands of tests" have failed to show any connection between its products and cancer. (Even after federal researchers found traces of a carcinogen in J&J's Baby Powder, forcing the company to recall 33,000 containers of the product, the company responded by questioning the validity of the government's testing process.) Moreover, the International Agency for Research on Cancer classifies genital use of talc as only "possibly" carcinogenic—that is, having the potential to cause cancer. After all, talc is found in a wide variety of cosmetic products and has other uses, such as in paints and plastics.

Key Point

Product liability lawsuits are common for large corporations. Note that in the talcum powder cases, 90 percent or more of the jury awards were for "failure to warn." J&J could have warned consumers of a potential link between genital use of talcum powder and ovarian cancer, but it did not. Of course, sales of talc-based products would not have grown so rapidly had such a warning been evident on each J&J Baby Powder container.

fraudulent misrepresentation, and strict liability. Sometimes, a business faces multiple product liability lawsuits over the same product, as discussed in this chapter's Business Web Log feature.

6–1a Negligence

Negligence is the failure to exercise the degree of care that a reasonable, prudent person would have exercised under the circumstances. If a manufacturer fails to exercise "due care" to make a product safe, a person who is injured by the product may sue the manufacturer for negligence.

Due Care Must Be Exercised The manufacturer must exercise due care in all of the following areas:

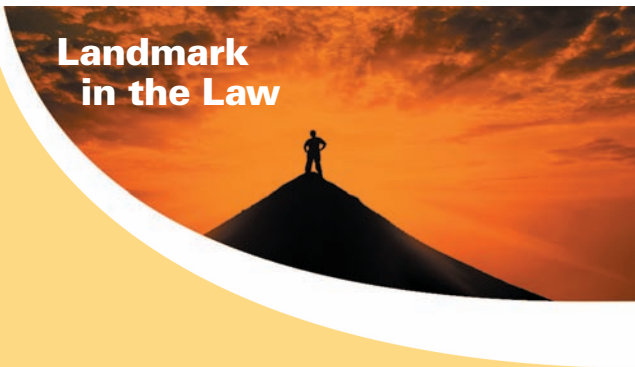
1. Designing the product.
2. Selecting the materials.
3. Using the appropriate production process.
4. Assembling and testing the product.
5. Placing adequate warnings on the label to inform the user of dangers of which an ordinary person might not be aware.
6. Inspecting and testing any purchased components used in the final product.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus Question 1

Can a manufacturer be held liable to any person who suffers an injury proximately caused by the manufacturer's negligently made product?

Privity of Contract The relationship that exists between the promisor and the promisee of a contract.



Privity of Contract Not Required A product liability action based on negligence does not require privity of contract between the injured plaintiff and the defendant manufacturer. Privity of contract refers to the relationship that exists between the promisor and the promisee of a contract. Privity is the reason that normally only the parties to a contract can enforce that contract.

In the context of product liability law, privity is not required. A person who is injured by a defective product can bring a negligence suit even though that person was not the one who actually purchased the product—and thus is not in privity. A manufacturer is liable for its failure to exercise due care to any person who sustains an injury proximately caused by a negligently made (defective) product.

Relative to the long history of the common law, this exception to the privity requirement is a fairly recent development, dating to the early part of the twentieth century. A leading case in this area is MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., which is presented as this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature.

"Cause in Fact" and Proximate Cause In a product liability suit based on negligence, as in any action alleging that the defendant was negligent, the plaintiff must show that the defendant's conduct was the "cause in fact" of an injury. Cause in fact requires showing that but for the defendant's action, the injury would not have occurred. It must also be determined that the defendant's act was the proximate cause of the injury. This determination focuses on the foreseeability of the consequences of the act and whether the defendant should be held legally responsible.

MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co. (1916)

In the landmark case of MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co.,[a] the New York Court of Appeals—New York's highest court—considered the liability of a manufacturer that had failed to exercise reasonable care in manufacturing a finished product.

Case Background Donald MacPherson suffered injuries while riding in a Buick automobile that suddenly collapsed because one of the wheels was made of defective wood. The spokes crumbled into fragments, throwing MacPherson out of the vehicle and injuring him.

MacPherson had purchased the car from a Buick dealer, but he brought a lawsuit against the manufacturer, Buick Motor Company. Buick itself had not made the wheel but had bought it from another manufacturer. There was evidence, though, that Buick could have discovered the defects by conducting a reasonable inspection and that no such inspection had taken place. MacPherson charged Buick with negligence for putting a human life in imminent danger.

The Issue Before the Court and the Court's Ruling The primary issue was whether Buick owed a duty of care to anyone except the immediate purchaser of the car—that is, the Buick dealer. In deciding the issue, Justice Benjamin Cardozo stated that "if the nature of a thing is such that it is reasonably certain to place life and limb in peril when negligently made, it is then a thing of danger. . . . If to the element of danger there is added knowledge that the thing will be used by persons other than the purchaser, and used without new tests, then, irrespective of contract, the manufacturer of this thing of danger is under a duty to make it carefully."

The court concluded that "beyond all question, the nature of an automobile gives warning of probable danger if its construction is defective. This automobile was designed to go 50 miles an hour. Unless its wheels were sound and strong, injury was almost certain." Although Buick itself had not manufactured the wheel, the court held that Buick had a duty to inspect the wheels and that Buick "was responsible for the finished product." Therefore, Buick was liable to MacPherson for the injuries he sustained when he was thrown from the car.

Application to Today's World This landmark decision was a significant step in creating the legal environment of the modern world. As often happens, technological developments necessitated changes in the law. Today, automobile manufacturers are commonly held liable when their negligence causes automobile users to be injured.

a. 217 N.Y. 382, 111 N.E. 1050 (1916).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

At issue in the following case was whether the proximate cause of the injury to a product's user was the manufacturer's inadequate warnings or the purchaser's failure to follow the manufacturer's maintenance instructions.

Case 6.1

Primal Vantage Co. v. O'Bryan

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, __ S.W.3d __, 2019 WL 6044870 (2019).

Facts Dennis Martin owned a hunting stand (called a ladderstand) made by Primal Vantage Company. The stand consisted of a platform fifteen feet above the ground with an attached ladder. Five polypropylene straps secured the stand to a tree. On a hunting trip on Martin's property, Kevin O'Bryan climbed the stand's ladder. At that time, the stand had been affixed to the tree for five years without inspection or maintenance, and two of the straps had deteriorated and broken. When O'Bryan reached the platform, the remaining straps broke, and the stand collapsed. O'Bryan—seriously injured, paralyzed from the waist down, and suffering unremitting pain—filed a suit in a Kentucky state court against Primal Vantage, alleging product liability. A jury awarded O'Bryan damages on a finding that the warnings accompanying the stand were inadequate. The court ordered the damages to be paid to O'Bryan, and Primal Vantage appealed.

Issue Was the inadequacy of the warnings the proximate cause of the accident?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's order. "Primal Vantage in the exercise of ordinary care should have been aware that the stand was unreasonably dangerous and failed to provide an adequate warning."

Reason Primal Vantage asserted that it was entitled to a verdict in its favor. A label on the stand told users to inspect the stand and not to use it if any parts were damaged or missing. Primal Vantage contended that even if these warnings were inadequate, that factor was not the proximate cause of O'Bryan's accident, because he admitted that he had never read them. "The real cause," the company argued, "was Martin's failure to inspect and maintain the ladderstand." The appellate court explained that the adequacy of a warning is measured not only by its content but also by its placement and visibility. This warning was on the back of the ladder. O'Bryan testified that if the warning had been visible, he would have read it and would not have climbed the ladder to the platform. Ultimately, the appellate court did not rule in Primal Vantage's favor. The court responded to the stand maker's argument by citing the principle that "except in extraordinary circumstances, the negligence of an intervening party does not relieve the manufacturer of the duty to warn adequately." If a product user's injury results from a manufacturer's breach of its duty of care, the manufacturer is liable for the harm.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment In the initial trial, should the jury have found that O'Bryan was also at fault? How might this finding have affected the award of damages? Explain.
- Economic During voir dire*, a potential juror asked whether the jury would be told how much Primal Vantage's insurance company would pay if O'Bryan was awarded damages. How should the court have responded? Why?*

6–1b Misrepresentation

When a user or consumer is injured as a result of a manufacturer's or seller's fraudulent misrepresentation, the basis of liability may be the tort of fraud. In this situation, the misrepresentation must have been made knowingly or with reckless disregard for the facts. The intentional mislabeling of packaged cosmetics, for instance, or the intentional concealment of a product's defects constitutes fraudulent misrepresentation.

The misrepresentation must be of a material fact, and the seller must have intended to induce the buyer's reliance on the misrepresentation. Misrepresentation on a label or advertisement is enough to show the intent to induce reliance. Of course, to bring a lawsuit on this ground, the buyer must have relied on the misrepresentation.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

6–2 Strict Product Liability

Under the doctrine of strict liability, people may be liable for the results of their acts regardless of their intentions or their exercise of reasonable care. In addition, liability does not depend on privity of contract. The injured party does not have to be the buyer or a third party beneficiary (one for whose benefit a contract is made). In the 1960s, courts applied the doctrine of strict liability in several landmark cases involving manufactured goods, and this doctrine has since become a common method of holding manufacturers liable.

6–2a Strict Product Liability and Public Policy

The law imposes strict product liability as a matter of public policy. The public policy concerning strict product liability may be expressed in a statute or in the common law. This public policy rests on a threefold assumption:

1. Consumers should be protected against unsafe products.
2. Manufacturers and distributors should not escape liability for faulty products simply because they are not in privity of contract with the ultimate user of those products.
3. Manufacturers, sellers, and lessors of products are generally in a better position than consumers to bear the costs associated with injuries caused by their products. They can ultimately pass on these costs to all consumers in the form of higher prices.

gpointstudio/iStock/Getty Images

If a power tool is defective and injures a user, does the user sue under contract law or tort law?

Classic Case Example 6.1 William Greenman was injured when his Shopsmith combination power tool threw off a piece of wood that struck him in the head. He sued the manufacturer, claiming that he had followed the product instructions and that the product must be defective.

In a landmark decision, Greenman v. Yuba Power Products, Inc.,[1] the California Supreme Court set out the reason for applying tort law rather than contract law in cases involving consumers who were injured by defective products. According to the Greenman court, the "purpose of such liability is to [e]nsure that the costs of injuries resulting from defective products are borne by the manufacturers . . . rather than by the injured persons who are powerless to protect themselves." Today, the majority of states recognize strict product liability, although some state courts limit its application to situations involving personal injuries (rather than property damage).

6–2b Requirements for Strict Product Liability

Focus Question 2

What are the elements of a cause of action in strict product liability?

After the Restatement (Second) of Torts was issued in 1964, Section 402A became a widely accepted statement of how the doctrine of strict liability should be applied to sellers of goods. These sellers include manufacturers, processors, assemblers, packagers, bottlers, wholesalers, distributors, retailers, and lessors.

The bases for an action in strict liability that are set forth in Section 402A can be summarized as the following six requirements. Depending on the jurisdiction, if these requirements are met, a manufacturer's liability to an injured party can be almost unlimited.

1. The product must have been in a defective condition when the defendant sold it.
2. The defendant must normally be engaged in the business of selling (or otherwise distributing) that product.
3. The product must be unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer because of its defective condition.

1. 59 Cal.2d 57, 377 P.2d 897, 27 Cal.Rptr. 697 (1962); see also, Okoye v. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., 2017 WL 1435886 (N.D.Cal. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

4. The plaintiff must incur physical harm to self or property by use or consumption of the product.
5. The defective condition must be the actual and legal cause of the injury or damage.
6. The goods must not have been substantially changed from the time the product was sold to the time the injury was sustained.

Proving a Defective Condition Under these requirements, in any action against a manufacturer, seller, or lessor, the plaintiff does not have to show why or how the product became defective. The plaintiff does, however, have to prove that the product was defective at the time it left the seller or lessor and that this defective condition made it "unreasonably dangerous" to the user or consumer.

Unless evidence can be presented that will support the conclusion that the product was defective when it was sold or leased, the plaintiff normally will not succeed. If the product was delivered in a safe condition and subsequent mishandling made it harmful to the user, the seller or lessor usually is not strictly liable.

nikkytok/iStock/Getty Images

Does a person injured by a defective air bag have to prove that it was defective when the car was manufactured?

Unreasonably Dangerous Products The Restatement recognizes that many products cannot possibly be made entirely safe for all uses. Thus, sellers or lessors of these products are held liable only when the products are unreasonably dangerous. A court may consider a product so defective as to be an unreasonably dangerous product in either of the following situations.

1. The product is dangerous beyond the expectation of the ordinary consumer.
2. A less dangerous alternative was economically feasible for the manufacturer, but the manufacturer failed to produce it.

Unreasonably Dangerous Product A product that is so defective that it is dangerous beyond the expectation of an ordinary consumer, or a product for which a less dangerous alternative was feasible but the manufacturer failed to produce it.

A product may be unreasonably dangerous due to a flaw in its manufacturing, design, or warning. As discussed in this chapter's Cybersecurity and the Law feature, the law is still unsettled when it comes to a manufacturer's strict liability if the flaw is in the product's security system.

Cybersecurity and the Law

The Internet of Things

The Internet of Things (IoT) refers to the online interconnection of computing devices imbedded in objects such as window shades, refrigerators, and health monitors. Each IoT device contains software that, like any computer software, is vulnerable to outside attack, or hacking. The inevitable harm caused by IoT hacking is likely to impact American business in the form of strict product liability lawsuits.

Unreasonably Dangerous?

If a defective oven catches fire, under strict product liability the manufacturer will most likely be held liable for any harm that results. But what if a cyber criminal gains control of a smart oven, causing it to catch fire and injure its owner? Does an ineffective IoT cybersecurity system make a product "unreasonably dangerous" to the consumer, leaving the manufacturer strictly liable? What if the problem was a glitch in the smart oven's software? Is software a "product" for the purposes of strict product liability?

As with any new legal issue caused by advancing technology, the answers to these questions will come from a combination of case law and legislation. California was the first state to regulate the IoT by requiring manufacturers of Internet-connected devices to equip them with "reasonable security features."[a] Ultimately, state courts

a. Cal. Civ. Code Section 1798.91.04(a).

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

will determine to what extent this law exposes manufacturers to strict product liability. It should not take long for the issue to arise, in California or elsewhere. Approximately 25 billion IoT products are in use, with billions more poised to enter workplaces, homes, and automobiles in the near future.

Critical Thinking

Security engineers discovered that faulty coding in the Chrysler Jeep's entertainment software made the car vulnerable to cyber attacks, conceivably enabling hackers to gain control of the vehicles. The United States Supreme Court has allowed a breach of warranty lawsuit against Chrysler by Jeep owners who contend that they would not have purchased the cars had they known about the security defect. Why might the outcome of this case be important for strict product liability law?

6–2c Product Defects

The Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability defines the three types of product defects that have traditionally been recognized in product liability law—manufacturing defects, design defects, and inadequate warnings.

Focus Question 3

What are three types of product defects?

Manufacturing Defects According to Section 2(a) of the Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability, a product "contains a manufacturing defect when the product departs from its intended design even though all possible care was exercised in the preparation and marketing of the product." Basically, a manufacturing defect is a departure from design specifications that results in products that are physically flawed, damaged, or incorrectly assembled. A glass bottle that is made too thin, causing it to explode in a consumer's face, is an example of a product with a manufacturing defect.

Quality Control. Usually, manufacturing defects occur when a manufacturer fails to assemble, test, or check the quality of a product adequately. In fact, the idea behind holding defendants strictly liable for manufacturing defects is to encourage greater investment in product safety and stringent quality control standards. Note that liability is imposed on a manufacturer (and on the wholesaler and retailer) regardless of whether the manufacturer's quality control efforts were "reasonable."

The Role of Expert Testimony. Cases involving allegations of a manufacturing defect are often decided based on the opinions and testimony of experts. Case Example 6.2 Preston Cavner was seriously injured when the Cessna U206F plane he was piloting crashed shortly after takeoff. Cavner's wife, son, and a babysitter were also injured in the accident, and another son was killed. He filed a lawsuit against the manufacturer of the plane's engine, Continental Motors, Inc. (CMI), based on a manufacturing defect.

At trial, experts testified that there were "burrs," or sharp metal edges, in the Cessna's engine cylinders, a violation of CMI's design specifications. These burrs broke off and lodged in the engine's valves, leading to a loss of power and the resulting crash. A jury concluded that this manufacturing defect made the airplane unreasonably dangerous and awarded Cavner and the other injured parties more than $20 million in damages.[2]

Design Defects Unlike a product with a manufacturing defect, a product with a design defect is made in conformity with the manufacturer's design specifications. Nevertheless, it

2. Cavner v. Continental Motors, Inc., 2019 WL 1254015 (8 Wash.App.2d 1001, 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

results in injury to the user because the design itself is flawed. The product's design creates an unreasonable risk to the user.

A product "is defective in design when the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product could have been reduced or avoided by the adoption of a reasonable alternative design by the seller or other distributor, or a predecessor in the commercial chain of distribution, and the omission of the alternative design renders the product not reasonably safe."[3] See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for an example of how courts analyze design defects.

Test for Design Defects. To successfully assert a design defect, a plaintiff has to show that:

1. A reasonable alternative design was available.
2. As a result of the defendant's failure to adopt the alternative design, the product was not reasonably safe.

In other words, a manufacturer or other defendant is liable only when the harm was reasonably preventable.

Example 6.3 Gillespie accidentally cuts off several of his fingers while operating a table saw. He later files a lawsuit against the maker of the saw, claiming that the blade guards on the saw were defectively designed. At trial, however, an expert testifies that the alternative design for blade guards used for table saws could not have been used for the particular cut that Gillespie was performing at the time he was injured. In this situation, Gillespie's claim will likely fail because there is no proof that the "better" guard design would have prevented his injury.

According to the Official Comments accompanying the Restatement (Third) of Torts, a court can consider a broad range of factors in deciding claims of design defects. These

3. Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability, Section 2(b).

How State Legislation Can Limit Recovery for Design Defects

Business Law Analysis

David Dobrovolny bought a new Ford F-350 pickup truck. A year later, the truck spontaneously caught fire in Dobrovolny's driveway. The truck was destroyed, but no other property was damaged, and no one was injured. Dobrovolny filed a suit in a Nebraska state court against Ford Motor Company on a theory of strict product liability to recover the cost of the truck. Nebraska limits the application of strict product liability to situations involving personal injuries. Will Dobrovolny's lawsuit succeed? Why or why not?

Analysis: The majority of states recognize strict product liability. The purpose of strict product liability is to ensure that the costs of injuries resulting from defective products are borne by the manufacturers rather than by the injured persons. The law imposes this liability as a matter of public policy. Some state courts limit the application of the tort theory of strict product liability to situations involving personal injuries rather than property damage.

Nebraska recognizes strict product liability, but the state's courts limit its application. The issue is whether these limits apply when a product self-destructs without causing damage to persons or other property.

Result and Reasoning: Because Nebraska limits strict product liability suits to situations involving personal injury, a court will most likely dismiss Dobrovolny's design defect claim. When a product injures only itself, the reasons for imposing strict product liability lose their significance. The consumer has not been injured, and the loss concerns the consumer's benefit of the bargain from the contract with the seller of the product. Although a consumer with only a damaged product may not recover in tort, the consumer is not without other remedies. Dobrovolny may attempt to recover for the loss of his truck under contract theories for breach of warranty.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

factors include the magnitude and probability of the foreseeable risks, as well as the relative advantages and disadvantages of the product as it was designed and as it alternatively could have been designed.

Risk-Utility Analysis. Most courts engage in a risk-utility analysis, determining whether the risk of harm from the product as designed outweighs its utility to the user and to the public. Case Example 6.4 Benjamin Riley, a county sheriff, was driving his Ford F-150 pickup truck near Ehrhardt, South Carolina, when it collided with another vehicle. The impact caused Riley's truck to leave the road and roll over. The driver's door of the truck opened in the collision, and Riley was ejected and killed. Riley's widow, Laura, as the representative of his estate, filed a product liability suit against Ford Motor Company. She claimed that the design of the door-latch system of the truck allowed the door to open in the collision. A state court held in her favor and awarded the estate $900,000 in damages.

Ford appealed, but the court found that a reasonable alternative design was available for the door-latch system. Evidence showed that Ford was aware of the safety problems presented by the current system (a rod-linkage system). After conducting a risk-utility analysis of a different system (a cable-linkage system), Ford had concluded that the alternative system was feasible and perhaps superior. The state's highest court affirmed the damages award.[4]

Robert Landau/Corbis Documentary/Getty Images

What creates a design defect in an umpire or catcher's facemask?

Consumer-Expectation Test. Instead of the risk-utility test, some courts apply the consumer-expectation test to determine whether a product's design was defective. Under this test, a product is unreasonably dangerous when it fails to perform in the manner that would reasonably be expected by an ordinary consumer.

Case Example 6.5 A representative from Wilson Sporting Goods Company gave Edwin Hickox an umpire's mask that was designed to be safer than other umpire's masks. The mask had a newly designed throat guard that angled forward instead of extending straight down. While Hickox was working as an umpire during a game and wearing the mask, he was was struck by a foul ball and injured. He suffered a concussion and damage to his inner ear, which caused permanent hearing loss. Hickox and his wife sued the manufacturer for product liability based on a defective design and won. A jury awarded $750,000 to Hickox and $25,000 to his wife. Wilson appealed.

The reviewing court affirmed the jury's verdict. The design was defective because "an ordinary consumer would have expected the mask to perform more safely than it did." The evidence presented to the jury had shown that Wilson's mask was more dangerous than comparable masks sold at the time. The new "masks could concentrate energy at the point of impact, rather than distribute energy evenly throughout the padded area of the mask," as an ordinary consumer would have expected a baseball mask to do.[5]

Inadequate Warnings A product may also be deemed defective because of inadequate instructions or warnings. A product will be considered defective "when the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product could have been reduced or avoided by the provision of reasonable instructions or warnings by the seller or other distributor, or a predecessor in the commercial chain of distribution, and the omission of the instructions or warnings renders the product not reasonably safe."[6] Generally, a seller must also warn consumers of the harm that can result from the foreseeable misuse of its product.

Note that plaintiffs must show that inadequate warnings were the proximate cause of the injuries that they sustained. In the following case, a drug manufacturer argued that an injured plaintiff failed to prove that an inadequate warning was the cause of his injuries.

4. Riley v. Ford Motor Co., 414 S.C. 185, 777 S.E.2d 824 (2015).
5. Wilson Sporting Goods Co. v. Hickox, 59 A.3d 1267 (D.C.App. 2013).
6. Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability, Section 2(c).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 6.2

Stange v. Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc.

Superior Court of Pennsylvania,2018 PA Super 4, 179A.3d 45 (2018).

Facts Timothy Stange was twelve years old when his physician, Dr. Edward Kovnar, prescribed Risperdal, an antipsychotic drug, for Stange's Tourette's syndrome. (Tourette's syndrome is a neurological disorder characterized by repetitive behaviors and vocalizations, called tics.) Stange subsequently developed female breasts, a condition known as gynecomastia. Surgery successfully removed his breasts, but left him with permanent scars and pain. Risperdal is made by Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. Janssen knew that gynecomastia was a frequent adverse event in children and adolescents who took Risperdal. But its label stated that the disorder's occurrence in those who took Risperdal was "rare." Stange filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Janssen, alleging that the maker negligently failed to adequately warn of the risk of gynecomastia associated with Risperdal use. The court entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for more than $500,000. Janssen appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

Issue Did Stange prove that an inadequate warning was the cause of his injuries?

Decision Yes. The appellate court affirmed the judgment in favor of Stange. "Due to Janssen's inadequate labeling and failure to warn, Dr. Kovnar was unaware of the specific heightened risks associated with the use of Risperdal."

Reason The court explained that in a case involving the failure to warn of a risk associated with a prescription drug, a plaintiff must prove that the manufacturer failed to exercise reasonable care to inform a physician of facts that make the drug likely to be dangerous. A physician must be fully aware of the drug's characteristics to properly decide whether to prescribe it. In this case, Janssen knew that gynecomastia was a frequent adverse event associated with Risperdal, not "rare." But the drug maker intentionally downplayed the risk of gynecomastia for adolescent boys using Risperdal. The drug label's "warnings were not accurate, strong, or clear. Instead, the warnings, to the extent they warned at all, were inaccurate and misleading about the risks." The court pointed out that Kovnar testified he would not have prescribed Risperdal to Stange if he had been aware of the increased risk.

Critical Thinking

- Economic Why did Janssen downplay the risks of Risperdal in the warnings to physicians? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that instead of suffering harm through a prescription drug's legitimate use, the plaintiff had been injured by a drug's illegal abuse. Would the result have been different? Explain.

Content of Warnings. Important factors for a court to consider include the risks of a product, the "content and comprehensibility" and "intensity of expression" of warnings and instructions, and the "characteristics of expected user groups."[7] Courts apply a "reasonableness" test to determine if the warnings adequately alert consumers to the product's risks. For instance, children will likely respond more readily to bright, bold, simple warning labels, while educated adults might need more detailed information. For more on tips on making sure a product's warnings are adequate, see this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature.

Case Example 6.6 Jeffrey Johnson was taken to the emergency room for an episode of atrial fibrillation, a heart rhythm disorder. Dr. David Hahn used a defibrillator manufactured by Medtronic, Inc., to deliver electric shocks to Johnson's heart. The defibrillator had synchronous and asynchronous modes, and it reverted to the asynchronous mode after each use. Hahn intended to deliver synchronized shocks, which required him to select the synchronous mode for each shock. Hahn did not read the device's instructions, which Medtronic had provided both in a manual and on the device itself. As a result, he delivered one synchronized shock, followed by twelve asynchronous shocks that endangered Johnson's life.

7. Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability, Section 2, Comment h.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

When Is a Warning Legally Bulletproof?

A company can develop and sell a perfectly manufactured and designed product, yet still face product liability lawsuits for defective warnings. A product may be defective because of inadequate instructions or warnings when the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product could have been reduced by reasonable warnings offered by the seller or other distributor. Manufacturers and distributors have a duty to warn users of any hidden dangers in their products. Additionally, they have a duty to instruct users in how to use the product to avoid any dangers. Warnings generally must be clear and specific. They must also be conspicuous.

When No Warning Is Required

Not all manufacturers have to provide warnings. People are expected to know that knives can cut fingers, for instance, so a seller need not place a bright orange label on each knife sold reminding consumers of this danger. Most household products are generally safe when used as intended.

In a New Jersey case, a ten-year-old boy was injured when he fell and struck his face on a Razor A kick scooter's handlebars. The padded end caps on the handlebars had deteriorated, and the boy's mother had thrown them away, exposing the handlebars' metal ends.

The boy and his mother sued, claiming that the manufacturer was required to provide a warning to prevent injuries of this type. The appellate court noted, however, that the plaintiffs were not able to claim that the Razor A was defective. "Lacking evidence that Razor A's end-cap design was defective, plaintiffs cannot show that Razor A had a duty to warn of such a defect, and therefore cannot make out their failure to warn claim."[a]

In an Indiana case, an employee of a concrete contractor was injured at a construction site when his head was struck by a sixteen-foot-long two-by-four board that had dislodged from a concrete formwork system. The employee sued the construction manager and the manufacturer of the formwork system for failure to warn. The court decided that the danger that lumber used in this formwork system could eject and strike a person was open and obvious. Therefore, neither the construction manager nor the manufacturer of the system was liable for failing to warn the employee.[b]

Medical Warnings

In a case involving a surgical procedure, a woman suffered severe damage to her pelvis that turned out to be permanent. Her lawsuit against the manufacturer of the mesh implant that caused the damage included a failure-to-warn claim. At trial, her physician testified that, if the manufacturer's "Instructions for Use" had informed him about the significant possibility of permanent damage, he would have chosen a different treatment plan. A federal appeals court upheld the jury's $20 million award, holding that the manufacturer's short, generic warning of risk did not provide enough information to either the plaintiff or her physician.[c]

The appeals court noted that, if the mesh implant manufacturer had provided ample warning, it might have been protected by the learned intermediary doctrine. Under this legal theory, a properly informed physician bears the responsibility to explain the risks of any drug or medical procedure to the patient. Opioid manufacturers have turned to the learned intermediary doctrine as a defense against product liability lawsuits stemming from the many thousands of fatal overdoses linked to their product in recent years. At least one court has rejected this approach, however, holding that an opioid manufacturer's aggressive marketing strategies negated any defense that proper label warnings would have provided.[d]

Business Questions

1. To protect themselves, manufacturers have been forced to include lengthy safety warnings for their products. What might be the downside of such warnings?

2. Does a manufacturer have to create safety warnings for every product? Why or why not?

a. Vann v. Toys R Us, 2014 WL3537937 (N.J.Sup.A.D. 2014).
b. Gleaves v. Messer Construction Co., 77 N.E.3d 1244 (Ind. App. 2017).
c. Kaiser v. Johnson & Johnson, 947 F.3d 996 (7th Cir. 2020).
d. Commonwealth v. Purdue Pharma, L.P. et al., 2019 WL 5495866 (36 Mass.L.Rptr. 56 2019).

Johnson and his wife filed a product liability suit against Medtronic asserting that Medtronic had provided inadequate warnings about the defibrillator and that the device had a design defect. A Missouri appellate court held that the Johnsons could not pursue a claim based on the inadequacy of Medtronic's warnings, but they could pursue a claim alleging a design defect. The court reasoned that in some cases, "a manufacturer may be held liable where it chooses to warn of the danger . . . rather than preclude the danger by design."[8]

8. Johnson v. Medtronic, Inc., 365 S.W.3d 226 (Mo.App. 2012).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Obvious Risks. There is no duty to warn about risks that are obvious or commonly known. Warnings about such risks do not add to the safety of a product and could even detract from it by making other warnings seem less significant. As will be discussed later in this chapter, the obviousness of a risk and a user's decision to proceed in the face of that risk may be a defense in a product liability suit based on an inadequate warning.

Example 6.7 Sixteen-year-old Lana attempts to do a back flip on a trampoline and fails. She is paralyzed as a result. There are nine warning labels affixed to the trampoline, an instruction manual with safety warnings, and a placard attached at the entrance advising users not to do flips. If Lana sues the manufacturer for inadequate warnings, she is likely to lose. The warning labels are probably sufficient to make the risks obvious and insulate the manufacturer from liability for her injuries.

alexemanuel/iStock/Getty Images

How many and what types of warnings against doing back flips on this trampoline must be affixed to eliminate the manufacturer's liability?

Risks that may seem obvious to some users will not be obvious to all users. This is a particular problem when users are likely to be children. A young child may not be able to read or understand warning labels or comprehend the risk of certain activities. To avoid liability, the manufacturer would have to prove that the warnings it provided were adequate to make the risk of injury obvious to a young child.

State Laws and Constitutionality. An action alleging that a product is defective due to an inadequate label can be based on state law, but that law must not violate the U.S. Constitution. Case Example 6.8 California once enacted a law imposing restrictions and a labeling requirement on the sale or rental of "violent video games" to minors. Although the video game industry had adopted a voluntary rating system for games, the legislators deemed those labels inadequate. The Video Software Dealers Association and the Entertainment Software Association immediately filed a suit in federal court to invalidate the law, and the law was struck down. The court found that the definition of a violent video game in California's law was unconstitutionally vague and violated the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech.[9]

6–2d Market-Share Liability

Generally, in cases involving product liability, a plaintiff must prove that the defective product that caused the injury was made by a specific defendant. In a few situations, however, courts have dropped this requirement when a plaintiff cannot prove which of many distributors of a harmful product supplied the particular product that caused the injury. Under a theory of market-share liability, a court can hold each manufacturer responsible for a percentage of the plaintiff's damages that is equal to the percentage of its market share.

Market-Share Liability A theory under which liability is shared among all firms that manufactured and distributed a particular product during a certain period of time. This form of liability sharing is used only when the specific source of the harmful product is unidentifiable.

Case Example 6.9 Suffolk County Water Authority (SCWA) is a municipal water supplier in Suffolk County, New York. SCWA discovered the presence of a toxic chemical, perchloroethylene (PCE), used by dry cleaners and others in its local water. SCWA filed a product liability lawsuit against Dow Chemical Corporation and other companies that manufactured and distributed PCE. Dow filed a motion to dismiss the case for failure to state a claim, since SCWA could not identify each defendant whose allegedly defective product had caused the water contamination.

9. Video Software Dealers Association v. Schwarzenegger, 556 F.3d 950 (9th Cir. 2009); Brown v. Entertainment Merchants Association, 564 U.S. 786, 131 S.Ct. 2729, 180 L.Ed.2d 708 (2011).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

A state trial court refused to dismiss the action, holding that SWCA's allegations were sufficient to invoke market-share liability. Under market-share liability, the burden of identification shifts to defendants if the plaintiff establishes a prima facie case on every element of the claim except identification of the specific defendant. (A prima facie case is one in which the plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence for the claim to go forward.)[10]

Courts in many jurisdictions do not recognize market-share liability, believing that it deviates too significantly from traditional legal principles. Jurisdictions that do recognize this theory of liability apply it only when it is difficult or impossible to determine which company made a particular product.

6–2e Other Applications of Strict Liability

Almost all courts extend the strict liability of manufacturers and other sellers to injured bystanders. Example 6.10 A forklift that Trent is operating will not go into reverse, and as a result, it runs into a bystander. In this situation, the bystander can sue the manufacturer of the defective forklift under strict liability (and possibly bring a negligence action against the forklift operator as well).

Strict liability also applies to suppliers of component parts. Example 6.11 Toyota buys brake pads from a subcontractor and puts them in Corollas without changing their composition. If those pads are defective, both the supplier of the brake pads and Toyota will be held strictly liable for injuries caused by the defects.

6–3 Defenses to Product Liability

Defendants in product liability suits can raise a number of defenses. One defense, of course, is to show that there is no basis for the plaintiff's claim. For instance, in a product liability case based on negligence, if a defendant can show that the plaintiff has not met the requirements (such as causation) for an action in negligence, generally the defendant will not be liable. A defendant may also assert that the statute of limitations for a product liability claim has lapsed.[11]

In a case involving strict product liability, a defendant can claim that the plaintiff failed to meet one of the requirements. If the defendant establishes that goods were altered after they were sold, for instance, the defendant normally will not be held liable.

6–3a Preemption

Focus Question 4

What defenses to liability can be raised in a product liability lawsuit?

A defense that has been successfully raised by defendants in recent years is preemption—that government regulations preempt claims for product liability. An injured party may not be able to sue a manufacturer of defective products that are subject to comprehensive federal regulatory schemes.

Medical devices, for instance, are subject to extensive government regulation and undergo a rigorous premarket approval process. Case Example 6.12 The United States Supreme Court decided in Riegel v. Medtronic, Inc., that a man who was injured by an approved medical device (a balloon catheter) could not sue its maker for product liability. The Court reasoned that Congress had created a comprehensive scheme of federal safety oversight for medical devices. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration is required to review the design, labeling, and manufacturing of medical devices before they are marketed to make sure that they are

10. Suffolk County Water Authority v. Dow Chemical Co., 44 Misc.3d 569, 987 N.Y.S.2d 819 (N.Y.Sup. 2014).
11. Similar state statutes, called statutes of repose, place outer time limits on product liability actions.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

safe and effective. Because premarket approval is a "rigorous process," it preempts all common law claims challenging the safety or effectiveness of a medical device that has been approved.[12]

Since the Medtronic decision, some courts have extended the preemption defense to other product liability actions.[13] Other courts have been unwilling to deny an injured party relief simply because the federal government was supposed to ensure the product's safety.

In the following Spotlight Case, the United States Supreme Court had to decide if the preemption defense barred a plaintiff's claim for injuries caused by vaccination.

12. Riegel v. Medtronic, Inc., 552 U.S. 312, 128 S.Ct. 999, 169 L.Ed.2d 892 (2008).
13. See, for example, Fortner v. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., 2017 WL 3193928 (S.D.N.Y. 2017).

Spotlight on Injuries from Vaccinations: Case 6.3

Bruesewitz v. Wyeth, LLC

Supreme Court of the United States, 562 U.S. 223, 131 S.Ct. 1068, 179 L.Ed.2d 1 (2011).

Facts When Hannah Bruesewitz was six months old, her pediatrician administered a dose of the diphtheria, tetanus, and pertussis (DTP) vaccine according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's recommended childhood immunization schedule. Within twenty-four hours, Hannah began to experience seizures. She suffered more than one hundred seizures during the next month. Her doctors diagnosed her with "residual seizure disorder" and "developmental delay."

naumoid/iStock/Getty Images

What happens when a vaccine causes adverse side effects?

Hannah's parents, Russell and Robalee Bruesewitz, filed a claim for relief in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims under the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act (NCVIA). The NCVIA set up a no-fault compensation program for persons injured by vaccines. The claim was denied. The Bruesewitzes then filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Wyeth, LLC, the maker of the vaccine, alleging strict product liability. The suit was moved to a federal district court. The court held that the claim was preempted by the NCVIA, which includes provisions protecting manufacturers from liability for "a vaccine's unavoidable, adverse side effects." A federal appellate court affirmed the district court's judgment. The Bruesewitzes appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Was the Bruesewitzes' strict product liability claim against Wyeth for the injuries that their child suffered from vaccination preempted by the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act?

Decision Yes. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's judgment. The NCVIA preempted the Bruesewitzes' claim against Wyeth for injury to their daughter caused by the DTP vaccine's side effects.

Reason The Court reasoned that Congress enacted the NCVIA as a matter of public policy to stabilize the vaccine market and facilitate compensation. In the no-fault compensation program set up by the NCVIA, a person with a vaccine-related claim files a petition with the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. The court may award compensation for legal, medical, rehabilitation, counseling, special education, and vocational training expenses, as well as for diminished earning capacity, pain and suffering, and death. The awards are funded by a tax on the vaccine. In exchange for the "informal, efficient" compensation program, vaccine manufacturers that comply with the regulatory requirements are "immunized" from liability. The statute thus strikes a balance between paying victims harmed by vaccines and protecting the vaccine industry from collapsing under the costs of tort liability.

Critical Thinking

- Political If the public wants to change the policy outlined in this case, which branch of the government—and at what level—should be lobbied to make the change? Explain.
- Economic What is the public policy expressed by the provisions of the NCVIA?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

6–3b Assumption of Risk

Assumption of risk can sometimes be used as a defense in a product liability action. To establish such a defense, the defendant must show that (1) the plaintiff knew and appreciated the risk created by the product defect and (2) the plaintiff voluntarily assumed the risk, even though it was unreasonable to do so.

dlewis33/E+/Getty Images

Under what circumstances can a tanning salon customer sue for injuries even though a release was signed?

Although assumption of the risk is a defense in product liability actions, some courts do not allow it to be used as a defense to strict product liability claims. Case Example 6.13 When Savannah Boles became a customer of Executive Tans, she signed a contract. One clause stated that signers used the company's tanning booths at their own risk. It also released the manufacturer and others from liability for any injuries. Later, Boles's fingers were partially amputated when they came into contact with a tanning booth's fan. Boles sued the manufacturer, claiming strict product liability. The Colorado Supreme Court held that assumption of risk was not applicable because strict product liability is driven by public-policy considerations. The theory focuses on the nature of the product rather than the conduct of either the manufacturer or the person injured.[14]

6–3c Product Misuse

Similar to the defense of voluntary assumption of risk is that of product misuse, which occurs when a product is used for a purpose for which it was not intended. The courts have severely limited this defense. Today, product misuse is recognized as a defense only when the particular use was not reasonably foreseeable. If the misuse is foreseeable, the seller must take measures to guard against it.

Case Example 6.14 Steven Iliades was injured when he climbed into a press machine without placing it in manual mode, as he had been trained to do. Instead, he relied on a "light curtain," which stops the press when its beam is interrupted by the wave of a hand or arm. Because his body was stuck, Iliades could not engage the light curtain.

A trial court dismissed Iliades's product liability lawsuit against the press machine's manufacturer on the grounds that it was not reasonably foreseeable that an employee would disregard safety precautions to such an extreme degree. The Michigan Supreme Court eventually ordered a new trial, with instructions that the lower court focus not only on Iliades's misuse of the press machine, but also on whether such misuse, no matter how outrageous, was reasonably foreseeable by the manufacturer.[15]

6–3d Comparative Negligence (Fault)

Developments in the area of comparative negligence, or fault (discussed in the torts chapter), have also affected the doctrine of strict liability. Today, courts in many jurisdictions consider the negligent or intentional actions of both the plaintiff and the defendant when apportioning liability and awarding damages. A defendant may be able to limit at least some liability for injuries caused by a defective product if it can show that the plaintiff's misuse of the product contributed to the injuries.

When proved, comparative negligence differs from other defenses in that it does not completely absolve the defendant of liability. It can, however, reduce the amount of damages that will be awarded to the plaintiff. Note that some jurisdictions allow only intentional conduct to affect a plaintiff's recovery, whereas others allow ordinary negligence to be used as a defense to product liability.

14. Boles v. Sun Ergoline, Inc., 223 P.3d 724 (Co.Sup.Ct. 2010).
15. Iliades v. Dieffenbacher North America, Inc., 915 N.W.2d 338 (501 Mich. 326 2018).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

6–3e Commonly Known Dangers

As mentioned, the dangers associated with certain products (such as sharp knives and guns) are so commonly known that manufacturers need not warn users of those dangers. If a defendant succeeds in convincing the court that a plaintiff's injury resulted from a commonly known danger, the defendant normally will not be liable.

Classic Case Example 6.15 In a case from 1957, Marguerite Jamieson was injured when an elastic exercise rope slipped off her foot and struck her in the eye, causing a detachment of the retina. Jamieson claimed that the manufacturer should be liable because it had failed to warn users that the exerciser might slip off a foot in such a manner.

The court stated that to hold the manufacturer liable in these circumstances "would go beyond the reasonable dictates of justice in fixing the liabilities of manufacturers." After all, stated the court, "almost every physical object can be inherently dangerous or potentially dangerous in a sense. . . . A manufacturer cannot manufacture a knife that will not cut or a hammer that will not mash a thumb or a stove that will not burn a finger. The law does not require [manufacturers] to warn of such common dangers."[16]

6–3f Knowledgeable User

A related defense is the knowledgeable user defense. If a particular danger (such as electrical shock) is or should be commonly known by particular users of the product (such as electricians), the manufacturer of electrical equipment need not warn these users of the danger.

Spotlight Case Example 6.16 The parents of a group of teenagers who had become overweight and developed health problems filed a product liability lawsuit against McDonald's. The plaintiffs claimed that the well-known fast-food chain should be held liable for failing to warn customers of the adverse health effects of eating its food products. The court rejected this claim, however, based on the knowledgeable user defense.

According to the court, it is well known that the food at McDonald's contains high levels of cholesterol, fat, salt, and sugar, and is therefore unhealthful. The court's opinion, which thwarted numerous future lawsuits against fast-food restaurants, stated, "If consumers know (or reasonably should know) the potential ill health effects of eating at McDonald's, they cannot blame McDonald's if they, nonetheless, choose to satiate their appetite with a surfeit of supersized McDonald's products."[17]

6–3g Statutes of Limitations and Repose

As mentioned previously, statutes of limitations restrict the time within which an action may be brought. The statute of limitations for product liability cases varies according to state law. Usually, the injured party must bring a product liability claim within two to four years. Often, tolling suspends the running of the prescribed period until the party suffering an injury has discovered it or should have discovered it.

To ensure that sellers and manufacturers will not be left vulnerable to lawsuits indefinitely, many states have passed statutes that place outer time limits on product liability actions. Such a statute is called a statute of repose, as mentioned earlier. For instance, a statute of repose may require that claims be brought within twelve years from the date of sale or manufacture of the defective product. If the plaintiff does not bring an action before the prescribed period expires, the seller cannot be held liable.

Tolling A legal doctrine that allows for the temporary suspension of the running of a prescribed time period, such as a statute of limitations.

Statute of Repose A statute that places outer time limits on product liability actions. Such statutes cut off absolutely the right to bring an action after a specified period of time following some event (often the product's manufacture or purchase) other than the occurrence of an injury.

16. Jamieson v. Woodward & Lothrop, 247 F.2d 23, 101 D.C.App. 32 (1957).
17. Pelman v. McDonald's Corp., 237 F.Supp.2d 512 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Practice and Review

Shalene Kolchek bought a Great Lakes Spa from Val Porter, a dealer who was selling spas at the state fair. After Kolchek signed the contract, Porter handed her the manufacturer's paperwork and arranged for the spa to be delivered and installed for her. Three months later, Kolchek left her six-year-old daughter, Litisha, alone in the spa. While exploring the spa's hydromassage jets, Litisha got her index finger stuck in one of the jet holes.

Litisha yanked hard, injuring her finger, and then panicked and screamed for help. Kolchek was unable to remove Litisha's finger, and the local police and rescue team were called to assist. After a three-hour operation that included draining the spa, sawing out a section of the spa's plastic molding, and slicing the jet casing, Litisha's finger was freed. Following this procedure, the spa was no longer functional. Litisha was taken to the local emergency room, where she was told that a bone in her finger was broken in two places. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under which theories of product liability can Kolchek sue Porter to recover for Litisha's injuries?
2. Would privity of contract be required for Kolchek to succeed in a product liability action against Great Lakes? Explain.
3. For an action in strict product liability against Great Lakes, what six requirements must Kolchek meet?
4. What defenses to product liability might Porter or Great Lakes be able to assert?

Debate This

All liability suits against tobacco companies for causing lung cancer should be thrown out of court now and forever.

Key Terms

market-share liability 157
privity of contract 148
product liability 146
statute of repose 161
tolling 161
unreasonably dangerous product 151

Chapter Summary: Product Liability

Product Liability Claims	1. Negligence—The manufacturer must use due care in designing the product, selecting materials, using the appropriate production process, assembling and testing the product, placing adequate warnings on the label or product, and inspecting and testing its components. Privity of contract is not required. A manufacturer is liable for failure to exercise due care to any person who sustains an injury proximately caused by a negligently made (defective) product. 2. Misrepresentation—Fraudulent misrepresentation of a product may result in product liability based on the tort of fraud. The misrepresentation must have been made knowingly or with reckless disregard for the facts.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Strict Product Liability	1. Requirements— a. The defendant must have sold the product in a defective condition. b. The defendant must normally be engaged in the business of selling that product. c. The product must be unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer because of its defective condition (in most states). d. The plaintiff must incur physical harm to self or property by use or consumption of the product. e. The defective condition must be the proximate cause of the injury or damage. f. The goods must not have been substantially changed from the time the product was sold to the time the injury was sustained. 2. Product defects—A product may be defective in three basic ways: in its manufacture, in its design, or in the instructions or warnings that come with it. 3. Market-share liability—When plaintiffs cannot prove which of many distributors of a defective product supplied the particular product that caused the plaintiffs' injuries, some courts apply market-share liability. All firms that manufactured and distributed the harmful product during the period in question are then held liable for the plaintiffs' injuries in proportion to the firms' respective shares of the market, as directed by the court. 4. Other applications—Manufacturers and other sellers are liable for harms suffered by bystanders as a result of defective products. Suppliers of component parts are strictly liable for defective parts that, when incorporated into a product, cause injuries to users.
Defenses to Product Liability	1. Preemption—An injured party may not be able to sue the manufacturer of a product that is subject to comprehensive federal safety regulations, such as medical devices. 2. Assumption of risk—The user or consumer knew of the risk of harm and voluntarily assumed it. 3. Product misuse—The user or consumer misused the product in a way unforeseeable by the manufacturer. 4. Comparative negligence—Liability may be distributed between the plaintiff and the defendant under the doctrine of comparative negligence if the plaintiff's misuse of the product contributed to the risk of injury. 5. Commonly known dangers—If a defendant succeeds in convincing the court that a plaintiff's injury resulted from a commonly known danger, such as the danger associated with using a sharp knife, the defendant will not be liable. 6. Knowledgeable user—If a particular danger is or should be commonly known by particular users of the product, the manufacturer of the product need not warn these users of the danger.

Issue Spotters

1. Rim Corporation makes tire rims and sells them to Superior Vehicles, Inc., which installs them on cars. One set of rims is defective, which an inspection would reveal. Superior does not inspect the rims. The car with the defective rims is sold to Town Auto Sales, which sells the car to Uri. Soon, the car is in an accident caused by the defective rims, and Uri is injured. Is Superior Vehicles liable? Explain your answer. (See Product Liability Claims.)
2. Bensing Company manufactures generic drugs for the treatment of heart disease. A federal law requires generic drug makers to use labels that are identical to the labels on brand-name versions of the drugs. Hunter Rothfus purchased Bensing's generic drugs in Ohio and wants to sue Bensing for defective labeling based on its failure to comply with Ohio state common law (rather than the federal labeling requirements). What defense might Bensing assert to avoid liability under state law? (See Defenses to Product Liability.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

6–1. Product Liability. Carmen buys a television set manufactured by AKI Electronics. She is going on vacation, so she takes the set to her mother's house for her mother to use. Because the set is defective, it explodes, causing considerable damage to her mother's house. Carmen's mother sues AKI for the damage to her house. Discuss the theories under which Carmen's mother can recover from AKI. (See Product Liability Claims.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

6–2. Product Liability. Jason Clark, an experienced hunter, bought a paintball gun. Clark practiced with the gun and knew how to screw in the carbon dioxide cartridge, pump the gun, and use its safety and trigger. Although Clark was aware that he could purchase protective eyewear, he chose not to do so. Clark had taken gun safety courses and understood that it was "common sense" not to shoot anyone in the face. Clark's friend, Chris Wright, also owned a paintball gun and was similarly familiar with the gun's use and its risks.

Clark, Wright, and their friends played a game that involved shooting paintballs at cars whose occupants also had the guns. One night, while Clark and Wright were cruising with their guns, Wright shot at Clark's car but hit Clark in the eye. Clark filed a product liability lawsuit against the manufacturer of Wright's paintball gun to recover for the injury. Clark claimed that the gun was defectively designed. During the trial, Wright testified that his gun "never malfunctioned." In whose favor should the court rule? Why? (See Product Liability Claims.)

6–3. Product Misuse. Five-year-old Cheyenne Stark was riding in the backseat of her parents' Ford Taurus. Cheyenne was not sitting in a booster seat. Instead, she was using a seatbelt designed by Ford but was wearing the shoulder belt behind her back. The car was involved in a collision. As a result, Cheyenne suffered a spinal cord injury and was paralyzed from the waist down. The family filed a suit against Ford Motor Co., alleging that the seatbelt was defectively designed. Could Ford successfully claim that Cheyenne had misused the seatbelt? Why or why not? [Stark v. Ford Motor Co., 365 N.C. 468, 723 S.E.2d 753 (2012)] (See Defenses to Product Liability.)

6–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Product Liability. While driving on Interstate 40 in North Carolina, Carroll Jett became distracted by a texting system in the cab of his tractor-trailer truck. He smashed into several vehicles that were slowed or stopped in front of him, injuring Barbara and Michael Durkee and others. The injured motorists filed a suit in a federal district court against Geologic Solutions, Inc., the maker of the texting system, alleging product liability. Was the accident caused by Jett's inattention or the texting device? Should a manufacturer be required to design a product that is incapable of distracting a driver? Discuss. [Durkee v. Geologic Solutions, Inc., 502 Fed. Appx. 326 (4th Cir. 2013)] (See Product Liability Claims.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 6-4, go to Appendix E.

6–5. Strict Product Liability. Medicis Pharmaceutical Corp. makes Solodyn, a prescription oral antibiotic. Medicis warns physicians that "autoimmune syndromes, including drug-induced lupus-like syndrome," may be associated with use of the drug. Amanda Watts had chronic acne. Her physician prescribed Solodyn. Information included with the drug did not mention the risk of autoimmune disorders, and Watts was not otherwise advised of it. She was prescribed the drug twice, each time for twenty weeks. Later, she experienced debilitating joint pain and, after being hospitalized, was diagnosed with lupus. On what basis could Watts recover from Medicis in an action grounded in product liability? Explain. [Watts v. Medicis Pharmaceutical Corp., 236 Ariz. 19, 365 P.3d 944 (2016)] (See Strict Product Liability.)

6–6. Strict Product Liability. Duval Ford, LLC, sold a new Ford F-250 pickup truck to David Sweat. Before taking delivery, Sweat ordered a lift kit to be installed on the truck by a Duval subcontractor. Sweat also replaced the tires and modified the suspension system to increase the towing capacity. Later, through Burkins Chevrolet, Sweat sold the truck to Shaun Lesnick. Sweat had had no problems with the truck's steering or suspension, but Lesnick did. He had the steering repaired and made additional changes, including installing a steering stabilizer and replacing the tires. Two months later, Lesnick was driving the truck when the steering and suspension suddenly failed, and the truck flipped over, causing Lesnick severe injuries. Could Lesnick successfully claim that Duval and Burkins had failed to warn him of the risk of a lifted truck? Explain. [Lesnick v. Duval Ford, LLC, 41 Fla.L.Weekly D281, 185 So.3d 577 (1 Dist. 2016)] (See Product Liability Claims.)

6–7. Spotlight on Pfizer, Inc.—Defenses to Product Liability. Prescription drugs in the United States must be approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) before they can be sold. A drug maker whose product is approved through the FDA's "abbreviated new drug application" (ANDA) process cannot later change the label without FDA approval. Pfizer Inc. makes and sells by prescription Depo-T, a testosterone replacement drug classified as an ANDA-approved drug. Rodney Guilbeau filed a claim in a federal district court against Pfizer, alleging that he had experienced a "cardiovascular event" after taking Depo-T. He sought recovery on a state-law product liability theory, arguing that Pfizer had failed to warn patients adequately about the risks. He claimed that after the drug's approval its maker had become aware of a higher incidence of heart attacks, strokes, and other cardiovascular events among those who took it but had not added a warning to its label. What is Pfizer's best defense to this claim? Explain. [Guilbeau v. Pfizer, Inc., 80 F.3d 304 (7th Cir. 2018)] (See Defenses to Product Liability.)

6–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Product Liability. While replacing screws in a gutter, John Baugh fell off a ladder and landed head-first on his concrete driveway. He sustained a severe brain injury, which permanently limited his ability to perform routine physical and intellectual functions. He filed a suit in a federal district court against Cuprum S.A. de C.V., the company that designed and made the ladder, alleging a design defect under product liability theories. Baugh weighed nearly 200 pounds, which was the stated weight limit on this ladder. Kevin Smith, a mechanical engineer, testified on Baugh's behalf that the gusset (bracket) on the ladder's right front side was too short to support Baugh's weight. This caused the ladder's leg to fail and Baugh to fall. In Smith's opinion, a longer gusset would have prevented the accident. Cuprum argued that the accident occurred because Baugh climbed too high on the ladder and stood on its fourth step and pail shelf, neither of which were intended for the purpose. No other person witnessed Baugh using the ladder prior to his fall, however, so there was no evidence to support Cuprum's argument. [Baugh v. Cuprum S.A. de C.V., 845 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2017)] (See Strict Product Liability.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1. What is a manufacturer's legal and ethical duty when designing and making products for consumers? Did Cuprum meet this standard? Discuss.
2. Did the mechanical engineer's testimony establish that a reasonable alternative design was available for Cuprum's ladder? Explain.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

6–9. Time-Limited Group Assignment. Bret D'Auguste was an experienced skier when he rented equipment to ski at Hunter Mountain Ski Bowl in New York. When D'Auguste entered an extremely difficult trail, he noticed immediately that the surface consisted of ice with almost no snow. He tried to exit the steeply declining trail by making a sharp right turn, but in the attempt, his left ski snapped off. D'Auguste lost his balance, fell, and slid down the mountain, striking his face and head against a fence along the trail. According to a report by a rental shop employee, one of the bindings on D'Auguste's skis had a "cracked heel housing." D'Auguste filed a lawsuit against the bindings' manufacturer on a theory of strict product liability. The manufacturer filed a motion for summary judgment. (See Product Liability Claims.)

1. The first group will take the position of the manufacturer and develop an argument why the court should grant the summary judgment motion and dismiss the strict product liability claim.
2. The second group will take the position of D'Auguste and formulate a basis for why the court should deny the motion and allow the strict product liability claim.
3. The third group will evaluate whether D'Auguste assumed the risk of this type of injury.
4. The fourth group will analyze whether the manufacturer could claim that D'Auguste's negligence (under the comparative negligence doctrine) contributed to his injury.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Alfa Photo/Shutterstock.com

7 Intellectual Property Rights

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. Why is the protection of trademarks important?
2. How does the law protect patents?
3. What laws protect authors' rights in the works they create?
4. What are trade secrets, and what laws offer protection for this form of intellectual property?
5. How does the TRIPS agreement protect intellectual property worldwide?

Intellectual Property Property resulting from intellectual and creative processes.

"My words and my ideas are my property, and I'll keep and protect them as surely as I do my stable of unicorns."

Jarod Kintz
1982–present (American author)

Intellectual property is any property resulting from intellectual, creative processes—the products of an individual's mind, as suggested in the chapter-opening quotation. Although it is an abstract term for an abstract concept, intellectual property is nonetheless familiar to almost everyone. The apps for your iPhone or Samsung Galaxy, the movies you see, and the music you listen to are all forms of intellectual property.

More than two hundred years ago, the framers of the U.S. Constitution recognized the importance of protecting creative works in Article I, Section 8. Statutory protection of these rights began in the 1940s and continues to evolve to meet the needs of modern society.

Suppose that JD Beverage Company makes and sells a line of flavored vodkas called "Hot Lips Vodka." The name Hot Lips Vodka, along with an image of puckered lips, appears on the label of each bottle. The color of the lips logo depends on the vodka's flavor—red for chili pepper, green for apple, and so on. JD Beverage has registered trademarks for the name Hot Lips Vodka and the puckered lips logo, and the company heavily markets the vodka using hot lips as a theme. Sales of Hot Lips Vodka are at an all-time high.

Now another alcoholic beverage company begins to distribute a line of flavored vodkas called "Kiss Vodka." Like the Hot Lips label, the new vodka's label features the product's name and a puckered lips logo, and the company uses the lips in its marketing. JD Beverage believes that Kiss Vodka's use of the lips logo is diminishing the value of its Hot Lips brand and cutting into its sales. What can JD Beverage do? The answer lies in intellectual property law.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

7–1 Trademarks

A trademark is a distinctive word, symbol, sound, or design that identifies the manufacturer as the source of particular goods and distinguishes its products from those made or sold by others. At common law, the person who used a symbol or mark to identify a business or product was protected in the use of that trademark. Clearly, if another company used the trademark, it could lead consumers to believe that its goods were made by the trademark owner. The law seeks to avoid this kind of confusion. (For information on how companies use trademarks and service marks, see this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature.)

Focus Question 1

Why is the protection of trademarks important?

Trademark A distinctive word, symbol, sound, or design that identifies the manufacturer as the source of particular goods and distinguishes its products from those made or sold by others.

Trademarks and Service Marks

Managerial Strategy

Trademarks and service marks consist of much more than well-known brand names, such as Apple and Amazon. If you become a marketing manager, you will be involved in creating trademarks or service marks for your firm, protecting the firm's existing marks, and ensuring that you do not infringe on anyone else's marks. You will need to be aware that parts of a brand name or other forms of product identification may qualify for trademark protection. Some examples include:

1. Catchy phrases—Certain brands have established phrases that are associated with the brands, such as Nike's "Just Do It!" Take care to avoid using another brand's catchy phrase in your own program. Note, too, that not all phrases can become part of a trademark or service mark. When a phrase is extremely common, the courts normally will not grant it trademark or service mark protection.
2. Abbreviations—The public sometimes abbreviates a well-known trademark. For example, Budweiser beer is known as Bud and Coca-Cola as Coke. Do not use any name for a product or service that closely resembles a well-known abbreviation, such as Koke for a cola drink.
3. Shapes—The shape of a brand name, a service mark, or a container can take on exclusivity if the shape clearly aids in product or service identification. Just about everyone recognizes the shape of the fluid Coca-Cola bottle, for example. Avoid using a similar shape for competing products.
4. Ornamental colors—Sometimes, color combinations can become part of a service mark or trademark. For example, FedEx established its unique identity with the use of bright orange and purple. The courts have protected this color combination. The same holds for the black-and-copper color combination of Duracell batteries.
5. Ornamental designs—Symbols and designs associated with a particular mark are normally protected, so do not attempt to copy them. For instance, Levi's places a small tag on the left side of the rear pocket of its jeans. Cross uses a cut-off black cone on the top of its pens.
6. Sounds—Sounds can also be protected. For example, the familiar roar of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM) lion is protected.

When to Protect Trademarks and Service Marks

Once your company has established trademarks or service marks, it must decide how aggressively to protect those marks. If it fails to protect them, it faces the possibility that the marks will become generic. As discussed later, aspirin, cellophane, thermos, dry ice, shredded wheat, and many other familiar terms were once legally protected trademarks.

Protecting exclusive rights to a mark can be expensive, however, and a company must determine how much it is worth to protect its rights. Major expenditures to protect a small company's trademarks and service marks might not be cost-effective.

Business Questions

1. The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office requires that a registered trademark or service mark be put into commercial use within six months. Extensions can be granted, but the mark must be put into commercial use within three years after the application has been approved. Why do you think the federal government established this requirement?

2. Should trademark protection apply to similarities between noncompeting products? Why or why not?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

In the following Classic Case concerning Coca-Cola, the defendants argued that the Coca-Cola trademark was not entitled to protection under the law because the term did not accurately represent the product.

Classic Case 7.1

Coca-Cola Co. v. Koke Co. of America

Supreme Court of the United States, 254 U.S. 143, 41 S.Ct. 113, 65 L.Ed. 189 (1920).

Facts John Pemberton, an Atlanta pharmacist, invented a caramel-colored, carbonated soft drink in 1886. His bookkeeper, Frank Robinson, named the beverage Coca-Cola after two of the ingredients, coca leaves and kola nuts. Asa Candler bought the Coca-Cola Company in 1891 and made the soft drink available throughout the United States and in parts of Canada and Mexico. Candler continued to sell Coke aggressively and to open up new markets in Europe and elsewhere, attracting numerous competitors, some of whom tried to capitalize directly on the Coke name.

© Rob Wilson/ShutterStock.com

How is Coca-Cola protected?

The Coca-Cola Company brought an action in a federal district court to enjoin (prevent) other beverage companies from using the names Koke and Dope for their products. The defendants contended that the Coca-Cola trademark was a fraudulent representation and that Coca-Cola was therefore not entitled to any help from the courts. By using the Coca-Cola name, the defendants alleged, the Coca-Cola Company represented that the beverage contained cocaine (from coca leaves). The district court granted the injunction, but the federal appellate court reversed. The Coca-Cola Company appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Did the marketing of products called Koke and Dope by the Koke Company of America and other firms constitute an infringement on Coca-Cola's trademark?

Decision Yes for Koke, but no for Dope. The United States Supreme Court enjoined the competing beverage companies from calling their products Koke but not from calling their products Dope.

Reason The Court noted that before 1900 the Coca-Cola beverage had contained a small amount of cocaine. This ingredient had been deleted from the formula by 1906 at the latest, however, and the Coca-Cola Company had advertised to the public that no cocaine was present in its drink. The court emphasized that Coca-Cola was a widely popular drink "to be had at almost any soda fountain." Because of the public's widespread familiarity with Coca-Cola, the retention of the name (referring to coca leaves and kola nuts) was not misleading: "Coca-Cola probably means to most persons the plaintiff's familiar product to be had everywhere rather than a compound of particular substances." The name Coke was found to be so common a term for the trademarked product Coca-Cola that the defendants' use of the similar-sounding Koke as a name for their beverages was disallowed. The Court could find no reason to restrain the defendants from using the name Dope, however.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Coca-Cola had been trying to make the public believe that its product contained cocaine. Would the result in the case likely have been different? Explain your answer.
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law In this early case, the United States Supreme Court made it clear that trademarks and trade names (and nicknames for those marks and names, such as "Coke" for "Coca-Cola") that are in common use receive protection under the common law. This holding is significant historically because it is the predecessor to the federal statute later passed to protect trademark rights (the Lanham Act, discussed next).

7–1a Statutory Protection of Trademarks

Statutory protection of trademarks and related property is provided at the federal level by the Lanham Act of 1946.[1] The Lanham Act was enacted in part to protect manufacturers from losing business to rival companies that used confusingly similar trademarks. The Lanham Act incorporates the common law of trademarks and provides remedies for owners of trademarks who wish to enforce their claims in federal court. Many states also have trademark statutes.

1. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1051–1128.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Trademark Dilution The Federal Trademark Dilution Act[2] amended the Lanham Act to allow trademark owners to bring suits in federal court for trademark dilution. Later, Congress further amended the law on trademark dilution by passing the Trademark Dilution Revision Act (TDRA).[3]

Trademark Dilution The unauthorized use of a distinctive and famous mark in a way that impairs the mark's distinctiveness or harms its reputation.

Under the TDRA, to state a claim for trademark dilution, a plaintiff must prove the following:

1. The plaintiff owns a famous mark that is distinctive.
2. The defendant has begun using a mark in commerce that allegedly is diluting the famous mark.
3. The similarity between the defendant's mark and the famous mark gives rise to an association between the marks.
4. The association is likely to impair the distinctiveness of the famous mark or harm its reputation.

Trademark dilution laws protect "distinctive" or "famous" trademarks (such as Rolls-Royce, McDonald's, Starbucks, and Apple) from certain unauthorized uses. Such a mark is protected even when the unauthorized use is on noncompeting goods or is unlikely to confuse. More than half of the states have also enacted trademark dilution laws.

Know This

Trademark dilution laws protect the owners of distinctive marks from unauthorized uses even when the defendants' use involves noncompeting goods or is unlikely to cause confusion.

The Marks Need Not Be Identical A famous mark may be diluted not only by the use of an identical mark but also by the use of a similar mark, provided that it reduces the value of the famous mark. A similar mark is more likely to lessen the value of a famous mark when the companies using the marks provide related goods or compete against each other in the same market.

Spotlight Case Example 7.1 When Samantha Lundberg opened Sambuck's Coffeehouse in Astoria, Oregon, she knew that Starbucks was one of the largest coffee chains in the nation. Starbucks Corporation filed a dilution lawsuit, and a federal court ruled that use of the Sambuck's mark constituted trademark dilution because it created confusion for consumers. Not only was there a "high degree" of similarity between the marks, but also both companies provided coffee-related services through stand-alone retail stores. Therefore, the use of the similar mark (Sambuck's) reduced the value of the famous mark (Starbucks).[4]

7–1b Trademark Registration

Trademarks may be registered with the state or with the federal government. To register for protection under federal trademark law, a person must file an application with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office in Washington, D.C. A mark can be registered (1) if it is currently in commerce or (2) if the applicant intends to put it into commerce within six months.

In special circumstances, the six-month period can be extended by thirty months. Thus, the applicant would have a total of three years from the date of notice of trademark approval to make use of the mark and to file the required use statement. Registration is postponed until the mark is actually used.

During this waiting period, applicants can legally protect their trademarks against third parties who have neither used the marks previously nor filed applications for them. Registration is renewable between the fifth and sixth years after the initial registration and every ten years thereafter (every twenty years for trademarks registered before 1990).

2. 15 U.S.C. Section 1125.
3. Pub. L. No. 103-312, 120 Stat. 1730 (2006).
4. Starbucks Corp. v. Lundberg, 2005 WL 3183858 (D.Or. 2005).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Ethical Issue

Should the law allow offensive trademark names? It is settled law that the First Amendment generally protects people's use of offensive words. Until recently, though, free speech did not necessarily extend to trademarking a word or name that some Americans find offensive. Under Section 2(a) of the Lanham Act (also known as the disparagement clause), the federal government could prohibit applicants from trademarking offensive (or disparaging) terms. The disparagement clause bars any trademark that "may disparage . . . or bring into contempt, or disrepute" any persons, institutions, beliefs, or national symbols. The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) used this clause to cancel the Washington Redskins football team's trademarks, which were deemed offensive to Native Americans.[5] Then came another case involving a musical group called The Slants, which consisted of only Asians.

dean bertoncelj/Shutterstock.com

Do trademarks that some people find offensive deserve First Amendment protection? Why or why not?

The members of The Slants picked the name because it was offensive. They claimed they wanted to turn the phrase upside down "to reappropriate it into something positive and empowering." When the trademark registration was reviewed by the USPTO, however, the USPTO cited Section 2(a) of the Lanham Act to deny registration. The band contested the ruling, noting that it could not get a record label deal unless it had a federally registered trademark. The case eventually was heard by the United States Supreme Court. In arguing before the Court, the band's attorney pointed out the numerous inconsistencies in the USPTO's decisions concerning potentially offensive names. For instance, the USPTO had approved a hip-hop group's registration of N.W.A.—which stands for Niggaz Wit Attitudes.

The United States Supreme Court eventually decided that the disparagement clause of the Lanham Act was an unconstitutional restraint on free speech. In a unanimous opinion, Justice Samuel Alito wrote, "It offends a bedrock First Amendment principle: Speech may not be banned on the ground that it expresses ideas that offend." Under this ruling, the federal government can no longer cancel or refuse to register trademarks—such as The Slants or the Redskins—that officials deem to be offensive or disparaging.[6]

7–1c Trademark Infringement

Registration of a trademark with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office gives notice on a nationwide basis that the trademark belongs exclusively to the registrant. The registrant is also allowed to use the symbol ® to indicate that the mark has been registered. Whenever that trademark is copied to a substantial degree or used in its entirety by another, intentionally or unintentionally, the trademark has been infringed (used without authorization).

Know This

To prove trademark infringement, the trademark owner must show that the other party's use of the mark has created a likelihood of confusion about the origin of that party's goods or services.

When a trademark has been infringed, the owner has a cause of action against the infringer. To succeed in a lawsuit for trademark infringement, the owner must show that the defendant's use of the mark created a likelihood of confusion about the origin of the defendant's goods or services. The owner need not prove that the infringer acted intentionally or that the trademark was registered (although registration does provide proof of the date of inception of the trademark's use).

The most commonly granted remedy for trademark infringement is an injunction to prevent further infringement. Under the Lanham Act, a trademark owner that successfully proves

5. See Pro-Football, Inc. v. Blackhorse, 62 F.Supp.3d 498 (E.D.Va. 2014) and 112 F.Supp.3d 439 (E.D.Va. 2015).
6. Matal v. Tam, 582 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1744, 198 L.Ed.2d 366 (2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

infringement can recover actual damages, plus the profits that the infringer wrongfully received from the unauthorized use of the mark. A court can also order the destruction of any goods bearing the unauthorized trademark. In some situations, the trademark owner may also be able to recover attorneys' fees.

7–1d Distinctiveness of the Mark

A central objective of the Lanham Act is to reduce the likelihood that consumers will be confused by similar marks. For that reason, only those trademarks that are deemed sufficiently distinctive from all competing trademarks will be protected.

To determine a mark's strength, courts classify it on a spectrum of five categories, ranging from strongest to weakest. Fanciful and arbitrary marks employ words and phrases with no commonly understood connection to the product. These are the two strongest categories and trigger the highest degree of trademark protection. Suggestive marks, which suggest a product's features and require consumers to use some imagination to associate the suggestive mark with the product, are in the middle of the spectrum. The two weakest categories are descriptive and generic marks. Descriptive marks define a particular characteristic of the product in a way that does not require any imagination. Generic marks describe the product in its entirety and are not entitled to trademark protection.

Strong Marks As the most distinctive (strongest) trademarks, fanciful and arbitrary marks receive automatic protection because they serve to identify a particular product's source, as opposed to describing the product itself. Fanciful trademarks often include invented words. Examples include Xerox for one company's copiers and Google for another company's search engine.

Arbitrary trademarks use words and phrases with no commonly understood connection to the product, such as Dutch Boy as a name for paint. Even a single letter used in a particular style can be an arbitrary trademark, such as the stylized X mark that Quiksilver, Inc., uses on its clothing.

Suggestive trademarks, representing the middle of the spectrum, indicate something about a product's nature, quality, or characteristics without describing the product directly. For instance, "Dairy Queen" suggests an association between its products and milk, but it does not directly describe ice cream. Suggestive marks can be transformed into strong marks by achieving a high degree of marketplace recognition, such as through substantial advertising.

Secondary Meaning Descriptive terms, geographic terms, and personal names are not inherently distinctive and do not receive protection under the law until they acquire a secondary meaning. Whether a secondary meaning becomes attached to a term or name usually depends on how extensively the product is advertised, the market for the product, the number of sales, and other factors.

A secondary meaning may arise when customers begin to associate a specific term or phrase (such as Calvin Klein) with specific trademarked items made by a particular company (designer clothing and goods). Once a secondary meaning is attached to a term or name, a trademark is considered distinctive and is protected. Even a color can qualify for trademark protection, such as the color schemes used by college sports teams.

Case Example 7.2 Federal Express Corporation (FedEx) provides transportation and delivery services worldwide using the logo FedEx in a specific color combination. FedEx sued a competitor, JetEx Management Services, Inc., for using the same color combination and a similar name and logo. JetEx also mimicked

Leonard Zhukovsky/Shutterstock.com

Why should a company's distinctive colors, such those for FedEx, be protected under trademark law?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

FedEx's trademarked slogan ("The World on Time" for FedEx, and "Keeping the World on Time" for JetEx). FedEx alleged trademark infringement and dilution, among other claims.

A federal district court in New York granted a permanent injunction to block JetEx from using the infringing mark in FedEx colors. When JetEx (now operating as JetEx Air Express) continued to use the infringing mark on its vehicles, FedEx went back to the court to enforce the injunction. The court entered a default judgment against JetEx and awarded FedEx an additional $25,000 in attorneys' fees and court costs.[7]

Generic Terms Generic terms that refer to an entire class of products, such as bicycle and computer, receive no protection, even if they acquire secondary meanings. A particularly thorny problem for a business arises when its trademark acquires generic use. For instance, aspirin and thermos were originally trademarked products, but today the words are used generically. Other trademarks that have acquired generic use include escalator, trampoline, raisin bran, dry ice, lanolin, linoleum, nylon, and cornflakes.

A trademark that is commonly used does not automatically become generic, though. Case Example 7.3 David Elliot and Chris Gillespie sought to register numerous domain names (Internet addresses), including "googledisney.com" and "googlenewstvs.com." They were unable to register the names because all of them used the word google, a trademark of Google, Inc.

Elliot and Gillespie brought an action in federal court to have the Google trademark canceled because it had become a generic term. They argued that because most people now use google as a verb ("to google") when referring to searching the Internet with any search engine (not just Google), the term should no longer be protected. The court held that even if people do use the word google as a verb, it is still a protected trademark if consumers associate the noun with one company. The court concluded that "the primary significance of the word google to a majority of the public who utilize Internet search engines is a designation of the Google search engine."[8]

7–1e Service, Certification, and Collective Marks

Service Mark A trademark that is used to distinguish the services (rather than the products) of one person or company from those of another.

A service mark is essentially a trademark that is used to distinguish the services (rather than the products) of one person or company from those of another. For instance, each airline has a particular mark or symbol associated with its name. Titles and character names used in radio and television are frequently registered as service marks.

Certification Mark A mark used by one or more persons, other than the owner, to certify the region, materials, mode of manufacture, quality, or other characteristic of specific goods or services.

Other marks protected by law include certification marks and collective marks. A certification mark is used by one or more persons, other than the owner, to certify the region, materials, mode of manufacture, quality, or other characteristic of specific goods or services. Certification marks include such marks as "Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval" and "UL Tested."

Collective Mark A mark used by members of a cooperative, association, union, or other organization to certify the region, materials, mode of manufacture, quality, or other characteristic of specific goods or services.

When used by members of a cooperative, association, labor union, or other organization, a certification mark is referred to as a collective mark. Example 7.4 Collective marks appear at the end of a movie's credits to indicate the various associations and organizations that participated in making the movie. The mark "CPA" is a collective mark used by members of the Society of Certified Public Accountants.

7–1f Trade Dress

Trade Dress The image and overall appearance of a product.

The term trade dress refers to the image and overall appearance of a product. Trade dress is a broad concept that can include all or part of the total image or overall impression created by a product or its packaging. Example 7.5 The distinctive decor, menu, and style of service of a particular restaurant may be regarded as the restaurant's trade dress. Similarly, trade dress

7. Federal Express Corp. v. JetEx Air Express, Inc., 2017 WL 816479 (E.D.N.Y. 2017).
8. Elliot v. Google, Inc., 45 F.Supp.3d 1156 (D.Ariz. 2014).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

can include the layout and appearance of a catalogue, the use of a lighthouse as part of a golf hole, the fish shape of a cracker, or the G-shaped design of a Gucci watch.

Basically, trade dress is subject to the same protection as trademarks. In cases involving trade dress infringement, as in trademark infringement cases, a major consideration is whether consumers are likely to be confused by the allegedly infringing use. Example 7.6 Converse makes All-Star shoes, which were the first shoes ever endorsed by a famous basketball player, Chuck Taylor. Nike, Inc., which now owns Converse, sued thirty-one companies, including Ralph Lauren, for manufacturing very similar versions of these shoes, claiming that consumers were likely to be confused. The knockoffs used the same white rubber soles, rubber cap on the toes, canvas tops, and conspicuous stitching as used on All-Stars. Ralph Lauren ultimately agreed to settle its dispute with Nike by destroying all remaining fake All-Stars and paying Nike an undisclosed sum.

7–1g Counterfeit Goods

Counterfeit goods copy or otherwise imitate trademarked goods but are not genuine. The importation of goods bearing counterfeit trademarks poses a significant problem for U.S. businesses, consumers, and law enforcement (see the Business Web Log feature for an example). In addition to having negative financial effects on legitimate businesses, sales of certain counterfeit goods, such as pharmaceuticals and nutritional supplements, can present serious public health risks.

Stop Counterfeiting in Manufactured Goods Act The Stop Counterfeiting in Manufactured Goods Act[9] (SCMGA) was enacted to combat counterfeit goods. The act made it a crime to intentionally traffic in, or attempt to traffic in, counterfeit goods or services, or to knowingly use a counterfeit mark on or in connection with goods or services.

9. Pub. L. No. 109-181 (2006), which amended 18 U.S.C. Sections 2318–2320.

Business Web Log

Amazon Faces Fake Products

The world's largest online retailer is facing at least one lawsuit alleging trademark infringement, copyright infringement, and other torts. Electronic cable designer and manufacturer Fuse Chicken, LLC, discovered that Amazon consumers were frequently being sold fake Fuse Chicken cables for their smartphones.

The reality today is that when any branded product becomes well known, cheap imitations become a problem. Amazon apparently did not do enough to prevent the sale of such inferior copies of Fuse Chicken's trademarked and copyrighted products. For example, Amazon sold Fuse Chicken's Bobine Auto iPhone Lightning Car Dock to a customer who gave it a one-star review because it broke within a week. The product was clearly a counterfeit version.

Fuse Chicken attempted to resolve the issue of counterfeit products with Amazon. When Fuse Chicken received little satisfaction, it filed suit.[a] In its lawsuit, Fuse Chicken pointed out that Amazon does not control the products sold via its "Sell Yours Here" listing site. Anybody can sell a trademarked or copyrighted product via this site. According to the lawsuit, "Amazon makes no effort to determine whether the products sold by such third-party sellers are authentic."

A much larger company, France's Chanel, has also taken legal action to protect itself against counterfeiters on Amazon.com. The company won a multimillion-dollar trademark infringement lawsuit against thirty vendors who were using Amazon to sell fake Chanel goods, such as bags, shirts, and cell phone cases. As part of the settlement, a federal judge in California ordered Amazon to disable the vendor sites and transfer any funds in their accounts to Chanel.[b]

a. Fuse Chicken, LLC. v. Amazon.com, Inc., Case: 5:17-c-b-01538-SL Doc # 1 Filed July 21, 2017 in Northern District Ohio Court.

b. Kali Hays, "Chanel Scores Win Against Amazon Sellers in Counterfeit Fight." www.wwd.com. WWD: June 28, 2017, Web.

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

Key Point

Large-scale online retailing continues to grow, and Amazon continues to dominate this sector. The number of counterfeit products is growing, too. Amazon has decided to fight back. In tandem with its vendors, Amazon has filed numerous lawsuits against counterfeiters who take advantage of its platform.[c] It has also set up "Project Zero," a program in which sellers provide Amazon with trademarks, logos, and other protected data. Using this information, Amazon conducts a scan of billions of its product listings each day, searching for any possible infringements. Other online resellers, such as Alibaba and eBay, also face counterfeit issues. It's a multibillion-dollar problem that won't go away soon.

c. See Amazon.com, Inc. v. Zhang et al, W.D. Wash. 2020.

Before this act took effect, the law did not prohibit the creation or shipment of counterfeit labels that were not attached to products. Therefore, counterfeiters would make labels and packaging bearing a counterfeit trademark, ship the labels to another location, and then affix them to inferior products to deceive buyers. The SCMGA closed this loophole by making it a crime to traffic in counterfeit labels, stickers, packaging, and the like, whether or not they are attached to goods.

Penalties for Counterfeiting Persons found guilty of violating the SCMGA may be fined up to $2 million or imprisoned for up to ten years (or more, if they are repeat offenders). If a court finds that the statute was violated, it must order the defendant to forfeit the counterfeit products (which are then destroyed), as well as any property used in the commission of the crime. The defendant must also pay restitution to the trademark holder or victim in an amount equal to the victim's actual loss.

Case Example 7.7 Charles Anthony Jones pleaded guilty to trafficking in counterfeit prescription drugs for erectile dysfunction. The court sentenced Jones to thirty-seven months in prison and ordered him to pay more than $600,000 in restitution. Jones appealed, arguing that the amount awarded was more than the pharmaceutical companies' actual losses. The court agreed. The pharmaceutical companies were entitled only to their lost net profits rather than the retail price of the genuine drugs.[10]

Combating Online Sales of Counterfeit Goods The United States cannot prosecute foreign counterfeiters under U.S. laws, because our national laws do not apply to them. One effective tool that U.S. officials are using to combat online sales of counterfeit goods is to obtain a court order to close down the domain names of websites that sell such goods.

Example 7.8 U.S. agents have shut down hundreds of domain names on the Monday after Thanksgiving ("Cyber Monday"). Shutting down the websites, particularly on key shopping days, prevents some counterfeit goods from entering the United States. Europol, an international organization, has also used this tactic.

7–1h Trade Names

Trade Name A name that a business uses to identify itself and its brand. A trade name is directly related to a business's reputation and goodwill, and is protected under trademark law.

Trademarks apply to products. The term trade name refers to part or all of a business's name, whether the business is a sole proprietorship, a partnership, or a corporation. Generally, a trade name is directly related to a business and its goodwill.

A trade name may be protected as a trademark if the trade name is the same as the company's trademarked product—for instance, Coca-Cola. Unless it is also used as a trademark or service mark, a trade name cannot be registered with the federal government. Trade names

10. United States v. Jones, 616 Fed.Appx. 726 (5th Cir. 2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

are protected under the common law, but only if they are unusual or fancifully used. The word Safeway, for instance, was sufficiently fanciful to obtain protection as a trade name for a grocery chain.

7–1i Licensing

One way to avoid litigation and still make use of another's trademark or other form of intellectual property is to obtain a license to do so. A license in this context is an agreement permitting the use of a trademark, copyright, patent, or trade secret for certain limited purposes. The party that owns the intellectual property rights and issues the license is the licensor, and the party obtaining the license is the licensee. Licensors often receive payments called royalties from licensees in return for permission to use the trademarked item.

License An agreement by the owner of intellectual property to permit another to use a trademark, copyright, patent, or trade secret for certain limited purposes.

Royalties Payments made by a licensee to a licensor as part of an agreement for the ongoing use of the licensor's trademarked asset.

A license grants only the rights expressly described in the license agreement. A licensor might, for instance, allow the licensee to use a trademark as part of its company or domain name, but not otherwise use the mark on any products or services. Disputes frequently arise over licensing agreements, particularly when the license involves Internet use.[11]

7–2 Patents

A patent is a grant from the government that gives an inventor the exclusive right to make, use, and sell an invention for a period of twenty years. Patents for designs, as opposed to inventions, are given for a fourteen-year period. The applicant must demonstrate to the satisfaction of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office that the invention, discovery, process, or design is novel, useful, and not obvious in light of current technology. (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis for more about some fundamental patent issues.)

Patent A property right granted by the federal government that gives an inventor an exclusive right to make, use, and sell an invention for a limited time.

11. See, for instance, Diebold Incorporated v. QSI, Inc., 2017 WL 3219866 (N.D. Ohio 2017).

The Impact of Patent Time Limits

Stephen Kimble invented a toy made up of a glove equipped with a valve and a canister of pressurized foam. The patented toy allowed people to shoot fake webs like the Marvel Comics superhero Spider-Man. In 1990, Kimble tried to cut a deal with Marvel Entertainment concerning his toy, but he was unsuccessful. Then Marvel started selling its own version of the toy.

When Kimble sued Marvel for patent infringement, he won. The result was a settlement that involved a licensing agreement between Kimble and Marvel with a lump-sum payment plus a royalty to Kimble of 3 percent of all sales of the toy. The agreement did not specify an end date for royalty payments to Kimble, and Marvel later sued to have the payments stop after the twenty-year patent expired.

Analysis According to a United States Supreme Court case that was decided nearly sixty years ago, a licensee cannot be forced to pay royalties to a patent holder after the patent has expired. So, if a licensee signs a contract to continue to pay royalties after the patent has expired, the contract is invalid and thus unenforceable.

Result and Reasoning Applying its own precedent, the United States Supreme Court ruled in Marvel's favor. As Justice Elena Kagan said in the opinion, "Patents endow their holders with certain super powers, but only for a limited time." In a dissenting opinion, Justice Samuel A. Alito, Jr., countered, "The decision interferes with the ability of parties to negotiate licensing agreements that reflect the true value of a patent, and it disrupts contractual expectations." The majority did not necessarily disagree, noting that its decision was based on an outmoded understanding of economics and may serve to hinder competition and innovation. In this instance, however, the doctrine of stare decisis dictated the result.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus Question 2
How does the law protect patents?

Until recently, patent law in the United States differed from the laws of many other countries because the first person to invent a product or process obtained the patent rights, rather than the first person to file for a patent. It was often difficult to prove who invented an item first, however, which prompted Congress to change the system by passing the America Invents Act.[12] Now, the first person to file an application for a patent on a product or process will receive patent protection. In addition, the law established a nine-month limit for challenging a patent on any ground.

The period of patent protection begins on the date when the patent application is filed, rather than when the patent is issued, which can sometimes be years later. After the patent period ends (either fourteen or twenty years later), the product or process enters the public domain, and anyone can make, sell, or use the invention without paying the patent holder.

7–2a Searchable Patent Databases

A significant development relating to patents is the availability online of the world's patent databases. The website of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (www.uspto.gov) provides searchable databases covering U.S. patents granted since 1976. The website of the European Patent Office (www.epo.org) provides online access to 50 million patent documents in more than seventy nations through a searchable network of databases.

Businesses use these searchable databases in many ways. Companies may conduct patent searches to list or inventory their patents, which are valuable assets. Patent searches also enable companies to study trends and patterns in a specific technology or to gather information about competitors in the industry.

Know This
A patent is granted to inventions that are novel (new) and not obvious in light of prior discoveries.

7–2b What Is Patentable?

Under the Patent Act, "[w]hoever invents or discovers any new and useful process, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, may obtain a patent therefor, subject to the conditions and requirements of this title."[13] Thus, to be patentable, an invention must be novel, useful, and not obvious in light of current technology.

Almost anything is patentable, except the laws of nature, natural phenomena, and abstract ideas (including algorithms[14]). Even artistic methods and works of art, certain business processes, and the structures of storylines are patentable, provided that they are novel and not obvious.[15] Plants that are reproduced asexually (by means other than from seed), such as hybrid or genetically engineered plants, are patentable in the United States, as are genetically engineered (or cloned) microorganisms and animals.

As mentioned, abstract ideas (including theories and concepts) are not patentable. For this reason, ideas that involve analyzing information and displaying results have often been found ineligible for patents. Such an idea becomes patentable only if particular aspects or combinations of elements transform it into a patent-eligible claim. Case Example 7.9 West View Research, LLC (WVR), holds numerous patents in a range of technologies, including speech recognition, wireless mobile devices, and medical devices. WVR filed a suit in federal court against several automakers, including Audi, Hyundai, Nissan, Tesla, and Volkswagen, alleging patent infringement.

---

12. The full title of this law is the Leahy-Smith America Invents Act, Pub. L. No. 112-29 (2011), which amended 35 U.S.C. Sections 1, 41, and 321.
13. 35 U.S.C. Section 101.
14. An algorithm is a step-by-step procedure, formula, or set of instructions for accomplishing a specific task. An example is the set of rules used by a search engine to rank the listings contained within its index in response to a particular query.
15. For a United States Supreme Court case discussing the obviousness requirement, see KSR International Co. v. Teleflex, Inc., 550 U.S. 398, 127 S.Ct. 1727, 167 L.Ed.2d 705 (2007). For a discussion of business process patents, see In re Bilski, 545 F3d 943 (Fed. Cir. 2008).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

WVR claimed that the carmakers had infringed two of its patents by selling vehicles with touch-screen displays that offered navigation, traffic, and weather information. A federal district court held in favor of the defendants, and a federal appellate court affirmed. The appellate court reasoned that the two patents simply described abstract ideas (analyzing information and displaying results) and lacked an inventive element that could transform them into patent-eligible inventions. WVR's two patents were thus invalid.[16]

oktay sonmez/Alamy

Why are abstract ideas, such as the in-dash navigation system in new cars, ineligible for patent protection?

7–2c Patent Infringement

If a firm makes, uses, or sells another's patented design, product, or process without the patent owner's permission, it commits the tort of patent infringement. Patent infringement may occur even though the patent owner has not put the patented product into commerce. Patent infringement may also occur even though not all features or parts of an invention are copied. (To infringe the patent on a process, however, all steps or their equivalent must be copied.)

Obviously, companies that specialize in developing new technology stand to lose significant profits if someone "makes, uses, or sells" devices that incorporate their patented inventions. Because these firms are the holders of numerous patents, they are frequently involved in patent infringement lawsuits (as well as other types of intellectual property disputes).

A complication in many such lawsuits is their global scope. Many companies that make and sell electronics and computer software and hardware are based in foreign nations (for instance, Sony is a Japanese firm). Foreign firms can apply for and obtain U.S. patent protection on items that they sell within the United States, just as U.S. firms can obtain protection in foreign nations where they sell goods. In the United States, however, no patent infringement occurs when a patented product is made and sold in another country.

Spotlight Case Example 7.10 Apple sued Samsung in federal court alleging that Samsung's Galaxy smartphones and tablets that use Google's HTC Android operating system infringed on Apple's patents. Apple had design patents that covered its devices' graphical user interface (the display of icons on the home screen), shell, and screen and button design. Apple had also patented the way information is displayed on iPhones and other devices, the way windows pop open, and the way information is scaled and rotated.

A jury found that Samsung had willfully infringed five of Apple's patents and awarded about $500 million in damages. The parties appealed. A judge later reduced the amount of damages awarded on the patent claims, but litigation continued. A federal appellate court held that elements of the physical design of these two manufacturers' mobile devices and their on-screen icons were not protected under the Lanham Act.

The United States Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The Court explained that the Patent Act provision governing damages for design patent infringement encompasses both a product sold to a consumer and a component of that product. Therefore, components of the infringing smartphones could be considered relevant to damages, even though the consumers could not purchase those components separately.[17] Eventually, the two parties settled for an undisclosed sum.

16. West View Research, LLC v. Audi AG, Volkswagen AG, 685 Fed.Appx. 923 (Fed.Cir. 2017).
17. Apple, Inc. v. Samsung Electronics Co., 678 Fed.Appx. 1012 (Fed.Cir. 2017); Samsung Electronics Co. v. Apple, Inc., 580 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 429, 196 L.Ed.2d 363 (2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

7–2d Remedies for Patent Infringement

If a patent is infringed, the patent holder may sue for relief in federal court. The patent holder can seek an injunction against the infringer and can also request damages for royalties and lost profits. In some cases, the court may grant the winning party reimbursement for attorneys' fees and costs. If the court determines that the infringement was willful, the court can triple the amount of damages awarded (treble damages).

In the past, permanent injunctions were routinely granted to prevent future infringement. Today, however, a patent holder must prove that it has suffered irreparable injury and that the public interest would not be disserved by a permanent injunction. Thus, courts have the discretion to decide what is equitable in the circumstances and to consider the public interest rather than just the interests of the parties.

Spotlight Case Example 7.11 Cordance Corporation developed some of the technology and software that automates Internet communications. Cordance sued Amazon.com, Inc., for patent infringement, claiming that Amazon's one-click purchasing interface infringed on one of Cordance's patents. After a jury found Amazon guilty of infringement, Cordance requested the court to issue a permanent injunction against Amazon's infringement or, alternatively, to order Amazon to pay Cordance an ongoing royalty.

The court refused to issue a permanent injunction, because Cordance had not proved that it would otherwise suffer irreparable harm. Cordance and Amazon were not direct competitors in the relevant market. Cordance had never sold or licensed the technology infringed by Amazon's one-click purchasing interface and had presented no market data or evidence to show how the infringement negatively affected Cordance. The court also refused to impose an ongoing royalty on Amazon.[18]

7–3 Copyrights

Copyright The exclusive right of an author or originator of a literary or artistic production to publish, print, sell, or otherwise use that production for a statutory period of time.

Focus Question 3
What laws protect authors' rights in the works they create?

A copyright is an intangible property right granted by federal statute to the author or originator of certain literary or artistic productions. The 1976 Copyright Act,[19] as amended, governs copyrights. Works created after January 1, 1978, are automatically given statutory copyright protection for the life of the author plus 70 years. For copyrights owned by publishing companies, the copyright expires 95 years from the date of publication or 120 years from the date of creation, whichever is first. For works by more than one author, the copyright expires 70 years after the death of the last surviving author.

Case Example 7.12 The popular character Sherlock Holmes originated in stories written by Arthur Conan Doyle and published from 1887 through 1927. Over the years, elements of the characters and stories created by Doyle have appeared in books, movies, and television series, including Elementary on CBS and Sherlock on BBC. Before 2013, those who wished to use the copyrighted Sherlock material had to pay a licensing fee to Doyle's estate. Then, in 2013, the editors of a book of Holmes-related stories filed a lawsuit in federal court claiming that the basic Sherlock Holmes story elements introduced before 1923 should no longer be protected. The court agreed and ruled that these elements have entered the public domain—that is, the copyright has expired, and they can be used without permission.[20] 18. Cordance Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc., 730 F.Supp.2d 333 (D.Del. 2010).

19. 17 U.S.C. Sections 101 et seq.
20. Klinger v. Conan Doyle Estate, Ltd., 988 F.Supp.2d 879 (N.D.Ill. 2013).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

7–3a Registration

Copyrights can be registered with the U.S. Copyright Office (www.copyright.gov) in Washington, D.C. Registration is not required, however. A copyright owner need not place a © or Copr. or Copyright on the work to have the work protected against infringement. Chances are that if somebody created it, somebody owns it.

Generally, copyright owners are protected against the following:

1. Reproduction of the work.
2. Development of derivative works.
3. Distribution of the work.
4. Public display of the work.

HARTSWOOD FILMS/BBC WALES/Album/Newscom

Why have the story elements from the famous Sherlock Holmes books entered the public domain?

7–3b What Is Protected Expression?

Works that are copyrightable include books, records, films, artworks, architectural plans, menus, music videos, product packaging, and computer software. To be protected, a work must be "fixed in a durable medium" from which it can be perceived, reproduced, or communicated. As noted, protection is automatic, and registration is not required.

To obtain protection under the Copyright Act, a work must be original and fall into one of the following categories:

1. Literary works (including newspaper and magazine articles, computer and training manuals, catalogues, brochures, and print advertisements).
2. Musical works and accompanying words (including advertising jingles).
3. Dramatic works and accompanying music.
4. Pantomimes and choreographic works (including ballets and other forms of dance).
5. Pictorial, graphic, and sculptural works (including cartoons, maps, posters, statues, and even stuffed animals).
6. Motion pictures and other audiovisual works (including multimedia works).
7. Sound recordings.
8. Architectural works.

Section 102 Exclusions Generally, something that is not an original expression will not qualify for copyright protection. Facts widely known to the public are not copyrightable. Page numbers are not copyrightable because they follow a sequence known to everyone. Mathematical calculations are not copyrightable.

In addition, it is not possible to copyright an idea. Section 102 of the Copyright Act specifically excludes copyright protection for any "idea, procedure, process, system, method of operation, concept, principle, or discovery, regardless of the form in which it is described, explained, illustrated, or embodied." Thus, others can freely use the underlying ideas or principles embodied in a work. What is copyrightable is the particular way in which an idea is expressed. Whenever an idea and an expression are inseparable, the expression cannot be copyrighted. An idea and its expression, then, must be separable to be copyrightable.

Compilations of Facts As mentioned, facts widely known to the public are not copyrightable. Compilations of facts, however, may be copyrightable. Under Section 103 of the Copyright Act, a compilation is a work formed by the collection and assembling of preexisting materials or of data that are selected, coordinated, or arranged in such a way that the resulting work as a whole constitutes an original work of authorship.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The key requirement for the copyrightability of a compilation is originality. For instance, a template form used by emergency room physicians to record patient information is not original and does not qualify for copyright protection. Case Example 7.13 EC Design's LifePlanner is an elaborate spiral-bound daily planner, augmented by inspirational sayings, lists of goals, and plenty of space for personal entries. Craft Smith's Recollections Planner is a less expensive but still elaborate spiral-bound daily planner, augmented by inspirational sayings, lists of goals, and plenty of space for personal entries.

EC filed a copyright infringement lawsuit against Craft Smith based on the similarities between these two items. A federal court dismissed the suit for several reasons. First, the U.S. Copyright Office had rejected EC's attempt to register the LifePlanner layout because a layout is a "template of expression," not an original form of authorship. Second, as a compilation of materials gathered from other sources, the LifePlanner does not qualify as a protectable literary work. Third, the LifePlanner's utilitarian purpose—to help users plan and organize their lives—is not separate enough from the way it looks to earn protection under the law.[21]

7–3c Copyright Infringement

Whenever the form or expression of an idea is copied, an infringement of copyright occurs. The reproduction does not have to be exactly the same as the original, nor does it have to reproduce the original in its entirety. If a substantial part of the original is reproduced, copyright infringement has occurred.

Example 7.14 Ed Sheeran was accused of copyright infringement over his hit song "Photograph." Sheeran allegedly copied much of the song note for note from "Amazing," a single released a few years earlier by X Factor winner Matt Cardle. The songwriters of "Amazing" sued Sheeran, who reportedly settled the case for $20 million.

Note that when a copyright owner grants to another a license to use the work, the owner waives the right to sue that party (the licensee) for copyright infringement. In an action for copyright infringement, copying may be inferred when a plaintiff establishes that the defendant had access to the copyrighted work and that substantial similarities exist between it and the alleged copy. In the following case, involving two toy makers, the parties agreed that the plaintiff owned a valid copyright in certain toys and that the defendant had access to those products. The dispute was over the similarities between the respective products.

21. Craft Smith, LLC v. EC Design, LLC, 388 F.Supp.3d 1385 (D. Utah 2019).

Case 7.2

LEGO A/S v. ZURU Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Federal Circuit, 799 Fed.Appx 823 (2020).

Facts LEGO A/S is an industry leader in designing and making toys, including construction toys. ZURU Inc. also designs, makes, and sells toys. When ZURU debuted its ZURU Action Figures in Walmart stores and on the Walmart website, LEGO filed a suit in a federal district court against ZURU, alleging infringement of LEGO's copyrights covering the appearance of its Minifigures, an iconic construction toy. LEGO posited that the Action Figures were substantially similar in overall look and feel to the Minifigures. The court agreed and granted LEGO a preliminary injunction. ZURU appealed, arguing that "a general sense of similarity is not sufficient" to support an injunction on the basis of copyright infringement. ZURU asked the court to "note specific differences in shape, expression, and proportions" between the toys.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Issue Were ZURU's Action Figures sufficiently similar to LEGO's Minifigures to infringe on LEGO's copyrights?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed the lower court's findings and its entry of an injunction in LEGO's favor. The injunction restrained ZURU from manufacturing, selling, offering for sale, displaying, and importing products that allegedly infringe LEGO's copyrights.

Reason Contending that the designs of its figures were sufficiently different and distinct, ZURU argued that the lower court's failure to identify specific similarities in the two products' artistic expression rendered its findings "clearly erroneous." The appellate court reasoned that "such an analysis is fundamentally at odds" with the standard test for substantial similarity. The test is "whether an ordinary observer, unless he [or she] set out to detect the disparities" between two products, "would be disposed to overlook them, and regard the aesthetic appeal as the same." Under this standard, if the average person would recognize a copy as having been taken from an original, copyrighted work, the two items would be substantially similar. To make this assessment, a court must examine products for their whole concept and feel. The application of this principle "is especially appropriate in an infringement action involving children's works, because children's works are often less complex than those aimed at an adult audience." In this case, the lower court found the total concept and feel of the toys to be substantially similar. Because ZURU did not show otherwise, "we see no reason to disagree with the district court's finding on substantial similarity."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Accompanying LEGO's registration of its copyright are images depicting "Basic Minifigures." Rather than these images, the district court compared ZURU's Action Figures to actual LEGO Minifigures, which differ in facial expression and jacket color. Was this, as ZURU alleged, an improper comparison? Why or why not?
- Ethical On the eve of the trial, ZURU promised to recall its Action Figures from Walmart's stores in an effort to defeat LEGO's request for an injunction. Could this promise be considered ethical? Explain.

Remedies for Copyright Infringement Those who infringe copyrights may be liable for damages or criminal penalties. These range from actual damages or statutory damages, imposed at the court's discretion, to criminal proceedings for willful violations. Actual damages are based on the harm caused to the copyright holder by the infringement, while statutory damages, not to exceed $150,000, are provided for under the Copyright Act. In addition, criminal proceedings may result in fines and/or imprisonment. In some instances, a court may grant an injunction against the infringer.

Spotlight Case Example 7.15 Rusty Carroll operated an online term paper business, R2C2, Inc., that offered up to 300,000 research papers for sale on nine different websites. Individuals whose work was posted on these websites without their permission filed a lawsuit against Carroll for copyright infringement. Because Carroll repeatedly failed to comply with court orders regarding discovery, the court found that the copyright infringement was likely to continue unless an injunction was issued. The court therefore issued a permanent injunction prohibiting Carroll and R2C2 from selling any term paper without sworn documentary evidence that the paper's author had given permission.[22]

The "Fair Use" Exception An exception to liability for copyright infringement is made under the "fair use" doctrine. In certain circumstances, a person or organization can reproduce copyrighted material without paying royalties. Section 107 of the Copyright Act provides as follows:

> [T]he fair use of a copyrighted work, including such use by reproduction in copies or phonorecords or by any other means specified by [Section 106 of the Copyright Act], for purposes such as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching (including multiple

22. Weidner v. Carroll, 2010 WL 310310 (S.D.Ill. 2010).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

copies for classroom use), scholarship, or research, is not an infringement of copyright. In determining whether the use made of a work in any particular case is a fair use the factors to be considered shall include—
(1) the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes;
(2) the nature of the copyrighted work;
(3) the amount and substantiality of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole; and
(4) the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work.

What Is Fair Use? Because the fair use guidelines are very broad, the courts determine whether a particular use is fair on a case-by-case basis. Thus, anyone reproducing copyrighted material may be committing a violation. In determining whether a use is fair, courts have often considered the fourth factor to be the most important. Case Example 7.16 A number of research universities, in partnership with Google, Inc., agreed to digitize books from their libraries and create a repository for them. Eighty member institutions (including many colleges and universities) contributed more than 10 million works to the HathiTrust Digital Library. Some authors complained that this book scanning violated their rights and sued the HathiTrust and several associated entities for copyright infringement.

The court, however, sided with the defendants and held that making digital copies for the purposes of online search was a fair use. The library's searchable database enabled researchers to find terms of interest in the digital volumes—but not to read the volumes online. Therefore, the court concluded that the digitization did not provide a substitute that damaged the market for the original works.[23]

See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion of whether Beyoncé's use of three phrases written by another artist constituted fair use.

The First Sale Doctrine Section 109(a) of the Copyright Act provides that the owner of a particular item that is copyrighted can, without the authority of the copyright owner, sell or otherwise dispose of it. This rule is known as the first sale doctrine.

Kevin Winter/Wirelmage/Getty Images

Beyoncé sampled several phrases from another musician in one of her songs. Why might a court conclude that this use was not a fair use under copyright law?

Under this doctrine, once a copyright owner sells or gives away a particular copy of a work, the copyright owner no longer has the right to control the distribution of that copy. Thus, for instance, a person who buys a copyrighted book can sell it to someone else. The first sale doctrine also applies to copyrighted CDs and DVDs.

The United States Supreme Court has ruled that the first sale doctrine protects lawfully made copies no matter where in the world those copies were made. Case Example 7.17 Supap Kirtsaeng, a citizen of Thailand, was a graduate student at the University of Southern California. He enlisted friends and family in Thailand to buy copies of textbooks there and ship them to him in the United States. Kirtsaeng resold the textbooks on eBay, where he eventually made about $100,000.

John Wiley & Sons, Inc., had printed some of those textbooks in Asia. Wiley sued Kirtsaeng in federal district court for copyright infringement. Kirtsaeng argued that Section 23. Authors Guild, Inc. v. HathiTrust, 755 F.3d 87 (2d Cir. 2014). See also Authors Guild v. Google, Inc., 804 F.3d 202 (2d Cir. 2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Beyoncé, Sampling, and a $20 Million Lawsuit

To date, Beyoncé's single "Formation" has been legally downloaded millions times. The video and the song itself were nominated for Grammy awards in the following categories: Record of the Year, Song of the Year, and Best Music Video.

What Does Sampling Involve?

In the song "Formation," Beyoncé sampled several phrases attributed to street performer and music artist Anthony Barré, popularly known as Messy Mya. (Sampling is taking a part of a sound recording and reusing it in a different recording.) Messy Mya became famous on YouTube by filming himself in New Orleans' gay, lesbian, and transgender communities in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The three phrases that Beyoncé sampled are:

- "I like that."
- "What happened at the New Orleans."
- "Bitch, I'm back by popular demand."

Was It Fair Use?

Copyright law requires payment to copyright owners except for fair use. But what constitutes fair use? Typically, courts tend to measure fair use by looking at whether the use in question is of a commercial nature. Additionally, courts look at the amount and substantiality of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole and the effect of the use on the potential market for the copyrighted work. Beyoncé claimed that her sampled use of Messy Mya's words fell under the fair use doctrine.

A Lawsuit Nonetheless

Messy Mya was shot and killed in 2010, and his estate would not accept the fair use doctrine defense offered by Beyoncé's attorneys. Rather, the estate sued for $20 million in back royalties, as well as proper credit for Messy Mya "as a writer, composer, producer, and performer." The suit alleged that "the verbatim copying of [Messy Mya's] voice and words by defendant is so blatant in both scale and degree that it raises this matter to an unusual level of striking similarity."

Are the three phrases that Beyoncé sampled worth $20 million? After losing a motion to dismiss the case based on a fair use defense in a federal district court, Beyoncé agreed to settle the case for the full $20 million.[a]

Critical Thinking

Beyoncé also used footage from a 2013 documentary called That B.E.A.T. Why might international entertainment stars choose to use sampled words and sampled video footage without the permission of the copyright holders?

a. Estate of Barré v. Carter, 272 F.Supp.3d 906 (E.D.La. 2017).

109(a) of the Copyright Act allows the first purchaser-owner of a book to sell it without the copyright owner's permission. The trial court held in favor of Wiley, and that decision was affirmed on appeal. Kirtsaeng then appealed to the United States Supreme Court, which ruled in Kirtsaeng's favor. The first sale doctrine applies even to goods purchased abroad and resold in the United States.[24]

7–3d Copyright Protection for Software

The Computer Software Copyright Act amended the Copyright Act to include computer programs in the list of creative works protected by federal copyright law. Generally, copyright protection extends to those parts of a computer program that can be read by humans, such as the high-level language of a source code. Protection also extends to the binary-language object code, which is readable only by the computer, and to such elements as the overall structure, sequence, and organization of a program.

24. Kirtsaeng v. John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 568 U.S. 519, 133 S.Ct. 1351, 185 L.Ed.2d 392 (2013). See also Geophysical Service, Inc. v. TGS-NOPEC Geophysical Co., 850 F.3d 785 (5th Cir. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Not all aspects of software are protected, however. Courts typically have not extended copyright protection to the "look and feel"—the general appearance, command structure, video images, menus, windows, and other screen displays—of computer programs. (Note that copying the "look and feel" of another's product may be a violation of trade dress or trademark laws, however.) Sometimes it can be difficult for courts to decide which particular aspects of software are protected.

Case Example 7.18 Oracle America, Inc., is a software company that owns numerous application programming interfaces, or API packages. Oracle grants licenses to others to use these API packages to write applications in the Java programming language. Java is open and free for anyone to use, but using it requires an interface.

When Google began using some of Oracle's API packages to run Java on its Android mobile devices, Oracle sued for copyright infringement. Google argued that the software packages were command structure, which are not protected under copyright law. Ultimately, a federal appellate court concluded that the API packages were source code and were entitled to copyright protection.[25]

The dispute in the following case was whether a third-party software support service infringed the copyright of the owner of the software that the service supported.

---

25. Oracle America, Inc. v. Google, Inc., 750 F.3d 1339 (Fed.Cir. 2014).

Case 7.3

Oracle USA, Inc. v. Rimini Street, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 879 F.3d 948 (2018).

Facts Oracle USA, Inc., licenses its proprietary enterprise software for a one-time payment. Oracle also sells its licensees maintenance contracts for the software. The maintenance work includes software updates. Rimini Street, Inc., provided third-party support for Oracle's enterprise software, in competition with Oracle's maintenance services. To compete effectively, Rimini also needed to provide software updates to its customers. Creating these updates required copying Oracle's copyrighted software.

Oracle filed a suit in a federal district court against Rimini, alleging copyright infringement. Oracle alleged that Rimini copied Oracle's software under the license of one customer for work for other customers, or for unknown or future customers, instead of restricting the copying to work for the licensee. A jury found in Oracle's favor. The court entered a judgment for Oracle, awarding damages of more than $50 million. Rimini appealed the judgment to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Issue Did Rimini infringe Oracle's copyright?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the lower court. "Rimini's accused acts violated the exclusive right Oracle enjoys as owner of the software copyright."

Reason The appellate court acknowledged that software needs patches and updates to fix glitches. Enterprise software is customized to a user's specific purpose. To create updates for enterprise software requires copying the software so that it can be modified to develop and test the updates. Making this copy without a license violates the exclusive right of the copyright owner to copy the software. In this case, Oracle's licenses permitted its licensees to make copies for themselves to maintain the software. The licenses further allowed the licensees to outsource the maintenance work to others, such as Rimini. But the licenses limited the copying to support for the licensees. Work that Rimini performed under one customer's license for other customers was not in support of the licensee. The same reasoning applied to work performed for unknown or future customers.

Critical Thinking

- Economic Rimini argued that Oracle was misusing the copyright in its proprietary software to stifle competition. Do you agree? Explain.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Rimini had bought one of Oracle's licenses for itself. Would the result have been different? Why or why not?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

7–4 Trade Secrets

The law of trade secrets protects some business processes and information that are not or cannot be protected under patent, copyright, or trademark law. A trade secret is basically information of commercial value. A company's customer lists, plans, and research and development are trade secrets. Trade secrets may also include pricing information, marketing techniques, and production methods—anything that makes an individual company unique and that would have value to a competitor.

Trade Secret A formula, device, idea, process, or other information used in a business that gives the owner a competitive advantage in the marketplace.

Unlike copyright and trademark protection, protection of trade secrets extends both to ideas and to their expression. (For this reason, and because there are no registration or filing requirements for trade secrets, trade secret protection may be well suited for software.) Of course, the secret formula, method, or other information must be disclosed to some persons, particularly to key employees. Businesses generally attempt to protect their trade secrets by having all employees who use the process or information agree in their contracts, or in confidentiality agreements, never to divulge it.

Focus Question 4

What are trade secrets, and what laws offer protection for this form of intellectual property?

7–4a State and Federal Law on Trade Secrets

Under Section 757 of the Restatement of Torts, those who disclose or use another's trade secret, without authorization, are liable to that other party if either of the following is true:

1. They discovered the secret by improper means.
2. Their disclosure or use constitutes a breach of a duty owed to the other party.

Stealing of confidential business data by industrial espionage, as when a business taps into a competitor's computer, is a theft of trade secrets without any contractual violation and is actionable in itself.

Trade secrets have long been protected under the common law. Today, nearly every state has enacted trade secret laws based on the Uniform Trade Secrets Act. Additionally, the Economic Espionage Act made the theft of trade secrets a federal crime.

7–4b Trade Secrets in Cyberspace

Today's computer technology undercuts a business firm's ability to protect its confidential information, including trade secrets. For instance, a dishonest employee could e-mail trade secrets in a company's server to a competitor or a future employer. If e-mail is not an option, the employee might walk out with the information on a flash drive.

Case Example 7.19 Charles Furstenau was a manager at Radiant Global Logistics, a company that helps customers with shipping needs. Disgruntled with Radiant, Furstenau decided to join a competitor, BTX Logistics. Before doing so, he forwarded e-mails containing information on revenues, profit margins, preferred shippers, and financial projections from his Radiant account to his personal account. Learning this, Radiant sued Furstenau and BTX for misappropriation of trade secrets. A federal district court prohibited Furstenau from contacting clients he had worked with at Radiant for six months and indefinitely barred BTX from using the information in the e-mails to its advantage. A federal appeals court affirmed, with the caveat that Furstenau's "general knowledge" of the logistics trade, as opposed to the specific data in the e-mails, did not constitute a trade secret.[26]

For a summary of trade secrets and other forms of intellectual property, see Exhibit 7-1.

26. Radiant Global Logistics v. Furstenau, __ F.3d. __ (6th Cir. 2020).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 7-1 Forms of Intellectual Property

	Definition	How Acquired	Duration	Remedy For Infringement
Trademark (service, certification, and collective marks, and trade dress)	Any distinctive word, symbol, sound, or design that an entity uses to distinguish its goods or services from those of others. The owner has the exclusive right to use that mark or trade dress.	1. At common law, ownership created by use of the mark. 2. Registration with the appropriate federal or state office gives notice and is permitted if the mark is currently in commercial use or will be within the next six months.	Unlimited, as long as it is in use. To continue notice by registration, the owner must renew by filing between the fifth and sixth years, and thereafter, every ten years.	1. Injunction prohibiting the future use of the mark. 2. Actual damages plus profits received by the party who infringed (can be increased under the Lanham Act). 3. Destruction of articles that infringed. 4. Plus attorneys' fees.
Patent	A grant from the government that gives an inventor exclusive rights to make, use, and sell an invention.	By filing a patent application with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and receiving its approval.	Twenty years from the date of the application; for design patents, fourteen years.	1. Injunction against infringer. 2. Possible monetary damages, including royalties and lost profits, plus attorneys' fees. 3. Damages may be tripled for intentional infringement.
Copyright	The right of an author or originator of a literary or artistic work, or other production that falls within a specified category, to have the exclusive use of that work for a given period of time.	Automatic (once the work or creation is put in tangible form). Only the expression of an idea (and not the idea itself) can be protected by copyright.	For authors: the life of the author plus 70 years. For publishers: 95 years after the date of publication or 120 years after creation.	Actual damages plus profits received by the party who infringed, or statutory damages under the Copyright Act. Courts may impose fines and/or imprisonment, as well as an injunction.
Trade Secret	Any information that a business possesses and that gives the business an advantage over competitors (including customer lists, plans, pricing information, and production methods).	Through the originality and development of the information and processes that constitute the business secret and are unknown to others.	Unlimited, so long as not revealed to others. Once revealed to others, it is no longer a trade secret.	Monetary damages for misappropriation (the Uniform Trade Secrets Act also permits punitive damages if willful), plus costs and attorneys' fees.

7–5 International Protections

For many years, the United States has been a party to various international agreements relating to intellectual property rights. For instance, the Paris Convention of 1883, to which about 180 countries are signatory, allows parties in one country to file for patent and trademark protection in any of the other member countries. Other international agreements include the Berne Convention, the Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (known as the TRIPS agreement), the Madrid Protocol, and the Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

7–5a The Berne Convention

Under the Berne Convention of 1886, if a U.S. citizen writes a book, every country that has signed the convention must recognize the writer's copyright in the book. Also, if a citizen of a country that has not signed the convention first publishes a book in one of the 169 countries that have signed, all other countries that have signed the convention must recognize that author's copyright. Copyright notice is not needed to gain protection under the Berne Convention for works published after March 1, 1989.

The European Union altered its copyright rules under the Berne Convention by agreeing to extend the period of royalty protection for musicians from fifty years to seventy years. This decision aids major record labels as well as performers and musicians. The profits of musicians and record companies have been shrinking in recent years because of the sharp decline in sales of compact discs and the rise in digital downloads (both legal and illegal).

7–5b The TRIPS Agreement

The Berne Convention and other international agreements have given some protection to intellectual property on a worldwide level. None of them, however, has been as significant and far reaching in scope as the Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) agreement. Representatives from more than one hundred nations signed the TRIPS agreement in 1994.

Focus Question 5
How does the TRIPS agreement protect intellectual property worldwide?

Established Standards and Procedures The TRIPS agreement established, for the first time, standards for the international protection of intellectual property rights, including patents, trademarks, and copyrights for movies, computer programs, books, and music. The TRIPS agreement provides that each member country must include in its domestic laws broad intellectual property rights and effective remedies (including civil and criminal penalties) for violations of those rights.

Each member nation must ensure that legal procedures are available for parties who wish to bring actions for infringement of intellectual property rights. Additionally, a related document established a mechanism for settling disputes among member nations.

Prohibits Discrimination Generally, the TRIPS agreement forbids member nations from discriminating against foreign owners of intellectual property rights in the administration, regulation, or adjudication of such rights. In other words, a member nation cannot give its own nationals (citizens) favorable treatment without offering the same treatment to nationals of all member countries. Example 7.20 A U.S. software manufacturer brings a suit for the infringement of intellectual property rights under Germany's national laws. Because Germany is a member of the TRIPS agreement, the U.S. manufacturer is entitled to receive the same treatment as a German manufacturer. ■

7–5c The Madrid Protocol

In the past, one of the difficulties in protecting U.S. trademarks internationally was that it was time consuming and expensive to apply for trademark registration in foreign countries. The filing fees and procedures for trademark registration vary significantly among individual countries. The Madrid Protocol, which was signed into law in 2003, may help to resolve these problems.

The Madrid Protocol is an international treaty that has been signed by about a hundred countries. Under its provisions, a U.S. company wishing to register its trademark abroad can submit a single application and designate other member countries in which it would like to register the mark. The treaty was designed to reduce the costs of obtaining international trademark protection by more than 60 percent.

Although the Madrid Protocol may simplify and reduce the cost of trademark registration in foreign nations, it remains to be seen whether it will provide significant benefits to trademark owners. Even with an easier registration process, the question of whether member countries will enforce the law and protect the mark still remains.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

7–5d The Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement

In 2011, Australia, Canada, Japan, Korea, Morocco, New Zealand, Singapore, and the United States signed the Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement (ACTA), an international treaty to combat global counterfeiting and piracy. Other nations have since signed the agreement. Once a nation has adopted appropriate procedures, it can ratify the treaty.

Provisions and Goals The goals of the treaty are to increase international cooperation, facilitate the best law enforcement practices, and provide a legal framework to combat counterfeiting. The treaty has its own governing body.

The ACTA applies not only to counterfeit physical goods, such as medications, but also to pirated copyrighted works being distributed via the Internet. The idea is to create a new standard of enforcement for intellectual property rights that goes beyond the TRIPS agreement and encourages international cooperation and information sharing among signatory countries.

Border Searches Under ACTA, member nations are required to establish border measures that allow officials, on their own initiative, to search commercial shipments of imports and exports for counterfeit goods. The treaty neither requires nor prohibits random border searches of electronic devices, such as laptops and iPads, for infringing content.

If border authorities reasonably believe that any goods in transit are counterfeit, the treaty allows them to keep the suspect goods unless the owner proves that the items are authentic and noninfringing. The treaty allows member nations, in accordance with their own laws, to order online service providers to furnish information about (including the identity of) suspected trademark and copyright infringers.

Practice and Review

Two computer science majors, Trent and Xavier, have an idea for a new video game, which they propose to call "Hallowed." They form a business and begin developing their idea. Several months later, Trent and Xavier run into a problem with their design and consult with a friend, Brad, who is an expert in creating computer source codes. After the software is completed but before Hallowed is marketed, a video game called Halo 2 is released for both the Xbox and the PlayStation 3 systems. Halo 2 uses source codes similar to those of Hallowed and imitates Hallowed's overall look and feel, although not all the features are alike. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would the name Hallowed receive protection as a trademark or as trade dress?
2. If Trent and Xavier had obtained a business process patent on Hallowed, would the release of Halo 2 infringe on their patent? Why or why not?
3. Based only on the facts presented above, could Trent and Xavier sue the makers of Halo 2 for copyright infringement? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that Trent and Xavier discover that Brad took the idea of Hallowed and sold it to the company that produced Halo 2. Which type of intellectual property issue does this raise?

Debate This

Congress has amended the Copyright Act several times. Copyright holders now have protection for many decades. Was Congress justified in extending the copyright time periods? Why or why not?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

certification mark 172 collective mark 172 copyright 178 intellectual property 166 license 175 patent 175 royalties 175 service mark 172 trade dress 172 trade name 174 trade secret 185 trademark 167
trademark dilution 169

Chapter Summary: Intellectual Property Rights

Trademarks	1. A trademark is a distinctive word, symbol, sound, or design that identifies the manufacturer as the source of the goods and distinguishes its products from those made or sold by others. 2. The major federal statutes protecting trademarks and related property are the Lanham Act and the Federal Trademark Dilution Act. Generally, to be protected, a trademark must be sufficiently distinctive from all competing trademarks. 3. Trademark infringement occurs when one party uses a mark that is the same as, or confusingly similar to, the protected trademark, service mark, certification mark, collective mark, or trade name of another party without permission when marketing goods or services.
Patents	1. A patent is a grant from the government that gives an inventor the exclusive right to make, use, and sell an invention for a period of twenty years (fourteen years for a design patent) from the date when the application for a patent is filed. To be patentable, an invention (or a discovery, process, or design) must be novel, useful, and not obvious in light of current technology. Computer software may be patented. 2. Almost anything is patentable, except the laws of nature, natural phenomena, and abstract ideas (including algorithms). Even artistic methods and works of art, certain business processes, and the structures of storylines may be patentable. 3. Patent infringement occurs when someone uses or sells another's patented design, product, or process without the patent owner's permission. The patent holder can sue the infringer in federal court and request an injunction, but must prove irreparable injury to obtain a permanent injunction against the infringer. The patent holder can also request damages and attorneys' fees. If the infringement was willful, the court can grant treble damages.
Copyrights	1. A copyright is an intangible property right granted by federal statute to the author or originator of certain literary or artistic productions. The Copyright Act, as amended, governs copyrights. Works created after January 1, 1978, are automatically given statutory protection for the life of the author plus seventy years. 2. Copyright infringement occurs whenever the form or expression of an idea is copied without the permission of the copyright holder. An exception applies if the copying is deemed a "fair use." 3. The Computer Software Copyright Act amended the Copyright Act to include computer programs in the list of creative works protected by federal copyright law.
Trade Secrets	1. Trade secrets are basically information of commercial value and include customer lists, plans, research and development, and pricing information. 2. Trade secrets are protected under the common law and by statute in nearly all of the states against misappropriation by competitors. Unlike copyright and trademark protection, protection of trade secrets extends both to ideas and to their expression. The Economic Espionage Act made the theft of trade secrets a federal crime.
International Protections	Various international agreements provide international protection for intellectual property. A landmark agreement is the Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) agreement, which provides for enforcement procedures in all countries signatory to the agreement.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Issue Spotters

1. Roslyn, a food buyer for Organic Cornucopia Food Company, decides to go into business for herself as Roslyn's Kitchen. She contacts Organic's suppliers, offering to buy their entire harvest for the next year. She also contacts Organic's customers, offering to sell her products for less than Organic. Has Roslyn violated any of the intellectual property rights discussed in this chapter? Explain. (See Trade Secrets.)
2. Global Products develops, patents, and markets software. World Copies, Inc., sells Global's software without the maker's permission. Is this patent infringement? If so, how might Global save the cost of suing World for infringement and at the same time profit from World's sales? (See Patents.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

7–1. Patent Infringement. John and Andrew Doney invented a hard-bearing device for balancing rotors. Although they obtained a patent for their invention from the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, it was never used as an automobile wheel balancer. Some time later, Exetron Corp. produced an automobile wheel balancer that used a hard-bearing device similar to the Doneys' device. Given that the Doneys had not used their device for automobile wheel balancing, does Exetron's use of a similar device infringe on the Doneys' patent? (See Patents.)

7–2. Fair Use. Professor Wise is teaching a summer seminar in business torts at State University. Several times during the course, he makes copies of relevant sections from business law texts and distributes them to his students. Wise does not realize that the daughter of one of the textbook authors is a member of his seminar. She tells her father about Wise's copying activities, which have taken place without her father's or his publisher's permission. Her father sues Wise for copyright infringement. Wise claims protection under the fair use doctrine. Who will prevail? Explain. (See Copyrights.)

7–3. Spotlight on Macy's—Copyright Infringement. United Fabrics International, Inc., bought a fabric design from an Italian designer and registered a copyright to the design with the U.S. Copyright Office. When Macy's, Inc., began selling garments with a similar design, United filed a copyright infringement suit against Macy's. Macy's argued that United did not own a valid copyright to the design and so could not claim infringement. Does United have to prove that the copyright is valid to establish infringement? Explain. [United Fabrics International, Inc. v. C & J Wear, Inc., 630 F.3d 1255 (9th Cir. 2011)] (See Copyrights.)

7–4. Copyright Infringement. SilverEdge Systems Software hired Catherine Conrad to perform a singing telegram. SilverEdge arranged for James Bendewald to record Conrad's performance of her copyrighted song to post on the company's website. Conrad agreed to wear a microphone to assist in the recording, told Bendewald what to film, and asked for an additional fee only if SilverEdge used the video for a commercial purpose. Later, the company chose to post a video of a different performer's singing telegram instead. Conrad filed a suit in a federal district court against SilverEdge and Bendewald for copyright infringement. Are the defendants liable? Explain. [Conrad v. Bendewald, 500 Fed.Appx. 526 (7th Cir. 2013)] (See Copyrights.)

7–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Patents. The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (PTO) denied Raymond Gianelli's application for a patent for a "Rowing Machine"—an exercise machine on which a user pulls on handles to perform a rowing motion against a selected resistance. The PTO considered the device obvious in light of a previously patented "Chest Press Apparatus for Exercising Regions of the Upper Body"—an exercise machine on which a user pushes on handles to overcome a selected resistance. On what ground might this result be reversed on appeal? Discuss. [In re Gianelli, 739 F.3d 1375 (Fed. Cir. 2014)] (See Patents.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 7–5, go to Appendix E.

7–6. Patents. Rodney Klassen was employed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA). Without the USDA's authorization, Klassen gave Jim Ludy, a grape grower, plant material for two unreleased varieties of grapes. For almost two years, most of Ludy's plantings bore no usable fruit, none of the grapes were sold, and no plant material was given to any other person. The plantings were visible from publicly accessible roads, but none of the vines were labeled, and the variety could not be identified by simply viewing the vines. Under patent law, an applicant may not obtain a patent for an invention that is in public use more than one year before the date of the application. Could the USDA successfully apply for patents on the two varieties given to Ludy? Explain. [Delano Farms Co. v. California Table Grape Commission, 778 F.3d 1243 (Fed.Cir. 2015)] (See Patents.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

7–7. Copyright Infringement. Savant Homes, Inc., is a custom home designer and builder. Using what it called the Anders Plan, Savant built a model house in Windsor, Colorado. This was a ranch house with two bedrooms on one side and a master suite on the other, separated by a combined family room, dining room, and kitchen. Ron and Tammie Wagner toured the Savant house. The same month, the Wagners hired builder Douglas Collins and his firm, Douglas Consulting, to build a house for them. After it was built, Savant filed a lawsuit in a federal district court against Collins for copyright infringement, alleging that the builder had copied the Anders Plan in the design and construction of the Wagner house. Collins showed that the Anders Plan consisted of standard elements and standard arrangements of elements. In these circumstances, has infringement occurred? Explain. [Savant Homes, Inc. v. Collins, 809 F.3d 1133 (10th Cir. 2016)] (See Copyrights.)

7–8. Patent Infringement. Finjan, Inc., owns a patent—U.S. Patent No. 7,418,731, or "the '731 patent"—for a system and method that protect computers from malicious software embedded in websites on the Internet. The system consists of a gateway that compares security profiles associated with requested files to the security policies of requesting users. The method includes scanning an incoming file to create the profile, which comprises a list of computer commands the file is programmed to perform. The '731 patent required "a list of computer commands." Blue Coat Systems, Inc., sold a competing product. Blue Coat's product scanned an incoming file for certain commands and created a new file called Cookie2 that contained a field showing whether, and how often, those commands appeared. Finjan filed a suit against Blue Coat, alleging patent infringement. Blue Coat argued that its profiles did not contain the '731 patent's required "list of computer commands." Did Blue Coat's product infringe Finjan's patent? Explain. [Finjan, Inc. v. Blue Cost Systems, Inc., 879 F.3d 1299 (Fed. Cir. 2018)] (See Patents.)

7–9. Copyrights. The "Jimmy Smith Rap" is a copyrighted rap recording asserting the supremacy of jazz over other types of music. Released thirty years later, "Pound Cake" is a hip-hop song in which Aubrey Graham and Shawn Carter, professionally known as Drake and Jay-Z, rap about the greatness and authenticity of their work. At the beginning of the seven-minute-long "Pound Cake" is a sampling of thirty-five seconds of the "Jimmy Smith Rap." Criticizing jazz elitism, "Pound Cake" emphasizes that it is not the genre but the authenticity of the music that matters. The release of "Pound Cake" had no effect on the demand for the "Jimmy Smith Rap," for which there was no active market at the time. Did Drake and Jay-Z make "fair use" of the "Jimmy Smith Rap," or were they liable for copyright infringement? Explain. [Estate of Smith v. Graham, 799 FedAppx 36 (2d Cir. 2020)] (See Copyrights.)

7–10. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Copyright Infringement. Usenet is an online bulletin board network. A user gains access to Usenet posts through a commercial service, such as Giganews, Inc. Giganews deletes or blocks posts that contain child pornography. Otherwise, the service does not monitor content. Perfect 10, Inc., owns the copyrights to tens of thousands of images, many of which have been illegally posted on Usenet through Giganews. When Perfect 10 notified Giganews of posts that contained infringing images, the service took them down. Despite these efforts, illegal posting continued. Perfect 10 filed a suit in a federal district court against Giganews, alleging copyright infringement. [Perfect 10, Inc. v. Giganews, Inc., 847 F.3d 657 (9th Cir. 2017)] (See Copyrights.)

1. Is Giganews liable for copyright infringement? Do Internet service providers have an ethical duty to do more to prevent infringement? Why or why not?
2. Using the IDDR approach, decide whether a copyright owner has an ethical duty to protect against infringement.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

7–11. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Patents. After years of research, your company has developed a product that might revolutionize the green (environmentally conscious) building industry. The product is made from relatively inexpensive and widely available materials combined in a unique way that can substantially lower the heating and cooling costs of residential and commercial buildings. The company has registered the trademark it intends to use for the product and has filed a patent application with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. (See Patents.)

1. One group will provide three reasons why this product does or does not qualify for patent protection.
2. A second group will develop a four-step plan for how the company can best protect its intellectual property rights (trademark, trade secret, and patent) and prevent domestic and foreign competitors from producing counterfeit goods or cheap knockoffs.
3. The third group will list and explain three ways in which the company can utilize licensing.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

BigTuneOnline/Shutterstock.com

8 Internet Law, Social Media, and Privacy

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is cybersquatting, and when is it illegal?
2. What law protects copyrights in the digital age?
3. Identify several ways that social media has affected American legal processes.
4. What law governs whether Internet service providers are liable for online defamatory statements made by users?
5. When does the law protect a person's electronic communications from being intercepted or accessed?

"The Internet is just the world passing around notes in a classroom."

Jon Stewart
1962–present (American comedian and former host of The Daily Show)

The Internet has changed our lives and our laws. Technology has put the world at our fingertips and now allows even the smallest business to reach customers around the globe. Because the Internet allows the world to "pass around notes" so quickly, as Jon Stewart joked in the chapter-opening quotation, it presents a variety of challenges for the law.

Courts are often in uncharted waters when deciding disputes that involve the Internet, social media, and online privacy. Judges may have no common law precedents to rely on when resolving cases. Long-standing principles of justice may be inapplicable. New rules are evolving, but often not as quickly as technology.

Suppose that one day Frank Smith, a law student, learns that someone has created a Facebook account called "Frank Smithsexfiendman." The Facebook page associated with this account is showing doctored photos and videos of Frank engaged in a number of sexually explicit acts. As if this were not bad enough, whoever set up the account has sent friend requests to many of Frank's family members and acquaintances, causing them to visit the embarrassing page. Frank reports the account to Facebook and requests that it be deleted because of the humiliating nature of its content. Twenty-four hours later, the Frank Smithsexfiendman page remains active.

Frank has no idea who is behind this elaborate prank. Can he succeed in a lawsuit against Facebook for defamation or invasion of privacy? Proving torts online can be difficult, particularly when the person who may be liable is impossible to identify. In this chapter, you will read about the rules pertaining to a number of online torts, as well as other legal challenges presented by the Internet and social media.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

8–1 Internet Law

A number of laws specifically address issues that arise only on the Internet. These issues include unsolicited e-mail, domain names, cybersquatting, and meta tags, as we discuss here. We also discuss how the law is dealing with problems of trademark dilution online, as well as licensing.

8–1a Spam

Businesses and individuals alike are targets of spam.[1] Spam is the unsolicited "junk e-mail" that floods virtual mailboxes with advertisements, solicitations, and similar communications. Considered relatively harmless in the early days of the Internet, spam has become a serious problem. By some estimates, it accounts for roughly 75 percent of all e-mails.

Spam Bulk, unsolicited (junk) e-mail.

State Regulation of Spam In an attempt to combat spam, thirty-seven states have enacted laws that prohibit or regulate its use. Many state laws that regulate spam require the senders of e-mail ads to instruct the recipients on how they can "opt out" of further e-mail ads from the same sources. For instance, in some states, an unsolicited e-mail must include a toll-free phone number or return e-mail address that the recipient can use to ask the sender not to send unsolicited e-mails.

The Federal CAN-SPAM Act In 2003, Congress enacted the Controlling the Assault of Non-Solicited Pornography and Marketing (CAN-SPAM) Act.[2] The legislation applies to any "commercial electronic mail messages" that are sent to promote a commercial product or service. Significantly, the statute preempts state antispam laws except those provisions in state laws that prohibit false and deceptive e-mailing practices.

Generally, the act permits the sending of unsolicited commercial e-mail but prohibits certain types of spamming activities. Prohibited activities include the use of a false return address and the use of false, misleading, or deceptive information when sending e-mail. The statute also prohibits the use of "dictionary attacks"—sending messages to randomly generated e-mail addresses—and the "harvesting" of e-mail addresses from websites through the use of specialized software.

Case Example 8.1 Zoobuh provides "Safe E-mail for Kids and Families." Consequently, its customers were not pleased when they started receiving daily e-mails from the dating website xdating.com. These messages contained fake profiles of nonexistent xdating.com members supposedly living near the recipients. Furthermore, when recipients clicked the "unsubscribe" option in the e-mails, they unwittingly signed up to receive additional xdating.com marketing materials.

Alleging that these e-mails violated the CAN-SPAM Act, Zoobuh filed suit against the company that provided xdating.com access to its customer list. Zoobuh asserted that the spam caused lost time, as its employees worked to block the offending e-mails, and lost profits, as frustrated customers cancelled Zoobuh's e-mail service. Finding for Zoobuh, a federal judge awarded the company $3 million in damages.[3] Victories in court, however, have done little to curb spam, which continues to flow at a rate of many billions of messages per day.

1. The term spam is said to come from the lyrics of a Monty Python song that repeats the word spam over and over.
2. 15 U.S.C. Sections 7701 et seq.
3. Zoobuh, Inc., v. Savicom, Inc., 2019 WL 1466285 (D. Utah, 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The U.S. Safe Web Act After the CAN-SPAM Act took effect, spamming from servers located in other nations increased. These cross-border spammers generally were able to escape detection and legal sanctions because the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) lacked the authority to investigate foreign spamming.

Congress sought to rectify the situation by enacting the U.S. Safe Web Act (also known as the Undertaking Spam, Spyware, and Fraud Enforcement with Enforcers beyond Borders Act).[4] The act allows the FTC to cooperate and share information with foreign agencies in investigating and prosecuting those involved in spamming, spyware, and various Internet frauds and deceptions.

Internet Service Providers (ISP) A business or organization that offers users access to the Internet and related services.

The Safe Web Act also provides a "safe harbor" for Internet service providers (ISPs)—organizations that provide access to the Internet. The safe harbor gives ISPs immunity from liability for supplying information to the FTC concerning possible unfair or deceptive conduct in foreign jurisdictions.

8–1b Domain Names

Domain Name The series of letters and symbols used to identify a site operator on the Internet (an Internet address).

As e-commerce expanded worldwide, one issue that emerged involved the rights of a trademark owner to use the mark as part of a domain name. A domain name is part of an Internet address, such as "cengage.com."

Structure of Domain Names Every domain name ends with a top-level domain (TLD), which is the part of the name to the right of the period. This part of the name often indicates the type of entity that operates the site. For instance, com is an abbreviation for commercial, and edu is an abbreviation for education.

The second-level domain (SLD)—the part of the name to the left of the period—is chosen by the business entity or individual registering the domain name. Competition for SLDs among firms with similar names and products has led to numerous disputes. By using an identical or similar domain name, one company may attempt to profit from a competitor's goodwill (the intangible value of a business).

Goodwill In the business context, the valuable reputation of a business viewed as an intangible asset.

Domain Name Distribution System The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN), a nonprofit corporation, oversees the distribution of domain names and operates an online arbitration system. Due to numerous complaints, ICANN overhauled the domain name distribution system in 2012.

ICANN now sells new generic top-level domain names (gTLDs) for an initial price of $185,000 plus an annual fee of $25,000. Whereas TLDs previously had been limited to only a few terms (including com, net, and org), gTLDs can take any form. Many companies and corporations have acquired gTLDs based on their brands, such as aol, bmw, target, and walmart. Some companies have numerous gTLDs. Google's gTLDs, for instance, include android, chrome, gmail, goog, and YouTube.

Because gTLDs have greatly increased the potential number of domain names, domain name registrars have proliferated. Registrar companies charge a fee to businesses and individuals to register new names and to renew annual registrations (often through automated software). Many of these companies also buy and sell expired domain names.

Cybersquatting The act of registering a domain name that is the same as, or confusingly similar to, the trademark of another and then offering to sell that domain name back to the trademark owner.

8–1c Cybersquatting

One of the goals of the new gTLD system was to alleviate the problem of cybersquatting. Cybersquatting occurs when a party registers a domain name that is the same as, or confusingly similar to, the trademark of another and then offers to sell the domain name back to the

4. Pub. L. No. 109–455, 120 Stat. 3372 (2006), codified in various sections of 15 U.S.C. and 12 U.S.C. Section 3412.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

trademark owner. Example 8.2 Apple, Inc., has repeatedly sued cybersquatters that registered domain names similar to the names of its products, such as iphone8.com and ipods.com.

Focus Question 1

What is cybersquatting, and when is it illegal?

Anticybersquatting Legislation Because cybersquatting has led to so much litigation, Congress enacted the Anticybersquatting Consumer Protection Act (ACPA).[5] The act amended the Lanham Act—the federal law protecting trademarks. The ACPA makes cybersquatting illegal when both of the following are true:

1. The domain name is identical or confusingly similar to the trademark of another.
2. The one registering, trafficking in, or using the domain name has a "bad faith intent" to profit from that trademark.

Despite the ACPA, cybersquatting continues to present a problem for businesses. Case Example 8.3 CrossFit, Inc., is a Delaware corporation that provides personal fitness services and products. CrossFit is well known in the fitness industry and licenses affiliates to operate individual CrossFit-branded programs. CrossFit granted a license to Andres Del Cueto Davalos to operate a location in Mexico and allowed him to use the domain name "CrossFitAlfa." Davalos later registered the domain name CrossFitBeta without CrossFit's permission and then used both of these domain names to redirect website visitors to a third website, www.woodbox.com. Davalos was attempting to siphon off CrossFit customers to another business that he co-owned, Woodbox Training Centers, which operated in twenty-five locations across Mexico. CrossFit sued under the ACPA. Because of Davalos's bad faith intent, the court awarded CrossFit the maximum amount of statutory damages available ($100,000 for each domain name), plus costs and attorneys' fees.[6]

Andrew Errington/Moment Mobile/Getty Images

How did the Anticybersquatting Consumer Protection Act affect a dispute involving the physical fitness program, CrossFit, and its affiliates?

Cybersquatting Proliferation All domain name registrars are supposed to relay information about registrations and renewals to ICANN and other companies that keep a master list of domain names, but this does not always occur. The speed at which domain names change hands and the difficulty in tracking mass automated registrations have created an environment in which cybersquatting can flourish.

Cybersquatters have also developed the tactic of typosquatting, or registering a name that is a misspelling of a popular brand name, such as googl.com or appple.com. Because many Internet users are not perfect typists, Web pages using these misspelled names may receive a lot of traffic, making them attractive to certain advertisers. If the misspelling that a typosquatter uses is significant, the trademark owner may have trouble gaining ACPA protection.

Typosquatting A form of cybersquatting that relies on mistakes, such as typographical errors, made by Internet users when entering information into a Web browser.

Applicability and Sanctions of the ACPA The ACPA applies to all domain name registrations of trademarks. Successful plaintiffs in suits brought under the act can collect actual damages and profits, or they can elect to receive statutory damages ranging from $1,000 to $100,000.

Although some companies have successfully sued under the ACPA, there are roadblocks to pursuing such lawsuits. Some domain name registrars offer privacy services that hide the true owners of websites, making it difficult for trademark owners to identify cybersquatters. Thus, before bringing a suit, a trademark owner has to ask the court for a subpoena to discover the identity of the owner of the infringing website. Because of the high costs of court proceedings, discovery, and even arbitration, many disputes over cybersquatting are settled out of court.

To facilitate dispute resolution, ICANN offers two dispute resolution forums: the Uniform Domain-Name Dispute-Resolution Policy (UDRP) and the Uniform Rapid

5. 15 U.S.C. Section 1129.
6. CrossFit, Inc. v. Davalos, 2017 WL 733213 (N.D.Cal. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Suspension (URS) system. More disputes are resolved through the UDRP, which allows common law trademark claims and has fewer procedural requirements. The newer URS system can be used by only registered trademark owners with clear-cut infringement claims. The URS has other limitations as well, but it is faster. Example 8.4 IBM once filed a complaint with the URS against an individual who registered the domain names IBM.guru and IBM.ventures. A week later, the URS panel decided in IBM's favor and suspended the two domain names.

8–1d Meta Tags

Meta tags are key words that give Internet browsers specific information about a Web page. Meta tags can be used to increase the likelihood that a site will be included in search engine results, even if the site has nothing to do with the key words. In effect, one website can appropriate the key words of other sites with more frequent hits so that the appropriating site will appear in the same search engine results as the more popular sites.

Using another's trademark in a meta tag without the owner's permission normally constitutes trademark infringement. Some uses of another's trademark as a meta tag may be permissible, however, if the use is reasonably necessary and does not suggest that the owner authorized or sponsored the use.

Case Example 8.5 Nespresso USA, Inc., is a well-known espresso and coffee machine producer, and owner of the federally registered trademark "Nespresso." Nespresso also makes and sells espresso capsules for use with its machines. Africa America Coffee Trading Company, which does business as Libretto, makes espresso capsules that are compatible with Nespresso machines. Libretto's capsules are the same shape and size as Nespresso's, but they are made of plastic (not aluminum like Nespresso's). Libretto used Nespresso's trademark on its boxes and also used the word "Nespresso" as a meta tag in the source code for its website.

Nespresso attempted to contact Libretto and request that it stop producing and selling espresso capsules that infringed on its trademark, but Libretto did not respond. Nespresso filed a suit in a federal court in New York. The court concluded that Libretto had been infringing on Nespresso's trademark and permanently enjoined (prohibited) Libretto from using Nespresso's mark—including its meta tags.[7]

8–1e Trademark Dilution in the Online World

As previously explained, trademark dilution occurs when a trademark is used, without authorization, in a way that diminishes the distinctive quality of the mark. Unlike trademark infringement, a claim of dilution does not require proof that consumers are likely to be confused by a connection between the unauthorized use and the mark. For this reason, the products involved need not be similar, as the following Spotlight Case illustrates.

7. Nespresso USA, Inc. v. Africa America Coffee Trading Co., LLC, 2016 WL 3162118 (S.D.N.Y. 2016).

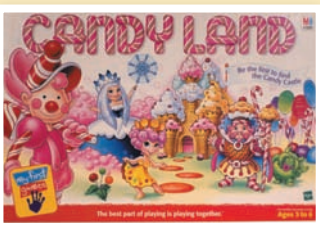
Spotlight on Internet Porn: Case 8.1

Hasbro, Inc. v. Internet Entertainment Group, Ltd.

United States District Court, Western District of Washington, 1996 WL 84853 (1996).



Facts Hasbro, Inc., the maker of Candy Land, a children's board game, owns the Candy Land trademark. The defendants, Brian Cartmell and the Internet Entertainment Group, Ltd., used candyland.com as a domain name for a sexually explicit Internet site. Any person who performed an online search for "candyland" was directed to this adult website. Hasbro filed a trademark dilution claim in a federal court, seeking a permanent injunction to prevent the defendants from using the CANDYLAND trademark.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Issue Did the defendants' use of the word candyland in connection with a sexually explicit website violate Hasbro's trademark rights?

Decision Yes. The district court granted Hasbro a permanent injunction and ordered the defendants to remove all content from the candyland .com website and to stop using the CANDYLAND mark.

digitalreflections/Shutterstock.com

Candy Land is a children's board game. Why did its parent company, Hasbro, Inc., sue a website?

Reason The court reasoned that Hasbro had shown that the defendants' use of the CANDYLAND mark and the domain name candyland.com in connection with their Internet site was causing irreparable injury to Hasbro. As required to obtain an injunction, Hasbro had demonstrated a likelihood that the defendants' conduct violated both the federal and the Washington State statutes against trademark dilution. "The probable harm to Hasbro from defendants' conduct outweighs any inconvenience that defendants will experience if they are required to stop using the CANDYLAND name."

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the candyland.com website had not been sexually explicit but had sold candy. Would the result have been the same? Explain.
- Economic How can companies protect themselves from situations such as the one described in this case? What limits each company's ability to be fully protected?

8–1f Licensing

Recall that a company may permit another party to use a trademark (or other intellectual property) under a license. A licensor might grant a license allowing its trademark to be used as part of a domain name, for instance.

Another type of license involves the use of a product such as software. This sort of licensing is ubiquitous in the online world. When you download an application on your smartphone or other mobile device, for instance, you are typically entering into a license agreement. You are obtaining only a license to use the software and not ownership rights in it. Apps published on Google Play, for instance, may use its licensing service to prompt users to agree to a license at the time of installation and use.

Licensing agreements frequently include restrictions that prohibit licensees from sharing the file and using it to create similar software applications. The license may also limit the use of the application to a specific device or give permission to the user for a certain time period.

8–2 Copyrights in Digital Information

Focus Question 2
What law protects copyrights in the digital age?

Copyright law is probably the most important form of intellectual property protection on the Internet. This is because much of the material on the Internet (including software and database information) is copyrighted, and in order for that material to be transferred online, it must be "copied." Generally, whenever a party downloads software, movies, or music into a computer's random access memory, or RAM, without authorization, a copyright is infringed.

In 1998, Congress passed additional legislation to protect copyright holders—the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA).[8] Because of its significance in protecting against the piracy of copyrighted materials in the online environment, this act is presented as this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature.

8. 17 U.S.C. Sections 512, 1201–1205, 1301–1332; and 28 U.S.C. Section 4001.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Digital Millennium Copyright Act

The United States leads the world in the production of creative products, including books, films, videos, recordings, and software. Exports of U.S. creative products surpass those of every other U.S. industry in value.

Given the importance of intellectual property to the U.S. economy, the United States has actively supported international efforts to protect ownership rights in intellectual property, including copyrights. In 1996, to curb unauthorized copying of copyrighted materials, the member nations of the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) adopted a treaty to upgrade global standards of copyright protection, particularly for the Internet.

Implementing the WIPO Treaty Congress implemented the provisions of the WIPO treaty by enacting a new statute to update U.S. copyright law in 1998. The law—the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA)—is a landmark step in the protection of copyright owners. Because of the leading position of the United States in the creative industries, the law also serves as a model for other nations.

Among other things, the DMCA established civil and criminal penalties for anyone who circumvents (bypasses) encryption software or other technological antipiracy protection. Also prohibited are the manufacture, import, sale, and distribution of devices or services for circumvention.

Allowing Fair Use The act provides for exceptions to fit the needs of libraries, scientists, universities, and others. In general, the law does not restrict the "fair use" of circumvention methods for educational and other noncommercial purposes. For instance, circumvention is allowed to test computer security, conduct encryption research, protect personal privacy, and enable parents to monitor their children's use of the Internet. The exceptions are to be reconsidered every three years.

Limiting the Liability of Internet Service Providers The DMCA also includes a safe-harbor provision that limits the liability of Internet service providers (ISPs). Under the act, an ISP is not liable for any copyright infringement by a customer unless the ISP is aware of the subscriber's violation. An ISP may be held liable only if it fails to take action to shut the subscriber down after learning of the violation. A copyright holder has to act promptly, however, by pursuing a claim in court, or the subscriber has the right to be restored to online access.

Application to Today's World Without the DMCA, copyright owners would have a more difficult time obtaining legal redress against those who, without authorization, decrypt or copy copyrighted materials. Nevertheless, problems remain, particularly because of the global nature of the Internet.

Donald Miralle/Getty Images

Was the use of a Prince song in a YouTube video considered a "fair use" under the DMCA? Why or why not?

8–2a Copyright Infringement

Technology has vastly increased the potential for copyright infringement. Even using a small portion of another's copyrighted sound recording (digital sampling) can constitute copyright infringement. Fair use can be asserted as a defense to copyright infringement. Spotlight Case Example 8.6 Stephanie Lenz posted a short video on YouTube of her toddler son dancing with the Prince song "Let's Go Crazy" playing in the background. Universal Music Group (UMG) sent YouTube a take-down notice that stated that the video violated copyright law under the DMCA. YouTube removed the "dancing baby" video and notified Lenz of the allegations of copyright infringement, warning her that repeated incidents of infringement could lead it to delete her account.

Lenz filed a lawsuit against UMG claiming that accusing her of infringement constituted a material misrepresentation (fraud) because UMG knew that Lenz's video was a fair use of the song. The district court held that UMG should have considered the fair use doctrine before sending the take-down notice. UMG appealed, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed. Lenz was allowed to pursue nominal damages from UMG for sending the notice without considering whether her use was fair.[9]

9. Lenz v. Universal Music Group, 815 F.3d 1145 (9th Cir. 2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Initially, criminal penalties for copyright violations could be imposed only if unauthorized copies were exchanged for financial gain. Then, Congress amended the law and extended criminal liability for the piracy of copyrighted materials to persons who exchange unauthorized copies of copyrighted works without realizing a profit.

See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion of copyright law in the context of video games.

8–2b File-Sharing Technology

Soon after the Internet became popular, a few enterprising programmers created software to compress large data files, particularly music files. The best-known compression and decompression system is MP3, which enables music fans to download songs or entire CDs onto

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Riot Games, Inc., Protects Its Online Video Game Copyrights

The acronym LoL generally means "laugh out loud." But when it comes to the popular online video game League of Legends, owned by Riot Games, Inc., LoL means something much different. More than 100 million people use this free multiplayer video game online each month. Of course, competitors have eyed that large market for years.

Taking on a Chinese Competitor

To protect its LoL copyrights, U.S.-based Riot Games has filed a lawsuit against a Chinese company, Shanghai MoBai Computer Technology (Moby). Riot Games alleges that Moby has "blatantly and slavishly copied LoL in [Moby's online video game called] Arena of Battle."[a] In particular, Moby's copycat game features nearly sixty champions with similar names, sound effects, icons, and abilities as those used in LoL. Moby has marketed Arena of Battle through the Apple App Store as well as Google Play, and it has used alternative titles and aliases in order to sell its game.

Note that under current case law, video gameplay is not protected by copyright law. Gameplay describes how players interact with a video game, such as through its plot and its rules. Specific expressions of that gameplay, however—as measured by look, settings, stories, characters, and sound—are protected.

The Mobile Game Market in China

While LoL has been China's top computer desktop game for years, millions of Chinese online game players use only mobile platforms, such as smartphones and tablets. As a result, Tencent, the parent company of Riot Games, created a mobile version of LoL called King of Glory. It is almost an exact copy of LoL. King of Glory is now China's top-grossing Apple mobile game. Of course, there are no copyright issues with King of Glory because Tencent can copy its own video game.

Taking on a Cheating Software Developer

In addition to suing Moby, as mentioned earlier, Riot Games accused the makers of LeagueSharp of violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act.[b] The plaintiff claimed that the defendants had violated the Digital Millennium Copyright Act[c] by circumventing LoL's anti-cheating software. Customers had paid a monthly fee to use LeagueSharp. Among other things, the service enabled them to see hidden information, automate gameplay to perform with enhanced accuracy, and accumulate certain rewards at a rate not possible for a normal human player.

The obvious question is why anybody would have wanted to pay for LeagueSharp services—recall that LoL is a free online game. The reason is the advantage the cheating players gained over ordinary players. They could, for instance, more quickly and easily win "swords," which they could use to buy new characters with which to play. LeagueSharp's makers ultimately agreed to pay $10 million to Riot Games.[d]

Critical Thinking

If LoL is free to players, why would a Chinese company want to copy it?

a. Riot Games, Inc., v. Shanghai MoBai Computer Technology Co., Ltd. et al, Case No. 3:17-CV-00331 (N.D.Cal. 2017).

b. Riot Games, Inc. v. Argote, Case No. 2:16-CV-5871 (C.D.Cal. 2017).

c. Pub. L. No. 105–304, 112 Stat. 2860 (1998).

d. Chalk, Andy. "Riot awarded $10 million in Leaguesharp lawsuit settlement." pcgamer.com. 03 Mar. 2017. Web.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

their computers or onto portable listening devices, such as smartphones. The MP3 system also made it possible for music fans to access other fans' files by engaging in file-sharing via the Internet.

Peer-to-Peer (P2P) Networking The sharing of resources among multiple computer or other devices without the requirement of a central network server.

Distributed Network A network that can be used by persons located (distributed) around the country or the globe to share computer files.

Cloud Computing The delivery to users of on-demand services from third-party servers over a network.

Methods of File-Sharing File-sharing can be accomplished through peer-to-peer (P2P) networking. The concept is simple. Rather than going through a central network, P2P networking uses numerous computers or other devices that are connected to one another, often via the Internet.

A P2P network is a type of distributed network, which may include devices distributed all over the country or the world. Persons located almost anywhere can work together on the same project by using file-sharing programs on distributed networks.

The predominant method of sharing files via the Internet is cloud computing, which is essentially a subscription-based or pay-per-use service that extends a computer's software or storage capabilities. Cloud computing can deliver a single application through a browser to multiple users. Alternatively, cloud computing might provide data storage and virtual servers that can be accessed on demand. Amazon, Facebook, Google, IBM, and Sun Microsystems are using and developing more cloud computing services.

The BitTorrent Protocol BitTorrent has become the most popular method of P2P file sharing in the world. Its popularity is based on the speed with which it can send multiple large, high-quality files without using a great deal of bandwidth. There is nothing inherently illegal about using BitTorrent. For instance, someone who uploads a home movie onto BitTorrent to share it with family members is most likely not breaking any law.

When BitTorrent is used to share recorded music files, however, copyright issues arise. Recording artists and their labels stand to lose large amounts of royalties and revenues if relatively few digital downloads are purchased and then made available on distributed networks. These concerns have prompted recording companies to pursue not only companies involved in file-sharing but also individuals who have file-shared copyrighted works.

In the following case, the owner of copyrights in musical compositions sought to recover from an Internet service provider, some of whose subscribers used BitTorrent to share the owner's copyrighted compositions without permission.

Case 8.2

BMG Rights Management (US), LLC v. Cox Communications, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, 881 F.3d 293 (2018).

Facts Cox Communications, Inc., is an Internet service provider (ISP) with 4.5 million subscribers. Some of the subscribers shared copyrighted files, including music files, without the copyright owners' permission, using BitTorrent. Cox's stated policy is to suspend or terminate subscribers who use the service to "infringe the . . . copyrights . . . of any party." Despite this policy, Cox declined to terminate infringing subscribers so as not to lose revenue.

BMG Rights Management (US), LLC, owns copyrights in some of the music shared by the subscribers. BMG sent millions of notices to Cox to alert the ISP to the infringing activity. Cox deleted the notices without acting on them. BMG filed a suit in a federal district court against Cox, seeking to hold the ISP liable under the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA) for its subscribers' infringement of BMG's copyrights. Cox claimed a "safe harbor" under the act. The court issued a judgment in BMG's favor. Cox appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

Issue Was Cox liable for contributory copyright infringement?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the lower court. "Cox failed to qualify for the DMCA safe harbor because it failed to implement its [infringement] policy in any consistent or meaningful way."

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Reason To qualify for a "safe harbor" under the DMCA, an ISP must implement a policy that provides for the termination of subscribers who repeatedly infringe copyrights. The court recognized that Cox had adopted such a policy. But, as shown by internal e-mails, Cox determined not to terminate subscribers who violated the policy. Although some subscribers were terminated, their service was always reactivated. Furthermore, when Cox decided to delete all infringement notices received from BMG, Cox dispensed with terminating subscribers who repeatedly infringed BMG's copyrights in particular. Cox argued that the DMCA requires termination of repeat infringers only in "appropriate circumstances." The court found no evidence that "appropriate circumstances" played any role in Cox's decisions to terminate (or not). Instead, those decisions were based on "one goal: not losing revenue from paying subscribers."

Critical Thinking

- Technology Should an ISP be liable for copyright infringement by its subscribers regardless of whether the ISP is aware of the violation? Why or why not?
- Legal Environment Could Cox legitimately claim that it had no knowledge of subscribers who infringed BMG's copyrights, since the ISP was deleting all of BMG's infringement notices? Explain.

Pirated Movies and Television File-sharing also creates problems for the motion picture industry, which loses significant amounts of revenue annually as a result of pirated DVDs. Numerous websites offer software that facilitates the illegal copying of movies. Popcorn Time, for example, is a BitTorrent site that offers streaming services that allow users to watch pirated movies and television shows without downloading them.

Case Example 8.7 UN4 Productions, Inc., creates and distributes a series of martial arts films called Boyka Undisputed. When the company determined that an unauthorized copy of Boyka Undisputed 4 was being shared on BitTorrent, it tried to determine who was responsible for initially uploading the film. Failing in these efforts, UN4 subpoenaed a number of ISPs, requesting the "digital footprints" of anyone who had illegally downloaded Boyka Undisputed 4 on BitTorrent.

This strategy identified five individuals, whom UN4 successfully sued for infringement of its copyrighted material. Because the defendants had not profited from these "minor" infringements, a federal judge determined that UN4 was only entitled to $750 in damages from each. The judge also ordered the defendants to destroy their downloaded files of the film.[10]

8–3 Social Media

Social media provide a means by which people can create, share, and exchange ideas and comments via the Internet. Social networking sites, such as Facebook, Google+, LinkedIn, Pinterest, and Tumblr, have become ubiquitous. Other social media platforms, including Instagram, Snapchat, and Twitter, have also gained popularity. Studies show that Internet users spend more time on social networks than at any other sites, and the amount of time people spend on social media is constantly increasing.

Social Media Forms of communication through which users create and share information, ideas, messages, and other content via the Internet.

8–3a Legal Issues

The emergence of Facebook and other social networking sites has affected the legal process in various ways. Here, we explain some uses of social media posts in the litigation process, as well as in the investigations that precede prosecutions or other actions. We also discuss what can happen when employees violate their employers' social media policies.

10. UN4 Productions, Inc. v. Primozich, 372 F.Supp.1129 (W.D. Wash. 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Impact on Litigation Social media posts now are routinely included in discovery in litigation. Such posts can provide damaging information that establishes a person's intent or what that person knew at a particular time. Like e-mail, posts on social networks can be the smoking gun that leads to liability.

In some situations, social media posts have been used to reduce damages awards. Example 8.8 Jil Daniels sues for injuries she sustained in a car accident, claiming that her injuries make it impossible for her to continue working as a hairstylist. The jury initially determines that her damages were $237,000, but when the jurors see Daniels's tweets and photographs of her partying in New Orleans and vacationing on the beach, they reduce the damages award to $142,000.

Impact on Settlement Agreements Social media posts have been used to invalidate settlement agreements that contained confidentiality clauses. Case Example 8.9 Patrick Snay was the headmaster of Gulliver Preparatory School in Florida. When Gulliver did not renew Snay's employment contract, Snay sued the school for age discrimination. During mediation, Snay agreed to settle the case for $80,000 and signed a confidentiality clause that required he and his wife not to disclose the "terms and existence" of the agreement. Nevertheless, Snay and his wife told their daughter, Dana, that the dispute had been settled and that they were happy with the results.

Dana, a college student, had recently graduated from Gulliver and, according to Snay, had suffered retaliation at the school. Dana posted a Facebook comment that said, "Mama and Papa Snay won the case against Gulliver. Gulliver is now officially paying for my vacation to Europe this summer. SUCK IT." The comment went out to 1,200 of Dana's Facebook friends, many of whom were Gulliver students, and school officials soon learned of it. The school immediately notified Snay that he had breached the confidentiality clause and refused to pay the settlement amount. Ultimately, a state intermediate appellate court agreed and held that Snay could not enforce the settlement agreement.[11]

Criminal Investigations Law enforcement uses social media to detect and prosecute criminals. A surprising number of criminals boast about their illegal activities on social media. Example 8.10 Paige Thompson, a former software engineer for Amazon, tweeted that "I've basically strapped myself with a bomb vest." Thompson was referring, metaphorically, to the punishment she was likely to receive for breaking into a server used by credit card company Capital One and compromising the financial data of more than 100 million people. The tweet resulted in her arrest and criminal charges that carry a maximum punishment of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Police may also use social media to help them to locate a particular suspect or to determine the identity of other suspects within a criminal network. In fact, police officers in New York City and other locations have even assumed fake identities on Facebook in order to "friend" suspects and obtain information. According to at least one court, it is legally acceptable for law enforcement officers to set up a phony social media account to catch a suspect.[12]

Administrative Agencies Federal regulators also use social media posts in their investigations into illegal activities. Example 8.11 Reed Hastings, the top executive of Netflix, stated on Facebook that Netflix subscribers had watched a billion hours of video the previous month. As a result, Netflix's stock price rose, which prompted a federal agency investigation. Under securities laws, such a statement is considered to be material information to investors. Thus, it must be disclosed to all investors, not just a select group, such as those who had access to Hastings's Facebook post.

---

11. Gulliver Schools, Inc. v. Snay, 137 So.3d 1045 (Fla.App. 2014).
12. United States v. Gatson, 2014 WL 7182275 (D.N.J. 2014). See also United States v. Tutis, 216 F.Supp.3d 467 (D.N.J. 2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The agency ultimately concluded that it could not hold Hastings responsible for any wrong-doing because the agency's policy on social media use was not clear. The agency then issued new guidelines that allow companies to disclose material information through social media if investors have been notified in advance.

Administrative law judges can base their decisions on the content of social media posts. Case Example 8.12 Jennifer O'Brien was a tenured teacher at a public school in New Jersey when she posted two messages on her Facebook page. "I'm not a teacher—I'm a warden for future criminals!" and "They had a scared straight program in school—why couldn't I bring first graders?" Not surprisingly, outraged parents protested. The deputy superintendent of schools filed a complaint against O'Brien with the state's commissioner of education, charging her with conduct unbecoming a teacher.

After a hearing, an administrative law judge ordered that O'Brien be removed from her teaching position. O'Brien appealed to a state court, claiming that her Facebook postings were protected by the First Amendment and could not be used by the school district to discipline or discharge her. The court found that O'Brien had failed to establish that her Facebook postings were protected speech and that the seriousness of O'Brien's conduct did not warrant removal from her position.[13]

Employers' Social Media Policies Many large corporations have established specific guidelines on using social media in the workplace. Employees who use social media in a way that violates their employer's stated policies may be disciplined or fired. Courts and administrative agencies usually uphold an employer's right to terminate a person based on violation of a social media policy.

Case Example 8.13 Virginia Rodriquez worked for Walmart Stores, Inc., for almost twenty years and had been promoted to management. Then she was disciplined for violating the company's policies by having a fellow employee use Rodriquez's password to alter the price of an item that she purchased. Under Walmart's rules, another violation within a year would mean termination.

Nine months later, on Facebook, Rodriquez publicly chastised employees under her supervision for calling in sick to go to a party. The posting violated Walmart's "Social Media Policy," which was "to avoid public comment that adversely affects employees." Walmart terminated Rodriquez. She filed a lawsuit, alleging discrimination, but the court issued a summary judgment in Walmart's favor.[14] Note, though, that some employees' posts on social media may be protected under labor law.

Focus Question 3

Identify several ways that social media has affected American legal processes.

8–3b Protection of Social Media Passwords

Employees and applicants for jobs or colleges have occasionally been asked to divulge their social media passwords. An employer or school may look at an individual's Facebook or other account to see if it includes controversial postings, such as racially discriminatory remarks or photos of parties where drugs were being used. Such postings can have a negative effect on a person's prospects even if they were made years earlier or are taken out of context.

More than half of the states have enacted legislation to protect individuals from having to disclose their social media passwords. These laws vary. Some states, such as Michigan, prohibit employers from taking adverse action against an employee or job applicant based on what the person has posted online. Michigan's law also applies to e-mail and cloud storage accounts.

13. In re O'Brien, 2013 WL 132508 (N.J.App. 2013). See also Grutzmacher v. Howard County, 851 F.3d 332 (4th Cir. 2017).
14. Rodriquez v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 2013 WL 102674 (N.D.Tex. 2013).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Legislation will not completely prevent employers and others from taking actions against employees or applicants based on their social network postings, though. Management and human resources personnel are unlikely to admit that they based a hiring decision on what they saw on someone's Facebook page. They may not even have to admit to looking at the Facebook page if they use private browsing, which enables people to keep their Web browsing activities confidential. How, then, would a person who does not get the job prove that the rejection occured because the employer accessed social media postings?

8–3c Company-wide Social Media Networks

Many companies, including Dell, Inc., and Nikon Instruments, have formed their own internal social media networks. Software companies offer a variety of systems, including Salesforce.com's Chatter, Microsoft's Yammer, and WebEx Meetings. Posts on these internal networks, or intranets, are quite different from the typical posts on Facebook, LinkedIn, and Twitter. Employees use them to exchange messages about topics related to their work, such as deals that are closing, new products, production flaws, how a team is solving a problem, and the details of customer orders. Thus, the tone is businesslike.

An important advantage to using an internal system for employee communications is that the company can better protect its trade secrets. The company usually decides which employees can see particular intranet files and which employees will belong to each "social group" within the company. Generally, the company will keep the data in its system on its own secure server.

Internal social media systems also offer additional benefits. They provide real-time information about important issues, such as production glitches, along with information about products, customers, and competitors. Another major benefit is a significant reduction in e-mail. Rather than wasting fellow employees' time on mass e-mailings, workers can post messages or collaborate on presentations via the company's social network.

8–4 Online Defamation

Cyber Tort A tort committed via the Internet.

A cyber tort is a tort that arises from online conduct. One of the most prevalent cyber torts is online defamation. Recall that defamation is wrongfully hurting a person's reputation by communicating false statements about that person to others. Because the Internet enables individuals to communicate with large numbers of people simultaneously (via tweets, for instance), online defamation is a common problem in today's legal environment.

Example 8.14 Ross sets up several websites asserting that, among other things, California real estate developer Bradley is a scam artist with a history of serious crimes including fraud and racketeering. As proof, the websites contain links to articles about a different Bradley, a convicted criminal from Pennsylvania. When the real estate developer sues for defamation, Ross admits that the online allegations are false and were intended to "inflict lots of pain" on Bradley, with whom he is engaged in a legal dispute. A federal jury in Nevada reacts to this admission by finding Ross liable and awards Bradley millions in damages. ■

8–4a Identifying the Author of Online Defamation

An initial issue raised by online defamation is simply discovering who is committing it. In the real world, identifying the author of a defamatory remark generally is an easy matter. Suppose, though, that a business firm has discovered that defamatory statements about its policies and products are being posted in an online forum. Such forums allow anyone—customers, employees, or crackpots—to complain about a firm that they dislike while remaining anonymous.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Therefore, a threshold barrier to anyone who seeks to bring an action for online defamation is discovering the identity of the person who posted the defamatory message. An Internet service provider (ISP) can disclose personal information about its customers only when ordered to do so by a court. Consequently, businesses and individuals are increasingly bringing lawsuits against "John Does" (John Doe, Jane Doe, and the like are fictitious names used in lawsuits when the identity of a party is not known or when a party wishes to remain anonymous for privacy reasons). Then, using the authority of the courts, the plaintiffs can obtain from the ISPs the identity of the persons responsible for the defamatory messages.

Note that courts have occasionally refused to order companies to disclose the identity of their users. Case Example 8.15 Yelp, Inc., is a California company that operates a social networking website for consumer reviews. Seven users of Yelp posted negative reviews of Hadeed Carpet Cleaning, Inc., in Alexandria, Virginia. Hadeed brought a defamation suit against the "John Doe" reviewers in a Virginia state court, claiming that because these individuals were not actual customers, their comments were false and defamatory. Yelp failed to comply with a court order to reveal the users' identities and was held in contempt.

Yelp appealed, claiming that releasing the identities would violate the defendants' First Amendment right to free speech. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment, but that decision was reversed on appeal. The Supreme Court of Virginia ruled that even though the state trial court had jurisdiction, it did not have subpoena power over Yelp, a nonresident defendant. According to the court, "Enforcement of a subpoena seeking out-of-state discovery is generally governed by the courts and the law of the state in which the witness resides or where the documents are located."[15]

iPhone/Alamy

Can a business that receives poor reviews on Yelp force Yelp to disclose the reviewers' identities in a lawsuit for online defamation?

8–4b Liability of Internet Service Providers

Normally, those who repeat or otherwise republish a defamatory statement are subject to liability. Thus, newspapers, magazines, and television and radio stations are subject to liability for defamatory content that they publish or broadcast, even though the content was prepared or created by others.

Applying this rule to cyberspace, however, raises an important issue: Should ISPs be regarded as publishers and therefore be held liable for defamatory messages that are posted by their users in online forums or other arenas?

General Rule The Communications Decency Act (CDA) states that "no provider or user of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider."[16] Thus, under the CDA, ISPs usually are treated differently from publishers in print and other media and are not liable for publishing defamatory statements that come from a third party.

The CDA's broad protection for ISPs extends beyond republication of defamatory statements. This chapter's Business Law Analysis feature illustrates the CDA's general rule.

Exceptions Although the courts generally have construed the CDA as providing a broad shield to protect ISPs from liability for third party content, some courts have started establishing limits to this immunity. Case Example 8.16 Roommate.com, LLC, operated an online roommate-matching website that helps individuals find roommates based on their descriptions of themselves and their roommate preferences. Users respond to a series of online questions, choosing from answers in drop-down and select-a-box menus. Some of the questions asked users to disclose their sex, family status, and sexual orientation—which is not permitted under the federal Fair Housing Act.

Focus Question 4

What law governs whether Internet service providers are liable for online defamatory statements made by users?

15. Yelp, Inc. v. Hadeed Carpet Cleaning, Inc., 289 Va. 426, 770 S.E.2d 440 (2015).
16. 47 U.S.C. Section 230.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Immunity of ISPs under the Communications Decency Act

CyberConnect, Inc., is an Internet service provider (ISP). Emma is a CyberConnect subscriber. Market Reach, Inc., is an online advertising company.

Using sophisticated software, Market Reach directs its ads to those users most likely to be interested in a particular product. When Emma receives one of the ads, she objects to the content. Furthermore, she claims that CyberConnect should pay damages for "publishing" the ad. Is CyberConnect liable for the content of Market Reach's ad?

Analysis: The Communications Decency Act (CDA) states that "no provider . . . of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider." In other words, under the CDA, CyberConnect and other ISPs are not liable for the content of published statements that come from a third party, such as the statements in Market Reach's ad.

Result and Reasoning: Because CyberConnect is not regarded as a publisher under the CDA, the company is not liable for the content of Market Reach's ad (even if Emma could prove that the content was defamatory). ISPs are not liable for third party content that they have no ability to control.

When a nonprofit housing organization sued Roommate.com, the company claimed it was immune from liability under the CDA. A federal appellate court disagreed and ordered Roommate.com to pay nearly $500,000. By creating the website and the questionnaire and answer choices, Roommate.com prompted users to express discriminatory preferences and matched users based on these preferences in violation of federal law.[17]

8–5 Privacy

In recent years, Facebook, Google, and Yahoo have all been accused of violating users' privacy rights. The right to privacy has been construed to be guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and some state constitutions. To maintain a suit for the invasion of privacy, though, a person must have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the particular situation.

8–5a Reasonable Expectation of Privacy

People clearly have a reasonable expectation of privacy when they enter their personal banking or credit-card information online. They also have a reasonable expectation that online companies will follow their own privacy policies. But it is probably not reasonable to expect privacy in statements made on Twitter—or photos posted on Twitter, Flickr, or Instagram, for that matter.

The collection and use of links included in the messages of Facebook users prompted some users to file a suit against the platform for violation of privacy. Facebook confirmed that it collects the "content and other information" that users provide when they "message or communicate with others" and that it may use that information. At issue in the following case was the remedy.

17. Fair Housing Council of San Fernando Valley v. Roommate.com, LLC, 666 F.3d 1216 (9th Cir. 2012).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 8.3

Campbell v. Facebook, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, __ F.3d __, 2020 WL 1023350 (2020).

Facts Facebook, Inc., operates a social media platform with over two billion active users, including seven of ten adults in the United States. One function allows a user to send a message that the platform describes as private because only the sender and recipient can view the contents. Matthew Campbell, Anna St. John, and other users filed a suit in a federal district court against Facebook, alleging that the company routinely captured, read, and used links contained in the messages without the users' consent, in violation of federal privacy law. The plaintiffs claimed that Facebook used the data to facilitate targeted advertising. After four mediation sessions, the parties reached a settlement. In the agreement, Facebook promised to add a disclosure to the "Help Center" page on its platform for a year revealing that "we use tools to identify and store links shared in messages." The court concluded that the plaintiffs were not likely to prevail if the case proceeded and approved the settlement. St. John appealed, arguing that the settlement was not fair because the plaintiffs received only "worthless" relief.

Issue Was requiring Facebook to post a notice on its platform a sufficient remedy for an alleged violation of privacy?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the decision of the lower court. Given the unlikelihood that the plaintiffs would have succeeded if they had pursued their claim, "it was not unreasonable that the settlement gave [them] something of modest value."

Reason The court did not agree with St. John that the value of the relief accorded in the settlement was "worthless." Facebook was required to post a disclosure about the collection and possible use of its users' private data on a page that would be accessed by hundreds of thousands of the platform's users within a year. The post made it less likely that the users who read it would reveal private information to Facebook while using the platform.

In agreeing to the settlement, the plaintiffs gave up little, in the court's view. Under the federal statute on which the plaintiffs based their claim, they would have had to show that Facebook's practices included an unlawful "interception" of their messages. This would have required proof that Facebook read the messages in "transit" as opposed to in "storage," an uncertain legal issue. The plaintiffs would have had to show that they had not consented to Facebook's collection and use of their data. And they would have had to successfully argue that the activity did not occur in "the ordinary course of business." These obstacles amply supported the conclusion that the plaintiffs were "ultimately likely to have lost this entire case."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Is a violation of an individual's right to privacy, without more, enough to sustain a legal cause, or should additional consequences be required to maintain an action? Explain.
- Economic Should Facebook pay the platform's users for Facebook's use of their private data? Discuss.

8–5b Data Collection and Cookies

Whenever a consumer purchases items online from a retailer, the retailer collects information about the consumer. A cookie is an invisible file that computers, smartphones, and other such devices create to track a user's Web browsing activities. Cookies provide detailed information to marketers about an individual's behavior and preferences, which is then used to personalize online services.

Cookie A small file sent from a website and stored in a user's Web browser to track the user's Web browsing activities.

Over time, a retailer can amass considerable data about a person's shopping habits. Does collecting this information violate the person's right to privacy? Should retailers be able to pass on the data they have collected to their affiliates? Should they be able to use the information to predict what a consumer might want and then create online "coupons" customized to fit the person's buying history?

Case Example 8.17 Any device connected to the Internet is capable of transmitting a multitude of information not only about the device but also about its use. Utilizing integrated software, smart TVs allow consumers to access the Internet and on-demand services, including Hulu, Netflix, and Pandora. Apparently, for three years, Vizio, Inc., which installs such software on smart TVs, was secretly tracking what viewers were watching on approximately 16 million of these devices. This information was then sold to advertisers, allowing them to specifically target advertising to Vizio smart TVs and to any computers, tablets, or smartphones connected to the same network.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

A number of purchasers of Vizio smart TVs filed a class action data privacy lawsuit against the company for, at a minimum, violating the Video Privacy Protection Act.[18] Initially, Vizio insisted that by allowing advertisers to make "better-informed decisions," its actions actually benefited consumers. Eventually, however, the company reached a settlement that dispersed $11 million among more than 500,000 Vizio smart TV owners.[19]

8–5c The Electronic Communications Privacy Act

Focus Question 5

When does the law protect a person's electronic communications from being intercepted or accessed?

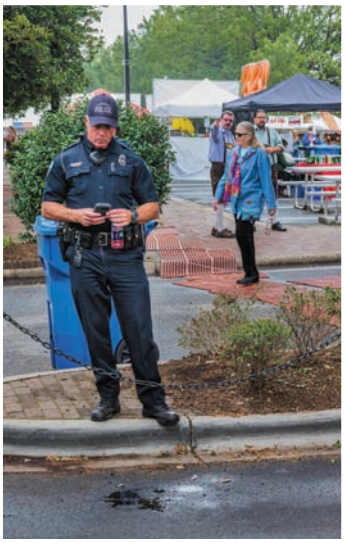
The Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA)[20] amended federal wiretapping law to cover electronic forms of communications. Although Congress enacted the ECPA many years before the Internet existed, it nevertheless applies to communications that take place online.

The ECPA prohibits the intentional interception of any wire, oral, or electronic communication. It also prohibits the intentional disclosure or use of the information obtained by the interception.

Exclusions Excluded from the ECPA's coverage are any electronic communications through devices that an employer provides for its employee to use "in the ordinary course of its business." Consequently, if a company provides the electronic device (cell phone, laptop, tablet) to the employee for ordinary business use, the company is not prohibited from intercepting business communications made on it.

This "business-extension exception" to the ECPA permits employers to monitor employees' electronic communications made in the ordinary course of business. It does not permit employers to monitor employees' personal communications. Another exception allows an employer to avoid liability under the act if the employees consent to having the employer monitor their electronic communications.

Stored Communications Part of the ECPA is known as the Stored Communications Act (SCA).[21] The SCA prohibits intentional and unauthorized access to stored electronic communications, and sets forth criminal and civil sanctions for violators. A person can violate the SCA by intentionally accessing a stored electronic communication.



The SCA also prevents "providers" of communication services (such as cell phone companies and social media networks) from divulging private communications to certain entities and individuals. Case Example 8.18 As part of an investigation into disability fraud, the New York County District Attorney's Office sought from Facebook the data and stored communications of 381 retired police officers and firefighters. The government suspected that these individuals had faked illness after 9/11 in order to obtain disability.

Facebook challenged the warrants in court, arguing that they were unconstitutional because they were overly broad and lacked particularity. The court ruled against Facebook and ordered it to comply. It also ordered the company not to notify the users that it was

18. 18 U.S.C. Section 2710(a).
19. In Re Vizio, Inc. Consumer Privacy Litigation, 2019 WL 3818854 (C.D. Calif. 2019).
20. 18 U.S.C. Sections 2510–2521.
21. 18 U.S.C. Sections 2701–2711.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

disclosing their data to government investigators. Facebook complied but appealed the decision. The reviewing court held that only the individuals, not Facebook, could challenge the warrants as violations of privacy. Thus, the government was allowed to seize all of Facebook's digital data pertaining to these users.[22]

RidingMetaphor/Alamy

Why did a court rule that stored data from Facebook accounts of certain police officers and firefighters could be accessed by a third party?

8–5d Internet Companies' Privacy Policies

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) investigates consumer complaints of privacy violations. The FTC has forced many companies, including Google, Facebook, and Twitter, to enter into agreements consenting to give the FTC broad power to review their privacy and data practices. It can then sue companies that violate the terms of the agreements.

At this chapter has pointed out, Facebook has had to deal with a number of complaints about its privacy policy and has changed its policy several times to satisfy its critics and ward off potential government investigations. Other companies, including mobile app developers, have also changed their privacy policies to provide more information to consumers. For the most part, companies—rather than courts or legislatures—have defined the privacy rights of online users. This situation, however, appears to be changing.

Ethical Issue

What are the privacy implications of the facial recognition industry? Using biometrics—the measurement and analysis of an individual's unique physical characteristics—facial recognition software can identify someone from a photo or video. The program is then able to compare this information with biometric details stored in a database to create a match. This technology has potential benefits, particularly in the arenas of national security and artificial intelligence. It also has one significant potential drawback: the loss of privacy. The idea of closed-circuit cameras scanning city streets or artificial intelligence applications scouring social media to pick out faces fills many with dread. "The right to participate in society anonymously is something we cannot lose," says one privacy advocate.

Nationwide, more than sixty university administrations have promised not to link facial recognition technology with their campus security cameras. Promoters of the Coachella Arts and Music Festival, an annual California event, and other large-scale events have made similar vows.

Several states already have comparable protections in place. Legislation passed many years ago in Illinois, for example, requires companies to obtain written permission before collecting a person's facial scan, fingerprints, or other biometrics.[23] Facebook ran afoul of this law with its Tag Suggestions photo-labeling service, which uses facial recognition software to connect faces with names on its social media platforms. The company paid $550 million to settle a class action lawsuit filed by Illinois residents who claimed that Tag Suggestions violated their right to privacy.[24]

22. In re 381 Search Warrants Directed to Facebook, Inc., 29 N.Y.3d 231, 78 N.E.3d 141, 55 N.Y.S.3d 696 (2017).
23. The Illinois Biometric Information Privacy Act, 740 ILCS 14.
24. Patel v. Facebook, Inc., 932 F.3d 1264 (9th Cir. 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Practice and Review

While he was in high school, Joel Gibb downloaded numerous songs to his smartphone from an unlicensed file-sharing service. He used portions of the copyrighted songs when he recorded his own band and posted videos on YouTube and Facebook. He also used BitTorrent to download several movies from the Internet. Now Gibb has applied to Boston University. The admissions office has requested access to his Facebook password, and he has complied. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What laws, if any, did Gibb violate by downloading music and videos from the Internet?
2. Was Gibb's use of portions of copyrighted songs in his own music illegal? Explain.
3. Can individuals legally post copyrighted content on their Facebook pages? Why or why not?
4. Did Boston University violate any laws when it asked Joel to provide his Facebook password? Explain.

Debate This

Internet service providers should be subject to the same defamation laws as newspapers, magazines, and television and radio stations.

Key Terms

cloud computing 200 cookie 207
cybersquatting 194 cyber tort 204 distributed network 200 domain name 194 goodwill 194
Internet service provider (ISP) 194 peer-to-peer (P2P) networking 200
social media 201
spam 193
typosquatting 195

Chapter Summary: Internet Law, Social Media, and Privacy

Internet Law

1. Spam—Unsolicited junk e-mail accounts for about three-quarters of all e-mails. Laws to combat spam have been enacted, but the flow of spam continues.
   a. The Controlling the Assault of Non-Solicited Pornography and Marketing (CAN-SPAM) Act prohibits false and deceptive e-mails originating in the United States.
   b. The U.S. Safe Web Act allows U.S. authorities to cooperate and share information with foreign agencies in investigating and prosecuting those involved in spamming, spyware, and various Internet frauds and deceptions. The act includes a "safe harbor" for Internet service providers.
2. Domain names—Trademark owners often use their mark as part of a domain name (Internet address). The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN) oversees the distribution of domain names. ICANN has expanded the available domain names to include new generic top-level domain names (gTLDs).
3. Cybersquatting—Registering a domain name that is the same as, or confusingly similar to, the trademark of another and then offering to sell the domain name back to the trademark owner is known as cybersquatting. Anticybersquatting legislation makes this practice illegal if the one registering, trafficking in, or using the domain name has a "bad faith intent" to profit from that mark.
4. Meta tags—Search engines compile their results by looking through a website's meta tags, or key words. Using another's trademark in a meta tag without the owner's permission normally constitutes trademark infringement.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

	5. Trademark dilution—When a trademark is used online, without authorization, in a way that diminishes the distinctive quality of the mark, it constitutes trademark dilution. Unlike infringement actions, trademark dilution claims do not require proof that consumers are likely to be confused by a connection between the unauthorized use and the mark. 6. Licensing—Many companies choose to permit others to use their trademarks and other intellectual property online through licensing. The purchase of software generally involves a license agreement. These agreements frequently include restrictions that prohibit licensees from sharing the file and using it to create similar software applications.
Copyrights in Digital Information	1. Copyrighted works online—Much of the material on the Internet (including software and database information) is copyrighted. In order for that material to be transferred online, it must be "copied." Generally, whenever a party downloads software or music without authorization, a copyright is infringed. 2. Digital Millennium Copyright Act—The Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA) protects copyrights online and establishes civil and criminal penalties for anyone who bypasses encryption software or other technologies. The DMCA provides exceptions for certain educational and nonprofit uses. It also limits the liability of Internet service providers for infringement unless the ISP is aware of the user's infringement and fails to take action. 3. File-sharing—When file-sharing is used to download others' stored music files or illegally copy movies, copyright issues arise. Individuals who download music or movies in violation of copyright laws are liable for infringement. Companies that distribute file-sharing software or provide such services have been held liable for the copyright infringement of their users if the software or technology involved promoted copyright infringement.
Social Media	1. Legal issues—The emergence of Facebook and other social networking sites has had a number of effects on the legal process. Social media posts have had an impact on litigation and settlement agreements. Law enforcement and administrative agencies now routinely use social media to detect illegal activities and conduct investigations, as do many businesses. 2. Social media passwords—Private employers and schools have sometimes looked at an individual's Facebook or other social media account to see if it included controversial postings. A number of states have enacted legislation that protects individuals from having to divulge their social media passwords. Such laws may not be completely effective in preventing employers from rejecting applicants or terminating workers based on their social media postings. 3. Company-wide social media networks—Many companies today form their own internal social media networks through which employees can exchange messages about topics related to their work.
Online Defamation	Federal and state statutes apply to certain forms of cyber torts, or torts that occur in cyberspace, such as online defamation. Under the federal Communications Decency Act (CDA), Internet service providers generally are not liable for defamatory messages posted by their subscribers.
Privacy	1. Expectation of privacy—Numerous Internet companies have been accused of violating users' privacy rights. To sue for invasion of privacy, though, a person must have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the particular situation. It is often difficult to determine how much privacy can reasonably be expected on the Internet. 2. Data collection and cookies—Whenever a consumer purchases items online from a retailer, the retailer collects information about the consumer through "cookies." Consequently, retailers have gathered large amounts of data about individuals' shopping habits. It is not always clear whether collecting such information violates a person's right to privacy. 3. The Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA)—The ECPA prohibits the intentional interception or disclosure of any wire, oral, or electronic communication. a. The ECPA includes a "business-extension exception" that permits employers to monitor employees' electronic communications made in the ordinary course of business (but not their personal communications). b. The Stored Communications Act (SCA) is part of the ECPA and prohibits intentional unauthorized access to stored electronic communications (such as backup data stored by an employer). 4. Internet companies' privacy policies—Many companies establish Internet privacy policies, which typically inform users what types of data they are gathering and for what purposes it will be used.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Issue Spotters

1. Karl self-publishes a cookbook titled Hole Foods, in which he sets out recipes for donuts, Bundt cakes, tortellini, and other foods with holes. To publicize the book, Karl designs the website holefoods.com. Karl appropriates the key words of other cooking and cookbook sites with more frequent hits so that holefoods.com will appear in the same search engine results as the more popular sites. Has Karl done anything wrong? Explain. (See Internet Law.)
2. Eagle Corporation began marketing software in 2010 under the mark "Eagle." In 2019, Eagle.com, Inc., a different company selling different products, begins to use eagle as part of its URL and registers it as a domain name. Can Eagle Corporation stop this use of eagle? If so, what must the company show? (See Internet Law.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

8–1. Privacy. See You, Inc., is an online social network. SeeYou's members develop personalized profiles to share information—photos, videos, stories, activity updates, and other items—with other members. Members post the information that they want to share and decide with whom they want to share it. SeeYou launched a program to allow members to share with others what they do elsewhere online. For example, if a member rents a movie through Netflix, SeeYou will broadcast that information to everyone in the member's online network. How can SeeYou avoid complaints that this program violates its members' privacy? (See Privacy.)

8–2. Copyrights in Digital Information. When she was in college, Jammie Thomas-Rasset wrote a case study on Napster, an online peer-to-peer (P2P) file-sharing network, and knew that it had been shut down because it was illegal. Later, Capitol Records, Inc., which owns the copyrights to a large number of music recordings, discovered that "tereastarr"—a user name associated with Thomas-Rasset's Internet protocol address—had made twenty-four songs available for distribution on KaZaA, another P2P network. Capitol notified Thomas-Rasset that she had been identified as engaging in the unauthorized trading of music. She replaced the hard drive on her computer with a new drive that did not contain the songs in dispute. Is Thomas-Rasset liable for copyright infringement? Explain. [Capitol Records, Inc. v. Thomas-Rasset, 692 F.3d 899 (8th Cir. 2012)] (See Copyrights in Digital Information.)

8–3. Privacy. Using special software, South Dakota law enforcement officers found a person who appeared to possess child pornography at a specific Internet protocol address. The officers subpoenaed Midcontinent Communications, the service that assigned the address, for the personal information of its subscriber. With this information, the officers obtained a search warrant for the residence of John Rolfe, where they found a laptop that contained child pornography. Rolfe argued that the subpoenas violated his "expectation of privacy." Did Rolfe have a privacy interest in the information obtained by the subpoenas issued to Midcontinent? Discuss. [State of South Dakota v. Rolfe, 825 N.W.2d 901 (S.Dak. 2013)] (See Privacy.)

8–4. File-Sharing. Dartmouth College professor M. Eric Johnson, in collaboration with Tiversa, Inc., a company that monitors peer-to-peer networks to provide security services, wrote an article titled "Data Hemorrhages in the Health-Care Sector." In preparing the article, Johnson and Tiversa searched the networks for data that could be used to commit medical or financial identity theft. They found a document that contained the Social Security numbers, insurance information, and treatment codes for patients of LabMD, Inc. Tiversa notified LabMD of the find in order to solicit its business. Instead of hiring Tiversa, however, LabMD filed a suit in a federal district court against the company, alleging trespass, conversion, and violations of federal statutes. What do these facts indicate about the security of private information? Explain. How should the court rule? [LabMD, Inc. v. Tiversa, Inc., 2013 WL 425983 (11th Cir. 2013)] (See Copyrights in Digital Information.)

8–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Social Media. Mohammad Omar Aly Hassan and nine others were indicted in a federal district court on charges of conspiring to advance violent jihad (holy war against enemies of Islam) and other offenses related to terrorism. The evidence at Hassan's trial included postings he made on Facebook concerning his adherence to violent jihadist ideology. Convicted, Hassan appealed, contending that the Facebook items had not been properly authenticated (established as his own comments). How might the government show the connection between postings on Facebook and those who post them? Discuss. [United States v. Hassan, 742 F.3d 104 (4th Cir. 2014)] (See Social Media.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 8–5, go to Appendix E.

8–6. Social Media. Kenneth Wheeler was angry at certain police officers in Grand Junction, Colorado, because of a driving-under-the-influence arrest that he viewed as unjust. While in Italy, Wheeler posted a statement to his Facebook page urging his "religious followers" to "kill cops, drown them in the blood of their children, hunt them down and kill their entire bloodlines" and provided names. Later, Wheeler added a post to "commit a massacre in the Stepping Stones Preschool and day care, just walk in and kill everybody." Could a reasonable person conclude that Wheeler's posts were true threats? How might law enforcement officers use Wheeler's posts? Explain. [United States v. Wheeler, 776 F.3d 736 (10th Cir. 2015)] (See Social Media.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

8–7. Social Media. Irvin Smith was charged in a Georgia state court with burglary and theft. Before the trial, during the selection of the jury, the state prosecutor asked the prospective jurors whether they knew Smith. No one responded affirmatively. Jurors were chosen and sworn in, without objection. After the trial, during deliberations, the jurors indicated to the court that they were deadlocked. The court charged them to try again. Meanwhile, the prosecutor learned that "Juror 4" appeared as a friend on the defendant's Facebook page and filed a motion to dismiss her. The court replaced Juror 4 with an alternate. Was this an appropriate action, or was it an "abuse of discretion"? Should the court have admitted evidence that Facebook friends do not always actually know each other? Discuss. [Smith v. State of Georgia, 335 Ga.App. 497, 782 S.E.2d 305 (2016)] (See Social Media.)

8–8. Internet Law. Jason Smathers, an employee of America Online (AOL), misappropriated an AOL customer list with 92 million screen names. He sold the list for $28,000 to Sean Dunaway, who sold it to Braden Bournival. Bournival used it to send AOL customers more than 3 billion unsolicited, deceptive e-mail ads. AOL estimated the cost of processing the ads to be at least $300,000. Convicted of conspiring to relay deceptive e-mail in violation of federal law, Smathers was ordered to pay AOL restitution of $84,000 (treble the amount for which he had sold the AOL customer list). Smathers appealed, seeking to reduce the amount. He cited a judgment in a civil suit for a different offense against Bournival and others for which AOL had collected $95,000. Smathers also argued that his obligation should be reduced by restitution payments made by Dunaway. Which federal law did Smathers violate? Should the amount of his restitution be reduced? Explain. [United States v. Smathers, 879 F.3d 453 (2d. Cir. 2018)] (See Internet Law.)

8–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Social Media. One August morning, around 6:30 A.M., a fire occurred at Ray and Christine Nixon's home in West Monroe, Louisiana. The Nixons told Detective Gary Gilley of the Ouachita Parish Sheriff's Department that they believed the fire was deliberately set by Matthew Alexander, a former employee of Ray's company. Ray gave Alexander's phone number to Gilley, who contacted the number's service provider, Verizon Wireless Services, L.L.C. Gilley said that he was investigating a house fire that had been started with the victims inside the dwelling, and wanted to know where the number's subscriber had been that day. He did not present a warrant, but he did certify that Verizon's response would be considered an "emergency disclosure." [Alexander v. Verizon Wireless Services, L.L.C., 875 F.3d 243 (5th Cir. 2017)] (See Social Media.)

1. Using the Inquiry and Discussion steps in the IDDR approach, identify the ethical dilemma that Verizon faced in this situation and actions that the company might have taken to resolve that issue.
2. Suppose that Verizon gave Gilley the requested information, and that later Alexander filed a suit against the provider, alleging a violation of the Stored Communications Act. Could Verizon successfully plead "good faith" in its defense?

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

8–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—File-Sharing. James, Chang, and Braden are roommates. They are music fans and frequently listen to the same artists and songs. They regularly exchange MP3 music files that contain songs from their favorite artists. (See Copyrights in Digital Information.)

1. One group of students will decide whether the fact that the roommates are transferring files among themselves for no monetary benefit protects them from being subject to copyright law.
2. The second group will consider whether it would be legal for each roommate to buy music on CD and then, after downloading a copy on to their hard drive, give the CD to the other roommates to do the same. Does this violate copyright law? Is it the same as file-sharing digital music? Explain.
3. A third group will consider streaming music services. If one roommate subscribes to a streaming service and the other roommates use the service for free, would this violate copyright law? Why or why not?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

9 Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

Focus Questions

The six Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. How does the burden of proof differ in criminal versus civil cases?
2. What two elements normally must exist before a person can be held liable for a crime?
3. What are five broad categories of crimes? What is white-collar crime?
4. What defenses can be raised to avoid liability for criminal acts?
5. What constitutional safeguards exist to protect persons accused of crimes?
6. How has the Internet expanded opportunities for identity theft?

"The crime problem is getting really serious. The other day, the Statue of Liberty had both hands up."

Jay Leno
1950–present
(American comedian and former television host)

The "crime problem" is of concern to all Americans, as suggested in the chapter-opening quotation. Not surprisingly, laws dealing with crime are an important part of the legal environment of business.

Society imposes a variety of sanctions to protect businesses from harm so that they can compete and flourish. These sanctions include damages for tortious conduct, damages for breach of contract, and various equitable remedies. Additional sanctions are imposed under criminal law.

Many statutes regulating business provide for criminal as well as civil sanctions. For instance, federal statutes that protect the environment often include criminal sanctions. Businesses that violate environmental laws can be criminally prosecuted. Walmart Inc., for example, was charged with illegally handling and disposing of hazardous materials (such as pesticides) at its retail stores across the nation. Walmart ultimately pleaded guilty to six counts of violating the Clean Water Act and was sentenced to pay over $81 million in fines as a result.

9–1 Civil Law and Criminal Law

Civil law pertains to the duties that exist between persons or between persons and their governments. Criminal law, in contrast, has to do with crime. A crime can be defined as a wrong against society proclaimed in a statute and, if committed, punishable by society through fines and/or imprisonment—and, in some cases, death.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Because crimes are offenses against society as a whole, they are prosecuted by a public official, such as a district attorney (D.A.) or an attorney general (A.G.), not by the crime victims. Once a crime has been reported, the D.A.'s office decides whether to file criminal charges and to what extent to pursue the prosecution or carry out additional investigation.

Crime A wrong against society proclaimed in a statute and, if committed, punishable by society through fines, imprisonment, or death.

9–1a Key Differences Between Civil Law and Criminal Law

Because the state has extensive resources at its disposal when prosecuting criminal cases, and because the sanctions can be so severe, there are numerous procedural safeguards to protect the rights of defendants. We look here at one of these safeguards—the higher burden of proof that applies in a criminal case—and at the sanctions imposed for criminal acts. Exhibit 9–1 summarizes these and other key differences between civil law and criminal law.

Burden of Proof In a civil case, the plaintiff usually must meet the preponderance of the evidence standard. That is, the plaintiff must convince the court that, based on the evidence presented by both parties, it is more likely than not that the plaintiff's allegation is true.

In a criminal case, in contrast, the state must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. If the jury views the evidence in the case as reasonably permitting either a guilty or a not guilty verdict, then the jury's verdict must be not guilty. In other words, the prosecutor must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant has committed every essential element of the alleged offense. If the jurors are not convinced of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, they must find the defendant not guilty.

Beyond a Reasonable Doubt The standard of proof used in criminal cases.

Note also that in a criminal case, the jury's verdict normally must be unanimous—agreed to by all members of the jury—to convict the defendant.[1] In a civil trial by jury, in contrast, typically only three-fourths of the jurors need to agree.

Focus Question 1

How does the burden of proof differ in criminal versus civil cases?

Criminal Sanctions The sanctions imposed on criminal wrongdoers are also harsher than those applied in civil cases. Remember that the purpose of tort law is to allow persons harmed by the wrongful acts of others to obtain compensation from the wrongdoer rather than to punish the wrongdoer.

In contrast, criminal sanctions are designed to punish those who commit crimes and to deter others from committing similar acts in the future. Criminal sanctions include fines as well as the much harsher penalty of the loss of liberty by incarceration in a jail or prison. Most criminal sanctions also involve probation and sometimes require restitution, community service, or an educational or treatment program. The harshest criminal sanction is, of course, the death penalty.

1. Note that two states, Louisiana and Oregon, used to allow jury verdicts that were not unanimous.

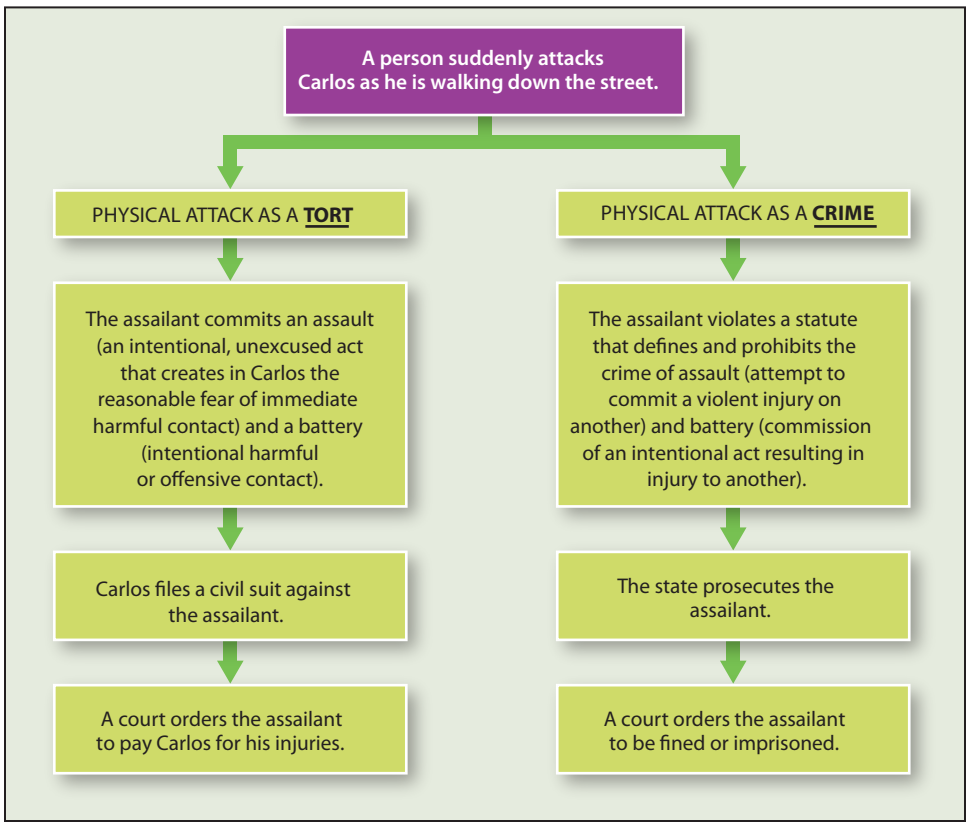
Exhibit 9-1 Key Differences between Civil Law and Criminal Law

ISSUE	CIVIL LAW	CRIMINAL LAW
Party who brings suit	The person who suffered harm.	The state.
Wrongful act	Causing harm to a person or to a person's property.	Violating a statute that prohibits some type of activity.
Burden of proof	Preponderance of the evidence.	Beyond a reasonable doubt.
Verdict	Three-fourths majority (typically).	Unanimous.
Remedy	Damages to compensate for the harm or a decree to achieve an equitable result.	Punishment (fine, imprisonment, or death).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

9–1b Civil Liability for Criminal Acts

Some torts, such as assault and battery, provide a basis for a criminal prosecution as well as a tort action. Example 9.1 Carlos is walking down the street, minding his own business, when suddenly a person attacks him. In the ensuing struggle, the attacker stabs Carlos several times, seriously injuring him. A police officer restrains and arrests the wrongdoer. In this situation, the attacker may be subject both to criminal prosecution by the state and to a tort lawsuit brought by Carlos. Exhibit 9–2 illustrates how the same act can result in both a tort action and a criminal action against the wrongdoer.



9–1c Classification of Crimes

Felony A serious crime—such as arson, murder, rape, or robbery—that carries the most severe sanctions, ranging from more than one year in a state or federal prison to the death penalty.

Depending on their degree of seriousness, crimes are classified as felonies or misdemeanors. A felony is a serious crime punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than one year.[2] Many states also define several degrees of felony offenses and vary the punishment according to the degree.[3] For instance, most jurisdictions punish a burglary that involves forced entry into a home at night more harshly than a burglary that involves breaking into a nonresidential building during the day.

2. Federal law and most state laws use this definition, but there is some variation among states as to the length of imprisonment associated with a felony conviction.
3. Although the American Law Institute issued the Model Penal Code in 1962, it is not a uniform code, and each state has developed its own set of laws governing criminal acts. Thus, types of crimes and prescribed punishments may differ from one jurisdiction to another.

Exhibit 9-2 Tort Lawsuit and Criminal Prosecution for the Same Act

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

A misdemeanor is a less serious crime, punishable by a fine or by confinement in jail for up to a year. A petty offense is a minor violation, such as jaywalking or violating a building code, considered to be a subset of misdemeanors. Even for petty offenses, however, a guilty party can be put in jail for a few days, fined, or both, depending on state or local law. Whether a crime is a felony or a misdemeanor can determine in which court the case is tried and, in some states, whether the defendant has a right to a jury trial.

Misdemeanor A lesser crime than a felony, punishable by a fine or incarceration in jail for up to one year.

Petty Offense The least serious kind of criminal offense, such as a traffic or building-code violation.

9–2 Criminal Liability

Two elements normally must exist simultaneously for a person to be convicted of a crime:

1. The performance of a prohibited act (actus reus).
2. A specified state of mind or intent on the part of the actor (mens rea).

Focus Question 2

What two elements normally must exist before a person can be held liable for a crime?

9–2a The Criminal Act

Every criminal statute prohibits certain behavior. Most crimes require an act of commission. That is, a person must do something in order to be accused of a crime. In criminal law, a prohibited act is referred to as the actus reus,[4] or guilty act. In some instances, an act of omission can be a crime, but only when a person has a legal duty to perform the omitted act, such as filing a tax return.

Actus Reus A guilty (prohibited) act. It is one of the two essential elements required to establish criminal liability.

The guilty act requirement is based on one of the premises of criminal law—that a person is punished for harm done to society. For a crime to exist, the guilty act must cause some harm to a person or to property. Thinking about killing someone or about stealing a car may be wrong, but the thoughts do no harm until they are translated into action. Of course, someone can be punished for attempting murder or robbery, but normally only if that person took substantial steps toward the criminal objective. Additionally, the person must have specifically intended to commit the crime to be convicted of an attempt. (Is a popular form of online currency causing so much harm to society that its use should be considered a criminal act? See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion.)

4. Pronounced ak-tuhs ray-uhs.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Should Bitcoin Be Illegal?

Bitcoin is a cryptocurrency, meaning that it only exists as a digital asset on the Internet. No central bank or government is involved with Bitcoin. Instead, a decentralized network of computers monitors all transactions, and the open market decides the value of each bitcoin. The cryptocurrency can be easily transferred by Internet users through the use of apps or other programs, sometimes called "wallets."

The Dark Web

The U.S. Congress, at the urging of many finance and law enforcement experts, has considered making Bitcoin illegal. The problem is that cryptocurrencies are tailor-made for criminal activity. Anyone can use Bitcoin without providing a name or identity, and it is very difficult to trace online purchases made using this form of trade.

Consequently, Bitcoin is the currency of choice on the dark web, a part of the Internet that can only be accessed through special methods designed to obscure the identity of providers and users. An estimated

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

(Continued)

$200 million in Bitcoin is spent on dark web markets each month. Law enforcement officials believe that the dark web is an important source of distribution for synthetic opioids, which cause thousands of deaths in the United States each year. In Park City, Utah, two thirteen-year-old boys overdosed on a synthetic opioid known as Pinky that they had purchased using Bitcoin on the dark web.

Stateless Currency

There is little evidence that a federal law banning Bitcoin, if passed, would have much effect. Buyers and sellers using Bitcoin are almost always able to remain anonymous. Furthermore, it can be difficult for law enforcement to determine the source not only of cryptocurrency-related crime but of any criminal activity that takes place online. As one expert puts it, "You can't prevent people from holding ones and zeros on a device in their pocket."

Critical Thinking

Despite Bitcoin's oversized presence on the dark web, only about 1 percent of all transactions using the cryptocurrency involve an illegal exchange of goods. How does this fact impact arguments in favor of banning Bitcoin?

9–2b State of Mind

Mens Rea A wrongful mental state ("guilty mind"), or intent. It is one of the two essential elements required to establish criminal liability.

A wrongful mental state (mens rea)[5] is generally required to establish criminal liability. The required mental state, or intent, is indicated in the applicable statute or law. Theft, for example, involves the guilty act of taking another person's property. The guilty mental state involves both the awareness that the property belongs to another and the intent to deprive the owner of it. A court can also find that the required mental state is present when a defendant's acts are reckless or criminally negligent.

A criminal conspiracy exists when two or more people agree to commit an unlawful act, and then take some action toward its completion. The required intent involves purposely agreeing with others and intending to commit the underlying crime. In the following case, the issue was whether the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant had "knowingly and voluntarily" participated in a conspiracy to commit health-care fraud.

5. Pronounced mehns ray-uh.

Case 9.1

United States v. Crabtree

United States Court of Appeals, Eleventh Circuit, 878 F.3d 1274 (2018).

Facts Health Care Solutions Network, Inc. (HCSN), operated mental health centers to provide psychiatric therapy in a partial hospitalization program—a bridge between restrictive inpatient care and routine outpatient care. HCSN organized its business around procuring, retaining, and readmitting patients to maximize billing potential, without respect to their health needs. It ensured that patient files complied with strict Medicare requirements by editing intake information, fabricating treatment plans, and falsifying therapy and treatment notes. The scheme spanned seven years, and amounted to more than $63 million in fraudulent claims.

At one of HCSN's facilities, Doris Crabtree was responsible for patient therapy notes. The notes were systematically altered and falsified to support Medicare claims. Convicted in a federal district court of conspiracy to commit health-care fraud, Crabtree appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit. She argued that she had only been negligent and careless.

Issue Was the evidence sufficient to support Crabtree's conviction for conspiring to commit health-care fraud?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed Crabtree's conviction. "A reasonable jury [could] conclude that Crabtree . . . had knowledge of the conspiracy at HCSN" and that she "voluntarily joined the conspiracy, given the substantial evidence of [her] role in furthering the fraud."

Reason A conspiracy, and a defendant's participation in it, can be proved by inferences drawn from the actions of the defendant and others, and from the circumstantial evidence of a scheme. In this case, the government provided "considerable" evidence that Crabtree was aware of the conspiracy. HCSN employees testified that, for example, she complied with their requests to doctor patient therapy notes to meet Medicare requirements. In conversation, Crabtree expressed awareness that some of the patients suffered from Alzheimer's, dementia, autism, and other conditions that were unsuitable for treatment at HCSN.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The government also proffered "substantial" evidence that she voluntarily joined the conspiracy. For example, Crabtree complied with requests to alter and fabricate notes for billing and Medicare purposes. In the notes, she would misrepresent the therapy that patients received. Thus, a patient's note might indicate full participation in a therapy session when, in fact, the patient was absent.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Could Crabtree have successfully avoided her conviction by arguing that her only "crime" was "naively trusting her co-workers"? Why or why not?
- Ethical It seems reasonable to assume that one of the purposes of any business is to "maximize billing potential." When does conduct to accomplish that purpose become unethical?

Recklessness Defendants are criminally reckless if they consciously disregard a substantial and unjustifiable risk. Example 9.2 A claustrophobic patient at the Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville, Tennessee, was about to undergo a full body scan, which requires lying inside a large tube-like machine for about thirty minutes. A nurse, meaning to inject the patient with the anti-anxiety drug Versed, mistakenly injected her with vecuronium, a powerful narcotic used to keep patients from moving during surgery.

The mistake occurred, apparently, because both drugs start with "VE." After the patient died, state law enforcement officials charged the nurse with reckless homicide. When a medical professional does not read the label of a drug she is about to inject into a patient, she has arguably created a substantial and unjustifiable risk of severe harm or death.

Criminal Negligence Criminal negligence occurs when the defendant takes an unjustified, substantial, and foreseeable risk that results in harm. A defendant can be negligent even if the defendant was not actually aware of the risk but should have been aware of it.[6]

A homicide is classified as involuntary manslaughter when it results from an act of criminal negligence and there is no intent to kill. Example 9.3 Demolition contractor Griffith Campbell was convicted of involuntary manslaughter after he caused a brick wall to collapse onto a Salvation Army store, leading to the deaths of six people in the thrift shop. The wall was unstable when it fell because Campbell had removed support beams and joists to sell for salvage. Furthermore, he had negligently conducted the demolition during business hours.

Strict Liability and Overcriminalization An increasing number of laws and regulations have imposed criminal sanctions for strict liability crimes—that is, offenses that do not require a wrongful mental state, or malice, to establish criminal liability. Critics say that such laws lead to overcriminalization.

Federal Crimes. The federal criminal code now lists more than four thousand criminal offenses, many of which do not require a specific mental state. In addition, several hundred thousand federal rules can be enforced through criminal sanctions, and many of these rules do not require intent. See this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature for a discussion of how these laws and rules affect American businesspersons.

Strict liability crimes are particularly common in environmental laws, laws aimed at combatting illegal drugs, and other laws affecting public health, safety, and welfare. Case Example 9.4 Paul Kenner was a commercial cattle rancher in Nebraska. Due to a faulty fence, three hundred of Kenner's cattle wandered onto a national wildlife refuge, where they grazed for ten days. A Kenner ranch hand also drove an all-terrain vehicle onto the wildlife refuge, which is

6. Model Penal Code Section 2.02(2)(d).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

prohibited by federal regulations. Kenner was convicted of four separate crimes involving failing to comply with the National Wildlife Refuge System.[7]

State Crimes. Many states have also enacted laws that punish behavior as criminal without the need to show criminal intent. Example 9.5 In several states, a vendor who sells alcohol to someone under the age of twenty-one has committed a crime. Under these laws, vendors can be convicted of the crime regardless of their intent or their knowledge of the customer's actual age.

9–2c Corporate Criminal Liability

A corporation is a legal entity created under the laws of a state. At one time, it was thought that a corporation could not incur criminal liability because, although a corporation is a legal person, it can act only through its agents (corporate directors, officers, and employees). Therefore, the corporate entity itself could not "intend" to commit a crime. Over time, this view has changed. Obviously, corporations cannot be imprisoned, but they can be fined or denied certain legal privileges (such as necessary licenses).

7. United States v. Kenner, 238 F.Supp.3d 1157 (D.Neb. 2017).

The Criminalization of American Business

What do Bank of America, Citigroup, JPMorgan Chase, and Goldman Sachs have in common? All paid hefty fines for purportedly misleading investors about mortgage-backed securities. In fact, these companies paid the government a total of $50 billion in fines. The payments were made in lieu of criminal prosecutions.

Today, several hundred thousand federal rules that apply to businesses carry some form of criminal penalty. That is in addition to more than four thousand federal laws, many of which carry criminal sanctions for their violation. Each year, about 150 corporations either are convicted or plead guilty to violating federal statutes or rules.

Criminal Convictions

The first successful criminal conviction in a federal court against a company—the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad—was upheld by the Supreme Court in 1909 (the violation: cutting prices).[a] Many other successful convictions followed.

One landmark case developed the aggregation test, now called the Doctrine of Collective Knowledge.[b] This test aggregates the omissions and acts of two or more persons in a corporation, thereby constructing an actus reus and a mens rea out of the conduct and knowledge of several individuals.

Not all government attempts at applying criminal law to corporations survive. Courts have sometimes found insufficient evidence to show that a company acted with specific intent to commit a crime.[c] Often, however, companies choose to reach settlement agreements with the government rather than fight criminal indictments.

Many Pay Substantial Fines in Lieu of Prosecution

Under certain circumstances, corporations will reach so-called nonprosecution agreements with the government. These agreements typically involve multimillion- or multibillion-dollar fines. This number does not include fines paid to the Environmental Protection Agency or to the Fish and Wildlife Service.

According to law professors Margaret Lemos and Max Minzner, "Public enforcers often seek large monetary awards for self-interested reasons divorced from the public interest and deterrents. The incentives are strongest when enforcement agencies are permitted to retain all or some of the proceeds of enforcement."[d]

Business Questions

1. Why might a corporation's managers agree to pay a large fine rather than to be indicted and proceed to trial?

2. How do managers determine the optimal amount of legal research to undertake to prevent their companies from violating the many thousands of federal regulations?

a. New York Central and Hudson River Railroad v. United States, 212 U.S. 481, 29 S.Ct. 304, 53 L.Ed. 613 (1909).

b. United States v. Bank of New England, 821 F.2d 844 (1st Cir. 1987).

c. See, for example, McGee v. Sentinel Offender Services, LLC, 719 F.3d 1236 (11th Cir. 2013); Golden v. FNF Servicing, Inc., 2015 WL 5302703 (M.D.Ga. 2015); and United States ex rel. Salters v. American Family Care, Inc., 262 F.Supp.3d 1266 (N.D.Ala. 2017).

d. Margaret Lemos and Max Minzner, "For-Profit Public Enforcement," Harvard Law Review 127, 17 Jan. 2014.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Liability of the Corporate Entity Today, corporations are normally liable for the crimes committed by their agents and employees within the course and scope of their employment.[8] For liability to be imposed, the prosecutor typically must show that the corporation could have prevented the act or that a supervisor within the corporation authorized or had knowledge of the act. In addition, corporations can be criminally liable for failing to perform specific duties imposed by law (such as duties under environmental laws or securities laws).

Spotlight Case Example 9.6 A prostitution ring, the Gold Club, was operating out of motels in West Virginia. A motel manager, who was also an officer in the corporation that owned the motels, gave discounted rates to Gold Club prostitutes, and they paid him in cash. The corporation received a portion of the funds generated by the Gold Club's illegal operations. At trial, the jury found that the corporation was criminally liable because a supervisor within the corporation—the motel manager—had knowledge of the prostitution ring and profited from it, and the corporation allowed it to continue.[9]

Liability of Corporate Officers and Directors Corporate directors and officers are personally liable for the crimes they commit, regardless of whether the crimes were committed for their personal benefit or on the corporation's behalf. Additionally, corporate directors and officers may be held liable for the actions of employees under their supervision. Under the responsible corporate officer doctrine, a court may impose criminal liability on corporate officers regardless of whether they participated in, directed, or even knew about a given criminal violation.[10]

Case Example 9.7 Austin DeCoster owned and controlled Quality Egg, LLC, an egg-production and processing company with facilities across Iowa. His son, Peter DeCoster, was the chief operating officer. Due to unsanitary conditions in some of its facilities, Quality shipped and sold eggs that contained salmonella bacteria, which sickened thousands of people across the United States.

The federal government prosecuted the DeCosters under the responsible corporate officer doctrine, in part for Quality's failure to comply with regulations on egg-production facilities. The DeCosters ultimately pleaded guilty to violating three criminal statutes. But when they were ordered to serve three months in jail, the DeCosters challenged the sentence as unconstitutional. The court held that the sentence of incarceration was appropriate because the evidence suggested that the defendants knew about the unsanitary conditions in their processing plants.[11]

chaiwoot seetha/Shutterstock.com

If unsanitary conditions at an egg-production facility spark sickness among consumers, can the corporate owner be held criminally liable?

9–3 Types of Crimes

Federal, state, and local laws provide for the classification and punishment of hundreds of thousands of different criminal acts. Traditionally, though, crimes have been grouped into five broad categories: violent crime (crimes against persons), property crime, public order crime, white-collar crime, and organized crime. In addition, when crimes are committed in cyberspace rather than the physical world, we often refer to them as cyber crimes.

Focus Question 3

What are five broad categories of crimes? What is white-collar crime?

8. See Model Penal Code Section 2.07.
9. As a result of the convictions, the motel manager was sentenced to fifteen months in prison, and the corporation was ordered to forfeit the motel property. United States v. Singh, 518 F.3d 236 (4th Cir. 2008). For an example involving environmental laws, see United States v. House of Raeford Farms, Inc., 2013 WL 179185 (M.D.N.C. 2013).
10. For a landmark case in this area, see United States v. Park, 421 U.S. 658, 95 S.Ct. 1903, 44 L.Ed.2d 489 (1975).
11. United States v. Quality Egg, LLC, 99 F.Supp.3d 920 (N.D. Iowa 2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

9–3a Violent Crime

Robbery The act of forcefully and unlawfully taking personal property of any value from another.

Certain crimes are called violent crimes, or crimes against persons, because they cause others to suffer harm or death. Murder is a violent crime. So, too, is sexual assault. Robbery—defined as the taking of cash, personal property, or any other article of value from a person by means of force or fear—is another violent crime. Typically, states have more severe penalties for aggravated robbery—robbery with the use of a deadly weapon.

Assault and battery, which were discussed in the context of tort law, are also classified as violent crimes. Example 9.8 Restaurateur Mario Batali was criminally charged with indecent assault and battery arising from an incident at a Boston restaurant. While taking a selfie with a fan, he allegedly kissed and groped her and, when she tried to escape his grasp, aggressively touched her face.

Each of these violent crimes is further classified by degree, depending on the circumstances surrounding the criminal act. These circumstances include the intent of the person committing the crime and whether a weapon was used. For crimes other than murder, the level of pain and suffering experienced by the victim is also a factor.

9–3b Property Crime

The most common type of criminal activity is property crime—crimes in which the goal of the offender is some form of economic gain or the damaging of property. Robbery is a form of property crime, as well as a violent crime, because the offender seeks to gain the property of another. We look here at a number of other crimes that fall within the general category of property crime.

Burglary The unlawful entry or breaking into a building with the intent to commit a felony.

Burglary Traditionally, burglary was defined under the common law as breaking and entering the dwelling of another at night with the intent to commit a felony. Originally, the definition was aimed at protecting an individual's home and its occupants. Most state statutes have eliminated some of the requirements found in the common law definition. The time of day at which the breaking and entering occurs, for example, is usually immaterial. State statutes frequently omit the element of breaking, and some states do not require that the building be a dwelling. When a deadly weapon is used in a burglary, the person can be charged with aggravated burglary and punished more severely.

Larceny The wrongful taking and carrying away of another person's personal property with the intent to permanently deprive the owner of the property.

Larceny Under the common law, the crime of larceny involved the unlawful taking and carrying away of someone else's personal property with the intent to permanently deprive the owner of possession. Put simply, larceny is stealing, or theft.

Whereas robbery involves force or fear, larceny does not. Therefore, picking pockets is larceny, not robbery. Similarly, an employee who takes company products and supplies home for personal use without authorization commits larceny.

Most states have expanded the definition of property that is subject to larceny statutes. Stealing computer programs may constitute larceny even though the "property" is not physical (see the discussion of cyber crime later in this chapter). The theft of natural gas, Internet access, and television cable service can also constitute larceny.

Obtaining Goods by False Pretenses Obtaining goods by means of false pretenses is a form of theft that involves trickery or fraud, such as using someone else's credit card number without permission. Statutes dealing with such illegal activities vary widely from state to state. They often apply not only to property, but also to services and cash.

Case Example 9.9 While Matthew Steffes was incarcerated, he devised a scheme to make free collect calls from prison. (A collect call is a telephone call in which the calling party places a call at the called party's expense.) Steffes had his friends and family members set up new phone number accounts by giving false information to AT&T. This information included fictitious business names, as well as personal identifying information stolen from a healthcare clinic. Once a new phone number was working, Steffes made unlimited collect calls to it without paying the bill until AT&T eventually shut down the account. For nearly two years, Steffes used sixty fraudulently obtained phone numbers to make hundreds of collect calls. The loss to AT&T was more than $28,000.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Steffes was convicted in a state court of theft by fraud. He appealed, arguing that he had not made false representations to AT&T. The Wisconsin Supreme Court affirmed his conviction. The court held that Steffes had made false representations to AT&T by providing it with fictitious business names and stolen personal identifying information. He made these false representations so that he could make phone calls without paying for them, which deprived the company of its "property"—its electricity.[12]

Receiving Stolen Goods It is a crime to receive goods that a person knows or should have known were stolen or illegally obtained. To be convicted, the recipient of such goods need not know the true identity of the owner or the thief, and need not have paid for the goods. All that is necessary is that the recipient knows or should have known that the goods were stolen, which implies an intent to deprive the true owner of those goods.

Arson The willful and malicious burning of a building (and, in some states, vehicles and other items of personal property) is the crime of arson. At common law, arson traditionally applied only to burning down another person's house. The law was designed to protect human life. Today, arson statutes have been extended to cover the destruction of any building, regardless of ownership, by fire or explosion.

Arson The intentional burning of a building.

Every state has a special statute that covers the act of burning a building for the purpose of collecting insurance. Example 9.10 Benton owns an insured apartment building that is falling apart. If he sets fire to it or pays someone else to do so, he is guilty not only of arson but also of defrauding the insurer, which is attempted larceny. Of course, the insurer need not pay the claim when insurance fraud is proved.

Forgery The fraudulent making or altering of any writing (including electronic records) in a way that changes the legal rights and liabilities of another is forgery. Example 9.11 Without authorization, Severson signs Bennett's name to the back of a check made out to Bennett and attempts to cash it. Severson has committed the crime of forgery. Forgery also includes changing trademarks, falsifying public records, counterfeiting, and altering a legal document.

Forgery The fraudulent making or altering of any writing in a way that changes the legal rights and liabilities of another.

9–3c Public Order Crime

Historically, societies have always outlawed activities considered to be contrary to public values and morals. Today, the most common public order crimes include public drunkenness, prostitution, gambling, and illegal drug use. These crimes are sometimes referred to as victimless crimes because they normally harm only the offender. From a broader perspective, however, they are detrimental to society as a whole because they may create an environment that gives rise to property and violent crimes.

Example 9.12 A man is stumbling through a mall parking lot, screaming obscenities. A sheriff's deputy arrives on the scene and—noting that the man is slurring his speech, has bloodshot eyes, and smells of alcohol—arrests him for public intoxication. Under state law, this public order crime is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of no more than $500.

9–3d White-Collar Crime

Crimes occurring in the business context are popularly referred to as white-collar crimes, although this is not an official legal term. Ordinarily, white-collar crime involves an illegal act or series of acts committed by an individual or business entity using some nonviolent means to obtain a personal or business advantage.

White-Collar Crime Nonviolent crime committed by individuals or business entities to obtain a personal or business advantage.

12. State of Wisconsin v. Steffes, 347 Wis.2d 683, 832 N.W.2d 101 (2013).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Usually, this kind of crime is committed in the course of a legitimate occupation. Corporate crimes fall into this category. In addition, certain property crimes, such as larceny and forgery, may also be white-collar crimes if they occur within the business context.

Embezzlement The fraudulent appropriation of funds or other property by a person who was entrusted with the funds or property.

Embezzlement When a person who is entrusted with another person's funds or property fraudulently appropriates it, embezzlement occurs. Embezzlement is not larceny, because the wrongdoer does not physically take the property from another's possession, and it is not robbery, because force or fear is not used.

Typically, embezzlement is carried out by an employee who steals funds. Banks are particularly prone to this problem, but embezzlement can occur in any firm. In a number of businesses, corporate officers or accountants have fraudulently converted funds for their own benefit and then "fixed" the books to cover up their crime. Embezzlement occurs whether the embezzler takes the funds directly from the victim or from a third person. If the financial officer of a corporation pockets checks from third parties that were given to her to deposit into the corporate account, she is embezzling.

Frequently, an embezzler takes relatively small amounts repeatedly over a long period. This might be done by underreporting income or deposits and embezzling the remaining amount, or by creating fictitious persons or accounts and writing checks to them from the corporate account. An employer's failure to remit state withholding taxes that were collected from employee wages can also constitute embezzlement.

The intent to return embezzled property—or its actual return—is not a defense to the crime of embezzlement, as the following Spotlight Case illustrates.

Spotlight on White-Collar Crime: Case 9.2

People v. Sisuphan

Court of Appeal of California, First District, 181 Cal.App.4th 800, 104 Cal.Rptr.3d 654 (2010).

Facts Lou Sisuphan was the director of finance at a Toyota dealership. Sisuphan complained repeatedly to management about another employee, Ian McClelland. The general manager, Michael Christian, would not terminate McClelland "because he brought a lot of money into the dealership." In an attempt to get McClelland fired, Sisuphan took and kept an envelope containing a payment of nearly $30,000 from one of McClelland's customers. McClelland believed the envelope had been deposited in the company safe's drop slot, but after it got stuck, Sisuphan wriggled the envelope free and kept it in the company's safe.

tomeng/iStock Unreleased/Getty Images

A Toyota dealership employee committed embezzlement but returned the funds. Is this a crime?

Later, Sisuphan told the dealership what he had done and returned the money, adding that he had "no intention of stealing the money." Christian fired Sisuphan the next day, and the district attorney later charged Sisuphan with embezzlement. After a jury trial, Sisuphan was found guilty. Sisuphan appealed.

Issue Did Sisuphan take the funds with the intent to defraud his employer?

Decision Yes. The appellate court affirmed Sisuphan's conviction for embezzlement. Sisuphan had the required intent at the time he took the funds, and the evidence that he repaid the dealership was properly excluded.

Reason The court reasoned that evidence of repayment is admissible only if it shows that a defendant's intent at the time of the taking was not fraudulent. In determining whether Sisuphan's intent was fraudulent at the time of the taking, the main issue was not whether he intended to spend the funds that he had taken, but whether he intended to use the payment "for a purpose other than that for which the dealership entrusted it to him." Sisuphan's stated purpose was to get McClelland fired. Because this purpose was beyond the scope of his responsibility, it was "outside the trust afforded him by the dealership" and indicated fraudulent intent.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Why was Sisuphan convicted of embezzlement instead of larceny? What is the difference between these two crimes?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Mail and Wire Fraud One of the most potent weapons against white-collar criminals are the federal laws that prohibit mail fraud[13] and wire fraud.[14] These laws make it a federal crime to devise any scheme that uses the U.S. mail, commercial carriers (such as FedEx or UPS), or wire (including telegraph, telephone, television, e-mail, and online social media) with the intent to defraud the public. These laws are often applied when persons send untrue or misleading information via e-mail with the intent of obtaining a financial benefit under false pretenses.

Case Example 9.13 Donovan Davis and several associates launched Capital Blu Management to trade in the foreign currency marketplace. Over the course of several days, Capital Blu engaged in a disastrous series of trades, losing almost $3 million. Davis feared that if these losses were reported to investors, they would abandon the company, and his reputation in the financial community would suffer. So Capital Blu sent out a monthly report via mail and e-mail falsely reporting a 1.6 percent gain.

This monthly pattern of transmitting fraudulent reports continued until regulators shut Capital Blu down a year later. In a ruling upheld on appeal, a federal trial court found Davis responsible for $10 million in investor losses and convicted him on six counts of mail fraud and one count of wire fraud.[15]

The maximum penalty under these statutes is substantial. Persons convicted of mail or wire fraud may be imprisoned for up to twenty years and/or fined. If the violation affects a financial institution or involves fraud in connection with emergency disaster-relief funds, the violator may be fined up to $1 million, imprisoned for up to thirty years, or both.

Bribery The crime of bribery involves offering something of value to someone in an attempt to influence that person—who is usually, but not always, a public official—to act in a way that serves a private interest. Three types of bribery are considered crimes: bribery of public officials, commercial bribery, and bribery of foreign officials. As an element of the crime of bribery, intent must be present and proved. The bribe itself can be anything the recipient considers to be valuable, but the defendant must have intended it as a bribe. Realize that the crime of bribery occurs when the bribe is offered—it is not required that the bribe be accepted. Accepting a bribe is a separate crime.

Commercial bribery involves corrupt dealings between private persons or businesses. Typically, people make commercial bribes to obtain proprietary information, cover up an inferior product, or secure new business. Industrial espionage sometimes involves commercial bribes. Example 9.14 Kent works at the firm of Jacoby & Meyers. He offers to pay Laurel, an employee in a competing firm, if she will give him her firm's trade secrets and pricing schedules. Kent has committed commercial bribery. So-called kickbacks, or payoffs for special favors or services, are a form of commercial bribery in some situations.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act In many foreign countries, government officials make the decisions on most major construction and manufacturing contracts. Side payments to government officials in exchange for favorable business contracts are not unusual in such countries. The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act[16] (FCPA) prohibits U.S. businesspersons from bribing foreign officials to secure beneficial contracts. Firms that violate the FCPA can be fined up to $2 million. Individuals can be fined up to $100,000 and imprisoned for up to five years.

Prohibition against the Bribery of Foreign Officials. The first part of the FCPA applies to all U.S. companies and their directors, officers, shareholders, employees, and agents. This part of the act prohibits the bribery of most officials of foreign governments if the purpose of the payment is to motivate the official to act in an official capacity to provide business opportunities.

The FCPA does not prohibit payments to minor officials whose duties are ministerial. A ministerial action is a routine activity, such as the processing of paperwork, with little or no discretion involved in the action. These payments, often referred to as "grease," are meant 13. The Mail Fraud Act of 1990, 18 U.S.C. Sections 1341–1342.

14. 18 U.S.C. Section 1343.
15. United States v. Davis, 789 Fed.Appx. 105 (11th Cir. 2019).
16. 15 U.S.C., Sections 78dd-1, et seq.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Rawpixel.com/Shutterstock.com

What type of payments to foreign officials are allowed under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act?

to expedite the performance of administrative services. Thus, a firm that makes a payment to a minor official to speed up an import licensing process has not violated the FCPA.

Generally, the act also permits payments to foreign officials if such payments are lawful within the foreign country. Payments to private foreign companies or other third parties are permissible unless the U.S. firm knows that the payments will be passed on to a foreign government in violation of the FCPA.

Accounting Requirements. In the past, bribes were often concealed in corporate financial records. Thus, the second part of the FCPA is directed toward accountants. All companies must keep detailed accounting records that provide "reasonable assurance" that their transactions are accounted for and legal. The FCPA prohibits any person from making false statements to accountants or false entries in any record or account.

Case Example 9.15 Noble Corporation operated some offshore drilling rigs in Nigeria. Mark Jackson and James Ruehlen were officers at Noble. The U.S. government accused Noble of bribing Nigerian government officials and charged Jackson and Ruehlen individually with violating the FCPA's accounting provisions. Jackson and Ruehlen allegedly approved numerous "special handling" and "procurement" payments to the Nigerian government, knowing that those payments were actually bribes. Allowing illegal payments to be listed on the books as legitimate operating expenses violates the FCPA.[17]

Bankruptcy Fraud Federal bankruptcy law allows individuals and businesses to be relieved of oppressive debt through bankruptcy proceedings. Numerous white-collar crimes may be committed during the many phases of a bankruptcy proceeding. A creditor may file a false claim against the debtor. Also, a debtor may attempt to protect assets from creditors by fraudulently concealing property or by fraudulently transferring property to favored parties. For instance, a company-owned automobile may be "sold" at a bargain price to a trusted friend or relative.

Theft of Trade Secrets Trade secrets constitute a form of intellectual property that can be extremely valuable for many businesses. The Economic Espionage Act[18] made the theft of trade secrets a federal crime. The act also made it a federal crime to buy or possess the trade secrets of another person, knowing that the trade secrets were stolen or otherwise acquired without the owner's authorization.

Violations of the act can result in steep penalties. An individual who violates the act can be imprisoned for up to ten years and fined up to $500,000. A corporation or other organization can be fined up to $5 million. Additionally, any property acquired as a result of the violation, such as airplanes and automobiles, is subject to criminal forfeiture, or seizure by the government. Similarly, any property used in the commission of the violation, such as servers and other electronic devices, is subject to forfeiture. A theft of trade secrets conducted via the Internet, for instance, could result in the forfeiture of every computer or other device used to commit or facilitate the crime.

Insider Trading An individual who obtains "inside information" about the plans of a publicly listed corporation can often make stock-trading profits by purchasing or selling corporate securities based on the information. Insider trading is a violation of securities law. Generally, the rule is that a person who possesses inside information and has a duty not to disclose it to outsiders may not profit from the purchase or sale of securities based on that information until the information is made available to the public.

Insider Trading The purchase or sale of securities on the basis of information that has not been made available to the public.

17. Securities Exchange Commission v. Jackson, 908 F.Supp.2d 834 (S.D.Tex.—Houston 2012).
18. 18 U.S.C. Sections 1831–1839.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

9–3e Organized Crime

As mentioned, white-collar crime takes place within the confines of the legitimate business world. Organized crime, in contrast, operates illegitimately by, among other things, providing illegal goods and services, such as illegal drugs, gambling, and prostitution. Today, organized crime is heavily involved in cyber crime.

Money Laundering Organized crime and other illegal activities generate many billions of dollars in profits each year. Under federal law, banks and other financial institutions are required to report currency transactions involving more than $10,000. Consequently, those who engage in illegal activities face difficulties when they try to deposit their cash profits from illegal transactions.

As an alternative to simply storing cash from illegal transactions somewhere outside of the banking system, wrongdoers and racketeers often launder their "dirty" money through a legitimate business to make it "clean." Money laundering is engaging in financial transactions to conceal the identity, source, or destination of illegally gained funds.

Money Laundering Engaging in financial transactions to conceal the identity, source, or destination of illegally gained funds.

Example 9.16 Leo, a successful drug dealer, becomes a partner with a restaurateur. Little by little, the restaurant shows increasing profits. As a partner in the restaurant, Leo is able to report the "profits" of the restaurant as legitimate income on which he pays federal and state taxes. He can then spend those funds without worrying that his lifestyle may exceed the level possible with his reported income. ■

Racketeering To curb the entry of organized crime into the legitimate business world, Congress enacted the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO).[19] The statute makes it a federal crime to:

1. Use income obtained from racketeering activity to purchase any interest in an enterprise.
2. Acquire or maintain an interest in an enterprise through racketeering activity.
3. Conduct or participate in the affairs of an enterprise through racketeering activity.
4. Conspire to do any of the preceding activities.

Broad Application of RICO. The definition of racketeering is so inclusive—basically covering any attempt to earn illegal income involving more than one person—that it can be used against a broad range of criminal activity that has little to do with organized crime. RICO incorporates by reference twenty-six separate types of federal crimes and nine types of state felonies.[20] A person who commits two of these offenses is guilty of "racketeering activity."

Under the criminal provisions of RICO, any individual found guilty is subject to a fine of up to $25,000 per violation, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both. Additionally, any assets (property or cash) that were acquired as a result of the illegal activity or that were "involved in" or an "instrumentality of" the activity are subject to government forfeiture.

SpeedKingz/Shutterstock.com

What might be some circumstances under which a shoplifter could be charged with racketeering?

Civil Liability. In the event of a RICO violation, the government can seek not only criminal penalties but also civil penalties, such as the divestiture of a defendant's interest in a business or the dissolution of the business. (Divestiture refers to the forfeiture and subsequent sale of the defendant's interest.)

Moreover, in some cases, the statute allows private individuals to sue violators and potentially to recover three times their actual losses (treble damages), plus attorneys' fees, for business injuries caused by a RICO violation. This is perhaps the most controversial aspect

19. 18 U.S.C. Sections 1961–1968.
20. See 18 U.S.C. Section 1961(1)(A).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

of RICO and one that continues to cause debate in the nation's federal courts. The prospect of receiving treble damages in civil RICO lawsuits has given plaintiffs a financial incentive to pursue businesses and employers for violations.

9–4 Defenses to Criminal Liability

Focus Question 4
What defenses can be raised to avoid liability for criminal acts?

Persons charged with crimes may be relieved of criminal liability if they can show that their criminal actions were justified under the circumstances. In certain circumstances, the law may also allow someone to be excused from criminal liability because that person lacks the required mental state. We look at several of the defenses to criminal liability here.

Note that procedural violations, such as obtaining evidence without a valid search warrant, may also operate as defenses. Evidence obtained in violation of a defendant's constitutional rights normally may not be admitted in court. If the evidence is suppressed, then there may be no basis for prosecuting the defendant.

9–4a Justifiable Use of Force

Self-Defense The legally recognized privilege to do what is reasonably necessary to protect oneself, one's property, or someone else against injury by another.

Probably the best-known defense to criminal liability is self-defense. Other situations, however, also justify the use of force: the defense of one's dwelling, the defense of other property, and the prevention of a crime. In all of these situations, it is important to distinguish between deadly and nondeadly force. Deadly force is likely to result in death or serious bodily harm. Nondeadly force is force that appears reasonably necessary to prevent the imminent use of criminal force.

Generally speaking, people can use the amount of nondeadly force that seems necessary to protect themselves, their dwellings, or other property or to prevent the commission of a crime. Deadly force can be used in self-defense if the defender reasonably believes that imminent death or grievous bodily harm will otherwise result. In addition, normally the attacker must be using unlawful force, and the defender must not have initiated or provoked the attack.

Many states are expanding the situations in which the use of deadly force can be justified. Florida, for instance, allows the use of deadly force to prevent the commission of a "forcible felony," including robbery, carjacking, and sexual battery.

9–4b Necessity

Sometimes, criminal defendants are relieved of liability if they can show that a criminal act was necessary to prevent an even greater harm. Example 9.17 Trevor is a convicted felon and, as such, is legally prohibited from possessing a firearm. While he and his wife are in a convenience store, a man draws a gun, points it at the cashier, and demands all the cash. Afraid that the man will start shooting, Trevor grabs the gun and holds on to it until police arrive. In this situation, if Trevor is charged with possession of a firearm, he can assert the defense of necessity.

9–4c Insanity

A person who suffers from a mental illness may be incapable of the state of mind required to commit a crime. Thus, insanity can be a defense to a criminal charge. Note that an insanity defense does not allow a person to avoid imprisonment. It simply means that a defendant who successfully proves insanity will be placed in a mental institution.

Example 9.18 Medina Espinosa of Beaver Dam, Wisconsin, was charged with first degree murder for shooting his ex-wife fifteen times. Ten days earlier, Espinosa apparently had been accidentally exposed to harmful chemicals at the Kraft Heinz factory where he worked.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

According to Espinosa's attorney, these chemicals had caused neurological damage that left Espinosa unable to form the intent necessary to be held responsible for his ex-wife's murder. Consequently, he pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity.

Phonix_a Pk.sarote/Shutterstock.com

Suppose a defendant in a murder trial had been exposed to a chemical spill at work just before committing the alleged crime. How could the defendant's attorney use the workplace accident in the client's defense? What would the attorney have to prove?

9–4d Mistake

Everyone has heard the saying "ignorance of the law is no excuse." Ordinarily, ignorance of the law or a mistaken idea about what the law requires is not a valid defense. A mistake of fact, as opposed to a mistake of law, can excuse criminal responsibility if it negates the mental state necessary to commit a crime.

Example 9.19 If Oliver Wheaton mistakenly walks off with Julie Tyson's briefcase because he thinks it is his, there is no crime. Theft requires knowledge that the property belongs to another. (If Wheaton's act causes Tyson to incur damages, however, she may sue him in a civil action for the tort of trespass to personal property or conversion.)

9–4e Duress

Duress exists when the wrongful threat of one person induces another person to perform an act that would not otherwise have been performed. In such a situation, duress is said to negate the mental state necessary to commit a crime because the defendant was forced or compelled to commit the act.

Duress can be used as a defense to most crimes except murder. The states vary in how duress is defined and what types of crimes it can excuse, however. Generally, to successfully assert duress as a defense, the defendant must reasonably believe that an immediate danger exists, and the jury (or judge) must conclude that the defendant's belief was reasonable.

Know This

"Ignorance" is a lack of information. "Mistake" is a confusion of information, which can sometimes negate criminal intent.

Duress Unlawful pressure that causes a person to perform an act that the person would not otherwise perform.

Entrapment A defense in which a defendant claims to have been induced by a public official to commit a crime that would otherwise not have been committed.

9–4f Entrapment

Entrapment is a defense designed to prevent police officers or other government agents from enticing persons to commit crimes so that they can later be prosecuted for criminal acts. In the typical entrapment case, an undercover agent suggests that a crime be committed and pressures or induces an individual to commit it. The agent then arrests the individual for the crime.

For entrapment to succeed as a defense, both the suggestion and the inducement must take place. The defense is not intended to prevent law enforcement agents from setting a trap for an unwary criminal. Rather, its purpose is to prevent them from pushing the individual into a criminal act. The crucial issue is whether the person who committed a crime was predisposed to commit the illegal act or did so only because the agent induced it.

9–4g Statute of Limitations

With some exceptions, such as for the crime of murder, statutes of limitations apply to crimes just as they do to civil wrongs. In other words, the state must initiate criminal prosecution within a certain number of years. If a criminal action is brought after the statutory time period has expired, the accused person can raise the statute of limitations as a defense.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The running of the time period in a statute of limitations may be tolled—that is, suspended or stopped temporarily—if the defendant is a minor or is not in the jurisdiction. When the defendant reaches the age of majority or returns to the jurisdiction, the statutory time period begins to run again.

9–4h Immunity

Self-Incrimination Giving testimony in a trial or other legal proceeding that could expose the person testifying to criminal prosecution.

Accused persons are understandably reluctant to give information if it will be used to prosecute them, and they cannot be forced to do so. The privilege against self-incrimination is granted by the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The clause reads "nor shall [any person] be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

When the state wishes to obtain information from a person accused of a crime, the state can grant immunity from prosecution or agree to prosecute for a less serious offense in exchange for the information. Persons who are granted immunity can no longer refuse to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds because they now have an absolute privilege against self-incrimination.

Plea Bargaining The process by which a criminal defendant and the prosecutor work out an agreement to dispose of the criminal case, subject to court approval.

Often, a grant of immunity from prosecution for a serious crime is part of the plea bargaining between the defendant and the prosecuting attorney. The defendant may be convicted of a lesser offense, while the state uses the defendant's testimony to prosecute accomplices for serious crimes carrying heavy penalties.

9–5 Constitutional Safeguards

Focus Question 5

What constitutional safeguards exist to protect persons accused of crimes?

Criminal law brings the power of the state, with all its resources, to bear against the individual. Criminal procedures are designed to protect the constitutional rights of individuals and to prevent the arbitrary use of power by the government.

The U.S. Constitution provides specific safeguards for those accused of crimes. Most of these safeguards protect individuals not only against federal government actions but also, by virtue of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, against state government actions. These protections are set forth in the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments.

9–5a Fourth Amendment Protections

Search Warrant An order granted by a public authority, such as a judge, that authorizes law enforcement personnel to search particular premises or property.

The Fourth Amendment protects the "right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects." Before searching or seizing private property, law enforcement officers must obtain a search warrant—an order from a judge or other public official authorizing the search or seizure.

Advances in technology have allowed authorities to track phone calls and vehicle movements with greater ease and precision. The use of such technology can constitute a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Spotlight Case Example 9.20 Antoine Jones owned and operated a nightclub in the District of Columbia. Government agents suspected that he was also trafficking in narcotics. As part of their investigation, agents obtained a warrant to attach a global positioning system (GPS) device to Jones's wife's car, which he used regularly. The warrant authorized installation in the District of Columbia and within ten days, but agents installed the device on the eleventh day and in Maryland.

The agents then tracked the vehicle's movement for about a month, eventually arresting Jones for possession and intent to distribute cocaine. Jones was convicted. He appealed, arguing that the government did not have a valid warrant for the GPS tracking. The United States Supreme Court held that the attachment of a GPS tracking device to a suspect's vehicle does constitute a Fourth Amendment search. The Court did not rule on whether the search in this case was unreasonable, however, and allowed Jones's conviction to stand.[21]

21. United States v. Jones, 565 U.S. 945, 132 S.Ct. 945, 181 L.Ed.2d 911 (2012).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Probable Cause To obtain a search warrant, law enforcement officers must convince a judge that they have reasonable grounds, or probable cause, to believe a search will reveal a specific illegality. Probable cause requires the officers to have trustworthy evidence that would convince a reasonable person that the proposed search or seizure is more likely justified than not.

Probable Cause Reasonable grounds for believing that a search or seizure should be conducted.

Classic Case Example 9.21 Based on a tip that Oscar Gutierrez was involved in drug trafficking, law enforcement officers went to his home with a drug-sniffing dog. The dog alerted officers to the scent of narcotics at the home's front door. Officers knocked for fifteen minutes, but no one answered. Eventually, they entered and secured the men inside the home. They then obtained a search warrant based on the dog's positive alert. Officers found eleven pounds of methamphetamine in the search, and Gutierrez was convicted. The evidence of the drug-sniffing dog's positive alert for the presence of drugs established probable cause for the warrant.[22]

The Fourth Amendment prohibits general warrants. It requires a particular description of what is to be searched or seized. General searches through a person's belongings are not permissible. The search cannot extend beyond what is described in the warrant. Although search warrants require specificity, if a search warrant is issued for a person's residence, items in that residence may be searched even if they do not belong to that individual.

Because of the strong governmental interest in protecting the public, a warrant normally is not required for seizures of spoiled or contaminated food. Nor are warrants required for searches of businesses in such highly regulated industries as liquor, guns, and strip mining.

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy The Fourth Amendment protects only against searches that violate a person's reasonable expectation of privacy. A reasonable expectation of privacy exists if (1) the individual actually expects privacy, and (2) the person's expectation is one that society as a whole would consider legitimate.

Classic Case Example 9.22 Jenny Stracner, an investigator with the Laguna Beach (California) Police Department, enlisted the aid of a local trash collector in gathering evidence on suspect Billy Greenwood. Instead of taking Greenwood's trash bags to be incinerated, the collector agreed to give them to Strancer. The officer found enough drug paraphernalia in the garbage to obtain a warrant to search Greenwood's home, where she found illegal drugs.

The United States Supreme Court upheld the search and Greenwood's subsequent arrest. People do not, the Court reasoned, have a reasonable expectation of privacy when it comes to their garbage bags. The Court noted that when we place our trash on a curb, we expose it to any number of intrusions by "animals, children, scavengers, snoops, and other members of the public." In other words, if Greenwood had truly intended to keep the contents of his garbage private, he would not have left it on the side of the road.[23]

Paul Vasarhelyi/Shutterstock.com

Do you feel that people have a reasonable expectation of privacy when it comes to the contents of garbage bags left on a curb? Why or why not?

9–5b Fifth Amendment Protections

The Fifth Amendment offers significant protections for accused persons. One is the guarantee that no one can be deprived of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Two other important Fifth Amendment provisions protect persons against double jeopardy and self-incrimination.

22. United States v. Gutierrez, 760 F.3d 750 (7th Cir. 2014).
23. California v Greenwood, 436 U.S. 35, 108 S.Ct. 1625, 100 L.Ed.2d 30 (1988).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Due Process of Law Remember that due process of law has both procedural and substantive aspects. Procedural due process requirements underlie criminal procedures. The law must be carried out in a fair and orderly way. In criminal cases, due process means that defendants should have an opportunity to object to the charges against them before a fair, neutral decision maker, such as a judge. Defendants must also be given the opportunity to confront and cross-examine witnesses and accusers, and to present their own witnesses.

Double Jeopardy The Fifth Amendment requirement that prohibits a person from being tried twice for the same criminal offense.

Double Jeopardy The Fifth Amendment also protects persons from double jeopardy (being tried twice for the same criminal offense). The prohibition against double jeopardy means that once a criminal defendant is acquitted (found "not guilty") of a particular crime, the government may not retry that defendant for the same crime.

The prohibition against double jeopardy does not preclude the crime victim from bringing a civil suit against that same defendant to recover damages, however. In other words, a person found "not guilty" of assault and battery in a state criminal case can be sued for damages by the victim in a civil tort case. Additionally, a state's prosecution of a crime will not prevent a separate federal prosecution relating to the same activity (and vice versa), provided the activity can be classified as a different crime.

Know This

The Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination does not cover partnerships or corporations.

Self-Incrimination The Fifth Amendment grants a privilege against self-incrimination. Thus, in criminal proceedings, accused persons cannot be compelled to give testimony that might subject them to criminal prosecution.

The Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination extends only to natural persons. Because a corporation is a legal entity and not a natural person, the privilege against self-incrimination does not apply to it. Similarly, the business records of a partnership do not receive Fifth Amendment protection. When a partnership is required to produce these records, it must do so even if the information incriminates the persons who constitute the business entity.

Ethical Issue

Should police be able to force you to unlock your mobile phone? Today's cell phones can store countless pages of text, thousands of pictures, and hundreds of videos. Such data can remain on a mobile phone for years. Also, since the advent of the "cloud," much of the data viewable on a mobile phone is stored on a remote server. Should police nonetheless be able to force you to unlock your phone? Or does this practice violate the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination?

In Riley v. California,[24] the United States Supreme Court unanimously held that warrantless search and seizure of digital contents of a mobile phone during an arrest is unconstitutional. Chief Justice John Roberts stated, "The fact that technology now allows for an individual to carry [the privacies of life] in his hand does not make the information any less worthy of the protection for which the Founders fought." Nevertheless, a number of federal courts have allowed evidence obtained from cell phones to be used against a defendant even when there was no search warrant.[25]

24 573 U.S. 373, 134 S.Ct. 2473, 189 L.Ed.2d 430 (2014). See also United States v. Caballero, 178 F.Supp.3d 1008 (S.D.Cal. 2016).
25 See, for instance, Ly v. Beard, 652 Fed.Appx. 550 (9th Cir. 2016); and U.S. v. Miller, 641 Fed.Appx. 242 (4th Cir. 2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

9–5c The Exclusionary Rule

Under what is known as the exclusionary rule, any evidence obtained in violation of the constitutional rights spelled out in the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments generally is not admissible at trial. All evidence derived from the illegally obtained evidence is known as the "fruit of the poisonous tree," and normally must also be excluded from the trial proceedings. For instance, if a confession is obtained after an illegal arrest, the arrest is the "poisonous tree," and the confession, if "tainted" by the arrest, is the "fruit."

Exclusionary Rule A rule that prevents evidence that is obtained illegally or without a proper search warrant from being admissible in court.

The purpose of the exclusionary rule is to deter police from conducting warrantless searches and engaging in other misconduct. The rule can sometimes lead to injustice, however. If evidence of a defendant's guilt was obtained improperly (without a valid search warrant, for instance), it normally cannot be used against the defendant in court.

Know This

Once suspects have been informed of their rights, anything they say can be used as evidence in a trial.

9–5d The Miranda Rule

In Miranda v. Arizona, a case decided in 1966, the United States Supreme Court established the rule that individuals who are arrested must be informed of certain constitutional rights. Suspects must be informed of their Fifth Amendment right to remain silent and their Sixth Amendment right to counsel. If the arresting officers fail to inform a criminal suspect of these constitutional rights, any statements the suspect makes normally will not be admissible in court. Because of its importance in criminal procedure, the Miranda case is presented as this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature.

Although the Supreme Court's Miranda ruling was controversial, the decision has survived attempts by Congress to overrule it. Over time, however, the Supreme Court has made a number of exceptions to the Miranda ruling. For instance, the Court has recognized a "public safety" exception that allows certain statements to be admitted even if the defendant was not given Miranda warnings. A defendant's statements that reveal the location of a weapon would be admissible under this exception.

Additionally, a suspect must unequivocally and assertively ask to exercise the right to counsel in order to stop police questioning. Saying, "Maybe I should talk to a lawyer" during an interrogation after being taken into custody is not enough.

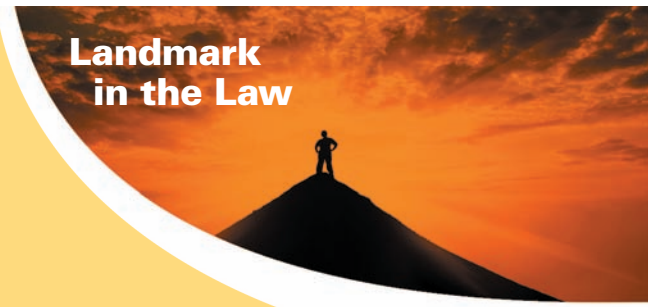
9–6 Cyber Crime

The U.S. Department of Justice broadly defines computer crime as any violation of criminal law that involves knowledge of computer technology for its perpetration, investigation, or prosecution. Many computer crimes fall under the broad label of cyber crime, which describes any criminal activity occurring in the virtual community of the Internet.

Computer Crime Any violation of criminal law that involves knowledge of computer technology for its perpetration, investigation, or prosecution.

Cyber Crime A crime that occurs in the online environment.

Most cyber crimes are simply existing crimes, such as fraud and theft of intellectual property, in which the Internet is the instrument of wrongdoing. Here, we look at several types of activities that constitute cyber crimes against persons or property.



9–6a Cyber Fraud

Fraud is any misrepresentation knowingly made with the intention of deceiving another and on which a reasonable person would and does rely to her or his detriment. Cyber fraud is fraud committed over the Internet. Scams that were once conducted solely by mail or phone can now be found online, and new technology has led to increasingly creative ways to commit fraud.

Cyber Fraud Any misrepresentation knowingly made over the Internet with the intention of deceiving another for the purpose of obtaining property or funds.

Two widely reported forms of cyber crime are advance fee fraud and online auction fraud. In the simplest form of advance fee fraud, consumers order and pay for items, such as automobiles or antiques, that are never delivered. Online auction fraud is also fairly straightforward.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Miranda v. Arizona (1966)

The United States Supreme Court's decision in Miranda v. Arizona[a] has been cited in more court decisions than any other case in the history of U.S. law. Through television shows and other media, the case has also become familiar to most of the adult population in the United States.

The case arose after Ernesto Miranda was arrested in his home on March 13, 1963, for the kidnapping and rape of an eighteen-year-old woman. Miranda was taken to a police station in Phoenix, Arizona, and questioned by two police officers. Two hours later, the officers emerged from the interrogation room with a written confession signed by Miranda.

Rulings by the Lower Courts The confession was admitted into evidence at the trial, and Miranda was convicted and sentenced to prison for twenty to thirty years. Miranda appealed his conviction, claiming that he had not been informed of his constitutional rights. He did not assert that he was innocent of the crime or that his confession was false or made under duress. He claimed only that he would not have confessed if he had been advised of his right to remain silent and to have an attorney.

The Supreme Court of Arizona held that Miranda's constitutional rights had not been violated and affirmed his conviction. In its decision, the court emphasized that Miranda had not specifically requested an attorney.

The Supreme Court's Decision The Miranda case was subsequently consolidated with three other cases involving similar issues and reviewed by the United States Supreme Court. In its decision, the Court stated that whenever an individual is taken into custody, "the following measures are required: He must be warned prior to any questioning that he has the right to remain silent, that anything he says can be used against him in a court of law, that he has the right to the presence of an attorney, and that if he cannot afford an attorney one will be appointed for him prior to any questioning if he so desires." If the accused waives the rights to remain silent and to have counsel present, the government must be able to demonstrate that the waiver was made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily.

Application to Today's World *Today, both on television and in the real world, police officers routinely advise suspects of their "*Miranda rights" on arrest. When Ernesto Miranda himself was later murdered, the suspected murderer was "read his Miranda rights." Interestingly, this decision has also had ramifications for criminal procedure in Great Britain. British police officers are required, when making arrests, to inform suspects, "You do not have to say anything. But if you do not mention now something which you later use in your defense, the court may decide that your failure to mention it now strengthens the case against you. A record will be made of everything you say, and it may be given in evidence if you are brought to trial."

a. 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966).

A person lists an expensive item for auction, on either a legitimate or a fake auction site, and then refuses to send the product after receiving payment. Or, as a variation, the wrongdoer may send the purchaser an item that is worth less than the one offered in the auction.

The larger online auction sites, such as eBay, try to protect consumers against such schemes by providing warnings or offering various forms of insurance. Nonetheless, it is nearly impossible to completely eliminate online fraud potential because users can assume multiple identities.

Case Example 9.23 A group of Romanians were arrested and brought to the United States to face charges for allegedly stealing millions of dollars from American victims on sites such as eBay, Craigslist, and Amazon. According to the federal government, one of the suspects, Ionut Ciobanu, created a fake Facebook profile calling himself Sgt. Judith Lane of the U.S. Air Force, a ruse designed to reassure potential purchasers of the nonexistent automobiles he was selling online.[26]

26. United States v. Andrei-Catlin Stoica, et al., E. D. Kentucky (2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

9–6b Cyber Identity Theft

In cyberspace, thieves are not subject to the physical limitations of the "real" world. A thief can steal data stored in a networked computer with Internet access from anywhere on the globe. Only the speed of the connection and the thief's computer equipment limit the quantity of data that can be stolen.

Identity Theft Identity theft occurs when the wrongdoer steals a form of identification—such as a name, date of birth, or Social Security number—and uses the information to access and steal the victim's financial resources. Widespread use of the Internet has caused a marked increase in identity theft, and many millions of Americans have been victimized.

Identity Theft The illegal use of someone else's personal information to access the victim's financial resources.

Focus Question 6

How has the Internet expanded opportunities for identity theft?

The Internet has provided relatively easy access to private data. Frequent Web surfers and social media users surrender a wealth of personal information. Websites use so-called "cookies" to collect data on their customers and visitors. Often, sites store information such as names, e-mail addresses, and credit card numbers. Identity thieves may be able to steal this information by fooling a website into thinking that they are the true account holders. Identity thieves may also be able to use personal information that people disclose on social media sites (such as birthdays, children's names, hometowns, employers) to gain access to financial information.

Stolen Credit Card Numbers. More than half of identity thefts involve the misappropriation of credit card accounts. In most situations, the legitimate holders of credit cards are not held responsible for the costs of purchases made with a stolen number. The loss is borne by the businesses and banks.

Example 9.24 The Northeast convenience store chain Wawa announced that a security breach in its computer system had allowed cyberthieves to obtain some of the company's stored credit card payment data. Two months later, someone going by the name of Joker Stash started posting these data for sale on the dark web, asking about $17 apiece for the credit card numbers of about 30 million Wawa customers.

Card Testing Online markets are particularly attractive for credit card thieves because the thieves can engage in a practice called "card testing." This involves using a stolen credit card number, or thousands of stolen credit card numbers, to make very small online purchases, perhaps no larger than two dollars. If the fraudulent transaction is successful, the criminal will raise the amount of the purchases until the issuing financial institution or the real owner notices. This chapter's Cybersecurity and the Law feature explores another tactic designed to "cash in" stolen credit card numbers online.

Password Theft The more personal information a cyber criminal obtains, the easier it is to find a victim's online user name at a particular website. Once the online user name has been compromised, it is easier to steal the victim's password, which is often the last line of defense in protecting financial information.

Numerous software programs aid identity thieves in illegally obtaining passwords. A technique called keystroke logging, for instance, relies on software that embeds itself in a victim's computer and records every keystroke made on that computer. User names and passwords are then recorded and sold to the highest bidder. Internet users should also be wary of any links contained within e-mails sent from unknown sources. These links can sometimes be used to illegally obtain personal information.

Phishing In a distinct form of identity theft known as phishing, the perpetrator "fishes" for financial data and passwords from consumers by posing as a legitimate business such as a bank or credit card company. The "phisher" may send an e-mail asking the recipient to "update" or "confirm" vital information. Often, the e-mail includes a threat that an account or some other service will be discontinued if the information is not provided. Once the Phishing A form of identity theft in which the perpetrator sends e-mails purporting to be from a legitimate business to induce recipients to reveal their personal financial data, passwords, or other information.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Counter-Strike: Global Offensive

The online video game Counter-Strike: Global Offensive (CS:GO) involves two teams, each attempting to eliminate the other while carrying out objectives such as planting bombs or protecting hostages. CS:GO gamers, who number at around 20 million, also try to gain "loot boxes" that allow them to upgrade their avatars or weapons. Initially, the only way to open a loot box was to purchase a "container key" from Valve Corporation, which sells and operates CS:GO. Eventually, however, it became possible to trade loot boxes and container keys for "real" money on various Internet marketplaces.

The problem with this system became clear when Valve suspended all trading of container keys between players. Such activity, the company announced, had become "fraud sourced." In other words, the trading of container keys was being used to launder income from credit card fraud. Valve's actions highlight the opportunities presented to cyber criminals by online gaming markets. Cybercriminals can use their illicit earnings or stolen credit card numbers to buy virtual items and then sell those items—often at a discounted price—to other gamers in exchange for real money.

The Displacement Effect

According to "the displacement effect," as some parts of an economy become more highly regulated, tainted funds move to the less regulated parts of the economy. Under federal banking laws, only "convertible virtual currency" (CVC) is subject to regulation designed to combat money laundering. To fall under the definition of a CVC, the virtual currency must have a value in real currency or act as a substitute for real currency.[a] This definition does not cover CS:GO's container keys or, to give another example, the online survival contest Fortnite's V-bucks. Consequently, these online video games will continue to attract some players who are laundering money.

a. 31 U.S.C. Section 5330.

Critical Thinking

One suggestion for alleviating the problem of "fraud sourced" money is to require proof of identity from anyone who wants to trade virtual items on online gaming platforms. Do you think this strategy would be successful? Why or why not?

unsuspecting individual enters the information, the phisher can sell it or use it to masquerade as that person or to drain that person's bank or credit account.

Phishing scams have also spread to social networking sites and text messages. (Phishing via text messages is known as "smishing," because text messages use the Short Message Service, or SMS, format.) Example 9.25 Customers of FedEx received an official-looking text informing them that they needed to set up delivery preferences for a package. The text included a link that, if clicked, took potential victims to a purported Amazon.com website promising them a reward if they filled out a customer satisfaction survey. To claim the reward, they had to provide their home address and a credit card number for shipping and handling. The FedEx texts and Amazon websites were fake. People who did provide their personal data, besides becoming susceptible to identify theft, were unwittingly signing up to pay $98.95 a month for additional nonexistent "rewards" in the future. ■

9–6c Hacking

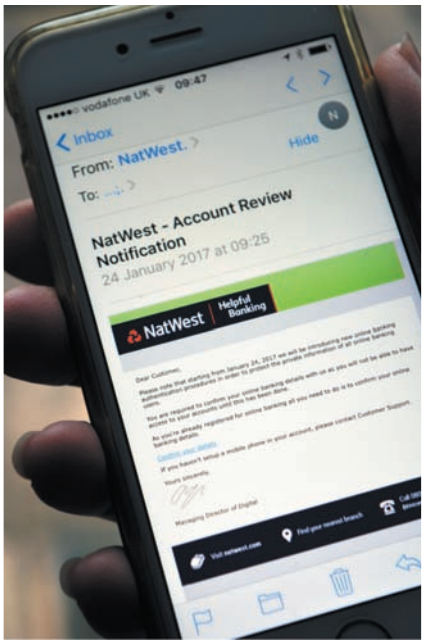
Hacker A person who uses computers to gain unauthorized access to data.

Botnets Networks of compromised computers connected to the Internet that can be used to generate spam, relay viruses, or cause servers to fail.

A hacker is someone who uses one computer, smartphone, or other device to break into another. The danger posed by hackers has increased significantly because of botnets, or networks of computers that have been appropriated by hackers without the knowledge of their owners. A hacker may secretly install a program on thousands, if not millions, of personal computer "robots," or "bots."

Example 9.26 After Apple, Inc., introduced its mobile-payment system, cyber thieves began hacking into Apple mobile devices to make purchases with stolen credit card numbers. At about the same time, cyber criminals were stealing the credit card data of at least 60 million Home Depot customers and illegally accessing the financial information of 76 million

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.



JPMorgan Chase clients. Hackers have also demonstrated that they can take over the dashboard computer systems that control cars. Additionally, the risk of takeover extends to numerous wireless-enabled medical devices, such as pacemakers and insulin pumps.

Malware Botnets are one form of malware, a term that refers to any program that is harmful to a computer or, by extension, its user. One type of malware is a worm—a software program that is capable of reproducing itself as it spreads from one computer to the next. The Conficker worm, for instance, spread to more than a million personal computers around the world within a three-week period. It was transmitted to some computers through the use of Facebook and Twitter.

A virus, another form of malware, is also able to reproduce itself but must be attached to an "infested" host file to travel from one computer network to another. For instance, hackers can corrupt banner ads that use Adobe's Flash Player or send bogus Flash Player updates. When an Internet user clicks on the banner ad or installs the update, a virus is installed. Worms and viruses can be programmed to perform a number of functions, such as prompting host computers to continually "crash" and reboot, or to otherwise infect the system.

Service-Based Hacking Today, many companies offer "software as a service." Instead of buying software to install on a computer, the user connects to Web-based software. The user can then write e-mails, edit spreadsheets, and the like using a Web browser.

Cyber criminals have adapted this method and now offer "crimeware as a service." Would-be thieves no longer have to be computer hackers to create botnets or steal banking information and credit card numbers. They can rent the online services of cyber criminals to do the work for a small price. The thieves can even target individual groups, such as U.S. physicians or British attorneys.

Josie Elias/Alamy

Hackers can potentially take over automobile computer systems. What other everyday products and services are susceptible to hacking?

9–6d Cyberterrorism

Cyberterrorists use technology and the Internet to cause fear, violence, or extreme financial harm. Cyberterrorists, as well as hackers, may target businesses. The goals of a hacking operation might include a wholesale theft of data, such as a merchant's customer files, or the monitoring of a computer to discover a business firm's plans and transactions. A cyberterrorist might also insert false codes or data into a computer. For instance, the processing control system of a food manufacturer could be changed to alter the levels of ingredients so that consumers of the food would become ill.

A cyberterrorist attack on a major financial institution, such as the New York Stock Exchange or a large bank, could leave securities or money markets in flux. Such an attack could seriously affect the daily lives of U.S. citizens, business operations, and national security.

9–6e Prosecution of Cyber Crime

Cyber crime has raised new issues in the investigation of crimes and the prosecution of offenders. Determining the "location" of a cyber crime and identifying a criminal in cyberspace are two significant challenges for law enforcement.

Jurisdiction and Identification Challenges A threshold issue is, of course, jurisdiction. Jurisdiction is normally based on physical geography, and each state and nation has jurisdiction over crimes committed within its boundaries. But geographic boundaries simply do not apply in cyberspace. A person who commits an act against a business in California, where the act is a cyber crime, might never have set foot in California but might instead reside in, say, Canada, where the act may not be a crime.

Malware Malicious software programs, such as viruses and worms, that are designed to cause harm to a computer, network, or other device.

Worm A software program that automatically replicates itself over a network but does not alter files and is usually invisible to the user until it has consumed system resources.

Virus A software program that can replicate itself over a network and spread from one device to another, altering files and interfering with normal operations.

Cyberterrorists Criminals who use technology and the Internet to cause fear, violence, and extreme financial harm.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Identifying the wrongdoer can also be difficult. Cyber criminals do not leave physical traces, such as fingerprints or DNA samples, as evidence of their crimes. Even electronic "footprints" (digital evidence) can be hard to find and follow. For instance, cyber criminals may employ software, such as Tor, to mask their IP addresses—codes that identify individual computers on the Internet—and the IP addresses of those with whom they communicate. Law enforcement must hire computer forensic experts to bypass the software and track down the criminals. For these reasons, laws written to protect physical property are often difficult to apply in cyberspace.

The Computer Fraud and Abuse Act Perhaps the most significant federal statute specifically addressing cyber crime is the Counterfeit Access Device and Computer Fraud and Abuse Act.[27] This act is commonly known as the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, or CFAA.

Among other things, the CFAA provides that a person who accesses a computer online, without authority, to obtain classified, restricted, or protected data (or attempts to do so) is subject to criminal prosecution. Such data could include financial and credit records, medical records, legal files, military and national security files, and other confidential information. The data can be located in government or private computers. The crime has two elements: accessing a computer without authority and taking the data.

This theft is a felony if it is committed for a commercial purpose or for private financial gain, or if the value of the stolen information exceeds $5,000. Penalties include fines and imprisonment for up to twenty years. A victim of computer theft can also bring a civil suit against the violator to obtain damages, an injunction, and other relief.

27. 18 U.S.C. Section 1030.

Practice and Review

Edward Hanousek worked for Pacific & Arctic Railway and Navigation Company (P&A) as a roadmaster of the White Pass & Yukon Railroad in Alaska. As an officer of the corporation, Hanousek was responsible "for every detail of the safe and efficient maintenance and construction of track, structures, and marine facilities of the entire railroad," including special projects. One project was a rock quarry, known as "6-mile," above the Skagway River. Next to the quarry, and just beneath the surface, ran a high-pressure oil pipeline owned by Pacific & Arctic Pipeline, Inc., P&A's sister company. When the quarry's backhoe operator punctured the pipeline, an estimated one thousand to five thousand gallons of oil were discharged into the river. Hanousek was charged with negligently discharging a harmful quantity of oil into a navigable water of the United States in violation of the criminal provisions of the Clean Water Act (CWA). Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Hanousek have the required mental state (mens rea) to be convicted of a crime? Why or why not?
2. Which theory discussed in the chapter would enable a court to hold Hanousek criminally liable for violating the statute regardless of whether he participated in, directed, or even knew about the specific violation?
3. Could the backhoe operator who punctured the pipeline also be charged with a crime in this situation? Explain.
4. Suppose that, at trial, Hanousek argued that he could not be convicted because he was not aware of the requirements of the CWA. Would this defense be successful? Why or why not?

Debate This

Because of overcriminalization, particularly by the federal government, Americans may be breaking the law regularly without knowing it. Should Congress rescind many of the more than four thousand federal crimes now on the books?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

actus reus 217
arson 223
beyond a reasonable doubt 215 botnets 236 burglary 222 computer crime 234 crime 214
cyber crime 234 cyber fraud 234
cyberterrorist 237 double jeopardy 232 duress 229
embezzlement 224 entrapment 229
exclusionary rule 233 felony 216 forgery 223 hacker 236
identity theft 235 insider trading 226 larceny 222 malware 237 mens rea 218 misdemeanor 217 money laundering 227 petty offense 217 phishing 236
plea bargaining 230 probable cause 231 robbery 222 search warrant 230
self-defense 228
self-incrimination 230 virus 237
white-collar crime 223
worm 237

Chapter Summary: Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

Civil Law and Criminal Law	1. Civil law—Pertains to the duties that exist between persons or between persons and their governments, excluding the duty not to commit crimes. 2. Criminal law—Has to do with crimes, which are wrongs against society proclaimed in statutes and, if committed, punishable by society through fines and/or imprisonment—or in some cases, death. Because crimes are offenses against society as a whole, they are prosecuted by a public official, not by the victims. 3. Key differences—An important difference between civil and criminal law is that the standard of proof is higher in criminal cases. 4. Civil liability for criminal acts—A criminal act may give rise to both criminal liability and tort liability. 5. Classification of crimes—Crimes may also be classified according to their degree of seriousness. Felonies are serious crimes usually punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than one year. Misdemeanors are less serious crimes punishable by fines or by confinement for up to one year.
Criminal Liability	1. Guilty act—In general, some form of harmful act to a person or property must be committed for a crime to exist. 2. State of mind—An intent to commit a crime, or a wrongful mental state, is also required for a crime to exist. 3. Corporate criminal liability—Corporations are normally liable for crimes committed by their agents or employees within the course and scope of their employment.
Types of Crimes	1. Violent crimes—Crimes that cause others to suffer harm or death, including murder, assault and battery, sexual assault, and robbery. 2. Property crimes—The most common form of crime. The offender's goal is to obtain some economic gain or to damage property. This category includes burglary, larceny, obtaining goods by false pretenses, receiving stolen property, arson, and forgery. 3. Public order crimes—Acts, such as public drunkenness, prostitution, gambling, and illegal drug use, that a statute has established are contrary to public values and morals. 4. White-collar crimes—Illegal acts committed by a person or business using nonviolent means to obtain a personal or business advantage. Usually, such crimes are committed in the course of a legitimate occupation. Examples include embezzlement, mail and wire fraud, bribery, bankruptcy fraud, theft of trade secrets, and insider trading. 5. Organized crime—A form of crime conducted by groups operating illegitimately to satisfy the public's demand for illegal goods and services (such as illegal drugs, gambling, and prostitution). Organized crime is heavily involved in cyber crime, money laundering, and racketeering (RICO) violations.
Defenses to Criminal Liability	Defenses to criminal liability include justifiable use of force, necessity, insanity, mistake, duress, entrapment, and the statute of limitations. In some cases, defendants may be relieved of criminal liability, at least in part, if they are given immunity.
Constitutional Safeguards	1. Fourth Amendment—Provides protection against unreasonable searches and seizures and requires that probable cause exist before a warrant for a search or seizure can be issued. 2. Fifth Amendment—Requires due process of law, prohibits double jeopardy, and protects against self-incrimination. 3. Exclusionary rule—A criminal procedural rule that prohibits the introduction at trial of all evidence obtained illegally or without a proper search warrant. 4. Miranda* rule—A rule set forth by the Supreme Court in Miranda v. Arizona holding that individuals who are arrested must be informed of certain constitutional rights, including their right to counsel.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Cyber Crime
	1. Cyber fraud—Misrepresentations are knowingly made over the Internet to deceive another. Two widely reported forms are online auction fraud and advance fee fraud. 2. Cyber identity theft—In cyberspace, identity theft is made easier by the fact that many e-businesses store information such as consumers' names, e-mail addresses, and credit card numbers. Password theft and phishing are variations of cyber identity theft. 3. Hacking—A hacker is a person who uses one computer to break into another. Malware is any program that is harmful to a computer or, by extension, a computer user. Worms and viruses are examples. 4. Cyberterrorism—A cyberterrorist attack on a major U.S. financial institution or telecommunications system could have serious repercussions, including jeopardizing national security. 5. Prosecution of cyber crime—Prosecuting cyber crime is more difficult than prosecuting traditional crime. Identifying the wrongdoer is complicated, and jurisdictional issues may arise. A significant federal statute addressing cyber crime is the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act.

Issue Spotters

1. Dana takes her roommate's credit card, intending to charge expenses that she incurs on a vacation. Her first stop is a gas station, where she uses the card to pay for gas. With respect to the gas station, has she committed a crime? If so, what is it? (See Types of Crimes.)
2. Without permission, Ben downloads consumer credit files from a computer belonging to Consumer Credit Agency. He then sells the data to Dawn. Has Ben committed a crime? If so, what is it? (See Cyber Crime.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

9–1. Types of Cyber Crimes. The following situations are similar, but each represents a variation of a particular crime. Identify the crime and point out the differences in the variations. (See Cyber Crime.)

1. Chen, posing fraudulently as Diamond Credit Card Co., sends an e-mail to Emily, stating that the company has observed suspicious activity in her account and has frozen the account. The e-mail asks her to reregister her credit card number and password to reopen the account.
2. Claiming falsely to be Big Buy Retail Finance Co., Conner sends an e-mail to Dino, asking him to confirm or update his personal security information to prevent his Big Buy account from being discontinued.

9–2. Cyber Scam. Kayla, a student at Learnwell University, owes $20,000 in unpaid tuition. If Kayla does not pay the tuition, Learnwell will not allow her to graduate. To obtain the funds to pay the debt, she sends e-mails to people that she does not know asking them for financial help to send her child, who has a disability, to a special school. In reality, Kayla has no children. Is this a crime? If so, which one? (See Cyber Crime.)

9–3. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—White-Collar Crime. Matthew Simpson and others created and operated a series of corporate entities to defraud telecommunications companies, creditors, credit reporting agencies, and others. Through these entities, Simpson and his confederates used routing codes and spoofing services to make long-distance calls appear to be local. They stole other firms' network capacity and diverted payments to themselves. They leased goods and services without paying for them. To hide their association with their corporate entities and with each other, they used false identities, addresses, and credit histories, and issued false bills, invoices, financial statements, and credit references. Did these acts constitute mail and wire fraud? Discuss. [United States v. Simpson, 741 F.3d 539 (5th Cir. 2014)] (See Types of Crimes.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 9–3, go to Appendix E.

9–4. Defenses to Criminal Liability. George Castro told Ambrosio Medrano that a bribe to a certain corrupt Los Angeles County official would buy a contract with the county hospitals. To share in the deal, Medrano recruited Gustavo Buenrostro. In turn, Buenrostro contacted his friend James Barta, the owner of Sav–Rx, which provides prescription benefit management services. Barta was asked to pay a "finder's fee" to Castro. He did not pay, even after frequent e-mails and calls with deadlines and ultimatums delivered over a period of months. Eventually, Barta wrote Castro a Sav–Rx check for $6,500, saying that it was to help his friend Buenrostro. Castro was an FBI agent, and the county official and contract were fictional. Barta was charged with conspiracy to commit bribery. At trial, the government conceded that Barta was not predisposed to commit the crime. Could he be absolved of the charge on a defense of entrapment? Explain. [United States v. Barta, 776 F.3d 931 (7th Cir. 2015)] (See Defenses to Criminal Liability.)

9–5. Fourth Amendment Protections. Federal officers obtained a warrant to arrest Kateena Norman on charges of credit card fraud and identity theft. Evidence of the crime included videos, photos, and a fingerprint on a fraudulent check. A previous search of Norman's house had uncovered credit cards, new merchandise, and identifying information for other persons. An Internet account registered to the address had been used to apply for fraudulent credit cards, and a fraudulently obtained rental car was parked on the property. As the officers arrested Norman outside her house, they saw another woman and a caged pit bull inside. They further believed that Norman's boyfriend, who had a criminal record and was also suspected of identify theft, could be there. In less than a minute, the officers searched only those areas within the house in which a person could hide. Would it be reasonable to admit evidence revealed in this "protective sweep" during Norman's trial on the arrest charges? Discuss. [United States v. Norman, 637 Fed. Appx. 934 (11th Cir. 2016)] (See Constitutional Safeguards.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

9–6. Types of Crimes. In Texas, Chigger Ridge Ranch, L.P., operated a 700-acre commercial hunting area called Coyote Crossing Ranch (CCR). Chigger Ridge leased CCR and its assets for twelve months to George Briscoe's company, VPW Management, LLC. The lease identified all of the vehicles and equipment that belonged to Chigger Ridge, which VPW could use in the course of business, but the lease did not convey any ownership interest. During the lease term, however, Briscoe told his employees to sell some of the vehicles and equipment. Briscoe did nothing to correct the buyers' false impression that he owned the property and was authorized to sell it. The buyers paid with checks, which were deposited into an account to which only Briscoe and his spouse had access. Which crime, if any, did Briscoe commit? Explain. [Briscoe v. State of Texas, 2018 WL 792255 (Tex.App.—Texarkana 2018)] (See Types of Crimes.)

9–7. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Identity Theft. Heesham Broussard obtained counterfeit money instruments. To distribute them, he used account information and numbers on compromised FedEx accounts procured from hackers. Text messages from Broussard indicated that he had participated previously in a similar scam and that he knew the packages would be delivered only if the FedEx accounts were "good." For his use of the accounts, Broussard was charged with identity theft. In defense, he argued that the government could not prove he knew the misappropriated accounts belonged to real persons or businesses. [United States v. Broussard, 675 Fed.Appx. 454 (5th Cir. 2017)] (See Cyber Crime.)

1. Does the evidence support Broussard's assertion? From an ethical perspective, does it matter whether he knew that the accounts belonged to real customers? Why or why not?
2. Assuming that FedEx knew its customers' account information had been compromised, use the IDDR approach to consider whether the company had an ethical obligation to take steps to protect those customers from theft.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

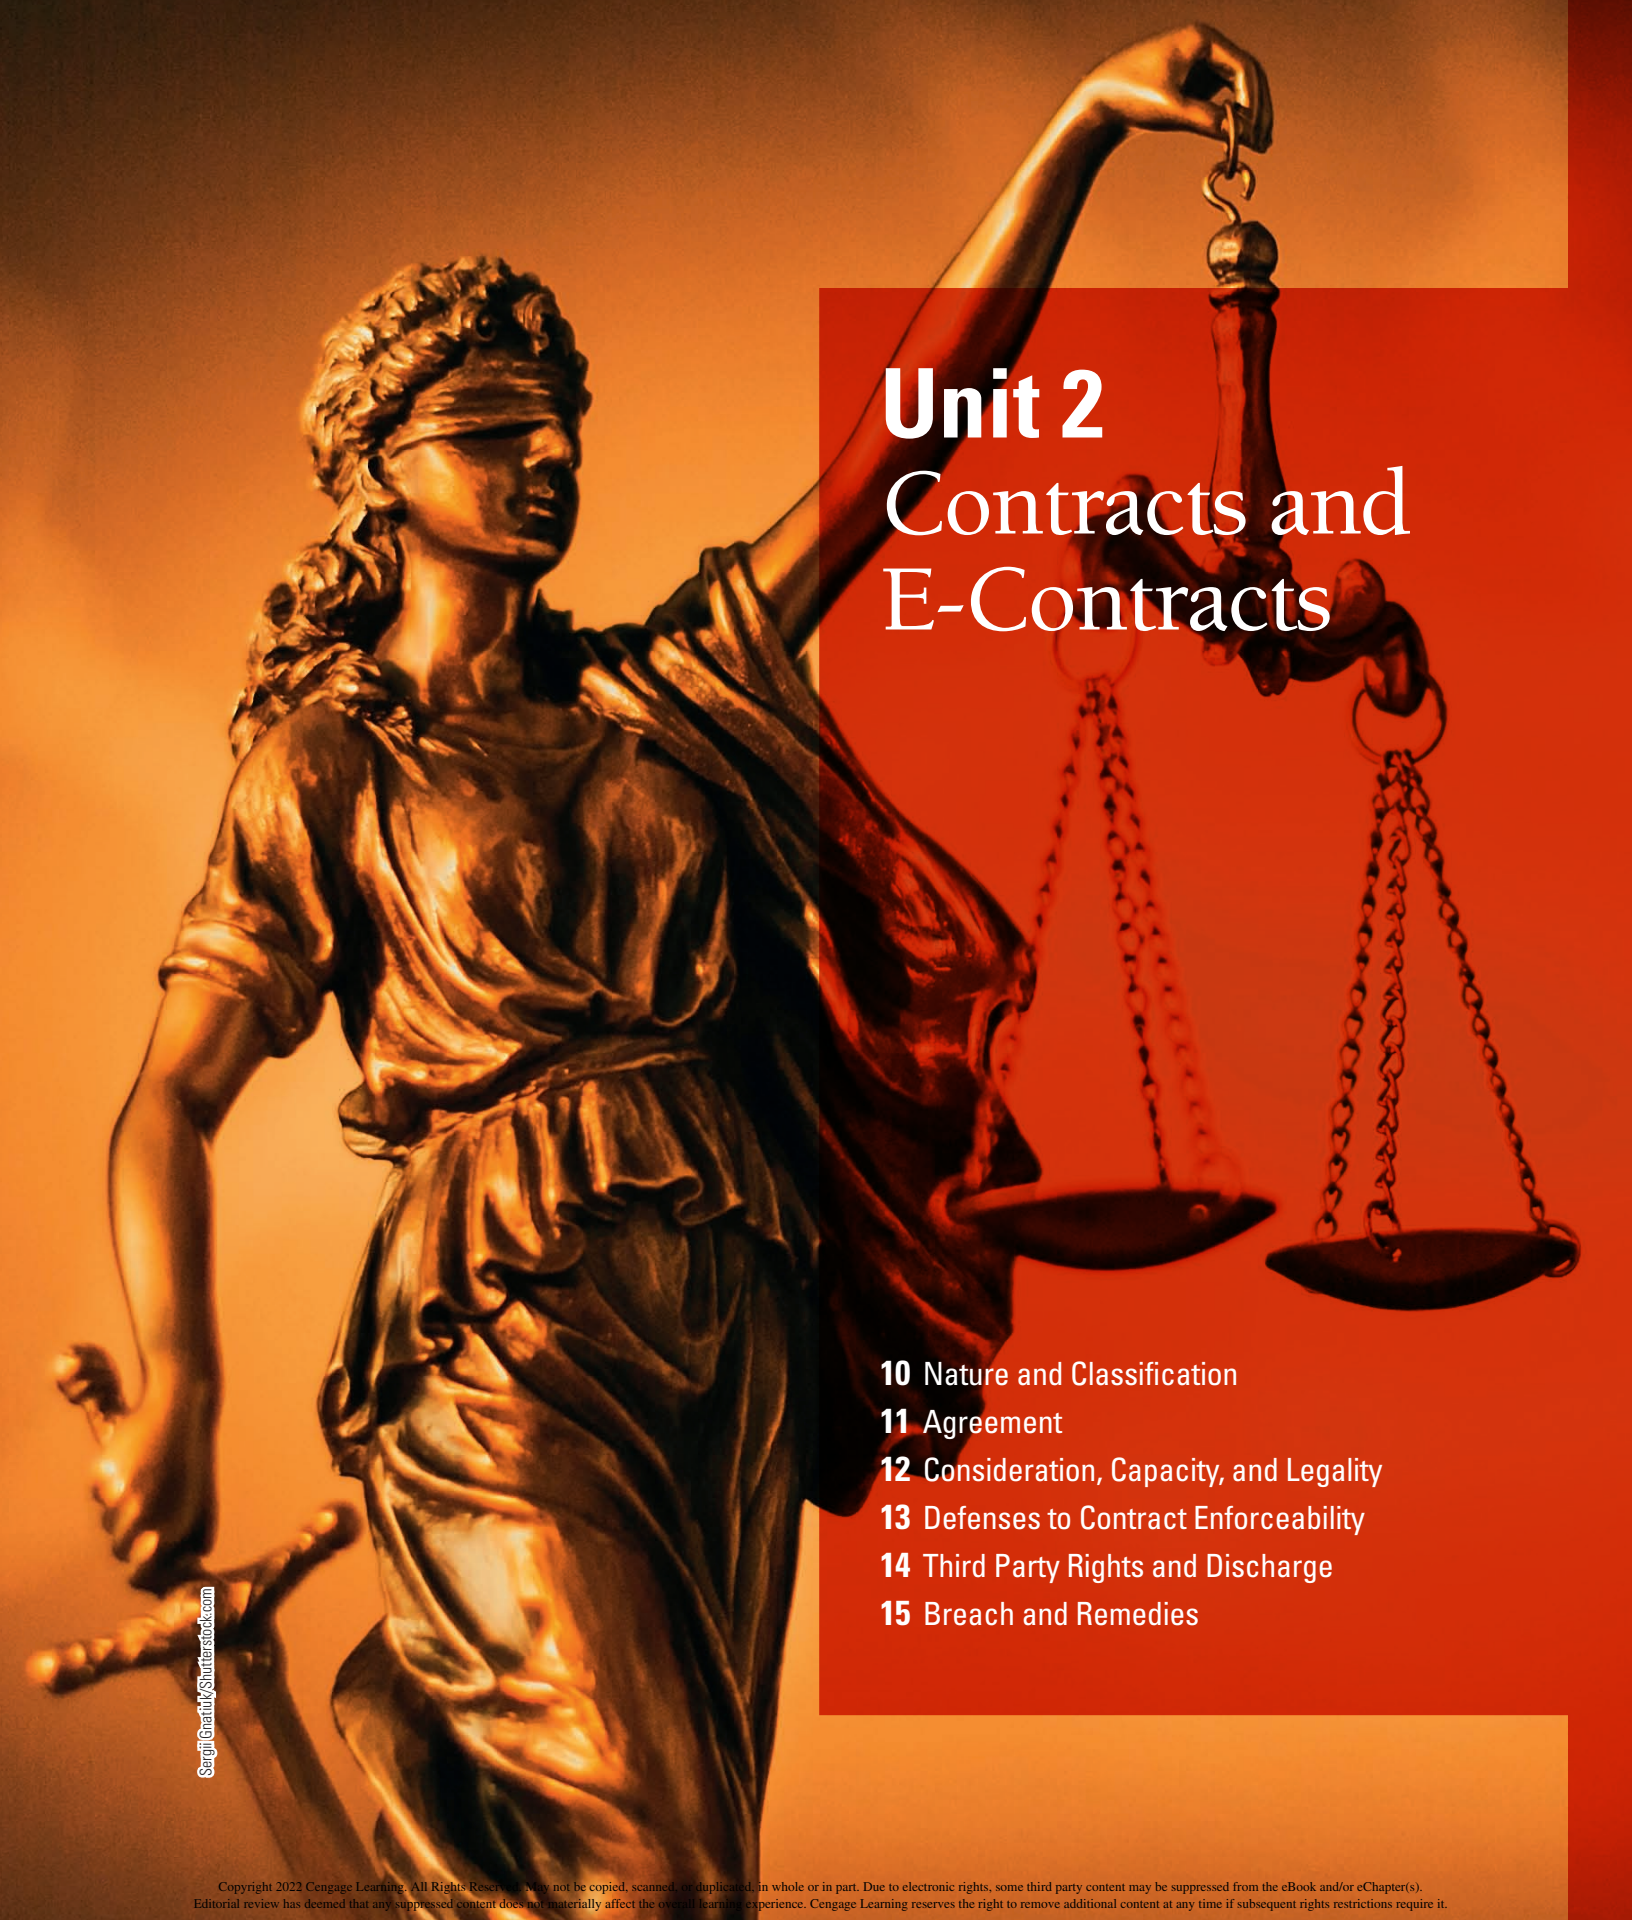
9–8. Critical Legal Thinking. Ray steals a purse from an unattended car at a gas station. Because the purse contains money and a handgun, Ray is convicted of grand theft of property (cash) and grand theft of a firearm. On appeal, Ray claims that he is not guilty of grand theft of a firearm because he did not know that the purse contained a gun. Can Ray be convicted of grand theft of a firearm even though he did not know that the gun was in the purse? Explain. (See Types of Crimes.)

9–9. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Cyber Crime. Cyber crime costs consumers millions of dollars every year. It costs businesses, including banks and other credit card issuers, even more. Nonetheless, when cyber criminals are caught and convicted, they are rarely ordered to pay restitution or sentenced to long prison terms. (See Cyber Crime.)

1. One group should formulate an argument that stiffer sentences would reduce the amount of cyber crime.
2. A second group should determine how businesspersons can best protect themselves from cyber crime and avoid the associated costs.
3. A third group should decide how and when a court should order cyber criminals to pay restitution to their victims. Should victims whose computers have been infected with worms or viruses be entitled to restitution, or only victims of theft who have experienced financial loss? What should the measure of restitution be? Should large companies that are victims of cyber crime be entitled to the same restitution as individuals?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unit One—Task-Based Simulation



iStockPhoto.com/lisafx

CompTac, Inc., which is headquartered in San Francisco, California, is one of the leading software manufacturers in the United States. The company invests millions of dollars to research and develop new software applications and computer games that are sold worldwide. It also has a large service department and takes great pains to offer its customers excellent support services.

1. Jurisdiction. CompTac routinely purchases some of the materials necessary to produce its computer games from a New York firm, Electrotex, Inc. A dispute arises between the two firms, and CompTac wants to sue Electrotex for breach of contract. Can CompTac bring the suit in a California state court? Can CompTac bring the suit in a federal court? Explain.
2. Negligence. A customer at one of CompTac's retail stores stumbles over a crate in the parking lot and breaks her leg. Just moments earlier, the crate had fallen off a CompTac truck that was delivering goods from a CompTac warehouse to the store. The customer sues CompTac, alleging negligence. Will she succeed in her suit? Why or why not?
3. Wrongful Interference. Roban Electronics, a software manufacturer and one of CompTac's major competitors, has been trying to convince one of CompTac's key employees, Jim Baxter, to come to work for Roban. Roban knows that Baxter has a written employment contract with CompTac, which Baxter would breach if he left CompTac before the contract expired. Baxter goes to work for Roban, and the departure of its key employee causes CompTac to suffer substantial losses due to delays in completing new software. Can CompTac sue Roban to recoup some of these losses? If so, on what ground?
4. Cyber Crime. One of CompTac's employees in its accounting division, Alan Green, has a gambling problem. To repay a gambling debt of $10,000, Green decides to "borrow" from CompTac to cover the debt. Using his knowledge of Comp-Tac account numbers, Green electronically transfers $10,000 from a CompTac account into his personal checking account. A week later, he is luckier at gambling and uses the same electronic procedures to transfer funds from his personal checking account back to the CompTac account. Has Green committed any crimes? If so, what are they?
5. Ethical Decision Making. One of CompTac's best-selling products is a computer game that includes some extremely violent actions. Groups of parents, educators, and consumer activists have bombarded CompTac with letters and e-mail messages calling on the company to stop selling the product. CompTac executives are concerned about the public outcry, but at the same time, they realize that the game is CompTac's major source of profits. If it ceased marketing the game, the company could go bankrupt. If you were a CompTac decision maker, what would your decision be in this situation? How would you justify your decision from an ethical perspective?
6. Intellectual Property. CompTac wants to sell one of its best-selling software programs to An Phat Company, a firm located in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam. CompTac is concerned, however, that after an initial purchase, An Phat will duplicate the software without permission (and in violation of U.S. copyright laws) and sell the illegal bootleg software to other firms in Vietnam. How can CompTac protect its software from being pirated by An Phat Company?
7. Social Media. CompTac seeks to hire fourteen new employees. Its human resources (HR) department asks all candidates during their interview to disclose their social media passwords so that the company can access their social media accounts. Is it legal for employers to ask prospective employees for their social media passwords? Explain. If CompTac does not ask for passwords, can it legally look at a person's online posts when evaluating whether to hire or fire the person?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unit 2
Contracts and E-Contracts

10 Nature and Classification
11 Agreement
12 Consideration, Capacity, and Legality
13 Defenses to Contract Enforceability
14 Third Party Rights and Discharge
15 Breach and Remedies

Sergii Gnatiuk/Shutterstock.com

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

10 Nature and Classification

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is the objective theory of contracts?
2. What are the four basic elements necessary to the formation of a valid contract?
3. What is the difference between express and implied contracts?
4. When will a court impose a quasi contract?
5. What rules guide the courts in interpreting contracts?

Promise A declaration that binds the person who makes it (the promisor) to do or not to do a certain act.

Promisor A person who makes a promise.

Promisee A person to whom a promise is made.

"All sensible people are selfish, and nature is tugging at every contract to make the terms of it fair."

Ralph Waldo Emerson
1803–1882 (American poet)

As Ralph Waldo Emerson observed in the chapter-opening quotation, people tend to act in their own self-interest, and this influences the terms they seek in their contracts. Contract law must therefore provide rules to determine which contract terms will be enforced.

A contract is based on a promise—a declaration by a person (the promisor) that binds the person to do or not to do a certain act. As a result, the person to whom the promise is made (the promisee) has a right to expect or demand that something either will or will not happen in the future.

Like other types of law, contract law reflects our social values, interests, and expectations at a given point in time. It shows what kinds of promises our society thinks should be legally binding. For instance, licensing agreements that a person clicks on to download software on a smartphone are promises that should be legally binding. If Alicia agrees to Snapchat's terms of service but then reverse-engineers Snapchat's software to create competing software, she has breached her contract with Snapchat. Contract law also distinguishes between promises that create only moral obligations (such as a promise to take a friend to lunch) and promises that are legally binding (such as a promise to pay for items ordered online).

10–1 An Overview of Contract Law

Before we look at the numerous rules that courts use to determine whether a particular promise will be enforced, it is necessary to understand some fundamental concepts of contract law. In this section, we describe the sources and general function of contract law and introduce the objective theory of contracts.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

10–1a Sources of Contract Law

The common law governs all contracts except when it has been modified or replaced by statutory law, such as the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), or by administrative agency regulations. Contracts relating to services, real estate, employment, and insurance, for instance, generally are governed by the common law of contracts. Contracts for the sale and lease of goods, however, are governed by the UCC to the extent that the UCC has modified general contract law.

fstop123/E+/Getty Images

House purchases always are completed with explicit contracts. Why?

10–1b The Function of Contracts

No aspect of modern life is entirely free of contractual relationships. You acquire rights and obligations, for instance, when you borrow funds, buy or lease a house, obtain insurance, form a business, or purchase goods or services. Contract law is designed to provide stability and predictability, as well as certainty, for both buyers and sellers in the marketplace.

Contract law assures the parties to private agreements that the promises they make will be enforceable. Clearly, many promises are kept because the parties involved feel a moral obligation to keep them or because keeping a promise is in their mutual self-interest. Nevertheless, in business agreements, the rules of contract law are often followed to avoid potential disputes.

By supplying procedures for enforcing private agreements, contract law provides an essential condition for the existence of a market economy. Without a legal framework of reasonably assured expectations within which to make long-run plans, businesspersons would be able to rely only on the good faith of others. Duty and good faith are usually sufficient to obtain compliance with a promise. When price changes or adverse economic factors make contract compliance costly, however, these elements may not be enough. Contract law is necessary to ensure compliance with a promise or to entitle the innocent party to some form of relief.

10–1c The Definition of a Contract

A contract is an agreement that can be enforced in court. It is formed by two or more parties who agree to perform or to refrain from performing some act now or in the future.

Contract A set of promises constituting an agreement between parties, giving each a legal duty to the other and the right to seek a remedy for the breach of the promises or duties.

Generally, contract disputes arise when there is a promise of future performance. If the contractual promise is not fulfilled, the party who made it is subject to the sanctions of a court. That party may be required to pay damages for failing to perform the contractual promise. In a few instances, the party may be required to perform the promised act.

10–1d The Objective Theory of Contracts

In determining whether a contract has been formed, the element of intent is of prime importance. In contract law, intent is determined by what is referred to as the objective theory of contracts. Under this theory, a party's intention to enter into a contract is judged by outward, objective facts as interpreted by a reasonable person, rather than by the party's secret, subjective intentions. Objective facts may include:

Objective Theory of Contracts The view that contracting parties shall be bound only by terms that can be objectively inferred from promises made.

1. What the party said when entering into the contract.
2. How the party acted or appeared.
3. The circumstances surrounding the transaction.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus Question 1
What is the objective theory of contracts?

Case Example 10.1 The Leaf Clean Energy Company invested $30 million with Invenergy Wind, a wind energy developer. The investment contract prohibited Invenergy from conducting a "Material Partial Sale" without Leaf's consent. If such a sale occurred, Invenergy was required to pay Leaf a penalty. After Invenergy concluded a $1.8 billion "Material Partial Sale" without Leaf's consent, the investment company sued to obtain its penalty under the contract, which was about $126 million.

A lower court agreed that Invenergy had breached the contract but awarded Leaf only one dollar in damages. The court reasoned that, under the terms of the agreement, if Leaf had been notified and agreed to the sale, Leaf would not have received any payment. (That is, Leaf was entitled to a penalty only if Invenergy breached the contract.) It would have been unfair for Leaf to gain such a large amount when it had not suffered any actual harm. Applying the objective theory of contracts, the Delaware Supreme Court reversed and ordered Invenergy to pay Leaf the $126 million. The appellate court scolded the lower court for ignoring the "clear and unambiguous" terms of the contract, which were designed to prevent Invenergy from making any major financial decisions without Leaf's consent.[1]

10–2 Elements of a Contract

The many topics that will be discussed in the following chapters on contract law require an understanding of the basic elements of a valid contract and the way in which a contract is created. Also important is an understanding of the types of circumstances in which even legally valid contracts will not be enforced.

10–2a Requirements of a Valid Contract

The following list briefly describes the four requirements that must be met for a valid contract to exist. If any of these elements is lacking, no contract will have been formed. (Each item will be explained more fully in subsequent chapters.)

Focus Question 2
What are the four basic elements necessary to the formation of a valid contract?

1. Agreement. An agreement to form a contract includes an offer and an acceptance. One party must offer to enter into a legal agreement, and another party must accept the terms of the offer.
2. Consideration. Any promises made by the parties must be supported by legally sufficient and bargained-for consideration (something of value received or promised to convince a person to make a deal).
3. Contractual capacity. Both parties entering into the contract must have the contractual capacity to do so. The law must recognize them as possessing characteristics that qualify them as competent parties.
4. Legality. The contract's purpose must be to accomplish some goal that is legal and not against public policy.

An agreement to form a contract can modify the terms of a previous contract. When a dispute concerns whether this has occurred, the offer and acceptance of both agreements can be reviewed to determine their effect. If the terms are ambiguous, evidence outside the expression of an agreement can be considered to determine what the parties intended at the time.

Of course, as in every case involving a contract, the parties' subjective beliefs with respect to the terms are irrelevant, particularly in the absence of any evidence to support those beliefs. In the following case, the court applied the objective theory of contracts to determine the intent of parties who had agreed to a promissory note for the repayment of a student loan.

1. Leaf Invenergy Company v. Invenergy Renewables LLC, 210 A.3d 688 (Del. 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 10.1

Credible Behavioral Health, Inc. v. Johnson

Court of Appeals of Maryland, 466 Md. 380, 220 A.3d 303 (2019).

Facts Credible Behavioral Health, Inc., provides software solutions to behavioral health and human services providers. Credible offers a tuition loan program to its employees who wish to pursue undergraduate, graduate, or postgraduate education. Emmanuel Johnson, a Credible employee, accepted the offer, and the parties memorialized their agreement in a promissory note. The terms provided that Johnson would repay the loan after completing his studies, with the percentage to be repaid depending on how long he remained with the company. Before Johnson obtained a degree, however, Credible fired him.

When he did not repay the loan, Credible filed a suit in a Maryland state court against him, seeking repayment. Johnson argued that the terms of the note required repayment only if he quit his employment, not if he was fired. The trial court ruled in his favor. Credible appealed. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the ruling. Credible appealed to the state's highest court, the Maryland Court of Appeals.

Issue Did the parties intend the note to be repaid regardless of whether an employee quit or was fired?

Decision Yes. The Maryland Court of Appeals reversed the decision of the intermediate appellate court, which had upheld the ruling of the trial court. The lower courts "erred in construing the promissory note to require repayment only in situations where an employee quits."

Reason Credible argued that the terms of the note revealed that the parties intended the loan to be repaid on termination of employment whether an employee was fired or quit. The state's highest court applied the objective theory of contracts to determine the parties' intent in agreeing to the note and to interpret its terms to be consistent with that intent. This determination "is based on what a reasonable person in the position of the parties would have understood the language to mean and not the subjective intent of the parties at the time of formation." The note provided for the repayment of the loan, plus interest, "if you terminate employment with the company" less than thirty-six months after achieving a degree.

The note further provided that this amount was due and payable ninety days "after the termination of your employment, whether by you or the company." The court reasoned that this language "substantially uncloaks the intent underlying the promissory note. It makes clear that the parties intended the loan to be repaid . . . in situations where Credible fires an employee."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment As a principle of contract interpretation, courts consistently strive to interpret contracts in accord with common sense. Does the application of this principle to the facts in this case support or undercut the decision of the Maryland Court of Appeals? Explain.
- Economic What consequences might Credible have suffered if the Maryland Court of Appeals had interpreted the terms of the note to require repayment only when an employee quit, not when that employee was fired? Discuss.

10–2b Defenses to the Enforceability of a Contract

Even if all of the requirements listed above are satisfied, a contract may be unenforceable if the following requirements are not met. These requirements typically are raised as defenses to the enforceability of an otherwise valid contract.

1. Voluntary consent. The consent of both parties must be voluntary. For instance, if a contract was formed as a result of fraud, mistake, or duress (coercion), the contract may not be enforceable.
2. Form. The contract must be in whatever form the law requires. Some contracts must be in writing to be enforceable.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

10–3 Types of Contracts

There are many types of contracts. They may be categorized based on legal distinctions as to their formation, performance, and enforceability.

10–3a Contract Formation

Contracts may be classified based on how and when they are formed. Exhibit 10–1 shows three such classifications, and the following subsections explain them in greater detail.

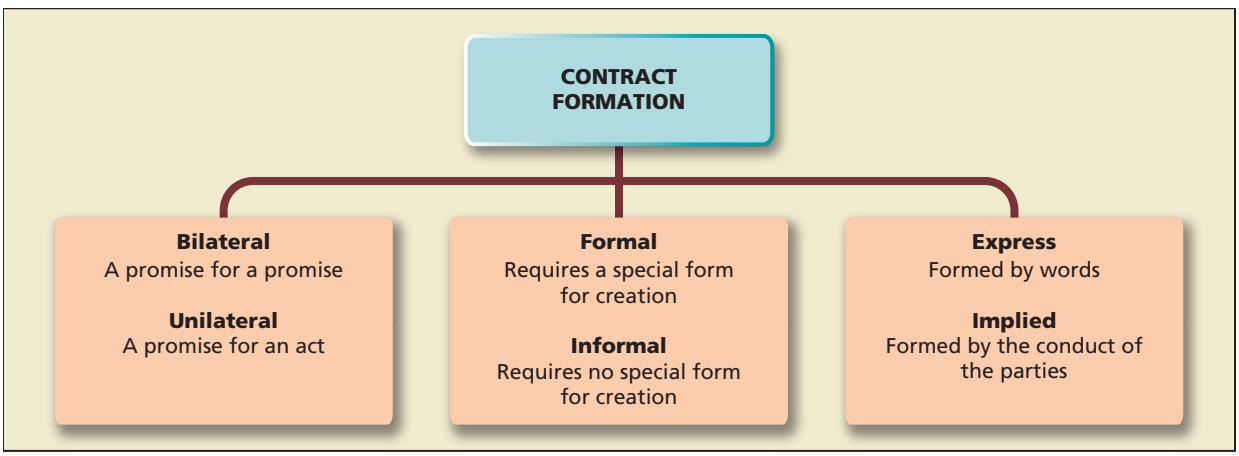
Offeror A person who makes an offer.

Offeree A person to whom an offer is made.

Bilateral versus Unilateral Contracts Every contract involves at least two parties. The offeror is the party making the offer (promising to do or not to do something). The offeree is the party to whom the offer is made. A contract is classified as bilateral or unilateral depending on what the offeree must do to accept the offer and bind the offeror to a contract.

Bilateral Contract A type of contract that arises when a promise is given in exchange for a return promise.

Bilateral Contracts. If the offeree can accept simply by promising to perform, the contract is a bilateral contract. Hence, a bilateral contract is a "promise for a promise." An example of a bilateral contract is a contract in which one person agrees to buy another person's automobile for a specified price. No performance, such as the payment of funds or delivery of goods, need take place for a bilateral contract to be formed. The contract comes into existence at the moment the promises are exchanged.



Example 10.2 Javier offers to buy Ann's smartphone for $200. Javier tells Ann that he will give her the cash for the phone on the following Friday, when he gets paid. Ann accepts Javier's offer and promises to give him the phone when he pays her on Friday. Javier and Ann have formed a bilateral contract. ■

Unilateral Contract A type of contract that results when an offer can be accepted only by the offeree's performance.

Unilateral Contracts. If the offer is phrased so that the offeree can accept only by completing the contract performance, the contract is a unilateral contract. Hence, a unilateral contract is a "promise for an act." In other words, the contract is formed not at the moment when promises are exchanged but rather when the contract is performed.

Example 10.3 Reese says to Kay, "If you drive my car from New York to Los Angeles, I'll give you $1,000." Only on Kay's completion of the act—bringing the car to Los Angeles—does she fully accept Reese's offer to pay $1,000. If she chooses not to accept the offer to drive the car to Los Angeles, there are no legal consequences. ■

Exhibit 10–1 Classifications Based on Contract Formation

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Contests, lotteries, and other competitions offering prizes are also examples of offers for unilateral contracts. If a person complies with the rules of the contest—such as by submitting the right lottery number at the right place and time—a unilateral contract is formed. The organization offering the prize is then bound to a contract to perform as promised in the offer. If the person fails to comply with the contest rules, however, no binding contract is formed.

Ethical Issue

Does a "You break it, you buy it" sign create a unilateral contract? It is not unusual to see posted in retail stores signs that say, "You break it, you buy it." The implication, of course, is that you are legally obligated to buy something if you break it while inspecting it prior to a potential purchase. This "rule" is often known as the "Pottery Barn Rule," even though that retailer has no such rule.

Some argue that posted signs of this nature create unilateral contracts. It is difficult to prove the validity of such contracts, however. After all, for a contract to be formed, the accepting party has to demonstrate acceptance of the terms purposed. Few courts would uphold the notion that every customer agrees to every proposition posted on the walls of retail establishments. Moreover, where is the consideration? That is, what does the retailer give customers in return for their acceptance of a unilateral contract that says, "You break it, you buy it"?

Consider also that every customer in a retail establishment is an invitee. Consequently, the retailer accepts the risk that customers may accidentally damage items on display, regardless of posted warnings. Simply stating that once a customer reads a sign and chooses to continue shopping constitutes an acceptance is not only legally problematic, it is ethically bothersome. Merchants cannot transfer the risk of breakage to customers just by posting notices.

Revocation of Offers for Unilateral Contracts. A problem arises in unilateral contracts when the promisor attempts to revoke (cancel) the offer after the promisee has begun performance but before the act has been completed. Example 10.4 Seiko offers to buy Jin's sailboat, moored in San Francisco, on delivery of the boat to Seiko's dock in Newport Beach, three hundred miles south of San Francisco. Jin rigs the boat and sets sail. Shortly before his arrival at Newport Beach, Jin receives a message from Seiko withdrawing her offer. Is the offer terminated?

In contract law, offers are normally revocable (capable of being taken back, or canceled) until accepted. Under the traditional view of unilateral contracts, Seiko's revocation would terminate the offer. Because Seiko's offer was to form a unilateral contract, only Jin's delivery of the sailboat at her dock would have been an acceptance. ■

Because of the harsh effect on the offeree of the revocation of an offer to form a unilateral contract, the modern-day view is different. Today, once performance has been substantially undertaken, the offeror cannot revoke the offer. In fact, as illustrated by the following case, the rule in some states is that as soon as the offeree begins performing, the offeror is precluded from revoking or modifying the offer.

Natta Ang/Shutterstock.com

Can a party withdraw from an offer to buy a sailboat just before it is delivered to the agreed-upon location? Why or why not?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 10.2

Boswell v. Panera Bread Co.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 879 F.3d 296 (2018).

Facts To recruit and retain managers for its restaurants, Panera Bread Company created a program under which managers were eligible to receive a one-time bonus. A manager who signed an agreement to participate in the program would be paid the bonus five years later, provided the manager was still working for Panera at that time. The amount of the bonus depended on the profitability of the manager's restaurant. Later, a change in general business conditions led Panera to conclude that the bonuses would be too costly. The employer set a $100,000 cap on the amount. Mark Boswell and sixty-six other managers filed a suit in a federal district court, maintaining that by imposing the cap, Panera committed breach of contract. The court issued a summary judgment in favor of the managers. Panera appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

Issue Were the managers entitled to bonuses based on the offer's original terms?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the lower court. Panera's promise to pay bonuses in return for the managers' continued employment was an offer for a unilateral contract. "Panera was not entitled to move the goalposts on them by imposing a bonus cap, which was outside the contemplation of the . . . offer."

Reason The managers were at-will employees when they signed the bonus agreements, which provided that they would retain this status for the five-year period. Employment at will is a unilateral contract—the employer promises to pay if the employee works as directed. "An employer's promise to pay a bonus in return for an at-will employee's continued employment is an offer for a unilateral contract." To make an offer for a unilateral contract irrevocable, the offeree need only begin performance. The purpose of this rule is to protect the offeree's justifiable reliance on the offeror's promise. In this case, each of the managers had begun performing. Therefore, the offer had become irrevocable, and Panera could not modify its terms. Of course, "Panera could have terminated the managers if it chose and precluded them from receiving the bonus, but it did not."

Critical Thinking

- Economic Could Panera have successfully argued that a drop in its revenue allowed it to impose the cap? Why or why not?
- Legal Environment Does the fact that the managers continued to work for Panera after it imposed the cap undercut their claim? Explain.

Formal Contract An agreement that by law requires a specific form for its validity.

Informal Contract A contract that does not require a specific form or method of creation to be valid.

Express Contract A contract in which the terms of the agreement are stated in words, oral or written.

Formal versus Informal Contracts Another classification system divides contracts into formal contracts and informal contracts. A formal contract requires a special form or method of creation (formation) to be enforceable.[2] One example is negotiable instruments, which include checks, drafts, promissory notes, and certificates of deposit. Negotiable instruments are formal contracts because, under the Uniform Commercial Code, a special form and language are required to create them. Letters of credit, which are frequently used in international sales contracts, are another type of formal contract.

Any contract that is not a formal contract is an informal contract (also called a simple contract). No special form is required (except for certain types of contracts that must be in writing or evidenced by an electronic record). The contracts are usually based on their substance rather than their form. Typically, though, businesspersons put their contracts in writing (including electronic records) to ensure that there is some proof of a contract's existence should problems arise.

Express versus Implied Contracts Contracts may also be categorized as express or implied. In an express contract, the terms of the agreement are fully and explicitly

2. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 6. Remember that Restatements of the Law are books that summarize court decisions on a particular topic and that courts often refer to for guidance.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

stated in words, oral or written. A signed lease for an apartment or a house is an express written contract. If a classmate accepts your offer to sell your textbooks from last semester for $200, an express oral contract has been made.

A contract that is implied from the conduct of the parties is called an implied contract (or sometimes an implied-in-fact contract). This type of contract differs from an express contract in that the conduct of the parties, rather than their words, creates and defines at least some of the terms of the contract. For an implied contract to arise, certain requirements must be met.

Implied Contract A contract formed in whole or in part from the conduct of the parties.

Requirements for Implied Contracts. Normally, if the following conditions exist, a court will hold that an implied contract was formed:

1. The plaintiff furnished some service or property.
2. The plaintiff expected to be paid for that service or property, and the defendant knew or should have known that payment was expected.
3. The defendant had a chance to reject the services or property and did not.

Focus Question 3

What is the difference between express and implied contracts?

Example 10.5 Ryan, a small business owner, needs an accountant to complete his tax return. He drops by a local accountant's office, explains his situation to the accountant, and learns what fees she charges. The next day, he returns and gives the receptionist all of the necessary documents to complete his tax return. Then he walks out without saying anything further. In this situation, Ryan has entered into an implied contract to pay the accountant the usual fees for her services. The contract is implied because of Ryan's conduct and hers. She expects to be paid for completing the tax return, and by bringing in the records she will need to do the job, Ryan has implied an intent to pay her.

Mixed Contracts with Express and Implied Terms. Note that a contract can be a mixture of an express contract and an implied contract. In other words, a contract may contain some express terms, while others are implied. During the construction of a home, for instance, the homeowner often asks the builder to make changes in the original specifications.

Spotlight Case Example 10.6 Lamar Hopkins hired Uhrhahn Construction & Design, Inc., for several projects in the construction of his home. For each project, the parties signed a written contract that was based on a cost estimate and specifications and that required changes to the agreement to be in writing. While the work was in progress, however, Hopkins repeatedly asked Uhrhahn to deviate from the contract specifications, which Uhrhahn did. None of these requests was made in writing.

One day, Hopkins asked Uhrhahn to use Durisol blocks instead of the cinder blocks specified in the original contract, indicating that the cost would be the same. Uhrhahn used the Durisol blocks but demanded extra payment when it became clear that the Durisol blocks were more complicated to install. Although Hopkins had paid for the other orally requested deviations from the contract, he refused to pay Uhrhahn for the substitution of the Durisol blocks. Uhrhahn sued for breach of contract. The court found that Hopkins, through his conduct, had waived the provision requiring written contract modification and created an implied contract to pay the extra cost of installing the Durisol blocks.[3] jhorrocks/E+/Getty Images

Under what circumstances can an owner be liable for additional costs due to a request for a change in materials even though no written contract modification was created?

10–3b Contract Performance

Contracts are also classified according to their state of performance. A contract that has been fully performed on both sides is called an executed contract. A contract that has not been fully performed by the parties is called an executory contract. If one party has fully performed but Executed Contract A contract that has been fully performed by both parties.

Executory Contract A contract that has not yet been fully performed.

3. Uhrhahn Construction & Design, Inc. v. Hopkins, 179 P.3d 808 (Utah App. 2008).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

the other has not, the contract is said to be executed on the one side and executory on the other, but the contract is still classified as executory.

Example 10.7 Jackson, Inc., agreed to buy ten tons of coal from the Northern Coal Company. Northern has delivered the coal to Jackson's steel mill, but Jackson has not yet paid. At this point, the contract is executed on the part of Northern and executory on Jackson's part. After Jackson pays Northern, the contract will be executed on both sides. ■

10–3c Contract Enforceability

Valid Contract A contract that results when the elements necessary for contract formation (agreement, consideration, capacity, and legality) are present.

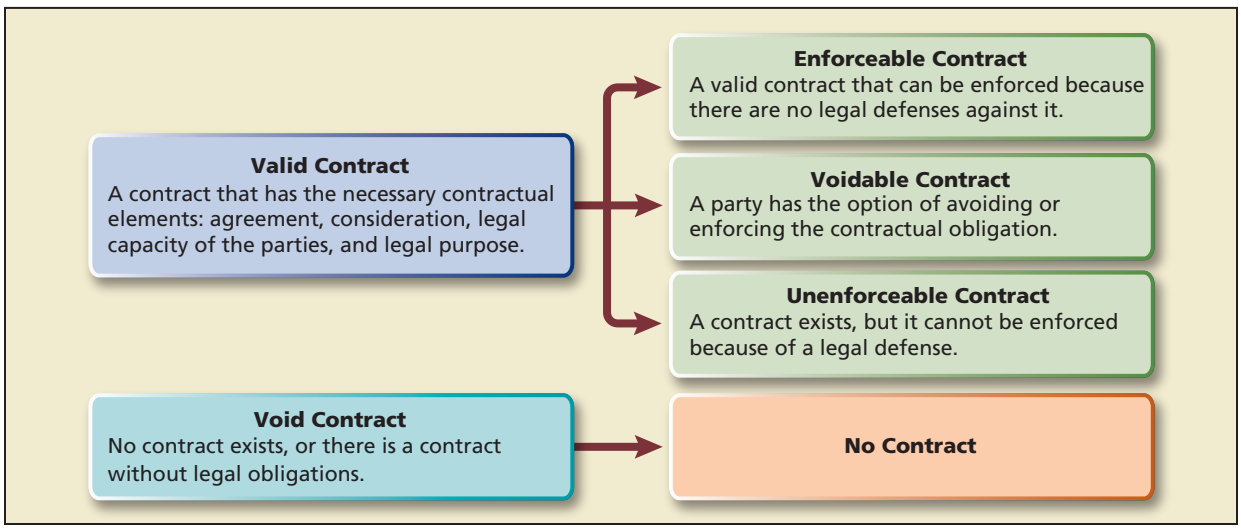
A valid contract has the four elements necessary to entitle at least one of the parties to enforce it in court. Those elements, as mentioned earlier, consist of (1) an agreement (offer and acceptance), (2) supported by legally sufficient consideration, (3) made by parties who have the legal capacity to enter into the contract, (4) for a legal purpose.

As you can see in Exhibit 10-2, valid contracts may be enforceable, voidable, or unenforceable. Additionally, a contract may be referred to as a void contract. We look next at the meaning of the terms voidable, unenforceable, and void in relation to contract enforceability.

Voidable Contract A contract that may be legally avoided at the option of one or both of the parties.

Voidable Contracts

A voidable contract is a valid contract but one that can be avoided at the option of one or both of the parties. The party having the option can elect either to avoid any duty to perform or to ratify (make valid) the contract. If the contract is avoided, both parties are released from it. If it is ratified, both parties must fully perform their respective legal obligations.



For instance, contracts made by minors generally are voidable at the option of the minor (with certain exceptions). Contracts made by incompetent persons and intoxicated persons may also be voidable. Additionally, contracts entered into under fraudulent conditions are voidable at the option of the defrauded party. Contracts entered into under legally defined duress or undue influence are also voidable.

Unenforceable Contract A valid contract rendered unenforceable by some statute or law.

Unenforceable Contracts

An unenforceable contract is one that cannot be enforced because of certain legal defenses against it. It is not unenforceable because a party failed to satisfy a legal requirement of the contract. Rather, it is a valid contract rendered unenforceable by some statute or law. For instance, some contracts must be in writing. If they are not, they will not be enforceable except in certain exceptional circumstances.

Exhibit 10–2 Enforceable, Voidable, Unenforceable, and Void Contracts

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Void Contracts A void contract is no contract at all. The terms void and contract are contradictory. None of the parties has any legal obligations if a contract is void. A contract can be void because one of the parties was previously determined by a court to be mentally incompetent, for instance, or because the purpose of the contract was illegal.

Void Contract A contract having no legal force or binding effect.

10–4 Quasi Contracts

Express contracts and implied contracts are actual or true contracts formed by the words or actions of the parties. A quasi contract, or contract implied in law, is not an actual contract because it does not arise from any agreement, express or implied, between the parties themselves. Rather, it is a fictional contract that courts can impose on the parties "as if" the parties had entered into an actual contract. (The word quasi is Latin for "as if.")

Quasi Contract An obligation or contract imposed by law (a court), in the absence of an agreement, to prevent the unjust enrichment of one party.

Quasi contracts are equitable rather than legal contracts. Usually, they are imposed to avoid the unjust enrichment of one party at the expense of another. The doctrine of unjust enrichment is based on the theory that individuals should not be allowed to profit or enrich themselves inequitably at the expense of others. Case Example 10.8 Chad Parker owned about an acre of property that had a trailer home on it. He sold the trailer to David and Alison Wilson for $1,000 and sold the property to them for $10,000. These agreements were made orally, and no title or deed transfers took place. The Wilsons lived in the trailer for seven years, making $11,228.19 of improvements to the structure and the property. After a falling out between Parker and David, Parker had the Wilsons evicted and moved back into the trailer.

Focus Question 4

When will a court impose a quasi contract?

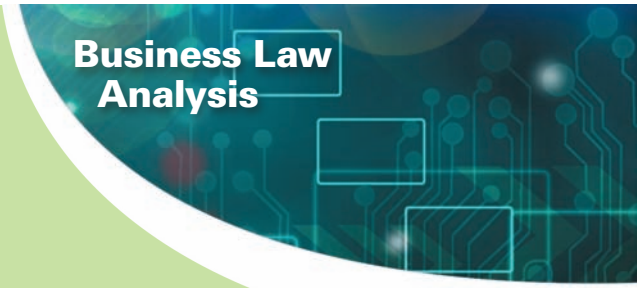
A Pennsylvania appellate court found that, in the absence of any express contract, Parker had unjustly enriched himself at the Wilsons' expense. Enforcing a quasi contract, the court ordered Parker to pay the Wilsons $12,228.19 in damages. This amount represented the value of the improvements plus the $1,000 difference between how much the Wilsons actually paid Parker and how much they would have paid him had they rented the trailer and property for seven years.[4] For an example of when a court would most likely not impose a quasi contract, see this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature.

When the court imposes a quasi contract, a plaintiff may recover in quantum meruit,[5] a Latin phrase meaning "as much as one deserves." Quantum meruit essentially describes the extent of compensation owed under a quasi contract.

Quantum Meruit A Latin phrase meaning "as much as one deserves." The expression describes the extent of compensation owed under a quasi contract.

10–4a Limitations on Quasi-Contractual Recovery

Although quasi contracts exist to prevent unjust enrichment, in some situations, the party who obtains a benefit is not liable for its fair value. Basically, a party who has conferred a benefit on someone else unnecessarily or as a result of misconduct or negligence cannot invoke the doctrine of quasi contract. The enrichment in those situations will not be considered "unjust."



Case Example 10.9 Michael Plambeck owned two chiropractic clinics in Kentucky that treated many patients injured in car accidents, including some who were customers of State Farm Automobile Insurance Company. All of the clinics' treating chiropractors were licensed to practice in Kentucky, but Plambeck (the owner) was not. Plambeck was a licensed chiropractor in another state but had allowed his Kentucky license to lapse because he was not treating any patients. Plambeck did not realize that Kentucky state law required him to be licensed as the owner of the clinics.

When State Farm discovered that Plambeck was not licensed in Kentucky, it filed a suit against the clinics seeking to recover payments it had made on behalf of its customers. The 4. Wilson v. Parker, 2020 PA Super 13, __ A.3d __ (2020).

5. Pronounced kwahn-tuhm mehr-oo-wit.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Deciding If a Court Would Impose a Quasi Contract

American Commercial Lines (ACL) operates tow boats and barges. ACL entered into a contract with VCS Chemical Corp. to purchase a diesel fuel additive called LZ8411A, which was manufactured by Lubrizol. Following a dispute, VCS stopped distributing Lubrizol's LZ8411A. Instead of informing ACL of this development, VCS provided the tow boat company with a "counterfeit additive" of lower quality. When ACL found out, it filed a number of lawsuits, including one against Lubrizol under quasi contract theory.

Analysis: Federal judge Richard Posner explained quasi contract in these words: "The classic example is the physician who chances on a person lying unconscious on the ground and treats him. Because the patient is unconscious there can be no contractual negotiation regarding the physician's price for the treatment. Yet it is customary for physicians to be paid for the medical services they render, and so the law treats the situation as if the parties had contracted for treatment at the physician's normal rate."[a] A quasi contract is not, however, designed to reward a company such as ACL that could have entered into a contract with Lubrizol but did not.

Result and Reasoning: ACL cannot recover any damages from Lubrizol under quasi contract theory. Lubrizol did not manufacture the counterfeit additive or sell it to ACL. Nor was Lubrizol reasonably required to inform ACL about its dispute with VCS. If a corporation such as ACL is worried about being cheated in this manner, it should start entering into contracts with the manufacturers, and not just with the distributors, of the products it uses.

In this case, it is instructive to realize that VCS is a small company and Lubrizol is a large one. Thus, ACL was trying to access Lubrizol's "deep pockets" with a misguided reliance on quasi contract law.

a. American Commercial Lines, LLC v. The Lubrizol Corp., 817 F.3d 548 (7th Cir. 2016). Also see ConFold Pacific, Inc. v. Polaris Industries, Inc., 433 F.3d 952, 958 (7th Cir. 2006).

trial court awarded State Farm $577,124 in damages for unjust enrichment, but the appellate court reversed. The court reasoned that State Farm had a legal duty to pay for the chiropractic treatment of its customers and could not avoid paying for the services because the clinics' owner was not licensed. The payments did not constitute unjust enrichment, because the patients had, in fact, received treatment by licensed chiropractors.[6]

10–4b When an Actual Contract Exists

The doctrine of quasi contract generally cannot be used when an actual contract covers the area in controversy. In this situation, a party who claims that a nonperforming party was unjustly enriched already has a remedy. The nonbreaching party can sue the breaching party for breach of contract.

Case Example 10.10 R & M Trucking-Intermodal, Inc., is a trucking company in Illinois that provides transportation and warehousing services in the Chicago area. Richard Lombardi is a top executive at DRM Holdings, Inc., which, along with Dr. Miracle's, Inc., produces and distributes hair care products. Lombardi contracted with R & M to transport a large amount of inventory (773 pallets, or twenty full-size trailer loads) of hair relaxer kits for DRM. Lombardi then requested that R & M store the inventory until DRM could pick it up.

R & M agreed to store the goods for a weekly storage fee, but DRM never came to remove the pallets, despite repeated requests. DRM owed nearly $430,000 on the account, and payments were sporadic. Eventually, R & M filed a lawsuit, asserting a number of claims, including both breach of contract and quasi contract. Lombardi filed a motion to dismiss. The court held that R & M's quasi-contract claim must be dismissed under state law, because an express contract already existed that governed the parties' relationship.[7]

6. State Farm Automobile Insurance Co. v. Newburg Chiropractic, P.S.C., 741 F.3d 661 (6th Cir. 2013).

7. R & M Trucking-Intermodal, Inc. v. Dr. Miracle's, Inc., 2017 WL 3034673 (N.D.Ill. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

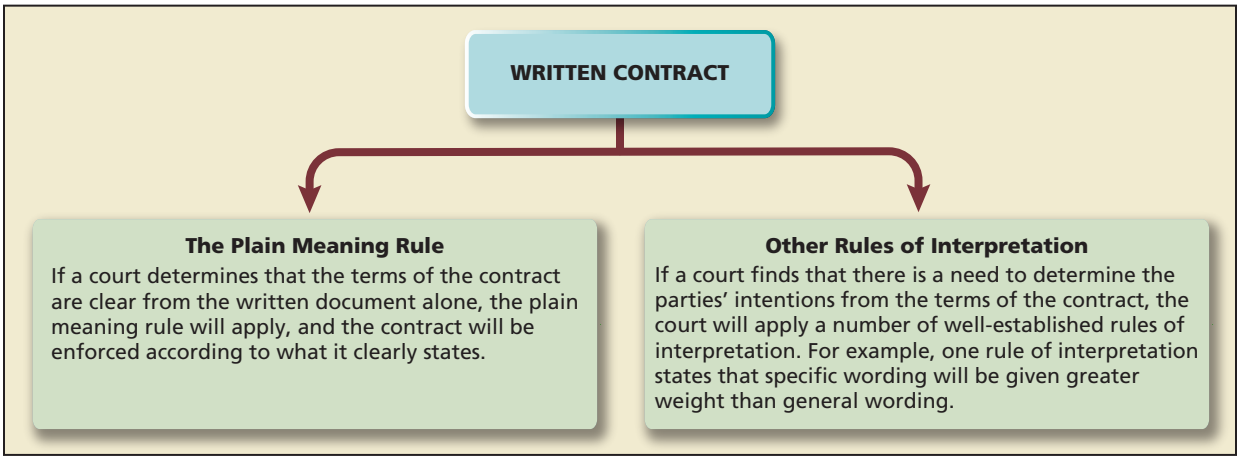
10–5 Interpretation of Contracts

Parties may sometimes agree that a contract has been formed but disagree on its meaning or legal effect. One reason that this may happen is the technical legal terminology traditionally used in contracts, sometimes referred to as legalese. Today, many contracts are written in "plain," nontechnical language. Even then, though, a dispute may arise over the meaning of a contract simply because the rights or obligations under the contract are not expressed clearly—no matter how "plain" the language used.

In this section, we look at some common law rules of contract interpretation. These rules provide the courts with guidelines for deciding disputes over how contract terms or provisions should be interpreted. Exhibit 10–3 provides a brief graphic summary of how these rules are applied.

10–5a Plain Language Laws

The federal government and a majority of the states have enacted plain language laws to regulate legal writing and eliminate legalese. All federal agencies are required to use plain language in most of their forms and written communications. Plain language requirements have been extended to agency rulemaking as well. States frequently have plain language laws that apply to consumer contracts—contracts made primarily for personal, family, or household purposes. The legal profession has also moved toward plain English, and court rules in many jurisdictions require attorneys to use plain language in court documents.



10–5b The Plain Meaning Rule

When a contract's language is clear and unequivocal, a court will enforce it according to its obvious terms. The meaning of the terms must be determined from the face of the instrument—from the written document alone. This is sometimes referred to as the plain meaning rule. The words—and their plain, ordinary meanings—determine the intent of the parties at the time they entered into the contract. A court is bound to give effect to the contract according to this intent.

Know This

No one can avoid contractual obligations by claiming not to have read the contract. A contract normally is interpreted as if each party had read every word carefully.

Exhibit 10–3 Rules of Contract Interpretation

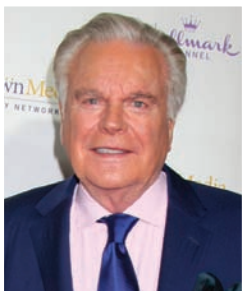
Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Ambiguity What if a contract's language is not clear and unequivocal? A court will consider a contract to be unclear, or ambiguous, in the following situations:

1. When the intent of the parties cannot be determined from its language.
2. When it lacks a provision on a disputed issue.
3. When a term is susceptible to more than one interpretation.
4. When there is uncertainty about a provision.

Extrinsic Evidence If a contract term is ambiguous, a court may interpret the ambiguity against the party who drafted the contract term, as discussed shortly. Sometimes, too, a court may consider extrinsic evidence—evidence not contained in the document itself—in interpreting ambiguous contract terms. Such evidence may include the testimony of the parties, additional agreements or communications, or other information relevant to determining the parties' intent.

Extrinsic Evidence Any evidence not contained in the contract itself, which may include the testimony of the parties, additional agreements or communications, or other information relevant to determining the parties' intent.



The admissibility of extrinsic evidence can significantly affect the court's interpretation of ambiguous contractual provisions and thus the outcome of litigation. But when the contract is clear and unambiguous, a court normally cannot consider evidence outside the contract. The following Spotlight Case illustrates these points.

Spotlight on Columbia Pictures: Case 10.3

Wagner v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc.

California Court of Appeal, Second District, 146 Cal.App.4th 586, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 898 (2007).

Facts Actor Robert Wagner entered into an agreement with Spelling-Goldberg Productions (SGP) "relating to Charlie's Angels (herein called the 'series')." The contract entitled Wagner to 50 percent of the net profits that SGP received from broadcasting the series and from all ancillary, music, and subsidiary rights in connection with the series. SGP hired Ivan Goff and Ben Roberts to write the series, under a contract subject to the Writers Guild of America Minimum Basic Agreement (MBA).[a] The MBA stipulated that the writer of a television show retains the right to make and market films based on the material, subject to the producer's right to buy this right if the writer decides to sell it within five years.

©Helga Esteb/Shutterstock.com

Actor Robert Wagner had the rights to the TV series Charlie's Angels.

The first Charlie's Angels episode aired in 1976. In 1982, SGP sold its rights to the series to Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc. Thirteen years later, Columbia bought the movie rights to the material from Goff's and Roberts's heirs. In 2000 and 2003, Columbia produced and distributed two Charlie's Angels movies. Wagner filed a suit in a California state court against Columbia, claiming a share of the profits from the films. The court granted Columbia's motion for summary judgment. Wagner appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

Issue Did the language of Wagner's contract with SGP entitle Columbia to all of the profits from the two Charlie's Angels movies?

Decision Yes. The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment.

Reason Wagner offered evidence to show that a previous contract with SGP involving a property titled Love Song had been intended to give him half of the net profits that SGP received from the property from all sources without limitation as to source or time. Wagner argued that because the profits provision in the Charlie's Angels agreement used identical language, the provision should be interpreted to give him the same share. The court stated that an "agreement is the writing itself." Extrinsic evidence is not admissible "to show intention independent of an unambiguous written instrument." The court reasoned that even if the parties intended Wagner to share in the profits from all sources, "they did not say so in their contract." Under the language of the contract, Wagner was not entitled to share in the profits from the exercise of the movie rights to Charlie's Angels if those rights were acquired separately. SGP did not acquire the movie rights to Charlie's Angels by exercising this right within the five-year period. Columbia obtained those rights separately more than five years later.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment How might the result in this case have been different if the court had allowed Wagner's extrinsic evidence of the prior contract regarding Love Song to be used as evidence in this dispute?

a. The Writers Guild of America is an association of screen and television writers that negotiates industry-wide agreements with motion picture and television producers to cover the rights of its members.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

10–5c Other Rules of Interpretation

Generally, as mentioned, a court will interpret contract language to give effect to the parties' intent as expressed in the contract. This is the primary purpose of the rules of interpretation—to determine the parties' intent from the language used in their agreement and to give effect to that intent. A court normally will not make or remake a contract, nor will it normally interpret the language according to what the parties claim their intent was when they made the contract.

Focus Question 5

What rules guide the courts in interpreting contracts?

Rules the Courts Use The courts use the following rules in interpreting contractual terms:

1. Insofar as possible, a reasonable, lawful, and effective meaning will be given to all of a contract's terms.
2. A contract will be interpreted as a whole. Individual, specific clauses will be considered subordinate to the contract's general intent. All writings that are a part of the same transaction will be interpreted together.
3. Terms that were the subject of separate negotiation will be given greater consideration than standardized terms and terms that were not negotiated separately.
4. A word will be given its ordinary, commonly accepted meaning, and a technical word or term will be given its technical meaning, unless the parties clearly intended something else.
5. Specific and exact wording will be given greater consideration than general language.
6. Written or typewritten terms prevail over preprinted terms.
7. Because a contract should be drafted in clear and unambiguous language, a party that uses ambiguous expressions is held to be responsible for the ambiguities. Thus, when the language has more than one meaning, it will be interpreted against the party that drafted the contract.
8. Evidence of trade usage, prior dealing, and course of performance may be admitted to clarify the meaning of an ambiguously worded contract. (We will define and discuss these terms in the chapter on sales and lease contracts.)

Express Terms Usually Given Most Weight In situations in which trade usage, prior dealing, and course of performance come into play, the courts observe certain priorities in interpreting contracts. Express terms (terms expressly stated in the contract) are given the greatest weight, followed by course of performance, course of dealing, and custom and usage of trade—in that order. When considering custom and usage, a court will look at the trade customs and usage common to the particular business or industry and to the locale in which the contract was made or is to be performed.

Case Example 10.11 E.I. du Pont de Nemours and Company's standard employment contract states that employees who "retire" keep any stock options provided by the company. According to the language of the contract, an employee can only "retire" after having been with the company for at least fifteen years. Employees who leave for other reasons must exercise the stock options by their last day of employment or lose them. (When a company offers stock options to its employees, it gives them the opportunity to buy a specified number of shares of the company's stock within a set time period and at a price established by the company on a prior date.)

After ten years with DuPont, James Bearden, at the age of sixty-seven, decided to stop working. Because Bearden did not exercise his stock options before leaving, DuPont allowed them to expire. Bearden sued, arguing that, going by the dictionary, "retirement" means exiting the workforce upon reaching a certain age. A federal appellate court rejected this reasoning. By the express language of the contract, the court held, Bearden had fallen short of the years-of-service requirement (fifteen years) and therefore had not "retired" from DuPont for stock option purposes.[8]

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

8. Bearden v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours and Company, 945 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2019).

Practice and Review

Mitsui Bank hired Ross Duncan as a branch manager in one of its Southern California locations. At that time, Duncan received an employee handbook informing him that Mitsui would review his performance and salary level annually. In 2020, Mitsui decided to create a new lending program to help financially troubled businesses stay afloat. It promoted Duncan to be the credit development officer (CDO) and gave him a written compensation plan. Duncan's compensation was to be based on the new program's success and involved a bonus and commissions based on new loans and sales volume. The written plan also stated, "This compensation plan will be reviewed and potentially amended after one year and will be subject to such review and amendment annually thereafter."

Duncan's efforts as CDO were successful, and the business-lending program he developed grew to represent 25 percent of Mitsui's business in 2021 and 40 percent by 2023. Nevertheless, Mitsui refused to give Duncan a raise in 2021. Mitsui also amended Duncan's compensation plan to significantly reduce his compensation and to change his performance evaluation schedule to every six months. When he had still not received a raise by 2023, Duncan resigned as CDO and filed a lawsuit claiming breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What are the four requirements of a valid contract?
2. Did Duncan have a valid contract with Mitsui for employment as credit development officer? If so, was it a bilateral or a unilateral contract?
3. What are the requirements of an implied contract?
4. Can Duncan establish an implied contract based on the employment manual or the written compensation plan? Why or why not?

Debate This

Companies should be able to make or break employment contracts whenever and however they wish.

Key Terms

bilateral contract 248 contract 245 executed contract 251
executory contract 251 express contract 250 extrinsic evidence 256 formal contract 250 implied contract 251 informal contract 250 objective theory of contracts 245 offeree 248
offeror 248 promise 244 promisee 244 promisor 244 quantum meruit 253 quasi contract 253
unenforceable contract 252 unilateral contract 248 valid contract 252
voidable contract 252
void contract 253

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Chapter Summary: Nature and Classification

An Overview of Contract Law	1. Sources of contract law—The common law governs all contracts except when it has been modified or replaced by statutory law, such as the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), or by administrative agency regulations. The UCC governs contracts for the sale and lease of goods. 2. The function of contracts—Contract law establishes what kinds of promises will be legally binding and supplies procedures for enforcing legally binding promises, or agreements. 3. The definition of a contract—A contract is an agreement that can be enforced in court. It is formed by two or more parties who agree to perform or to refrain from performing some act now or in the future. Each party has a legal duty to the other and the right to seek a remedy for breach of the promise or duty. 4. The objective theory of contracts—In contract law, intent is determined by objective facts, not by the personal or subjective intent or belief of a party.
Elements of a Contract	1. Requirements of a valid contract—The four requirements of a valid contract are agreement, consideration, contractual capacity, and legality. 2. Defenses to the enforceability of a contract—Even if the four requirements of a valid contract are met, a contract may be unenforceable if it lacks voluntary consent or is not in the required form.
Types of Contracts	1. Bilateral—A promise for a promise. 2. Unilateral—A promise for an act (acceptance is the completed or substantial performance of the contract by the offeree). 3. Formal—Requires a special form for contract formation. 4. Informal—Requires no special form for contract formation. 5. Express—Formed by words (oral or written). 6. Implied—Formed at least in part by the conduct of the parties. 7. Executed—A fully performed contract. 8. Executory—A contract not yet fully performed. 9. Valid—A contract that has the four necessary contractual elements of agreement, consideration, capacity, and legality. 10. Voidable—A contract in which a party has the option of avoiding or ratifying the contractual obligation. 11. Unenforceable—A valid contract that cannot be enforced because of some statute or law. 12. Void—No contract exists.
Quasi Contracts	A quasi contract, or a contract implied in law, is a fictional contract that is imposed by a court to prevent unjust enrichment of one party at the expense of another.
Interpretation of Contracts	Increasingly, plain language laws require contracts to be written in nontechnical language so that the terms are clear and understandable to the parties. Under the plain meaning rule, a court will enforce the contract according to its obvious terms, the meaning of which must be determined from the written document alone. Other rules applied by the courts when interpreting contracts include giving greater consideration to specific wording and holding a party that uses vague terms responsible for the ambiguities.

Issue Spotters

1. Kerin sends a letter to Joli telling her that he has a book to sell at a certain price. Joli signs and returns the letter. When Kerin delivers the book, Joli sends it back, claiming that they do not have a contract. Kerin claims they do. What standard determines whether these parties have a contract? (See An Overview of Contract Law.)
2. Dyna tells Ed that she will pay him $1,000 to set fire to her store so that she can collect under a fire insurance policy. Ed sets fire to the store, but Dyna refuses to pay. Can Ed recover? Why or why not? (See Types of Contracts.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

10–1. Unilateral Contract. Rocky Mountain Races, Inc., sponsors the "Pioneer Trail Ultramarathon," with an advertised first prize of $10,000. The rules require the competitors to run one hundred miles from the floor of Blackwater Canyon to the top of Pinnacle Mountain. The rules also provide that Rocky reserves the right to change the terms of the race at any time. Monica enters the race and is declared the winner. Rocky offers her a prize of $1,000 instead of $10,000. Did Rocky and Monica have a contract? Explain. (See Types of Contracts.)

10–2. Implied Contract. Janine was hospitalized with severe abdominal pain and placed in an intensive care unit. Her doctor told hospital personnel to order around-the-clock nursing care for Janine. At the hospital's request, a nursing services firm, Nursing Services Unlimited, provided two weeks of in-hospital care and, after Janine was sent home, two additional weeks of at-home care. During the at-home period of care, Janine was fully aware that she was receiving the benefit of the nursing services. Nursing Services later billed Janine $4,000 for the nursing care, but Janine refused to pay on the ground that she had never contracted for the services, either orally or in writing. In view of the fact that no express contract was ever formed, can Nursing Services recover the $4,000 from Janine? If so, under what legal theory? Discuss. (See Types of Contracts.)

10–3. Contract Classification. For employment with the Firestorm Smokejumpers—a crew of elite paratroopers who parachute into dangerous situations to fight fires—applicants must complete a series of tests. The crew chief sends the most qualified applicants a letter stating that they will be admitted to Firestorm's training sessions if they pass a medical exam. Jake Kurzyniec receives the letter and passes the exam, but a new crew chief changes the selection process and rejects him. Is there a contract between Kurzyniec and Firestorm? If there is a contract, what type of contract is it? (See Types of Contracts.)

10–4. Spotlight on Taco Bell—Implied Contract. Thomas Rinks and Joseph Shields developed Psycho Chihuahua, a caricature of a Chihuahua dog with a "do-not-back-down" attitude. They promoted and marketed the character through their company, Wrench, LLC. Ed Alfaro and Rudy Pollak, representatives of Taco Bell Corp., learned of Psycho Chihuahua and met with Rinks and Shields to talk about using the character as a Taco Bell "icon." Wrench sent artwork, merchandise, and marketing ideas to Alfaro, who promoted the character within Taco Bell. Alfaro asked Wrench to propose terms for Taco Bell's use of Psycho Chihuahua. Taco Bell did not accept Wrench's terms, but Alfaro continued to promote the character within the company.

Meanwhile, Taco Bell hired a new advertising agency, which proposed an advertising campaign involving a Chihuahua. When Alfaro learned of this proposal, he sent the Psycho Chihuahua materials to the agency. Taco Bell made a Chihuahua the focus of its marketing but paid nothing to Wrench. Wrench filed a suit against Taco Bell in a federal court claiming that it had an implied contract with Taco Bell and that Taco Bell breached that contract. Do these facts satisfy the requirements for an implied contract? Why or why not? [Wrench, LLC. v. Taco Bell Corp., 256 F.3d 446 (6th Cir. 2001), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 1114, 122 S.Ct. 921, 151 L.Ed.2d 805 (2002)] (See Types of Contracts.)

10–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Implied Contracts. Ralph Ramsey insured his car with Allstate Insurance Co. He also owned a house on which he maintained a homeowner's insurance policy with Allstate. Bank of America had a mortgage on the house and paid the insurance premiums on the homeowner's policy from Ralph's account. After Ralph died, Allstate canceled the car insurance. Ralph's son Douglas inherited the house. The bank continued to pay the premiums on the homeowner's policy, but from Douglas's account, and Allstate continued to renew the insurance. When a fire destroyed the house, Allstate denied coverage, however, claiming that the policy was still in Ralph's name. Douglas filed a suit in a federal district court against the insurer. Was Allstate liable under the homeowner's policy? Explain. [Ramsey v. Allstate Insurance Co., 514 Fed.Appx. 554 (6th Cir. 2013)] (See Types of Contracts.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 10–5, go to Appendix E.

10–6. Quasi Contracts. Lawrence M. Clarke, Inc., was the general contractor for construction of a portion of a sanitary sewer system in Billings, Michigan. Clarke accepted Kim Draeger's proposal to do the work for a certain price. Draeger arranged with two subcontractors to work on the project. The work provided by Draeger and the subcontractors proved unsatisfactory. All of the work fell under Draeger's contract with Clarke. Clarke filed a suit in a Michigan state court against Draeger, seeking to recover damages on a theory of quasi contract. The court awarded Clarke $900,000 in damages on that theory. A state intermediate appellate court reversed this award. Why? [Lawrence M. Clarke, Inc. v. Draeger, 2015 WL 205182 (Mich.App. 2015)] (See Quasi Contracts.)

10–7. Interpretation of Contracts. Lehman Brothers, Inc. (LBI), wrote a letter to Mary Ortegón offering her employment as LBI's "Business Chief Administrative Officer in Its Fixed Income Division." The offer included a salary of $150,000 per year and an annual "minimum bonus" of $350,000. The letter stated that the bonus would be paid unless Ortegón resigned or was terminated for certain causes. In other words, the bonus was not a "signing" bonus—it was clearly tied to her performance on the job. Ortegón accepted the offer. Before she started work, however, LBI rescinded it. Later, LBI filed for bankruptcy in a federal court. Ortegón filed a claim with the court for the amount of the bonus on the ground that LBI had breached its contract with her by not paying it. Can extrinsic evidence be admitted to interpret the meaning of the bonus term? Explain. [Ortegón v. Giddens, 638 Fed.Appx. 47 (2d Cir. 2016)] (See Interpretation of Contracts.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

10–8. Quasi Contracts. In New Jersey, a patient admitted to a medical care facility through the regular admissions process is responsible for applying to the state for assistance in paying the bill. In contrast, a patient admitted on an emergency basis is not responsible for applying to the state—the facility is. Of course, to obtain assistance, the patient must be indigent. D.B., a diagnosed schizophrenic, experienced a psychotic episode. The Warren County, New Jersey, psychiatric emergency screening service determined that he was a danger to himself and others. He was involuntarily committed to Newton Medical Center, a mental health-care facility. Newton did not apply to the state for financial assistance for D.B.'s treatment. Instead, Newton billed the patient $6,745.50. D.B., who was indigent, did not pay. Can Newton recover the amount of the unpaid bill from D.B. on a theory of quasi contract? Discuss. [Newton Medical Center v. D.B., 452 N.J.Super. 615, 178 A.3d 1281, 2018 WL 480296 (App.Div. 2018)] (See Quasi Contracts.)

10–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Contract Requirements. Mark Carpenter, a certified financial planner, contracted to recruit investors for GetMoni.com, which owned a defunct gold mine in Arizona. Carpenter then contracted with clients to invest their funds, sending more than $2 million to GetMoni.com. Only about 20 percent of the money went to developing the mine. The rest was used to run a Ponzi scheme. Carpenter collected another $1 million, but instead of sending it to GetMoni.com, he deposited it into his own account. A federal investigation unraveled the scheme. Carpenter was charged with two counts of fraud—one for his deal with GetMoni.com and one for his misrepresentations to clients after he stopped dealing with GetMoni.com. [United States v. Carpenter, 676 Fed.Appx. 397 (6th Cir. 2017)] (See An Overview of Contract Law.)

1. Which elements do Carpenter's contracts lack, preventing them from being enforced? Can he argue successfully that he acted ethically? Discuss.
2. Using the IDDR approach, discuss whether certified financial planners have an ethical obligation to contract in the best interests of their clients.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

10–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Contracts. Review the basic requirements for a valid contract listed at the beginning of this chapter. Now consider the relationship entered into when a student enrolls in a college or university. (See Elements of a Contract.)

1. One group should analyze and discuss whether a contract has been formed between the student and the college or university.
2. A second group should assume that there is a contract and explain whether it is bilateral or unilateral.
3. The third group will consider the documents that each of you signed when enrolling in college. Did you read and understand the provisions? Would the plain meaning rule apply even if you did not understand some parts?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

11 Agreement

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What three elements are necessary for an effective offer?
2. What elements are necessary for an effective acceptance?
3. How do click-on and shrink-wrap agreements differ?
4. What is the primary purpose of the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act?

Agreement A mutual understanding or meeting of the minds between two or more individuals regarding the terms of a contract.

Offer A promise or commitment to perform or refrain from performing some specified act in the future.

"It is necessity that makes laws."

Voltaire
1694–1778
(French intellectual and writer)

Voltaire's statement that it is "necessity that makes laws" is particularly true in regard to contracts. Contract law developed over time to meet society's need to know with certainty what kinds of promises, or contracts, will be enforced and the point at which a valid and binding contract is formed. For a contract to be considered valid and enforceable, four basic requirements—agreement, consideration, contractual capacity, and legality—must be met.

In this chapter, we look closely at the first of these requirements, agreement. The parties must agree on the terms of the contract and manifest to each other their mutual assent (agreement) to the same bargain. Ordinarily, agreement is evidenced by two events: an offer and an acceptance. One party offers a certain bargain to another party, who then accepts that bargain. An agreement does not necessarily have to be in writing. Both parties, however, must manifest their assent, or voluntary consent, to the same bargain.

Agreement is required to form a contract, whether it is formed in the traditional way (on paper) or online. In today's world, numerous contracts are formed via the Internet. When someone enters an online agreement with a cell phone company to purchase a smartphone and data plan, for instance, that person has entered into an electronic contract, or e-contract.

11–1 Offer

An offer is a promise or commitment to perform or refrain from performing some specified act in the future. The party making an offer is called the offeror, and the party to whom the offer is made is called the offeree.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Three elements are necessary for an offer to be effective:

1. There must be a serious, objective intention by the offeror.
2. The terms of the offer must be reasonably certain, or definite, so that the parties and the court can ascertain the terms of the contract.
3. The offer must be communicated to the offeree.

Focus Question 1
What three elements are necessary for an effective offer?

Once an effective offer has been made, the offeree's acceptance of that offer creates a legally binding contract (providing the other essential elements for a valid and enforceable contract are present).

11–1a Intention of the Offer

The first requirement for an effective offer is serious, objective intent on the part of the offeror. Intent is not determined by the subjective intentions, beliefs, or assumptions of the offeror. Rather, it is determined by what a reasonable person in the offeree's position would conclude that the offeror's words and actions meant. Offers made in obvious anger, jest, or undue excitement do not meet the requirement of serious, objective intent. Because these offers are not effective, an offeree's acceptance does not create an agreement.

Example 11.1 You ride to school each day with Spencer in his new automobile, which has a market value of $25,000. One cold morning, the car will not start. Spencer yells in anger, "I'll sell this car to anyone for $500!" You drop $500 in his lap. A reasonable person—taking into consideration Spencer's frustration and the obvious difference in value between the car's market price and the purchase price—would realize that Spencer's offer was not made with serious and objective intent. Therefore, no agreement is formed.

In the Classic Case presented next, the court considered whether an offer made "after a few drinks" met the serious-intent requirement.

Classic Case 11.1

Lucy v. Zehmer

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 196Va. 493, 84S.E.2d 516 (1954).

Facts W. O. Lucy and A. H. Zehmer had known each other for fifteen to twenty years. For some time, Lucy had wanted to buy Zehmer's farm, but Zehmer had always said that he was not interested in selling. One night, Lucy stopped in to visit with the Zehmers at a restaurant they operated. Lucy said to Zehmer, "I bet you wouldn't take $50,000 for that place." Zehmer replied, "Yes, I would, too; you wouldn't give fifty." Throughout the evening, the conversation returned to the sale of the farm. All the while, the parties were drinking whiskey.

dcwcreations/ShutterStock.com

Can an intoxicated person's offer to sell his farm for a specific price meet the serious-intent requirement?

Eventually, Zehmer wrote up an agreement on the back of a restaurant check for the sale of the farm, and he asked his wife, Ida, to sign it—which she did. When Lucy brought an action in a Virginia state court to enforce the agreement, Zehmer argued that he had been "high as a Georgia pine" at the time and that the offer had been made in jest: "two doggoned drunks bluffing to see who could talk the biggest and say the most." Lucy claimed that he had not been intoxicated and did not think Zehmer had been, either, given the way Zehmer handled the transaction. The trial court ruled in favor of the Zehmers, and Lucy appealed.

Issue Did the agreement meet the serious-intent requirement despite the claim of intoxication?

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

Decision Yes. The agreement to sell the farm was binding.

Reason The court held that the evidence given about the nature of the conversation, the appearance and completeness of the agreement, and the signing all tended to show that a serious business transaction, not a casual jest, was intended. The court had to look into the objective meaning of the Zehmers' words and acts: "An agreement or mutual assent is of course essential to a valid contract, but the law imputes to a person an intention corresponding to the reasonable meaning of his words and acts. If his words and acts, judged by a reasonable standard, manifest an intention to agree, it is immaterial what may be the real but unexpressed state of mind."

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that after Lucy signed the agreement, he decided he did not want the farm after all, and that Zehmer sued Lucy to perform the contract. Would this change in the facts alter the court's decision that Lucy and Zehmer had created an enforceable contract? Why or why not?
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This is a classic case in contract law because it so clearly illustrates the objective theory of contracts with respect to determining whether an offer was intended. Today, the courts continue to apply the objective theory of contracts and routinely cite the Lucy v. Zehmer decision as a significant precedent in this area.

Know This

An opinion is not an offer and not a contract term. Goods or services can be "perfect" in one party's opinion and "poor" in another's.

When Intent May Be Lacking The concept of intention can be further clarified by looking at statements that are not offers and situations in which the parties' intent to be bound might be questionable.

1. Expressions of opinion. An expression of opinion is not an offer. It does not indicate an intention to enter into a binding agreement.
2. Statements of future intent. A statement of an intention to do something in the future (such as "I plan to sell my Verizon stock") is not an offer.
3. Preliminary negotiations. A request or invitation to negotiate is not an offer. It only expresses a willingness to discuss the possibility of entering into a contract. Statements such as "Will you sell your farm?" or "I wouldn't sell my car for less than $8,000" are examples.
4. Invitations to bid. When a government entity or private firm needs to have construction work done, contractors are invited to submit bids. The invitation to submit bids is not an offer. The bids that contractors submit are offers, however, and the government entity or private firm can bind the contractor by accepting the bid.
5. Advertisements and price lists. In general, representations made in advertisements and price lists are treated not as offers to contract but as invitations to negotiate.[1] Only rarely are such materials construed as offers. On some occasions, courts have considered advertisements to be offers because they contained definite terms that invited acceptance. (An example is an ad offering a reward for a lost dog.)
6. Live and online auctions. In a live auction, a seller "offers" goods for sale through an auctioneer, but this is not an offer to form a contract. Rather, it is an invitation asking bidders to submit offers. In the context of an auction, a bidder is the offeror, and the auctioneer is the offeree. The offer is accepted when the auctioneer strikes the hammer.

   The most familiar type of auction today takes place online through websites like eBay and eBid. "Offers" to sell an item on these sites generally are treated as invitations to negotiate. Unlike live auctions, online auctions are automated. Buyers can enter incremental bids on an item (without approving each price increase) up to a specified amount or without a limit.

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 26, Comment b.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Agreements to Agree Traditionally, agreements to agree—that is, agreements to agree to the material terms of a contract at some future date—were not considered to be binding contracts. The modern view, however, is that agreements to agree may be enforceable agreements (contracts) if it is clear that the parties intended to be bound by the agreements. In other words, under the modern view the emphasis is on the parties' intent rather than on form.

Spotlight Case Example 11.2 After a person was injured and nearly drowned on a water ride at one of its amusement parks, Six Flags, Inc., filed a lawsuit against the manufacturer that had designed the ride. The manufacturer claimed that the parties did not have a binding contract but had only engaged in preliminary negotiations that were never formalized in a construction contract.

The court, however, held that the evidence was sufficient to show an intent to be bound. The evidence included a faxed document specifying the details of the water ride, along with the parties' subsequent actions (having begun construction and written notes on the faxed document). The manufacturer was required to provide insurance for the water ride at Six Flags. In addition, its insurer was required to defend Six Flags in the personal-injury lawsuit that arose from the incident.[2]

Cassiohabib/Shutterstock.com

How did intention affect the outcome of a lawsuit between Six Flags and the manufacturer of a water ride?

Preliminary Agreements Increasingly, the courts are holding that a preliminary agreement constitutes a binding contract if the parties have agreed on all essential terms and no disputed issues remain to be resolved. In contrast, if the parties agree on certain major terms but leave other terms open for further negotiation, a preliminary agreement is binding only in the sense that the parties have committed themselves to negotiate the undecided terms in good faith in an effort to reach a final agreement.

In the following Spotlight Case, a dispute arose over an agreement to settle a case during the trial. One party claimed that the agreement, which was formed via e-mail, was binding. The other party claimed that the e-mail exchange was merely an agreement to work out the terms of a settlement in the future. Can an exchange of e-mails create a complete and unambiguous agreement?

2. Six Flags, Inc. v. Steadfast Insurance Co., 474 F.Supp.2d 201 (D.Mass. 2007).

Spotlight on Amazon.com: Case 11.2

Basis Technology Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc.

Appeals Court of Massachusetts, 71 Mass.App.Ct. 29, 878 N.E.2d 952 (2008).

Facts Basis Technology Corporation created software and provided technical services for a Japanese-language website operated by Amazon. com, Inc. The agreement between the two companies allowed for separately negotiated contracts for additional services that Basis might provide to Amazon. Later, Basis sued Amazon for various claims, including failure to pay for services not included in the original agreement. During the trial, the two parties appeared to reach an agreement to settle out of court via a series of e-mail exchanges outlining the settlement. When Amazon reneged, Basis served a motion to enforce the proposed settlement. The trial judge entered a judgment against Amazon, which appealed.

Issue Did the agreement that Amazon entered into with Basis via e-mail constitute a binding settlement contract?

Decision Yes. The Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the trial court's finding that Amazon intended to be bound by the terms of the e-mail exchanges.

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

Reason The court examined the evidence consisting of e-mails between the two parties. It pointed out that in open court and on the record, counsel had "reported the result of the settlement without specification of the terms."

Amazon claimed that the e-mail terms were incomplete and were not definite enough to form an agreement. The court noted, however, that "provisions are not ambiguous simply because the parties have developed different interpretations of them." In the exchange of e-mails, the essential business terms were indeed resolved. Afterward, the parties were simply proceeding to record the settlement terms, not to create them. The e-mails constituted a complete and unambiguous statement of the parties' desire to be bound by the settlement terms.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Assume that, instead of exchanging e-mails, the attorneys for both sides had had a phone conversation that included all of the terms to which they actually agreed in their e-mail exchanges. Would the court have ruled differently? Why or why not?

11–1b Definiteness of the Offer

The second requirement for an effective offer involves the definiteness of its terms. An offer must have reasonably definite terms so that a court can determine if a breach has occurred and give an appropriate remedy.[3] The specific terms required depend, of course, on the type of contract. Generally, a contract must include the following terms, either expressed in the contract or capable of being reasonably inferred from it:

1. The identification of the parties.
2. The identification of the object or subject matter of the contract (also the quantity, when appropriate), including the work to be performed, with specific identification of such items as goods, services, and land.
3. The consideration to be paid.
4. The time of payment, delivery, or performance.

An offer may invite an acceptance to be worded in such specific terms that the contract is made definite. Example 11.3 Nintendo of America, Inc., contacts your Play 2 Win Games store and offers to sell "from one to twenty-five Nintendo gaming systems for $75 each. State number desired in acceptance." You agree to buy twenty systems. Because the quantity is specified in the acceptance, the terms are definite, and the contract is enforceable.

When the parties have clearly manifested their intent to form a contract, courts sometimes are willing to supply a missing term in a contract, especially a sales contract. But a court will not rewrite a contract if the parties' expression of intent is too vague or uncertain to be given any precise meaning.

11–1c Communication of the Offer

A third requirement for an effective offer is communication—the offer must be communicated to the offeree. Ordinarily, one cannot agree to a bargain without knowing that it exists.

Case Example 11.4 Adwoa Gyabaah was hit by a bus owned by Rivlab Transportation Corporation. Gyabaah filed a suit in a New York state court against the bus company. Rivlab's insurer offered to tender the company's policy limit of $1 million in full settlement of Gyabaah's claims. On the advice of her attorney, Jeffrey Aronsky, Gyabaah signed a release (a contract forfeiting the right to pursue a legal claim) to obtain the settlement funds.

The release, however, was not sent to Rivlab or its insurer, National Casualty. Moreover, Gyabaah claimed that she had not decided whether to settle. Two months later, Gyabaah

3. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 33. The UCC has relaxed the requirements regarding the definiteness of terms in contracts for the sale of goods. See UCC 2–204(3).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

changed lawyers and changed her mind about signing the release. Her former attorney, Aronsky, filed a motion to enforce the release so that he could obtain his fees from the settlement funds. The court denied the motion, and Aronsky appealed. The reviewing court held that there was no binding settlement agreement. The release was never delivered to Rivlab or its insurer, nor was acceptance of the settlement offer otherwise communicated to them.[4]

(See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for an example of how courts deal with offers of a reward.)

11–1d Termination of the Offer

The communication of an effective offer to an offeree gives the offeree the power to transform the offer into a binding, legal obligation (a contract) by an acceptance. This power of acceptance does not continue forever, though. It can be terminated either by the action of the parties or by operation of law. Termination by the action of the parties can involve a revocation by the offeror or a rejection or counteroffer by the offeree.

Termination by Action of the Parties An offer can be terminated by action of the parties in any of three ways: by revocation, by rejection, or by counteroffer.

Revocation. The offeror's act of withdrawing an offer is referred to as revocation. Unless an offer is irrevocable, the offeror usually can revoke the offer (even if there has been a promise to keep it open), as long as the revocation is communicated to the offeree before the offeree accepts. Revocation may be accomplished by either of the following:

Revocation The withdrawal of a contract offer by the offeror. Unless an offer is irrevocable, it can be revoked at any time prior to acceptance without liability.

1. Express repudiation of the offer (such as "I withdraw my previous offer of October 17").
2. Performance of acts that are inconsistent with the existence of the offer and are made known to the offeree (for instance, selling the offered property to another person in the offeree's presence).

4. Gyabaah v. Rivlab Transportation Corp., 102 A.D.3d 451, 958 N.Y.S.2d 109 (2013).

Business Law Analysis

Offers of a Reward

The Baton Rouge Crime Stoppers (BCS) offered a reward for information about the "South Louisiana Serial Killer." The information was to be provided via a hotline. Dianne Alexander had survived an attack by a person suspected of being the killer. She identified a suspect in a police photo lineup and later sought to collect the reward. BCS refused to pay because she had not provided information to them via the hotline. Had Alexander complied with the terms of the offer?

Analysis: One of the requirements for an effective offer is communication, resulting in the offeree's knowledge of the offer. One of the requirements for an effective acceptance is also communication—in most situations, the offeror must be notified of the acceptance. In a unilateral contract, the full performance of some act is specified. If acceptance is evident, notification may be unnecessary, unless of course, the offeror asks for it.

Result and Reasoning: In this situation, the offer consisted of a reward. To obtain the reward, an offeree was asked to provide information regarding the "South Louisiana Serial Killer" to the Baton Rouge Crime Stoppers via a hotline. Alexander did not comply with the terms of this offer, and thus the offerors were not bound to pay her. She provided information to the police related to the arrest and indictment of the killer. But there was no indication in the offer that the police were the offerors or that they were authorized to accept the requested information on behalf of the offerors. Therefore, a court would not require BCS to pay the reward to Alexander.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The general rule followed by most states is that a revocation becomes effective when the offeree or the offeree's agent (a person acting on behalf of the offeree) actually receives it. Therefore, a statement of revocation sent via FedEx on April 1 and delivered at the offeree's residence or place of business on April 2 becomes effective on April 2. An offer made to the general public (such as through a website) may be revoked in the same manner in which it was originally communicated (through the same website).

Irrevocable Offers. Although most offers are revocable, some can be made irrevocable. Increasingly, courts refuse to allow an offeror to revoke an offer when the offeree has changed position because of justifiable reliance on the offer (under the doctrine of promissory estoppel). In some circumstances, "firm offers" made by merchants may also be considered irrevocable.

Option Contract A contract under which the offeror cannot revoke the offer for a stipulated time period (because the offeree has given consideration for the offer to remain open).

Another form of irrevocable offer is an option contract. An option contract is created when an offeror promises to hold an offer open for a specified period of time in return for a payment (consideration) given by the offeree. An option contract takes away the offeror's power to revoke an offer for the period of time specified in the option. If no time is specified, then a reasonable period of time is implied.

Option contracts are frequently used in conjunction with the sale of real estate. Example 11.5 Tyler agrees to lease a house from Jackson, the property owner. The lease contract includes a clause stating that Tyler is paying an additional $15,000 for an option to purchase the property within a specified period of time at a specified price. If Tyler decides not to purchase the house after the specified period has lapsed, he loses the $15,000, and Jackson is free to sell the property to another buyer.

Termination by Action of the Offeree If the offeree rejects the offer, either by words or by conduct, the offer is terminated. Any subsequent attempt by the offeree to accept will be construed as a new offer, giving the original offeror (now the offeree) the power of acceptance.

Know This

The way in which a response to an offer is phrased can determine whether the offer is accepted or rejected.

Rejection. Like a revocation, a rejection is effective only when it is actually received by the offeror or the offeror's agent. Example 11.6 Goldfinch Farms offers to sell specialty Maitake mushrooms to a Japanese buyer, Kinoko Foods. If Kinoko rejects the offer by sending a letter via U.S. mail, the rejection will not be effective (and the offer will not be terminated) until Goldfinch receives the letter.

Merely inquiring about an offer does not constitute rejection. Example 11.7 Ray offers to buy Fran's digital pen for $100. Fran responds, "Is that your best offer?" A reasonable person would conclude that Fran has not rejected the offer but has merely made an inquiry. She could still accept and bind Ray to the $100 price.

Counteroffer An offeree's response to an offer in which the offeree rejects the original offer and at the same time makes a new offer.

Counteroffers. A counteroffer is a rejection of the original offer and the simultaneous making of a new offer. Example 11.8 Burke, a beet farmer, offers to sell her product to Lang, the owner of the Lang's Roadside Veggie Stand, for $1.70 a pound. Lang responds, "Your price is too high. I'll offer to pay $1.30 a pound for your beets." Lang's response is a counteroffer because it rejects Burke's offer to sell her beets at $1.70 a pound and creates a new offer by Lang to purchase the beets at $1.30 a pound.

Mirror Image Rule A common law rule that requires that the terms of the offeree's acceptance adhere exactly to the terms of the offeror's offer for a valid contract to be formed.

At common law, the mirror image rule requires that the offeree's acceptance match the offeror's offer exactly. In other words, the terms of the acceptance must "mirror" those of the offer. If the acceptance materially changes or adds to the terms of the original offer, it will be considered not an acceptance but a counteroffer—which, of course, need not be accepted. The original offeror can, however, accept the terms of the counteroffer and create a valid contract.[5]

5. The mirror image rule has been greatly modified in regard to sales contracts. Section 2–207 of the UCC provides that a contract is formed if the offeree makes a definite expression of acceptance (such as signing the form in the appropriate location), even though the terms of the acceptance modify or add to the terms of the original offer.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This
When an offer is rejected, it is terminated.

Termination by Operation of Law The power of the offeree to transform the offer into a binding, legal obligation can be terminated by operation of law through the occurrence of any of the following events:

1. Lapse of time.
2. Destruction of the specific subject matter of the offer.
3. Death or incompetence of the offeror or the offeree.
4. Supervening illegality of the proposed contract.

Lapse of Time. An offer terminates automatically by law when the period of time specified in the offer has passed. If the offer states that it will be left open until a particular date, then the offer will terminate at midnight on that day. If the offer states that it will be left open for a number of days, this time period normally begins to run when the offer is actually received by the offeree, not when it is formed or sent.

If the offer does not specify a time for acceptance, the offer terminates at the end of a reasonable period of time. A reasonable period of time is determined by the subject matter of the contract, business and market conditions, and other relevant circumstances. An offer to sell farm produce, for instance, will terminate sooner than an offer to sell farm equipment because produce is perishable and subject to greater fluctuations in market value.

Destruction, Death, or Incompetence. An offer is automatically terminated if the specific subject matter of the offer (such as a smartphone or a house) is destroyed before the offer is accepted. An offeree's power of acceptance is also terminated when the offeror or offeree dies or becomes legally incapacitated, unless the offer is irrevocable. Example 11.9 Sybil offers to sell commercial property to Westside Investments for $2 million. In June, Westside pays Sybil $5,000 in exchange for her agreement to hold the offer open for ten months (forming an option contract). If Sybil dies in July, her offer is not terminated, because it is irrevocable. Westside can purchase the property from Sybil's estate at any time within the ten-month period.

In contrast, a revocable offer is personal to both parties and cannot pass to the heirs, guardian, or estate of either party. This rule applies whether or not the other party had notice of the death or incompetence.

Jeff Greenberg/Universal Images Group/Getty Images

If the owner of a commercial property dies before the end of the time period specified in an option contract, what happens to the deal?

Supervening Illegality. A statute or court decision that makes an offer illegal automatically terminates the offer. Example 11.10 Lee offers to lend Kim $10,000 at an annual interest rate of 15 percent. Before Kim can accept the offer, a law is enacted that prohibits interest rates higher than 8 percent. Lee's offer is automatically terminated. (If the statute is enacted after Kim accepts the offer, a valid contract is formed, but the contract may still be unenforceable.)

11–2 Acceptance

Acceptance The act of voluntarily agreeing, through words or conduct, to the terms of an offer, thereby creating a contract.

An acceptance is a voluntary act by the offeree that shows assent, or agreement, to the terms of an offer. The offeree's act may consist of words or conduct. The acceptance must be unequivocal and must be communicated to the offeror. Generally, only the person to whom the offer is made or that person's agent can accept the offer and create a binding contract. (See this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature for a discussion of how parties can sometimes inadvertently accept a contract via e-mail or text messages.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Can Your E-Mails Create a Valid Contract?

The widespread use of e-mail as an informal means of communication is taken for granted in the business world. Not surprisingly, parties considering an agreement often exchange offers and counteroffers via e-mail. The parties may believe that these informal electronic exchanges are for negotiation purposes only. But such communications can lead to the formation of valid contracts.

E-Mails and Employment Contracts

As in so many areas of business communications, contract negotiations are often carried out using e-mail. Consider the case of Andrew Kolchins, a commodities trader who worked for the brokerage firm Evolution Markets. As Kolchins's employment contract was about to expire, Evolution Markets' chief executive officer (CEO) sent him an e-mail offering him a new agreement based on the same terms as his existing deal. Kolchins replied with an e-mail that stated, "I accept, pls send contract." The CEO responded with his own e-mail that read, "Mazel. Looking forward to another great run." ("Mazel" is shorthand for mazel tov, a Hebrew phrase used to express congratulations.)

Evolution Markets never presented Kolchins with a new written contract, and eventually terminated his employment. A New York trial court dismissed Kolchins's breach of contract lawsuit against his ex-employer but was overruled by the state court of appeals. The higher court found that the e-mails contained an offer, an acceptance, and a congratulatory exclamation with a forward-looking statement about a continued working relationship. As such, these communications could form the basis for a valid employment contract.[a]

"Accidental" Contracts via E-Mail

When a series of e-mails signal intent to be bound, a contract may be formed, even though some language in the e-mails may be careless or accidental. Even if a party later claims to have had unstated objections to the terms, the e-mails will prevail. What matters is whether a court determines that it is reasonable for the receiving party to believe that there is an agreement.

Indeed, e-mail contracting has become so common that only unusually strange circumstances will cause a court to reject such contracts.[b] Furthermore, under the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act, a contract "may not be denied legal effect solely because an electronic record was used in its formation." Most states have adopted this act, at least in part.

Critical Thinking

How can a company structure e-mail negotiations to avoid "accidentally" forming a contract?

a. Kolchins v. Evolution Markets, Inc., 96 N.E.3d 784, 73 N.Y.3d 100 (2018).

b. See, for example, Copano Energy, LLC v. Bujnoch, __ S.W.3d ___, 63 Tex. Sup. Ct. J 348 (2020).

Focus Question 2

What elements are necessary for an effective acceptance?

11–2a Unequivocal Acceptance

To exercise the power of acceptance effectively, the offeree must accept unequivocally. This is the mirror image rule previously discussed. An acceptance may be unequivocal even though the offeree expresses dissatisfaction with the contract. For instance, "I accept the offer, but can you give me a better price?" or "I accept, but please send a written contract" is an effective acceptance. (Notice how important each word is!)

An acceptance cannot impose new conditions or change the terms of the original offer. If it does, the acceptance may be considered a counteroffer, which is a rejection of the original offer. For instance, the statement "I accept the offer but only if I can pay on ninety days' credit" is a counteroffer and not an unequivocal acceptance.

Note that even when the additional terms are construed as a counteroffer, the other party can accept the terms by words or by conduct. Case Example 11.11 Sonja Brown made a written offer to Lagrange Development to buy a particular house for $79,900. Lagrange's executive director, Terry Glazer, penciled in modifications to the offer—an increased purchase price of $84,200 and a later date for acceptance. Glazer initialed the changes and signed the document. Brown initialed the date change but not the price increase, and did not sign the revised contract. Nevertheless, Brown went through with the sale and received ownership of the property. When a dispute later arose as to the purchase price, a court found that Glazer's modification of the terms had constituted a counteroffer, which Brown had accepted by performance. Therefore, the contract was enforceable for the modified price of $84,200.[6]

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

11–2b Silence as Acceptance

Ordinarily, silence cannot constitute acceptance, even if the offeror states, "By your silence and inaction, you will be deemed to have accepted this offer." This general rule applies because an offeree should not be put under a burden of liability to act affirmatively in order to reject an offer. No consideration—that is, nothing of value—has passed to the offeree to impose such a liability.

In some instances, however, the offeree does have a duty to speak. If so, silence or inaction on the offeree's part will operate as an acceptance. Silence may be an acceptance when an offeree takes the benefit of offered services having had an opportunity to reject them and knowing that they were offered with the expectation of compensation.

Silence can also operate as an acceptance when the offeree has had prior dealings with the offeror. Example 11.12 Marabel's restaurant routinely receives shipments of produce from a certain supplier. That supplier notifies Marabel's that it is raising its prices because its crops were damaged by a late freeze. If the restaurant does not respond in any way, the silence may operate as an acceptance, and the supplier will be justified in continuing regular shipments.

andreas/E+/Getty Images

Why can silence operate as an acceptance to changes in contract terms between a restaurant and its regular produce supplier?

11–2c Communication of Acceptance

Whether the offeror must be notified of the acceptance depends on the nature of the contract. In a unilateral contract, the full performance of some act is called for. Acceptance is usually evident, and notification is therefore unnecessary (unless the law requires it or the offeror asks for it). In a bilateral contract, in contrast, communication of acceptance is necessary, because acceptance is in the form of a promise. The bilateral contract is formed when the promise is made rather than when the act is performed.

Case Example 11.13 Mohammed Kutite sought to lease a gas station operated by Majors Management. The closing date for the lease agreement was October 1. On September 27, Majors sent Kutite five documents to sign and have notarized before the closing date. Kutite did so and returned the documents on September 28. Kutite refused, however, to sign a separate document acknowledging that he would continue using the ATM machine that was already at the gas station.

On October 2, Majors informed Kutite that if he did not sign the ATM agreement, then the deal was off. Kutite sued for breach of contract, claiming that the agreement had been formalized on September 28. A federal appellate court disagreed, holding that Kutite could not unilaterally establish a valid contract simply by returning the five signed and notarized forms. Rather, a final step was necessary—a Majors's representative needed to give some indication of assent. Communication of this acceptance never occurred, as was made clear by the blank lines on the five documents still awaiting Majors's signed approval.[7]

Know This

A bilateral contract is a promise for a promise, and a unilateral contract is performance for a promise.

6. Brown v. Lagrange Development Corp., 2015 -Ohio- 133, 2015 WL 223877 (Ohio App. 2015).
7. Kutite, LLC v. Excell Petroleum, LLC, 780 Fed.Appx. 254 (6th Cir. 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

11–2d Mode and Timeliness of Acceptance

Acceptance in bilateral contracts must be timely. The general rule is that acceptance in a bilateral contract is timely if it is made before the offer is terminated. Problems may arise, though, when the parties involved are not dealing face to face. In such situations, the offeree should use an authorized mode of communication.

Mailbox Rule A common law rule that acceptance takes effect, and thus completes formation of the contract, at the time the offeree sends or delivers the acceptance via the communication mode expressly or impliedly authorized by the offeror.

The Mailbox Rule. Acceptance takes effect, and thus completes formation of the contract, at the time the offeree sends or delivers the acceptance via the mode of communication expressly or impliedly authorized by the offeror. This is the so-called mailbox rule, also called the deposited acceptance rule, which the majority of courts follow. Under this rule, if the authorized mode of communication is the mail, then an acceptance becomes valid when it is dispatched (placed in the control of the U.S. Postal Service)—not when it is received by the offeror. (Note, however, that if the offer stipulates when acceptance will be effective, then the offer will not be effective until the time specified.)

The mailbox rule does not apply to instantaneous forms of communication, such as when the parties are dealing face to face, by phone, by text, by video conferencing, or by e-mail. Under the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA—discussed later in this chapter), e-mail is considered sent when it either leaves the sender's control or is received by the recipient. This rule, which takes the place of the mailbox rule if the parties have agreed to conduct transactions electronically, allows an e-mail acceptance to become effective when sent.

Authorized Means of Communication. A means of communicating acceptance can be expressly authorized by the offeror or impliedly authorized by the facts and circumstances of the situation. An acceptance sent by means not expressly or impliedly authorized normally is not effective until it is received by the offeror.

When an offeror specifies how acceptance should be made, such as by overnight delivery, the contract is not formed unless the offeree uses that mode of acceptance. Both the offeror and the offeree are bound in contract the moment the specified means of acceptance is employed. Example 11.14 Motorola Mobility, Inc., offers to sell 144 Moto G8 Power smartphones to Call Me Plus phone stores. The offer states that Call Me Plus must accept the offer via FedEx overnight delivery. The acceptance is effective (and a binding contract is formed) the moment that Call Me Plus gives the overnight envelope containing the acceptance to the FedEx driver. ■

If the offeror does not expressly authorize a certain mode of acceptance, then acceptance can be made by any reasonable means.[8] Courts look at the prevailing business usages and the surrounding circumstances to determine whether the mode of acceptance used was reasonable. Usually, the offeror's choice of a particular means in making the offer implies that the offeree can use the same or a faster means for acceptance. Example 11.15 If the offer is made via USPS Priority Mail, it would be reasonable to accept the offer via Priority Mail or by a faster method, such as signed scanned documents sent as attachments via e-mail. ■

Substitute Method of Acceptance. Sometimes, the offeror authorizes a particular method of acceptance, but the offeree accepts by a different means. In that situation, the acceptance may still be effective if the substituted method serves the same purpose as the authorized means. Acceptance by a substitute method is not effective on dispatch, though. No contract will be formed until the acceptance is received by the offeror. Example 11.16 Bennion's offer specifies acceptance via FedEx overnight delivery but the offeree accepts instead by overnight delivery from UPS. The substitute method of acceptance will still be effective, but not until the offeror (Bennion) receives the acceptance from UPS. ■

---

8. Note that UCC 2–206(1)(a) states specifically that an acceptance of an offer for the sale of goods can be made by any medium that is reasonable under the circumstances.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

11–3 E-Contracts

E-Contract A contract that is formed electronically.

Numerous contracts are formed online. An electronic contract, or e-contract, must meet the same basic requirements (agreement, consideration, contractual capacity, and legality) as a paper contract. Disputes concerning e-contracts, however, tend to center on contract terms and whether the parties voluntarily agreed to those terms.

Online contracts may be formed not only for the sale of goods and services, but also for licensing. The "sale" of software generally involves a license, or a right to use the software, rather than the passage of title (ownership rights) from the seller to the buyer. Example 11.17 When Lauren downloads an app on her smartphone, she has to select "I agree" several times to the terms and conditions under which she will use the software. After she agrees to these terms (the licensing agreement), she can use the application.

As you read through the following subsections, keep in mind that although we typically refer to the offeror and the offeree as a seller and a buyer, in many online transactions these parties would be more accurately described as a licensor and a licensee.

11–3a Online Offers

Sellers doing business via the Internet can protect themselves against contract disputes and legal liability by creating offers that clearly spell out the terms that will govern their transactions if the offers are accepted. All important terms should be conspicuous and easy to view.

Displaying the Offer The seller's website should include a hypertext link to a page containing the full contract so that potential buyers are made aware of the terms to which they are assenting. The contract generally must be displayed online in a readable format such as in a twelve-point typeface. All provisions should be reasonably clear.

Example 11.18 Netquip sells a variety of heavy equipment, such as trucks and trailers, online at its website. Because Netquip's pricing schedule is very complex, the schedule must be fully provided and explained on the website. In addition, the terms of the sale (such as any warranties and the refund policy) must be fully disclosed.

Provisions to Include An important rule to keep in mind is that the offeror (seller) controls the offer and thus the resulting contract. The seller should therefore anticipate any desired contractual terms and provide for them in the offer. In some instances, a standardized contract form may suffice. At a minimum, an online offer should include the following provisions:

1. Acceptance of terms. A clause that clearly indicates what constitutes the buyer's agreement to the terms of the offer, such as a box containing the words "I accept" that the buyer can click on to indicate acceptance. (Mechanisms for accepting online offers will be discussed later in this chapter.)
2. Payment. A provision specifying how payment for the goods (including any applicable taxes) must be made.
3. Return policy. A statement of the seller's refund and return policies.
4. Disclaimer. Disclaimers of liability for certain uses of the goods. For instance, an online seller of business forms may add a disclaimer that the seller does not accept responsibility for the buyer's reliance on the forms rather than on an attorney's advice.
5. Limitation on remedies. A provision specifying the remedies available to the buyer if the goods are found to be defective or if the contract is otherwise breached. Any limitation of remedies should be clearly spelled out.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

6. Privacy policy. A statement indicating how the seller will use the information gathered about the buyer.
7. Dispute resolution. Provisions relating to dispute settlement, such as an arbitration clause.

Dispute-Settlement Provisions Online offers frequently include provisions relating to dispute settlement. For instance, the offer might include an arbitration clause specifying that any dispute arising under the contract will be arbitrated in a designated forum.

Case Example 11.19 Scott Rosendahl enrolled in an online college, Ashford University. He claimed that the school's adviser had told him that Ashford offered one of the cheapest undergraduate degree programs in the country. In fact, it did not. Rosendahl later sued the school, claiming that it had violated false advertising laws and had engaged in fraud and negligent misrepresentation. The university argued that the enrollment agreement clearly contained a requirement that all disputes be arbitrated. Rosendahl, like other students, had electronically assented to this agreement when he enrolled. Ashford presented the online application forms to the court, and the court dismissed Rosendahl's lawsuit. Rosendahl had agreed to arbitrate any disputes he had with Ashford.[9]

Forum-Selection Clause
A provision in a contract designating the court, jurisdiction, or tribunal that will decide any disputes arising under the contract.

Forum-Selection Clause. Many online contracts also contain a forum-selection clause indicating the forum, or location (such as a court or jurisdiction), for the resolution of any dispute arising under the contract. Significant jurisdictional issues can occur when parties are at a great distance, as they often are when they form contracts via the Internet. A forum-selection clause will help to avert future jurisdictional problems and also help to ensure that the seller will not be required to appear in court in a distant state.

Case Example 11.20 Rebecca Bextel developed a business plan to sell online greeting cards for the benefit of charitable organizations. She hired Tekstir, Inc., to develop the website for her venture, called Ecocards. Several months later, Bextel filed suit against Tekstir in a Wyoming state court, claiming the company had failed to meet its contractual obligations. Tekstir argued that the contract with Bextel included a forum-selection clause requiring any disputes to be ligated in Orange County, California. The Supreme Court of Wyoming held that the forum-selection clause was enforceable and granted Tekstir's motion to dismiss.[10]

Oleg Ribar/Shutterstock.com

The owner of a greeting card company in Wyoming sues a website designer in California. Is it fair to both parties if the forum-selection clause in their agreement requires that all disputes must be litigated in California? Why or why not?

Choice-of-Law Clause. Some online contracts may also include a choice-of-law clause, specifying that any dispute arising out of the contract will be settled in accordance with the law of a particular jurisdiction, such as a state or country. Choice-of-law clauses are particularly common in international contracts, but they may also appear in e-contracts to specify which state's laws will govern in the United States.

Sometimes, the same contract will include all three of these types of clauses (arbitration, forum-selection, and choice-of-law). Case Example 11.21 Xlibris Publishing provides services to authors who wish to self-publish their work. It offers, through its website, a variety of publishing packages to facilitate editing, publishing, and marketing. Avis Smith, a New York resident, had previously 9. Rosendahl v. Bridgepoint Education, Inc., 2012 WL 667049 (S.D.Cal. 2012).

10. Ecocards v. Tekstir, Inc., 2020 WY 38, __ P.3d. __ (2020).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

submitted his manuscript to Xlibris. Smith received an e-mail from Xlibris offering him a program at half price that would "provide the book what it deserves when it comes to exposure and publicity." Four days later, Smith contracted to purchase the Platinum Service Package from Xlibris for around $7,500 to be paid over three months.

A clause in the contract stated that any disputes between the parties would be arbitrated in Indianapolis, under the laws of Indiana. Communications between Smith and Xlibris deteriorated, and Smith ultimately filed a lawsuit against the company in a federal court in New York. Xlibris asked the court to compel arbitration in Indiana. The court ruled that Smith had consented to the arbitration, forum-selection, and choice-of-law clauses, which were enforceable. Smith was required to arbitrate the dispute in Indiana.[11]

11–3b Online Acceptances

The Restatement (Second) of Contracts states that parties may agree to a contract "by written or spoken words or by other action or by failure to act."[12] The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which governs sales contracts, has a similar provision. Section 2–204 of the UCC states that any contract for the sale of goods "may be made in any manner sufficient to show agreement, including conduct by both parties which recognizes the existence of such a contract." The courts have used these provisions in determining what constitutes an online acceptance.

Focus Question 3

How do click-on and shrink-wrap agreements differ?

Click-On Agreements The courts have concluded that the act of clicking on a box labeled "I accept" or "I agree" can indicate acceptance of an online offer. The agreement resulting from such an acceptance is often called a click-on agreement (sometimes, a click-on license or click-wrap agreement).

Click-on Agreement An agreement that arises when an online buyer clicks on "I agree" or otherwise indicates assent to be bound by the terms of an offer.

Generally, the law does not require that the parties have read all of the terms in a contract for it to be effective. Therefore, clicking on a box that states "I agree" to certain terms can be enough to bind a party to these terms. The terms may be contained on a website through which the buyer is obtaining goods or services, or they may appear on the screen of a computer, smartphone, or other device when software is downloaded from the Internet.

Case Example 11.22 Any person who agrees to work as an Uber driver must enter into a services agreement and driver addendum contract with Uber Technologies, Inc. The contracts include an arbitration provision. New drivers must click the "Yes, I agree" button to use the Uber App and to start working by picking up passengers.

A group of Chinese-speaking Uber drivers filed a breach of contract suit against the company. Uber responded with a motion to compel arbitration, which a federal district court granted. The plaintiffs had downloaded the Chinese version of the Uber App and could read the arbitration provision in their native language. Each had clicked on the button and agreed to arbitrate any disputes (whether or not they had actually read the clause). Thus, the arbitration clause was enforceable, and the lawsuit was dismissed.[13]

MikeDotta/Shutterstock.com

Does clicking on the "I agree" button of Uber's downloadable service agreement constitute acceptance of the arbitration clause in the agreement?

11. Smith v. Xlibris Publishing, 2016 WL 5678566 (E.D.N.Y. 2016).
12. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 19.
13. Kai Peng v. Uber Technologies, Inc., 237 F.Supp.3d 36 (E.D.N.Y. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

In the following case, a lottery entrant claimed that the lottery breached its contract with him when it denied him the prize. The lottery acknowledged that he had accepted its offer to contract when he entered the contest online, and that his ticket had won the drawing. But it asserted that he was disqualified because he had failed to comply with the terms of the contract—that is, the rules of the contest.

Case 11.3

Bailey v. Kentucky Lottery Corp.

Kentucky Court of Appeals, 542 S.W.3d 305 (2018).

Facts Kentucky Lottery Corporation operates the Kentucky state lotteries. In a "second-chance" promotion, a scratch-off ticket that revealed an "FTP" ("Final Top Prize") symbol could be entered to win $175,000 in a drawing. The lottery operates a website at which individuals can register for an online account and enter the contest. The contest rules required an entrant to provide a valid phone number and mailing address, and keep them current. If the winner could not be reached within seven days after the drawing, disqualification would result.

Brett Bailey established an online account and entered several scratch-off tickets in the promotion. He provided a mailing address, but it was not correct, and before the drawing, he changed his phone number without notifying the lottery. Bailey's ticket won, but the lottery was unable to reach him—it could not contact him by phone, and a certified letter sent to the incorrect address was undeliverable. After expiration of the seven-day period, the prize was awarded to an eligible alternate. Later, Bailey filed a suit in a Kentucky state court against Kentucky Lottery Corporation, claiming breach of contract. The court granted a summary judgment to the defendant. Bailey appealed.

Issue Did Bailey accept the lottery's online contract terms and was he bound by those terms?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court in favor of the lottery. "Bailey failed to comply with the requirements of the lottery's promotion, and the lottery had a contractual right to disqualify his entry from the drawing."

Reason Bailey entered the promotion by providing information on the lottery's website and by agreeing to the terms of use and to all other rules and regulations that applied to online account holders. The appellate court pointed out, "The purchase of a lottery ticket is the acceptance of an offer to contract and . . . the terms of the contract are the rules and regulations of the lottery." Here, Bailey agreed to the terms of the FTP promotion when he established an online account and entered his scratch-off tickets in the drawing. Those terms included requirements to provide and keep current a correct phone number and address. The rules further stated that a winner who could not be reached within a specific period after the drawing would be disqualified. Bailey did not provide a valid address, and he did not keep his phone number updated. Due to these omissions on Bailey's part, the lottery was unable to contact him when his ticket won the drawing, and the prize was awarded to another eligible entrant. "The court did not err when it granted summary judgment to the lottery."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment The lottery's rules did not provide for entrants to be notified by e-mail, but contracts generally impose on the parties a duty to do everything necessary to carry them out. Did the lottery breach its contract with Bailey by failing to notify him by e-mail? Explain.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Bailey had complied with the lottery's rules by keeping his address and phone number current, but that the lottery had not tried to notify him before the expiration of the seven-day period. Would the result have been different? Why or why not?

Ethical Issue

How enforceable are click-on agreements to donate funds to a charity? Millions of online shoppers use PayPal as a convenient payment method. But PayPal can also be used to donate to a favorite charity. PayPal offers its users a Giving Fund platform. By going to PayPal's charity-giving platform, a potential contributor can choose from a list of charities. The Giving Fund platform requires two steps: clicking on the donation button for the charity and specifying the amount.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Many of the listed charities, though, have not yet actually signed up with PayPal to receive these donated funds. What happens when a contributor clicks on a listed charity that has not signed up? Apparently, neither the contributor nor the charity is notified, and PayPal sends the funds to other listed charities that are signed up with its service. Consequently, contributors' funds may go to charities that they did not choose, and charities may fail to receive donations meant for them. A number of individuals have filed a class-action lawsuit against PayPal based on this practice. The suit alleges that PayPal misled those making charitable contributions on its Giving Fund platform.[14]

Shrink-Wrap Agreements

A shrink-wrap agreement (or shrink-wrap license) is an agreement whose terms are expressed inside a box in which goods are packaged. (The term shrink-wrap refers to the plastic that covers the box.) Usually, according to the agreement, the party who opens the box automatically accepts the terms by keeping the goods. Similarly, by opening a software package, the purchaser agrees to abide by the terms of the limited license agreement.

Shrink-Wrap Agreement An agreement whose terms are expressed in a document located inside a box in which goods (usually software) are packaged.

Example 11.23 Arial orders a new iPhone from Best Electronics, which ships it to her. Along with the iPhone, the box contains an agreement setting forth the terms of the sale, including what remedies are available. The document also states that Arial's retention of the iPhone for longer than thirty days will be construed as an acceptance of the terms.

In most instances, a shrink-wrap agreement is not between a retailer and a buyer, but is between the manufacturer of the hardware or software and the ultimate buyer-user of the product. The terms generally concern warranties, remedies, and other issues associated with the use of the product.

Shrink-Wrap Agreements and Enforceable Contract Terms. In some cases, the courts have enforced the terms of shrink-wrap agreements in the same way as the terms of other contracts. These courts have reasoned that by including the terms with the product, the seller proposed a contract that the buyer could accept by using the product after having an opportunity to read the terms. Thus, a buyer's failure to object to terms contained within a shrink-wrapped software package may constitute an acceptance of the terms by conduct.

Shrink-Wrap Terms That May Not Be Enforced. Sometimes, courts have refused to enforce certain terms included in shrink-wrap agreements because the buyer did not expressly consent to them. An important factor is when the parties form their contract.

If a buyer orders a product over the telephone, for instance, and the seller does not mention terms such as an arbitration clause or a forum-selection clause, clearly the buyer has not expressly agreed to these terms. If the buyer discovers the clauses after the parties entered into a contract, a court may conclude that those clauses were proposals for additional terms and not part of the contract.

Case Example 11.24 David Noble purchased a Samsung Smartwatch from an AT&T store after seeing ads saying that its battery life was twenty-four to forty-eight hours with typical use. But Noble's Smartwatch battery lasted only about four hours, so he returned the Smartwatch and received a new one. The second Smartwatch suffered from the same battery problem. Noble again went back to the AT&T store and, this time, was directed to ship the Smartwatch to Samsung. Samsung then sent Noble a third Smartwatch with equally poor battery life. Noble then filed a suit against Samsung in a federal district court. Samsung filed a motion to compel arbitration, which the district court denied. Samsung appealed.

14. Friends for Health v. PayPal, Inc., 2017 WL 782249 (N.D.Ill. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Inside each of the Smartwatch boxes that Noble received was a tiny booklet titled "Health and Safety and Warranty Guide" that included a standard Limited Warranty. On page ninety-seven of the guide, a boldface question read "What is the procedure for resolving disputes?" Under that was a statement saying that any disputes would be resolved exclusively through binding arbitration, and not by a court or jury. The federal appellate court held that this language "tucked away in a brochure" was not sufficient to show that Noble had agreed to arbitration. Because consumers were not given reasonable notice of the arbitration clause (on the outside of the guide or somewhere obvious in the packaging), it was unenforceable.[15]

Browse-Wrap Terms Terms or conditions of use presented when an online buyer downloads a product but to which the buyer does not have to agree before installing or using the product.

Browse-Wrap Terms Like the terms of a click-on agreement, browse-wrap term can occur in a transaction conducted over the Internet. Unlike a click-on agreement, however, browse-wrap terms do not require the buyer or user to assent to the terms before, say, downloading or using certain software. Case Example 11.25 James McCants bought dietary supplements over the Internet that allegedly seriously damaged his liver. When he sued the seller, Vitacost.com, Inc., the company moved for arbitration based on a clause in the browse-wrap terms. To see the arbitration clause, a purchaser would have had to scroll to the bottom of the seller's Web page and click on a hyperlink labeled "Terms and Conditions." The court held that these browse-wrap terms were not part of the sales agreement and were thus unenforceable.[16]

11–3c Federal Law on E-Signatures and E-Documents

E-Signature An electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record.

An e-signature has been defined as "an electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record."[17] Electronic documents can be signed in a number of ways. Thus, e-signatures include encrypted digital signatures, names (intended as signatures) at the ends of e-mail messages, and "clicks" on a Web page if the clicks include some means of identification.

Under the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-SIGN Act),[18] no contract, record, or signature may be "denied legal effect" solely because it is in electronic form. An electronic signature is as valid as a signature on paper, and an e-document can be as enforceable as a paper one.

For an e-signature to be enforceable, however, the contracting parties must have agreed to use electronic signatures. For an electronic document to be valid, it must be in a form that can be retained and accurately reproduced.

The E-SIGN Act does not apply to all types of documents. Contracts and documents that are exempt include court papers, divorce decrees, evictions, foreclosures, health-insurance terminations, prenuptial agreements, and wills. Also, the only agreements governed by the UCC that fall under this law are those covered by Articles 2 and 2A and UCC 1–107 and 1–206. Despite these limitations, the E-SIGN Act significantly expanded contracting online.

11–3d Partnering Agreements

Partnering Agreement An agreement between a seller and a buyer who frequently do business with each other concerning the terms and conditions that will apply to all subsequently formed electronic contracts.

One way online sellers and buyers can prevent disputes over signatures in their e-contracts, as well as disputes over the terms and conditions of those contracts, is to form partnering agreements. In a partnering agreement, a seller and a buyer who frequently do business with each other agree in advance on the terms and conditions that will apply to all transactions subsequently conducted electronically. The partnering agreement can also establish special access and identification codes to be used by the parties when transacting business electronically.

---

15. Noble v. Samsung Electronics Company, Inc., 682 Fed.Appx. 113 (3d Cir. 2017).
16. Vitacost.com, Inc. v. McCants, 210 So.3d 761 (Fla.App. 2017).
17. This definition is from the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act.
18. 15 U.S.C. Sections 7001 et seq.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

A partnering agreement reduces the likelihood that disputes will arise under the contract because the buyer and the seller have agreed in advance to the terms and conditions that will accompany each sale. Furthermore, if a dispute does arise, a court or arbitration forum will be able to refer to the partnering agreement when determining the parties' intent.

11–4 The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act

Focus Question 4

What is the primary purpose of the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act?

The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and the American Law Institute promulgated the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA). The UETA has been adopted, at least in part, by forty-eight states.

The primary purpose of the UETA is to remove barriers to e-commerce by giving the same legal effect to electronic records and signatures as is given to paper documents and signatures. The UETA broadly defines an e-signature as "an electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record."[19] A record is "information that is inscribed on a tangible medium or that is stored in an electronic or other medium and is retrievable in perceivable [visual] form."[20]

Record Information that is either inscribed on a tangible medium or stored in an electronic or other medium and is retrievable in visual form.

11–4a The Scope and Applicability of the UETA

The UETA does not create new rules for electronic contracts. Rather, it establishes that records, signatures, and contracts may not be denied enforceability solely due to their electronic form.

The UETA does not apply to all writings and signatures. It covers only electronic records and electronic signatures relating to a transaction. A transaction is defined as an interaction between two or more parties relating to business, commercial, or governmental activities.[21] The act specifically does not apply to wills or testamentary trusts or to transactions governed by the UCC (other than those covered by Articles 2 and 2A).[22] In addition, the provisions of the UETA allow the states to exclude its application to other areas of law.

11–4b The Federal E-SIGN Act and the UETA

Congress passed the E-SIGN Act a year after the UETA was presented to the states for adoption. Thus, a significant issue was to what extent the federal E-SIGN Act preempted the UETA as adopted by the states.

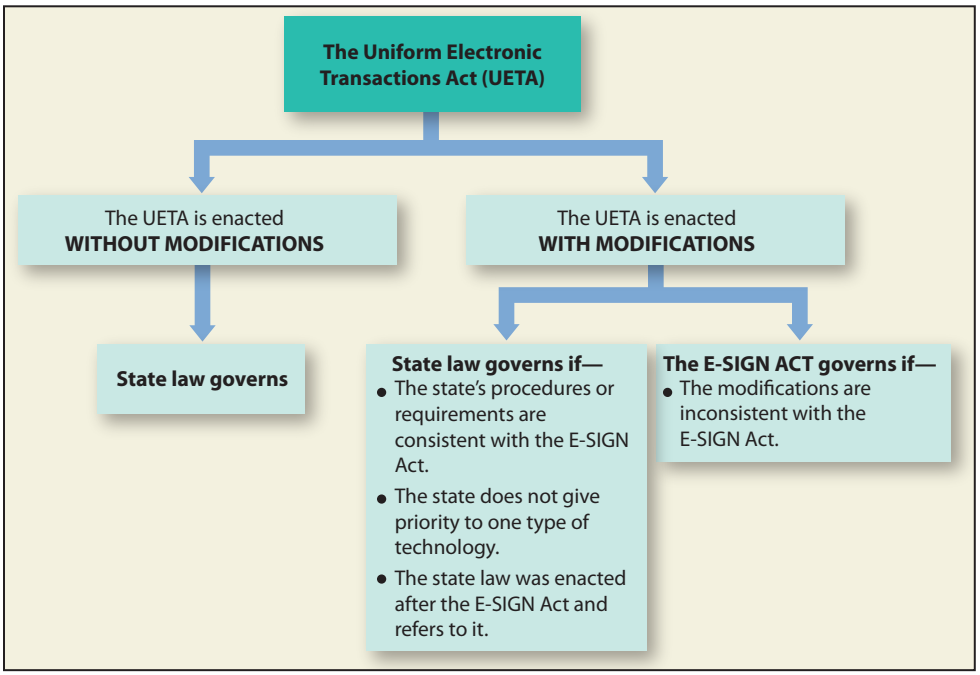
The E-SIGN Act[23] explicitly provides that if a state has enacted the uniform version of the UETA, it is not preempted by the E-SIGN Act. In other words, if the state has enacted the UETA without modification, state law will govern.

The problem is that many states have enacted nonuniform (modified) versions of the UETA, largely for the purpose of excluding other areas of state law from the UETA's terms. The E-SIGN Act specifies that those exclusions will be preempted to the extent that they are inconsistent with the E-SIGN Act's provisions.

19. UETA 102(8).
20. UETA 102(15).
21. UETA 2(12) and 3.
22. UETA 3(b).
23. 15 U.S.C. Section 7002(2)(A)(i).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The E-SIGN Act explicitly allows the states to enact alternative requirements for the use of electronic records or electronic signatures. Generally, however, the requirements must be consistent with the provisions of the E-SIGN Act, and the state must not give greater legal status or effect to one specific type of technology. Additionally, if a state enacts alternative requirements after the E-SIGN Act was adopted, the state law must specifically refer to the E-SIGN Act.



The relationship between the E-SIGN Act and the UETA is illustrated in Exhibit 11–1.

11–4c Highlights of the UETA

The UETA will not apply to a transaction unless the parties have agreed to conduct transactions by electronic means. The agreement may be explicit, or it may be implied by the conduct of the parties and the surrounding circumstances.[24] It may be reasonable, for instance, to infer that a person who gives out a business card with an e-mail address on it has consented to transact business electronically.[25] Agreement may also be inferred from a letter or other writing, as well as from verbal communication. Furthermore, a person who has previously agreed to an electronic transaction can withdraw this consent and refuse to conduct further business electronically.

Attribution Under the UETA, if an electronic record or signature is the act of a particular person, the record or signature may be attributed to that person. If someone types their name at the bottom of an e-mail purchase order, for instance, that name will qualify as a "signature" and be attributed to the person whose name appears.

Exhibit 11–1 The E-SIGN Act and the UETA

24. UETA 5(b).
25. UETA 5, Comment 4B.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The UETA contains no express provisions about what constitutes fraud or whether an agent is authorized to enter a contract. Under the UETA, other state laws control if any issues relating to agency, authority, forgery, or contract formation arise. If existing state law requires a document to be notarized, the electronic signature of a notary public or other person authorized to verify signatures satisfies this requirement.

The Effect of Errors The UETA encourages, but does not require, the use of security procedures (such as encryption) to verify changes to electronic documents and to correct errors. If the parties have agreed to a security procedure and one party does not detect an error because of failure to follow the procedure, the conforming party can legally avoid the effect of the change or error.

To avoid the effect of errors, a party must promptly notify the other party of the error and of the intent not to be bound by the error. In addition, the party must take reasonable steps to return any benefit received. Parties cannot avoid a transaction if they have benefited.

Timing An electronic record is considered sent when it is properly directed to the intended recipient in a form readable by the recipient's computer system. Once the electronic record leaves the control of the sender or comes under the control of the recipient, the UETA deems it to have been sent. An electronic record is considered received when it enters the recipient's processing system in a readable form—even if no individual is aware of its receipt.

Practice and Review

Shane Durbin wanted to have a recording studio custom-built in his home. He sent invitations to a number of local contractors to submit bids on the project. Rory Amstel submitted the lowest bid, which was $20,000 less than any of the other bids Durbin received. Durbin called Amstel to ascertain the type and quality of the materials that were included in the bid and to find out if he could substitute a superior brand of acoustic tiles for the same bid price. Amstel said he would have to check into the price difference. The parties also discussed a possible start date for construction.

Two weeks later, Durbin changed his mind and decided not to go forward with his plan to build a recording studio. Amstel filed a suit against Durbin for breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Amstel's bid meet the requirements of an offer? Explain.
2. Was there an acceptance of the offer? Why or why not?
3. Suppose that the court determines that the parties did not reach an agreement. Further suppose that Amstel, in anticipation of building Durbin's studio, had purchased materials and refused other jobs so that he would have time in his schedule for Durbin's project. Under what theory discussed in the chapter might Amstel attempt to recover these costs?
4. How is an offer terminated? Assuming that Durbin did not inform Amstel that he was rejecting the offer, was the offer terminated at any time described here? Explain.

Debate This

The terms and conditions in click-on agreements are so long and detailed that no one ever reads the agreements. Therefore, the act of clicking on "I agree" is not really an acceptance.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

acceptance 269
agreement 262
browse-wrap terms 278
click-on agreement 275
counteroffer 268
e-contract 273
e-signature 278
forum-selection clause 274 mailbox rule 272 mirror image rule 268
offer 262
option contract 268 partnering agreement 278 record 279 revocation 267
shrink-wrap agreement 277

Chapter Summary: Agreement

Offer	1. Intention—There must be a serious, objective intent by the offeror to become bound by the offer. Nonoffer situations include (a) expressions of opinion; (b) statements of future intent; (c) preliminary negotiations; (d) invitations to bid; (e) advertisements and price lists; and (f) live and online auctions. 2. Definiteness—The terms of the offer must be sufficiently definite to be ascertainable by the parties or by a court. 3. Communication—The offer must be communicated to the offeree. 4. Termination of the offer—The offer can be terminated either by the action of the parties or by operation of law. a. The parties can either revoke or reject the offer. Some offers, such as a merchant's firm offer and option contracts, are irrevocable. A counteroffer is a rejection of the original offer and the making of a new offer. b. An offer terminates by operation of law through a lapse of time, destruction of the specific subject of the offer, death or incompetence of the parties, or the supervening illegality of the proposed contract.
Acceptance	1. Can be made only by the offeree or the offeree's agent. 2. Must be unequivocal. Under the common law (mirror image rule), if new terms or conditions are added to the acceptance, it will be considered a counteroffer. 3. Except in a few situations, an offeree's silence does not constitute an acceptance. 4. Communication of acceptance depends on the nature of the contract. In a unilateral contract, full performance is called for. In a bilateral contract, communication of acceptance is necessary because acceptance is in the form of a promise. 5. Acceptance in bilateral contracts must be timely and takes effect when the offeree sends or delivers the acceptance via the mode of communication authorized by the offeror.
E-Contracts	1. Online offers—The terms of a contract offer presented via the Internet should be as inclusive as the terms in an offer made in a written (paper) document. The offer should be displayed in an easily readable format and should include some mechanism, such as an "I agree" or "I accept" box, by which the customer can accept the offer. Because jurisdictional issues frequently arise with online transactions, the offer should include dispute-settlement provisions and may include a forum-selection clause. 2. Online acceptances— a. Click-on agreements are created when a buyer, completing an online transaction, is required to indicate assent to be bound by the terms of an offer by clicking on a box that says, for instance, "I agree." The terms of the agreement may appear on the website through which the buyer is obtaining goods or services, or they may appear on a computer screen when software is downloaded. b. The terms of a shrink-wrap agreement are expressed inside a box in which goods are packaged. The party who opens the box is informed that keeping the goods indicates agreement to the terms of the shrink-wrap agreement. c. Browse-wrap terms do not require the buyer or user to assent to the terms before, say, downloading or using certain software.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

	3. Federal law on e-signatures and e-documents— a. The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) defines an e-signature as "an electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record." E-signatures may include encrypted digital signatures, names at the ends of e-mail messages, and clicks on a Web page. b. The Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-SIGN Act) gave validity to e-signatures by providing that no contract, record, or signature may be "denied legal effect" solely because it is in an electronic form. 4. Partnering agreements—A seller and a buyer who frequently do business with each other may agree in advance on the terms and conditions that will apply to all transactions subsequently conducted electronically.
The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA)	The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) has been adopted, at least in part, by most states, to create rules to support the enforcement of e-contracts. Under the UETA, contracts entered into online, as well as other electronic documents, are presumed to be valid. The UETA does not apply to certain transactions governed by the UCC or to wills or testamentary trusts.

Issue Spotters

1. Fidelity Corporation offers to hire Ron to replace Monica, who has given Fidelity a month's notice of her intent to leave the company. Fidelity gives Ron a week to decide whether to accept. Two days later, Monica decides not to leave and signs an employment contract with Fidelity for another year. The next day, Monica tells Ron of the new contract. Ron immediately e-mails a formal letter of acceptance to Fidelity. Do Fidelity and Ron have a contract? Why or why not? (See Offer.)
2. Applied Products, Inc., does business with Beltway Distributors, Inc., online. Under the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act, what determines the effect of the electronic documents evidencing the parties' deal? Is a party's "signature" necessary? Explain. (See The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

11–1. Offer. Ball writes to Sullivan and inquires how much Sullivan is asking for a specific forty-acre tract of land Sullivan owns. Ball then receives a letter from Sullivan stating, "I will not take less than $60,000 for the forty-acre tract as specified." Ball immediately sends Sullivan a fax stating, "I accept your offer for $60,000 for the forty-acre tract as specified." Discuss whether Ball can hold Sullivan to a contract for sale of the land. (See Offer.)

11–2. Shrink-Wrap Agreements. TracFone Wireless, Inc., sells phones and wireless service. The phones are sold for less than their cost, and TracFone recoups this loss by selling prepaid airtime for their use on its network. Software in the phones prohibits their use on other networks. The phones are sold subject to the condition that the buyer agrees "not to tamper with or alter the software." This condition is printed on the packaging. Bequator Corp. bought at least 18,616 of the phones, disabled the software so that they could be used on other networks, and resold them. Is Bequator liable for breach of contract? Explain. [TracFone Wireless, Inc. v. Bequator Corp., Ltd., 2011 WL 1427635 (S.D.Fla. 2011)] (See E-Contracts.)

11–3. Online Acceptances. Heather Reasonover opted to try Internet service from Clearwire Corp. Clearwire sent her a confirmation e-mail that included a link to its website. Clearwire also sent her a modem. In the enclosed written materials, at the bottom of a page, in small type was the website URL. When Reasonover plugged in the modem, an "I accept terms" box appeared. Without clicking on the box, Reasonover quit the page. A clause in Clearwire's "Terms of Service," accessible only through its website, required its subscribers to submit any dispute to arbitration. Is Reasonover bound to this clause? Why or why not? [Kwan v. Clearwire Corp., 2012 WL 32380 (W.D.Wash. 2012)] (See E-Contracts.)

11–4. Acceptance. Judy Olsen, Kristy Johnston, and their mother, Joyce Johnston, owned seventy-eight acres of real property on Eagle Creek in Meagher County, Montana. When Joyce died, she left her interest in the property to Kristy. Kristy wrote to Judy, offering to buy Judy's interest or to sell her own interest to Judy. She requested that Judy "please respond to Bruce Townsend." In a letter to Kristy—not to Bruce—Judy accepted the offer to buy Kristy's interest in the property. By that time, however, Kristy had offered to sell her interest to their brother, Dave, and he had accepted. Did Judy and Kristy have an enforceable binding contract, entitling Judy to specific performance? Or did Kristy's offer so limit its acceptance to one exclusive mode that Judy's reply was not effective? Discuss. [Olsen v. Johnston, 368 Mont. 347, 301 P.3d 791 (2013)] (See Acceptance.)

11–5. Acceptance. Amy Kemper was seriously injured when her motorcycle was struck by a vehicle driven by Christopher Brown. Kemper's attorney wrote to Statewide Claims Services,

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

the administrator for Brown's insurer, asking for "all the insurance money that Mr. Brown had under his insurance policy." In exchange, the letter indicated that Kemper would sign a "limited release" on Brown's liability, provided that it did not include any language requiring her to reimburse Brown or his insurance company for any of their incurred costs. Statewide then sent a check and release form to Kemper, but the release demanded that Kemper "place money in an escrow account in regards to any and all liens pending." Kemper refused the demand, claiming that Statewide's response was a counteroffer rather than an unequivocal acceptance of the settlement offer. Did Statewide and Kemper have an enforceable agreement? Discuss. [Kemper v. Brown, 325 Ga.App. 806, 754 S.E.2d 141 (2014)] (See Acceptance.)

11–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Requirements of the Offer. Technical Consumer Products, Inc. (TCP), makes and distributes energy-efficient lighting products. Emily Bahr was TCP's district sales manager in Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota when the company announced the details of a bonus plan. District sales managers who achieved 100 percent year-over-year sales growth and a 42 percent gross margin would earn 200 percent of their base salaries as a bonus. TCP retained absolute discretion to modify the plan. Bahr's base salary was $42,500. Her final sales results for the year showed 113 percent year-over-year sales growth and a 42 percent gross margin. She anticipated a bonus of $85,945, but TCP could not afford to pay the bonuses as planned, and Bahr received only $34,229. In response to Bahr's claim for breach of contract, TCP argued that the bonus plan was too indefinite to be an offer. Is TCP correct? Explain. [Bahr v. Technical Consumer Products, Inc., 601 Fed. Appx. 359 (6th Cir. 2015)] (See Offer.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 11–6, go to Appendix E.

11–7. Acceptance. Altisource Portfolio Solutions, Inc., is a global corporation that provides real property owners with services that include property preservation—repairs, debris removal, and so on. Lucas Contracting, Inc., is a small trade contractor in Carrollton, Ohio. On behalf of Altisource, Berghorst Enterprises, LLC, hired Lucas to perform preservation work on certain foreclosed properties in eastern Ohio. When Berghorst did not pay for the work, Lucas filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Altisource. Before the trial, Lucas e-mailed the terms of a settlement. The same day, Altisource e-mailed a response that did not challenge or contradict Lucas's proposal and indicated agreement to it. Two days later, however, Altisource forwarded a settlement document that contained additional terms. Which proposal most likely satisfies the element of agreement to establish a contract? Explain. [Lucas Contracting, Inc. v. Altisource Portfolio Solutions, Inc., 2016 -Ohio- 474 (2016)] (See Acceptance.)

11–8. Online Acceptances. Airbnb, Inc., maintains a website that lists, advertises, and takes fees or commissions for property rentals posted on the site. To offer or book accommodations on the site, a party must register and create an account. The sign-up screen states, "By clicking 'Sign Up' . . . you confirm that you accept the Terms of Service" (TOS). The TOS, which are hyperlinked, include a mandatory arbitration provision. Francesco Plazza registered with Airbnb and created an account but did not read the TOS. Later, Plazza filed a suit in a federal district court against Airbnb, alleging that the defendant was acting as an unlicensed real estate broker and committing deceptive trade practices in violation of New York state law. Airbnb filed a motion to compel arbitration, pursuant to the TOS. Can Plazza avoid arbitration? Explain. [Plazza v. Airbnb, Inc., 289 F.Supp.3d 537 (S.D.N.Y. 2018)] (See E-Contracts.)

11–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Intention. The Prince Hall Grand Lodge of Washington is a fraternal association incorporated in the state of Washington. The Grand Lodge Constitution provides that the Grand Master "shall decide all questions of . . . Masonic law." Grand Master Gregory Wraggs suspended the membership of Lonnie Traylor for "un-Masonic conduct." Traylor asked Wraggs to revoke the suspension and prepared a "Memo of Understanding." Wraggs agreed to talk but declined to revoke the suspension and did not sign the memo. Traylor filed a suit in a Washington state court against the Grand Lodge and Wraggs, alleging that the Grand Master's failure to revoke Traylor's suspension was a breach of contract. [Traylor v. Most Worshipful Prince Hall Grand Lodge, 197 Wash.App. 1026 (Div. 2 2017)] (See Offer.)

1. Was it ethical of Wraggs to agree to talk to Traylor but decline to revoke his suspension? Use the IDDR approach to decide.
2. On what basis would the court likely hold that there was no contract between Wraggs and Traylor? Is it unethical of Traylor to assert otherwise? Discuss, using the IDDR approach.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

11–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—E-Contracts. To download a specific app to your smartphone or tablet device, you usually have to check a box indicating that you agree to the company's terms and conditions. Most individuals do so without ever reading those terms and conditions. Print out a specific set of terms and conditions from a downloaded app to use in this assignment. All group members should print out the same set of terms and conditions. (See E-Contracts.)

1. One group will determine which of these terms and conditions are favorable to the company.
2. Another group will determine which of these terms and conditions could conceivably be favorable to the individual.
3. A third group will determine which terms and conditions, on net, favor the company too much.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Consideration, Capacity, and Legality

12

"Liberty of contract is not an absolute concept. It is relative to many conditions of time and place and circumstance."

Benjamin Cardozo
1870–1938
(Associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, 1932–1938)

Courts generally tend to enforce contracts, and much of the law is devoted to aiding the enforceability of contracts. Before a court will enforce a contractual promise, however, it must be convinced that there was some exchange of consideration underlying the bargain.

Furthermore, as indicated in the chapter-opening quotation, "liberty of contract" is not absolute. In other words, not all people can make legally binding contracts at all times. Contracts entered into by persons lacking the capacity to do so may be voidable. Similarly, contracts calling for the performance of an illegal act are illegal and thus void—they are not contracts at all.

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What are the two elements of consideration?
2. In what circumstances might a promise be enforced despite a lack of consideration?
3. Does a minor have the capacity to enter into an enforceable contract? What does it mean to disaffirm a contract?
4. Under what circumstances will courts enforce a covenant not to compete?
5. What are the consequences of entering an illegal agreement?

12–1 Consideration

In any legal system, some promises will be enforced, and other promises will not be enforced. The simple fact that a party has made a promise does not necessarily mean that the promise is enforceable.

Under the common law, a primary basis for the enforcement of promises is consideration. Consideration usually is defined as the value given in return for a promise. Often, consideration is broken down into two parts: (1) something of legally sufficient value must be given in exchange for the promise, and (2) there must be a bargained-for exchange.

Consideration The value given in return for a promise or performance in a contractual agreement.

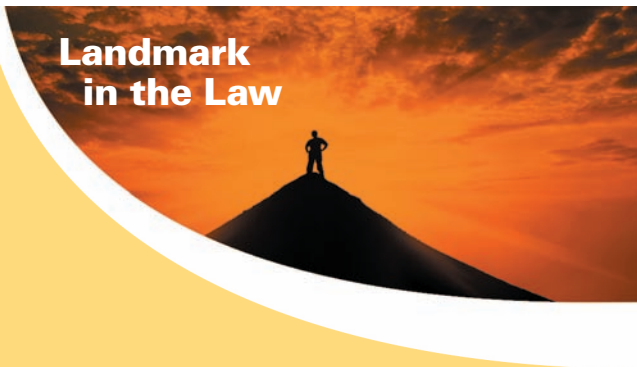
Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus Question 1

What are the two elements of consideration?

12–1a Legally Sufficient Value

To be legally sufficient, consideration must be something of value in the eyes of the law. The "something of legally sufficient value" may consist of any of the following:



1. A promise to do something that one has no prior legal duty to do.
2. The performance of an action that one is otherwise not obligated to undertake (such as providing accounting services).
3. The refraining from an action that one has a legal right to undertake (called a forbearance).

Forbearance The act of refraining from an action that one has a legal right to undertake.

Consideration in bilateral contracts normally consists of a promise in return for a promise. In a contract for the sale of goods, for instance, the seller promises to ship specific goods to the buyer, and the buyer promises to pay for those goods when they are received. Each of these promises constitutes consideration for the contract.

In contrast, unilateral contracts involve a promise in return for a performance. Example 12.1 Anita says to her neighbor, "If you paint my garage, I will pay you $800." Anita's neighbor paints the garage. The act of painting the garage is the consideration that creates Anita's contractual obligation to pay her neighbor $800.

What if, in return for a promise to pay, a person refrains from pursuing harmful habits, such as the use of tobacco and alcohol? Does such forbearance create consideration for the contract? This was the issue in the 1891 case Hamer v. Sidway, which we present as this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature.

Hamer v. Sidway (1891)

In Hamer v. Sidway,[a] the issue before the court arose from a contract created in 1869 between William Story, Sr., and his nephew, William Story II. The uncle promised his nephew that if the nephew refrained from drinking alcohol, using tobacco, and playing billiards and cards for money until he reached the age of twenty-one, the uncle would pay him $5,000 (about $75,000 in today's dollars). The nephew, who indulged occasionally in all of these "vices," agreed to refrain from them and did so for the next six years.

Following his twenty-first birthday in 1875, the nephew wrote to his uncle that he had performed his part of the bargain and was thus entitled to the promised $5,000 (plus interest). A few days later, the uncle wrote the nephew a letter stating, "[Y]ou shall have the five thousand dollars, as I promised you." The uncle said that the money was in the bank and that the nephew could "consider this money on interest."

a. 124 N.Y. 538, 27 N.E. 256 (1891).

The Issue of Consideration The nephew left the money in the care of his uncle, who held it for the next twelve years. When the uncle died in 1887, however, the executor of the uncle's estate refused to pay the $5,000 (plus interest) claim brought by Hamer, a third party to whom the promise had been assigned. (The law allows parties to assign, or transfer, rights in contracts to third parties.) The executor, Sidway, contended that the contract was invalid because there was insufficient consideration to support it. The uncle had received nothing, and the nephew had actually benefited by fulfilling the uncle's wishes. Therefore, no contract existed.

The Court's Conclusion Although a lower court upheld Sidway's position, the New York Court of Appeals reversed and ruled in favor of the plaintiff, Hamer. "The promisee used tobacco, occasionally drank liquor, and he had a legal right to do so," the court stated. "That right he abandoned for a period of years upon the strength of the promise of the testator [one who makes a will] that for such forbearance he would give him $5,000. We need not speculate on the effort which may have been required to give up the use of those stimulants. It is sufficient that he restricted his lawful freedom of action within certain prescribed limits upon the faith of his uncle's agreement."

Application to Today's World Although this case was decided more than a century ago, the principles enunciated by the court remain applicable to contracts formed today, including online contracts. For a contract to be valid and binding, consideration must be given, and that consideration must be something of legally sufficient value.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

12–1b Bargained-for Exchange

The second element of consideration is that it must provide the basis for the bargain struck between the contracting parties. The item of value must be given or promised by the promisor (offeror) in return for the promisee's promise or performance.

This element of bargained-for exchange distinguishes contracts from gifts. Case Example 12.2 Rachel Thomas was admitted to a hospital emergency room with pregnancy-related complications. The attending physician, Dr. Archer, recommended that she be transported by medevac (helicopter) to a different facility. The woman and her husband informed the physician that they needed their insurer's preauthorization for that course of action or they could be personally liable for the costs. Dr. Archer allegedly promised to call the insurer and, if it would not approve the medevac, have the hospital bear the costs itself. But the physician failed to contact the insurer until much later, and the insurer declined coverage.

The couple sued the hospital, claiming breach of contract by Dr. Archer. The court ruled in favor of the hospital, and the case was appealed to the Alaska Supreme Court. The court held that the physician's alleged promise about insurance and payment did not give rise to an enforceable contract. There was no evidence that the hospital sought any consideration from the Thomases for the physician's alleged promise. Thus, there was no "bargained-for" consideration. The court affirmed the dismissal of the Thomases' contract claim (but remanded the case on the issue of promissory estoppel, a concept that will be discussed shortly).[1]

In the following case, the court was asked to consider whether a Major League Baseball team receives consideration from fans in exchange for promotional items that the fans receive when attending a game.

1. Thomas v. Archer, 384 P.3d 791 (Alaska 2016).

Case 12.1

Cincinnati Reds, L.L.C. v. Testa

Supreme Court of Ohio, 2018 -Ohio- 4669, 122 N.E.3d 1178 (2018).

Facts Faced with rising ticket prices and increasing entertainment options, Major League Baseball organizations have experienced challenges in getting fans to attend games. One way to attract fans is to offer them unique merchandise—such as bobbleheads, shirts, blankets, caps, player cards, tote bags, and bats—that they can obtain only by attending a game.

The Cincinnati Reds, L.L.C., often engages in these types of promotions. The Reds' home state, Ohio, imposes a sales tax on certain goods but exempts goods intended for resale. Concluding that the Reds' promotional items were purchased to give away, not to resell, the state board of tax appeals (BTA) denied the team's request for an exemption.

On appeal to the Ohio Supreme Court, the Reds argued that they resold the promotional items by promising to distribute them—that this promise creates a contractual expectation on the part of the fans, who buy tickets and attend games as consideration for receiving the items.

Issue Do ticket purchases and game attendance by Reds fans constitute consideration for receiving promotional items distributed by the Reds at the games?

Decision Yes. The Ohio Supreme Court reversed the decision of the BTA. "Consideration is given in exchange for the Reds' agreement to supply fans with . . . promotional items. The transfer of promotional items to fans thus constitutes a sale . . . and the promotional items are subject to the sale-for-resale exemption."

Reason The testimony of the Reds' chief financial officer, Doug Healy, contradicted the BTA's finding that the Reds intended to give away promotional items rather than sell them. Healy testified that

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

the Reds advertise in advance to notify fans which specific promotional items will be distributed at which games. Fans buy tickets to those games expecting to receive those items. If the Reds do not have enough of the items to provide one to each fan at the game, the Reds provide a different item, a ticket to a future game, or something else of equivalent value. Healy explained that the costs of the promotional items are included in the prices of the tickets, which are set before the season begins. The items are distributed at "less desirable" games for which tickets are not expected to be sold out.

The court reasoned that because the cost of the promotional item was included in the ticket price, part of the price paid for the right to attend the "less desirable" game and a separate part paid for the right to receive the promotional item. The court concluded, therefore, that the promotional items constituted things of value in exchange for which fans paid amounts included in the prices of the tickets.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Fans sometimes catch and keep baseballs hit into the stands. How do these actions differ from the situation described in this case, in which the fans were promised and received promotional items for attending games? Does this distinction support or undercut the court's ruling?
- Economic What effect does the decision in this case have on the state's collection of revenue? Discuss.

12–1c Adequacy of Consideration

Adequacy of consideration involves "how much" consideration is given. Essentially, adequacy of consideration concerns the fairness of the bargain.

The General Rule On the surface, when the items exchanged are of unequal value, fairness would appear to be an issue. Normally, however, a court will not question the adequacy of consideration based solely on the comparative value of the things exchanged.

In other words, the determination of whether consideration exists does not depend on the values of the things exchanged. Something need not be of direct economic or financial value to be considered legally sufficient consideration. In many situations, the exchange of promises and potential benefits is deemed to be sufficient consideration.

Under the doctrine of freedom of contract, courts leave it up to the parties to decide what something is worth, and parties are usually free to bargain as they wish. If people could sue merely because they had entered into an unwise contract, the courts would be overloaded with frivolous suits.

Know This

A consumer's signature on a contract does not always guarantee that the contract will be enforced. The contract must also comply with state and federal consumer protection laws.

When Voluntary Consent May Be Lacking Occasionally, an exception may be made to the general rule just discussed. A large disparity in the amount or value of the consideration exchanged may raise a red flag for a court to look more closely at the bargain. Shockingly inadequate consideration can indicate that fraud, duress, or undue influence was involved.

Example 12.3 Spencer pays $500 for an iPhone that he later discovers is a fake (counterfeit). Because the device is not authentic, he could claim that there was no valid contract because of inadequate consideration and fraud. ■ (Disparity in the consideration exchanged may also cause a judge to question whether the contract is so one-sided that it is unconscionable.[2])

2. Pronounced un-kon-shun-uh-bul.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

12–1d Agreements That Lack Consideration

Sometimes, one or both of the parties to a contract may think that they have exchanged consideration when in fact they have not. Here, we look at some situations in which the parties' promises or actions do not qualify as contractual consideration.

Preexisting Duty Under most circumstances, a promise to do what one already has a legal duty to do does not constitute legally sufficient consideration. A sheriff, for instance, cannot collect a reward for information leading to the capture of a criminal if the sheriff already has a legal duty to capture the criminal.

Likewise, if a party is already bound by contract to perform a certain duty, that duty cannot serve as consideration for a second contract. Example 12.4 Bauman-Bache, Inc., begins construction on a seven-story office building and after three months demands an extra $75,000 on its contract. If the extra $75,000 is not paid, the firm will stop working. The owner of the land, finding no one else to complete construction, agrees to pay the extra $75,000. The agreement is not enforceable because it is not supported by legally sufficient consideration—Bauman-Bache had a preexisting contractual duty to complete the building. ■

Unforeseen Difficulties. The preexisting duty rule is intended to prevent extortion and the so-called holdup game. Nonetheless, if, during performance of a contract, extraordinary difficulties arise that were totally unforeseen at the time the contract was formed, a court may allow an exception to the rule. The key is whether the court finds that the modification is fair and equitable in view of circumstances not anticipated by the parties when the contract was made.[3]

Suppose that in Example 12.4, Bauman-Bache asked for the extra $75,000 because it encountered a rock formation that no one knew existed. Suppose, too, that the landowner agreed to pay the extra amount to excavate the rock. In this situation, if the court finds that it is fair to do so, it may enforce the agreement. If rock formations are common in the area, however, the court may determine that the contractor should have known of the risk. In that situation, the court may choose to apply the preexisting duty rule and prevent Bauman-Bache from obtaining the extra $75,000.

© TFoxFoto/Shutterstock.com

Are there circumstances under which a contractor can legally demand a payment amount that is greater than what was stated in the contract?

Rescission and New Contract. The law recognizes that two parties can mutually agree to rescind, or cancel, their contract, at least to the extent that it is executory (still to be carried out). Rescission[4] is the unmaking of a contract so as to return the parties to the positions they occupied before the contract was made.

Rescission A remedy whereby a contract is canceled and the parties are returned to the positions they occupied before the contract was made.

Sometimes, parties rescind a contract and make a new contract at the same time. When this occurs, it is often difficult to determine whether there was consideration for the new contract or whether the parties had a preexisting duty under the previous contract. If a court finds there was a preexisting duty, then the new contract will be invalid because there was no consideration.

Past Consideration Promises made in return for actions or events that have already taken place are unenforceable. These promises lack consideration in that the element of bargained-for exchange is missing. In short, you can bargain for something to take place now or in the future but not for something that has already taken place. Therefore, past consideration is no consideration.

Past Consideration Something given or some act done in the past, which cannot ordinarily be consideration for a later bargain.

Spotlight Case Example 12.5 Jamil Blackmon became friends with Allen Iverson when Iverson was a high school student who showed tremendous promise as an athlete. Blackmon suggested that Iverson use "The Answer" as a nickname in the league tournaments,

3. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 73.
4. Pronounced reh-sih-zhen.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

and said that Iverson would be "The Answer" to the National Basketball Association's declining attendance. Later, Iverson said that he would give Blackmon 25 percent of any proceeds from the merchandising of products that used "The Answer" as a logo or a slogan. Because Iverson's promise was made in return for past consideration (Blackmon's earlier suggestion), it was unenforceable. In effect, Iverson stated his intention to give Blackmon a gift.[5]

Illusory Promises If the terms of the contract express such uncertainty of performance that the promisor has not definitely promised to do anything, the promise is said to be illusory—without consideration and unenforceable. Example 12.6 The president of Tuscan Corporation says to his employees, "All of you have worked hard, and if profits remain high, a 10 percent bonus at the end of the year will be given—if management thinks it is warranted." This is an illusory promise, or no promise at all, because performance depends solely on the discretion of the president (the management). There is no bargained-for consideration. The statement declares merely that management may or may not do something in the future.

Option-to-cancel clauses in contracts for specified time periods sometimes present problems because of illusory promises. Example 12.7 Abe contracts to hire Chris for one year at $5,000 per month, reserving the right to cancel the contract at any time. On close examination of these words, you can see that Abe has not actually agreed to hire Chris, because Abe can cancel without liability before Chris starts performance. Abe has not given up the opportunity of hiring someone else. This contract is therefore illusory.

But if, instead, Abe reserves the right to cancel the contract at any time after Chris has begun performance by giving Chris thirty days' notice, the promise is not illusory. Abe, by saying that he will give Chris thirty days' notice, is relinquishing the opportunity (legal right) to hire someone else instead of Chris for a thirty-day period. If Chris works for one month and Abe then gives him thirty days' notice, Chris has an enforceable claim for two months' salary ($10,000).

Exhibit 12–1 illustrates some common situations in which promises or actions do not constitute contractual consideration.

5. Blackmon v. Iverson, 324 F.Supp.2d 602 (E.D.Pa. 2003).

Exhibit 12–1 Examples of Agreements That Lack Consideration

PREEXISTING DUTY

When a person already has a legal duty to perform an action, a promise to perform that action is not legally sufficient consideration.

Example: A firefighter cannot receive a cash reward from a business owner for putting out a fire in a downtown commercial district. As a city employee, the firefighter had a duty to extinguish the fire.

PAST CONSIDERATION

When a person makes a promise in return for actions or events that have already taken place, there is no consideration.

Example: A real estate agent sells a friend's house without charging a commission, and in return, the friend promises to give the agent $1,000. The friend's promise is simply an intention to give a gift.

ILLUSORY PROMISES

When contract terms are so uncertain that there is no definite promise, the promise is illusory.

Example: A man promises to stop by soon to look at his neighbor's riding lawn mower. If he likes it, he will pay $900. The promise to purchase is simply a statement of something he might do in the future.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

12–1e Settlement of Claims

Businesspersons and others often enter into contracts to settle legal claims. It is important to understand the nature of the consideration given in these settlement agreements. Commonly used settlement agreements include an accord and satisfaction, a release, and a covenant not to sue.

Accord and Satisfaction

In an accord and satisfaction, a debtor offers to pay, and a creditor accepts, a lesser amount than the creditor originally claimed was owed. The accord is the agreement. In the accord, one party undertakes to give or perform, and the other to accept, in satisfaction of a claim, something other than that on which the parties originally agreed. Satisfaction is the performance (usually payment) that takes place after the accord is executed.

Accord and Satisfaction A common means of settling a disputed claim, whereby a debtor offers to pay a lesser amount than the creditor purports to be owed.

A basic rule is that there can be no satisfaction unless there is first an accord. In addition, for accord and satisfaction to occur, the amount of the debt must be in dispute.

Liquidated Debts. If a debt is liquidated, accord and satisfaction cannot take place. A liquidated debt is one whose amount has been ascertained, fixed, agreed on, settled, or exactly determined. Example 12.8 Barbara Kwan signs an installment loan contract with her banker. In the contract, Kwan agrees to pay a specified rate of interest on a specified amount of borrowed funds at monthly intervals for two years. Because both parties know the precise amount of the total obligation, it is a liquidated debt.

Liquidated Debt A debt whose amount has been ascertained, fixed, agreed on, settled, or exactly determined.

Know This

Even with liquidated debts, creditors will often enter into settlement agreements that allow debtors to pay a lesser amount than was originally owed.

In the majority of states, a creditor's acceptance of a lesser sum than the entire amount of a liquidated debt is not satisfaction, and the balance of the debt is still legally owed. The reason for this rule is that the debtor has given no consideration to satisfy the obligation of paying the balance to the creditor. The debtor has a preexisting legal obligation to pay the entire debt. (Of course, even with liquidated debts, creditors often do negotiate debt settlement agreements with debtors for a lesser amount than was originally owed. Creditors sometimes even forgive or write off a liquidated debt as uncollectable.)

Unliquidated Debts. An unliquidated debt is the opposite of a liquidated debt. The amount of the debt is not settled, fixed, agreed on, ascertained, or determined, and reasonable persons may differ over the amount owed. In these circumstances, acceptance of payment of the lesser sum operates as a satisfaction, or discharge, of the debt because there is valid consideration. The parties give up a legal right to contest the amount in dispute.

Unliquidated Debt A debt that is uncertain in amount.

Release

A release is a contract in which one party forfeits the right to pursue a legal claim against the other party. It bars any further recovery beyond the terms stated in the release.

Release An agreement in which one party gives up the right to pursue a legal claim against another party.

A release will generally be binding if it meets the following requirements:

1. The agreement is made in good faith.
2. The release contract is in a signed writing (required in many states).
3. The contract is accompanied by consideration.[6]

A person involved in an automobile accident may be asked to sign a release. Clearly, that person is better off knowing the extent of any injuries or damages before signing. Example 12.9 Kara's car is damaged in an accident caused by Raoul's negligence. Raoul offers to give Kara $3,000 if she will release him from further liability resulting from the accident. Kara agrees and signs the release.

6. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), a written, signed waiver by an aggrieved party discharges any further liability for a breach, even without consideration.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

gmnicholas/E+/Getty Images

Is it possible to limit one's liability after a car accident?

If Kara later discovers that the repairs will cost $4,200, she cannot recover the additional amount from Raoul. Kara is limited to the $3,000 specified in the release because a valid contract was formed. Kara and Raoul both voluntarily agreed to the terms in a signed writing, and sufficient consideration was present. The consideration was the legal right to recover damages that Kara forfeited should her damages be more than $3,000, in exchange for Raoul's promise to give her $3,000.

Covenant Not to Sue Unlike a release, a covenant not to sue does not always prevent further recovery. The parties simply substitute a contractual obligation for some other type of legal action based on a valid claim. Suppose in Example 12.9 that Kara agrees not to sue Raoul for damages in a tort action if he will pay for the damage to her car. If Raoul fails to pay, Kara can bring an action for breach of contract.

As the following Spotlight Case illustrates, a covenant not to sue can form the basis for a dismissal of the claims of either party to the covenant.

Covenant Not to Sue An agreement to substitute a contractual obligation for another legal action based on a valid claim.

Spotlight on Nike: Case 12.2

Already, LLC v. Nike, Inc.

Supreme Court of the United States, 568 U.S. 85, 133 S.Ct. 721, 184 L.Ed.2d 553 (2013).

Facts Nike, Inc., designs, makes, and sells athletic footwear, including a line of shoes known as "Air Force 1." Already, LLC, also designs and markets athletic footwear, including the "Sugar" and "Soulja Boy" lines. Nike filed a suit in a federal district court against Already, alleging that Soulja Boys and Sugars infringed the Air Force 1 trademark. Already filed a counterclaim, contending that the Air Force 1 trademark was invalid.

While the suit was pending, Nike issued a covenant not to sue. Nike promised not to raise any trademark claims against Already based on Already's existing footwear designs or any future Already designs that constituted a "colorable imitation" of Already's current products. Nike then filed a motion to dismiss its own claims and to dismiss Already's counterclaim. Already opposed the dismissal of its counterclaim, but the court granted Nike's motion. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed. Already appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Issue Did Nike's covenant not to sue Already over the Air Force 1 trademark prevent Already from suing to establish that Nike's trademark was invalid?

Decision Yes. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the lower courts. Under the covenant not to sue, Nike could not file a trademark infringement claim against Already, and Already could not assert that Nike's trademark was invalid.

Reason The Supreme Court looked at the wording of the covenant not to sue to determine whether Already's counterclaim was moot. (A matter is moot if it involves no actual controversy for the court to decide, and federal courts will dismiss moot cases.) Nike had unconditionally and irrevocably promised not to assert any trademark infringement claims against Already relating to the mark used on any of Already's current footwear products and similar future designs. Under the covenant's broad language, the Court noted, "It is hard to imagine a scenario that would potentially infringe Nike's trademark and yet not fall under the covenant." Therefore, further litigation of the trademark dispute was unnecessary, and dismissal was proper.

Critical Thinking

- Economic Why would any party agree to a covenant not to sue?
- Legal Environment Which type of contracts are similar to covenants not to sue?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

12–2 Promissory Estoppel

Sometimes, individuals rely on promises, and their reliance may form a basis for a court to infer contract rights and duties. Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel (also called detrimental reliance), a person who has reasonably and substantially relied on the promise of another can obtain some measure of recovery. Promissory estoppel allows a party to recover on a promise even though it was made without consideration. Under this doctrine, a court may enforce an otherwise unenforceable promise to avoid an injustice that would otherwise result.

Promissory Estoppel A doctrine that can be used to enforce a promise when the promisee has justifiably relied on the promise and when justice will be better served by enforcing the promise.

12–2a Requirements to Establish Promissory Estoppel

For the doctrine of promissory estoppel to be applied, the following elements are required:

1. There must be a clear and definite promise.
2. The promisor should have expected that the promisee would rely on the promise.
3. The promisee reasonably relied on the promise by acting or refraining from some act.
4. The promisee's reliance was definite and resulted in substantial detriment.
5. Enforcement of the promise is necessary to avoid injustice.

Focus Question 2

In what circumstances might a promise be enforced despite a lack of consideration?

If these requirements are met, a promise may be enforced even though it is not supported by consideration. In essence, the promisor (the offeror) will be estopped (barred or prevented) from asserting lack of consideration as a defense.

Estopped Barred, impeded, or precluded.

Promissory estoppel is similar in some ways to the doctrine of quasi contract that was discussed in a previous chapter. In both situations, a court acts in the interests of equity and imposes contract obligations on the parties to prevent unfairness even though no actual contract exists. The difference is that with quasi contract, no promise was made at all. In contrast, with promissory estoppel, an otherwise unenforceable promise was made and relied on.

12–2b Application of Promissory Estoppel

Promissory estoppel was originally applied to situations involving gifts (I promise to pay you $1,000 a week so that you will not have to work) and donations to charities (I promise to contribute $50,000 a year to the All Saints orphanage). Later, courts began to apply the doctrine in other situations, including business transactions, employment relationships, and disputes among family members.

Case Example 12.10 CBRE, Inc., was selling commercial real estate owned by API Foils, Inc. BH 329 NB, LLC, offered to buy the property for $7.5 million, which CBRE accepted. BH 329 NB signed a letter of intent setting forth the sale's terms, including the purchase price and an agreement to lease back the property to API for one year. API signed the letter of intent, showing its agreement in principle to the deal. The letter specified that it was not a sales contract.

CBRE promised it would not market or accept other purchase offers while the parties were closing the deal. Despite its promise, CBRE continued to market the property and eventually received a higher offer from a different buyer. CBRE then notified BH 329 NB that it no longer had a deal with API.

BH 329 NB sued CBRE for breach of contract and promissory estoppel. A federal district court dismissed the contract claim but allowed the promissory estoppel claim to go forward. CBRE clearly had promised not to market the property in exchange for the plaintiff's agreement not to lower its offer price. BH 329 NB reasonably relied on CBRE's promise by continuing to negotiate the deal with API, and by doing so, incurred costs and lost other business opportunities as a result.[7]

7. BH 329 NB, LLC v. CBRE, Inc., 2017 WL 3641566 (D.N.J. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

12–3 Contractual Capacity

Contractual Capacity The capacity required by the law for a party who enters into a contract to be bound by that contract.

Contractual capacity is the legal ability to enter into a contractual relationship. Courts generally presume the existence of contractual capacity, but in some situations, capacity is lacking or may be questionable. A person who has been determined by a court to be mentally incompetent, for instance, cannot form a legally binding contract. In other situations, a party may have the capacity to enter into a valid contract but may also have the right to avoid liability under it. For instance, minors—or infants, as they are commonly referred to in the law—usually are not legally bound by contracts.

In this section, we look at the effect of youth, intoxication, and mental incompetence on contractual capacity.

12–3a Minors

Age of Majority The age (eighteen years, in most states) at which a person is granted by law the rights and responsibilities of an adult.

Emancipation In regard to minors, the act of being freed from parental control.

Today, in almost all states, the age of majority (when a person is no longer a minor) for contractual purposes is eighteen years.[8] In addition, some states provide for the termination of minority on marriage.

Minority status may also be terminated by a minor's emancipation, which occurs when a child's parent or legal guardian relinquishes the legal right to exercise control over the child. Normally, minors who leave home to support themselves are considered emancipated. Several jurisdictions permit minors to petition a court for emancipation.

The general rule is that a minor can enter into any contract that an adult can, provided that the contract is not one prohibited by law for minors (such as a contract involving the sale of alcoholic beverages or tobacco products). A contract entered into by a minor, however, is voidable at the option of that minor, subject to certain exceptions (to be discussed shortly). To exercise the option to avoid a contract, a minor need only manifest (clearly show) an intention not to be bound by it. The minor "avoids" the contract by disaffirming it.

Focus Question 3

Does a minor have the capacity to enter into an enforceable contract? What does it mean to disaffirm a contract?

Disaffirmance The legal avoidance, or setting aside, of a contractual obligation.

Disaffirmance The legal avoidance, or setting aside, of a contractual obligation is referred to as disaffirmance. To disaffirm, a minor must express, through words or conduct, the intent not to be bound to the contract. The minor must disaffirm the entire contract, not merely a portion of it. For instance, a minor cannot decide to keep part of the goods purchased under a contract and return the remaining goods.

Note that an adult who enters into a contract with a minor cannot avoid contractual duties on the ground that the minor can do so. Unless the minor exercises the option to disaffirm the contract, the adult party normally is bound by it.

Disaffirmance within a Reasonable Time. A minor can ordinarily disaffirm a contract at any time during minority[9] or for a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority. What constitutes a "reasonable" time may vary. If an individual fails to disaffirm an executed contract within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority, a court will likely hold that the contract has been ratified (ratification will be discussed shortly).

A Minor's Obligations on Disaffirmance. All states' laws permit minors to disaffirm contracts (with certain exceptions), including executed contracts. However, state laws differ on the extent of a minor's obligations on disaffirmance.

Case Example 12.11 Ian Norred was a seventeen-year-old minor when he started working as a server at a Cotton Patch Café in Texas. Norred electronically signed a document titled "Notice to Employees" that contained a mutual arbitration agreement for all disputes arising out of his employment. Seven months later, Norred turned eighteen. Ten months after that,

8. The age of majority may still be twenty-one for other purposes, such as the purchase and consumption of alcohol.
9. In some states, however, minors who enter into a contract for the sale of land cannot disaffirm the contract until they reach the age of majority.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Norred left his job and filed a compensation lawsuit against Cotton Patch alleging violations of federal labor law. At the same time, Norred attempted to disaffirm the terms of his original employment contract. Citing Texas case law from 1889, the federal court ruled that, by waiting nearly a year after his eighteenth birthday, Norred had taken too long to disaffirm and was therefore bound by the arbitration agreement.[10]

Courts in most states hold that the minor need only return the goods (or other consideration) subject to the contract, provided the goods are in the minor's possession or control. Even if the minor returns damaged goods, the minor often is entitled to disaffirm the contract and obtain a refund of the purchase price.

A growing number of states place an additional duty on the minor to restore the adult party to the position that existed before the contract was made. These courts may hold a minor responsible for damage, ordinary wear and tear, and depreciation of goods that the minor used prior to disaffirmance. Example 12.12 Sixteen-year-old Jay buys a truck for $5,900 from a used-car dealer. The truck develops mechanical problems nine months later, but Jay continues to drive it until the engine blows up and the truck stops running. Jay then disaffirms the contract and attempts to return the truck to the dealer for a refund of the full purchase price. In states that hold minors responsible for damage, Jay can still disaffirm the contract, but he may only recover the depreciated value—not the purchase price—of the truck.

Iakov Filimonov/Shutterstock.com

What factor could prevent a server who signed an employment contract as a minor from later disaffirming that contract?

Necessaries Necessities required to maintain a standard of living, such as food, shelter, clothing, and medical attention.

Ratification The acceptance or confirmation of an act or agreement that gives legal force to an obligation that previously was not enforceable.

Exceptions to a Minor's Right to Disaffirm State courts and legislatures have carved out several exceptions to the minor's right to disaffirm. Some contracts, such as marriage contracts and contracts to enlist in the armed services, cannot be avoided. These exceptions are made for reasons of public policy.

In addition, although ordinarily minors can disaffirm contracts even when they have misrepresented their age, a growing number of states have enacted laws to prohibit disaffirmance in such situations. Other states prohibit disaffirmance by minors who misrepresented their age while engaged in business as adults.

Finally, a minor who enters into a contract for necessaries may disaffirm the contract but remains liable for the reasonable value of the goods. Necessaries include whatever is reasonably needed to maintain the minor's standard of living. In general, food, clothing, shelter, and medical services are necessaries. What is a necessary for one minor, however, may be a luxury for another, depending on the minors' customary living standard. Contracts for necessaries are enforceable only to the level of value needed to maintain the minor's standard of living.

Ratification In contract law, ratification is the act of accepting and giving legal force to an obligation that previously was not enforceable. A minor who has reached the age of majority can ratify a contract expressly or impliedly. Express ratification occurs when the individual, on reaching the age of majority, states orally or in writing an intention to be bound by the contract. Implied ratification takes place when the minor, on reaching the age of majority, behaves in a manner inconsistent with disaffirmance.

Example 12.13 Lindsay posts an ad on Craigslist offering to sell her grandmother's Yamaha grand piano for $6,000. Axel, who is seventeen years old, agrees to purchase the piano by making monthly payments of $200 over the next two and a half years. Axel does not disaffirm the contract, and six months into the agreement, he turns eighteen (the age of majority in his state). When Axel stops by Lindsay's house to make his seventh payment, he states, "I love the piano and will continue making payments." Axel's oral statement to Lindsay is an

Know This

A minor's station in life (including financial position, social status, and lifestyle) is important in determining whether an item is a necessary or a luxury. For instance, clothing is a necessary, but if a minor from a low-income family contracts to purchase a $2,000 leather coat, a court may deem the coat a luxury. In this situation, the contract would not be for "necessaries."

10. Norred v. Cotton Patch Café, LLC, 2019 WL 5425479 (N.D. Texas 2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Horn Andrey/Shutterstock.com

How can a minor imply ratification of an agreement to purchase a grand piano?

express ratification of their contract. He can no longer disaffirm it. Even if Axel never expressly tells Lindsay he will continue making payments but continues to do so well after reaching the age of majority, he has impliedly ratified the contract.

If a minor fails to disaffirm a contract within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority, then a court must determine whether the conduct constitutes implied ratification or disaffirmance. Generally, courts presume that executed contracts are ratified and that executory contracts are disaffirmed.

Parents' Liability As a general rule, parents are not liable for the contracts made by minor children acting on their own, except contracts for necessaries, which the parents are legally required to provide. This is why businesses ordinarily require parents to cosign any contract made with a minor. The parents then become personally obligated to perform the conditions of the contract, even if their child avoids liability.

12–3b Intoxicated Persons

Intoxication is a condition in which a person's normal capacity to act or think is inhibited by alcohol or some other drug. A contract entered into by an intoxicated person can be either voidable or valid (and thus enforceable).

If the person was sufficiently intoxicated to lack mental capacity and the other party had reason to know it, then the transaction may be voidable at the option of the intoxicated person, even if the intoxication was purely voluntary. The intoxicated person has the option of disaffirming the contract while intoxicated or for a reasonable time after becoming sober. If, despite intoxication, the person understood the legal consequences of the agreement, the contract is enforceable. (Note that an intoxicated person may ratify a contract expressly or impliedly after becoming sober.)

Courts look at objective indications of intoxication to determine if a person possessed or lacked the required capacity. It is difficult to prove that a person's judgment was so severely impaired that the person could not comprehend the legal consequences of entering into a contract. Therefore, courts rarely permit contracts to be avoided due to intoxication.

12–3c Mentally Incompetent Persons

Contracts made by mentally incompetent persons can be void, voidable, or valid. If a court has previously determined that a person is mentally incompetent and has appointed a guardian to represent the person, any contract made by that person is void—no contract exists. Only the guardian can enter into a binding contract on behalf of the mentally incompetent person.

If a court has not previously judged a person to be mentally incompetent but the person was incompetent at the time the contract was formed, the contract is voidable in most states. A contract is voidable if the person was unaware of entering into the contract or lacked the mental capacity to comprehend its nature, purpose, and consequences. In such situations, the contract is voidable (or can be ratified) at the option of the mentally incompetent person but not at the option of the other party.

Case Example 12.14 Annabelle Duffie was mildly mentally retarded and, at age seventy, had the beginning of dementia. For her entire life, she had lived with her brother, Jerome. When Jerome died, he left Annabelle his property, including 180 acres of timberland near Hope, Arkansas, valued at more than $400,000. Less than three months later, Annabelle signed a deed granting her interest in the tract to Charles and Joanne Black. The Blacks agreed to pay Annabelle $150,000 in monthly payments of $1,000.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Later, Annabelle's nephew, Jack, was appointed to be her legal guardian. On her behalf, Jack filed a lawsuit in an Arkansas state court against the Blacks, seeking to void the land deal because of Annabelle's lack of mental competence. The court ordered the Blacks to return the property to Annabelle. They appealed. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed. The evidence showed that Annabelle had been incompetent her entire life. She lacked the cognitive ability to make the complex financial decisions involved in selling property. Therefore, the contract was voidable.[11]

A contract entered into by a mentally ill person (whom a court has not previously declared incompetent) may also be valid if the person had capacity at the time the contract was formed. Some people who are incompetent due to age or illness have lucid intervals—temporary periods of sufficient intelligence, judgment, and will. During such intervals, they will be considered to have legal capacity to enter into contracts in the majority of states.

12–4 Legality

Legality is the fourth requirement for a valid contract to exist. For a contract to be valid and enforceable, it must be formed for a legal purpose. A contract to do something that is prohibited by federal or state statutory law is illegal and, as such, is void from the outset and thus unenforceable. Additionally, a contract to commit a tortious act (such as engage in fraudulent misrepresentation) or to commit an action that is contrary to public policy is illegal and unenforceable.

12–4a Contracts Contrary to Statute

Statutes often prescribe the terms of contracts. Some statutes set forth rules specifying which terms and clauses may be included in certain contracts and which are prohibited. Others prohibit certain contracts on the basis of their subject matter, the status of the contracting parties, or other factors. Next, we examine several ways in which contracts may be contrary to statute.

Contracts to Commit a Crime Any contract to commit a crime is in violation of a statute. Thus, a contract to sell illegal drugs in violation of criminal laws is unenforceable, as is a contract to hide a corporation's violation of securities laws or environmental regulations.

Sometimes, the object or performance of a contract is rendered illegal by statute after the contract has been formed. In that situation, the contract is considered discharged (terminated) by law.

Usury Almost every state has a statute that sets the maximum rate of interest that can be charged for different types of transactions, including ordinary loans. A lender who makes a loan at an interest rate above the lawful maximum commits usury.

Usury Charging an illegal rate of interest.

Although usurious contracts are illegal, most states simply limit the interest that the lender may collect on the contract to the lawful maximum interest rate in that state. In a few states, the lender can recover the principal amount of the loan but no interest. In addition, states can make exceptions to facilitate business transactions. For instance, many states exempt corporate loans from the usury laws, and nearly all states allow higher interest rate loans for borrowers who could not otherwise obtain loans.

11. Black v. Duffie, 2016 Ark.App. 584, 508 S.W.3d 40 (2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Gambling Gambling is the creation of risk for the purpose of assuming it. Traditionally, the states have deemed gambling contracts illegal and thus void. Today, many states allow (and regulate) certain forms of gambling, such as horse racing, video poker machines, and charity-sponsored bingo. In addition, nearly all states allow state-operated lotteries and gambling on Native American reservations.

RosaIreneBetancourt 9/Alamy

How can local licensing statutes affect a real estate transaction for high-end commercial property?

Licensing Statutes All states require members of certain professions—including physicians, lawyers, real estate brokers, accountants, architects, electricians, and stockbrokers—to have licenses. Some licenses are obtained only after extensive schooling and examinations, which indicate to the public that a special skill has been acquired. Others require only that the person obtaining the license be of good moral character and pay a fee.

Whether a contract with an unlicensed person is legal and enforceable depends on the purpose of the licensing statute. If the statute's purpose is to protect the public from unauthorized practitioners, then a contract involving an unlicensed practitioner generally is illegal and unenforceable. If the purpose is merely to raise government revenues, however, a contract with an unlicensed person may be enforced (and the unlicensed practitioner fined). See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for an example.

12–4b Contracts Contrary to Public Policy

Although contracts involve private parties, some are not enforceable because of the negative impact they would have on society. These contracts are said to be contrary to public policy. Examples include a contract to commit an immoral act, such as selling a child, and a contract that prohibits marriage (such as a contract to pay someone not to marry one's daughter). Business contracts that may be contrary to public policy include contracts in restraint of trade and unconscionable contracts or clauses.

Contracts in Restraint of Trade The United States has a strong public policy favoring competition in the economy. Thus, contracts in restraint of trade (anticompetitive agreements) generally are unenforceable because they are contrary to public policy. Typically, such contracts also violate one or more federal or state antitrust laws.

Business Law Analysis

Determining If a Contract with an Unlicensed Party Is Enforceable

PEMS Co. International, Inc., agreed to find a buyer for Rupp Industries, Inc., for a commission of 2 percent of the purchase price, which was to be paid by the buyer. Using PEMS's services, an investment group bought Rupp for $20 million and changed its name to Temp-Air, Inc. PEMS asked Temp-Air to pay a commission on the sale. Temp-Air refused, arguing that PEMS had acted as a broker in the deal without a license. The applicable statute defines a broker as any person who deals with the sale of a business. Can PEMS collect its commission?

Analysis: Whether a contract with an unlicensed person is legal and enforceable depends on the purpose of the statute. If the purpose is to protect the public from unauthorized practitioners, then a contract involving an unlicensed practitioner is generally illegal and unenforceable.

Result and Reasoning: The applicable statute defined a broker as any person who deals with the sale of a business. It seems clear that this definition covers PEMS. The purpose of this statute is to protect the public from potentially serious consequences related to having unlicensed parties handle business sales transactions that may involve millions of dollars.

PEMS's efforts toward the sale constituted the action of a broker. PEMS did not have a broker's license. Thus, if PEMS was acting as a broker, the unlicensed firm forfeited its right to collect a commission for its services. Using PEMS's services, an investment group made a successful purchase of Rupp. Therefore, PEMS is barred from maintaining this suit to collect the unpaid commission.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

An exception is recognized when the restraint is reasonable and is an ancillary (secondary, or subordinate) part of the contract. Such restraints often are included in contracts for the sale of an ongoing business and employment contracts.

Covenants Not to Compete and the Sale of an Ongoing Business. Many contracts involve a type of restraint called a covenant not to compete, or a restrictive covenant (promise). A covenant not to compete may be created when a merchant who sells a store agrees not to open a new store in a certain geographic area surrounding the old store. Such an agreement enables the seller to sell, and the purchaser to buy, the goodwill and reputation of an ongoing business without having to worry that the seller will open a competing business a block away. Provided the restrictive covenant is reasonable and is an ancillary part of the sale of an ongoing business, it is enforceable.

Covenant Not to Compete A contractual promise of one party to refrain from conducting business similar to that of another party for a certain period of time and within a specified geographical area.

Covenants Not to Compete in Employment Contracts. Sometimes, an agreement not to compete (also referred to as a noncompete agreement) is included in an employment contract. People in middle-level and upper-level management positions commonly agree not to work for competitors and not to start a competing business for a specified period of time after terminating employment.

Employment Contract A contract between an employer and an employee in which the terms and conditions of employment are stated.

Noncompete agreements are generally legal in most states so long as the specified period of time (of restraint) is not excessive in duration and the geographic restriction is reasonable. To be reasonable, a restriction on competition must protect a legitimate business interest and must not be any greater than necessary to protect that interest. What constitutes a reasonable time period may be different in the online environment than in conventional employment contracts. Because the geographical restrictions apply worldwide, the time restrictions may be shorter.

Focus Question 4

Under what circumstances will courts enforce a covenant not to compete?

Companies sometimes use covenants not to compete as the starting point for lawsuits against competitors. Case Example 12.15 Dana Clement was an administrator with Compassus, a hospice care provider in Houston. She left, taking a number of colleagues with her, to form a new branch of Crossroads Hospice in the same city. Compassus brought a number of claims, including conspiracy, against Crossroads, relying primarily on a covenant in Compassus's contract with Clement that forbade her from soliciting Compassus workers for employment elsewhere. A Texas appellate court dismissed the lawsuit, ruling that Crossroads could not be held responsible for Clement's actions. In large part, the court based its decision on the fact that Crossroads was unaware of the nonsolicitation covenant when it hired Clement and the other former Compassus employees.[12]

Ethical Issue

Are expansive noncompete agreements reducing worker mobility? You would probably expect workers to be asked to sign noncompete agreements that prevented them from, say, taking proprietary software code to a competitor. But would you expect a sandwich chain to require a worker to sign a noncompete agreement related to sandwich making? In the past, such agreements would not have been upheld in court. Today, they increasingly are. James Bessen, a writer for The Atlantic, has estimated that the number of lawsuits over noncompete agreements and trade secrets nearly tripled between 2000 and 2014.

Employees in high-tech firms seem to be the most affected. They often sign noncompete agreements that "freeze" them out of their industry for two years after they leave a high-tech employer, forcing them to seek jobs in other industries where they cannot use key skills and knowledge. The result is that noncompete agreements tend to limit job opportunities for highly skilled workers. In addition, noncompete agreements are increasingly being used with employees at lower levels (including blue-collar workers).

The negative impact of such agreements can be devastating on persons who lose or leave their jobs to find other employment. In other words, job mobility may be suffering from the pervasive use of noncompete agreements.

12. Crossroads Hospice, Inc. v. FC Compassus, LLC, __ S.W.3d __ 2020 WL 1264188 (1st Dist.—Houston 2020).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Enforcement Problems. The laws governing the enforceability of covenants not to compete vary significantly from state to state. California prohibits the enforcement of all covenants not to compete. In some states, such as Texas, such a covenant will not be enforced unless the employee has received some benefit in return for signing the noncompete agreement. This is true even if the covenant is reasonable as to time and area. If the employee receives no benefit, the covenant will be deemed void.

Reformation. Occasionally, depending on the jurisdiction, courts will reform covenants not to compete. If a covenant is found to be unreasonable in time or geographic area, the court may convert the terms into reasonable ones and then enforce the reformed covenant. This presents a problem, however, in that the judge has implicitly become a party to the contract. Consequently, courts usually resort to contract reformation only when necessary to prevent undue burdens or hardships.

Reformation A court-ordered correction of a written contract so that it reflects the true intentions of the parties.

In the following case, the court reformed a noncompete agreement by adding the words "current location." Was this modification reasonable given the facts of the case?

Case 12.3

Kennedy v. Shave Barber Co.

Court of Appeals of Georgia, 822 S.E.2d 606 (2018).

Facts Patricia Kennedy worked as a master barber for The Shave, a barbershop in the Virginia-Highland neighborhood of Atlanta, Georgia. Under the terms of her employment contract, Kennedy agreed that, after leaving her employment, she would not work in the men's grooming industry "within a three (3) mile radius of any SHAVE location" for two years and would not solicit customers of The Shave for one year.

Less than a month after quitting her position, Kennedy opened a new salon, "PK Does Hair," two miles from The Shave. She solicited customers through social media accounts on which she posted photos originally posted on social media by The Shave.

The Shave filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Kennedy, alleging a breach of the noncompete provision of her employment contract. Kennedy argued that the geographic restriction in the noncompete provision was "unreasonable and uncertain." The court limited the geographic scope of the provision to a three-mile radius of The Shave's current location and issued an injunction in The Shave's favor. Kennedy appealed.

Issue Was the court's reformation of the geographic scope of the noncompete provision reasonable?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's order in favor of The Shave. "Kennedy is in violation of . . . the restrictive covenants which where specifically designed to protect The Shave from competition from its former employees and loss of its client base. Therefore, the trial court did not err in finding the non-compete enforceable against Kennedy and in granting [an injunction] on this ground."

Reason The Shave had a legitimate business interest in protecting itself from the risk that Kennedy might appropriate customers by taking advantage of the contacts developed while she worked at The Shave.

The Shave had expended considerable resources in developing its name recognition and customer base. Most of The Shave's customers lived and worked within three miles of the Virginia-Highland location. The Shave had previously lost customers when two former employees opened competing barbershops within three miles. Based on the harm to The Shave's business if the noncompete provision was not enforced, the appellate court found the trial court's reformation of the provision's geographic scope to be reasonable. The appellate court also concluded that the trial court had eliminated any uncertainty by limiting the scope to three miles from The Shave's current location.

The appellate court also ruled, despite Kennedy's assertion to the contrary, that her social media posts of pictures of The Shave's customers constituted solicitation in further violation of the noncompete provision.

Critical Thinking

- Legal What "legitimate business interests" justify the enforcement of a noncompete provision?
- Economic What sort of harm, particularly in Kennedy's situation, would support a court's refusal to enforce an employment contract's noncompete provision?

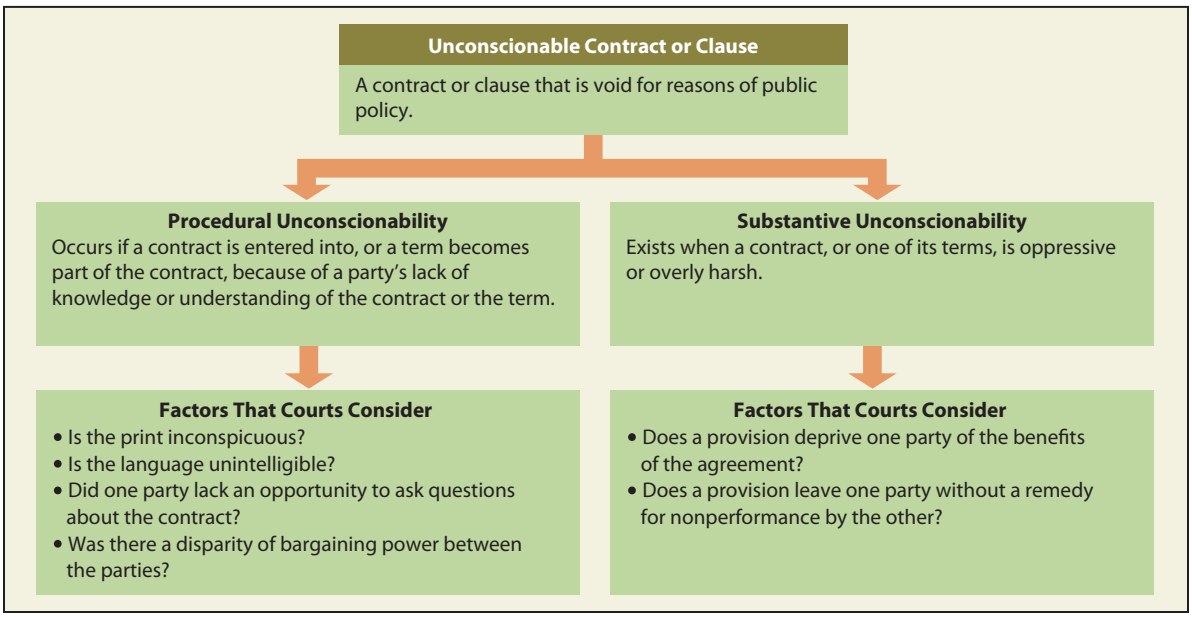
Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unconscionable Contracts or Clauses Ordinarily, a court does not look at the fairness or equity of a contract (or inquire into the adequacy of consideration). Persons are assumed to be reasonably intelligent, and the courts will not come to their aid just because they have made unwise or foolish bargains.

In certain circumstances, however, bargains are so oppressive that the courts relieve innocent parties of part or all of their duties. Such bargains are deemed unconscionable[13] because they are so unscrupulous or grossly unfair as to be "void of conscience."

Unconscionable Unscrupulous or grossly unfair. An unconscionable contract or clause is void on the basis of public policy because one party was forced to accept terms that are unfairly burdensome and that unfairly benefit the other party.

The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) incorporates the concept of unconscionability in its provisions with regard to the sale and lease of goods.[14] A contract can be unconscionable on either procedural or substantive grounds, as discussed in the following subsections and illustrated graphically in Exhibit 12–2.



Procedural Unconscionability. Procedural unconscionability often involves inconspicuous print, unintelligible language ("legalese"), or the lack of an opportunity to read the contract or ask questions about its meaning. This type of unconscionability typically arises when a party's lack of knowledge or understanding of the contract terms deprives the party of any meaningful choice.

Procedural unconscionability can also occur when there is such a disparity in bargaining power between the two parties that the weaker party's consent is not voluntary. This type of situation often involves an adhesion contract, which is a standard-form contract written exclusively by one party (the dominant party) and presented to the other (the adhering party) on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. In other words, the adhering party (usually a buyer or borrower) has no opportunity to negotiate the terms of the contract. Not all adhesion contracts are unconscionable—only those that unreasonably favor the drafter.

Adhesion Contract A standard-form contract in which the stronger party dictates the terms.

13. Pronounced un-kon-shun-uh-bul.
14. See UCC 2–302 and 2–719.

Exhibit 12–2 Unconscionability

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case Example 12.16 Lianna Saribekyan placed diamonds, gold, and other collectibles in a safety deposit box at the Bank of America's (BANA's) Universal City, California, branch. A few months later, this branch was slated for closure. Without informing Saribekyan, bank employees drilled open her deposit box and placed its contents, unsecured, in storage for several days. Millions of dollars' worth of the items went missing, including four bags of diamonds inventoried by BANA as "beads" and a container full of gold that had been replaced with pennies.

The trial court found BANA liable but limited its payout to $2,460 because the bank's Safety Deposit Rules and Regulations capped damages for negligence at ten times the safety deposit box's annual rent. A California appellate court reversed, identifying a contract of adhesion. To support this conclusion, the court noted that the limitation of liability provision was "buried" in the small print of a five-page supplement to the original agreement, an addendum that Saribekyan was never shown. Furthermore, the court found BANA's negligence so grievous that to limit damages in such a way would "shock the conscience."[15]

Substantive Unconscionability. Substantive unconscionability occurs when contracts, or portions of contracts, are oppressive or overly harsh. Courts generally focus on provisions that deprive one party of the benefits of the agreement or leave that party without remedy for nonperformance by the other. Sometimes, courts will find that the same contract is both substantively and procedurally unconscionable.

Substantive unconscionability can arise in a wide variety of business contexts. For instance, a contract clause that gives a business entity unrestricted access to the courts but requires the other party to arbitrate any dispute with the firm may be unconscionable.

Exculpatory Clauses

Exculpatory Clause A clause that releases a contractual party from liability in the event of monetary or physical injury, no matter who is at fault.

Often closely related to the concept of unconscionability is the exculpatory clause, which releases a party from liability in the event of monetary or physical injury, no matter who is at fault. Indeed, courts sometimes refuse to enforce such clauses because they deem them to be unconscionable.

Violation of Public Policy. Most courts view exculpatory clauses with disfavor. Exculpatory clauses found in rental agreements for commercial property are frequently held to be contrary to public policy, and such clauses are almost always unenforceable in residential property leases. Courts also usually hold that exculpatory clauses are against public policy in the employment context. Thus, employers frequently cannot enforce exculpatory clauses in contracts with employees or independent contractors to avoid liability for work-related injuries.

Enforcement of Exculpatory Clauses. Courts do enforce exculpatory clauses if they are reasonable, do not violate public policy, and do not protect parties from liability for intentional misconduct. The language used must not be ambiguous, and the parties must have been in relatively equal bargaining positions. See this chapter's Managerial Strategy feature for more information about when liability waivers will—and will not—be considered unconscionable.

Businesses such as health clubs, racetracks, amusement parks, skiing facilities, horse-rental operations, golf-cart concessions, and skydiving organizations frequently use exculpatory clauses to limit their liability for patrons' injuries. Because these services are not essential, the firms offering them are sometimes considered to have no relative advantage in bargaining strength, and anyone contracting for their services is considered to do so voluntarily. Courts also may enforce reasonable exculpatory clauses in loan documents, real estate contracts, and trust agreements.

15. Saribekyan v. Bank of America, NA, 2020 WL 38676 (2nd Dist. Div. 3 Cal. 2020).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Managerial Strategy

Creating Liability Waivers That Are Not Unconscionable

Blanket liability waivers that absolve a business from virtually every event, even those caused by the business's own negligence, are usually unenforceable because they are unconscionable. Exculpatory waivers are common, nonetheless. We observe such waivers in gym memberships, on admissions tickets to sporting events, and in simple contracts for the use of campgrounds.

Typically, courts view liability waivers as voluntarily bargained for whether or not they have been read. Thus, a waiver included in the fine print on the back of an admission ticket or on an entry sign to a stadium may be upheld. In general, if such waivers are unambiguous and conspicuous, the assumption is that patrons have had a chance to read them and have accepted their terms.

Activities with Inherent Risks

Cases challenging liability waivers have been brought against skydiving businesses, ski resorts, bobsledding operations, white-water rafting companies, and health clubs. For example, in Tuttle v Heavenly Valley, LP,[a] an appellate court in California upheld a ski resort's liability waiver. In that case, the plaintiff collided with a snowboarder, which was "an inherent risk of skiing," and died. The court reasoned that, as a matter of public policy, if a ski resort is not grossly negligent, then reasonable liability waivers should usually be an absolute defense against liability. Because there was no gross negligence in this instance, the ski resort prevailed.

In a similar case, Teresa Brigance fell and broke her leg when her ski boot caught on the chairlift as she was attempting to get off the lift. She sued the owner, Vail Summit Resorts, Inc., for her injuries. Brigance had signed a liability waiver before taking ski lessons at the resort, however. The waiver stated that she understood the inherent dangers and risks of skiing, and it specifically mentioned lift loading and unloading. The court found the waiver was valid and enforceable, and therefore dismissed Brigance's suit against Vail Summit.[b]

Waivers Involving Minors

Liability waivers for inherently dangerous activities involving minors are often held to different legal standards. For instance, Kathy Miller signed a liability waiver warning of the risk of serious injury, paralysis, or death when she bought a ticket for her eleven-year-old daughter to visit House of Boom, a trampoline park. Miller's daughter broke her ankle in an accident involving another girl, and Miller sued to recoup the costs of the injury.

House of Boom, relying on the signed liability waiver, moved for the case to be dismissed. The Kentucky Supreme Court refused, finding that liability waivers between a parent and a for-profit entity involving the actions of a child are unenforceable. The court relied on two factors in making this decision. First, in Kentucky, parents have no right to enter into contracts on behalf of their children. Second, liability waivers in these cases are unacceptable in terms of public policy because they negate businesses' incentive to take "reasonable precautions to protect the safety of minor children."[c]

Business Questions

1. What would be your strategy regarding liability waivers if you were managing a business that relied on minors engaging in inherently dangerous activities?

2. Under what circumstances would you, as a business owner, choose to aggressively defend your business against a customer's liability lawsuit?

a. 2020 WL 563604 (4th Dis. Div. 3 Cal. 2020).

b. Brigance v. Vail Summit Resorts, Inc., 883 F.Supp.3d 1243 (10th Cir. 2018).

c. Miller v. House of Boom Kentucky, LLC, 575 S.W.3d 656 (Ky, 2019).

Spotlight Case Example 12.17 Colleen Holmes participated in the Susan G. Komen Race for the Cure in St. Louis, Missouri. Her signed entry form included an exculpatory clause under which Holmes agreed to release the event sponsors from liability "for any injury or damages I might suffer in connection with my participation in this Event."

During the race, Holmes sustained injuries when she tripped and fell over an audiovisual box left on the ground by one of the sponsors. She filed a negligence suit against the sponsor whose employees had placed the box on the ground without barricades or warnings of its presence. The court held that the language used in the exculpatory clause clearly released all sponsors and their agents and employees from liability for future negligence. Holmes could not sue for the injuries she sustained during the race.[16]

16. Holmes v. Multimedia KSDK, Inc., 395 S.W.3d 557, (Mo.App.E.D. 2013).

Aceshot1/Shutterstock.com

Is a waiver of negligence liability that appears on an entry form for a foot race enforceable?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus Question 5

What are the consequences of entering an illegal agreement?

12–5 The Effect of Illegality

In general, an illegal contract is void—that is, the contract is deemed never to have existed, and the courts will not aid either party. In most illegal contracts, both parties are considered to be equally at fault—in pari delicto.[17] If the contract is executory, neither party can enforce it. If it has been executed, neither party can recover damages.

The courts usually are not concerned if one wrongdoer in an illegal contract is unjustly enriched at the expense of the other. The main reason for this hands-off attitude is a belief that a plaintiff who has broken the law by entering into an illegal bargain should not be allowed to obtain help from the courts. Another justification is the hoped-for deterrent effect: a plaintiff who suffers a loss because of an illegal bargain will presumably be deterred from entering into similar illegal bargains in the future.

There are exceptions to the general rule that neither party to an illegal bargain can sue for breach and neither party can recover for performance rendered. We look at these exceptions here.

12–5a Justifiable Ignorance of the Facts

Sometimes, one of the parties to a contract has no reason to know that the contract is illegal and thus is relatively innocent. That party can often recover any benefits conferred in a partially executed contract. The courts will not enforce the contract but will allow the parties to return to their original positions.

A court may sometimes permit an innocent party who has fully performed under a contract to enforce the contract against the guilty party. Example 12.18 A trucking company contracts with Gillespie to carry crates filled with goods to a specific destination for a normal fee of $5,000. The trucker delivers the crates and later finds out that they contained illegal goods. Although the shipment, use, and sale of the goods are illegal under the law, the trucker, being an innocent party, can normally still legally collect the $5,000 from Gillespie.

12–5b Members of Protected Classes

When a statute is clearly designed to protect a certain class of people, a member of that class can enforce a contract in violation of the statute even though the other party cannot. Example 12.19 Statutes prohibit certain employees (such as flight attendants or pilots) from working more than a specified number of hours per month. An employee who is required to work more than the maximum can recover for those extra hours of service.

Other examples of statutes designed to protect a particular class of people are state statutes that regulate the sale of insurance. If an insurance company violates a statute when selling insurance, the purchaser can still enforce the policy and recover from the insurer.

12–5c Withdrawal from an Illegal Agreement

Image Source/DigitalVision/Getty Images

When two persons place an illegal bet on the outcome of a boxing match, can either withdraw from the wager?

If the illegal part of a bargain has not yet been performed, the party rendering performance can withdraw from the contract and recover the performance or its value. Example 12.20 Marta and Andy decide to wager (illegally) on the outcome of a boxing match. Each deposits $1,000 with a stakeholder, who agrees to pay the winner of the bet. At this point, each party has performed part of the agreement. Before payment occurs, either party is entitled to withdraw from the agreement by giving notice to the stakeholder.

12–5d Severable, or Divisible, Contracts

A contract that is severable, or divisible, consists of distinct parts that can be performed separately, with separate consideration provided for each part. With an indivisible contract, in contrast, complete performance by each party is essential, even if the contract contains a number of seemingly separate provisions.

17. Pronounced in-pah-ree deh-lick-tow.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

If a contract is divisible into legal and illegal portions, a court may enforce the legal portion but not the illegal one, so long as the illegal portion does not affect the essence of the bargain. This approach is consistent with the basic policy of enforcing the legal intentions of the contracting parties whenever possible.

Example 12.21 Cole signs an employment contract that is valid but includes an overly broad and thus illegal covenant not to compete. In that situation, a court might find the employment contract enforceable but reform the unreasonably broad covenant by converting its terms into reasonable ones. Alternatively, the court could declare the covenant illegal (and thus void) and enforce the remaining employment terms. ■

12–5e Fraud, Duress, or Undue Influence

Often, one party to an illegal contract is more at fault than the other. When one party uses fraud, duress, or undue influence to induce the other party to enter into an agreement, the second party will be allowed to recover for the performance or its value.

Practice and Review

Renee Beaver started racing go-karts competitively in 2020, when she was fourteen. Many of the races required her to sign an exculpatory clause to participate. She or her parents regularly signed such clauses. In 2022, right before her birthday, Renee participated in the annual Elkhart Grand Prix, a series of races in Elkhart, Indiana. During the event in which she drove, a piece of foam padding used as a course barrier was torn from its base and ended up on the track. A portion of the padding struck Beaver in the head, and another portion was thrown into oncoming traffic, causing a multikart collision during which she sustained severe injuries. Beaver filed an action against the race organizers for negligence. The organizers could not locate the exculpatory clause that Beaver had supposedly signed. Race organizers argued that she must have signed one to enter the race, but even if she had not signed one, her actions showed her intent to be bound by its terms. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Beaver have the contractual capacity to enter into a contract with an exculpatory clause? Why or why not?
2. Assuming that Beaver did, in fact, sign the exculpatory clause, did she later disaffirm or ratify the contract? Explain.
3. Now assume that Beaver had stated that she was eighteen years old at the time she signed the exculpatory clause. How might this affect her ability to disaffirm or ratify the contract?
4. Suppose Beaver can prove that she did not actually sign an exculpatory clause and this fact convinces race organizers to pursue a settlement. They offer to pay Beaver one-half of the amount that she is claiming in damages if she now signs a release of all claims. Because Beaver is young and the full effect of her injuries may not yet be clear, what other type of settlement agreement might she prefer? What is the consideration to support any settlement agreement that Beaver enters into with the race organizers?

Debate This

After agreeing to an exculpatory clause or purchasing some item, minors often seek to avoid the contracts. Today's minors are far from naïve and should not be allowed to avoid their contractual obligations.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Key Terms

accord and satisfaction 291 adhesion contract 301 age of majority 294
consideration 285
contractual capacity 294
covenant not to compete 299 covenant not to sue 292 disaffirmance 294 emancipation 294 employment contract 297 estopped 293
exculpatory clause 302 forbearance 286
liquidated debt 291
necessaries 295
past consideration 289
promissory estoppel 293
ratification 295 reformation 300
release 291
rescission 289 unconscionable 301
unliquidated debt 291
usury 297

Chapter Summary: Consideration, Capacity, and Legality

Consideration	1. Elements of consideration— a. Something of legally sufficient value must be given in exchange for a promise. b. There must be a bargained-for exchange. The item of value must be given or promised in return for the other party's promise or performance. 2. Legal sufficiency and adequacy of consideration—Legal sufficiency means that something of legal value must be given in exchange for a promise. Adequacy relates to "how much" consideration is given and whether a fair bargain was reached. Courts will inquire into the adequacy of consideration only when fraud, undue influence, duress, or unconscionability may be involved. 3. Contracts that lack consideration—Consideration is lacking in the following situations: a. Preexisting duty—A promise to do what one already has a legal duty to do is not legally sufficient consideration for a new contract. b. Past consideration—Actions or events that have already taken place do not constitute legally sufficient consideration. c. Illusory promises—When the nature or extent of performance is too uncertain, the promise is rendered illusory (without consideration and unenforceable). 4. Settlement of claims—Disputes may be settled by the following, which are enforceable provided there is consideration: a. Accord and satisfaction—An accord is an agreement in which a debtor offers to pay a lesser amount than the creditor claims is owed. Satisfaction takes place when the accord is executed. b. Release—An agreement in which, for consideration, a party forfeits the right to seek further recovery beyond the terms specified in the release. c. Covenant not to sue—An agreement not to sue on a valid claim. A contractual obligation is substituted for some other type of legal action.
Promissory Estoppel	Under the equitable doctrine of promissory estoppel, a person who has reasonably and substantially relied on the promise of another can obtain some measure of recovery. The promise is binding, even though there is no consideration, if injustice can be avoided only by enforcement of the promise.
	CONTRACTUAL CAPACITY
Minors	1. General rule—Contracts with minors are voidable at the option of the minor. 2. Emancipation—Occurs when a child's parent or legal guardian relinquishes the legal right to exercise control over the child. Normally, minors who leave home to support themselves are considered emancipated. In some jurisdictions, minors are permitted to petition a court for emancipation. 3. Disaffirmance—The legal avoidance of a contractual obligation. a. Disaffirmance can take place (in most states) at any time during minority and within a reasonable time after the minor has reached the age of majority. b. The minor must disaffirm the entire contract, not just part of it. c. When disaffirming executed contracts, the minor has a duty to return the received goods if they are still in the minor's control or (in some states) to pay their reasonable value.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

	d. Minors who have misrepresented their age will be denied the right to disaffirm by some courts. e. A minor may disaffirm a contract for necessaries but remains liable for the reasonable value of the goods. 4. Ratification—The acceptance, or affirmation, of a legal obligation. a. Express ratification—Occurs when the minor, in writing or orally, explicitly assumes the obligations imposed by the contract. b. Implied ratification—Occurs when the conduct of the minor is inconsistent with disaffirmance or when the minor fails to disaffirm an executed contract within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority. 5. Parents' liability—Generally, except for contracts for necessaries, parents are not liable for the contracts made by minor children acting on their own.
Intoxicated Persons	1. A contract entered into by an intoxicated person is voidable at the option of the intoxicated person if the person was sufficiently intoxicated to lack mental capacity, even if the intoxication was voluntary. 2. A contract with an intoxicated person is enforceable if, despite being intoxicated, the person understood the legal consequences of entering into the contract.
Mentally Incompetent Persons	1. A contract made by a person previously judged by a court to be mentally incompetent is void. 2. A contract made by a person who is mentally incompetent, but has not been previously declared incompetent by a court, is voidable at the option of that person.
LEGALITY
Contracts Contrary to Statute	1. Usury—Usury occurs when a lender makes a loan at an interest rate above the lawful maximum, which varies from state to state. 2. Gambling—Gambling contracts that violate state statutes are deemed illegal and thus void. 3. Licensing statutes—Contracts entered into by persons who do not have a license, when one is required by statute, will not be enforceable unless the underlying purpose of the statute is to raise government revenues (and not to protect the public from unauthorized practitioners).
Contracts Contrary to Public Policy	1. Contracts in restraint of trade—Contracts to restrain free competition are illegal and prohibited by statutes. An exception is a covenant not to compete. Such covenants usually are enforced by the courts if the terms are secondary to a contract (such as a contract for the sale of a business or an employment contract) and are reasonable as to time and area of restraint. Courts tend to scrutinize covenants not to compete closely and, at times, may reform them if they are overly broad rather than declaring the entire covenant unenforceable. 2. Unconscionable contracts and clauses—When a contract or contract clause is so unfair that it is oppressive to one party, it may be deemed unconscionable. As such, it is illegal and cannot be enforced. 3. Exculpatory clauses—An exculpatory clause releases a party from liability in the event of monetary or physical injury, no matter who is at fault. In certain situations, exculpatory clauses may be contrary to public policy and thus unenforceable.
EFFECT OF ILLEGALITY
General Rule	In general, an illegal contract is void, and the courts will not aid either party when both parties are considered to be equally at fault (in pari delicto). If the contract is executory, neither party can enforce it. If the contract is executed, neither party can recover damages.
Exceptions	Several exceptions exist to the general rule that neither party to an illegal bargain will be able to recover. The court may grant recovery in the following situations: 1. Justifiable ignorance of the facts—When one party has no reason to know that the contract is illegal and so is relatively innocent. 2. Members of protected classes—When one party to the contract is a member of a group of persons protected by a particular statute. 3. Withdrawal from an illegal agreement—When either party seeks to recover consideration given for an illegal contract before the illegal act is performed. 4. Severable, or divisible, contracts—When the court can divide the contract into illegal and legal portions, and the illegal portion is not essential to the bargain. 5. Fraud, duress, or undue influence—When one party was induced by the other party to enter into an illegal bargain through fraud, duress, or undue influence.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Issue Spotters

1. Before Maria starts her first year of college, Fred promises to give her $5,000 when she graduates. She goes to college, borrowing and spending far more than $5,000. At the beginning of the spring semester of her senior year, she reminds Fred of the promise. Fred sends her a note that says, "I revoke the promise." Is Fred's promise binding? Explain. (See Consideration.)
2. Sun Airlines, Inc., prints on its tickets that it is not liable for any injury to a passenger caused by the airline's negligence. If the cause of an accident is found to be the airline's negligence, can it use the clause as a defense to liability? Why or why not? (See Legality.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

12–1. Contracts by Minors. Kalen is a seventeen-year-old minor who has just graduated from high school. He is attending a university two hundred miles from home and has contracted to rent an apartment near the university for one year at $500 per month. He is working at a convenience store to earn enough income to be self-supporting. After living in the apartment and paying monthly rent for four months, he becomes involved in a dispute with his landlord. Kalen, still a minor, moves out and returns the key to the landlord. The landlord wants to hold Kalen liable for the balance of the payments due under the lease. Discuss fully Kalen's liability in this situation. (See Contractual Capacity.)

12–2. Spotlight on Kansas City Chiefs—Consideration. On Brenda Sniezek's first day of work for the Kansas City Chiefs Football Club, she signed a document that purported to compel arbitration of any disputes that she might have with the Chiefs. In the document, Sniezek agreed to comply at all times with and be bound by the constitution and bylaws of the National Football League (NFL). She agreed to refer all disputes to the NFL commissioner for a binding decision and to release the Chiefs and others from any related claims. Nowhere in the document did the Chiefs agree to do anything. Was there consideration for the arbitration provision? Explain. [Sniezek v. Kansas City Chiefs Football Club, 402 S.W.3d 580 (Mo.App. W.D. 2013)] (See Consideration.)

12–3. Consideration. Citynet, LLC, established an employee incentive plan "to enable the Company to attract and retain experienced individuals." The plan provided that participants who left Citynet's employment were entitled to "cash out" their entire vested balance. (When an employee's rights to a particular benefit become vested, they belong to that employee and cannot be taken away. The vested balance refers to the part of an account that goes with the employee on leaving the company.) When Citynet employee Ray Toney terminated his employment, he asked to redeem his $87,000.48 vested balance. Citynet refused, citing a provision of the plan that limited redemptions to no more than 20 percent annually. Toney filed a suit in a West Virginia state court against Citynet, alleging breach of contract. Citynet argued that the plan was not a contract but a discretionary bonus over which Citynet had sole discretion. Was the plan a contract? If so, was it bilateral or unilateral, and what was the consideration? [Citynet, LLC v. Toney, 235 W.Va.79, 772 S.E.2d 36 (2015)] (See Consideration.)

12–4. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Agreements That Lack Consideration. Arkansas-Missouri Forest Products, LLC (Ark-Mo), sells supplies to make wood pallets. Blue Chip Manufacturing (BCM) makes pallets. Mark Garnett, an owner of Ark-Mo, and Stuart Lerner, an owner of BCM, went into business together. Garnett and Lerner agreed that Ark-Mo would have a 30-percent ownership interest in their future projects. When Lerner formed Blue Chip Recycling, LLC (BCR), to manage a pallet repair facility in California, however, he allocated only a 5 percent interest to Ark-Mo. Garnett objected. In a "Telephone Deal," Lerner then promised Garnett that Ark-Mo would receive a 30 percent interest in their future projects in the Midwest, and Garnett agreed to forgo an ownership interest in BCR. But when Blue Chip III, LLC (BC III), was formed to operate a repair facility in the Midwest, Lerner told Garnett that he "was not getting anything." Ark-Mo filed a suit in a Missouri state court against Lerner, alleging breach of contract. Was there consideration to support the Telephone Deal? Explain. [Arkansas-Missouri Forest Products, LLC v. Lerner, 486 S.W.3d 438 (Mo.App. E.D. 2016)] (See Consideration.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 12–4, go to Appendix E.

12–5. Minors. Bonney McWilliam's father deeded a house in Norfolk County, Massachusetts, to Bonney and her daughter, Mechelle. Each owned a one-half interest. Described as "an emotionally troubled teenager," Mechelle had a history of substance abuse and a fractured relationship with her mother. At age sixteen, in the presence of her mother and her mother's attorney, Mechelle signed a deed transferring her interest in the house to Bonney. Later, still at odds with her mother, Mechelle learned that she did not have a right to enter the house to retrieve her belongings. Bonney claimed sole ownership. Mechelle filed a lawsuit in a Massachusetts state court against her mother to declare the deed void. Could the transfer of Mechelle's interest be disaffirmed? Explain. [McWilliam v. McWilliam, 46 N.E.3d 598 (Mass.App.Ct. 2016)] (See Contractual Capacity.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

12–6. Legality. Sue Ann Apolinar hired a guide through Arkansas Valley Adventures, LLC, for a rafting excursion on the Arkansas River. At the outfitter's office, Apolinar signed a release that detailed potential hazards and risks, including "overturning," "unpredictable currents," "obstacles" in the water, and "drowning." The release clearly stated that her signature discharged Arkansas Valley from liability for all claims arising in connection with the trip. On the river, while attempting to maneuver around a rapid, the raft capsized. The current swept Apolinar into a logjam where, despite efforts to save her, she drowned. Her son, Jesus Espinoza, Jr., filed a suit in a federal district court against the rafting company, alleging negligence. What are the arguments for and against enforcing the release that Apolinar signed? Discuss. [Espinoza v. Arkansas Valley Adventures, LLC, 809 F.3d 1150 (10th Cir. 2016)] (See Legality.)

12–7. Elements of Consideration. Carmen White signed a lease with Sienna Ridge Apartments in San Antonio, Texas. The lease required White to reimburse Sienna Ridge for any damage to the apartment not caused by the landlord's negligence or fault. After moving in, White received a new washer and dryer from her parents. She did not read the instruction manual before overloading the dryer with bedding, including an unwashed pillow, which started a fire. Sienna Ridge filed a claim for the resulting damage with Philadelphia Indemnity Insurance Company. Philadelphia paid the claim and filed a suit in a Texas state court against White, alleging that she had breached the lease by failing to reimburse Sienna Ridge for the damage. White argued that the lease was unenforceable for lack of consideration. Is White correct? Discuss. [Philadelphia Indemnity Insurance Co. v. White, 2017 WL 32899 (Tex.App.—San Antonio 2017)] (See Consideration.)

12–8. Contracts Contrary to Public Policy. P.M. and C.M. are married (the "Ms") and live in Iowa. Unable to conceive their own child, they signed a contract with T.B., who, in exchange for $13,000 and medical expenses, agreed to be impregnated with embryos fertilized with P.M.'s sperm and the ova (eggs) of an anonymous donor. T.B. agreed to carry the pregnancy to term, and she and her spouse D.B. (the "Bs") promised to deliver the baby at birth to the Ms. During the pregnancy, the relations between the parties deteriorated. When the baby was born, T.B. refused to honor the agreement to give up the child. Meanwhile, genetic testing excluded T.B. and D.B. as the biological parents and established P.M. as the father. Iowa exempts "surrogacy" from a state criminal statute that prohibits selling babies. There is no other state law on point. Is the contract between the Ms and the Bs enforceable? Discuss. [P.M. v. T.B., 907 N.W.2d 522 (Iowa 2018)] (See Legality.)

12–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Minors. Sky High Sports Nashville Operations, LLC, operated a trampoline park in Nashville, Tennessee. At the park, during a dodgeball tournament, Jacob Blackwell, a minor, suffered a torn tendon and a broken tibia. His mother, Crystal, filed a suit on his behalf in a Tennessee state court against Sky High, alleging negligence and seeking $500,000 to cover medical and other expenses. Sky High asserted that the claim was barred by a waiver of liability in a contract between the parties, which the defendant asked the court to enforce. The waiver released Sky High from liability for any "negligent acts or omissions." [Blackwell v. Sky High Sports Nashville Operations, LLC, 523 S.W.3d 624 (Tenn.App. 2017)] (See Contractual Capacity.)

1. Should Sky High offer a defense to the suit? What might Sky High argue as a reason for enforcing the waiver? Use the IDDR approach to answer these questions.
2. Would it be unethical to allow Jacob to recover? Apply the IDDR approach to explain.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

12–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Preexisting Duty. Melissa Faraj owns a lot and wants to build a house according to a particular set of plans and specifications. She solicits bids from building contractors and receives three bids: one from Carlton for $160,000, one from Feldberg for $158,000, and one from Siegel for $153,000. She accepts Siegel's bid. One month after beginning construction of the house, Siegel contacts Faraj and tells her that because of inflation and a recent price hike for materials, his costs have gone up. He says he will not finish the house unless Faraj agrees to pay an extra $13,000. Faraj reluctantly agrees to pay the additional sum. (See Consideration.)

1. One group will evaluate whether a contractor can ever raise the price of completing construction based on inflation and the rising cost of materials.
2. A second group will assume that after the house is finished, Faraj refuses to pay the extra $13,000. The group will decide whether Faraj is legally required to pay this additional amount.
3. A third group will determine what types of extraordinary difficulties could arise during construction that would justify a contractor's charging more than the original bid.
4. A fourth group will consider what would happen if Faraj and Siegel had rescinded the initial contract and entered a new construction contract that included the extra $13,000. Would a court be likely to find that there was no consideration because of a preexisting duty? Explain.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Valeri Potapova/Shutterstock.com

13 Defenses to Contract Enforceability

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is the difference between a unilateral and a bilateral mistake?
2. What are the elements of fraudulent misrepresentation?
3. What is the essential feature of undue influence?
4. What types of contracts must be in writing to be enforceable?
5. What is parol evidence? When is it admissible to clarify the terms of a written contract?

Voluntary Consent Knowledge of and genuine assent to the terms of a contract.

"Understanding is a two-way street."

Eleanor Roosevelt
1884–1962
(First Lady of the United States, 1933–1945)

An otherwise valid contract may still be unenforceable if the parties have not genuinely agreed to its terms. The lack of voluntary consent is a defense to the enforcement of a contract. As Eleanor Roosevelt stated in the chapter-opening quotation, "Understanding is a two-way street." If one party does not voluntarily consent to the terms of a contract, then there is no genuine "meeting of the minds," and the law will not normally enforce the contract, as we discuss in the first part of this chapter.

Voluntary consent (assent) may be lacking because of mistake, fraudulent misrepresentation, undue influence, or duress. Generally, parties who demonstrate that they did not genuinely agree to the terms of a contract can choose either to carry out the contract or to rescind (cancel) it and thus avoid the entire transaction.

A contract that is otherwise valid may also be unenforceable if it is not in the proper form. For instance, if a contract is required by law to be in writing and there is no written evidence or electronic record of it, the contract will not be enforced.

13–1 Mistakes

We all make mistakes, so it is not surprising that mistakes are made when contracts are created. In certain circumstances, contract law allows a contract to be avoided on the basis of mistake.

It is important to distinguish between mistakes of fact and mistakes of value or quality. Only a mistake of fact makes a contract voidable. Also, the mistake must involve some material fact—a fact that a reasonable person would consider important when determining a course of action.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Mistakes of fact occur in two forms—unilateral and bilateral (mutual). A unilateral mistake is made by only one of the contracting parties, whereas a mutual mistake is made by both. We look at these two types of mistakes next and illustrate them graphically in Exhibit 13–1.

13–1a Unilateral Mistakes

Unilateral Mistake A mistake that occurs when one party to a contract is mistaken as to a material fact.

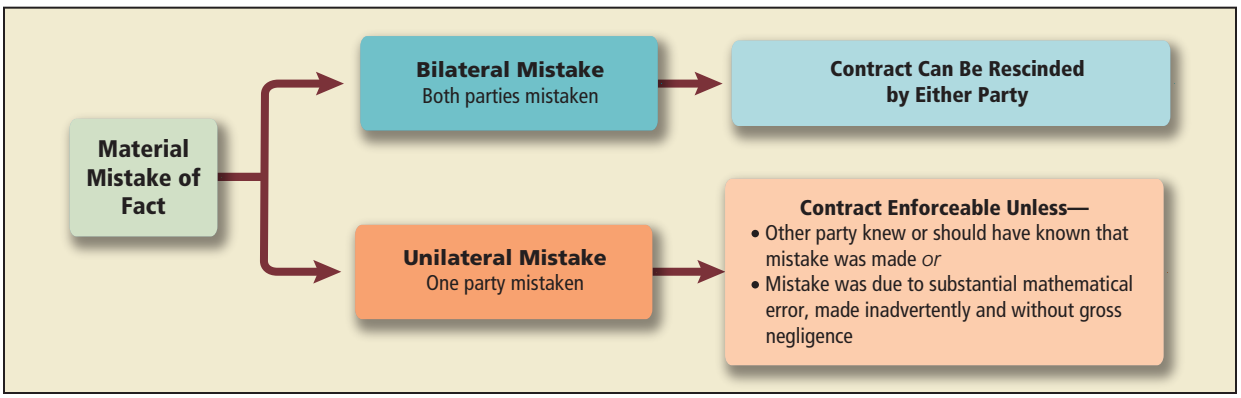
A unilateral mistake occurs when only one party is mistaken as to a material fact. Generally, a unilateral mistake does not give the mistaken party any right to relief from the contract. In other words, the contract normally is enforceable against the mistaken party.

Example 13.1 Elena intends to sell her jet ski for $2,500. When she learns that Chin is interested in buying a used jet ski, she sends him an e-mail offering to sell the jet ski to him. When typing the e-mail, however, she mistakenly keys in the price of $1,500. Chin immediately sends Elena an e-mail reply accepting her offer. Even though Elena intended to sell her jet ski for $2,500, she has made a unilateral mistake and is bound by the contract to sell it to Chin for $1,500.

This rule has at least two exceptions.[1] The contract may not be enforceable in either of the following situations.

1. The other party to the contract knows or should have known that a mistake of fact was made.
2. The error was due to a substantial mathematical mistake in addition, subtraction, division, or multiplication and was made inadvertently and without gross (extreme) negligence. If, for instance, a contractor's bid was significantly low because of a mistake in totaling the estimated costs, any contract resulting from the bid normally may be rescinded.

In both situations, the mistake must still involve some material fact.



13–1b Bilateral (Mutual) Mistakes

Bilateral Mistake A mistake that occurs when both parties to a contract are mistaken about the same material fact.

A bilateral mistake is a "mutual misunderstanding concerning a basic assumption on which the contract was made."[2] When both parties are mistaken about the same material fact, the contract can be rescinded, or canceled, by either party, although it is usually the adversely affected party that takes that step. Note that, as with unilateral mistakes, the mistake must be about a material fact.

1. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 153, liberalizes the general rule to take into account the modern trend of allowing avoidance in some circumstances even though only one party has been mistaken.
2. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 152.

Exhibit 13–1 Mistakes of Fact

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Focus Question 1

What is the difference between a unilateral and a bilateral mistake?

Contract May Be Reformed Rather than rescind a contract flawed by a bilateral mistake, judges often prefer to reform the agreement. Reformation allows a court, using its powers of equity, to restore the original goals of the parties who entered into the contract. Case Example 13.2 Jason Allen was injured in a work-related automobile accident. Allen's employer had workers' compensation insurance with Accident Fund Insurance Company of America. After a series of disputes and negotiations, Allen and Accident Fund entered into a voluntary payment agreement (VPA) under which the insurance company consented to pay Allen $264.53 per week for 54.2 weeks.

Neither side noticed, however, that the arithmetic of the VPA was wrong. Accident Fund should have been paying Allen $264.53 per week for 131.7 weeks, not 54.2 weeks. A Michigan appellate court found that the faulty calculations had escaped the notice of both parties. To correct this bilateral mistake, the court ordered that the VPA be reformed with the correct figures, reflecting the intentions of Allen and Accident Fund at the time of their agreement.[3]

When the Parties Reasonably Interpret a Term Differently A word or term in a contract may be subject to more than one reasonable interpretation. If the parties to the contract attach materially different meanings to the term, their mutual misunderstanding may allow the contract to be rescinded or reformed. Case Example 13.3 Offshore Energy Services (OES) contracted with companies to provide workers at offshore oil drilling operations. In its contract with rig operators, OES had an indemnity provision stating that it would insure the companies for tort claims filed against them by an OES employee. Raylin Richard, an OES employee, was injured while working on an oil rig. Richard filed a personal injury suit against Anadarko Petroleum, the head of that drilling project.

OES paid $2.5 million to Richard to settle the lawsuit, but OES's insurance company, Liberty Mutual, denied coverage. Liberty took the position that the indemnity clause in the contract between OES and Anadarko explicitly covered "subcontractors" but did not mention "contractors" like Anadarko. Both OES and Anadarko had thought that the indemnity provision applied to subcontractors and contractors, so they claimed that there had been a mutual mistake. The district court agreed and reformed the contract to include the word contractors as well as subcontractors. Thus, Liberty Mutual had to cover the amounts OES paid.[4]

Ethical Issue

Should a surviving member of Lynyrd Skynyrd abide by a thirty-year-old consent decree? One of the biggest songs of the 1970s was "Free Bird" by the southern rock group Lynyrd Skynyrd. Not too long after its release, the group's touring plane crashed, killing band members Ronnie Van Zant and Steve Gaines, among others. A decade later, all surviving band members became bound by a consent decree allowing the surviving musicians to tell only their personal individual stories rather than the story of the band. The order also prohibited the use of the group's name by any surviving member.

Flash forward three decades. Former Lynyrd Skynyrd drummer Artimus Pyle, along with Cleopatra Films, went into production of a biopic about the plane crash entitled Street Survivors: The True Story of the Lynyrd Skynyrd Plane Crash. Van Zant's brother, Johnny, and others sought a permanent injunction blocking the production and distribution of the film. The president of Cleopatra Films argued that the company had First Amendment rights to make the movie. The presiding judge ruled otherwise. "None of the defendants received the requisite authorization under the terms of the consent order in depiction of [Ronnie] Van Zant or Gaines or in the use of the Lynyrd Skynyrd name, and therefore all have violated the consent order."[5]

---

3. Allen v Charlevoix Abstract & Engineering Company, 929 N.W.2d 804, 326 Mich.App. 658 (2019).
4. Richard v. Anadarko Petroleum Corp., 850 F.3d 701 (5th Cir. 2017).
5. Ronnie Van Zant Inc. v. Pyle, 270 F.Supp.3d 656 311C (S.D.N.Y. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–1c Mistakes of Value

If a mistake concerns the future market value or quality of the object of the contract, the mistake is one of value, and the contract normally is enforceable. Example 13.4 Pablo buys a violin from Bev for $250. Although the violin is very old, neither party believes that it is valuable. Later, however, an antiques dealer informs the parties that the violin is rare and worth thousands of dollars. Here, both parties were mistaken, but the mistake is a mistake of value rather than a mistake of fact. Because mistakes of value do not warrant contract rescission, Bev cannot rescind the contract.

The reason that mistakes of value do not affect the enforceability of contracts is that value is variable. Depending on the time, place, and other circumstances, the same item may be worth considerably different amounts. When parties form a contract, their agreement establishes the value of the object of their transaction—for the moment. Each party is considered to have assumed the risk that the value will change in the future or prove to be different from what was originally thought. Without this rule, almost any party who considered a bargain unfair could argue mistake.

Pictorial Press Ltd/Alamy

Ronnie Van Zant, the founder of the rock band Lynyrd Skynyrd, died in a plane crash in 1977. How did a consent decree limit how his story could be told in the future?

13–2 Fraudulent Misrepresentation

Although fraud is a tort, the presence of fraud also affects the authenticity of the innocent party's consent to a contract. When an innocent party is fraudulently induced to enter into a contract, the contract usually can be avoided because that party has not voluntarily consented to the terms.[6] Normally, the innocent party can either rescind the contract or enforce it and seek damages for any harms resulting from the fraud.

Generally, fraudulent misrepresentation refers only to misrepresentation that is consciously false and is intended to mislead another. That is, the person making a fraudulent misrepresentation knows or believes that the assertion is false or knows that there is no basis (stated or implied) for the assertion.[7]

Typically, fraud involves the following elements:

1. A misrepresentation of a material fact must occur.
2. There must be an intent to deceive.
3. The innocent party must justifiably rely on the misrepresentation.
4. To collect damages, a party must have been harmed as a result of the misrepresentation.

Focus Question 2

What are the elements of fraudulent misrepresentation?

13–2a Misrepresentation Has Occurred

The first element of proving fraud is to show that misrepresentation of a material fact has occurred. This misrepresentation can occur by words or actions. For instance, an art gallery owner's statement "This painting is a Picasso" is a misrepresentation of fact if the painting was done by another artist. Similarly, if a customer asks to see only Jasper Johns paintings and the owner immediately leads the customer over to paintings that were not done by Johns, the owner's actions can be a misrepresentation.

Know This

To collect damages in almost any lawsuit, there must be some sort of injury.

6. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 163 and 164.
7. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 162.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Sometimes, a party agrees to enter into a contract on the basis of a promise that is not included in the document evidencing the agreement. Suppose that the document includes a merger clause, which states, "This agreement contains the entire agreement between the parties. There are no understandings or agreements between the parties except as expressly set forth." The issue in the following case concerned the effect of a merger clause on an allegation that the contract containing it was procured by fraud.

Case 13.1

McCullough v. Allstate Property and Casualty Insurance Co.

Alabama Court of Civil Appeals, 256 So.3d 103 (2018).

Facts Allstate Property and Casualty Insurance Company issued a policy to Jerry McCullough, insuring his pickup truck. McCullough loaned the truck to an acquaintance, who returned it damaged. McCullough filed a claim on the policy. Allstate treated the claim as involving multiple different claims (each with a $250 deductible). Allstate also reported these claims to an insurance exchange, Verisk Analytics Automobile Property Loss Underwriting Service (A-PLUS).[a]

Contending that the damage had resulted from only one claim, McCullough filed a suit in a federal district court against Allstate. The insurer agreed to settle the suit for $8,000. McCullough agreed to this amount, but only if Allstate corrected the report to reflect that he was making only one insurance claim and that Allstate paid nothing on that claim. (McCullough did not feel that the $8,000 was a payment for the damage to his truck.) Allstate's lawyer sent McCullough an e-mail agreeing to these terms, but the promise was not included in the release and settlement agreement that the parties signed. The release had a merger clause saying that there were no other agreements, verbal or otherwise, between the parties except as set forth in the contract.

Later, McCullough learned that Allstate had reported to A-PLUS that it had paid $8,000 to him on his claim. He filed a suit in an Alabama state court against Allstate, seeking damages for fraud. Both parties filed motions for summary judgment. The court granted Allstate's motion and denied McCullough's. McCullough appealed.

Issue Should McCullough be allowed to present evidence that the release was procured by fraud?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's summary judgment in favor of Allstate, affirmed the court's denial of McCullough's motion for summary judgment, and remanded the case. Genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on McCullough's claim for fraud.

Reason Allstate argued that McCullough's claim was barred by a merger clause in the release. The appellate court pointed out that under Alabama state law, a merger clause does not bar evidence of fraud in the inducement of a contract. "To hold otherwise is to encourage deliberate fraud." Thus, Allstate's motion for summary judgment should not have been granted.

McCullough's motion for summary judgment, however, was properly denied. McCullough asserted that he settled the federal lawsuit because he was promised that no payment on the claim would be on record. The release did not specify this promise, and Allstate later reported an $8,000 payment to A-PLUS. The court concluded that these allegations presented "a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Allstate, willfully to deceive, or recklessly without knowledge, agreed to report an amount of $0 on the claim and whether McCullough reasonably relied on any representation outside those contained in the release."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment In most cases involving the interpretation and application of a contract, a party is not allowed to present evidence outside the document expressing the parties' agreement. Why not?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that under the law, a merger clause barred evidence of fraud in the inducement of a contract. How would this affect contract negotiations? Would the result in this case have been different? Discuss.

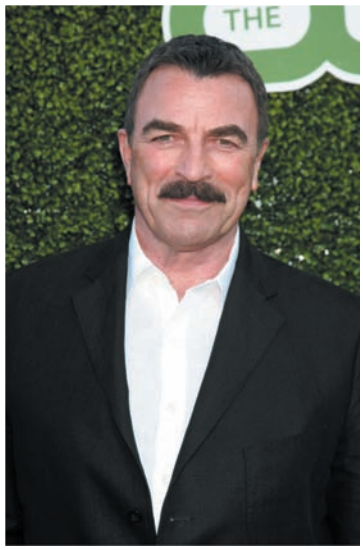
a. A-PLUS reports information received from insurance companies regarding claims. The reports can affect a claimant's insurance costs.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.



Misrepresentation by Conduct Misrepresentation also occurs when a party takes specific action to conceal a fact that is material to the contract.[8] Therefore, if a seller's actions prevent a buyer from learning of some fact that is material to the contract, the seller's behavior constitutes misrepresentation by conduct. It would also be misrepresentation by conduct for a seller to untruthfully deny knowledge of facts that are material to the contract when a buyer requests such information.

Spotlight Case Example 13.5 Actor Tom Selleck contracted to purchase a horse named Zorro for his daughter from Dolores Cuenca. Cuenca acted as though Zorro were fit to ride in competitions, when in reality the horse was unfit for this use because of a medical condition. Selleck filed a lawsuit against Cuenca for wrongfully concealing the horse's condition, and a jury awarded Selleck more than $187,000 for Cuenca's misrepresentation by conduct.[9]

Statements of Opinion Statements of opinion and representations of future facts (predictions) are generally not subject to claims of fraud. Statements such as "This land will be worth twice as much next year" and "This car will last for years and years" are statements of opinion, not fact. Contracting parties should recognize them as opinions and not rely on them. A fact is objective and verifiable, whereas an opinion is usually subject to debate. Therefore, sellers are allowed to use puffery to sell their goods without being liable for fraud. Nevertheless, in certain situations, such as when a naïve purchaser relies on an opinion from an expert, the innocent party may be entitled to rescission or reformation.

Misrepresentation of Law Misrepresentation of law ordinarily does not entitle a party to be relieved of a contract. Example 13.6 Cameron has a parcel of property that she is trying to sell to Levi. Cameron knows that a local ordinance prohibits building anything higher than three stories on the property. Nonetheless, she tells Levi, "You can build a condominium one hundred stories high if you want to." Levi buys the land and later discovers that Cameron's statement is false. Levi generally cannot avoid the contract, because under the common law, people are assumed to know state and local laws.

Exceptions to this rule occur when the misrepresenting party is in a profession known to require greater knowledge of the law than the average citizen possesses. For instance, if Cameron, in Example 13.6, had been a lawyer or a real estate broker, her willful misrepresentation of the area's zoning laws probably would have constituted fraud.

Kathy Hutchins/Shutterstock.com

How did misrepresentation by conduct affect an agreement between the television actor Tom Selleck and the owner of a horse?

Misrepresentation by Silence Ordinarily, neither party to a contract has a duty to come forward and disclose facts, and a contract normally will not be set aside because certain pertinent information has not been volunteered. Example 13.7 Jude is selling a car that has been in an accident and has been repaired. He does not need to volunteer this information to a potential buyer. If, however, the buyer asks him if the car has had extensive bodywork and he lies, Jude has committed fraudulent misrepresentation.

In general, if the seller knows of a serious potential problem that the buyer cannot reasonably be expected to discover, the seller may have a duty to speak. Normally, the seller must disclose only a latent defect—that is, a defect that could not readily be ascertained. Because a buyer of a house could easily discover the presence of termites through an inspection, for instance, termites may not qualify as a latent defect. Also, when the parties are in a fiduciary relationship—one of trust, such as partners, physician and patient, or attorney and client—there is a duty to disclose material facts. Failure to do so may constitute fraud.

Latent Defect A defect that is not obvious or cannot readily be ascertained.

8. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 160.
9. Selleck v. Cuenca, Case No. GIN056909, North County of San Diego, California, decided September 9, 2009.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–2b Intent to Deceive

Scienter Knowledge on the part of a misrepresenting party that material facts have been falsely represented or omitted with an intent to deceive.

The second element of fraud is knowledge on the part of the misrepresenting party that facts have been misrepresented. This element, usually called scienter,[10] or "guilty knowledge," generally signifies that there was an intent to deceive.

Scienter clearly exists if a party knows that a fact is not as stated. Example 13.8 Richard applies for a position as a business law professor two weeks after his release from prison. On his résumé, he lies and says that he was a corporate president for fourteen years and taught business law at another college. After he is hired, his probation officer alerts the school to Richard's criminal history. The school immediately fires him. If Richard sues the school for breach of his employment contract, he is unlikely to succeed. Because Richard clearly exhibited an intent to deceive the college by not disclosing his personal history, the school can rescind his employment contract without incurring liability.

Scienter also exists if a party makes a statement believing that the statement is not true or makes a statement recklessly, without regard to whether it is true or false. Finally, this element is met if a party says or implies that a statement is made on some basis, such as personal knowledge or personal investigation, when it is not.

Innocent Misrepresentation A misrepresentation that occurs when a person makes a false statement of fact that the person believes is true.

Innocent Misrepresentation If a person makes a statement that the person believes to be true but that actually misrepresents material facts, the person is guilty only of an innocent misrepresentation, not of fraud. When an innocent misrepresentation occurs, the aggrieved party can rescind the contract but usually cannot seek damages. Example 13.9 Bryant submits an application for no-fault automobile insurance with State Farm in which he states that he has not received any traffic citations for three years. State Farm accepts the application, and Bryant pays the premium.

Soon thereafter, State Farm discovers that, one year and eight months earlier, Bryant had been cited for operating a motor vehicle while impaired. Even if Bryant's misrepresentation on the application is an innocent mistake, State Farm can void the insurance contract and return the premium because the misrepresentation is material.

Negligent Misrepresentation A misrepresentation that occurs when a person makes a false statement of fact because the person did not exercise reasonable care or use the skill and competence required by the person's business or profession.

Negligent Misrepresentation Sometimes, a party will make a misrepresentation through carelessness, believing the statement is true. Such a misrepresentation may constitute negligent misrepresentation if the party did not exercise reasonable care in uncovering or disclosing the facts or did not use the skill and competence that the party's business or profession requires. Example 13.10 Dirk, an operator of a weight scale, certifies the weight of Sneed's commodity. If Dirk knows that the scale's accuracy has not been checked for more than three years, his action may constitute negligent misrepresentation.

In almost all states, negligent misrepresentation is equal to scienter, or knowingly making a misrepresentation. In effect, negligent misrepresentation is treated as fraudulent misrepresentation, even though the misrepresentation was not purposeful. In negligent misrepresentation, culpable ignorance of the truth supplies the intention to mislead, even if the defendant can claim, "I didn't know."

13–2c Justifiable Reliance on the Misrepresentation

Know This

A statement of opinion is neither a contract offer, nor a contract term, nor fraud.

The third element of fraud is reasonably justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation of fact. The deceived party must have a justifiable reason for relying on the misrepresentation. Also, the misrepresentation must be an important factor (but not necessarily the sole factor) in inducing the deceived party to enter into the contract.

Reliance is not justified if the innocent party knows the true facts or relies on obviously extravagant statements (such as "this pickup truck will get fifty miles to the gallon"). The same rule applies to defects in property sold. If the defects would be obvious on inspection,

10. Pronounced sy-en-ter.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

the buyer cannot justifiably rely on the seller's representations. If the defects are hidden or latent, however, the buyer is justified in relying on the seller's statements.

Case Example 13.11 Clifford Cronkelton negotiated with Patrick Shivley to buy a car wash in Ohio that had closed down due to bankruptcy. Cronkelton inspected the property and knew that he would have to replace some of the equipment, but he was concerned that the property needed to be winterized to protect it from damage. Shivley assured Cronkelton that the winterizing would be done.

Shivley contacted Guaranteed Construction Services, LLC, which hired Strayer Company to winterize the property. Strayer told Shivley that the only way to avoid problems was to leave the heat on at the car wash, but Shivley knew that the bank had shut off the heat. Later, the car wash was damaged by freezing. Although Shivley informed the bank about the damage, he did not tell Cronkelton, who did not become aware of the damages until after he had he bought the car wash. Cronkelton sued Guaranteed and Shivley for fraud and won. He was awarded more than $140,000 in damages. The defendants appealed. The reviewing court affirmed, holding that Cronkelton had justifiably relied on Shivley's representations that the car wash had been winterized.[11]

John de la Bastide/Shutterstock.com

Is it reasonable for the buyer of a car wash to rely on the seller's statements that the property has been properly winterized?

13–2d Injury to the Innocent Party

Most courts do not require a showing of harm in an action to rescind a contract. These courts hold that because rescission returns the parties to the positions they held before the contract was made, a showing of injury to the innocent party is unnecessary. In contrast, to recover damages caused by fraud, proof of harm is universally required. The measure of damages is ordinarily equal to the property's value had it been delivered as represented, less the actual price paid for the property.

In some situations, it may be difficult to identify an "innocent" party. Each year, for example, numerous essays are sold online to students who pass the work off as their own. To learn about the contractual ramifications of these transactions, in which neither party is entirely innocent, see this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.

11. Cronkelton v. Guaranteed Construction Services, LLC, 2013-Ohio-328, 988 N.E.2d 656 (3d Dist. 2013).

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

The Problem of "Contract Cheating"

"No matter what kind of academic paper you need, it is simple and secure to hire an essay writer for a price you can afford," the website promises. Further down, the site pledges that a "Built-in plagiarism checker" ensures that "the received paper is totally original with just one click." Such offers proliferate on the Internet, giving students the ability to choose among many competitors when purchasing made-to-order homework assignments for illicit (or at least unethical) purposes.

The Power of Disclaimers

The practice is popularly known as "contract cheating." Indeed, there is a contract for this work, just as there is for any other product that is bargained for, paid for, and delivered. But is it a valid contract, given the purpose of the product? Earlier, we noted that illegal contracts are void. Plagiarism, however, is not illegal. It is "merely" unethical. In most instances, if caught, the plagiarist will face a number of scholastic punishments, including possible expulsion. Plagiarists do not, for the most part, find themselves in civil or criminal court, however.

The online companies that sell these essays are also protected by carefully constructed legal disclaimers that inevitably

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

appear, in small print, near the bottom of their websites. The disclaimer will state that any product sold is for "research and reference purposes only" and is not intended to be presented as the student's own work.

How Effective Is a Disclaimer?

Generally speaking, parties to a contract cannot rely on a disclaimer to avoid legal responsibilities. For instance, a court will not accept a disclaimer that broadly states, "Company A is not responsible for any injuries" caused by a product. At the same time, parties are expected, "by the exercise of ordinary intelligence," to be aware of the nature of the transactions they enter into.[a] It would be difficult for either party in a contract cheating case to claim innocence as to the actual purpose of the transaction, or to allege misrepresentation by the other side. As a result, the courts have had very little to say about contract cheating. Instead, the burden has fallen on schools to combat the practice with student conduct pledges and anti-plagiarism software.

a. See Rubin v. Sabharwal, 171 A.D.3d 580, 99 N.Y.S.3d 17 (2019).

Critical Thinking

Josh pays AcademicShark.com $50 for an essay on the biblical references in Moby Dick. The website promises "a top-notch grade" and includes a disclaimer as described above. Josh hands in the Moby Dick paper without making any changes and receives a C+. Does he have any recourse under contract law should he want a refund? Explain your answer.

Because fraud actions necessarily involve wrongful conduct, courts may also award punitive, or exemplary, damages, which compensate a plaintiff over and above the amount of the actual loss. Because of the potential for punitive damages, which normally are not available in contract actions, plaintiffs often include a claim for fraudulent misrepresentation in their contract disputes.

13–3 Undue Influence and Duress

A contract lacks voluntary consent and is unenforceable if undue influence or duress is present.

13–3a Undue Influence

Undue Influence Persuasion that is less than actual force but more than advice and that induces a person to act according to the will or purposes of the dominating party.

Undue influence arises from relationships in which one party can greatly influence another party, thus overcoming that party's free will. A contract entered into under excessive or undue influence lacks voluntary consent and is therefore voidable.[12]

One Party Dominates the Other In various types of relationships, one party may have an opportunity to dominate and unfairly influence another party. Minors and elderly people, for instance, are often under the influence of guardians (persons who are legally responsible for them). If a guardian induces a young or elderly ward (the person whom the guardian looks after) to enter into a contract that benefits the guardian, the guardian may have exerted undue influence. Undue influence can arise from a number of confidential or fiduciary relationships, including attorney-client, physician-patient, guardian-ward, parent-child, husband-wife, and trustee-beneficiary.

Focus Question 3

What is the essential feature of undue influence?

The essential feature of undue influence is that the party being taken advantage of does not exercise free will in entering into a contract. It is not enough that a person is elderly or suffers from some mental or physical impairment. There must be clear and convincing evidence that the person did not act with free will. Similarly, the existence of a fiduciary relationship alone is insufficient to prove undue influence.

12. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 177.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

A Presumption of Undue Influence in Certain Situations The dominant party in a fiduciary relationship must exercise the utmost good faith in dealing with the other party. When the dominant party benefits from the relationship, a presumption of undue influence may arise. Thus, when a contract enriches the dominant party in a fiduciary relationship, the court will often presume that the contract was made under undue influence.

Example 13.12 Erik is the guardian for Kinsley, his ward. On her behalf, he enters into a contract from which he benefits financially. If Kinsley challenges the contract, the court will likely presume that the guardian has taken advantage of his ward. To rebut (refute) this presumption, Erik has to show that he made full disclosure to Kinsley and that consideration was present. He must also show that Kinsley received, if available, independent and competent advice before completing the transaction. Unless the presumption can be rebutted, the contract will be rescinded.

13–3b Duress

Agreement to the terms of a contract is not voluntary if one of the parties is forced into the agreement. The use of threats to force a party to enter into a contract constitutes duress, as does the use of blackmail or extortion to induce consent. Duress is both a defense to the enforcement of a contract and a ground for rescission of a contract.

To establish duress, there must be proof of a threat to do something that the threatening party has no right to do. Generally, for duress to occur, the threatened act must be wrongful or illegal, and it must render the person who receives the threat incapable of exercising free will. A threat to exercise a legal right, such as the right to sue someone, ordinarily does not constitute duress.

13–4 The Writing Requirement

Another defense to the enforceability of a contract is form—specifically, some contracts must be in writing. All states require certain types of contracts to be in writing or evidenced by a written memorandum or an electronic record. In addition, the party or parties against whom enforcement is sought must have signed the contract, unless certain exceptions apply (as discussed later in this chapter). In this text, we refer to these state statutes collectively as the Statute of Frauds.

Statute of Frauds A state statute that requires certain types of contracts to be in writing to be enforceable.

The following types of contracts are said to fall "within" or "under" the Statute of Frauds and therefore require a writing:

1. Contracts involving interests in land.
2. Contracts that cannot by their terms be performed within one year from the day after the date of formation.
3. Collateral, or secondary, contracts, such as promises to answer for the debt or duty of another.
4. Promises made in consideration of marriage.
5. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more.

Focus Question 4

What types of contracts must be in writing to be enforceable?

The actual name of the Statute of Frauds is misleading because it does not apply to fraud. Rather, in an effort to prevent fraud, the statute denies enforceability to certain contracts that do not comply with its requirements. The name derives from an English act passed in 1677 that was titled "An Act for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries."

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–4a Contracts Involving Interests in Land

A contract calling for the sale of land is not enforceable unless it is in writing or evidenced by a written or electronic memorandum. Land is real property and includes all physical objects that are permanently attached to the soil, such as buildings, fences, trees, and the soil itself. The Statute of Frauds operates as a defense to the enforcement of an oral contract for the sale of land. Example 13.13 Skylar contracts orally to sell his property in Fair Oaks to Beth. If he later decides not to sell, under most circumstances, Beth cannot enforce the contract.

The Statute of Frauds also requires written evidence of contracts for the transfer of other interests in land, such as mortgage agreements and leases. Similarly, an agreement that includes an option to purchase real property must be in writing for the option to be enforced. The issue in the following case was whether a contract for a sale of land met this requirement.

Case 13.2

Sloop v. Kiker

Court of Appeals of Arkansas, Division III, 2016 Ark.App. 125, 484 S.W.3d 696 (2016).

Facts Russell and Sally Kiker owned a house in Newton County, Arkansas. Mona Sloop agreed to buy it for $850,000. The parties signed a contract that identified the property by its street address and stipulated a $350,000 down payment, which was nonrefundable if closing did not occur by August 31. On the same day, they executed a deed containing a formal, legal description of the property by metes and bounds. (Metes and bounds is a way of describing the boundary lines of property according to the distance between two points.) They also agreed that Sloop could live in the house as caretaker until the August 31 deadline.

When the closing had not occurred by September 6, the Kikers filed a suit in an Arkansas state court against Sloop, seeking an order to remove her from the property and a declaration that they were entitled to keep the down payment. Sloop filed a counterclaim for the return of the $350,000. She argued that their contract violated the Statute of Frauds. The court issued a summary judgment in the favor of the Kikers. Sloop appealed.

Issue Does a contract that describes the real property being sold by its street address satisfy the Statute of Frauds?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court.

Reason Sloop argued that the contract did not satisfy the Statute of Frauds because it did not identify the Kikers as the sellers and it did not contain a sufficient description of the property. The court pointed out, however, that the deed the parties executed on the same day as the contract identified the Kikers as "grantors" and included a legal description of the property. "Generally, instruments executed at the same time by the same parties, for the same purpose, and in the course of the same transaction, are, in the eyes of the law, one instrument and will be read and construed together.

"Moreover, if a contract furnishes a means by which realty can be identified—a key to the property's location—the Statute of Frauds is satisfied." In this case, the designation in the contract of the premises by its street address met the requirement of the Statute of Frauds that the property being transferred be described with sufficient certainty for it to be identified.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Why does the Statute of Frauds require that a contract for a sale of land contain a sufficient description of the property?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the court in the Sloop case had not construed the deed and the contract as one instrument but as separate documents. How might that have affected the result? Explain.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–4b The One-Year Rule

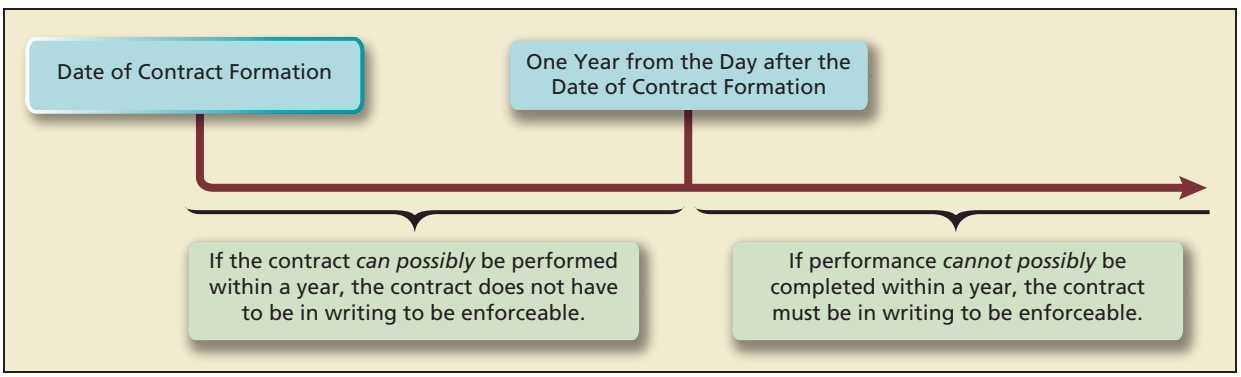
Contracts that cannot, by their own terms, be performed within one year from the day after the contract is formed must be in writing to be enforceable. The reason for this rule is that the parties' memory of their contract's terms is not likely to be reliable for longer than a year.

Time Period Starts the Day after the Contract Is Formed The one-year period begins to run the day after the contract is made. Example 13.14 Superior University forms a contract with Kimi stating that she will teach three courses in history during the coming academic year (September 15 through June 15). If the contract is formed in March, it must be in writing to be enforceable—because it cannot be performed within one year. If the contract is formed in July, in contrast, it will not have to be in writing to be enforceable—because it can be performed within one year.

Contract Must Be Objectively Impossible to Perform within One Year The test for determining whether an oral contract is enforceable under the one-year rule is whether performance is possible within one year from the day after the date of contract formation. It does not matter whether the agreement is likely to be performed during that period.

When performance of a contract is objectively impossible during the one-year period, the contract must be in writing to be enforceable. Example 13.15 A contract to provide five crops of tomatoes to be grown on a specific farm in Illinois would be objectively impossible to perform within one year. No farm in Illinois can produce five crops of tomatoes in a single year.

If performance is possible within one year under the contract's terms, the contract does not fall under the Statute of Frauds and need not be in writing. Case Example 13.16 Robert and Lynette Knigge owned a B&L Food Store in Redfield, South Dakota. When Robert was diagnosed with brain cancer and given five months to live, he entered into an oral contract with his brother, David, to manage the store. Robert died five months after the date of the contract. Lynette terminated David's employment two months later. David filed a suit in a South Dakota state court against his sister-in-law. He claimed that, under his oral contract with Robert, he was entitled to a severance payment if he lost the job at the store. A state court dismissed David's suit, but the South Dakota Supreme Court reversed and remanded. Because the oral contract between David and Robert could have been performed within one year, it did not have to be in writing to be enforceable.[13] Exhibit 13–2 graphically illustrates the one-year rule.



Sorbis/Shutterstock.com

How did the one-year rule affect the outcome of a lawsuit regarding the management of a local food store?

13. David Knigge v. B&L Food Stores, Inc., 2017 S.D. 4, 890 N.W.2d 570 (2017).

Exhibit 13–2 The One-Year Rule

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–4c Collateral Promises

Collateral Promise A secondary promise to a primary transaction, such as a promise made by one person to pay the debts of another if the latter fails to perform. A collateral promise normally must be in writing to be enforceable.

A collateral promise, or secondary promise, is one that is ancillary (subsidiary) to a principal transaction or primary contractual relationship. In other words, a collateral promise is one made by a third party to assume the debts or obligations of a primary party to a contract if that party does not perform. Any collateral promise of this nature falls under the Statute of Frauds and therefore must be in writing to be enforceable.

Primary versus Secondary Obligations An understanding of this concept requires the ability to distinguish between primary and secondary promises and obligations. A promise to pay another person's debt (or other obligation) that is not conditioned on the person's failure to pay (or perform) is a primary obligation. A promise to pay another's debt only if that party fails to pay is a secondary obligation. A contract in which a party assumes a primary obligation normally does not need to be in writing to be enforceable, whereas a contract assuming a secondary obligation does. Example 13.17 Nigel tells Dr. Lu, an orthodontist, that he will pay for the services provided for Nigel's niece. Because Nigel has assumed direct financial responsibility for his niece's debt, this is a primary obligation and need not be in writing to be enforceable. In contrast, if Nigel commits to paying his niece's orthodontist bill only if her mother does not, it is a secondary obligation. In that situation, Lu must have a signed writing or record proving that Nigel assumed this obligation for it to be enforced.

An Exception—The "Main Purpose" Rule An oral promise to answer for the debt of another is covered by the Statute of Frauds unless the guarantor's purpose in accepting secondary liability is to secure a personal benefit. Under the "main purpose" rule, this type of contract need not be in writing.[14] The assumption is that a court can infer from the circumstances of a case whether a "leading objective" of the promisor was to secure a personal benefit.

Example 13.18 Carrie contracts with Custom Manufacturing Company to have some machines custom made for her factory. She promises Newform Supply, Custom's supplier, that if Newform continues to deliver the materials to Custom for the production of the custom-made machines, she will guarantee payment. This promise need not be in writing, even though the effect may be to pay the debt of another, because Carrie's main purpose is to secure a benefit for herself.

Another typical application of the main purpose doctrine occurs when one creditor guarantees a debtor's debt to another creditor to forestall litigation. The purpose is to allow the debtor to remain in business long enough to generate profits sufficient to pay both creditors. In this situation, the guaranty does not need to be in writing to be enforceable.

13–4d Promises Made in Consideration of Marriage

A unilateral promise to make a monetary payment or to give property in consideration of marriage must be in writing. Example 13.19 Evan promises to buy Celeste a house in Maui if she marries him. Celeste would need written evidence of Evan's promise to enforce it.

Prenuptial Agreement An agreement made before marriage that defines each partner's ownership rights in the other partner's property. Prenuptial agreements must be in writing to be enforceable.

The same rule applies to a prenuptial agreement—an agreement made before marriage that defines each partner's ownership rights in the other partner's property. Example 13.20 Before marrying country singer Keith Urban, actress Nicole Kidman entered into a prenuptial agreement with him. Kidman agreed that if the couple divorced, she would pay Urban $640,000 for every year they had been married, unless Urban was using drugs. In that event, he would receive nothing.

14. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 116.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–4e Contracts for the Sale of Goods

The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) includes Statute of Frauds provisions that require written evidence or an electronic record of a contract for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more. (This low threshold amount may be increased in the future.)

A writing that will satisfy the UCC requirement need only state the quantity term (six thousand boxes of cotton gauze, for instance). The contract will not be enforceable for any quantity greater than that set forth in the writing.

Other agreed-on terms can be omitted or even stated imprecisely in the writing, as long as they adequately reflect both parties' intentions. A written memorandum or series of communications (including e-mail) evidencing a contract will suffice, provided that the writing is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought.

13–4f Exceptions to the Statute of Frauds

Exceptions to the applicability of the Statute of Frauds are made in certain situations. We describe those situations in the following subsections.

Partial Performance When a contract has been partially performed and the parties cannot be returned to their positions prior to the contract's formation, a court may grant specific performance. Specific performance is an equitable remedy that requires that a contract be performed according to its precise terms. The parties still must prove that an oral contract existed, of course.

In cases involving oral contracts for the transfer of interests in land, courts usually look at whether justice is better served by enforcing the oral contract when partial performance has taken place. For instance, if the purchaser has paid part of the price, taken possession, and made valuable improvements to the property, a court may grant specific performance.

In some states, mere reliance on certain types of oral contracts is enough to remove them from the Statute of Frauds. Under the UCC, an oral contract for goods priced at $500 or more is enforceable to the extent that a seller accepts payment or a buyer accepts delivery of the goods.[15]

Case Example 13.21 Pacific Fruit, Inc., exports cargo from Ecuador. NYKCool, based in Sweden, provides maritime transportation. NYKCool and Pacific entered into a written contract with a two-year duration, under which NYKCool agreed to transport weekly shipments of bananas from Ecuador to California and Japan.

At the end of the period, the parties agreed to extend the deal, but a new contract was never signed. The parties continued making weekly shipments for four more years until a dispute arose over unused cargo capacity and unpaid freight charges. An international arbitration panel found that Pacific Fruit was liable to NYKCool for $8.7 million for breach of contract. Pacific Fruit appealed, arguing that there was no contract in place. The court affirmed the award in favor of NYKCool. "The parties' substantial partial performance on the contract weighs strongly in favor of contract formation."[16]

Admissions If a party against whom enforcement of an oral contract is sought "admits" under oath that a contract for sale was made, the contract will be enforceable.[17] The party's admission can occur at any stage of the court proceedings, such as during a deposition or other discovery, pleadings, or testimony.

---

15. UCC 2–201(3)(c).

16. NYKCool A.B. v. Pacific Fruit, Inc., 2013 WL 163621 (2d Cir. 2013). The initials A.B. stand for Aktiebolag, which is the Swedish term for "limited company."

17. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 133.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

gerenme/Getty Images

If a seller admits under oath to a contract for $10,000 of commercial kitchen equipment, does the buyer owe more if additional equipment was installed?

If a party admits a contract subject to the UCC, the contract is enforceable, but only to the extent of the quantity admitted.[18] Example 13.22 Rachel, the president of Bistro Corporation, admits under oath that an oral agreement was made with Commercial Kitchens, Inc., to buy certain equipment for $10,000. A court will enforce the agreement only to the extent admitted ($10,000), even if Commercial Kitchens claims that the agreement involved $20,000 worth of equipment.

Promissory Estoppel An oral contract that would otherwise be unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds may be enforced under the doctrine of promissory estoppel. Section 139 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts provides that an oral promise can be enforceable, notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds, if the promisee has justifiably relied on the promise to the promisee's detriment. The promisee's reliance must have been foreseeable to the person making the promise, and enforcing the promise must be the only way to avoid injustice.

Note the similarities between promissory estoppel and the doctrine of partial performance discussed previously. Both require reasonable reliance and operate to estop, or prevent, a party from claiming that no contract exists.

Special Exceptions under the UCC Special exceptions to the applicability of the Statute of Frauds exist for sales contracts. Oral contracts for customized goods may be enforced in certain circumstances. Another exception has to do with oral contracts between merchants that have been confirmed in a written memorandum. We will examine this exception when we discuss the UCC's Statute of Frauds provisions.

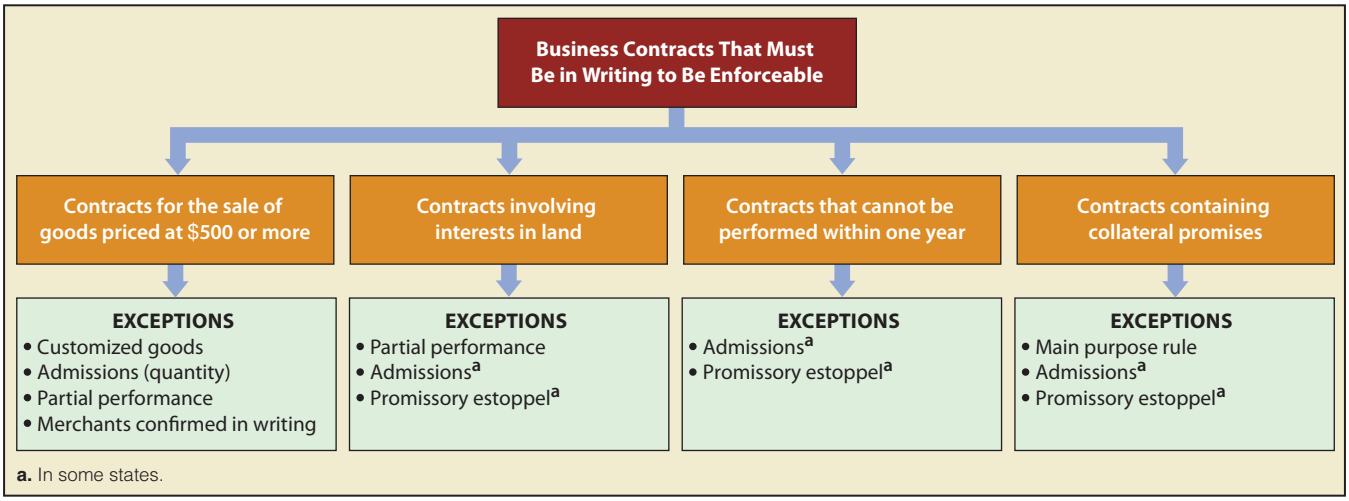

Exhibit 13–3 graphically summarizes the types of contracts that fall under the Statute of Frauds and the various exceptions that apply.

13–4g Sufficiency of the Writing

A written contract will satisfy the writing requirement of the Statute of Frauds, as will a written memorandum or an electronic record that evidences the agreement and is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. The signature need not be placed at the end of the document but can be anywhere in the writing. A signature can consist of a typed name or even just initials rather than the full name.

18. UCC 2–201(3)(b).

Exhibit 13–3 Contracts Subject to the Statute of Frauds

a. In some states.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

What Constitutes a Writing? A writing can consist of any confirmation, invoice, sales slip, check, fax, or e-mail—or such items in combination. The written contract need not be contained in a single document to constitute an enforceable contract. One document may incorporate another document by expressly referring to it. Several documents may form a single contract if they are physically attached—such as by staple, paper clip, or glue—or even if they are only placed in the same envelope.

Example 13.23 Simpson orally agrees to sell some land next to a shopping mall to Terro Properties. Simpson gives Terro an unsigned memo that contains a legal description of the property, and Terro gives Simpson an unsigned first draft of their contract. Simpson sends Terro a signed letter that refers to the memo and to the first and final drafts of the contract. Terro sends Simpson an unsigned copy of the final draft of the contract with a signed check stapled to it. Together, the documents can constitute a writing sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds and bind both parties to the terms of the contract as evidenced by the writings.

What Must Be Contained in the Writing? A memorandum or note evidencing an oral contract need only contain the essential terms of the contract, not every term. There must, of course, also be some indication that the parties voluntarily agreed to the terms. As mentioned, under the UCC, a writing evidencing a contract for the sale of goods need only state the quantity and be signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought.

Under most state laws, the writing must also name the parties and identify the subject matter, the consideration, and the essential terms with reasonable certainty. In addition, contracts for the sale of land usually must state the price and describe the property with sufficient clarity to allow these terms to be determined without reference to outside sources.

Note that because only the party against whom enforcement is sought must have signed the writing, a contract may be enforceable by one of its parties but not by the other. Example 13.24 Rock orally agrees to buy Betty's lake house and lot for $350,000. Betty writes Rock a letter confirming the sale by identifying the parties and the essential terms of the sales contract—price, method of payment, and legal address—and signs the letter. Betty has made a written memorandum of the oral land contract. Because she signed the letter, she normally can be held to the oral contract by Rock. Betty cannot enforce the agreement against Rock, however. Because he has not signed or entered into a written contract or memorandum, Rock can plead the Statute of Frauds as a defense.

13–5 The Parol Evidence Rule

Sometimes, a written contract does not include—or contradicts—an oral understanding reached by the parties before or at the time of contracting. For instance, a landlord might tell a person who agrees to rent an apartment that cats are permitted, whereas the lease contract clearly states that no pets are allowed. In determining the outcome of such disputes, the courts look to a common law rule called the parol evidence rule.

Under this rule, if a court finds that a written contract represents the complete and final statement of the parties' agreement, then it will not allow either party to present parol evidence. Parol evidence is testimony or other evidence of communications between the parties that is not contained in the contract itself. Thus, a party normally cannot present evidence of the parties' "prior or contemporaneous agreements or negotiations" if that evidence contradicts or varies the terms of the parties' written contract.[19]

The following case involved an alleged contract that appeared to be unenforceable for lack of consideration. One of the parties sought to present evidence outside the written terms of the deal to establish consideration. Could the court consider this evidence?

Focus Question 5

What is parol evidence? When is it admissible to clarify the terms of a written contract?

Parol Evidence Rule A rule of contracts under which a court will not receive into evidence prior or contemporaneous external agreements that contradict the terms of the parties' written contract.

19. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 213.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 13.3

Habel v. Estate of Capelli

Court of Appeals of Wisconsin, 2020 WI App 15, 391 Wis.2d 399, 941 N.W.2d 858 (2020).

Facts Alfred Habel operated a sports memorabilia business. John Capelli, a good customer, took some items for which he promised to pay later. When Habel sought payment, Capelli told him that he did not want his family to know how much he had spent and proposed that, in exchange for forbearance on the debt, Habel could sell Capelli's entire collection on his death and take a commission. Habel agreed, and they wrote out the terms, which gave Habel the choice not to perform the sale.

Sixteen years later, Capelli died. Habel showed the written agreement to Capelli's widow, Julie, who refused to let Habel sell the collection. Habel filed a suit in a Wisconsin state court against Capelli's estate, seeking specific performance or damages.

The estate argued that because the written terms gave Habel the option not to perform, there was no consideration on his part for the deal, making it unenforceable. The court agreed and granted a judgment in favor of the estate. Habel appealed, claiming that his forbearance was consideration.

Issue Did the parol evidence rule prevent Habel from presenting evidence of his purported forbearance?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. Habel's alleged agreement with Capelli was unenforceable for lack of consideration.

Reason When the written terms of an alleged contract are at issue, the parol evidence rule prevents a party from presenting evidence that contradicts or varies those terms.

In the terms of the alleged contract at issue in this case, Habel did not promise to do anything. Capelli "willed" Habel the right to sell Capelli's sports memorabilia collection. But the document provided that the parties' "agreement" could be terminated "in the event Habel shall not accept" to perform it. Under this provision, Habel assumed no obligation and could opt out of the deal. The alleged contract was thus rendered unenforceable for lack of consideration.

The court reasoned that it could not consider evidence of Habel's claim because the circumstances from which forbearance allegedly arose were not set out in the terms. The parol evidence rule barred the court's review of any such extrinsic evidence. "Habel's parol evidence cannot be used to vary or add terms, such as consideration—some detriment or obligation by Habel—when the document makes clear that all mutual promises are set forth therein."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Why is evidence of a prior negotiation or agreement that contradicts or varies the terms of a written agreement inadmissible in a court under the parol evidence rule?
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the written terms of the deal between Habel and Capelli had referred to other documents, such as unpaid invoices for Capelli's purchases, to be included as part of their alleged agreement. Would the result have been different? Discuss.

13–5a Exceptions to the Parol Evidence Rule

Because of the rigidity of the parol evidence rule, courts make several exceptions. These exceptions include the following:

Know This
The parol evidence rule and its exceptions relate to the rules concerning the interpretation of contracts.

1. Contracts subsequently modified. Evidence of a subsequent modification (oral or written) of a written contract can be introduced in court. Oral modifications may not be enforceable, however, if they come under the Statute of Frauds (such as a modification that increases the price of the goods being sold to more than $500). Also, oral modifications will not be enforceable if the original contract provides that any modification must be in writing.[20]
2. Voidable or void contracts. Oral evidence can be introduced in all cases to show that the contract was voidable or void (for instance, induced by mistake, fraud, or misrepresentation). The reason is simple: if deception led one of the parties to agree

20. UCC 2–209(2), (3).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

to the terms of a written contract, oral evidence indicating fraud should not be excluded. Courts frown on bad faith and are quick to allow the introduction at trial of parol evidence when it establishes fraud.

3. Contracts containing ambiguous terms. When the terms of a written contract are ambiguous, evidence is admissible to show the meaning of the terms. Case Example 13.25 Howard and Eleanor Windows owned a home in Pennsylvania. When raw sewage backed up in the city's sewer system and infiltrated their home, they filed a claim with their homeowner's insurance company, Erie Insurance Exchange. Erie denied coverage under the insurance policy's general exclusion for water damage caused by "water or sewage which backs up through sewers and drains." The Windowses sued Erie for breach of contract.

   Erie claimed that the parol evidence rule applied and prevented the Windowses from presenting evidence that contradicted the water-damage exclusion in the policy. The court disagreed and allowed the Windowses to present their case to a jury, which awarded them more than $75,000 in damages. Erie appealed. The appellate court affirmed the jury's verdict, reasoning that the term "backs up" was not defined in the contract and was subject to more than one reasonable interpretation.[21]

4. Incomplete contracts. Evidence is admissible when the written contract is incomplete in that it lacks one or more of the essential terms. The courts allow evidence to "fill in the gaps" in the contract.

5. Prior dealing, course of performance, or usage of trade. Under the UCC, evidence can be introduced to explain or supplement a written contract by showing a prior dealing, course of performance, or usage of trade.[22] This is because when buyers and sellers deal with each other over extended periods of time, certain customary practices develop. These practices are often overlooked in the writing of the contract, so courts allow the introduction of evidence to show how the parties have acted in the past. Usage of trade—practices and customs generally followed in a particular industry—can also shed light on the meaning of certain contract provisions, and thus evidence of trade usage may be admissible.

D_Townsend/Shutterstock.com

Which exception to the parol evidence rule applied in a dispute regarding an insurance claim for water and sewer damage?

6. Contracts subject to an orally agreed-on condition precedent. Sometimes the parties agree that a condition must be fulfilled before a party is required to perform the contract. This is called a condition precedent. If the parties have orally agreed on a condition precedent and the condition does not conflict with the terms of a written agreement, then a court may allow parol evidence to prove the oral condition. The parol evidence rule does not apply here because the existence of the entire written contract is subject to an orally agreed-on condition. Proof of the condition does not alter or modify the written terms but affects the enforceability of the written contract.

7. Contracts with an obvious or gross clerical (or typographic) error. When an obvious or gross clerical (or typographic) error exists that clearly would not represent the agreement of the parties, parol evidence is admissible to correct the error. Example 13.26 Davis agrees to lease office space from Stone Enterprises for $3,000 per month. The signed written lease provides for a monthly lease payment of $300 rather than the $3,000 agreed to by the parties. Because the error is obvious, Stone Enterprises would be allowed to admit parol evidence to correct the mistake.

21. Windows v. Eric Insurance Exchange, 161 A.3d 953 (Pa.Sup.Ct. 2017).
22. UCC 1–205, 2–202.

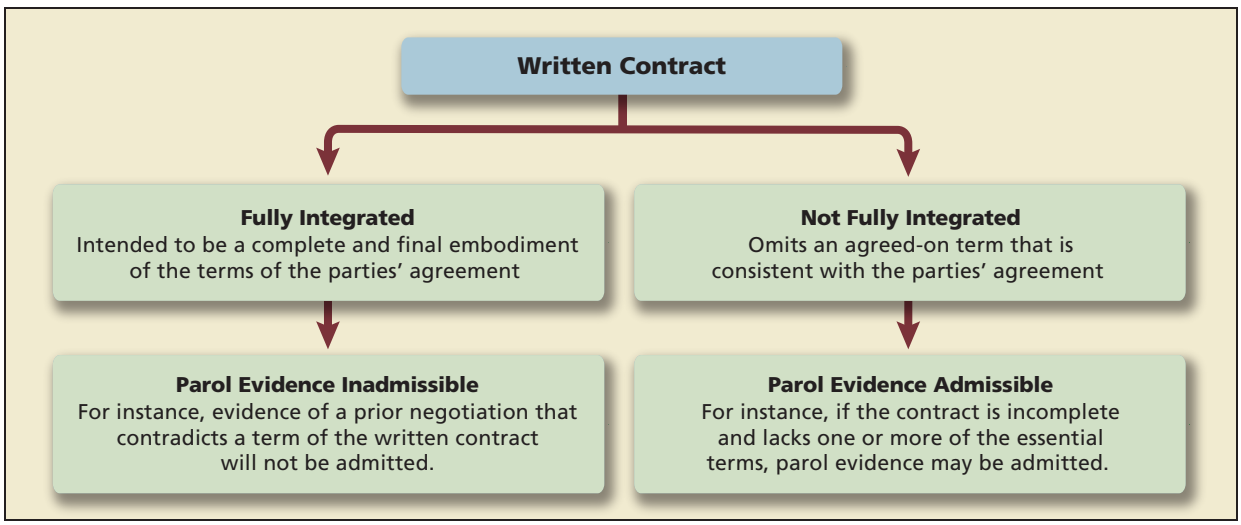
Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–5b Integrated Contracts

Integrated Contract A written contract that constitutes the final expression of the parties' agreement. Evidence extraneous to the contract that contradicts or alters the meaning of the contract in any way is inadmissible.

In determining whether to allow parol evidence, courts consider whether the written contract is intended to be a complete and final statement of the terms of the agreement. If it is, the contract is referred to as an integrated contract, and extraneous evidence (evidence from outside the contract) is excluded.

Case Example 13.27 Volvo Trucks makes heavy-duty trucks. Andy Mohr Truck Center was one of its dealers for a few years, until the relationship soured and they ended up in litigation. Volvo sought to terminate Mohr's dealership, claiming that Mohr had misrepresented a material fact in connection with its dealership application.



Mohr supposedly had orally promised Volvo that it would build a new long-term facility for the dealership if Volvo awarded the contract to Mohr (the "new-facility claim"). Mohr claimed that Volvo had orally promised to give Mohr a Mack Truck dealership franchise because Volvo owned Mack Truck (the "Mack claim"). Neither of these alleged promises was written in the parties' contract, which contained an integration clause. A federal district court dismissed the new-facility claim and the Mack claim. A federal appellate court affirmed, noting that both Volvo and Mohr were sophisticated parties that had experience with franchises and dealer agreements. The existence of an integration clause in their contract made it unreasonable for them to rely on any representations made outside of the contract.[23]

A contract can be either completely or partially integrated. If it contains all of the terms of the parties' agreement, then it is completely integrated. If it contains only some of the terms and not others, it is partially integrated. If the contract is only partially integrated, evidence of consistent additional terms is admissible to supplement the written agreement.[24] Note that parol evidence is admitted only to add to the terms of a partially integrated contract. For both completely and partially integrated contracts, courts exclude any evidence that contradicts the writing.

Exhibit 13–4 illustrates the relationship between integrated contracts and the parol evidence rule.

23. Andy Mohr Truck Center, Inc. v. Volvo Trucks North America, 869 F.3d 598 (7th Cir. 2017).
24. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 216.

Exhibit 13–4 The Parol Evidence Rule

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Practice and Review

Chelene had been a caregiver for Marta's elderly mother, Janis, for nine years. Shortly before Janis passed away, Chelene convinced her to buy Chelene's house for Marta. Janis died before the papers were signed, however. Four months later, Marta used her inheritance to buy Chelene's house without having it inspected. The house was built in the 1950s, and Chelene said it was in "perfect condition." Nevertheless, one year after the purchase, the basement started leaking. Marta had the paneling removed from the basement walls and discovered that the walls were bowed inward and cracked. Marta then had a civil engineer inspect the basement walls, and he found that the cracks had been caulked and painted over before the paneling was installed. He concluded that the "wall failure" had existed "for at least thirty years" and that the basement walls were "structurally unsound." Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Can Marta avoid the contract on the ground that both parties made a mistake about the condition of the house? Explain.
2. Can Marta sue Chelene for fraudulent misrepresentation? Why or why not? What element (or elements) might be lacking?
3. Now assume that Chelene knew that the basement walls were cracked and bowed and that she hired someone to install paneling before offering to sell the house. Did she have a duty to disclose this defect to Marta? Could a court find that Chelene's silence in this situation constituted misrepresentation? Explain.
4. Can Marta obtain rescission of the contract based on undue influence? If the sale to Janis had been completed before her death, could Janis have obtained rescission based on undue influence? Explain.

Debate This

Many countries have eliminated the Statute of Frauds except for sales of real estate. The United States should do the same.

Key Terms

bilateral mistake 311 collateral promise 322 innocent misrepresentation 316 integrated contract 328 latent defect 315
negligent misrepresentation 316
parol evidence rule 325
prenuptial agreement 322
scienter 316
Statute of Frauds 319 undue influence 318 unilateral mistake 311 voluntary consent 310

Chapter Summary: Defenses to Contract Enforceability

Mistakes	1. Unilateral—Generally, the mistaken party is bound by the contract unless (a) the other party knows or should have known of the mistake or (b) the mistake is a substantial mathematical error—such as an error in addition or subtraction—made inadvertently and without gross negligence. 2. Bilateral (mutual)—When both parties are mistaken about the same material fact, such as identity, either party can avoid the contract.
Fraudulent Misrepresentation	When fraud occurs, the innocent party can usually enforce or avoid the contract. The following elements are necessary to establish fraud: 1. A misrepresentation of a material fact must occur. 2. There must be an intent to deceive. 3. The innocent party must justifiably rely on the misrepresentation. 4. To collect damages, a party must have been harmed as a result of the misrepresentation.

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Undue Influence and Duress	1. Undue influence—Arises from special relationships, such as fiduciary relationships, in which one party's free will has been overcome by the undue influence exerted by the other party. The contract is voidable because it lacks voluntary consent. 2. Duress—The tactic of forcing a party to enter a contract under the fear of a threat—for instance, the threat of violence or serious economic loss. The party forced to enter the contract can rescind the contract.
The Writing Requirement	1. Applicability—The following types of contracts fall under the Statute of Frauds and must be in writing to be enforceable: a. Contracts involving interests in land, such as sales, leases, or mortgages. b. Contracts that cannot by their terms be fully performed within one year from the day after the contract's formation. c. Collateral promises, such as contracts made between a guarantor and a creditor whose terms make the guarantor secondarily liable. Exception: the "main purpose" rule. d. Promises made in consideration of marriage, including promises to make a monetary payment or give property in consideration of a promise to marry and prenuptial agreements made in consideration of marriage. e. Contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more under the Statute of Frauds provision in Section 2–201 of the Uniform Commercial Code. 2. Exceptions—Partial performance, admissions, and promissory estoppel. Oral contracts for customized goods may be enforced in certain circumstances. Another exception concerns oral contracts between merchants that have been confirmed in writing. 3. Sufficiency of the writing or electronic record—To constitute an enforceable contract under the Statute of Frauds, under most state laws a writing must be signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought, name the parties, identify the subject matter and the consideration, and state with reasonable certainty the essential terms of the contract. Under the UCC, a contract for a sale of goods is not enforceable beyond the quantity of goods shown in the contract.
The Parol Evidence Rule	The parol evidence rule prohibits the introduction at trial of evidence of the parties' prior or contemporaneous negotiations or agreements if this evidence contradicts or varies the terms of the parties' written contract. The written contract is assumed to be the complete embodiment of the parties' agreement. Because of the rigidity of the parol evidence rule, courts make a number of exceptions. For instance, courts may allow parol evidence when a contract is void or voidable, contains ambiguous terms, or is incomplete.

Issue Spotters

1. In selling a house, Matt tells Ann that the wiring, fixtures, and appliances are of a certain quality. Matt knows nothing about the quality, but it is not as specified. Ann buys the house. On learning the true quality, Ann confronts Matt. He says he wasn't trying to fool her, he was only trying to make a sale. Can she rescind the deal? Why or why not? (See Fraudulent Misrepresentation.)
2. Paula orally agrees to work with Next Corporation in New York City for two years. Paula moves her family to the city and begins work. Three months later, Paula is fired for no stated cause. She sues for reinstatement and back pay. Next Corporation argues that there is no written contract between them. What will the court say? (See The Writing Requirement.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

13–1. Voluntary Consent. Jerome is an elderly man who lives with his nephew, Philip. Jerome is totally dependent on Philip's support. Philip tells Jerome that unless Jerome transfers a tract of land he owns to Philip for a price 30 percent below market value, Philip will no longer support and take care of him. Jerome enters into the contract. Discuss fully whether Jerome can set aside this contract. (See Undue Influence and Duress.)

13–2. Statute of Frauds. Gemma promises a local hardware store that she will pay for a lawn mower that her brother is purchasing on credit if the brother fails to pay the debt. Must this promise be in writing to be enforceable? Why or why not? (See The Writing Requirement).

13–3. The Parol Evidence Rule. Rimma Vaks and her husband, Steven Mangano, executed a written contract with Denise Ryan and Ryan Auction Co. to auction their furnishings. The six-page contract provided a detailed summary of the parties' agreement. It addressed the items to be auctioned, how reserve prices would be determined, and the amount of Ryan's commission. When a dispute arose between the parties, Vaks and Mangano sued Ryan for breach of contract. Vaks and Mangano asserted that, before they executed the contract, Ryan had made various oral representations that were inconsistent with the terms of their written agreement. Assuming that their written contract was valid, can Vaks and Mangano recover for breach of an oral contract? Why or why not? [Vaks v. Ryan, 2014 Mass.App.Div. 37 (2014)]. (See The Parol Evidence Rule.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

13–4. Promises Made in Consideration of Marriage. After twenty-nine years of marriage, Robert and Mary Lou Tuttle were divorced. They admitted in court that before they were married, they had signed a prenuptial agreement. They both acknowledged that the agreement had stated that both would keep their own property and anything derived from that property. Robert came into the marriage owning farmland, while Mary Lou owned no real estate. During the marriage, ten different parcels of land, totaling about six hundred acres, were acquired, and two corporations, Tuttle Grain, Inc., and Tuttle Farms, Inc., were formed. A copy of the prenuptial agreement could not be found. Can the court enforce the agreement without a writing? Why or why not? [In re Marriage of Tuttle, 2013 WL 164035 (Ill.App. 5 Dist. 2013)] (See The Writing Requirement.)

13–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Fraudulent Misrepresentation. Joy Pervis and Brenda Pauley worked together as talent agents in Georgia. When Pervis "discovered" actress Dakota Fanning, Pervis sent Fanning's audition tape to Cindy Osbrink, a talent agent in California. Osbrink agreed to represent Fanning in California and to pay 3 percent of Osbrink's commissions to Pervis and Pauley, who agreed to split the payments equally. Six years later, Pervis told Pauley that their agreement with Osbrink had expired and there would be no more payments. Nevertheless, Pervis continued to receive payments from Osbrink. Each time Pauley asked about commissions, however, Pervis replied that she was not receiving any. Do these facts evidence fraud? Explain. [In re Pervis, 512 Bankr. 348 (N.D.Ga. 2014)] (See Fraudulent Misrepresentation.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 13–5, go to Appendix E.

13–6. Promises Made in Consideration of Marriage. Before their marriage, Linda and Gerald Heiden executed a prenuptial agreement. The agreement provided that "no spouse shall have any right in the property of the other spouse, even in the event of the death of either party." The description of Gerald's separate property included a settlement from a personal injury suit. Twenty-four years later, Linda filed for divorce. The court ruled that the prenuptial agreement applied only in the event of death, not divorce, and entered a judgment that included a property division and spousal support award. The ruling disparately favored Linda, whose monthly income with spousal support would be $4,467, leaving Gerald with only $1,116. Did the court interpret the Heidens' prenuptial agreement correctly? Discuss. [Heiden v. Heiden, 2015 WL 849006 (Mich.App. 2015)] (See The Writing Requirement.)

13–7. Exceptions to the Writing Requirement. Madeline Castellotti was the sole shareholder of Whole Pies, Inc., which owns John's Pizzeria in New York City. Her other assets included a 51 percent interest in a real estate partnership, a residence on Staten Island, and various bank accounts. When Madeline's son, Peter Castellotti, was going through a divorce, Madeline wanted to prevent Peter's then-wife Rea from benefiting from any of Madeline's assets. With this purpose in mind, she removed Peter from her will, leaving her daughter, Lisa Free, as the sole beneficiary. Lisa orally agreed to provide Peter with half of the income generated by the assets after their mother's death if his divorce was still pending and to transfer half of the assets after the divorce was final. In reliance on those promises, Peter agreed to pay the property taxes for the estate. Madeline died and Peter paid the taxes, but Lisa reneged on the deal. Peter filed a suit in a New York state court against his sister to recover. Should the court enforce the promise? On what legal theory? [Castellotti v. Free, 138 A.D.3d 198, 27 N.Y.S.3d 507 (1 Dept. 2016)] (See The Writing Requirement.)

13–8. The Statute of Frauds. Michael Brannon filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Derrick and Nancy Edman, claiming breach of an alleged oral contract for the sale of certain real property in Akron. Brannon asserted that he had moved onto the property and made significant improvements to the house, investing time and money in anticipation of receiving ownership of the property after all of the payments had been made. Brannon also said that he had diligently made the payments, and the Edmans had accepted them, crediting each against the remaining balance, until about half of the price had been paid. But when he attempted to make a payment in the third year of his occupancy, the Edmans refused it and threatened him with eviction. The Edmans argued that the Statute of Frauds barred Brannon's claim. Is this alleged contract enforceable? Explain. [Brannon v. Edman, 2018 -Ohio- 70, (9th Dist. 2018)] (See The Writing Requirement.)

A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Fraudulent Misrepresentation. Data Consulting Group contracted with Weston Medsurg Center, PLLC, a health-care facility in Charlotte, North Carolina, to install, maintain, and manage Weston's computers and software. At about the same time, Ginger

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Blackwood began to work for Weston as a medical billing and coding specialist. Soon, she was submitting false time reports and converting Weston documents and data to her own purposes. On her request, Data Consulting manager Nasko Dinev removed evidence of her actions from her work computer. [Weston Medsurg Center, PLLC v. Blackwood, 795 S.E.2d 829 (2017)] (See Fraudulent Misrepresentation.)

1. What should Weston do when it learns of these activities? With respect to this situation, identify and consider the firm's primary ethical dilemma using the IDDR approach.
2. Suppose that despite Dinev's efforts, Weston is later able to recover the data that was removed from Blackwood's work computer. How might this affect Weston's choices? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

13–9. Time-Limited Group Assignment—The Writing Requirement. Jason Novell, doing business as Novell Associates, hired Barbara Meade as an independent contractor. The parties orally agreed on the terms of employment, including payment of a share of the company's income to Meade, but they did not put anything in writing. Two years later, Meade quit. Novell then told Meade that she was entitled to $9,602—25 percent of the difference between the accounts receivable and the accounts payable as of Meade's last day of work. Meade disagreed and demanded more than $63,500—25 percent of the revenue from all invoices, less the cost of materials and outside processing, for each of the years that she had worked for Novell. Meade filed a lawsuit against Novell for breach of contract. (See The Writing Requirement.)

1. The first group will evaluate whether the parties had an enforceable contract.
2. The second group will decide whether the parties' oral agreement falls within any exception to the Statute of Frauds.
3. The third group will discuss how the lawsuit would be affected if Novell admitted that the parties had an oral contract under which Meade was entitled to a share of the company's income, but claimed that they had agreed she would receive only 15 percent of the income from invoices, not 25 percent.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

14 Third Party Rights and Discharge

"The laws of a state change with the changing times."

Aeschylus
525–456 B.C.E.
(Greek dramatist)

Once it has been determined that a valid and legally enforceable contract exists, attention can turn to the rights and duties of the parties to the contract. A contract is a private agreement between the parties who have entered into it, and traditionally these parties alone have rights and liabilities under the contract. This principle is referred to as privity of contract, and it establishes the basic principle that third parties have no rights in contracts to which they are not parties.

You may expect by now that for every rule of contract law, there is an exception. As times change, so must the laws, as indicated in the chapter-opening quotation. When justice cannot be served by adherence to a rule of law, exceptions to the rule must be made. For instance, privity of contract is not required for an injured person to recover damages under product liability laws.

In this chapter, we look at some exceptions to the rule of privity of contract: namely, assignments, delegations, and third party beneficiary contracts. We also examine how contractual obligations can be discharged and the degree of performance required to discharge a contract.

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is an assignment?
2. In what situations is the delegation of duties prohibited?
3. What factors indicate that a third party beneficiary is an intended beneficiary?
4. When is a breach considered material, and what effect does that have on the other party's obligation to perform?

Privity of Contract The relationship that exists between the promisor and the promisee of a contract.

14–1 Assignments

In a bilateral contract, the two parties have corresponding rights and duties. One party has a right to require the other to perform some task, and the other has a duty to perform it. Sometimes, though, a party will transfer contractual rights to someone else.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Assignment The transfer to another of all or part of one's rights arising under a contract.

Focus Question 1

What is an assignment?

The transfer of contract rights to a third person is known as an assignment. (The transfer of contract duties is a delegation, as will be discussed later in this chapter.)

Assignments are important because they are often used in business financing. Lending institutions, such as banks, frequently assign the rights to receive payments under their loan contracts to other firms, which pay for those rights. Example 14.1 Kendra obtains a loan from a bank to finance an online business venture. Later, she receives a notice from the bank stating that it has transferred (assigned) its rights to receive payments on the loan to another firm. When it is time to repay the loan, Kendra must make the payments to that other firm.

Note also that lenders that make mortgage loans (loans that enable prospective home buyers to purchase real estate) often assign their rights to collect the mortgage payments to a third party. Following an assignment, the home buyer is notified that future payments must be made to the third party, rather than to the original lender. Billions of dollars change hands daily in the business world in the form of assignments of rights in contracts. If it were not possible to transfer contractual rights, many businesses could not continue to operate.

14–1a Effect of an Assignment

Assignor A party who transfers (assigns) rights under a contract to another party (the assignee).

Assignee A party to whom rights under a contract are transferred, or assigned.

Obligee One to whom an obligation is owed.

Obligor One who owes an obligation to another.

In an assignment, the party assigning the rights to a third party is known as the assignor,[1] and the party receiving the rights is the assignee.[2] Other terms traditionally used to describe the parties in assignment relationships are obligee (the person to whom a duty, or obligation, is owed) and obligor (the person who is obligated to perform the duty).

In general, an assignment can take any form, oral or written, although it is advisable to put all assignments in writing. Of course, assignments covered by the Statute of Frauds—such as an assignment of an interest in land—must be in writing to be enforceable. In addition, most states require contracts for the assignment of wages to be in writing.[3] There are other assignments that must be in writing as well.

Extinguishes the Rights of the Assignor When rights under a contract are assigned unconditionally, the rights of the assignor are extinguished.[4] The assignee has a right to demand performance from the other original party to the contract, the obligor.

Example 14.2 Brenda is obligated by contract to pay Alex $1,000. Brenda is the obligor because she owes an obligation, or duty, to Alex. Alex is the obligee, the one to whom the obligation is owed. If Alex then assigns his right to receive the $1,000 to Charles, Alex is the assignor and Charles is the assignee. Charles now becomes the obligee because Brenda owes Charles the $1,000. Here, a valid assignment of a debt exists. Charles (the assignee-obligee) is entitled to enforce payment in court if Brenda (the obligor) does not pay him the $1,000. (Alex is no longer entitled to enforce payment because the assignment extinguished his original contract rights.) These concepts are illustrated in Exhibit 14–1.

Assignee Takes Rights Subject to Defenses The assignee obtains only those rights that the assignor originally had. In addition, the assignee's rights are subject to the defenses that the obligor has against the assignor.

Example 14.3 Returning to Example 14.2, suppose that Brenda owes Alex the $1,000 under a contract in which she agreed to buy Alex's Microsoft Surface Pro. When Brenda decided to purchase the tablet, she relied on Alex's fraudulent misrepresentation that it had an Intel Core i7 processor. When Brenda discovers that its processor is an Intel i3, she tells Alex that she

1. Pronounced uh-sye-nore.
2. Pronounced uh-sye-nee.
3. See, for example, California Labor Code Section 300.
4. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 317.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 14–1 Assignment Relationships

In the assignment relationship illustrated here, Alex assigns his rights under a contract that he made with Brenda to a third party, Charles. Alex thus becomes the assignor and Charles the assignee of the contractual rights. Brenda, the obligor, now owes performance to Charles instead of Alex. Alex's original contractual rights are extinguished after assignment.

is going to return the device to him and cancel the contract. Even though Alex has assigned his "right" to receive the $1,000 to Charles, Brenda need not pay Charles the $1,000. Brenda can raise the defense of Alex's fraudulent misrepresentation to avoid payment. ■

14–1b Rights That Cannot Be Assigned

As a general rule, all rights can be assigned. Exceptions are made, however, in the following special circumstances.

When a Statute Expressly Prohibits Assignment If a statute expressly prohibits assignment, the right in question cannot be assigned. For instance, in many states, workers' compensation statutes prohibit an employee who is receiving benefits from assigning them to another.

When a Contract Is Personal in Nature When a contract is for personal services, the rights under the contract normally cannot be assigned unless all that remains is a monetary payment.[5] Example 14.4 Anton signs a contract to be a tutor for Marisa's children. Marisa then attempts to assign to Roberto her right to Anton's services. Roberto cannot enforce the contract against Anton. Roberto's children may be more difficult to tutor than Marisa's. Thus, if Marisa could assign her rights to Anton's services to Roberto, it would change the nature of Anton's obligation. Because personal services are unique to the person rendering them, rights to receive personal services are likewise unique and cannot be assigned. ■

When an Assignment Will Significantly Change the Risk or Duties of the Obligor A right cannot be assigned if assignment will significantly alter the risks or the duties of the obligor.[6] Example 14.5 Alice has a hotel, and to insure it, she takes out a policy with Northwest Insurance Company. The policy insures against fire, theft, floods, and vandalism. Alice attempts to assign the insurance policy to Carmen, who owns a hotel in another city.

The assignment is ineffective because it may substantially alter the insurance company's duty of performance and the risk that the company undertakes. An insurance company

5. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 317 and 318.
6. See Section 2–210(2) of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

evaluates the particular risk associated with a specific party and tailors its policy to fit that risk. If the policy were assigned to a third party, the insurance risk could be materially altered.

When the Contract Prohibits Assignment If a contract stipulates that the right cannot be assigned, then ordinarily it cannot be assigned. This restraint operates only against the parties themselves. It does not prohibit an assignment by operation of law, such as an assignment pursuant to bankruptcy or death.

Whether an antiassignment clause is effective depends, in part, on how it is phrased. A contract that states that any assignment is void effectively prohibits any assignment. Example 14.6 Ramirez agrees to build a house for Amy. Their contract states, "This contract cannot be assigned by Amy without Ramirez's consent. Any assignment without such consent renders the contract void." This antiassignment clause is effective, and Amy cannot assign her rights without obtaining Ramirez's consent.

The rule that a contract can prohibit assignments has several exceptions:

1. A contract cannot prevent an assignment of the right to receive funds. This exception exists to encourage the free flow of funds and credit in modern business settings.
2. The assignment of ownership rights in real estate often cannot be prohibited because such a prohibition is contrary to public policy in most states. Prohibitions of this kind are called restraints against alienation (the voluntary transfer of land ownership).
3. The assignment of negotiable instruments (such as checks and promissory notes) cannot be prohibited.
4. In a contract for the sale of goods, the right to receive payments on an account or damages for breach of contract may be assigned even though the sales contract prohibits such an assignment.[7]

Alienation The transfer of title to real property (which "alienates" the real property from the former owner).

14–1c Notice of Assignment

Once a valid assignment of rights has been made to a third party, the third party should notify the obligor of the assignment (for instance, in Example 14.2, Charles should notify Brenda). Giving notice is not legally necessary to establish the validity of the assignment because an assignment is effective immediately, whether or not notice is given. Two major problems arise, however, when notice of the assignment is not given to the obligor.

Priority Issues If the assignor assigns the same right to two different persons, the question arises as to which one has priority—that is, which one has the right to the performance by the obligor. The rule most often observed in the United States is that the first assignment in time is the first in right. Some states, though, follow the English rule, which basically gives priority to the first assignee who gives notice.

Example 14.7 Jason owes Alexis $5,000 under a contract. Alexis first assigns the claim to Louisa, who does not give notice to Jason. Then Alexis assigns it to Dorman, who notifies Jason. In most states, Louisa would have priority because the assignment to her was first in time. In some states, however, Dorman would have priority because he gave first notice.

Potential for Discharge by Performance to the Wrong Party Until the obligor has notice of an assignment, the obligor can discharge any obligations by performance to the assignor, and this performance constitutes a discharge to the assignee. Once the obligor receives proper notice, only performance to the assignee can discharge the obligor's obligations.

7. UCC 2–210(2).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Example 14.8 Recall that Alexis, the obligee in Example 14.7, assigned to Louisa her right to collect $5,000 from Jason, and Louisa did not give notice to Jason. What will happen if Jason later pays Alexis the $5,000? Although the assignment was valid, Jason's payment to Alexis will discharge the debt. Louisa's failure to notify Jason of the assignment will cause her to lose the right to collect the $5,000 from Jason. (Note that Louisa will still have a claim against Alexis for the $5,000.) If Louisa had given Jason notice of the assignment, Jason's payment to Alexis would not have discharged the debt. ■

14–2 Delegations

Just as a party can transfer rights to a third party through an assignment, a party can also transfer duties. Duties are not assigned, however. They are delegated. Normally, a delegation of duties does not relieve the party making the delegation (the delegator) of the obligation to perform in the event that the party to whom the duty has been delegated (the delegatee) fails to perform.

No special form is required to create a valid delegation of duties. As long as the delegator expresses an intention to make the delegation, it is effective. The delegator need not even use the word delegate. Exhibit 14–2 illustrates delegation relationships.

Delegation of Duties The transfer to another of a contractual duty.

Delegator A party who transfers (delegates) obligations under a contract to another party (the delegatee).

Delegatee A party to whom contractual obligations are transferred, or delegated.

14–2a Duties That Cannot Be Delegated

As a general rule, any duty can be delegated. This rule has some exceptions, however. Delegation is prohibited in the following circumstances:

1. When performance depends on the personal skill or talents of the obligor.
2. When special trust has been placed in the obligor.
3. When performance by a third party will vary materially from that expected by the obligee.
4. When the contract expressly prohibits delegation.

Focus Question 2

In what situations is the delegation of duties prohibited?

Exhibit 14–2 Delegation Relationships

In the delegation relationship illustrated here, Brower delegates her duties under a contract that she made with Horton to a third party, Kuhn. Brower thus becomes the delegator and Kuhn the delegatee of the contractual duties. Kuhn now owes performance of the contractual duties to Horton. Note that a delegation of duties normally does not relieve the delegator (Brower) of liability if the delegatee (Kuhn) fails to perform the contractual duties.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

When the Duties Are Personal in Nature When special trust has been placed in the obligor or when performance depends on the obligor's personal skill or talents, contractual duties cannot be delegated. Example 14.9 O'Brien, who is impressed with Brodie's ability to perform veterinary surgery, contracts with Brodie to have her perform surgery on O'Brien's prize-winning stallion in July. Brodie later decides that she would rather spend the summer at the beach, so she delegates her duties under the contract to Lopez, who is also a competent veterinary surgeon. The delegation is not effective without O'Brien's consent, no matter how competent Lopez is, because the contract is for personal performance.

In contrast, nonpersonal duties may be delegated. Suppose that, in Example 14.9, Brodie contracts with O'Brien to pick up a large horse trailer and deliver it to O'Brien's property. Brodie delegates this duty to Lopez, who owns a towing business. This delegation is effective because the performance required is of a routine and nonpersonal nature.

baranozdemir/iStock/Getty Images

Under what circumstances may a veterinary surgeon delegate her duties to another veterinarian?

When Performance by a Third Party Will Vary Materially from That Expected by the Obligee When performance by a third party will vary materially from that expected by the obligee under the contract, contractual duties cannot be delegated. Example 14.10 Jared, a wealthy investor, establishes the company Heaven Sent to provide grants of capital to struggling but potentially successful businesses. Jared contracts with Merilyn, whose judgment Jared trusts, to select the recipients of the grants. Later, Merilyn delegates this duty to Donald. Jared does not trust Donald's ability to select worthy recipients. This delegation is not effective because it materially alters Jared's expectations under the contract with Merilyn.

When the Contract Prohibits Delegation When the contract expressly prohibits delegation by including an antidelegation clause, the duties cannot be delegated. Example 14.11 Dakota Company contracts with Belisario, a certified public accountant, to perform its audits. Because the contract prohibits delegation, Belisario cannot delegate the duty to perform the audits to another accountant—not even an accountant at the same firm.

14–2b Effect of a Delegation

Know This

In an assignment, the assignor's original contract rights are extinguished after the assignment. In a delegation, the delegator remains liable for performance under the contract if the delegatee fails to perform.

If a delegation of duties is enforceable, the obligee (the one to whom performance is owed) must accept performance from the delegatee (the one to whom the duties are delegated). Example 14.12 David has a duty to pick up and deliver heavy construction machinery to Alberto's property. David delegates his duty to Calder. In this situation, Alberto (the obligee) must accept performance from Calder (the delegatee) because the delegation is effective. The obligee can legally refuse performance from the delegatee only if the duty is one that cannot be delegated.

A valid delegation of duties does not relieve the delegator of obligations under the contract. Although there are exceptions, generally the obligee can sue both the delegatee and the delegator for failure to perform. Example 14.13 In the situation in Example 14.12, if Calder (the delegatee) fails to perform, David (the delegator) is still liable to Alberto (the obligee). The obligee can also hold the delegatee liable if the delegatee made a promise of performance that will directly benefit the obligee. In this situation, there is an "assumption of duty" on the part of the delegatee, and breach of this duty makes the delegatee liable to the obligee. For instance, if Calder promised David, in a contract, to pick up and deliver the construction equipment to Alberto's property but fails to do so, Alberto can sue David, Calder, or both.

Is the delegatee subject to the same obligations on the contract as the delegator? In the following case, a lender delegated the duty to service a student loan to a debt collector. The delegatee appeared to argue that it owed no obligation to the debtor arising from this duty.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 14.1

Mirandette v. Nelnet, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 720 Fed.Appx. 288 (2018).

Facts To pay for his daughter's education, Kurt Mirandette borrowed the funds. As a condition of the loan, Mirandette signed a "Master Promissory Note" (MPN). The MPN did not specify when payments on the loan were to be credited. The loan was serviced by Nelnet, Inc., and Nelnet Servicing, LLC, which credited Mirandette's payments ten to thirty days after he mailed the checks. Mirandette filed a suit in a federal district court against the Nelnet companies, claiming breach of contract. He alleged that the defendants manipulated the date on which they credited the payments, resulting in the wrongful accrual of interest and late fees. The defendants responded that the MPN did not obligate them to credit payments as of a certain date. The court dismissed the suit. Mirandette appealed.

Issue Without proof to the contrary, does a delegatee of a duty to service a loan owe any obligation to the debtor?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed the district court's dismissal of Mirandette's suit and remanded the case.

Reason The defendants argued first that Mirandette contracted with a third-party lender—not the defendants—to obtain the loan. The lender delegated the duty to service the loan to the defendants. The appellate court concluded that this argument "fails" because the defendants did not show that they had "no obligation to the debtor arising from their acceptance of the asserted delegation of the duty to service the loan."

The defendants also contended that they could credit Mirandette's payments on the loan whenever they chose because the MPN did not specify when the payments were to be credited. The court found this contention to be "untenable." Under this interpretation, the defendants could avoid crediting the payments indefinitely and charge interest on the full principal for the entire period of the loan. "Such an absurdity cannot have been intended by the parties signing this contract." Mirandette theorized that his payments should be credited on receipt. Because the lower court had not addressed this theory, the appellate court remanded the case for its consideration.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment The MPN stated that "applicable state law . . . may provide for certain borrower rights." The Nelnet companies are based in Nebraska. Nebraska's commercial code provides that the delivery of a check marks the date of payment. How might this provision affect the decision of the lower court on remand?
- Economic According to the defendants' reasoning, borrowers would have no contract remedies if loan servicers overcharged them. What effect might this circumstance have in the market for credit? Discuss.

14–2c "Assignment of All Rights"

Sometimes, a contract provides for an "assignment of all rights." This wording may create both an assignment of rights and a delegation of duties.[8] Typically, this situation occurs when general words are used, such as "I assign the contract" or "I assign all my rights under the contract." A court normally will construe such words as implying both an assignment of rights and a delegation of any duties of performance. Thus, the assignor remains liable if the assignee fails to perform the contractual obligations.

14–3 Third Party Beneficiaries

Another exception to the doctrine of privity of contract arises when the contract is intended to benefit a third party. The original parties to a contract can agree that the contract performance should be rendered to or directly benefit a third person. When this happens, the third

8. See UCC 2-210(1), (4); and Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 328.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Third Party Beneficiary One who is not a party to the contract but who stands to benefit from the contract's performance.

Intended Beneficiary A third party for whose benefit a contract is formed. An intended beneficiary can sue the promisor if the contract is breached.

person becomes an intended third party beneficiary of the contract. As the intended beneficiary of the contract, the third party has legal rights and can sue the promisor directly for breach of the contract.

14–3a Who Is the Promisor?

Who, though, is the promisor? In a bilateral contract, both parties to the contract make promises that can be enforced, so the court has to determine which party made the promise that benefits the third party. That person is the promisor.

In effect, allowing a third party to sue the promisor directly circumvents the "middle person" (the promisee) and thus reduces the burden on the courts. Otherwise, the third party would sue the promisee, who would then sue the promisor.

Classic Case Example 14.14 The classic case that gave third party beneficiaries the right to bring a suit directly against a promisor was decided in 1859. The case involved three parties—Holly, Lawrence, and Fox. Holly had borrowed $300 from Lawrence. Shortly thereafter, Holly loaned $300 to Fox, who in return promised Holly that he would pay Holly's debt to Lawrence on the following day. When Lawrence failed to obtain the $300 from Fox, he sued Fox to recover the funds. The court had to decide whether Lawrence could sue Fox directly (rather than suing Holly). The court held that when "a promise [is] made for the benefit of another, he for whose benefit it is made may bring an action for its breach."[9]

In the following case, the third party beneficiary was the former lead singer for a 1980s New Wave band. The promisor was the band's recording company and distributor. The promisee was a corporation formed by the band members to receive the band's royalties. The contract involved the payment of those royalties. The question before the court was whether the third party beneficiary could sue for breach of contract when the promisee lacked the capacity to bring the suit.

9. Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N.Y. 268 (1859).

Case 14.2

Bozzio v. EMI Group, Ltd.

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 811 F.3d 1144 (2016).

Facts In the 1980s, Dale Bozzio was the front woman of a Los Angeles–based New Wave band, Missing Persons. The members of the band formed Missing Persons, Inc. (MPI), a "loan-out" corporation through which to provide their artistic services.[a] Capitol Records (the promisor) entered into a contract with MPI (the promisee) to produce and market the band's recordings. The band members agreed to look solely to MPI for payment of all royalties and not to bring any claims against Capitol Records. After the group disbanded, MPI's corporate status was suspended for nonpayment of state corporate taxes.

Two decades later, Bozzio filed a suit in a federal district court against Capitol Records and others (including EMI Group, Ltd.), seeking royalties on their licensing for sale of "digital downloads, ringtones . . . , and streaming music" featuring the recordings of Missing Persons. Bozzio asserted that she was a third party beneficiary of the contract between Capitol Records and MPI with a right to sue directly for its enforcement.

The court dismissed the complaint on the ground that MPI, as a suspended corporation, lacked the capacity to sue. Bozzio appealed.

Issue Could Bozzio sue Capitol Records as a third party beneficiary even though MPI's corporate status had been suspended for nonpayment of state taxes?

Decision Yes. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the lower court's dismissal of the complaint and remanded the case. The appellate court concluded that MPI's

a. A loan-out corporation is a corporation formed for the financial benefit of artists and entertainers. Normally, its only function is to provide the services of an artist to producers and others.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

status was irrelevant with respect to Bozzio's right to bring her third party claim.

Reason The court based its decision on controlling case law. "The California Supreme Court has not decided whether a promisee corporation's suspended status precludes suit by a third-party beneficiary of the contract, but . . . the California Court of Appeal [has] suggested that a third-party beneficiary suit may go forward notwithstanding the promisee's incapacity to sue."

Two issues that remained to be resolved on remand were whether Bozzio was, in fact, a third party beneficiary of the contract between MPI and Capitol Records, and if so, whether she forfeited the right to sue to enforce that contract when she agreed to look solely to MPI for payment of all royalties and not to bring any claims against Capitol Records.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Capitol Records will, of course, contend that Bozzio's agreement to look solely to MPI for payment of all royalties and not to bring any claims against Capitol Records bars her suit in this case. What would be Bozzio's best response to this contention? Discuss.
- E-Commerce What effect might an ultimate decision in the plaintiff's favor in this case have on the licensing and sale of digital music? Explain.

14–3b Types of Intended Beneficiaries

Intended beneficiaries can be further classified as creditor beneficiaries or donee beneficiaries.

Creditor Beneficiary Like the plaintiff in Classic Case Example 14.14, a creditor beneficiary benefits from a contract in which one party (the promisor) promises another party (the promisee) to perform a duty that the promisee owes to a third party (the creditor beneficiary). As an intended beneficiary, the creditor beneficiary can sue the promisor directly to enforce the contract.

Case Example 14.15 Sharmalee Goonewardene filed a breach of contract lawsuit against ADP, a company that provided payroll services to her ex-employer, a travel agency called Altour. Goonewardene claimed that ADP was potentially liable for her unpaid wages under the third party beneficiary doctrine. A California appeals court concurred, reasoning that ADP had contracted with Altour to perform a duty—the payment of salary—owed to Goonewardene. Therefore, she could sue ADP as a third party beneficiary.

The California Supreme Court reversed, citing a fatal flaw in the lower court's analysis. That is, ADP did not pay Goonewardene's salary, Altour did. ADP's primary function was to relieve Altour of a time-consuming and complicated task that, if done improperly, can result in significant tax penalties. Evidently, the contract between Altour and ADP was meant to benefit ADP, not Goonewardene. Thus, the court found, she was not a third party beneficiary of that contract, and her suit against APD could not move forward.[10]

Donee Beneficiary When a contract is made for the express purpose of giving a gift to a third party, the third party is a donee beneficiary. A donee beneficiary can sue the promisor directly to enforce the promise.

The most common donee beneficiary contract is a life insurance contract. Example 14.16 Ben (the promisee) pays premiums to Standard Life, a life insurance company, and Standard Life (the promisor) promises to pay a certain amount on Ben's death to anyone Ben designates as a beneficiary. The designated beneficiary is a donee beneficiary under the life insurance policy and can enforce the payout promise made by the insurance company on Ben's death.

10. Goonewardene v. ADP, LLC, 434 P.3d 124, 243 Cal.Rptr.3d 299 (2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

14–3c When the Rights of an Intended Beneficiary Vest

An intended third party beneficiary cannot enforce a contract against the original parties until the third party's rights have vested, meaning that the rights have taken effect and cannot be taken away. Until these rights have vested, the original parties to the contract—the promisor and the promisee—can modify or rescind the contract without the consent of the third party.

When do the rights of third parties vest? Generally, the rights vest when any of the following occurs:

1. When the third party demonstrates express consent to the agreement, such as by sending a letter, a note, or an e-mail acknowledging awareness of, and consent to, the contract.
2. When the third party materially changes position in detrimental reliance on the contract, such as when a donee beneficiary contracts to have a home built in reliance on the receipt of funds promised in a donee beneficiary contract.
3. When the conditions for vesting are satisfied. For instance, the rights of a beneficiary under a life insurance policy vest when the insured person dies.

14–3d Incidental Beneficiaries

Incidental Beneficiary A third party who benefits from a contract even though the contract was not formed for that purpose. An incidental beneficiary has no rights in the contract and cannot sue to have it enforced.

Sometimes, a third person receives a benefit from a contract even though that person's benefit is not the reason the contract was made. Such a person is known as an incidental beneficiary. Because the benefit is unintentional, an incidental beneficiary cannot sue to enforce the contract. Only intended beneficiaries acquire legal rights in a contract.

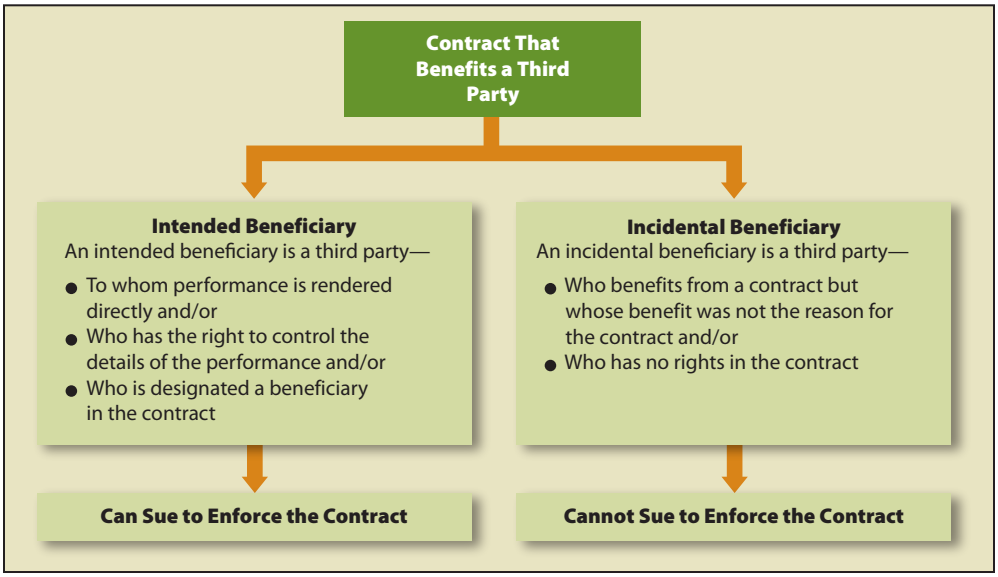
Classic Case Example 14.17 Spectators who attended an automobile race (the Grand Prix) sued the organizations that presented the event. The spectators were upset because fourteen of the twenty cars that were supposed to race dropped out at the last minute due to tire failures. The plaintiffs claimed that they were third party beneficiaries of the contract between the teams of drivers and the race promoters. They sought compensation for traveling to and attending the race. The court dismissed the plaintiffs' claims, however. "A failure to satisfy the subjective expectations of spectators at a sporting event is not actionable." The defendants did not have a contract with the spectators, and the spectators could not sue as third party beneficiaries.[11]

14–3e Identifying Intended versus Incidental Beneficiaries

In determining whether a party is an intended or an incidental beneficiary, the courts focus on the parties' intent, as expressed in the contract language and implied by the surrounding circumstances. Any beneficiary who is not deemed an intended beneficiary is considered incidental. Exhibit 14–3 graphically illustrates the distinction between intended and incidental beneficiaries.

Although no single test can embrace all possible situations, courts often apply the reasonable person test: Would a reasonable person in the position of the beneficiary believe that the promisee intended to confer on the beneficiary the right to enforce the contract? In addition, the presence of one or more of the following factors strongly indicates that the third party is an intended beneficiary of the contract:

1. Performance is rendered directly to the third party.
2. The third party has the right to control the details of performance.
3. The third party is expressly designated as a beneficiary in the contract.



Focus Question 3

What factors indicate that a third party beneficiary is an intended beneficiary?

11. Bowers v. Federation Internationale de L'Automobile, 461 F.Supp.2d 855 (S.D.Ind. 2006).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 14–3 Third Party Beneficiaries

Case Example 14.18 New York City decided to build a fifteen-story forensic biology (DNA testing) laboratory next to Bellevue Hospital in Manhattan. The city turned the project over to the Dormitory Authority of the State of New York (DASNY), which oversees public projects. DASNY contracted with Perkins Eastman Architects, P.C., which hired Samson Construction Company to excavate the site and lay the foundation. Unfortunately, Samson's excavation of the site caused adjacent structures, including a building, sidewalks, roadbeds, sewers, and water systems, to "settle," causing about $37 million in damage.

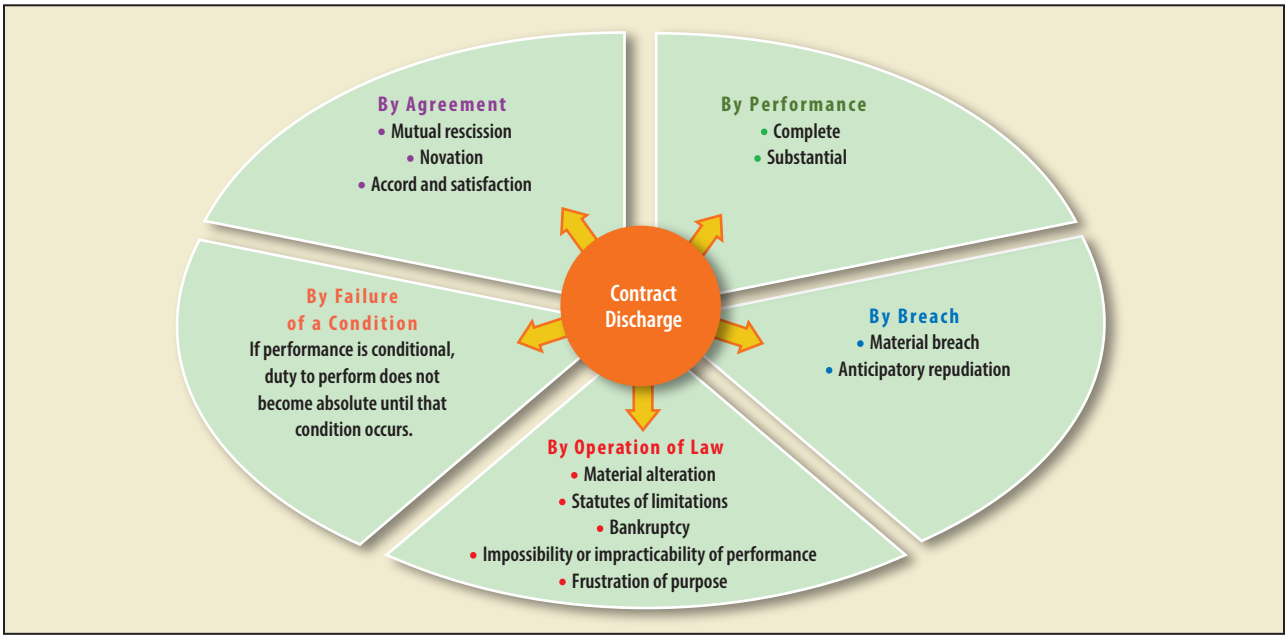
DASNY and the city sued Samson and Perkins, alleging breach of contract. Even though the city was not named in the contract between Samson and Perkins, a state appellate court held that the city was an intended third party beneficiary. "The contract expressly states that a City agency will operate the DNA laboratory, and the City retained control over various aspects of the project."[12]

14–4 Contract Discharge

The most common way to discharge, or terminate, contractual duties is by the performance of those duties. The duty to perform under a contract may be conditioned on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of a certain event, or the duty may be absolute. As shown in Exhibit 14–4, in addition to performance, a contract can be discharged in numerous other ways, including discharge by agreement of the parties and discharge by operation of law.

Discharge The termination of an obligation, such as occurs when the parties to a contract have fully performed their contractual obligations.

Performance The fulfillment of one's duties under a contract—the normal way of discharging one's contractual obligations.



14–4a Conditions of Performance

In most contracts, promises of performance are not expressly conditioned or qualified. Instead, they are absolute promises. They must be performed, or the party making the promise will be in breach of contract. Example 14.19 Paloma Enterprises contracts to sell a truckload of organic produce to Tran for $10,000. The parties' promises are unconditional: Paloma will deliver the produce to Tran, and Tran will pay $10,000 to Paloma. The payment does not have to be made if the produce is not delivered.

12. Dormitory Authority of the State of New York v. Samson Construction Co., 137 A.D.3d 433, 27 N.Y.S.3d 114 (1 Dept. 2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 14–4 Contract Discharge

Condition A qualification, provision, or clause in a contractual agreement, the occurrence or nonoccurrence of which creates, suspends, or terminates the obligations of the contracting parties.

In some situations, however, contractual promises are conditioned. A condition is a qualification in a contract based on a possible future event, the occurrence or nonoccurrence of which will trigger or suspend the performance of a legal obligation or terminate an existing obligation under a contract. If the condition is not satisfied, the obligations of the parties are discharged.

Three types of conditions can be present in a contract: conditions precedent, conditions subsequent, and concurrent conditions.

Condition Precedent A condition in a contract that must be met before a party's promise becomes absolute.

Conditions Precedent A condition that must be fulfilled before a party's promise becomes absolute is called a condition precedent. The condition precedes the absolute duty to perform. Life insurance contracts frequently specify that certain conditions, such as passing a physical examination, must be met before the insurance company will be obligated to perform under the contract. A contract to lease university housing may be conditioned on the lessee's being a student at the university.

Many contracts are conditioned on an independent appraisal of value. Example 14.20 Restoration Motors offers to buy Charlie's 1959 Thunderbird only if an expert appraiser estimates that it can be restored for less than a certain price. Thus, the parties' obligations are conditioned on the outcome of the appraisal. If the condition is not satisfied—that is, if the appraiser deems the cost to be significantly above the specified price—their obligations are discharged.

Condition Subsequent A condition in a contract that, if it occurs, operates to terminate a party's absolute promise to perform.

Conditions Subsequent When a condition operates to terminate a party's absolute promise to perform, it is called a condition subsequent. The condition follows, or is subsequent to, the absolute duty to perform. If the condition occurs, the party need not perform any further.

Example 14.21 A law firm hires Julia, a recent law school graduate. Their contract provides that the firm's obligation to continue employing Julia is discharged if she fails to pass the bar exam by her second attempt. This is a condition subsequent because a failure to pass the exam—and thus to obtain a license to practice law—will discharge a duty (employment) that has already arisen.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Generally, conditions precedent are common, and conditions subsequent are rare. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts omits the terms condition subsequent and condition precedent and refers to both simply as "conditions."[13]

Concurrent Conditions Conditions that must occur or be performed at the same time—they are mutually dependent. No obligations arise until these conditions are simultaneously performed.

Concurrent Conditions When each party's absolute duty to perform is conditioned on the other party's absolute duty to perform, concurrent conditions are present. These conditions exist only when the parties expressly or impliedly are to perform their respective duties simultaneously.

Example 14.22 If Janet promises to pay for goods when HP, Inc., delivers them, the parties' promises to perform are mutually dependent. Janet's duty to pay for the goods does not become absolute until HP either delivers or tenders the goods. Likewise, HP's duty to deliver the goods does not become absolute until Janet tenders or actually makes payment. Therefore, neither can recover from the other for breach without first tendering performance.

David McNew/Getty Images

If HP agrees to sell and deliver goods to someone who agrees to pay for them, what are the concurrent conditions?

14–4b Discharge by Performance

The contract comes to an end when both parties fulfill their respective duties by performing the acts they have promised. Performance can also be accomplished by tender. Tender is an unconditional offer to perform by a person who is ready, willing, and able to do so. Therefore, a seller who places goods at the disposal of a buyer has tendered delivery and can demand payment according to the terms of the agreement. A buyer who offers to pay for goods has tendered payment and can demand delivery of the goods.

Tender An unconditional offer to perform an obligation by a person who is ready, willing, and able to do so.

Once performance has been tendered, the party making the tender has done everything possible to carry out the terms of the contract. If the other party then refuses to perform, the party making the tender can consider the duty discharged and sue for breach of contract.

Complete Performance When a party performs exactly as agreed, there is no question as to whether the contract has been performed. When a party's performance is perfect, it is said to be complete.

Normally, conditions expressly stated in the contract must fully occur in all aspects for complete performance (strict performance) of the contract to take place. Any deviation breaches the contract and discharges the other party's obligations to perform.

For instance, most construction contracts require the builder to meet certain specifications. If the specifications are conditions, complete performance is required to avoid material breach. (Material breach will be discussed shortly.) If the conditions are met, the other party to the contract must then fulfill the obligation to pay the builder.

If the parties to the contract did not expressly make the specifications a condition, however, and the builder fails to meet the specifications, performance is not complete. What effect does that failure have on the other party's obligation to pay? The answer is part of the doctrine of substantial performance.

Substantial Performance A party who in good faith performs substantially all of the terms of a contract can enforce the contract against the other party under the doctrine of substantial performance. Note that good faith is required. Intentionally failing to comply with the terms is a breach of the contract.

13. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 224. Note that a plaintiff must prove a condition precedent, whereas the defendant normally proves a condition subsequent.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The basic requirements for performance to qualify as substantial performance are as follows:

1. The party must have performed in good faith. Intentional failure to comply with the contract terms is a breach of the contract.
2. The performance must not vary greatly from the performance promised in the contract. An omission, variance, or defect in performance is considered minor if it can easily be remedied by compensation (monetary damages).
3. The performance must create substantially the same benefits as those promised in the contract.

Courts decide whether performance was substantial on a case-by-case basis, examining all of the facts of the particular situation. Case Example 14.23 Magic Carpet Ride (MCR) purchased a used airplane from Rugger Investment Group. The contract required the airplane to be free from liens, or legal claims against it. In fact, though, the airplane was burdened with a lien at the time of the sale. The two sides amended their contract, giving Rugger an additional ninety days to remove the lien or pay MCR a $90,000 penalty.

Rugger obtained the lien release eight days too late. MCR sued for breach of contract to recover the $90,000 penalty. A California appeals court found that (1) Rugger had tried in good faith to meet the ninety-day deadline and that (2) MCR had received all bargained-for benefits. As it would be unfair for MCR to get the airplane and an additional $90,000, the court decided that the eight-day delay did not bar Rugger from claiming substantial performance under the terms of the amended contract.[14]

Effect on Duty to Perform. If one party's performance is substantial, the other party's duty to perform—for instance, to make payment—remains absolute. In other words, the parties must continue performing under the contract. In contrast, if performance is not substantial, there is a material breach, and the nonbreaching party is excused from further performance.

Damages. Because substantial performance is not perfect, the other party is entitled to damages to compensate for the failure to comply with the contract. The measure of the damages is the cost to bring the object of the contract into compliance with its terms, if that cost is reasonable under the circumstances. If the cost is unreasonable, the measure of damages is the difference in value between the performance that was rendered and the performance that would have been rendered if the contract had been performed completely.

Performance to the Satisfaction of Another Contracts often state that completed work must personally satisfy one of the parties or a third person. The question is whether this satisfaction becomes a condition precedent, requiring actual personal satisfaction or approval for discharge, or whether the test of satisfaction is performance that would satisfy a reasonable person (substantial performance).

When the subject matter of the contract is personal, a contract to be performed to the satisfaction of one of the parties is conditioned, and performance must actually satisfy that party. For instance, contracts for portraits and works of art are considered personal. Therefore, only the personal satisfaction of the party fulfills the condition (unless a court finds that the party is expressing dissatisfaction to avoid payment or otherwise is not acting in good faith).

Most other contracts need be performed only to the satisfaction of a reasonable person unless they expressly state otherwise. When such contracts require performance to the satisfaction of a third party (such as "to the satisfaction of Robert Ames, the supervising engineer"), the courts are divided. A majority of courts require the work to be satisfactory to a reasonable person. But some courts do require the personal satisfaction of the third party designated in the contract (here, Robert Ames). Again, the personal judgment must be made honestly, or the condition will be excused.

---

14. Magic Carpet Ride LLC v. Rugger Investment Group, L.L.C., 41 Cal.App.5th 357, 254 Cal.Rptr.3d 313 (2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Material Breach of Contract A breach of contract is the nonperformance of a contractual duty. A breach is material when performance is not at least substantial.[15] If there is a material breach, the nonbreaching party is excused from the performance of contractual duties and can sue for damages caused by the breach.

If the breach is minor (not material), the nonbreaching party's duty to perform may sometimes be suspended until the breach is remedied, but the duty is not entirely excused. Once the minor breach is cured (corrected), the nonbreaching party must resume performance of the contractual obligations.

Any breach entitles the nonbreaching party to sue for damages, but only a material breach discharges the nonbreaching party from the contract. The policy underlying these rules is that contracts should go forward when only minor problems occur, but that contracts should be terminated if major problems arise.

Case Example 14.24 The Yuma County (Arizona) Airport Authority (YCAA) leased commercial space to Lux Air for the purpose of refuelling airplanes. On September 4, YCAA sent Lux Air a letter warning that certain outstanding debts must be covered by October 1 or YCAA would "exercise all of its remedies" under the lease agreement. Lux Air acknowledged receipt of the letter but failed to pay rent on October 1, as required. Three weeks later, YCAA evicted Lux Air.

Lux Air sued YCAA for breach of contract. In Arizona, a landlord may terminate a lease only if there has been a material breach by the tenant. Lux Air claimed that its breach was not material because YCAA, in the September 4 letter, did not clearly state the consequences of failure to pay rent. An Arizona appeals court rejected this excuse, finding that, given the communications between the two companies and the inherent contractual importance of rent, Lux Air "knew or should have known" what steps were necessary to avoid the termination of its lease.[16] (See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for further explanation of how courts determine whether there has been a material breach.)

Breach of Contract The failure, without legal excuse, of a promisor to perform the obligations of a contract.

Focus Question 4

When is a breach considered material, and what effect does that have on the other party's obligation to perform?

15. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 241.
16. DBT Yuma LLC v. Yuma County Airport Authority, 2019 WL 439290, Ariz. Ct. App. (1st Div. 2019).

Determining When a Breach Is Material

The Northeast Independent School District in Bexar County, Texas, hired STR Constructors, Ltd., to renovate a middle school. STR subcontracted the tile work in the school's kitchen to Newman Tile, Inc. (NTI). The project had already fallen behind schedule. As a result, STR allowed its workers and other subcontractors' employees to walk on and damage the newly installed tile before it had cured, forcing NTI to constantly redo its work.

Despite NTI's requests for payment, STR remitted only half the amount due under their contract. When the school district refused to accept the kitchen, including the tile work, STR told NTI to quickly make repairs. A week later, STR terminated their contract. Did STR breach the contract with NTI?

Analysis: A breach of contract is the nonperformance of a contractual duty. A breach is material when performance is not at least substantial. On a material breach, the nonbreaching party is excused from performance. If a breach is minor, the nonbreaching party's duty to perform can sometimes be suspended until the breach has been remedied, but the duty to perform is not entirely excused. Once a minor breach has been cured, the nonbreaching party must resume performance. Any breach—material or minor—entitles the nonbreaching party to sue for damages.

Result and Reasoning: Yes, STR breached the contract with NTI. Because STR permitted its employees and other subcontractors to walk over and damage the newly installed tile, NTI had to redo its work constantly. Furthermore, despite NTI's requests for payment, STR remitted only half the amount due under the contract. Therefore, STR's performance was not substantial, and its breach was material.

Although NTI could have chosen to stop performing the contract right away and sue STR for breach, it did not. In fact, NTI continued to perform until STR terminated the contract. The termination apparently was done wrongfully and without good cause. The tile work would have been completed satisfactorily if STR had not allowed other workers to trample the newly installed tile before it had cured.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Ethical Issue

Is it a material breach of contract for a hospital to accept a donation and then refuse to honor part of its commitment?

Country singer Garth Brooks was born in Yukon, Oklahoma, and has made generous contributions to charities in that town. When his mother, Colleen Brooks, died, he donated $500,000 to Integris Rural Health, Inc., in that town. Brooks believed that he and the hospital's president had agreed verbally that the donation would be used to build a new women's health center in Yukon, which would be named after his mother. Several years passed, but the health center was not built. Integris claimed that it intended to do something to honor Colleen Brooks but insisted that it had never promised to build a new health center. When Integris refused to return the $500,000, Garth Brooks sued for breach of contract.

Was the hospital's failure to build a women's health center and name it after Brooks's mother a material breach of the verbal contract between Brooks and hospital management? A jury in Rogers County, Oklahoma, thought so and awarded Brooks $500,000 in actual damages for breach of contract. The jury also awarded Brooks another $500,000 because it found the hospital guilty of reckless disregard and intentional malice.

Anticipatory Repudiation An assertion or action by a party indicating that the party will not perform a contractual obligation.

Anticipatory Repudiation of a Contract Before either party to a contract has a duty to perform, one of the parties may refuse to perform that party's contractual obligations. This action is called anticipatory repudiation.[17]

Repudiation Is a Material Breach. When anticipatory repudiation occurs, it is treated as a material breach of the contract, and the nonbreaching party is permitted to bring an action for damages immediately. The nonbreaching party can file suit even though the scheduled time for performance under the contract may still be in the future. Until the nonbreaching party treats this early repudiation as a breach, however, the breaching party can retract the anticipatory repudiation by proper notice and restore the parties to their original obligations.[18]

An anticipatory repudiation is treated as a present, material breach for two reasons. First, the nonbreaching party should not be required to remain ready and willing to perform when the other party has already repudiated the contract. Second, the nonbreaching party should have the opportunity to seek a similar contract elsewhere. Indeed, that party may have the duty to do so to minimize loss.

When does a landlord's refusal to perform a duty under a lease constitute a material breach entitling the tenant to bring an action for damages? That was the question in the following case.

17. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 253; and UCC 2–610.
18. See UCC 2–611.

Case 14.3

Chalk Supply LLC v. Ribbe Real Estate LLC

Court of Appeals of Michigan, __ Mich.App.__, __ N.W.2d __, 2020 WL 39991 (2020).

Facts Chalk Supply LLC buys paints and other products, which it repackages and sells to consumers. Chalk Supply agreed to lease a warehouse from Ribbe Real Estate LLC (RRE) for eighteen months. Chalk Supply prepaid twelve and a half months' rent.

At Chalk Supply's request, the lease provided that a fire suppression system would be installed if required, with the cost to be "divided by 84 months (7 years) of which Tenant will pay in like equal installments during the term of the lease." A local ordinance required a fire suppression system. On receiving an estimate of the cost, however, RRE e-mailed Chalk Supply, before the tenant had moved onto the property, that RRE was not willing to pay for the system without a longer lease term.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Chalk Supply filed a suit in a Michigan state court against RRE, claiming breach of contract. The court ruled in Chalk Supply's favor and ordered RRE to return the money the tenant had paid in advance of the lease term. The landlord appealed.

Issue Was RRE's e-mail an anticipatory repudiation of the parties' lease entitling Chalk Supply to bring an action for breach of contract?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the trial court. RRE was in material breach of the parties' contract, and Chalk Supply could recover the money that it had paid in advance.

Reason Anticipatory repudiation occurs when a party states an intention not to perform a duty owed under a contract except on a condition that goes beyond the contract.

RRE and Chalk Supply executed a lease for a warehouse, and the tenant paid a substantial amount of the rent in advance. In their contract, the parties agreed that the landlord would pay the cost for a fire suppression system if required, and the tenant would repay that amount over eighty-four months. Under a local ordinance, a fire suppression system was required. RRE later refused to pay for the system unless the tenant agreed to negotiate a new, longer term for the lease. "This was, then, an anticipatory repudiation of the lease: . . . RRE would not perform a duty under the contract (pay for fire suppression if required) unless Chalk Supply extended the lease (a condition that went beyond the contract)."

RRE argued that its refusal to perform was not an anticipatory repudiation because it "was not unequivocal and was conditioned on the requirement of fire suppression." The court found this argument to be "meritless. . . . Saying that RRE would not pay for fire suppression if it was required was disavowing the very thing that RRE agreed to do."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment The lease between RRE and Chalk Supply required a security deposit to cover any default on a month's rent by the tenant. Chalk Supply did not pay the deposit. Should the court have ruled that this breach prevented Chalk Supply from prevailing on its claim against RRE? Discuss.
- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that RRE had received an estimate of the cost of the fire suppression system before the parties executed the lease and had then insisted on conditioning its payment on a longer term. Would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

Repudiation May Occur When Market Prices Fluctuate. Quite often, an anticipatory repudiation occurs when performance of the contract would be extremely unfavorable to one of the parties because of a sharp fluctuation in market prices.

Example 14.25 Mobile X enters into an e-contract to manufacture and sell 100,000 smartphones to Best Com, a global telecommunications company. Delivery is to be made two months from the date of the contract. One month later, three inventory suppliers raise their prices to Mobile X. Because of these higher prices, Mobile X stands to lose $500,000 if it sells the smartphones to Best Com at the contract price.

Mobile X immediately sends an e-mail to Best Com, stating that it cannot deliver the 100,000 phones at the contract price. Even though you may sympathize with Mobile X, its e-mail is an anticipatory repudiation of the contract. Best Com can treat the repudiation as a material breach and immediately pursue remedies, even though the contract delivery date is still a month away. ■

Know This

The risks that prices will fluctuate and values will change are ordinary business risks for which the law does not provide relief.

14–4c Discharge by Agreement

Any contract can be discharged by agreement of the parties. The agreement can be contained in the original contract, or the parties can form a new contract for the express purpose of discharging the original contract.

Discharge by Mutual Rescission Recission occurs when the parties cancel their contract and are returned to the positions they occupied prior to the contract's formation. For mutual rescission to take place, the parties must make another agreement that also satisfies the legal requirements for a contract—there must be an offer, an acceptance, and consideration. Ordinarily, if the parties agree to rescind the original contract, their promises not to perform the acts promised in the original contract will be legal consideration for the second contract.

Bloomberg/Getty Images

A smartphone manufacturer learns its supply costs will suddenly increase and cancels its upcoming delivery to clients. What is this action called?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Generally, a rescission agreement may be written or oral. Oral agreements to rescind most executory contracts are enforceable even if the original agreement was in writing. A writing (or electronic record) is required to rescind a contract for the sale of goods under the Uniform Commercial Code when the contract requires a written rescission. Also, agreements to rescind contracts involving transfers of realty must be evidenced by a writing or record.

When one party has fully performed, an agreement to rescind the original contract usually is not enforceable unless additional consideration or restitution is made. Because the performing party has received no consideration for the promise to call off the original bargain, additional consideration is necessary.

Novation The substitution, by agreement, of a new contract for an old one, with the rights under the old one being terminated.

Discharge by Novation The process of novation substitutes a third party for one of the original parties. Essentially, the parties to the original contract and one or more new parties get together and agree to the substitution. The requirements of a novation are as follows:

1. A previous valid obligation.
2. An agreement by all of the parties to a new contract.
3. The extinguishing of the old obligation (discharge of the prior party).
4. A new, valid contract.

Example 14.26 Union Corporation contracts to sell its pharmaceutical division to British Pharmaceuticals, Ltd. Before the transfer is completed, Union, British Pharmaceuticals, and a third company, Otis Chemicals, execute a new agreement to transfer all of British Pharmaceuticals' rights and duties in the transaction to Otis Chemicals. As long as the new contract is supported by consideration, the novation will discharge the original contract (between Union and British Pharmaceuticals) and replace it with the new contract (between Union and Otis Chemicals). ■

A novation expressly or impliedly revokes and discharges a prior contract. The parties involved may expressly state in the new contract that the old contract is now discharged. If the parties do not expressly discharge the old contract, it will be impliedly discharged if the new contract's terms are inconsistent with the old contract's terms.

Discharge by Accord and Satisfaction In an accord and satisfaction, the parties agree to accept performance different from the performance originally promised. An accord is a contract to perform some act to satisfy an existing contractual duty that has not yet been discharged. A satisfaction is the performance of the accord agreement. An accord and its satisfaction discharge the original contractual obligation.

Once the accord has been made, the original obligation is merely suspended until the accord agreement is fully performed. If it is not performed, the party to whom performance is owed can bring an action on the original obligation or for breach of the accord. Example 14.27 Shea obtains a judgment of $8,000 against Marla. Later, both parties agree that the judgment can be satisfied by Marla's transfer of her automobile to Shea. This agreement to accept the auto in lieu of $8,000 in cash is the accord. If Marla transfers her automobile to Shea, the accord agreement is fully performed, and the $8,000 debt is discharged. If Marla refuses to transfer her car, the accord is breached. Because the original obligation is merely suspended, Shea can sue to enforce the judgment for $8,000 in cash or bring an action for breach of the accord. ■

14–4d Discharge by Operation of Law

Under specified circumstances, contractual duties may be discharged by operation of law. These circumstances include material alteration of the contract, an applicable statute of limitations, bankruptcy, impossibility or impracticability of performance, and frustration of purpose.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Material Alteration To discourage parties from altering written contracts, the law allows an innocent party to be discharged from a contract that has been materially altered. If one party alters a material term of the contract—such as the quantity term or the price term—without the other party's knowledge, the party who was unaware of the alteration can treat the contract as discharged or terminated.

Statutes of Limitations Statutes of limitations limit the period during which a party can sue on a particular cause of action. After the applicable limitations period has passed, a suit can no longer be brought.

The period for bringing lawsuits for breach of oral contracts is usually two to three years and for written contracts, four to five years. Lawsuits for breach of a contract for the sale of goods must be brought within four years after the cause of action has accrued.[19] In their original contract, the parties can agree to reduce this four-year period to not less than one year. They cannot, however, agree to extend it beyond four years.

Bankruptcy A proceeding in bankruptcy attempts to allocate a debtor's assets to the creditors in a fair and equitable fashion. Once the assets have been allocated, the debtor receives a discharge in bankruptcy. A discharge in bankruptcy ordinarily prevents the creditors from enforcing most of the debtor's contracts. Partial payment of a debt after discharge in bankruptcy will not revive the debt.

Impossibility of Performance After a contract has been made, supervening events (such as a fire) may make performance impossible in an objective sense. This so-called impossibility of performance can discharge the contract. The doctrine of impossibility of performance is applied only when the parties could not have reasonably foreseen, at the time the contract was formed, the event or events that rendered performance impossible.

Impossibility of Performance
A doctrine under which a party to a contract is relieved of the duty to perform when performance becomes objectively impossible or totally impracticable.

Objective impossibility ("It cannot be done") must be distinguished from subjective impossibility ("I'm sorry, I personally cannot do it"). An example of subjective impossibility occurs when a person cannot deliver goods on time or make payment on time because the person has to have an emergency surgery. In effect, the nonperforming party is saying, "It is impossible for me to perform" rather than "It is impossible for anyone to perform." Accordingly, such excuses do not discharge a contract, and the nonperforming party is normally held in breach of contract.

When Performance Is Impossible. Three basic types of situations may qualify as grounds for the discharge of contractual obligations based on impossibility of performance:[20]

1. When a party whose personal performance is essential to the completion of the contract dies or becomes incapacitated prior to performance. Example 14.28 Fred, a famous dancer, contracts with Ethereal Dancing Guild to play a leading role in its new ballet. Before the ballet can be performed, Fred becomes ill and dies. His personal performance was essential to the completion of the contract. Thus, his death discharges the contract and his estate's liability for his nonperformance.
2. When the specific subject matter of the contract is destroyed. Example 14.29 A-1 Farm Equipment agrees to sell Gunther the green tractor on its lot and promises to have the tractor ready for Gunther to pick up on Saturday. On Friday night, however, a truck veers off the nearby highway and smashes into the tractor, destroying it beyond repair. Because the contract was for this specific tractor, A-1's performance is rendered impossible owing to the accident.

©Elnur/Shutterstock.com

This dancer has a contract to dance the lead role in a ballet that will run for a month. What happens if he breaks a leg before the shows start?

19. See UCC 2-725.
20. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 261–266; and UCC 2–615.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

3. When a change in the law renders performance illegal. Example 14.30 Russo contracts with Playlist, Inc., to create a website through which users can post and share movies, music, and other forms of digital entertainment. Russo commences the work. Before the site is operational, however, Congress passes the No Online Piracy in Entertainment (NOPE) Act. The NOPE Act makes it illegal to operate a website on which copyrighted works are posted without the copyright owners' consent. In this situation, the contract is discharged by operation of law. The purpose of the contract has been rendered illegal, and contract performance is objectively impossible.

Temporary Impossibility. An occurrence or event that makes performance temporarily impossible operates to suspend performance until the impossibility ceases. Once the temporary event ends, the parties ordinarily must perform the contract as originally planned.

Example 14.31 Mindy and Lyn contract to rent a sailboat from Key West Rentals for a month-long trip. The day before their trip is scheduled to begin, Hurricane Irma hits the coast where the boat is docked, causing damage. The hurricane makes performance temporarily impossible, and Mindy and Lyn postpone their trip. Once repairs are made to the dock and the boat, however, Key West Rentals will be required to perform the contract as originally planned. Mindy and Lyn have a right to rent the boat for a month for the previously agreed-on price.

Know This
The doctrine of commercial impracticability does not provide relief from such events as ordinary price increases or easily predictable changes in the weather.

Sometimes, however, the lapse of time and the change in circumstances surrounding such a contract make it substantially more burdensome for the parties to perform the promised acts. In that situation, the contract may be discharged. Classic Case Example 14.32 In 1942, actor Gene Autry was drafted into the U.S. Army. Being drafted rendered his contract with a Hollywood movie company temporarily impossible to perform, and it was suspended until the end of World War II in 1945. When Autry got out of the army, the purchasing power of the dollar had declined so much that performance of the contract would have been substantially burdensome to him. Therefore, the contract was discharged.[21]

Commercial Impracticability Courts may also excuse parties from their performance obligations when the performance becomes much more difficult or expensive than the parties originally contemplated. In one classic case, for instance, a court held that a contract could be discharged because a party would have to pay ten times more than the original estimate to excavate a certain amount of gravel.[22]

Commercial Impracticability A doctrine that may excuse the duty to perform a contract when performance becomes much more difficult or costly due to forces that neither party could have controlled or foreseen at the time the contract was formed.

For someone to invoke the doctrine of commercial impracticability successfully, however, the anticipated performance must become extremely difficult or costly.[23] Furthermore, the added burden of performing must not have been foreseeable by the parties when the contract was made.

Frustration of Purpose A court-created doctrine under which a party to a contract will be relieved of the duty to perform when the objective purpose of performance no longer exists due to reasons beyond that party's control.

Frustration of Purpose Closely allied with the doctrine of commercial impracticability is the doctrine of frustration of purpose. In principle, a contract will be discharged if supervening circumstances make it impossible to attain the purpose both parties had in mind when making the contract. As with commercial impracticability, the supervening event must not have been foreseeable at the time of contracting.

There are some differences between the doctrines, however. Commercial impracticability usually involves an event that increases the cost or difficulty of performance. In contrast, frustration of purpose typically involves an event that decreases the value of what a party receives under the contract.

21. Autry v. Republic Productions, 30 Cal.2d 144, 180 P.2d 888 (1947).
22. Mineral Park Land Co. v. Howard, 172 Cal. 289, 156 P. 458 (1916).
23. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 264.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Practice and Review

Val's Foods signs a contract to buy 1,500 pounds of basil from Sun Farms, a small organic herb grower, if an independent organization inspects the crop and certifies that it contains no pesticide or herbicide residue. Val's has a contract with several restaurant chains to supply pesto and intends to use Sun Farms' basil in the pesto to fulfill these contracts. When Sun Farms is preparing to harvest the basil, an unexpected hailstorm destroys half the crop. Sun Farms attempts to purchase additional basil from other farms, but it is late in the season, and the price is twice the normal market price. Sun Farms is too small to absorb this cost and immediately notifies Val's that it will not fulfill the contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Suppose that Sun Farms supplies the basil that survived the storm but the basil does not pass the chemical-residue inspection. Which concept discussed in the chapter might allow Val's to refuse to perform the contract in this situation?
2. Under which legal theory or theories might Sun Farms claim that its obligation under the contract has been discharged by operation of law? Discuss fully.
3. Suppose that Sun Farms contacts every basil grower in the country and buys the last remaining chemical-free basil anywhere. Nevertheless, Sun Farms is able to ship only 1,475 pounds to Val's. Would this fulfill Sun Farms' obligations to Val's? Why or why not?
4. Now suppose that Sun Farms sells its operations to Happy Valley Farms. As part of the sale, all three parties agree that Happy Valley will provide the basil as stated under the original contract. What is this type of agreement called?

Debate This

The doctrine of commercial impracticability should be abolished.

Key Terms

alienation 336
anticipatory repudiation 348 assignee 334 assignment 334 assignor 334
breach of contract 347 commercial impracticability 352 concurrent conditions 345 condition 344 condition precedent 344 condition subsequent 344 delegatee 337 delegation of duties 337 delegator 337 discharge 343
frustration of purpose 352
impossibility of performance 351 incidental beneficiary 342 intended beneficiary 340 novation 350
obligee 334
obligor 334 performance 343
privity of contract 333
tender 345
third party beneficiary 340

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Chapter Summary: Third Party Rights and Discharge

THIRD PARTY RIGHTS
Assignments	1. An assignment is the transfer of rights under a contract to a third party. The person assigning the rights is the assignor, and the party to whom the rights are assigned is the assignee. The assignee has a right to demand performance from the other original party to the contract, the obligor. 2. Generally, all rights can be assigned unless: a. A statute expressly prohibits assignment. b. The contract is for personal services. c. The assignment will significantly alter the obligor's risk or duties. d. The contract prohibits assignment. (Exception: Contracts cannot generally prohibit assignment of the right to receive funds, of ownership rights in real property, of negotiable instruments, or of certain payments on account or damages for breach of contract.) 3. The assignee should notify the obligor of the assignment. Although not legally required, notification avoids two potential problems: a. If the assignor assigns the same right to two different persons, the first assignment in time is generally the first in right, but in some states the first assignee to give notice takes priority. b. Until the obligor is notified of the assignment, the obligor can tender performance to the assignor. If the assignor accepts the performance, the obligor's duties under the contract are discharged without benefit to the assignee.
Delegations	1. A delegation is the transfer of duties under a contract to a third party (the delegatee), who then assumes the obligation of performing the contractual duties previously held by the one making the delegation (the delegator). 2. As a general rule, any duty can be delegated unless: a. Performance depends on the obligor's personal skills or talents. b. Special trust has been placed in the obligor. c. Performance by a third party will vary materially from that expected by the obligee. d. The contract expressly prohibits delegation. 3. A valid delegation of duties does not relieve the delegator of obligations under the contract. If the delegatee fails to perform, the delegator is still liable to the obligee. 4. An "assignment of all rights" is often construed to mean that both the rights and the duties arising under the contract are transferred to a third party.
Third Party Beneficiaries	A third party beneficiary contract is one that benefits a third party. 1. Intended beneficiary—A third party for whose benefit a contract is created. When the promisor (the one making the contractual promise that benefits a third party) fails to perform as promised, the intended beneficiary can sue the promisor directly. Types of intended beneficiaries are creditor and donee beneficiaries. 2. Incidental beneficiary—A third party who indirectly (incidentally) benefits from a contract but for whose benefit the contract was not specifically intended. Incidental beneficiaries have no rights to the benefits received and cannot sue to have the contract enforced.
CONTRACT DISCHARGE
Conditions of Performance	Contract obligations may be subject to the following types of conditions: 1. Condition precedent—A condition that must be fulfilled before a party's promise becomes absolute. 2. Condition subsequent—A condition that, if it occurs, operates to terminate a party's absolute promise to perform. 3. Concurrent conditions—Conditions that must be performed simultaneously. Each party's absolute duty to perform is conditioned on the other party's absolute duty to perform.
Discharge by Performance	A contract may be discharged by complete (strict) performance or by substantial performance. In some instances, performance must be to the satisfaction of another. Totally inadequate performance constitutes a material breach of the contract. An anticipatory repudiation of a contract allows the other party to sue immediately for breach of contract.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Discharge by Agreement	Parties may agree to discharge their contractual obligations in several ways: 1. By rescission—The parties mutually agree to rescind (cancel) the contract. 2. By novation—A new party is substituted for one of the primary parties to a contract. 3. By accord and satisfaction—The parties agree to render and accept performance different from that on which they originally agreed.
Discharge by Operation of Law	Parties' obligations under contracts may be discharged by operation of law owing to one of the following: 1. Material alteration. 2. Statutes of limitations. 3. Bankruptcy. 4. Impossibility of performance. 5. Commercial impracticability. 6. Frustration of purpose.

Issue Spotters

1. Eagle Company contracts to build a house for Frank. The contract states that "any assignment of this contract renders the contract void." After Eagle builds the house, but before Frank pays, Eagle assigns its right to payment to Good Credit Company. Can Good Credit enforce the contract against Frank? Why or why not? (See Assignments.)
2. C&D Services contracts with Ace Concessions, Inc., to service Ace's vending machines. Later, C&D wants Dean Vending Services to assume the duties under a new contract. Ace consents. What type of agreement is this? Are Ace's obligations discharged? Why or why not? (See Contract Discharge.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

14–1. Third Party Beneficiaries. Wilken owes Rivera $2,000. Howie promises Wilken that he will pay Rivera the $2,000 in return for Wilken's promise to give Howie's children guitar lessons. Is Rivera an intended beneficiary of the Howie-Wilken contract? Explain. (See Third Party Beneficiaries.)

14–2. Assignment. Aron, a college student, signs a one-year lease agreement that runs from September 1 to August 31. The lease agreement specifies that the lease cannot be assigned without the landlord's consent. In late May, Aron decides not to go to summer school and assigns the balance of the lease (three months) to a close friend, Erica. The landlord objects to the assignment and denies Erica access to the apartment. Aron claims that Erica is financially sound and should be allowed the full rights and privileges of an assignee. Discuss fully whether the landlord or Aron is correct. (See Assignments.)

14–3. Conditions of Performance. Russ Wyant owned Humble Ranch in Perkins County, South Dakota. Edward Humble, whose parents had previously owned the ranch, was Wyant's uncle. Humble held a two-year option to buy the ranch. The option included specific conditions. Once it was exercised, the parties had thirty days to enter into a purchase agreement, and the seller could become the buyer's lender by matching the terms of the proposed financing. After the option was exercised, the parties engaged in lengthy negotiations, but Humble did not respond to Wyant's proposed purchase agreement nor advise him of available financing terms before the option expired. Six months later, Humble filed a suit against Wyant to enforce the option. Is Humble entitled to specific performance? Explain. [Humble v. Wyant, 843 N.W.2d 334 (S.Dak. 2014)] (See Contract Discharge.)

14–4. Discharge by Operation of Law. Dr. Jake Lambert signed an employment agreement with Baptist Health Services, Inc., to provide cardiothoracic-surgery services to Baptist Memorial Hospital–North Mississippi, Inc., in Oxford, Mississippi. Complaints about Lambert's behavior arose almost immediately. He was evaluated by a team of doctors and psychologists, who diagnosed him as suffering from obsessive-compulsive personality disorder and concluded that he was unfit to practice medicine. Based on this conclusion, the hospital suspended his staff privileges. Citing the suspension, Baptist Health Services claimed that Lambert had breached his employment contract. What is Lambert's best defense to this claim? Explain. [Baptist Memorial Hospital–North Mississippi, Inc. v. Lambert, 157 So.3d 109 (Miss.App. 2015)] (See Contract Discharge.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

14–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Conditions of Performance. H&J Ditching & Excavating, Inc., was hired by JRSF, LLC, to perform excavating and grading work on Terra Firma, a residential construction project in West Knox County, Tennessee. Cornerstone Community Bank financed the project with a loan to JRSF. As the work progressed, H&J received payments totaling 90 percent of the price on its contract. JRSF then defaulted on the loan from Cornerstone, and Cornerstone foreclosed and took possession of the property. H&J filed a suit in a Tennessee state court against the bank to recover the final payment on its contract. The bank responded that H&J had not received its payment because it had failed to obtain an engineer's certificate of final completion, a condition under its contract with JRSF. H&J responded that it had completed all the work it had contracted to do. What type of contract condition does obtaining the engineer's certificate represent? Is H&J entitled to the final payment? Discuss. [H&J Ditching & Excavating, Inc. v. Cornerstone Community Bank, 2016 WL 675554 (Tenn.App. 2016)] (See Contract Discharge.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 14–5, go to Appendix E.

14–6. Third Party Beneficiaries. The Health Care Providers Self Insurance Trust (the trust) provided workers' compensation coverage to the employees of its members, including Accredited Aides Plus, Inc. The trust contracted with Program Risk Management, Inc. (PRM), to serve as the program administrator. The contract obligated PRM to reimburse the trust for "claims, losses, and liabilities . . . arising out of" PRM's acts or omissions. When the trust became insolvent, the state of New York assessed the trust's employer-members for some of its debts. These employer-members filed a suit against PRM for breach of contract. Were the trust's employer-members third party beneficiaries of the trust's contract with PRM? If so, could the employer-members maintain this action against PRM? Explain. [Accredited Aides Plus, Inc. v. Program Risk Management, Inc., 147 A.D.3d 122, 46 N.Y.S.3d 246 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept. 2017)] (See Third Party Beneficiaries.)

14–7. Assignments. State Farm Insurance Co. issued a policy to David Stulberger to insure a Nissan Rogue for collision damage. The policy provided, "No assignment . . . is binding upon us unless approved by us." When the Nissan was involved in an accident, State Farm agreed that the vehicle should be repaired. M.V.B. Collision Inc. performed the repairs at a cost of $14,101.80. State Farm offered to pay $9,960.36. Stulberger assigned to M.V.B. the right to pursue State Farm for the difference, or $4,141.44. The assignee filed a suit in a New York state court against the insurer to recoup this amount. The defendant responded with a motion to dismiss, arguing that the plaintiff lacked the capacity to sue because the defendant had not consented to the transfer by Stulberger. Is the assignment valid? Why or why not? [M.V.B. Collision Inc. v. State Farm Insurance Co., 59 Misc.3d 406, 72 N.Y.S.3d 407 (N.Y.C. Dist. 2018)] (See Assignments.)

14–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Discharge by Operation of Law. Lisa Goldstein reserved space for a marriage ceremony in a building owned by Orensanz Events, LLC, in New York City. The rental agreement provided that on cancellation of the event "for any reason beyond Owner's control," the client's sole remedy was another date for the event or a refund. Shortly before the wedding, the New York City Department of Buildings found Orensanz's building to be structurally unstable and ordered it vacated. The owner closed it and told Goldstein to find another venue. She filed a suit in a New York state court against Orensanz for breach of contract, arguing that the city's order had been for a cause within the defendant's control. [Goldstein v. Orensanz Events, LLC, 146 A.D.3d 492, 44 N.Y.S.3d 437 (1 Dept. 2017)] (See Contract Discharge.)

1. Is the owner of a commercial building ethically obligated to keep it structurally sound? Apply the IDDR approach in the context of the Goldstein case to answer this question.
2. Is a contracting party ethically obligated to "relax" the terms of the deal if the other party encounters "trouble" in performing them? Discuss.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

14–9. Critical Legal Thinking. The concept of substantial performance permits parties to be discharged from contracts even though they have not fully performed their contractual obligations. Is this fair? Why or why not? What policy interests are at issue here? (See Contract Discharge.)

14–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Anticipatory Repudiation. ABC Clothiers, Inc., has a contract with John Taylor, owner of Taylor & Sons, a retailer, to deliver one thousand summer suits to Taylor's place of business on or before May 1. On April 1, John receives a letter from ABC informing him that ABC will not be able to make the delivery as scheduled. John is very upset, as he had planned a big ad campaign. (See Contract Discharge.)

1. The first group will decide whether John Taylor can immediately sue ABC for breach of contract (on April 2).
2. Now suppose that John Taylor's son, Tom, tells his father that they cannot file a lawsuit until ABC actually fails to deliver the suits on May 1. The second group will determine who is correct, John or Tom.
3. Assume that Taylor & Sons can either file immediately or wait until ABC fails to deliver the goods. The third group will evaluate which course of action is better, given the circumstances.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

15

Breach and Remedies

"There's a remedy for everything except death."

Miguel de Cervantes
1547–1616
(Spanish author)

When one party breaches a contract, the other party—the nonbreaching party—can choose one or more of several remedies. A remedy is the relief provided to an innocent party when the other party has breached the contract. It is the means employed to enforce a right or to redress an injury. Although it may be an exaggeration to say there is a remedy for "everything" in life, as Cervantes claimed in the chapter-opening quotation, there is a remedy available for nearly every contract breach.

The most common remedies available to a nonbreaching party under contract law include damages, rescission and restitution, specific performance, and reformation. Courts distinguish between remedies at law and remedies in equity. Today, the remedy at law is normally monetary damages. Usually, a court will not award an equitable remedy unless the remedy at law is inadequate.

Suppose Daren, an orthodontist, is having a new office built for his orthodontic practice. He contracts with Bryan, doing business as Desert Sun Landscaping, to build a fountain in front of the new office for $14,000. Desert Sun installs the fountain while the office building is still under construction. Three weeks later, the fountain stops working properly. Desert Sun repairs the problem, which Bryan claims was caused by dirt and debris coming from the office construction.

The fountain continues to have problems, however. Within a month, the concrete slab underneath it irreparably cracks, and a pipe leading to the spray nozzles comes loose. Daren hires another landscaper to remove the defective fountain. Can Daren sue Bryan for breach of contract? If he sues and is successful, can he recover the $14,000 he paid for the fountain, as well as the cost of removing the fountain? These are the kinds of issues concerning breach and damages that we consider in this chapter.

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is the standard measure of compensatory damages when a contract is breached?
2. When do courts grant specific performance as a remedy?
3. What remedy is available when a court imposes a quasi contract?
4. What is a limitation-of-liability clause, and when will courts enforce it?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This

The terms of a contract must be sufficiently definite for a court to determine the amount of damages to award.

15–1 Damages

A breach of contract entitles the nonbreaching party to sue for monetary damages. In contract law, damages compensate the nonbreaching party for the loss of the bargain (whereas in tort law, damages compensate for harm suffered as a result of another's wrongful act). Often, courts say that innocent parties are to be placed in the position they would have occupied had the contract been fully performed.[1]

15–1a Types of Damages

There are basically four broad categories of damages:

1. Compensatory (to cover direct losses and costs).
2. Consequential (to cover indirect and foreseeable losses).
3. Punitive (to punish and deter wrongdoing).
4. Nominal (to recognize wrongdoing when no monetary loss is shown).

Compensatory and punitive damages were discussed in the context of tort law. Here, we look at these types of damages, as well as consequential and nominal damages, in the context of contract law.

Compensatory Damages Damages that compensate the nonbreaching party for the loss of the bargain are known as compensatory damages. These damages compensate the injured party only for damages actually sustained and proved to have arisen directly from the loss of the bargain caused by the breach of contract. They simply replace what was lost because of the wrong or damage, and, for this reason, are often said to "make the person whole."

Example 15.1 Jane wires Roy, her financial advisor, $34,980 to purchase an allocation of FluidCoin's initial cryptocurrency offering. Roy does not invest these funds as agreed, instead commingling them with funds used for his personal acquisition of FluidCoin. Jane sues Roy, seeking $34,980 in compensatory damages. Finding breach of contract, a court awards Jane the $34,980 plus attorney's fees and litigation costs, with interest.

There is a two-step process to determine whether a breach of contract has resulted in compensatory damages. Initially, it must be established that there is a contract between the parties and that the contract has been breached. Next, it must be proved that the breach caused damages.

Case Example 15.2 Owens Community College lost its accreditation from the National League for Nursing Accreditation Commission (NLNAC) in July. The college did not inform its nursing students of this development until after classes had started in the fall. Carianne Baird and sixty-one other students from the program filed a breach of contract suit against Owens.

An Ohio appeals court determined that a contract existed in which the students paid their fees in exchange for a degree from an NLNAC-accredited institution. By losing that accreditation, Owens breached the contract. The court also recognized the probability that this breach would harm the plaintiffs' career prospects. Therefore, compensatory damages could be determined by measuring the difference between their future earnings capacity as graduates of an NLNAC-accredited nursing college and their future earnings capacity as graduates of now-unaccredited Owens.[2] This chapter's Cybersecurity and the Law feature examines contractual issues, including potential damages, that arose when a popular fast food chain suffered a significant data breach.

Monkey Business Images/shutterstock.com

How might a court determine the compensatory damages for students whose contract with a nursing school has been breached?

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 347.
2. Baird v. Owens Community College, 2016 -Ohio- 537, Ohio Ct. App. (10th Dis. 2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Arby's Restaurant Group, Inc.

The restaurant chain Arby's was the target of third-party hackers who breached its credit card point-of-sale machines and stole the personal information of hundreds of thousands of customers. A group of these customers sued the company. The plaintiffs claimed that, despite being aware of other high-profile data breaches in the business world, Arby's failed to make meaningful improvements to the security of its point-of-sale network. The plaintiffs contended that any modern business transaction involves an implied contract in which, in return for a consumer's patronage, the retailer promises to take sufficient measures to protect the consumer's private information.

Arby's countered that the plaintiffs could not unilaterally impose a contractual obligation to safeguard credit card data. The company insisted that its only responsibility was to provide food in return for payment for the food. Rejecting these arguments, a federal court in Georgia ruled that a reasonable jury could find that an implied contract existed between Arby's and the plaintiffs. When customers use a credit card, the court concluded, they intend to share their financial information only with the merchant. If the customers had known that this information was at risk of being stolen, they likely would have taken their business elsewhre.[a]

a. In Re Arby's Restaurant Group Litigation, 2018 WL 2128441 (N.D. Georgia—Atlanta Div., 2018).

Critical Thinking

Suppose a court rules that Arby's weak point-of-sale security system does constitute a breach of contract. What might be some of the compensatory damages due to customers whose credit card information was stolen by hackers?

Standard Measure. The standard measure of compensatory damages is the difference between the value of the breaching party's promised performance under the contract and the value of that party's actual performance. This amount is reduced by any loss that the injured party has avoided.

Example 15.3 Randall contracts to perform certain services exclusively for Hernandez during the month of March for $4,000. Hernandez cancels the contract and is in breach. Randall is able to find another job during March but can earn only $3,000. He can sue Hernandez for breach and recover $1,000 as compensatory damages. Randall can also recover from Hernandez the amount that he spent to find the other job. ■ Expenses that are directly incurred because of a breach of contract—such as those incurred to obtain performance from another source—are called incidental damages.

Note that the measure of compensatory damages often varies by type of contract. Certain types of contracts deserve special mention and are discussed next.

Focus Question 1

What is the standard measure of compensatory damages when a contract is breached?

Incidental Damages Damages that compensate for expenses directly incurred because of a breach of contract, such as those incurred to obtain performance from another source.

Sale of Goods. In a contract for the sale of goods, the usual measure of compensatory damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price.[3] Example 15.4 Medik Laboratories contracts to buy ten model UTS 400 network servers from Cal Industries for $4,000 each, but Cal Industries fails to deliver the servers. The market price of the servers at the time Medik learns of the breach is $4,500. Therefore, Medik's measure of damages is $5,000 (10 × $500), plus any incidental damages (expenses) caused by the breach. ■

Sometimes, the buyer breaches when the seller has not yet produced the goods. In that situation, compensatory damages normally equal the seller's lost profits on the sale, not the difference between the contract price and the market price.

3. This amount is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place at which the goods were to be delivered or tendered. See Sections 2–708, 2–713, and 2–715(1) of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Sale of Land. Ordinarily, because each parcel of land is unique, the remedy for a seller's breach of a contract for a sale of real estate is specific performance, in which the buyer is awarded the bargained-for parcel of property. (Specific performance will be discussed more fully later in the chapter.) The majority of states follow this rule.

A minority of states apply a different rule when the seller breaches a land-sale contract unintentionally (for instance, when the seller cannot deliver good title to the land for an unforeseeable reason). In these states, a prospective buyer is limited to a refund of any down payment made plus any expenses incurred (such as fees for title searches, attorneys, and escrows). Thus, the minority rule effectively returns purchasers to the positions they occupied prior to the sale, rather than giving them the benefit of the bargain.

When the buyer is the party in breach, the measure of damages is typically the difference between the contract price and the market price of the land. The same measure is used when specific performance is not available (because the seller has sold the property to someone else, for instance).

Construction Contracts. The measure of damages in a building or construction contract depends on which party breaches and when the breach occurs.

1. Breach by owner. The owner may breach at three different stages—before performance has begun, during performance, or after performance has been completed. If the owner breaches before performance has begun, the contractor can recover only the profits that would have been made on the contract. (Profits equal the total contract price less the cost of materials and labor.) If the owner breaches during performance, the contractor can recover the profits plus the costs incurred in partially constructing the building. If the owner breaches after construction has been completed, the contractor can recover the entire contract price, plus interest.
2. Breach by contractor. When the contractor breaches the contract—either by failing to begin construction or by stopping work partway through the project—the measure of damages is the cost of completion. The cost of completion includes reasonable compensation for any delay in performance. If the contractor finishes late, the measure of damages is the loss of use.

Vasily Pindyurin/iStock/Getty Images

When a woodworking contractor breaches a contract, how is the measure of damages calculated?

Case Example 15.5 To remodel his home in Connecticut, Richard Viola hired J. S. Benson of J. S. Benson Woodworking & Design as his contractor. Over a period of five years, Viola paid Benson more than $500,000 to fabricate and install windows and doors, nearly $50,000 for the purchase of lumber, $10,000 to ship and store the lumber, as well as $111,000 toward the contract price. Nevertheless, Benson failed to complete the project and would not give Viola the lumber that he had purchased despite repeated requests. Viola eventually sued Benson for breaching the contract. A state court held that Benson had breached the contract and ordered him to pay $848,000 in damages. The damages awarded included additional amounts to reimburse Viola for attorneys' fees, rental costs (because he was unable to live in the home), and property taxes.[4]

3. Breach by both owner and contractor. When the performance of both parties—the construction contractor and the owner—falls short of what their contract required, the courts attempt to strike a fair balance in awarding damages.

Exhibit 15–1 summarizes the rules for the measure of damages in breached construction contracts.

4. Viola v. J. S. Benson, 2017 WL 2817404 (Ct. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 15–1 Measure of Damages—Breach of Construction Contracts

PARTY IN BREACH	TIME OF BREACH	MEASURE OF DAMAGES
Owner	Before construction has begun	Profits (contract price less cost of materials and labor)
Owner	During construction	Profits plus costs incurred up to time of breach
Owner	After construction is completed	Full contract price, plus interest
Contractor	Before construction has begun	Cost in excess of contract price to complete work
Contractor	Before construction is completed	Generally, all costs incurred by owner to complete

Consequential Damages Foreseeable damages that result from a party's breach of contract are called consequential damages, or special damages. They differ from compensatory damages in that they are caused by special circumstances beyond the contract itself. They flow from the consequences, or results, of a breach. When a seller fails to deliver goods, knowing that the buyer is planning to use or resell those goods immediately, a court may award consequential damages for the loss of profits from the planned resale. In the following case, an advertising company sought to recover consequential damages consisting of lost profits that the company claimed had been caused by a delay in the delivery of a customized truck.

Consequential Damages
Foreseeable damages that result from a party's breach of contract but are caused by special circumstances beyond the contract itself.

Case 15.1

HDAV Outdoor, LLC v. Red Square Holdings, LLC

Court of Appeals of Nevada,[a] ___ P.3d ___, 2019 WL 6974770 (2019).

Facts HDAV Outdoor, LLC, contracted with Red Square Holdings, LLC, to customize an Isuzu Diesel Eco Max box truck with LED light displays that would allow Red Square to use the truck for mobile advertising. HDAV Outdoor agreed to complete the customization within eight weeks after Red Square delivered the truck. HDAV Outdoor did not finish the job, however, until four and a half months after the eight-week completion date.

Red Square filed a suit in a Nevada state district court against HDAV Outdoor, alleging breach of contract and seeking damages. Mohamood Razack, Red Square's sales manager, testified that, based on the company's record of past profits, it had lost $12,000 per month in profits because of HDAV's "untimely" work.

The district court ruled in Red Square's favor and awarded damages in the amount of $45,000 in lost profits for the delay. HDAV Outdoor appealed, challenging the award.

Issue Did the district court abuse its discretion by awarding Red Square $45,000 in lost profits?

Decision No. The Nevada Court of Appeals affirmed the lower court's ruling and award. "HDAV Outdoor's challenge to the award of lost profits fails."

Reason The appellate court acknowledged that damages resulting from a breach of contract must be reasonably foreseeable at the time of the contract. The court recognized that those damages could include an award of lost profits that result from "an inability to timely use equipment as long as the delay is attributable to the breaching party."

In this case, HDAV Outdoor did not deliver the truck by the promised delivery date. Red Square claimed that its inability to use the truck until it was delivered resulted in lost profits. The appellant argued that Red Square had not provided evidence of its costs to offset against the sought-after lost profits. The appellate court explained, however, that an award of delay damages does not require the consideration of such an offset. "Obviously, Red Square was not incurring any costs specifically related to operating the truck because it did not have the truck to operate."

Finally, the court pointed out, "Red Square specifically notified HDAV Outdoor that it intended to commence advertising with the truck, and thus it was reasonably foreseeable that any delay in delivering the truck would adversely affect Red Square's profitability."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment What might explain the difference between Razack's estimate and the district court's award of Red Square's lost profits for the delay in the delivery of the truck? Discuss.
- Economic Instead of being awarded as consequential damages, should "lost profits" be considered a risk in the change of value to the object of a contract assumed by the nonbreaching party? Why or why not?

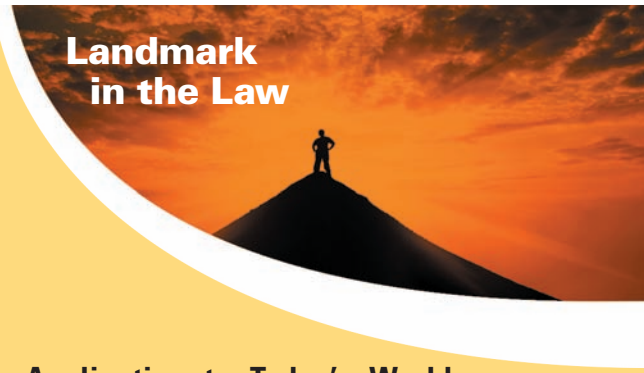
a. The Nevada Court of Appeals hears cases assigned to it by the Nevada Supreme Court, which otherwise hears all appeals from the state's district courts. This is similar to court systems in Idaho, Iowa, and Mississippi.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This

To avoid the risk of consequential damages, a seller can limit the buyer's remedies via contract.

For the nonbreaching party to recover consequential damages, the breaching party must know (or have reason to know) that special circumstances will cause the nonbreaching party to suffer an additional loss.[5] See this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature for a discussion of the nineteenth-century English case that established this rule on consequential damages.



Punitive Damages Punitive damages generally are not awarded in lawsuits for breach of contract. Because punitive damages are designed to punish the wrongdoer and set an example to deter similar conduct in the future, they have no legitimate place in contract law. A contract is simply a civil relationship between the parties. The law may compensate one party for the loss of the bargain—no more and no less. In a few situations, when a person's actions cause both a breach of contract and a tort, punitive damages may be available.

Nominal Damages When no actual damage or financial loss results from a breach of contract and only a technical injury is involved, the court may award nominal damages to the innocent party. Nominal damages awards are often small, such as one dollar, but they do Nominal Damages A small monetary award (often one dollar) granted to a plaintiff when no actual damage was suffered.

5. UCC 2–715(2).

Hadley v. Baxendale (1854)

The rule that requires a breaching party to have notice of special ("consequential") circumstances that will result in additional loss to the nonbreaching party before consequential damages can be awarded was first enunciated in Hadley v. Baxendale,[a] a landmark case decided in 1854.

Case Background The case involved a broken crankshaft used in a flour mill run by the Hadley family in Gloucester, England. The crankshaft attached to the steam engine in the mill broke, and the shaft had to be sent to a foundry in Greenwich so that a new shaft could be made to fit the engine.

The Hadleys hired Baxendale, a common carrier, to transport the shaft from Gloucester to Greenwich. Baxendale received payment in advance and promised to deliver the shaft the following day. It was not delivered for several days, however. The Hadleys had no extra crankshaft on hand to use, so they had to close the mill during those days. The Hadleys sued Baxendale to recover the profits they lost during that time. Baxendale contended that the loss of profits was "too remote."

In the mid-1800s, it was common knowledge that large mills, such as that run by the Hadleys, normally had more than one crankshaft in case the main one broke and had to be repaired. It is against this background that the parties presented their arguments on whether the damages resulting from the loss of profits while the crankshaft was out for repair were "too remote" to be recoverable.

The Issue Before the Court and the Court's Ruling The crucial issue for the court was whether the Hadleys had informed the carrier, Baxendale, of the special circumstances surrounding the crankshaft's repair. Specifically, did Baxendale know at the time of the contract that the mill would have to shut down while the crankshaft was being repaired?

In the court's opinion, the only circumstances communicated by the Hadleys to Baxendale at the time the contract was made were that the item to be transported was a broken crankshaft of a mill and that the Hadleys were the owners and operators of that mill. The court concluded that these circumstances did not reasonably indicate that the mill would have to stop operations if the delivery of the crankshaft was delayed.

Application to Today's World

Today, the rule enunciated by the court in this case still applies. When damages are awarded, compensation is given only for those injuries that the defendant could reasonably have foreseen as a probable result of the usual course of events following a breach. If the alleged injury is outside the usual and foreseeable course of events, the plaintiff must show specifically that the defendant had reason to know the facts and foresee the injury.

This rule applies to contracts in the online environment as well. For example, suppose that an online merchant loses business (and profits) due to a computer system's failure. If the failure was caused by malfunctioning software, the merchant normally may recover the lost profits from the software maker if these consequential damages were foreseeable.

a. 9 Exch. 341, 156 Eng.Rep. 145 (1854).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

establish that the defendant acted wrongfully. Most lawsuits for nominal damages are brought as a matter of principle under the theory that a breach has occurred and some damages must be imposed regardless of actual loss.

Example 15.6 Hernandez contracts to buy potatoes from Stanley at fifty cents a pound. Stanley breaches the contract and does not deliver the potatoes. Meanwhile, the price of potatoes falls. Hernandez is able to buy them in the open market at half the price he agreed to pay Stanley. Hernandez is clearly better off because of Stanley's breach. Thus, if Hernandez sues for breach of contract and wins, the court will likely award only nominal damages.

15–1b Mitigation of Damages

In most situations, when a breach of contract occurs, the injured party is held to a duty to mitigate, or reduce, the damages suffered. Under this doctrine of mitigation of damages, the required action depends on the nature of the situation.

Mitigation of Damages The requirement that a plaintiff do whatever is reasonable to minimize the damages caused by the defendant's breach of contract.

Employment Contracts In the majority of states, a person whose employment has been wrongfully terminated has a duty to mitigate damages incurred because of the employer's breach of the employment contract. In other words, a wrongfully terminated employee has a duty to take a similar job if one is available.

If the employee fails to do this, the damages received will be equivalent to the person's former salary less the income that person would have received in a similar job obtained by reasonable means. The employer has the burden of proving that such a job existed and that the employee could have been hired. Normally, a terminated employee is under no duty to take a job that is not of the same type and rank.

Example 15.7 Susan works as a librarian at Barnett University. When Susan is fired, she claims that she has been terminated in retaliation for filing an employment discrimination claim. Suppose that Susan succeeds in her employment discrimination claim but that Barnett can show that she has failed to take another librarian position when several comparable positions were available. Barnett can assert that she has failed to mitigate damages. In that situation, any compensation she is awarded for wrongful termination will be reduced by the amount she could have obtained from other employment.

Rental Agreements Some states require a landlord to use reasonable means to find a new tenant if a tenant abandons the premises and fails to pay rent. If an acceptable tenant becomes available, the landlord is required to lease the premises to this tenant to mitigate the damages recoverable from the former tenant.

The former tenant is still liable for the difference between the amount of the rent under the original lease and the rent received from the new tenant. If the landlord has not taken reasonable steps to find a new tenant, a court will likely reduce any award by the amount of rent the landlord could have received had this step been taken.

15–1c Liquidated Damages versus Penalties

A liquidated damages provision in a contract specifies that a certain dollar amount is to be paid in the event of a future default or breach of contract. (Liquidated means determined, settled, or fixed.)

Liquidated Damages An amount, stipulated in a contract, that the parties to the contract believe to be a reasonable estimation of the damages that will occur in the event of a breach.

Liquidated damages differ from penalties. Although a penalty also specifies a certain amount to be paid in the event of a default or breach of contract, it is designed to penalize the breaching party, not to make the innocent party whole. Liquidated damages provisions normally are enforceable. In contrast, if a court finds that a provision calls for a penalty, the agreement as to the amount will not be enforced, and recovery will be limited to actual damages.

Penalty A sum specified in a contract not as a measure of compensation for its breach but rather as a punishment for a default. The agreement as to the amount will not be enforced, and recovery will be limited to the actual damages.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Enforceability To determine whether a particular provision is for liquidated damages or a penalty, the court must answer two questions:

1. At the time the contract was formed, was it apparent that damages would be difficult to estimate in the event of a breach?
2. Was the amount set as damages a reasonable estimate and not excessive?[6]

If the answers to both questions are yes, the provision normally will be enforced. If either answer is no, the provision usually will not be enforced.

In the following Spotlight Case, the court had to decide whether a clause in a contract was an enforceable liquidated damages provision or an unenforceable penalty.

6. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 356(1).

Spotlight on Liquidated Damages: Case 15.2

Kent State University v. Ford

Court of Appeals of Ohio, Eleventh District, Portage County 2015-Ohio-41, 26 N.E.3d 868, (2015).

Facts Gene Ford signed a five-year contract with Kent State University in Ohio to work as the head coach for the men's basketball team. The contract provided that if Ford quit before the end of the contract term, he would pay to the school liquidated damages in an amount equal to his salary ($300,000), multiplied by the number of years remaining on the contract. Laing Kennedy, Kent State's athletic director, told Ford that the contract would be renegotiated within a few years.

If a college coach quits before the end of his contract, can the university recover liquidated damages?

©Debby Wong/Shutterstock.com

Four years before the contract expired, however, Ford left Kent State and began to coach for Bradley University at an annual salary of $700,000. Kent State filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Ford, alleging breach of contract. The court enforced the liquidated damages clause and awarded the university $1.2 million. Ford appealed, arguing that the liquidated damages clause in his employment contract was an unenforceable penalty.

Issue Was the liquidated damages clause in Ford's contract enforceable?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's award. The clause was not a penalty. "There was justification for seeking liquidated damages to compensate for Kent State's losses" on Ford's breach.

Reason At the time the contract was entered into, determining the damages that would result from a breach was "difficult, if not impossible." The resignation of a head coach from a university's basketball team may cause a loss in ticket sales and a drop in community and alumni support for the team. The university's ability to recruit players may also be affected. Of course, a search for a new coach and coaching staff will be required. These effects are not easy to measure before they happen, especially considering that such results may be different at different times in a coach's tenure. Kennedy's statement that the contract would be renegotiated indicated that Kent State was interested in the stability of these factors. And in this case, "based on the record, . . . the damages were reasonable." The salary that Bradley was willing to pay Ford showed the cost to Kent State of finding a new coach with his skill and experience. "There was also an asserted decrease in ticket sales, costs associated with the trip for the coaching search, and additional potential sums that may be expended."

Critical Thinking

- Cultural How does a college basketball team's record of wins and losses, and its ranking in its conference, support the court's decision in this case?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Common Uses of Liquidated Damages Provisions Liquidated damages provisions are frequently used in construction contracts. For instance, a provision requiring a construction contractor to pay $300 for every day the contractor is late in completing the project is a liquidated damages provision. Such provisions are also common in contracts for the sale of goods[7] and in certain loan contracts (see the example discussed in this chapter's Business Law Analysis). In addition, contracts with entertainers and professional athletes often include liquidated damages provisions.

15–2 Equitable Remedies

Sometimes, damages are an inadequate remedy for a breach of contract. In these situations, the nonbreaching party may ask the court for an equitable remedy. Equitable remedies include rescission and restitution, specific performance, and reformation.

7. Section 2–718(1) of the UCC specifically authorizes the use of liquidated damages provisions.

Business Law Analysis

Enforceability of Liquidated Damages Provisions

Planned Pethood Plus, Inc. (PPP), is a veterinarian-owned clinic. It borrowed $389,000 from KeyBank at an interest rate of 9.3 percent per year for ten years. The loan had a "prepayment penalty" clause that clearly stated that if the loan was repaid early, a specific formula would be used to assess a lump-sum payment to extinguish the obligation. The sooner the loan was paid off, the higher the prepayment penalty.

After a year, the veterinarians decided to pay off the loan. KeyBank invoked a prepayment penalty of $40,525.92, which was equal to 10.7 percent of the balance due. PPP sued, contending that the prepayment requirement was unenforceable because it was a penalty. The bank countered that the amount was not a penalty but liquidated damages and that the sum was reasonable. Was the loan's prepayment penalty clause enforceable?

Analysis: A liquidated damages provision in a contract specifies a certain amount of money to be paid in the event of a future default or breach of contract. In contrast, a penalty provision specifies a certain amount to be paid in the event of a default or breach of contract and is designed to penalize the breaching party. Liquidated damages provisions normally are enforceable, but penalty provisions are not.

To determine whether a provision is for liquidated damages or a penalty, ask (1) when the contract was formed, were the potential damages that would be incurred on its breach difficult to estimate, and (2) was the amount set as damages a reasonable estimate of those potential damages? If both answers are yes, the provision is for liquidated damages. If either answer is no, the provision is a penalty.

Result and Reasoning: PPP's loan included a prepayment penalty clause common to many loan agreements. If PPP decided to repay its loan early, an amount would be added to the balance due according to a specific formula. When the contract was formed, the potential loss to the lender on the loan's prepayment was difficult to estimate because the time of the prepayment could not be reasonably foreseen. The formula provided a reasonable estimate of that loss.

In other words, the answers to both questions in the Analysis section are yes. Thus, the provision in PPP's loan was for liquidated damages and enforceable.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

15–2a Rescission and Restitution

As previously discussed, rescission is essentially an action to undo, or cancel, a contract—to return nonbreaching parties to the positions that they occupied prior to the transaction.[8] When fraud, mistake, duress, undue influence, lack of capacity, or failure of consideration is present, rescission is available. Rescission may also be available by statute.[9] The failure of one party to perform under a contract entitles the other party to rescind the contract. The rescinding party must give prompt notice to the breaching party.

Rescission of a contract on the basis of a breach is appropriate where the breach is found to be material and willful. A party seeking rescission must also show that the contracting parties can be restored to the status quo. In the following case, a landlord overcharged a tenant certain fees and did not explain how the amount was calculated, as the lease required. The question was whether these circumstances entitled the tenant to rescind the lease.

8. The rescission discussed here refers to unilateral rescission, in which only one party wants to undo the contract. In mutual rescission, both parties agree to undo the contract. Mutual rescission discharges the contract, whereas unilateral rescission is generally available as a remedy for breach of contract.
9. Many states have laws that allow individuals who enter into "home solicitation contracts" to rescind these contracts within three business days for any reason. See, for example, California Civil Code Section 1689.5.

Case 15.3

Cipriano Square Plaza Corp. v. Munawar

Maryland Court of Special Appeals, 2018 WL 1040020 (2018).

Facts Haseeb and Razia Munawar entered into a lease to rent space in a shopping center in Greenbelt, Maryland, owned by Cipriano Square Plaza Corporation. The lease obligated the Munawars to pay a pro rata (proportionate) share of the real estate taxes. The new tenants were assessed with property tax charges shortly after occupying the leased space. Asserting that the amount was excessive, they asked Cipriano for an explanation. The lease required the landlord to provide certain documents (such as tax bills) and explain how the tenants' share was calculated. After repeated requests, the Munawars received a partial reduction but no explanation. They filed a suit in a Maryland state court against Cipriano, alleging a breach of the lease. The court rescinded the deal. Cipriano appealed.

Issue Were the Munawars entitled to rescind their lease?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the trial court. The landlord had materially breached the lease, and its rescission was an appropriate remedy.

Reason Cipriano breached its duties to the Munawars regarding payment of their share of the real estate taxes. Cipriano's breach consisted of its overcharges of the Munawars' share of the taxes and the landlord's refusal to explain the calculation of this assessment. Cipriano had "ample opportunities" to make this explanation and failed to do so. The overbilling and the failure to explain it were voluntary and intentional. The breach was material—the overcharges were about 130 percent of the Munawars' actual pro rata share. And rescission would restore the parties to their status quo before the lease.

Cipriano argued that it would lose the benefit of its lease with the Munawars. But the purpose of rescission "is not to give the breaching party the benefit of the bargain that it would have had but for its breach." Here, before the lease, Cipriano had an empty store. As a result of the rescission, the landlord would once again have an empty store that it could lease to another party.

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Cipriano designated Nicholas Vassello to testify on its behalf. Vassello was unable to explain how the Munawars' share of the property taxes was calculated. What effect might this testimony have had on the trial court's decision?
- Economic The lease provided that any monetary judgment in favor of the tenant could be recovered only on the landlord's sale of the shopping center. As a practical matter, how might this provision have affected the result in the Cipriano case?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Restitution To rescind a contract, both parties generally must make restitution to each other by returning goods, property, or funds previously conveyed.[10] If the property or goods can be returned, they must be. If the property or goods have been consumed, restitution must be made in an equivalent dollar amount. Essentially, restitution involves the recapture of a benefit conferred on a defendant who has been unjustly enriched by that benefit.

Restitution An equitable remedy under which persons are restored to their original position prior to loss or injury, or placed in the position they would have been in had the breach not occurred.

Example 15.8 Katie contracts with Mikhail to design a house for her. Katie pays Mikhail $9,000 and agrees to make two more payments of $9,000 (for a total of $27,000) as the design progresses. The next day, Mikhail calls Katie and tells her that he has taken a position with a large architectural firm in another state and cannot design the house. Katie decides to hire another architect that afternoon. Katie can obtain restitution of the $9,000.

Restitution Is Not Limited to Rescission Cases Restitution may be required when a contract is rescinded, but the right to restitution is not limited to rescission cases. Because an award of restitution basically returns something to its rightful owner, a party can seek restitution in actions for breach of contract, tort actions, and other types of actions.

Restitution can be obtained when funds or property has been transferred by mistake or because of fraud or incapacity. Similarly, restitution might be available when there has been misconduct by a party who has a special relationship with the other party. Even in criminal cases, a court can order restitution of funds or property obtained through embezzlement, conversion, theft, or copyright infringement.

Case Example 15.9 Clara Lee contracted to purchase Rosalina Robles's dental practice in Chicago, Illinois, for $267,000. Nearly half of the practice's market value was attributed to the business's good reputation. After Lee took over the practice, however, Chicago Magazine and other local media revealed that one of the dentists at Robles's practice had treated underage prostitutes in the offices after hours. Federal authorities were investigating that dentist for this and other misconduct.

Lee sued Robles for fraud, alleging that she had deliberately withheld information about the dentist and the investigation. An Illinois state court awarded rescission, and the holding was affirmed on appeal. The appellate court reasoned that the parties' agreement for the sale of the dental practice required Robles to disclose "any material information." The duty to disclose included actions by a "governmental agency that materially alters the desirability or economic potential of the assets."[11]

Know This

Restitution offers several advantages over traditional damages. First, restitution may be available in situations when damages cannot be proved or are difficult to prove. Second, restitution can be used to recover specific property. Third, restitution sometimes results in a greater overall award.

15–2b Specific Performance

The equitable remedy of specific performance calls for the performance of the act promised in the contract. This remedy is attractive to a nonbreaching party because it provides the exact bargain promised in the contract. It also avoids some of the problems inherent in a suit for monetary damages, such as collecting a judgment and arranging another contract. Moreover, the actual performance may be more valuable (to the promisee) than the monetary damages.

Specific Performance An equitable remedy in which a court orders the parties to perform as promised in the contract. This remedy normally is granted only when the legal remedy (monetary damages) is inadequate.

Normally, however, specific performance will not be granted unless the party's legal remedy (monetary damages) is inadequate.[12] For this reason, contracts for the sale of goods rarely qualify for specific performance. Monetary damages ordinarily are adequate in sales contracts because substantially identical goods can be bought or sold in the market. Only if the goods are unique will a court grant specific performance. For instance, paintings, sculptures, and rare books and coins are often unique, and monetary damages will not enable a buyer to obtain substantially identical substitutes in the market.

Focus Question 2

When do courts grant specific performance as a remedy?

10. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 370.
11. Clara Wonjung Lee, DDS, Ltd. v. Robles, 2014 WL 976776 (Ill.App. 2014). DDS stands for Doctor of Dental Surgery.
12. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 359.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Sale of Land A court may grant specific performance to a buyer in an action for a breach of contract involving the sale of land. In this situation, the legal remedy of monetary damages may not compensate the buyer adequately because every parcel of land is unique. The same land in the same location obviously cannot be obtained elsewhere. Only when specific performance is unavailable (such as when the seller has sold the property to someone else) will damages be awarded instead.

Case Example 15.10 Harmony Development agreed to sell seven acres of a planned subdivision to Jerry Davis for $1.5 million. The contract required Harmony to spend $1.85 million improving the property so that Davis could construct a health club on it. After Harmony made the improvements, Davis informed the company that the subdivision no longer "fit in harmony" with his plans and refused to complete the purchase. Harmony sued for breach of contract. The Wyoming Supreme Court granted specific performance, calling the remedy "a means of compelling [Davis] to do precisely what he should have done without being coerced by a court."[13]

Contracts for Personal Services Contracts for personal services require one party to work personally for another party. Courts normally refuse to grant specific performance of personal-service contracts. One reason is that ordering parties to perform personal services against their will would amount to a type of involuntary servitude.[14]

Moreover, the courts do not want to monitor contracts for personal services, which usually require the exercise of personal judgment or talent. Example 15.11 Nicole contracts with a surgeon to remove a tumor on her brain. If he refuses to perform the surgery, the court will not compel (nor would Nicole want) him to perform. A court cannot ensure meaningful performance in such a situation.[15]

If a contract is not deemed personal, the remedy at law of monetary damages may be adequate if a substantially identical service (for instance, lawn mowing) is available from other persons.

15–2c Reformation

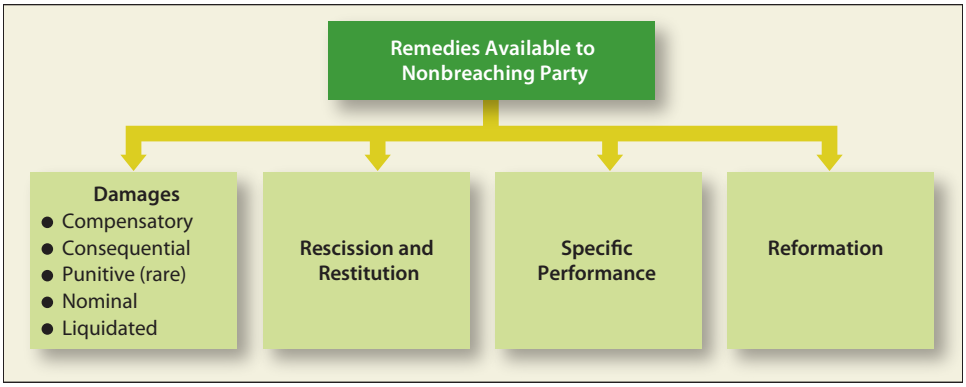
Reformation is an equitable remedy used when the parties have imperfectly expressed their agreement in writing. Reformation allows a court to rewrite the contract to reflect the parties' true intentions.

kadmy/iStock/Getty Images

What happens when a contract mistakenly specifies a crane instead of a forklift?

Fraud or Mutual Mistake Courts order reformation most often when fraud or mutual mistake is present. Example 15.12 If Carson contracts to buy a forklift from Yoshie but the written contract refers to a crane, a mutual mistake has occurred. Accordingly, a court could reform the contract so that the writing conforms to the parties' original intention as to which piece of equipment is being sold.

Incorrect Written Statement of the Parties' Oral Agreement A court will also reform a contract when two parties enter into a binding oral contract but later make an error when they attempt to put the terms into writing. Usually, the court will allow into evidence the correct terms of the oral contract, thereby reforming the written contract.



Covenants Not to Compete Courts also may reform contracts involving written covenants not to compete, or restrictive covenants. Such covenants are often included in contracts for the sale of ongoing businesses and in employment contracts. The agreements restrict the area and time in which one party can directly compete with the other party.

---

13. Davis v. Harmony Development LLC, 2020 WY 39, __ P.3d __ (2020).
14. Involuntary servitude, or slavery, is contrary to the public policy expressed in the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.
15. Similarly, courts often refuse to order specific performance of construction contracts because courts are not set up to operate as construction supervisors or engineers.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 15–2 Remedies for Breach of Contract

If a covenant not to compete is for a valid and legitimate purpose, but the area or time restraints are unreasonable, some courts will reform the restraints by making them reasonable and will then enforce the entire contract as reformed. Other courts will throw out the entire restrictive covenant as illegal. Thus, when businesspersons create restrictive covenants, they must make sure that the restrictions imposed are reasonable.

Case Example 15.13 Cardiac Study Center, Inc., a medical practice group, hired Dr. Robert Emerick. Later, Emerick became a shareholder of Cardiac and signed an agreement that included a covenant not to compete. The covenant stated that a physician who left the group promised not to practice competitively in the surrounding area for a period of five years. After Cardiac began receiving complaints from patients and other physicians about Emerick, it terminated his employment.

Emerick sued Cardiac, claiming that the covenant not to compete that he had signed was unreasonable and should be declared illegal. Ultimately, a state appellate court reformed the geographic and temporal restraints, and held that the covenant as reformed was both reasonable and enforceable. Cardiac had a legitimate interest in protecting its existing client base and prohibiting Emerick from taking its clients.[16]

Exhibit 15–2 graphically presents the remedies that are available to the nonbreaching party.

15–3 Recovery Based on Quasi Contract

In some situations, when no actual contract exists, a court may step in to prevent one party from being unjustly enriched at the expense of another party. As previously discussed, quasi contract is a legal theory under which an obligation is imposed in the absence of an agreement.

The legal obligation arises because the law considers that the party accepting the benefits has made an implied promise to pay for them. Generally, when one party has conferred a benefit on another party, justice requires that the party receiving the benefit pay the reasonable value for it. The party conferring the benefit can recover in quantum meruit, which means "as much as one deserves."

Focus Question 3

What remedy is available if a court imposes a quasi contract?

16. Emerick v. Cardiac Study Center, Inc., 189 Wash.App. 711, 357 P.3d 696 (2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

15–3a When Quasi Contract Is Used

Quasi contract allows a court to act as if a contract exists when there is no actual contract or agreement between the parties. Therefore, if the parties have entered into a contract concerning the matter in controversy, a court normally will not impose a quasi contract. A court can also use the doctrine when the parties entered into a contract that is unenforceable for some reason.

Know This
The function of a quasi contract is to impose a legal obligation on a party who made no actual promise.

Quasi-contractual recovery is often granted when one party has partially performed under a contract that is unenforceable. Quasi contracts provide an alternative to suing for damages and allow the party to recover the reasonable value of the partial performance. Depending on the case, the amount of the recovery may be measured either by the benefit received or by the detriment suffered.

Example 15.14 Ericson contracts to build two oil derricks for Petro Industries. The derricks are to be built over a period of three years, but the parties do not create a written contract. Therefore, the writing requirement will bar the enforcement of the contract.[17] After Ericson completes one derrick, Petro Industries informs him that it will not pay for the derrick. Ericson can sue Petro Industries under the theory of quasi contract.

15–3b The Requirements of Quasi Contract

shotbydave/E+/Getty Images

Assume that it takes several years to build two oil derricks, but no written contract exists. If one is built, does the purchaser have to pay for it?

To recover on a quasi contract theory, the party seeking recovery must show the following:

1. The party conferred a benefit on the other party.
2. The party conferred the benefit with the reasonable expectation of being paid.
3. The party did not act as a volunteer in conferring the benefit.
4. The party receiving the benefit would be unjustly enriched if allowed to retain the benefit without paying for it.

Applying these requirements to Example 15.14, Ericson can sue in quasi contract because all of the conditions for quasi-contractual recovery have been fulfilled. Ericson conferred a benefit on Petro Industries by building the oil derrick. Ericson built the derrick with the reasonable expectation of being paid. He did not intend to act as a volunteer. Petro Industries would be unjustly enriched if it was allowed to keep the derrick without paying Ericson for the work. Therefore, Ericson should be able to recover in quantum meruit the reasonable value of the oil derrick that was built, which is ordinarily equal to the fair market value.

15–4 Contract Provisions Limiting Remedies

A contract may include provisions stating that no damages can be recovered for certain types of breaches or that damages will be limited to a maximum amount. A contract may also provide that the only remedy for breach is replacement, repair, or refund of the purchase price. In addition, a contract may provide that one party can seek injunctive relief if the other party breaches the contract. Provisions stating that no damages can be recovered are called exculpatory clauses. Provisions that affect the availability of certain remedies are called limitation-of-liability clauses.

17. Contracts that by their terms cannot be performed within one year from the day after the date of contract formation must be in writing to be enforceable under the Statute of Frauds.

Ethical Issue

Can contracts for mixed martial arts fighters limit a fighter's right to stop fighting? If you are a mixed martial arts champion, the highest-profile league to work for is the Ultimate Fighting Championship, or UFC. But a contract with UFC's parent company, Zuffa, LLC, includes numerous restrictions on your behavior.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The UFC's exclusivity clause, for instance, prevents you from competing in other mixed martial arts leagues. Another clause states that if you refuse a fight—or are injured or disabled—Zuffa can choose to extend the term of your contract. The term may be extended for any period when a fighter is unable or unwilling to compete or train for any reason. Zuffa can even retain the rights to a fighter who wants to retire from mixed martial arts.

You probably also signed an agreement that has a "champions clause." That means that if you become a champion, your contract with the UFC is automatically extended. If you get really famous, you do not even have rights to your likeness. You have signed those away to the UFC. So if a video game is based on your likeness, the UFC obtains the profits, and you do not. Therefore, you will have trouble negotiating with sponsors outside of the UFC, because you really do not own much of yourself to "sell."

A group of current and former mixed martial arts fighters have filed a lawsuit against Zuffa. They claim that these contract limitations are fundamentally unfair. Because the contracts prevent fighters from working with other promoters, profiting from individual marketing deals, and signing with outside sponsors, the suit alleges that the UFC is violating antitrust laws. Litigation is ongoing.[18]

15–4a Sales Contracts

The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) provides that remedies can be limited in a contract for the sale of goods. We will examine the UCC provisions on limitation-of-liability clauses again in the context of the remedies available on the breach of a contract for the sale or lease of goods.[19]

15–4b Enforceability of Limitation-of-Liability Clauses

Focus Question 4

What is a limitation-of-liability clause, and when will courts enforce it?

Whether a limitation-of-liability clause in a contract will be enforced depends on the type of breach that is excused by the provision. Clauses that normally will not be enforced include provisions excluding liability for fraudulent or intentional injury or for illegal acts or other violations of law. Clauses excluding liability for negligence may be enforced in certain situations, however. When an exculpatory clause for negligence is contained in a contract made between parties who have roughly equal bargaining positions, the clause usually will be enforced.

Case Example 15.15 2010-1 SFG Venture, LLC, was the main lender on a commercial real estate loan for $15 million to fund construction of a hotel in Wisconsin. Lee Bank & Trust Co. purchased a 3.36 percent interest in the loan. Lee Bank signed a contract with SFG that included a clause limiting SFG's liability "except in the case of gross negligence or willful misconduct."

When the borrower made payments on the loan, SFG remitted 3.36 percent of each payment to Lee Bank. Eventually, however, the borrower stopped making payments, and litigation followed. Lee Bank sued SFG, which argued that it was protected by the contract provisions limiting its liability. The lower court refused to enforce the limitation-of-liability clause, but a state appellate court reversed. The court held that the clause was enforceable. It was sufficiently prominent in the contract and represented a reasonable allocation of risks in an arms-length business transaction.[20]

Bloomberg/Getty Images

Why did a court enforce the limitation-of-liability clause in a dispute over a hotel construction contract?

18. See Cung Le v. Zuffa, 2017 WL 2803171 (D.Nev. 2017); and Le v. Zuffa, 216 F.Supp.3d 1154 (D.Nev. 2016).
19. UCC 2–719.
20. 2010-1 SFG Venture, LLC v. Lee Bank & Trust Co., 332 Ga.App. 894, 775 S.E.2d 243 (2015).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Practice and Review

Kyle Bruno enters into a contract with X Entertainment to be a stuntman in a movie. Bruno is widely known as the best motorcycle stuntman in the business, and the movie, Xtreme Riders, has numerous scenes involving high-speed freestyle street-bike stunts. Filming is set to begin August 1 and end by December 1 so that the film can be released the following summer. Both parties to the contract have stipulated that the filming must end on time in order to capture the profits from the summer movie market.

The contract states that Bruno will be paid 10 percent of the net proceeds from the movie for his stunts. The contract also includes a liquidated damages provision, which specifies that if Bruno breaches the contract, he will owe X Entertainment $1 million. In addition, the contract includes a limitation-of-liability clause stating that if Bruno is injured during filming, X Entertainment's liability is limited to nominal damages. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. One day, while Bruno is preparing for a difficult stunt, he gets into an argument with the director and refuses to perform any stunts. Can X Entertainment seek specific performance of the contract? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that while performing a high-speed wheelie on a motorcycle, Bruno is injured by an intentionally reckless act of an X Entertainment employee. Will a court be likely to enforce the limitation-of-liability clause? Why or why not?
3. What factors would a court consider to determine if the $1 million liquidated damages clause is valid or is a penalty?
4. Suppose that there was no liquidated damages clause (or the court refused to enforce it) and X Entertainment breached the contract. The breach caused the release of the film to be delayed by many months. Could Bruno seek consequential (special) damages for lost profits from the summer movie market in that situation? Explain.

Debate This

Courts should always uphold limitation-of-liability clauses, whether or not the two parties to the contract had equal bargaining power.

Key Terms

consequential damages 361
incidental damages 359 liquidated damages 363 mitigation of damages 363 nominal damages 362 penalty 363 restitution 367
specific performance 367

Chapter Summary: Breach and Remedies

Damages

In contract law, the legal remedy designed to compensate the nonbreaching party for the loss of the bargain. The nonbreaching party frequently has a duty to mitigate (lessen or reduce) the damages suffered. There are four broad categories of damages. In addition, a contract may contain a provision for liquidated damages.

1. Compensatory damages—Damages that compensate the nonbreaching party for injuries actually sustained and proved to have arisen directly from the loss of the bargain resulting from the breach of contract.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

	a. In breached contracts for the sale of goods, the usual measure of compensatory damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price. b. In a seller's breach of a contract for the sale of land, the measure of damages is ordinarily specific performance. For a buyer's breach, the measure of damages is typically the same as in contracts for the sale of goods. c. In breached construction contracts, the measure of damages depends on which party breaches and at what stage of construction the breach occurs. 2. Consequential damages—Foreseeable damages that result from special circumstances beyond the contract itself (also called special damages). The damages flow only from the consequences of a breach. For a party to recover consequential damages, the breaching party must have known at the time the contract was formed that special circumstances existed that would cause the nonbreaching party to incur additional loss on breach of the contract. 3. Punitive damages—Damages awarded to punish the breaching party. Usually not awarded in an action for breach of contract unless a tort is involved. 4. Nominal damages—Damages small in amount (such as one dollar) that are awarded when a breach has occurred but no actual injury has been suffered. Awarded only to establish that the defendant acted wrongfully. 5. Mitigation of damages—In most situations, when a breach of contract occurs, the injured party is held to a duty to mitigate, or reduce, the damages suffered. 6. Liquidated damages—Damages specified in a contract as the amount to be paid to the nonbreaching party in the event the contract is breached. Clauses providing for liquidated damages are enforced if the damages were difficult to estimate at the time the contract was formed and if the amount stipulated is reasonable. If the amount is construed to be a penalty, the clause will not be enforced.
Equitable Remedies	1. Rescission—A remedy whereby a contract is canceled and the parties are restored to the original positions that they occupied prior to the transaction. Available when fraud, mistake, duress, undue influence, lack of capacity, or failure of consideration is present. The rescinding party must give prompt notice of the rescission to the breaching party. 2. Restitution—When a contract is rescinded, both parties must make restitution to each other by returning the goods, property, or funds previously conveyed. Restitution prevents the unjust enrichment of the parties. 3. Specific performance—An equitable remedy calling for the performance of the act promised in the contract. This remedy is available only in special situations—such as those involving contracts for the sale of unique goods or land—when monetary damages would be an inadequate remedy. Specific performance is not available as a remedy for breached contracts for personal services. 4. Reformation—An equitable remedy allowing a contract to be "reformed," or rewritten, to reflect the parties' true intentions. Available when an agreement is imperfectly expressed in writing.
Recovery Based on Quasi Contract	An equitable theory imposed by the courts to obtain justice and prevent unjust enrichment in a situation in which no enforceable contract exists. The party seeking recovery must show the following: 1. A benefit was conferred on the other party. 2. The party conferring the benefit did so with the expectation of being paid. 3. The party conferring the benefit did not volunteer the benefit. 4. The party receiving the benefit would be unjustly enriched if allowed to retain the benefit without paying for it.
Contract Provisions Limiting Remedies	A contract may provide that no damages (or only a limited amount of damages) can be recovered in the event the contract is breached. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, remedies may be limited in contracts for the sale of goods. Clauses excluding liability for fraudulent or intentional injury or for illegal acts cannot be enforced. Clauses excluding liability for negligence may be enforced if both parties hold roughly equal bargaining power.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Issue Spotters

1. Greg contracts to build a storage shed for Haney. Haney pays Greg in advance, but Greg completes only half the work. Haney pays Ipswich $500 to finish the shed. If Haney sues Greg, what will be the measure of recovery? (See Damages.)
2. Lyle contracts to sell his ranch to Marley, who is to take possession on June 1. Lyle delays the transfer until August 1. Marley incurs expenses in providing for cattle that he bought for the ranch. When they made the contract, Lyle had no reason to know of the cattle. Is Lyle liable for Marley's expenses in providing for the cattle? Why or why not? (See Damages.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

15–1. Liquidated Damages. Carnack contracts to sell his house and lot to Willard for $100,000. The terms of the contract call for Willard to make a deposit of 10 percent of the purchase price as a down payment. The terms further stipulate that if the buyer breaches the contract, Carnack will retain the deposit as liquidated damages. Willard makes the deposit, but because her expected financing of the $90,000 balance falls through, she breaches the contract. Two weeks later, Carnack sells the house and lot to Balkova for $105,000. Willard demands her $10,000 back, but Carnack refuses, claiming that Willard's breach and the contract terms entitle him to keep the deposit. Discuss who is correct. (See Damages.)

15–2. Measure of Damages. Before buying a house, Dean and Donna Testa hired Ground Systems, Inc. (GSI), to inspect the sewage and water disposal system. GSI reported a split system with a watertight septic tank, a wastewater tank, a distribution box, and a leach field. The Testas bought the house. Later, Dean saw that the system was not as GSI described—there was no distribution box or leach field, and there was only one tank, which was not watertight. The Testas arranged for the installation of a new system and sold the house. Assuming that GSI is liable for breach of contract, what is the measure of damages? [Testa v. Ground Systems, Inc., 206 N.J. 330, 20 A.3d 435 (App. Div. 2011)] (See Damages.)

15–3. Consequential Damages. After submitting the high bid at a foreclosure sale, David Simard entered into a contract to purchase real property in Maryland for $192,000. Simard defaulted (failed to pay) on the contract, so a state court ordered the property to be resold at Simard's expense, as required by state law. The property was then resold for $163,000, but the second purchaser also defaulted on his contract. The court then ordered a second resale, resulting in a final price of $130,000. Assuming that Simard is liable for consequential damages, what is the extent of his liability? Is he liable for losses and expenses related to the first resale? If so, is he also liable for losses and expenses related to the second resale? Why or why not? [Burson v. Simard, 35 A.3d 1154 (Md. 2012)] (See Damages.)

15–4. Liquidated Damages. Cuesport Properties, LLC, sold a condominium in Anne Arundel County, Maryland, to Critical Developments, LLC. As part of the sale, Cuesport agreed to build a wall between Critical Developments' unit and an adjacent unit within thirty days of closing. If Cuesport failed to do so, it was to pay $126 per day until completion. This was an estimate of the amount of rent that Critical Developments would lose until the wall was finished and the unit could be rented. Actual damages were otherwise difficult to estimate at the time of the contract. The wall was built on time, but without a county permit, and it did not comply with the county building code. Critical Developments did not modify the wall to comply with the code until 260 days after the date of the contract deadline for completion of the wall. Does Cuesport have to pay Critical Developments $126 for each of the 260 days? Explain. [Cuesport Properties, LLC v. Critical Developments, LLC, 209 Md.App. 607, 61 A.3d 91 (2013)] (See Damages.)

15–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Limitation-of-Liability Clauses. Mia Eriksson was a seventeen-year-old competitor in horseback-riding events. Her riding coach was Kristi Nunnink. Eriksson signed an agreement that released Nunnink from all liability except for damages caused by Nunnink's "direct, willful and wanton negligence." During an event at Galway Downs in Temecula, California, Eriksson's horse struck a hurdle. She fell from the horse and the horse fell on her, causing her death. Her parents, Karan and Stan Eriksson, filed a suit in a California state court against Nunnink for wrongful death. Is the limitation-of-liability agreement that Eriksson signed likely to be enforced in her parents' case? If so, how would it affect their claim? Explain. [Eriksson v. Nunnink, 233 Cal.App.4th 708, 183 Cal. Rptr.3d 234 (4 Dist. 2015)] (See Contract Provisions Limiting Remedies.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 15–5, go to Appendix E.

15–6. Damages. Robert Morris was a licensed insurance agent working for his father's independent insurance agency when he contacted Farmers Insurance Exchange in Alabama about becoming a Farmers agent. According to Farmers' company policy, Morris was an unsuitable candidate due to his relationship with his father's agency. But no Farmers representative told Morris of this policy, and none of the documents that he signed expressed it. Farmers trained Morris and appointed him its agent. About three years later, however, Farmers terminated the appointment for "a conflict of interest because his father was in the insurance business." Morris filed a suit in an Alabama state court against Farmers, claiming that he had been fraudulently induced to leave his father's agency to work for Farmers. If Morris was successful, what type of damages was he most likely awarded? What was the measure of damages? Discuss. [Farmers Insurance Exchange v. Morris, 228 So.3d 971 (Ala. 2016)] (See Damages.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

15–7. Reformation. Dr. John Holm signed a two-year employment agreement with Gateway Anesthesia Associates PLLC. During negotiations for the agreement, Gateway's president, Dr. Jon Nottingham, told Holm that on completion of the contract he would become a partner in the firm, and during the term he would be paid "like a partner." The written agreement did not reflect this promise—the contract read that Holm would be paid based on "net collections" for his services and did not state that at the end of the term he would become a partner. Later, Gateway told Holm that it did not intend to make him a partner. Holm filed a complaint in an Arizona state court against Gateway, alleging breach. Before the trial, Holm filed a motion to reform the contract to express what he had been told. Nottingham did not dispute Holm's account. What is the basis for the reformation of a contract? Is it appropriate in this case? Why or why not? [Holm v. Gateway Anesthesia Associates PLLC, 2018 WL 770503 (Ariz. Div. 1 2018)] (See Equitable Remedies.)

15–8. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Damages. Dr. John Braun conceived a cutting-edge device to treat adolescent scoliosis, a severe deformity of the spine. As consideration for the assignment of his intellectual property in the invention, Medtronic Sofamor Danek, Inc., a medical device manufacturer, offered Braun a higher-than-typical royalty and upfront payment. Medtronic also promised to fund expensive human trials for the device to obtain Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approval. But Medtronic never applied for permission to conduct human clinical studies. Finally, frustrated with the lack of performance on the contract, Braun filed a suit in a federal district court against Medtronic, seeking damages for breach. [Braun v. Medtronic Sofamor Danek, Inc. 2017 WL 6388810 (10th Cir. 2017)] (See Damages.)

1. Why would Medtronic make expensive promises and fail to perform? Is this ethical? Discuss, using the IDDR approach.
2. What would be the measure of damages that Braun seeks? Do the circumstances warrant an award of punitive damages? Explain.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

15–9. Critical Legal Thinking. Review the discussion of the doctrine of mitigation of damages in this chapter. What are some of the advantages and disadvantages of this doctrine? (See Damages.)

15–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Remedies. Frances Morelli agreed to sell Judith Bucklin a house in Rhode Island for $177,000. The sale was supposed to be closed by September 1. The contract included a provision that "if Seller is unable to convey good, clear, insurable, and marketable title, Buyer shall have the option to (a) accept such title as Seller is able to convey without reduction of the Purchase Price, or (b) cancel this Agreement and receive a return of all Deposits."

An examination of the public records revealed that the house did not have marketable title. Bucklin offered Morelli additional time to resolve the problem, and the closing did not occur as scheduled. Morelli decided that "the deal was over" and offered to return the deposit. Bucklin refused and, in mid-October, decided to exercise her option to accept the house without marketable title. She notified Morelli, who did not respond. She then filed a lawsuit against Morelli in a state court. (See Equitable Remedies.)

1. One group will discuss whether Morelli has breached the contract and will decide in whose favor the court should rule.
2. A second group will assume that Morelli did breach the contract and will determine what the appropriate remedy is in this situation.
3. A third group will list some possible reasons why Bucklin wanted to go through with the transaction even when faced with not receiving marketable title.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unit Two—Task-Based Simulation

Alberto Corelli offers to pay $2,500 to purchase a painting titled Moonrise from Tara Shelley, an artist whose works have been causing a stir in the art world. Shelley accepts Corelli's offer. Assuming that the contract has met all of the requirements for a valid contract, answer the following questions.

1. Minors. Corelli is a minor when he purchases the painting. Is the contract void? Is it voidable? What is the difference between these two conditions? A month after his eighteenth birthday, Corelli decides that he would rather have the $2,500 than the painting. He informs Shelley that he is disaffirming the contract and requests that Shelley return the $2,500 to him. When she refuses to do so, Corelli brings a court action to recover the $2,500. What will the court likely decide in this situation? Why?

2. Statute of Frauds. Both parties are adults, the contract is oral, and the painting is still in progress. Corelli pays Shelley the $2,500 in return for her promise to deliver the painting to his home when it is finished. A week later, after Shelley finishes the painting, a visitor to her gallery offers her $3,500 for it. Shelley sells the painting to the visitor and sends Corelli a signed letter explaining that she is "canceling" their contract for the sale of the Moonrise painting. Corelli sues Shelley to enforce the contract. Is the contract enforceable? Explain.

3. Capacity. Both parties are adults, and the contract, which is in writing, states that Corelli will pay Shelley the $2,500 the following day. In the meantime, Shelley allows Corelli to take the painting home with him. The next day, Corelli's son returns the painting to Shelley, stating that he is canceling the contract. He explains that his father has been behaving strangely lately, that he seems to be mentally incompetent at times, and that he clearly was not acting rationally when he bought the painting, which he could not afford. Is the contract enforceable? Discuss fully.

4. Impossibility of Performance. Both parties are adults, and the contract is in writing. The contract calls for Shelley to deliver the painting to Corelli's gallery in two weeks. Corelli has already arranged to sell the painting to a third party for $4,000 (a $1,500 profit), but it must be available for the third party in two weeks, or the sale will not go through. Shelley knows this but does not deliver the painting at the time promised. Corelli sues Shelley for $1,500 in damages. Shelley claims that performance was impossible because her mother fell seriously ill and required Shelley's care. Who will win this lawsuit, and why?

5. Agreement in E-Contracts. Both parties are adults. Shelley, on her website, offers to sell the painting for $2,500. Corelli accepts the offer by clicking on an "I accept" box on the computer screen displaying the offer. Among other terms, the online offer includes a forum-selection clause stating that any disputes under the contract are to be resolved by a court in California, the state in which Shelley lives. After Corelli receives the painting, he notices a smear of paint across the lower corner that was not visible in the digitized image that appeared on Shelley's website. Corelli calls Shelley, tells her about the smear, and says that he wants to cancel the contract and return the painting.

   When Shelley refuses to cooperate, Corelli sues her in a Texas state court, seeking to rescind the contract. Shelley claims that any suit against her must be filed in a California court in accordance with the forum-selection clause. Corelli maintains that the forum-selection clause is unconscionable and should not be enforced. What factors will the court consider in deciding this case? What will the court likely decide? Would it matter whether Corelli read the terms of the online offer before clicking on "I accept"?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unit 3
Commercial Transactions

16 Sales and Lease Contracts
17 Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts
18 Negotiable Instruments
19 International and Space Law
20 Banking
21 Security Interests and Creditors' Rights
22 Bankruptcy

Michal Kalasek/Shutterstock.com

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

16 Sales and Lease Contracts

Focus Questions

The four Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. If a contract involves both goods and services, when does the UCC apply?
2. What happens if an acceptance to a sales contract includes terms additional to or different from those in the offer?
3. When does risk of loss pass in a shipment contract?
4. What law governs contracts for the international sale of goods?

"I am for free commerce with all nations."

George Washington
1732–1799
(First president of the United States, 1789–1797)

When we turn to contracts for the sale and lease of goods, we move away from common law principles and into the area of statutory law. State statutory law governing sales and lease transactions is based on the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which has been adopted as law by all of the states.[1] (See this chapter's Landmark in the Law feature for more information on the UCC.)

The chapter-opening quotation echoes a sentiment that most Americans believe—free commerce will benefit our nation. The UCC seeks to promote commerce. Its goal is to simplify and to streamline commercial transactions. The UCC allows parties to form sales and lease contracts, including those entered into online, without observing the same degree of formality used in forming other types of contracts.

The UCC applies not only to transactions between merchants, but also to sales and leases that consumers enter into with merchants. Suppose that Peter wants an electric car. He would like a Tesla Model S, but a lease on a Tesla typically costs more than $1,000 a month. After some research, Peter is considering the less expensive Chevy Volt. He can lease the Volt for $294 a month for thirty-nine months and only has to make a $500 down payment up front. The Volt is not as sleek as the Tesla, but with the Volt, he has the benefit of an electric car.

Peter goes to the dealership, signs a lease, and is driving his new electric car that same day. At the end of the lease period, Peter simply returns the car to the dealership. The lease agreement between Peter and the dealership is governed by the UCC.

1. Louisiana has not adopted Articles 2 and 2A, however.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Uniform Commercial Code

Of all the attempts to produce a uniform body of laws relating to commercial transactions in the United States, none has been as successful or comprehensive as the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

The Origins of the UCC In the early years of this nation, sales law varied from state to state, and this lack of uniformity complicated the formation of multistate sales contracts. To remedy this situation, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) began drafting the UCC in 1945. The most significant individual involved in the project was its chief editor, Karl N. Llewellyn of the Columbia University Law School. Llewellyn's intellect, continuous efforts, and ability to compromise made the first version of the UCC—completed in 1949—a legal landmark. Over the next several years, the UCC was substantially accepted by almost every state in the nation.

Comprehensive Coverage The concepts of good faith and commercial reasonableness permeate the UCC. It attempts to provide a consistent, integrated framework of rules to deal with all phases ordinarily arising in a commercial sales or lease transaction. For instance, consider the following events, all of which may occur during a single transaction:

1. A contract for the sale or lease of goods is formed and executed. Article 2 and Article 2A of the UCC provide rules governing all aspects of this transaction.
2. The transaction may involve a payment—by check, electronic fund transfer, or other means. Article 3 (on negotiable instruments), Article 4 (on bank deposits and collections), Article 4A (on fund transfers), and Article 5 (on letters of credit) cover this part of the transaction.
3. The transaction may involve a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt that covers goods when they are shipped or stored. Article 7 (on documents of title) deals with this subject.
4. The transaction may involve a demand by the seller or lender for some form of security for the remaining balance owed. Article 9 (on secured transactions) covers this part of the transaction.

Periodic Changes and Updates Various articles and sections of the UCC are periodically changed or supplemented to clarify certain rules or to establish new rules when changes in business customs render the existing UCC provisions inapplicable.

For instance, when leases of goods in the commercial context became important, Article 2A governing leases was added to the UCC. To clarify the rights of parties to commercial fund transfers, particularly electronic fund transfers, Article 4A was issued. Articles 3 and 4, on negotiable instruments and banking relationships, have undergone significant revisions. The NCCUSL also substantially revised Article 9 on secured transactions, and the revised Article 9 has been adopted by all of the states.

Application to Today's World By periodically revising the UCC's articles, the NCCUSL has been able to adapt its provisions to changing business customs and practices. UCC provisions governing sales and lease contracts have also been extended to contracts formed in the online environment.

16–1 The Scope of Articles 2 and 2A

Article 2 of the UCC sets forth the requirements for sales contracts, as well as the duties and obligations of the parties involved in the sales contract. Article 2A covers similar issues for lease contracts. Bear in mind, however, that the parties to sales or lease contracts are free to agree to terms different from those stated in the UCC.

16–1a Article 2—Sales

Article 2 of the UCC governs sales contracts, or contracts for the sale of goods. To facilitate commercial transactions, Article 2 modifies some of the common law contract requirements that were discussed in previous chapters.

Sales Contracts Contracts for the sale of goods.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

To the extent that it has not been modified by the UCC, however, the common law of contracts also applies to sales contracts. In other words, the common law requirements for a valid contract—agreement, consideration, capacity, and legality—are also applicable to sales contracts.

In general, the rule is that when a UCC provision addresses a certain issue, the UCC governs, but when the UCC is silent, the common law governs. The relationship between general contract law and the law governing sales of goods is illustrated in Exhibit 16–1.

In regard to Article 2, keep two points in mind.

1. Article 2 deals with the sale of goods. It does not deal with real property (real estate), services, or intangible property such as stocks and bonds. Thus, if the subject matter of a dispute is goods, the UCC governs. If it is real estate or services, the common law applies.
2. In some situations, the rules can vary depending on whether the buyer or the seller is a merchant.

Sale The passing of title to property from the seller to the buyer for a price.

What Is a Sale? The UCC defines a sale as "the passing of title [evidence of ownership rights] from the seller to the buyer for a price" [UCC 2–106(1)]. The price may be payable in cash (or its equivalent) or in other goods or services. Case Example 16.1 Blasini, Inc., contracted to buy the business assets of the Attic Bar & Grill in Omaha, Nebraska, from Cheran Investments, LLC. Blasini obtained insurance and was making monthly payments on the assets. A fire broke out and damaged the business assets (such as furniture and equipment) involved in the sale. Because the purchase price had not yet been fully paid, a dispute arose concerning who was entitled to the insurance proceeds for the damage.

The insurance company asked a Nebraska state court to resolve the matter. Ultimately, a state appellate court held that the sale of the Attic's business assets involved goods, and thus the agreement was governed by the UCC. Under UCC 2–401, title to the goods passed to Blasini at the time the contract was formed, regardless of whether the entire purchase price had been paid. Therefore, Blasini was entitled to the insurance proceeds.[2]

2. Nautilus Insurance Co. v. Cheran Investments, LLC, 2014 WL 292809 (Neb.Ct.App. 2014).

Exhibit 16–1 The Law Governing Contracts

This exhibit graphically illustrates the relationship between general contract law and statutory law (UCC Articles 2 and 2A) governing contracts for the sale and lease of goods. Sales contracts are not governed exclusively by Article 2 of the UCC but are also governed by general contract law whenever it is relevant and has not been modified by the UCC.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

For a discussion of how states can impose taxes on online sales, see this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.

What Are Goods? To be characterized as a good, the item of property must be tangible, and it must be movable. Tangible property has physical existence—it can be touched or seen. Intangible property—such as corporate stocks and bonds, patents and copyrights, and ordinary contract rights—has only conceptual existence and thus does not come under Article 2. A movable item can be carried from place to place.

Tangible Property Property that has physical existence and can be distinguished by the senses of touch and sight.

Intangible Property Property that cannot be seen or touched but exists only conceptually, such as corporate stocks. Such property is not governed by Article 2 of the UCC.

Goods Associated with Real Estate. Because real estate cannot be carried from place to place, it is excluded from Article 2. Goods associated with real estate often fall within the scope of Article 2, however [UCC 2–107]. For instance, a contract for the sale of minerals, oil, or natural gas is a contract for the sale of goods if severance, or separation, is to be made by the seller. In contrast, a contract for the sale of growing crops or timber to be cut is a contract for the sale of goods regardless of who severs them from the land.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Taxing Web Purchases

In 1992, the United States Supreme Court ruled that an individual state cannot compel an out-of-state business that lacks a substantial physical presence within that state to collect and remit state taxes.[a] Congress has the power to pass legislation requiring out-of-state corporations to collect and remit state sales taxes, but it has not yet done so.

South Dakota Steps Up

Taking matters into its own hands, the South Dakota legislature enacted a statute that required certain out-of-state sellers to collect and remit sales tax "as if the seller had a physical presence in the state." The law applied only to sellers that annually sell more than $100,000 worth of goods or services within the state. South Dakota then sued three large retailers, Wayfair, Inc., Overstock.com, Inc., and Newegg, Inc., for failing to collect taxes as required under this law. The lower courts and the state's highest court ruled in favor of the retailers because of the Supreme Court's precedent requiring physical presence.

The Supreme Court Changes Course

When the case reached the Supreme Court, however, the justices reexamined the earlier decision and—in South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc.[b]— five out of nine of them chose to overrule it. The majority found that the case's focus on physical presence created an "online sales tax loophole" that gave out-of-state businesses an advantage. The justices concluded that in today's online environment, physical presence in a taxing state is not necessary for the seller to have a substantial connection with the state.

Chief Justice John Roberts wrote the dissenting opinion. He noted, "E-Commerce has grown into a significant and vibrant part of our national economy against the backdrop of established rules, including the physical-presence rule. Any alteration to those rules with the potential to disrupt the development of such a critical segment of the economy should be undertaken by Congress."

Such sentiments did little to dampen the enthusiasm of state legislatures eager to take advantage of the new online tax landscape and bolster their revenues. Within eighteen months of the Court's Wayfair decision, forty-three states had changed their laws to collect sales taxes on Internet purchases.

Critical Thinking

Does the Supreme Court's decision in South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc., make it more or less likely that Congress will enact legislation that requires out-of-state corporations to collect and pay taxes to states for a online sales?

a. Quill Corp. v. North Dakota, 504 U.S. 298, 112 S.Ct. 1904, 119 L.Ed.2d 91 (1992).

b. 582 U.S.___, 138 S.Ct. 2080, 201 L.Ed.2d 403 (2018).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Predominant-Factor Test A test courts use to determine whether a contract is primarily for the sale of goods or for the sale of services.

Goods and Services Combined. When contracts involve a combination of goods and services, courts generally use the predominant-factor test to determine whether a contract is primarily for the sale of goods or for the sale of services. If a court decides that a mixed contract is primarily a goods contract, any dispute, even a dispute over the services portion, will be decided under the UCC.

Case Example 16.2 Paper City, a microbrewery, entered into a contract with La Resistance, a beer distribution company, under which La Resistance would purchase beer from Paper City and distribute it to retailers. Almost five years after La Resistance allegedly breached the contract, Paper City sued. Under Article 2 of the UCC, the statute of limitations for disputes involving contracts for the sale of goods is four years. As a result, the trial court dismissed Paper City's lawsuit.

Paper City appealed, claiming that its contract with La Resistance was for services, not goods, and was therefore not covered by Article 2. Paper City argued that, under the contract and according to "industry standards," La Resistance provided services such as managing Paper City's accounts and representing Paper City at trade shows. The only financial transactions on record between the two companies, however, were those in which La Resistance paid Paper City for beer. Accordingly, a Massachusetts appeals court concluded that the sale of goods (beer) was the predominant factor in the two parties' distribution agreement and affirmed the lower's court decision.[3]

Focus Question 1

If a contract involves both goods and services, when does the UCC apply?

Who Is a Merchant? Article 2 governs the sale of goods in general. It applies to sales transactions between all buyers and sellers. In a limited number of instances, though, the UCC presumes that certain special business standards ought to be imposed on merchants because of their relatively high degree of commercial expertise.[4] Such standards do not apply to the casual or inexperienced seller or buyer (consumer).

Section 2–104 sets out three ways in which merchant status can arise:

1. A merchant is a person who deals in goods of the kind involved in the sales contract. Thus, a retailer, a wholesaler, or a manufacturer is a merchant of those goods sold in the business. A merchant for one type of goods is not necessarily a merchant for another type. For instance, a sporting equipment retailer is a merchant when selling tennis rackets but not when selling a used iPad.
2. A merchant is a person who, by occupation, holds himself or herself out as having special knowledge and skill related to the practices or goods involved in the transaction. This broad definition may include banks or universities as merchants.
3. A person who employs a merchant as a broker, agent, or other intermediary has the status of merchant in that transaction. Hence, if an art collector hires a broker to purchase or sell art for her, the collector is considered a merchant in the transaction.

Merchant Under the UCC, a person who deals in goods of the kind involved in the sales contract or who holds herself or himself out as having skill or knowledge peculiar to the practices or goods being purchased or sold.

In summary, a merchant is someone who is in the business of buying or selling particular goods and who possesses or uses an expertise specifically related to those goods. This basic distinction is not always clear-cut. For instance, state courts appear to be split on whether farmers should be considered merchants.

16–1b Article 2A—Leases

Lease Under Article 2A of the UCC, a transfer of the right to possess and use goods for a period of time in exchange for payment.

Leases of personal property (goods such as automobiles and industrial equipment) have become increasingly common. In this context, a lease is a transfer of the right to possess and use goods for a period of time in exchange for payment. Article 2A of the UCC was created to fill the need for uniform guidelines in this area.

3. Paper City Brewery Co., Inc. v. La Resistance, Inc., 124 N.E.3d 159, 95 Mass.App.Ct. 1103 (2019).
4. The provisions that apply only to merchants deal principally with the Statute of Frauds, firm offers, confirmatory memoranda, warranties, and contract modifications. These special rules reflect expedient business practices commonly known to merchants in the commercial setting. They will be discussed later in this chapter.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Article 2A covers any transaction that creates a lease of goods, as well as subleases of goods [UCC 2A–102, 2A–103(1)(k)]. Article 2A is essentially a repetition of Article 2, except that it applies to leases of goods rather than sales of goods and thus varies to reflect differences between sales and lease transactions. (Note that Article 2A does not apply to leases of real property, such as land or buildings.)

Definition of a Lease Agreement Article 2A defines a lease agreement as the bargain between a lessor and a lessee with respect to the lease of goods, as found in their language and as implied by other circumstances, including course of dealing and usage of trade or course of performance [UCC 2A–103(1)(k)]. A lessor is one who transfers the right to the possession and use of goods under a lease [UCC 2A–103(1)(p)]. A lessee is one who acquires the right to the temporary possession and use of goods under a lease [UCC 2A–103(1)(o)]. In other words, the lessee is the party who is leasing the goods from the lessor.

Article 2A applies to all types of leases of goods, including commercial leases and consumer leases. Special rules apply to certain types of leases, however, including consumer leases.

Lease Agreement An agreement in which one party (the lessor) agrees to transfer the right to the possession and use of property to another party (the lessee) in exchange for rental payments.

Lessor A party who transfers the right to the possession and use of goods to another in exchange for rental payments.

Lessee A party who acquires the right to the possession and use of another's goods in exchange for rental payments.

Consumer Leases Under UCC 2A–103(1)(e), a consumer lease involves three elements:

1. A lessor who regularly engages in the business of leasing or selling.
2. A lessee (except an organization) who leases the goods "primarily for a personal, family, or household purpose."
3. Total lease payments that are less than a dollar amount set by state statute.

To ensure special protection for consumers, certain provisions of Article 2A apply only to consumer leases. For instance, one provision states that a consumer may recover attorneys' fees if a court finds that a term in a consumer lease contract is unconscionable [UCC 2A–108(4)(a)].

16–2 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

As mentioned, Article 2 and Article 2A of the UCC modify common law contract rules in several ways. Remember, though, that parties to sales contracts are normally free to establish whatever terms they wish. The UCC comes into play only when the parties have failed to provide in their contract for a contingency that later gives rise to a dispute. The UCC makes this clear time and again by using such phrases as "unless the parties otherwise agree" and "absent a contrary agreement by the parties."

16–2a Offer

In general contract law, the moment a definite offer is met by an unqualified acceptance, a binding contract is formed. In commercial sales transactions, the verbal exchanges, correspondence, and actions of the parties may not reveal exactly when a binding contractual obligation arises. The UCC states that an agreement sufficient to constitute a contract can exist even if the moment of its making is undetermined [UCC 2–204(2), 2A–204(2)].

Open Terms Remember that under the common law of contracts, an offer must be definite enough for the parties (and the courts) to ascertain its essential terms when it is accepted. In contrast, the UCC states that a sales or lease contract will not fail for indefiniteness even if one or more terms are left open as long as both of the following are true:

1. The parties intended to make a contract.
2. There is a reasonably certain basis for the court to grant an appropriate remedy [UCC 2–204(3), 2A–204(3)].

Know This
Under the UCC, it is the actions of the parties that determine whether they intended to form a contract.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The UCC provides numerous open-term provisions (discussed shortly) that can be used to fill the gaps in a contract. Thus, if a dispute occurs, all that is necessary to prove the existence of a contract is an indication (such as a purchase order) that there is a contract. Missing terms can be proved by evidence, or a court can presume that the parties intended whatever is reasonable under the circumstances.

Keep in mind, though, that if too many terms are left open, a court may find that the parties did not intend to form a contract. In addition, the quantity of goods involved must be expressly stated in the contract. If the quantity term is left open, the courts will have no basis for determining a remedy.

In the following case, one company orally agreed to store another company's goods in anticipation of forming a contract, but they did not agree on how long that arrangement would last. The question was whether the open term in their agreement rendered the contract unenforceable.

Case 16.1

Toll Processing Services, LLC v. Kastalon, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 880 F.3d 820 (2018).

Facts Toll Processing Services, a subsidiary of International Steel Services, Inc., was formed to own and operate a pickle line. A pickle line is an operation used in the steel industry to process hot-rolled steel coil through acid tanks to remove rust and impurities. Toll Processing purchased a used pickle line from Ryerson & Sons that had been serviced by Kastalon, Inc., which provides equipment and repairs for the steel industry. Toll Processing was planning to reinstall the used pickle line somewhere else but did not have a facility. Kastalon agreed to move the pickle rolls to its facility and store them, at no cost, until Toll Processing could issue a purchase order to Kastalon to recondition the rolls. Both parties believed that Toll Processing would complete its plan to reinstall the pickle line within months, but they did not discuss the time frame.

Kastalon moved fifty-seven pickle rolls to its facility over a period of three months, but then had no further contact with Toll Processing for two years. Believing that the pickle rolls were of little value and that Toll Processing had gone out of business, Kastalon eventually scrapped the rolls and received $6,300 from a recycler. The following year, Toll Processing contacted Kastalon and requested a price quote for reconditioning the rolls, at which point Kastalon informed Toll that the rolls had been scrapped. Toll sued Kastalon for breach of contract (in addition to several other claims). A district court granted summary judgment in favor of Kastalon, finding that the oral agreement between the parties did not have a specific duration and lacked consideration. Toll Processing appealed.

Issue Did the fact that the parties' oral storage agreement lacked a specific duration render the contract unenforceable?

Decision Yes. A federal appellate court affirmed the judgment of the district court on the breach of contract claim. Although the parties may have attempted to form a contract, they did not reach a mutual understanding that Kastalon would store the pickle rolls for any certain period of time. Because there was no meeting of the minds on this term, the agreement was unenforceable. The appellate court reversed and remanded the district court's decision on Toll Processing's other claims, however.

Reason The court found that Kastalon's expectation that Toll Processing would hire it to repair and refurbish the pickle rolls constituted consideration. Nevertheless, the court concluded that the evidence showed that the parties did not have a mutual understanding that Kastalon would store the rolls indefinitely. The duration of the agreement was to be determined by the date on which Toll Processing issued a purchase order to Kastalon to repair and refurbish the rolls for use in the newly installed pickle line. When Kastalon agreed to store the rolls, Toll Processing did not know when—or even if—it would issue that purchase order. Because the parties' oral storage agreement was not sufficiently definite as to duration, a material term of the oral agreement, it was unenforceable.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the parties admitted that they had agreed Kastalon would store the rolls for up to one year. How would this have affected the court's decision on breach of contract?
- Ethical Was it unethical for Kastalon to scrap the rolls without attempting to contact Toll Processing? Explain.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Open Price Term. If the parties have not agreed on a price, the court will determine a "reasonable price at the time for delivery" [UCC 2–305(1)]. If either the buyer or the seller is to determine the price, the price is to be fixed (set) in good faith [UCC 2–305(2)]. Under the UCC, good faith means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade [UCC 2–103(1)(b)].

Sometimes, the price fails to be fixed through the fault of one of the parties. In that situation, the other party can treat the contract as canceled or fix a reasonable price. Example 16.3 Perez and Merrick enter into a contract for the sale of unfinished doors and agree that Perez will determine the price. Perez refuses to specify the price. Merrick can either treat the contract as canceled or set a reasonable price [UCC 2–305(3)].

Know This

The common law requires that the parties make their terms definite before they have a contract. The UCC applies general commercial standards to make the terms of a contract definite.

Open Payment Term. When parties do not specify payment terms, payment is due at the time and place at which the buyer is to receive the goods [UCC 2–310(a)]. The buyer can tender payment using any commercially normal or acceptable means, such as a check or credit card. If the seller demands payment in cash, the buyer must be given a reasonable time to obtain it [UCC 2–511(2)].

Example 16.4 Max agrees to purchase hay from Wagner's farm. Max leaves his truck and trailer at the farm for the seller to load the hay. Nothing is said about when payment is due, and the parties are unaware of the UCC's rules. Nevertheless, because the parties did not specify when payment was due, UCC 2–310(a) controls, and payment is due at the time Max picks up the hay. Therefore, Wagner can refuse to release the hay (or the vehicles on which the hay is loaded) to Max until he pays for it.

Open Delivery Term. When no delivery terms are specified, the buyer normally takes delivery at the seller's place of business [UCC 2–308(a)]. If the seller has no place of business, the seller's residence is used. When goods are located in some other place and both parties know it, delivery is made there. If the time for shipment or delivery is not clearly specified in the sales contract, the court will infer a "reasonable" time for performance [UCC 2–309(1)].

emholk/iStock/Getty Images

If no time for payment for hay is specified in a sales contract, when is payment due?

Duration of an Ongoing Contract. A single contract might specify successive performances but not indicate how long the parties are required to deal with each other. In this situation, either party may terminate the ongoing contractual relationship. Principles of good faith and sound commercial practice call for reasonable notification before termination, however, to give the other party time to make substitute arrangements [UCC 2–309(2), (3)].

Options and Cooperation Regarding Performance. When the contract contemplates shipment of the goods but does not specify the shipping arrangements, the seller has the right to make these arrangements in good faith, using commercial reasonableness in the situation [UCC 2–311].

When a sales contract omits terms relating to the assortment of goods, the buyer can specify the assortment. Example 16.5 Petry Drugs, Inc., enters an e-contract to purchase one thousand toothbrushes from Marconi's Dental Supply. The toothbrushes come in a variety of colors, but the contract does not specify color. Petry, the buyer, has the right to take six hundred blue toothbrushes and four hundred green ones, if it wishes. Petry, however, must exercise good faith and commercial reasonableness in making its selection [UCC 2–311].

Open Quantity Terms. Normally, if the parties do not specify a quantity, no contract is formed. A court will have no basis for determining a remedy because there is almost no way for a court to determine objectively what is a reasonable quantity of goods for someone to buy. (In contrast, a court can objectively determine a reasonable price for particular goods by looking at the market for like goods.) Nevertheless, the UCC recognizes two exceptions to this rule in requirements and output contracts [UCC 2–306(1)].

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Requirements Contract An agreement in which a buyer agrees to purchase and a seller agrees to sell all or up to a stated amount of what the buyer needs or requires.

1. Requirements Contracts. Requirements contracts are common in the business world and normally are enforceable. In a requirements contract, the buyer agrees to purchase and the seller agrees to sell all or up to a stated amount of what the buyer needs or requires. Example 16.6 Umpqua Cannery forms a contract with Al Garcia. The cannery agrees to purchase from Garcia, and Garcia agrees to sell to the cannery, all of the green beans that the cannery needs or requires during the following summer. There is implicit consideration in this contract because the buyer (the cannery) gives up the right to buy goods (green beans) from any other seller. This forfeited right creates a legal detriment—that is, consideration.

   If, however, the buyer promises to purchase only if the buyer wishes to do so, the promise is illusory (without consideration) and unenforceable by either party. Similarly, if the buyer reserves the right to buy the goods from someone other than the seller, the promise is unenforceable (illusory) as a requirements contract.

Output Contract An agreement in which a seller agrees to sell and a buyer agrees to buy all or up to a stated amount of what the seller produces.

2. Output Contracts. In an output contract, the seller agrees to sell and the buyer agrees to buy all or up to a stated amount of what the seller produces. Example 16.7 Ruth has planted two acres of organic tomatoes. Bella Union, a local restaurant, agrees to buy all of the tomatoes that Ruth produces that year to use at the restaurant. Again, because the seller essentially forfeits the right to sell goods to another buyer, there is implicit consideration in an output contract.

The UCC imposes a good faith limitation on requirements and output contracts. The quantity under such contracts is the amount of requirements or the amount of output that occurs during a normal production year. The actual quantity purchased or sold cannot be unreasonably disproportionate to normal or comparable prior requirements or output [UCC 2–306(1)].

Merchant's Firm Offer Under regular contract principles, an offer can be revoked at any time before acceptance. The major common law exception is an option contract, in which the offeree pays consideration for the offeror's irrevocable promise to keep the offer open for a stated period. The UCC creates a second exception for firm offers made by a merchant to sell, buy, or lease goods.

Firm Offer An offer (by a merchant) that is irrevocable without the necessity of consideration for a stated period of time or, if no definite period is stated, for a reasonable time (neither period to exceed three months).

A firm offer arises when a merchant-offeror gives assurances in a signed writing that the offer will remain open. A merchant's firm offer is irrevocable without the necessity of consideration[5] for the stated period or, if no definite period is stated, a reasonable period (neither period to exceed three months) [UCC 2–205, 2A–205].

Example 16.8 Osaka, a used-car dealer, e-mails Saucedo on January 1, stating, "I have a used 2020 Toyota RAV4 on the lot that I'll sell you for $26,000 any time between now and January 31." This e-mail creates a firm offer, and Osaka will be liable for breach if he sells that Toyota RAV4 to someone other than Saucedo before January 31.

Know This

The UCC provides that acceptance can be made by any means that is reasonable under the circumstances—including prompt shipment of the goods.

16–2b Acceptance

Acceptance of an offer to buy, sell, or lease goods generally can be made in any reasonable manner and by any reasonable means. The UCC permits acceptance of an offer to buy goods "either by a prompt promise to ship or by the prompt or current shipment of conforming or nonconforming goods" [UCC 2–206(1)(b)]. Conforming goods accord with the contract's terms, whereas nonconforming goods do not.

5. If the offeree pays consideration, then an option contract (not a merchant's firm offer) is formed.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Shipment of Nonconforming Goods The prompt shipment of nonconforming goods constitutes both an acceptance, which creates a contract, and a breach of that contract. This rule does not apply if the seller seasonably (within a specified time period or a reasonable amount of time) notifies the buyer that the nonconforming shipment is offered only as an accommodation, or a favor. The notice of accommodation must clearly indicate to the buyer that the shipment does not constitute an acceptance and that, therefore, no contract has been formed.

Seasonably Within a specified time period or, if no period is specified, within a reasonable time.

Example 16.9 McCleary orders one thousand blue smart fitness watches from Halderson. Halderson ships one thousand black smart fitness watches to McCleary. If Halderson notifies McCleary that it has only black watches in stock, and the black watches are being sent as an accommodation, then the shipment is an offer. A contract will be formed only if McCleary accepts the black watches.

If, however, Halderson ships black watches without notifying McCleary that the goods are being sent as an accommodation, the shipment is both an acceptance and a breach of the resulting contract. McCleary can sue Halderson for any appropriate damages.

Alexey Boldin/Shutterstock.com

If a retailer orders blue smart fitness watches, but instead the seller sends black ones, is this an acceptance, a breach, or an accommodation?

Communication of Acceptance Required Under the common law, a unilateral offer can be accepted by beginning performance. The offeree need not notify the offeror of performance unless the offeror would not otherwise know about it. Under the UCC, however, the offeror must be notified within a reasonable time that the offeree has accepted the contract by beginning performance. Otherwise, the offeror can treat the offer as having lapsed before acceptance [UCC 2–206(2), 2A–206(2)].

Additional Terms Recall that under the common law, the mirror image rule requires that the terms of the acceptance exactly match those of the offer.

Example 16.10 Adderson e-mails an offer to sell twenty Samsung Galaxy Tab A 10.1 tablets to Beale. If Beale accepts the offer but changes it to require Tab S5e tablets, then there is no contract if the mirror image rule applies.

To avoid such situations, the UCC dispenses with the mirror image rule. Under the UCC, a contract is formed if the offeree's response indicates a definite acceptance of the offer, even if the acceptance includes terms additional to or different from those contained in the offer [UCC 2–207(1)]. Whether the additional terms become part of the contract depends, in part, on whether the parties are nonmerchants or merchants.

Focus Question 2

What happens if an acceptance to a sales contract includes terms additional to or different from those in the offer?

When One Party or Both Parties Are Nonmerchants. If one (or both) of the parties is a nonmerchant, the contract is formed according to the terms of the original offer submitted by the original offeror and not according to the additional terms of the acceptance [UCC 2–207(2)].

Example 16.11 BettyBloom.com sells plants and gardening supplies online. Employees of a school district in Oregon order $10,000 worth of goods for a school project—without the authority or approval of their employer—from the website. The invoices that accompany the goods contain a forum-selection clause requiring all disputes to be resolved in California.

When the school district fails to pay, BettyBloom.com files suit in a California court. The court is likely to find that the forum-selection clause is unenforceable. The clause is an additional term included in invoices delivered to a nonmerchant buyer (the school district) with the purchased goods. The clause cannot become part of the contract unless the school district expressly agrees to it.

When Both Parties Are Merchants. The drafters of the UCC created a special rule for merchants to avoid the "battle of the forms," which occurs when two merchants exchange separate standard forms containing different contract terms. Under UCC 2–207(2), in contracts between merchants, the additional terms automatically become part of the contract unless one of the following conditions exists:

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1. The original offer expressly limited acceptance to its terms.
2. The new or changed terms materially alter the contract.
3. The offeror objects to the new or changed terms within a reasonable period of time.

When determining whether an alteration is material, courts consider several factors. Generally, if the modification does not involve an unreasonable element of surprise or hardship for the offeror, the court will hold that the modification did not materially alter the contract.

Prior Dealings between Merchants. Courts also consider the parties' prior dealings in determining whether the added terms become part of contracts between merchants. See this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature for an example.

Conditioned on Offeror's Assent. The offeree's expression cannot be construed as an acceptance if it contains additional or different terms that are explicitly conditioned on the offeror's assent to those terms [UCC 2–207(1)]. This rule applies whether or not the parties are merchants. Example 16.12 Philips offers to sell ninety boxes of peaches at a specified price to Foodland. Dawn, Foodland's owner, responds, "I accept your offer on the condition that you give me thirty more boxes." Foodland's response will be construed not as an acceptance but as a counteroffer, which Philips may or may not accept.

Additional Terms between Merchants

B.S. International (BSI), makes costume jewelry. Jayco, Inc., is a wholesaler of costume jewelry. Jayco sent BSI a letter outlining the terms for orders, including the necessary procedure for obtaining credit for items that customers rejected. The letter stated, "By signing below, you agree to the terms." Steven Brown, BSI's owner, signed the letter and returned it. For six years, BSI made jewelry for Jayco, which resold it. Items rejected by customers were sent back to Jayco but never returned to BSI.

BSI eventually filed a suit against Jayco, claiming $41,000 for the unreturned items. BSI showed the court a copy of Jayco's terms. Across the bottom had been typed a "P.S." (postscript) requiring the return of rejected merchandise. Was this P.S. part of the contract?

Analysis: Under the common law, variations in terms between the offer and the acceptance violate the mirror image rule, which requires that the terms of an acceptance exactly mirror the terms of the offer. The UCC dispenses with this rule. Under the UCC, a contract is formed if the offeree makes a definite expression of acceptance even though the terms of the acceptance modify or add to the terms of the offer.

When both parties to a sales contract are merchants, the additional terms become part of their contract unless (1) the original offer expressly requires acceptance of its terms, (2) the new or changed terms materially alter the contract, or (3) the offeror rejects the new or changed terms within a reasonable time.

In this situation, the original offer stated, "By signing below, you agree to the terms." This statement could be construed to expressly require acceptance of the terms to make the offer a binding contract. The contract stated that Jayco was to receive credit for any rejected merchandise. Nothing indicated that the merchandise would be returned to BSI.

Result and Reasoning: When Brown (BSI's owner and the offeree) signed Jayco's (the offeror's) letter, it indicated BSI's agreement to the terms. Thus, BSI made a definite expression of acceptance. The practice of the parties—for six years rejected items were not returned—supports the conclusion that their contract did not contemplate the return of those items. The P.S. could be interpreted as materially altering the contract. Therefore, the P.S. is not part of the contract, and a court should dismiss BSI's lawsuit.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Additional Terms May Be Stricken. The UCC provides yet another option for dealing with conflicting terms in the parties' writings. Section 2–207(3) states that conduct by both parties that recognizes the existence of a contract is sufficient to establish a contract for the sale of goods. This is so even if the parties' writings contain different terms. In this situation, "the terms of the particular contract will consist of those terms on which the writings of the parties agree, together with any supplementary terms incorporated under any other provisions of this Act."

In a dispute over contract terms, this provision allows a court simply to strike from the contract those terms on which the parties do not agree. Example 16.13 SMT Marketing orders goods over the phone from Brigg Sales, Inc., which ships the goods with an acknowledgment form (confirming the order) to SMT. SMT accepts and pays for the goods. The parties' writings do not establish a contract, but there is no question that a contract exists. If a dispute arises over the terms, such as the extent of any warranties, UCC 2–207(3) provides the governing rule. ■

TatyanaMishchenko/iStock/Getty Images

Should prior dealings between a costume jewelry manufacturer and a buyer be considered if a contract dispute arises over additional terms? Why or why not?

As noted previously, the fact that a merchant's acceptance frequently contains terms that add to or even conflict with those of the offer is often referred to as the "battle of the forms." Although the UCC tries to eliminate this battle, the problem of differing contract terms still arises in commercial settings, particularly when standard forms for placing and confirming orders are used.

16–2c Consideration

The common law rule that a contract requires consideration also applies to sales and lease contracts. Unlike the common law, however, the UCC does not require a contract modification to be supported by new consideration. An agreement modifying a contract for the sale or lease of goods "needs no consideration to be binding" [UCC 2–209(1), 2A–208(1)]. Of course, a contract modification must be sought in good faith [UCC 1–304].

In some situations, an agreement to modify a sales or lease contract without consideration must be in writing to be enforceable. If the contract itself prohibits any changes to the contract unless they are in a signed writing, for instance, then only those changes agreed to in a signed writing are enforceable.

Sometimes, when a consumer (nonmerchant buyer) is dealing with a merchant, the merchant supplies the form that contains a clause prohibiting oral modification. In those situations, the consumer must sign a separate acknowledgment of the clause for it to be enforceable [UCC 2–209(2), 2A–208(2)]. Also, any modification that brings a sales contract under Article 2's Statute of Frauds provision usually must be in writing to be enforceable.

16–2d The Statute of Frauds

The UCC contains Statute of Frauds provisions covering sales and lease contracts. Under these provisions, sales contracts for goods priced at $500 or more and lease contracts requiring payments of $1,000 or more must be in writing to be enforceable [UCC 2–201(1), 2A–201(1)]. E-mails and other electronic records satisfy the writing requirement.

Know This

It has been proposed that the UCC be revised to eliminate the Statute of Frauds.

Sufficiency of the Writing A writing will be sufficient to satisfy the UCC's Statute of Frauds as long as it meets the following requirements:

1. It indicates that the parties intended to form a contract.
2. It is signed by the party (or agent of the party) against whom enforcement is sought. (Remember that a typed name can qualify as a signature.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The contract normally will not be enforceable beyond the quantity of goods shown in the writing. All other terms can be proved in court by oral testimony. For leases, the writing or record must reasonably identify and describe the goods leased and the lease term.

Special Rules for Contracts between Merchants Once again, the UCC provides a special rule for merchants in sales transactions. (There is no corresponding rule that applies to leases under Article 2A.) Merchants can satisfy the Statute of Frauds if, after the parties have agreed orally, one of the merchants sends a signed written confirmation to the other merchant within a reasonable time.

The communication must indicate the terms of the agreement, and the merchant receiving the confirmation must have reason to know of its contents. Unless the merchant who receives the confirmation gives written notice of objection to its contents within ten days after receipt, the writing or record is sufficient, even though that merchant has not signed anything [UCC 2–201(2)].

Example 16.14 Alfonso is a merchant-buyer in Cleveland. He contracts over the telephone to purchase $6,000 worth of spare aircraft parts from Maria, a merchant-seller in New York City. Two days later, Maria e-mails a signed confirmation detailing the terms of the oral contract, and Alfonso receives it. Alfonso does not notify Maria in writing of any objection to the contents of the confirmation within ten days of receipt. Therefore, Alfonso cannot raise the Statute of Frauds as a defense against the enforcement of the oral contract.

Exceptions In addition to the special rules for merchants, the UCC defines three exceptions to the writing requirements of the Statute of Frauds. An oral contract for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more—or the lease of goods involving total payments of $1,000 or more—will be enforceable despite the absence of a writing in the circumstances described next [UCC 2–201(3), 2A–201(4)].

Specially Manufactured Goods. An oral contract for the sale or lease of custom-made goods will be enforceable if the following conditions exist:

1. The goods are specially manufactured for a particular buyer or specially manufactured or obtained for a particular lessee.
2. The goods are not suitable for resale or lease to others in the ordinary course of the seller's or lessor's business.
3. The seller or lessor has substantially started to manufacture the goods or has made commitments for the manufacture or procurement of the goods.

Under these conditions, once the seller or lessor has taken action, the buyer or lessee cannot repudiate the agreement claiming the Statute of Frauds as a defense. Example 16.15 Womach orders custom window treatments from Hunter Douglas to use at her day spa business. The contract is oral, and the price is $6,000. When Hunter Douglas manufactures the window coverings and tenders delivery to Womach, she refuses to pay for them, even though the job is completed on time. Womach claims that she is not liable because the contract is oral. If the unique style, size, and color of the window treatments make it improbable that Hunter Douglas can find another buyer, Womach is liable to Hunter Douglas.

Admissions. An oral contract for the sale or lease of goods is enforceable if the party against whom enforcement of the contract is sought admits in pleadings, testimony, or other court proceedings that a contract for sale or lease was made. In this situation, the contract will be enforceable even though it was oral, but enforceability will be limited to the quantity of goods admitted.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Example 16.16 Gerald, a farmer, agrees by phone to sell his crops to Great Plains Cooperative. The parties reach two oral agreements for the delivery of corn. Gerald then reneges on the deal and sells his corn to another dealer. Great Plains pays a higher price to buy corn elsewhere and then sues Gerald for breach of contract. In court, Gerald acknowledges the first oral agreement but not the second. The court will apply the admissions exception to enforce the agreement admitted by Gerald, but the other agreement will be unenforceable under this exception.

Partial Performance. An oral contract for the sale or lease of goods is enforceable if payment has been made and accepted or goods have been received and accepted. This is the "partial performance" exception. The oral contract will be enforced at least to the extent that performance actually took place.

Example 16.17 Jamal orally contracts to lease to Opus Enterprises one thousand chairs at $2 each to be used during a one-day concert. Before delivery, Opus sends Jamal a check for $1,000, which Jamal cashes. Later, when Jamal attempts to deliver the chairs, Opus refuses delivery, claiming the Statute of Frauds as a defense, and demands the return of its $1,000.

Under the UCC's partial performance rule, Jamal can enforce the oral contract by tender of delivery of five hundred chairs for the $1,000 accepted. Similarly, if Opus had made no payment but had accepted the delivery of five hundred chairs from Jamal, the oral contract would have been enforceable against Opus for $1,000, the lease payment due for the five hundred chairs delivered.

These exceptions and other ways in which sales law differs from general contract law are summarized in Exhibit 16–2.

ghornephoto/E+/Getty Images

Can two oral agreements for delivery of corn be enforced if the seller admits that only the first agreement occurred?

Exhibit 16–2 Major Differences between Contract Law and Sales Law

TOPIC	CONTRACT LAW	SALES LAW
Contract Terms	The contract must contain all material terms.	Open terms are acceptable, if the parties intended to form a contract, but the quantity term normally must be specified, and the contract is not enforceable beyond the quantity term.
Acceptance	Mirror image rule applies. If additional terms are added in acceptance, a counteroffer is created.	Additional terms will not negate acceptance unless acceptance is made expressly conditional on assent to the additional terms.
Contract Modification	Modification requires consideration.	Modification does not require consideration.
Irrevocable Offers	Option contracts (with consideration) are irrevocable.	Merchants' firm offers (without consideration) are irrevocable.
Statute of Frauds Requirements	All material terms must be included in the writing.	Writing is required only for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more, but the contract is not enforceable beyond the quantity specified. Merchants can satisfy the requirement by a confirmatory memorandum evidencing their agreement. Exceptions exist for (1) specially manufactured goods, (2) admissions, and (3) partial performance.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

16–2e Parol Evidence

Recall that parol evidence consists of evidence outside the contract, such as evidence of the parties' prior negotiations, prior agreements, or oral agreements made at the time of contract formation. When a contract completely sets forth all the terms and conditions agreed to by the parties and is intended as a final statement of their agreement, it is considered fully integrated. The terms of a fully integrated contract cannot be contradicted by evidence outside the contract.

If, however, the writing (or record) contains some of the terms the parties agreed on but not others, the contract is not fully integrated. In this situation, a court may allow evidence of consistent additional terms to explain or supplement the terms stated in the contract. The court may also allow the parties to submit evidence of course of dealing, usage of trade, or course of performance [UCC 2–202, 2A–202]. A court will not under any circumstances allow the parties to submit evidence that contradicts the contract's stated terms, however. (This is also the rule under the common law.)

Course of Dealing and Usage of Trade Under the UCC, the meaning of any agreement, evidenced by the language of the parties and by their actions, must be interpreted in light of commercial practices and other surrounding circumstances. In interpreting a commercial agreement, the court will assume that the course of prior dealing between the parties and the usage of trade were taken into account when the agreement was phrased.

Course of Dealing Prior conduct between the parties to a contract that establishes a common basis for their understanding.

Course of Dealing. A course of dealing is a sequence of actions and communications between the parties to a particular transaction that establishes a common basis for their understanding [UCC 1–303(b)]. A course of dealing is restricted to the sequence of conduct between the parties in their transactions prior to the agreement. Under the UCC, a course of dealing between the parties is relevant in ascertaining the meaning of the parties' agreement. It "may give particular meaning to specific terms of the agreement, and may supplement or qualify the terms of the agreement" [UCC 1–303(d)].

Usage of Trade Any practice or method of dealing that is so regularly observed in a place, vocation, or trade that parties justifiably expect it will be observed in their transaction.

Usage of Trade. Any practice or method of dealing that is so regularly observed in a place, vocation, or trade as to justify an expectation by the parties that it will be observed in their transaction is a usage of trade [UCC 1–303(c)].

Example 16.18 United Loans, Inc., hires Fleet Title Review to search the public records for prior claims on potential borrowers' assets. Fleet's invoice states, "Liability limited to amount of fee." In the search industry, liability limits are common. After conducting many searches for United, Fleet reports that there are no claims with respect to Main Street Autos. United loans $100,000 to Main, with payment guaranteed by Main's assets.

When Main defaults on the loan, United learns that another lender has priority to Main's assets under a previous claim. If United sues Fleet Title for breach of contract, Fleet's liability will normally be limited to the amount of its fee. The statement in the invoice was part of the contract between United and Fleet Title, according to the usage of trade in the industry and the parties' course of dealing. ■

Course of Performance The conduct that occurs under the terms of a particular agreement, which indicates what the parties to that agreement intended the agreement to mean.

Course of Performance A course of performance is the conduct that occurs under the terms of a particular agreement [UCC 1–303(a)]. Presumably, the parties themselves know best what they meant by their words. Thus, the course of performance actually carried out under their agreement is the best indication of what they meant [UCC 2–208(1), 2A–207(1)].

Example 16.19 Janson's Lumber Company contracts with Lopez to sell Lopez a specified number of two-by-fours. The lumber in fact does not measure exactly 2 inches by 4 inches but rather 1⅞ inches by 3¾ inches. Janson's agrees to deliver the lumber in five deliveries, and Lopez, without objection, accepts the lumber in the first three deliveries. On the fourth delivery, however, Lopez objects that the two-by-fours do not measure 2 inches by 4 inches.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The course of performance in this transaction—that is, Lopez's acceptance of three deliveries without objection under the agreement—is relevant in determining that here the term two-by-four actually means "1⅞ by 3¾." Janson's can also prove that two-by-fours need not be exactly 2 inches by 4 inches by applying course of prior dealing, usage of trade, or both. Janson's can, for example, show that in previous transactions, Lopez took 1⅞-by-3¾-inch lumber without objection. In addition, Janson's can show that in the lumber trade, two-by-fours are commonly 1⅞ inches by 3¾ inches.

bilnoll/E+/Getty Images

Do two-by-fours actually measure 2 inches by 4 inches?

Rules of Construction The UCC provides rules of construction for interpreting contracts. Express terms, course of performance, course of dealing, and usage of trade are to be construed to be consistent with each other whenever reasonable. When such a construction is unreasonable, however, the UCC establishes the following order of priority [UCC 1–303(e), 2–208(2), 2A–207(2)]:

1. Express terms.
2. Course of performance.
3. Course of dealing.
4. Usage of trade.

16–2f Unconscionability

As previously discussed, an unconscionable contract is one that is so unfair and one-sided that it would be unreasonable to enforce it. Under the UCC, if a court deems a contract or a clause to have been unconscionable at the time it was made, the court can do any of the following [UCC 2–302, 2A–108]:

1. Refuse to enforce the contract.
2. Enforce the remainder of the contract without the unconscionable part.
3. Limit the application of the unconscionable term to avoid an unconscionable result.

The following Classic Case illustrates an early application of the UCC's unconscionability provisions.

Classic Case 16.2

Jones v. Star Credit Corp.

Supreme Court of New York, Nassau County 59 Misc.2d 189, 298 N.Y.S.2d 264 (1969).

Facts The Joneses, the plaintiffs, agreed to purchase a freezer for $900 as the result of a salesperson's visit to their home. Tax and financing charges raised the total price to $1,234.80. After making payments totaling $619.88, the plaintiffs brought a suit in a New York state court to have the purchase contract declared unconscionable under the UCC. At trial, the freezer was found to have a maximum retail value of approximately $300.

Issue Could this contract be denied enforcement on the ground of unconscionability?

Decision Yes. The court held that the contract was not enforceable and reformed the contract so that the Joneses were not required to make further payments on the freezer.

Reason The court relied on UCC 2–302(1), which states that if "the court as a matter of law finds the contract or any clause of the contract to have been unconscionable at the time it was made, the court may . . . so limit the application of any unconscionable clause as to avoid any unconscionable result."

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The court then considered the disparity between the $900 purchase price and the $300 retail value, as well as the fact that the credit charges alone exceeded the retail value. These excessive charges were exacted despite the seller's knowledge of the plaintiffs' limited resources. The court reformed the contract so that the plaintiffs' payments, amounting to more than $600, were regarded as payment in full.

Critical Thinking

- Social Why would the seller's knowledge of the buyers' limited resources support a finding of unconscionability?
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This early case illustrates the approach that many courts today take when deciding whether a sales contract is unconscionable—an approach that focuses on excessive price and unequal bargaining power.

16–3 Title and Risk of Loss

Before the creation of the UCC, title—the right of ownership—was the central concept in sales law and controlled all issues of rights and remedies of the parties to a sales contract. In some situations, title is still relevant under the UCC, and the UCC has special rules for determining who has title. (These rules do not apply to leased goods, obviously, because title remains with the lessor, or owner, of the goods.) In most situations, however, the UCC focuses less on title than on the concepts of identification, risk of loss, and insurable interest.

16–3a Identification

Identification In a sale of goods, the express designation of the goods provided for in the contract.

Before any interest in specific goods can pass from the seller or lessor to the buyer or lessee, the goods must exist and must be identified as the specific goods designated in the contract. Identification takes place when specific goods are designated as the subject matter of a sales or lease contract.

Identification allows title to pass from the seller to the buyer. (Remember, though, that title to leased goods does not pass to the lessee.) In addition, it allows risk of loss to pass from the seller or lessor to the buyer or lessee. This is important because it gives the buyer or lessee the right to insure the goods and the right to recover from third parties who damage the goods.

For goods already in existence, the parties can agree in their contract on when identification will take place. If the parties do not so specify, the UCC provisions discussed here determine when identification takes place [UCC 2–501(1), 2A–217].

Existing Goods If the contract calls for the sale or lease of specific goods that are already in existence, identification takes place at the time the contract is made. Example 16.20 Litco Company contracts to lease a fleet of five cars designated by their vehicle identification numbers (VINs). Because the cars are identified by their VINs, identification has taken place, and Litco acquires an insurable interest in the cars at the time of contracting.

Future Goods Any goods that are not in existence at the time of contracting are known as future goods. Various rules apply to identification of future goods, depending on the goods.

- If a sale or lease involves unborn animals to be born within twelve months after contracting, identification takes place when the animals are conceived.
- If a sale involves crops that are to be harvested within twelve months (or the next harvest season occurring after contracting, whichever is longer), identification takes place when the crops are planted. Otherwise, identification takes place when the crops begin to grow.
- In a sale or lease of any other future goods, identification occurs when the goods are shipped, marked, or otherwise designated by the seller or lessor as the goods to which the contract refers.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Goods That Are Part of a Larger Mass As a general rule, goods that are part of a larger mass are identified when the goods are marked, shipped, or somehow designated by the seller or lessor as the particular goods that are the subject of the contract. Example 16.21 Carlos orders 10,000 pairs of men's jeans from a lot that contains 90,000 articles of clothing for men, women, and children. Until the seller separates the 10,000 pairs of men's jeans from the other items, title and risk of loss remain with the seller.

A common exception to this rule involves fungible goods. Fungible goods are goods that are alike naturally, by agreement, or by trade usage. Typical examples include specific grades or types of wheat, petroleum, and cooking oil, which usually are stored in large containers. If the owners of these goods hold title as tenants in common (owners with undivided shares of the whole), a seller-owner can pass title and risk of loss to the buyer without actually separating the goods. The buyer replaces the seller as an owner in common [UCC 2–105(4)]. It is important to emphasize that what makes goods fungible is not simply that they are alike, but that they are of an identical grade or type.

Fungible Goods Goods that are alike by physical nature, agreement, or trade usage.

16–3b Passage of Title

Once goods are identified, the provisions of UCC 2–401 apply to the passage of title. Parties can expressly agree when and how title will pass. Throughout UCC 2–401, the words "unless otherwise explicitly agreed" appear, meaning that any explicit understanding between the buyer and the seller determines when title passes. Without an explicit agreement to the contrary, title passes to the buyer at the time and the place the seller performs by delivering the goods [UCC 2–401(2)]. For instance, if a person buys cattle at a livestock auction, title will pass to the buyer on physical delivery of the cattle (unless, of course, the parties agree otherwise).

Spotlight Case Example 16.22 Timothy Allen contracted with Indy Route 66 Cycles, Inc., to have a motorcycle custom built for him. Indy built the motorcycle and issued a "Certificate of Origin." Two years later, federal law enforcement officers arrested Allen on drug charges and seized his home and other property. The officers also seized the Indy-made motorcycle from the garage of the home of Allen's sister, Tena. Indy filed a claim against the government, arguing that it owned the motorcycle because it still possessed the "Certificate of Origin."

The court applied UCC Section 2–401(2) and ruled in favor of the government. Testimony by Indy's former vice president was "inconclusive" but implied that Indy had delivered the motorcycle to Allen. Because Indy had given up possession of the cycle to Allen, this was sufficient to pass title even though Indy had kept a "Certificate of Origin."[6]

In the future, the delivery of goods may sometimes be accomplished by drones. This chapter's Managerial Strategy feature discusses the use of drones in commerce.

Shipment Contract A contract for the sale of goods in which the seller is required or authorized to ship the goods by carrier. The seller assumes liability for any losses or damage to the goods until they are delivered to the carrier.

Shipment and Destination Contracts Unless otherwise agreed, delivery arrangements can determine when title passes from the seller to the buyer. In a shipment contract, the seller is required or authorized to ship goods by carrier, such as a trucking company. Under a shipment contract, the seller is required only to deliver conforming goods into the hands of a carrier, and title passes to the buyer at the time and place of shipment [UCC 2–401(2)(a)]. Generally, all contracts are assumed to be shipment contracts if nothing to the contrary is stated in the contract.

Hirkophoto/Stock Unreleased/Getty Images

When does title pass to the buyer of a motorcycle?

6. United States v. 2007 Custom Motorcycle, 2011 WL 232331 (D.Ariz. 2011).

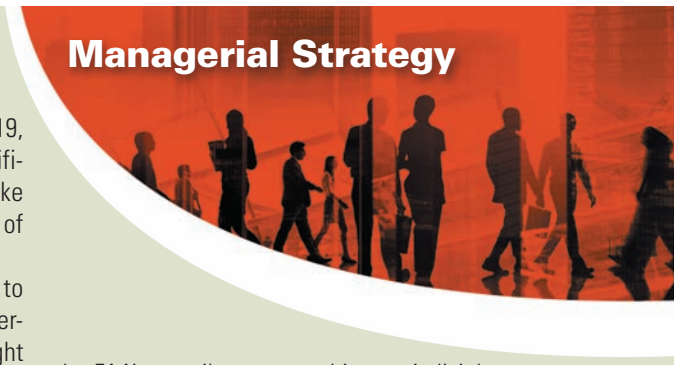
Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.



Destination Contract A contract for the sale of goods in which the seller is required or authorized to ship the goods by carrier and tender delivery of the goods at a particular destination. The seller assumes liability for any losses or damage to the goods until they are tendered at the destination specified in the contract.

Document of Title A paper exchanged in the regular course of business that evidences the right to possession of goods (for example, a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt).

In a destination contract, the seller is required to deliver the goods to a particular destination, usually directly to the buyer, but sometimes to another party designated by the buyer. Title passes to the buyer when the goods are tendered at that destination [UCC 2–401(2) (b)]. Tender of delivery occurs when the seller places or holds conforming goods at the buyer's disposal (with any necessary notice), enabling the buyer to take possession [UCC 2–503(1)].

Delivery without Movement of the Goods When the sales contract does not call for the seller to ship or deliver the goods (when the buyer is to pick up the goods), the passage of title depends on whether the seller must deliver a document of title, such as a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt, to the buyer. A bill of lading is a receipt for goods that is signed by a carrier and serves as a contract for the transport of the goods. A warehouse receipt is a receipt issued by a warehouser for goods stored in a warehouse.

Commercial Use of Drones

The United States lags behind many other nations when it comes to the commercial use of small, pilotless aerial vehicles known as drones. These devices can be used for a variety of tasks, such as taking real estate videos and making airborne railroad track inspections, but their greatest business potential seems to lie in package delivery.

Not surprisingly, Amazon has been a leader in this field. As part of its Prime Air program, the company is making thirty-minute drone deliveries in England and has conducted numerous tests in controlled settings in the United States. Google's Wing drone delivery service operates in Australia and Finland, and UPS has extensively tested drone deliveries on American medical campuses.

The Federal Aviation Administration Rules

Efforts by Amazon, Google, UPS, and other American companies to provide drone delivery services to consumers have been held up by Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) regulations. The FAA has authority to regulate all unmanned aircraft systems (UASs). It first proposed rules on commercial drone use in 2015, and these rules were not finalized until 2016.[a] The FAA did not designate a drone company as a certified air carrier until 2019, when Google's Wing was given that classification, allowing the company to make short-distance deliveries in the small town of Christiansburg, Virginia.

The FAA's rules require operators to apply for a license to use drones commercially. Drone flights are limited to daylight hours, and drones are not allowed to go above four hundred feet or fly faster than one hundred miles per hour. The rules also require that licensed drone operators maintain a continuous visual line of sight with the drones during operation. The latest challenge for the FAA is to approve a drone identification and tracking system. Without these safeguards, law enforcement agencies have resisted widespread commercial applications of the technology, worrying that unidentified drones will be used for crimes such as terrorism and drug smuggling.

Court Actions

The FAA has attempted to fine other-than-recreational users of drones. One case involved Texas EquuSearch, a group that searches for missing persons. The organization requested an emergency injunction after receiving an e-mail from an FAA employee indicating that its drone use was illegal. A federal appellate court in the District of Columbia refused to grant an injunction. The court found that the FAA's e-mail was not subject to judicial review.[b]

In another relevant case, Michael Singer sued to block the city of Newton, Massachusetts, from enforcing a local drone ordinance. Singer, a physician who hopes to deliver medical supplies via drone, claimed that local businesses should not have to comply with both Newton's rules and existing FAA regulations. A federal court struck down the parts of Newton's ordinance that mirrored federal law but refused to limit local governments' ability to co-regulate drone use more generally, when appropriate.[c]

Business Questions

1. What benefits can delivery by commercial drone provide to consumers?

2. Why might the United States be slow to adopt commercial drone delivery in comparison with some other nations?

a. 14 C.F.R. Part 107.

b. Texas EquuSearch Mounted Search and Recovery Team, RP Search Services, Inc., v. Federal Aviation Administration, 2014 WL 2860332 (D.C. Cir. 2014).

c. Singer v. City of Newton, 284 F.Supp.3d 125 (D.Mass 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

When a document of title is required, title passes to the buyer when and where the document is delivered. Thus, if the goods are stored in a warehouse, title passes to the buyer when the appropriate documents are delivered to the buyer. The goods never move. In fact, the buyer can choose to leave the goods at the same warehouse for a period of time, and the buyer's title to those goods will be unaffected.

When no documents of title are required and delivery is made without moving the goods, title passes at the time and place the sales contract is made, if the goods have already been identified. If the goods have not been identified, title does not pass until identification occurs [UCC 2–401(3)].

Example 16.23 Greg sells lumber to Bodan. They agree that Bodan will pick up the lumber at the lumberyard. If the lumber has been identified (segregated, marked, or in any other way distinguished from all other lumber), title passes to Bodan when the contract is signed. If the lumber is still in large storage bins at the lumberyard, title does not pass to Bodan until the particular pieces of lumber to be sold under this contract are identified.

16–3c Risk of Loss

Under the UCC, risk of loss does not necessarily pass with title. When risk of loss passes from a seller or lessor to a buyer or lessee is generally determined by the contract between the parties. Sometimes, the contract states expressly when the risk of loss passes. At other times, it does not, and a court must interpret the performance and delivery terms of the contract to determine whether the risk has passed.

ProjectB/iStock/Getty Images

When does the risk of loss pass to the buyer in the sale of a horse, when the horse is paid for in monthly installments?

Like risk of loss, the risk of liability that arises from the goods does not necessarily require the passage of title. In addition, as with risk of loss, when this risk passes from a seller to a buyer is generally determined by the contract between the parties. Case Example 16.24 Tammy Herring contracted to buy a horse named Toby from Stacy and Gregory Bowman, who owned Summit Stables in Washington. The contract required Herring to make monthly payments until she paid $2,200 in total for Toby. Additionally, Herring agreed to pay Toby's monthly boarding fee at Summit Stables until the purchase price balance was paid. The Bowmans were to provide Toby's registration papers to Herring only when she had paid in full.

One day, another stable boarder, Diana Person, was injured when she was thrown from a buggy drawn by Toby and driven by Herring's daughter. Person sued the Bowmans to recover for her injuries, but the court held that Herring (not the Bowmans) owned Toby at the time of the accident. Herring argued that she did not own the horse because she did not yet have its registration papers, but the court found that the contract clearly showed that Herring owned Toby. Therefore, the Bowmans were not liable for the injuries that Toby caused.[7]

Delivery with Movement of the Goods—Carrier Cases When the contract involves movement of the goods through a common carrier but does not specify when risk of loss passes, the courts first look for specific delivery terms in the contract. The terms that have traditionally been used in contracts within the United States are listed and defined in Exhibit 16–3. Unless the parties agree otherwise, these terms determine which party will pay the costs of delivering the goods and who bears the risk of loss. If the contract does not include these terms, then the courts must decide whether the contract is a shipment or a destination contract.

7. Person v. Bowman, 173 Wash.App. 1024 (2013).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 16–3 Contract Terms—Definitions

These contract terms help to determine which party will bear the costs of delivery and when risk of loss will pass from the seller to the buyer.

TERM	DEFINITION
F.O.B. (free on board)	Indicates that the selling price of goods includes transportation costs to the specific F.O.B. place named in the contract. The seller pays the expenses and carries the risk of loss to the F.O.B. place named [UCC 2–319(1)]. If the named place is the place from which the goods are shipped (for example, the seller's city or place of business), the contract is a shipment contract. If the named place is the place to which the goods are to be shipped (for example, the buyer's city or place of business), the contract is a destination contract.
F.A.S. (free alongside ship)	Requires that the seller, at the seller's own expense and risk, deliver the goods alongside the carrier before risk passes to the buyer [UCC 2–319(2)]. An F.A.S. contract is essentially an F.O.B. contract for ships.
C.I.F. or C.&F. (cost, insurance, and freight, or just cost and freight)	Requires, among other things, that the seller "put the goods in the possession of a carrier" before risk passes to the buyer [UCC 2–320(2)]. (These are basically pricing terms, and the contracts remain shipment contracts, not destination contracts.)
Delivery ex-ship (delivery from the carrying vessel)	Means that risk of loss does not pass to the buyer until the goods are properly unloaded from the ship or other carrier [UCC 2–322].

Focus Question 3

When does risk of loss pass in a shipment contract?

Shipment Contracts. In a shipment contract, the seller or lessor is required or authorized to ship goods by carrier but is not required to deliver them to a particular final destination. The risk of loss in a shipment contract passes to the buyer or lessee when the goods are delivered to the carrier [UCC 2–319(1)(a), 2–509(1)(a), 2A–219(2)(a)].

Example 16.25 Pitman, a seller in Texas, sells five hundred cases of grapefruit to a buyer in New York, F.O.B. Houston (free on board in Houston—see Exhibit 16–3). The contract authorizes shipment by carrier. It does not require that the seller tender the grapefruit in New York. Risk passes to the buyer when conforming goods are properly placed in the possession of the carrier in Houston. If the goods are damaged in transit, the loss is the buyer's. (Actually, buyers have recourse against carriers, subject to certain limitations, and buyers usually insure the goods from the time the goods leave the seller.)

Destination Contracts. In a destination contract, the risk of loss passes to the buyer or lessee when the goods are tendered to the buyer or lessee at the specified destination [UCC 2–319(1) (b), 2–509(1)(b), 2A–219(2)(b)]. In Example 16.25, if the contract had been F.O.B. New York, the risk of loss during transit to New York would have been the seller's. Risk of loss would not have passed to the buyer until the carrier tendered the grapefruit to the buyer in New York.

The following case involves the interpretation and application of two stated contract conditions for passing the risk of loss from a carrier to the buyer—delivery of the goods to the buyer and the buyer's signature on a bill of lading.

Case 16.3

Total Quality Logistics, LLC v. Balance Transportation, LLC

Court of Appeals of Ohio, Twelfth District, Clermont County, 2020 -Ohio- 620, __ Ohio App.3d __, __ N.E.3d __, 2020 WL 877795 (2020).

Facts C&C North America, Inc., paid Total Quality Logistics, LLC (TQL), a freight broker, to arrange for the shipment of a truckload of granite to Sun City Granite. Balance Transportation, LLC, signed an agreement with TQL to transport the load.

Balance's driver, Adrian Bernal, delivered the granite in good condition to Sun City, whose representative signed, dated, and returned the bill of lading accompanying the shipment. As a Sun City employee unloaded the first block of granite, other slabs fell off the truck and were damaged.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

TQL paid C&C for the cost of the damage and filed a complaint in an Ohio state court against Balance, seeking to recover the amount on a claim of breach of its contract with TQL. The court issued a summary judgment in Balance's favor. TQL appealed, asserting that the judgment should have been in its favor.

Issue Did the damage to the goods occur after the risk of loss passed from the carrier to the buyer?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. "The loss of cargo occurred after the risk of loss had shifted from Balance. This finding is dispositive [definitively resolves the issue] as to all claims raised by TQL."

Reason The agreement between TQL and Balance provided that the carrier's responsibility for the condition of the freight would end with its delivery and the buyer's signature on a bill of lading. On appeal, TQL argued that, although Sun City's representative had signed the bill of lading, Balance had not yet successfully delivered the cargo. Balance's driver, Bernal, still had to move his truck, park it, and unstrap the granite.

The court acknowledged that the Sun City representative had signed and dated the bill of lading, and returned it to Bernal, before instructing him to move his truck and park it. After doing as he was told, Bernal unstrapped the load from the trailer. "Up until this point," added the court, "there is no dispute that the cargo was in good condition."

During the unloading process, undertaken by Sun City's employee, the granite was badly damaged, however. "Since the damage occurred subsequent to delivery and receipt of the signed bill of lading, we agree with the trial court that Balance was no longer responsible for the risk of loss."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment Generally, a broker who only arranges for shipment is not liable for damage or loss to goods during their transport. Why did TQL decide to pay C&C for the cost of the damage to the granite? Discuss.
- Economic Should a risk-of-loss provision be included in a contract for the sale or transport of goods? Why or why not?

Delivery without Movement of the Goods The UCC also addresses situations in which the contract does not require the goods to be shipped or moved. Frequently, the buyer or lessee is to pick up the goods from the seller or lessor, or the goods are held by a bailee.

A bailment is a temporary delivery of personal property, without passage of title, into the care of another, called a bailee. Under the UCC, a bailee is a party who, by a bill of lading, warehouse receipt, or other document of title, acknowledges possession of goods and/or contracts to deliver them. For instance, a warehousing company or a trucking company may be a bailee.

Bailment A situation in which the personal property of one person (a bailor) is entrusted to another (a bailee), who is obligated to return the bailed property to the bailor or dispose of it as directed.

Goods Held by the Seller. When the seller keeps the goods for pickup, a document of title usually is not used. If the seller is a merchant, risk of loss to goods held by the seller passes to the buyer when the buyer actually takes physical possession of the goods [UCC 2–509(3)]. In other words, the merchant bears the risk of loss between the time the contract is formed and the time the buyer picks up the goods. Case Example 16.26 Roger Adams bought a preassembled table saw that weighed 288 pounds from Sears Roebuck and Company. When Adams went to the loading area to pick up the saw, a Sears employee used a hydraulic lift to elevate it to the height of Adams's pickup bed. Adams then pulled the saw onto the truck, and the employee went back inside the store (and did not secure the saw).

Adams, who was standing in the bed of his truck, took a step and lost his balance. He grabbed the saw to steady himself. Both he and the saw fell off the truck, and he was injured. Adams sued Sears, alleging negligence, but the court granted summary judgment in favor of Sears. Sears was under no duty to help Adams secure the saw in the truck, so the employee had not been negligent. Once the truck was loaded, the risk of loss (or injury) passed to Adams under the UCC because he had taken physical possession of the goods.[8]

8. Adams v. Sears Roebuck and Co., 2014 WL 670630 (D.Utah 2014).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Monty Rakusen/Cultura/Getty Images

While securing his purchases in his truck bed at a store's loading area, a customer falls and is injured. Who is liable, and why?

If the seller is not a merchant, the risk of loss to goods held by the seller passes to the buyer on tender of delivery [UCC 2–509(3)]. This means that a seller bears the risk of loss until the seller makes the goods available to the buyer and notifies the buyer that the goods are ready to be picked up.

With respect to leases, similar rules apply. The risk of loss passes to the lessee on the lessee's receipt of the goods if the lessor is a merchant. Otherwise, the risk passes to the lessee on tender of delivery [UCC 2A–219(2)(c)].

Goods Held by a Bailee. When a bailee is holding goods for a person who has contracted to sell them and the goods are to be delivered without being moved, the goods are usually represented by a document of title. The title document may be written, such as a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt, or evidenced by an electronic record.

When goods are held by a bailee, risk of loss passes to the buyer when one of the following occurs:

1. The buyer receives a negotiable document of title for the goods.
2. The bailee acknowledges the buyer's right to possess the goods.
3. The buyer receives a nonnegotiable document of title, and the buyer has a reasonable time to present the document to the bailee and demand the goods. If the bailee refuses to honor the document, the risk of loss remains with the seller [UCC 2–503(4)(b), 2–509(2)].

With respect to leases, if goods held by a bailee are to be delivered without being moved, the risk of loss passes to the lessee on acknowledgment by the bailee of the lessee's right to possession of the goods [UCC 2A–219(2)(b)].

Risk of Loss When the Contract Is Breached When a sales or lease contract is breached, the transfer of risk operates differently depending on which party breaches. Generally, the party in breach bears the risk of loss.

When the Seller or Lessor Breaches. If the seller or lessor breaches by supplying goods that are so nonconforming that the buyer has the right to reject them, the risk of loss does not pass to the buyer. Example 16.27 A buyer orders ten stainless steel refrigerators from a seller, F.O.B. the seller's plant. The seller ships white refrigerators instead. The white refrigerators (nonconforming goods) are damaged in transit. The risk of loss falls on the seller. Had the seller shipped stainless steel refrigerators (conforming goods) instead, the risk would have fallen on the buyer [UCC 2–510(1)]. ■

With nonconforming goods, the risk of loss does not pass to the buyer until one of the following occurs:

Cure The right of a party who tenders nonconforming performance to correct the nonconforming performance within the contract period.

1. The seller is able to cure the defects (that is, the goods are repaired, replaced, or discounted in price by the seller).
2. The buyer accepts the goods in spite of their defects (thus waiving the right to reject).

If a buyer accepts a shipment of goods and later discovers a defect, acceptance can be revoked. Revocation allows the buyer to pass the risk of loss back to the seller, at least to the extent that the buyer's insurance does not cover the loss [UCC 2–510(2)]. Article 2A provides similar rules for leases.

When the Buyer or Lessee Breaches. The general rule is that when a buyer or lessee breaches a contract, the risk of loss immediately shifts to the buyer or lessee. This rule has three important limitations:

1. The seller or lessor must already have identified the contract goods.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

2. The buyer or lessee bears the risk for only a commercially reasonable time after the seller or lessor has learned of the breach.
3. The buyer or lessee is liable only to the extent of any deficiency in the seller's insurance coverage [UCC 2–510(3), 2A–220(2)].

16–3d Insurable Interest

Parties to sales and lease contracts often obtain insurance coverage to protect against damage, loss, or destruction of goods. Any party purchasing insurance must have a sufficient interest in the insured item to obtain a valid policy. Insurance laws—not the UCC—determine sufficiency. The UCC is helpful, however, because it contains certain rules regarding insurable interests in goods.

Insurable Interest A property interest in goods being sold or leased that is sufficiently substantial to permit a party to insure against damage to the goods.

Insurable Interest of the Buyer or Lessee A buyer or lessee has an insurable interest in identified goods. The moment the contract goods are identified by the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee has a property interest in them. That allows the buyer or lessee to obtain necessary insurance coverage for those goods even before the risk of loss has passed [UCC 2–501(1), 2A–218(1)]. When the parties do not explicitly agree on identification in their contract, then the UCC provisions on identification discussed earlier in this chapter apply.

Insurable Interest of the Seller or Lessor A seller has an insurable interest in goods as long as the seller retains title to the goods. Even after title passes to the buyer, a seller who has a security interest in the goods (a right to secure payment) still has an insurable interest [UCC 2–501(2)]. Thus, both a buyer and a seller can have an insurable interest in the same goods at the same time. Of course, the buyer or seller must sustain an actual loss to recover from an insurance company. In regard to leases, the lessor retains an insurable interest in leased goods until the lessee exercises an option to buy and the risk of loss has passed to the lessee [UCC 2A–218(3)].

16–4 Contracts for the International Sale of Goods

Today, businesses often engage in sales and lease transactions on a global scale. International sales contracts between firms or individuals located in different countries are governed by the 1980 United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG). The CISG governs international contracts only if the countries of the parties to the contract have ratified the CISG and if the parties have not agreed that some other law will govern their contract. As of 2021, the CISG had been adopted by eighty-four countries, including the United States, Canada, some Central and South American countries, China, most European nations, Japan, and Mexico. That means that the CISG is the uniform international sales law of countries that account for more than two-thirds of all global trade.

Focus Question 4

What law governs contracts for the international sale of goods?

16–4a Applicability of the CISG

Essentially, the CISG is to international sales contracts what Article 2 of the UCC is to domestic sales contracts. As discussed earlier, in domestic transactions the UCC applies when the parties to a contract for a sale of goods have failed to specify in writing some important term concerning price, delivery, or the like. Similarly, whenever the parties subject to the CISG have failed to specify in writing the precise terms of a contract for the international sale of goods, the CISG will be applied.

Unlike the UCC, the CISG does not apply to consumer sales. Neither the UCC nor the CISG applies to contracts for services.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

16–4b A Comparison of CISG and UCC Provisions

The provisions of the CISG, although similar for the most part to those of the UCC, differ from them in certain respects. If the CISG and the UCC conflict, the CISG applies (because it is a treaty of the U.S. national government and therefore takes precedence over state laws under the U.S. Constitution). We look here at some differences with respect to contract formation.

Statute of Frauds Unlike the UCC, the CISG does not include any Statute of Frauds provisions. Under Article 11 of the CISG, an international sales contract does not need to be evidenced by a writing or to be in any particular form.

Offers UCC 2–205 provides that a merchant's firm offer is irrevocable, even without consideration, if the merchant gives assurances in a signed writing or record. In contrast, under the CISG, an offer can become irrevocable without a signed writing or record. Article 16(2) of the CISG provides that an offer will be irrevocable in either of the following circumstances:

1. The offeror states orally that the offer is irrevocable.
2. The offeree reasonably relies on the offer as being irrevocable.

In both of these situations, the offer will be irrevocable without a writing or record and without consideration.

Another difference is that, under the UCC, if the price term is left open, the court will determine "a reasonable price at the time for delivery" [UCC 2–305(1)]. Under the CISG, however, the price term must be specified, or at least provisions for its specification must be included in the agreement. Otherwise, normally no contract will exist.

Acceptances Under the UCC, a definite expression of acceptance that contains additional terms can still result in the formation of a contract, unless the additional terms are conditioned on the assent of the offeror. In other words, the UCC does away with the mirror image rule in domestic sales contracts.

Article 19 of the CISG provides that a contract can be formed even though the acceptance contains additional terms, unless the additional terms materially alter the contract. Under the CISG, however, a "material alteration" includes almost any change in the terms. If an additional term relates to payment, quality, quantity, price, time and place of delivery, extent of one party's liability to the other, or the settlement of disputes, the CISG considers the added term a material alteration. In effect, then, the CISG requires that the terms of the acceptance mirror those of the offer.

Case Example 16.28 VLM Food Trading International, Inc., a Canadian agricultural supplier, sold frozen potatoes to Illinois Trading Co., an American buyer and seller of produce. For each of their transactions, Illinois Trading sent a purchase order setting out the terms, and VLM responded with a confirming e-mail. VLM then shipped the order, Illinois Trading accepted it, and VLM followed up with a "trailing" invoice. Only the trailing invoice included a provision that the buyer would be liable for attorneys' fees if it breached the contract.

Nine transactions occurred without incident. Illinois Trading ran into financial difficulties, however, and did not pay for the next nine shipments. VLM filed a suit in a federal district court against the buyer, seeking to recover the unpaid amount plus attorneys' fees. Illinois Trading admitted that it owed the price for the potatoes but contested liability for the attorneys' fees. A federal appellate court agreed with Illinois Trading that under the CISG, the attorneys' fee provision in the trailing invoice did not become part of the parties' contract. The attorneys' fee provision was a material alteration to the contract terms, and Illinois Trading did not agree to the additional term.[9]

Toronto-Images.Com/Shutterstock.com

How did Article 19 of the CISG affect the court's decision regarding a dispute over the international sale of potatoes?

9. VLM Food Trading International, Inc. v. Illinois Trading Co., 811 F.3d 247 (7th Cir. 2016).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Practice and Review

Guy Holcomb owns and operates Oasis Goodtime Emporium, an adult entertainment establishment. Holcomb wanted to create an adult Internet system for Oasis that would offer customers adult theme videos and live chat room programs using performers at the club. On May 10, Holcomb signed a work order authorizing Thomas Consulting Group (TCG) "to deliver a working prototype of a customer chat system, demonstrating the integration of live video and chatting in a Web browser." In exchange for creating the prototype, Holcomb agreed to pay TCG $64,697. On May 20, Holcomb signed an additional work order in the amount of $12,943 for TCG to install a customized firewall system. The work orders stated that Holcomb would make monthly installment payments to TCG, and both parties expected the work would be finished by September.

Due to unforeseen problems largely attributable to system configuration and software incompatibility, the project required more time than anticipated. By the end of the summer, the website was still not ready, and Holcomb had fallen behind in the payments to TCG. TCG was threatening to cease work and file suit for breach of contract unless the bill was paid. Rather than make further payments, Holcomb wanted to abandon the website project. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would a court be likely to decide that the transaction between Holcomb and TCG was covered by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC)? Why or why not?
2. Would a court be likely to consider Holcomb a merchant under the UCC? Why or why not?
3. Did the parties have a valid contract under the UCC? Explain.
4. Suppose that Holcomb and TCG meet in October in an attempt to resolve their problems. At that time, the parties reach an oral agreement that TCG will continue to work without demanding full payment of the past-due amounts and Holcomb will pay TCG $5,000 per week. Assuming that the contract falls under the UCC, is the oral agreement enforceable? Why or why not?

Debate This

The UCC should require the same degree of definiteness of terms, especially with respect to price and quantity, as general contract law does.

Key Terms

bailment 399
course of dealing 392
course of performance 392 cure 400 destination contract 396 document of title 396 firm offer 386
fungible goods 395 identification 394
insurable interest 401 intangible property 381 lease 382
lease agreement 383 lessee 383 lessor 383 merchant 382
output contract 386 predominant-factor test 382 requirements contract 386 sale 380
sales contracts 379 seasonably 387 shipment contract 395 tangible property 381
usage of trade 392

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Chapter Summary: Sales and Lease Contracts

The Scope of Articles 2 and 2A	1. The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC)—Attempts to provide a consistent, uniform, and integrated framework of rules to deal with all phases ordinarily arising in a commercial sales or lease transaction, including contract formation, passage of title, and risk of loss. The concepts of good faith and commercial reasonableness permeate the UCC. 2. Article 2 (sales)—Governs contracts for the sale of goods (tangible, movable personal property). Rules can vary if the buyer or seller is a merchant. The common law of contracts also applies to sales contracts to the extent that the common law has not been modified by the UCC. If there is a conflict between a common law rule and the UCC, the UCC controls. 3. Article 2A (leases)—Governs contracts for the lease or sublease of goods. Except that it applies to leases, instead of sales, of goods, Article 2A is essentially a repetition of Article 2 and varies only to reflect differences between sales and lease transactions.
The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts	1. Offer— a. Not all terms have to be included for a contract to be formed (only the subject matter and quantity term normally must be specified). b. The price does not have to be included for a contract to be formed. c. Particulars of performance can be left open. d. A written and signed offer by a merchant, covering a period of three months or less, is irrevocable without payment of consideration. 2. Acceptance— a. Acceptance may be made by any reasonable means of communication. It is effective when dispatched. b. An offer can be accepted by a promise to ship or by prompt shipment of conforming goods, or by prompt shipment of nonconforming goods if accompanied by a notice of accommodation. c. Acceptance by performance requires notice within a reasonable time. Otherwise, the offer can be treated as lapsed before acceptance. d. A definite expression of acceptance creates a contract even if the terms of the acceptance differ from those of the offer, unless the additional or different terms in the acceptance are expressly conditioned on the offeror's assent to those terms. 3. Consideration—A modification of a contract for the sale of goods does not require consideration. 4. The Statute of Frauds— a. All contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more, and lease contracts requiring payments of $1,000 or more, must be in writing. A writing is sufficient as long as it indicates the parties' intention to form a contract and is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. A contract normally is not enforceable beyond the quantity shown in the writing. b. When written confirmation of an oral contract between merchants is not objected to in writing by the receiver within ten days, the contract is enforceable. c. For exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, see Exhibit 16–2. 5. Parol evidence rule— a. The terms of a clear and complete written contract cannot be contradicted by evidence of prior agreements or contemporaneous oral agreements. b. Evidence is admissible to clarify the terms of a writing if the contract terms are ambiguous or if evidence of course of dealing, usage of trade, or course of performance is necessary to learn or to clarify the parties' intentions. 6. Unconscionability—An unconscionable contract is one that is so unfair and one-sided that it would be unreasonable to enforce it. If the court deems a contract or a clause in a contract to have been unconscionable at the time it was made, the court can (a) refuse to enforce the contract, (b) refuse to enforce the unconscionable clause, or (c) limit the application of any unconscionable clauses to avoid an unconscionable result.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Title and Risk of Loss	1. Shipment contract—In the absence of an agreement, title and risk pass on the seller's or lessor's delivery of conforming goods to the carrier [UCC 2–319(1)(a), 2–401(2)(a), 2–509(1)(a), 2A–219(2)(a)]. 2. Destination contract—In the absence of an agreement, title and risk pass on the seller's or lessor's tender of delivery of conforming goods to the buyer or lessee at the point of destination [UCC 2–319(1)(b), 2–401(2)(b), 2–509(1)(b), 2A–219(2)(b)]. 3. Delivery without movement of the goods—In the absence of an agreement, if the goods are not represented by a document of title, title passes on the formation of the contract, and risk passes on the buyer's or lessee's receipt of the goods if the seller or lessor is a merchant or on the tender of delivery if the seller or lessor is a nonmerchant. 4. Risk of loss when the contract is breached— a. If the seller or lessor breaches by tendering nonconforming goods that are rejected by the buyer or lessee, the risk of loss does not pass to the buyer or lessee until the defects are cured (unless the buyer or lessee accepts the goods in spite of their defects, thus waiving the right to reject) [UCC 2–510(1), 2A–220(1)]. b. If the buyer or lessee breaches the contract, the risk of loss immediately shifts to the buyer or lessee for goods that are identified to the contract. The buyer or lessee bears the risk for only a commercially reasonable time after the seller or lessor has learned of the breach [UCC 2–510(3), 2A–220(2)].
Contracts for the International Sale of Goods	International sales contracts are governed by the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG) if the countries of the parties to the contract have ratified the CISG and if the parties have not agreed that some other law will govern their contract. Essentially, the CISG is to international sales contracts what Article 2 of the UCC is to domestic sales contracts. Unlike the UCC, however, the CISG does not apply to consumer sales. Whenever parties who are subject to the CISG have failed to specify in writing the precise terms of a contract for the international sale of goods, the CISG will be applied.

Issue Spotters

1. E-Design, Inc., orders 150 computer desks. Fav-O-Rite Supplies, Inc., ships 150 printer stands. Is this an acceptance of the offer or a counteroffer? If it is an acceptance, is it a breach of the contract? What if Fav-O-Rite told E-Design it was sending the printer stands as "an accommodation"? (See The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts.)
2. Truck Parts, Inc. (TPI), often sells supplies to United Fix-It Company (UFC), which services trucks. Over the phone, they negotiate for the sale of eighty-four sets of tires. TPI sends a letter to UFC detailing the terms and two weeks later ships the tires. Is there an enforceable contract between them? Why or why not? (See The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

16–1. Additional Terms. Strike offers to sell Bailey one thousand shirts for a stated price. The offer declares that shipment will be made by Dependable Truck Line. Bailey replies, "I accept your offer for one thousand shirts at the price quoted. Delivery to be by Yellow Express Truck Line." Both Strike and Bailey are merchants. Three weeks later, Strike ships the shirts by Dependable Truck Line, and Bailey refuses to accept delivery. Strike sues for breach of contract. Bailey claims that there never was a contract because his reply, which included a modification of carriers, did not constitute an acceptance. Bailey further claims that even if there had been a contract, Strike would have been in breach because Strike shipped the shirts by Dependable, contrary to the contract terms. Discuss fully Bailey's claims. (See The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts.)

16–2. Spotlight on Goods and Services—The Statute of Frauds. Fallsview Glatt Kosher Caterers ran a business that provided travel packages, including food, entertainment, and lectures on religious subjects, to customers during the Passover holiday at a New York resort. Willie Rosenfeld verbally agreed to pay Fallsview $24,050 for the Passover package for himself and his family. Rosenfeld did not appear at the resort and never paid the money owed. Fallsview sued Rosenfeld for breach of contract. Rosenfeld claimed that the contract was unenforceable because it was not in writing and violated the UCC's Statute of Frauds. Is the contract valid? Explain. [Fallsview Glatt Kosher Caterers, Inc. v. Rosenfeld, 794 N.Y.S.2d 790 (N.Y. Super. 2005)] (See The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

16–3. Goods Held by the Seller or Lessor. Douglas Singletary bought a manufactured home from Andy's Mobile Home and Land Sales. The contract stated that the buyer accepted the home "as is where is." Singletary paid the full price, and his crew began to ready the home to relocate it to his property. The night before the home was to be moved, however, it was destroyed by fire. Who suffered the loss? Explain. [Singletary, III v. P&A Investments, Inc., 712 S.E.2d 681 (N.C.App. 2011)] (See Title and Risk of Loss.)

16–4. Risk of Loss. Ethicon, Inc., a pharmaceutical company, entered into an agreement with UPS Supply Chain Solutions, Inc., to transport pharmaceuticals. The drivers were provided by International Management Services Co. under a contract with a UPS subsidiary, Worldwide Dedicated Services, Inc. During the transport of a shipment from Ethicon's facility in Texas to buyers "F.O.B. Tennessee," one of the trucks collided with a concrete barrier near Little Rock, Arkansas, and caught fire, damaging the goods. Who was liable for the loss? Why? [Royal & Sun Alliance Insurance, PLC v. International Management Services Co., 703 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2013)] (See Title and Risk of Loss.)

16–5. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Goods and Services Combined. Allied Shelving and Equipment, Inc., sells and installs shelving systems. National Deli, LLC, contracted with Allied to provide and install a parallel rack system (a series of large shelves) in National's warehouse. Both parties were dissatisfied with the result. National filed a suit in a Florida state court against Allied, which filed a counterclaim. Each contended that the other had materially breached the contract. The court applied common law contract principles to rule in National's favor on both claims. Allied appealed, arguing that the court should have applied the UCC. When does a court apply common law principles to a contract that involves both goods and services? In this case, why might an appellate court rule that the UCC should be applied instead? Explain. [Allied Shelving and Equipment, Inc. v. National Deli, LLC, 40 Fla.L.Weekly D145, 154 So.3d 482 (Dist.App. 2015)] (See The Scope of Articles 2 and 2A.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 16-5, go to Appendix E.

16–6. Acceptance. New England Precision Grinding, Inc. (NEPG), sells precision medical parts in Massachusetts. NEPG agreed to supply Kyphon, Inc., with certain medical parts. NEPG contracted with Simply Surgical, LLC, to obtain the parts from Iscon Surgicals, Ltd. The contract did not mention Kyphon or require Kyphon's acceptance of the parts. Before shipping, Iscon would certify that the parts conformed to NEPG's specifications. On receiving the parts, NEPG would certify that they conformed to Kyphon's specifications. On delivery, Kyphon would also inspect the parts.

After about half a dozen transactions, NEPG's payments to Simply Surgical lagged, and the seller refused to make further deliveries. NEPG filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against Simply Surgical, alleging breach of contract. NEPG claimed that Kyphon had rejected some of the parts, which gave NEPG the right not to pay for them. Do the UCC's rules with respect to acceptance support or undercut the parties' actions? Discuss. [New England Precision Grinding, Inc. v. Simply Surgical, LLC, 89 Mass.App.Ct.176, 46 N.E.3d 590 (2016)] (See The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts.)

16–7. When Title Passes. James McCoolidge, a Nebraska resident, saw a used Honda Element for sale online. He contacted the seller, Daniel Oyvetsky, who offered to sell the vehicle for $7,500 on behalf of Car and Truck Center, LLC, a dealership in Nashville, Tennessee. McCoolidge paid the price and received the car and a certificate of title. Before he registered the certificate with the Nebraska Department of Motor Vehicles, he learned that the state of Tennessee had issued numerous certificates of title to the Element. Based on these documents, title could ultimately be traced to McCoolidge. But he chose to file a suit in a Nebraska state court against Oyvetsky, claiming that he had not received "clear" title. What does the UCC provide with respect to the passage of title under a sales contract? How does that rule impact McCoolidge's claim? Discuss. [McCoolidge v. Oyvetsky, 292 Neb. 955, 874 N.W.2d 892 (2016)] (See Title and Risk of Loss.)

16–8. Requirements Contracts. Medalist Golf, Inc., a high-end golf course builder, was working on a new golf course project in Missouri. Chris Williams, doing business as Cane Creek Sod, submitted a bid with Medalist to provide Meyer Zoysia grass sod for the project. Williams and Medalist executed a "grass supplier agreement" that specified the type and quality of grass to be used, stated the price, and gave Medalist a right to inspect and reject the sod. The parties estimated the quantity of sod needed for the project to be twenty-one acres. Williams had approximately sixty-five acres of Meyer Zoysia growing at the time. The agreement did not specify the amount of sod that Medalist would purchase from Williams, nor did it say that Medalist would buy Williams's sod exclusively. Later, when Medalist had an expert inspect Williams's sod (before it was harvested), the expert concluded that it did not meet the quality standards required for the project. Medalist therefore rejected the sod. Williams sued for breach of contract. Was the "grass supplier agreement" enforceable as a requirements contract? Why or why not? [Williams v. Medalist Golf, Inc., 2018 WL 1046889 (E.D.Mo. 2018)] (See The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts.)

16–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Sales and Lease Contracts. Camal Terry signed a "Sales Contract" to buy a 1995 BMW 3 Series from Robin Drive Auto, a car dealership in Delaware. Terry agreed to pay $4,995, and Robin Drive agreed to hold the BMW on layaway for him in contemplation of a sale within twenty-one days. Also specified were a down payment of $1,200 and the timing of other payments. But under the payment schedule, Terry was to pay $100 a week for six weeks (forty-two days) even though the sale was to take place twenty-one days later. In addition, the contract provided that the payments were fees for storage and "prep" and were not deductible from the price of the car. Terry paid more than $1,000 before asking Robin Drive to refund the money. When the dealership refused, Terry filed a suit in a Delaware state court against Robin Drive. Testimony about the mismatched contract terms was conflicting. [Terry v. Robin Drive Auto, 2017 WL 65842 (Del. Com. Pl. 2017)] (See The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts.)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

1. Ethically, what is wrong with this deal? Explain.
2. Using the IDDR approach, consider whether Robin Drive has an ethical obligation to use a different contract in its sales to consumers.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

16–10. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Parol Evidence. Mountain Stream Trout Co. agreed to buy "market size" trout from trout grower Lake Farms, LLC. Their five-year contract did not define market size. At the time, in the trade, market size referred to fish of one-pound live weight. After three years, Mountain Stream began taking fewer, smaller deliveries of larger fish, claiming that market size varied according to whatever its customers demanded and that its customers now demanded larger fish. Lake Farms filed a suit for breach of contract. (See The Formation and of Sales and Lease Contracts.)

1. The first group will decide whether parol evidence is admissible to explain the terms of this contract. Are there any exceptions that could apply?
2. A second group will determine the impact of course of dealing and usage of trade on the interpretation of contract terms.
3. A third group will discuss how parties to a commercial contract can avoid the possibility that a court will interpret the contract terms in accordance with trade usage.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

17 Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What is the perfect tender rule? What are some important exceptions to this rule?
2. When will a buyer or lessee be deemed to have accepted the goods?
3. What remedies are available to a seller or lessor when the buyer or lessee breaches the contract?
4. When can a buyer or lessee revoke acceptance?
5. What implied warranties arise under the UCC?

"Gratitude is as the good faith of merchants: it holds commerce together."

François de la Rochefoucauld
1613–1680
(French author)

The performance required of the parties under a sales or lease contract consists of the duties and obligations each party has under the terms of the contract. The basic obligation of the seller or lessor is to transfer and deliver conforming goods. The basic obligation of the buyer or lessee is to accept and pay for conforming goods in accordance with the contract [UCC 2–301, 2A–516(1)]. Overall performance of a sales or lease contract is controlled by the agreement between the parties. If Reyes contracts with Nike to buy five shipments of soccer balls for his store, he is obligated to pay for them according to the terms of his contract (within thirty days of receiving each shipment, for instance).

When the contract is unclear and disputes arise, the courts look to the UCC and impose standards of good faith and commercial reasonableness. The obligations of good faith and commercial reasonableness underlie every sales and lease contract. The UCC's good faith provision, which can never be disclaimed, reads as follows: "Every contract or duty within this Act imposes an obligation of good faith in its performance or enforcement" [UCC 1–304]. Good faith means honesty in fact. For a merchant, it means both honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade [UCC 2–103(1)(b)]. In other words, merchants are held to a higher standard of performance or duty than are nonmerchants.

Sometimes, circumstances make it difficult for a party to carry out the promised performance, leading to a breach of the contract. When a breach occurs, the aggrieved (wronged) party looks for remedies. At other times, a problem arises concerning the goods that are purchased or leased. In those situations, the buyer or lessee may sometimes be able to recover against the seller or lessor under a warranty.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

fizkes/Shutterstock.com

How does the Uniform Commercial Code's good faith provision affect everyday business transactions?

17–1 Obligations of the Seller or Lessor

The major obligation of the seller or lessor under a sales or lease contract is to deliver or tender delivery of conforming goods to the buyer or lessee. Conforming goods are goods that conform to the contract description in every way.

17–1a Tender of Delivery

Tender of delivery occurs when the seller or lessor makes conforming goods available to the buyer or lessee and provides whatever notification is reasonably necessary to enable the buyer or lessee to take delivery [UCC 2–503(1), 2A–508(1)].

Tender must occur at a reasonable hour and in a reasonable manner. In other words, a seller cannot call the buyer at 2:00 A.M. and say, "The goods are ready. I'll give you twenty minutes to get them." Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the goods must be tendered for delivery at a reasonable hour and kept available for a reasonable period of time to enable the buyer to take possession of them [UCC 2–503(1)(a)].

Normally, all goods called for by a contract must be tendered in a single delivery, unless the parties have agreed that the goods may be delivered in several lots or installments [UCC 2–307, 2–612, 2A–510]. Example 17.1 An order for one thousand Under Armour men's shirts cannot be delivered two shirts at a time. If, however, the parties agree that the shirts will be delivered in four orders of 250 each as they are produced (for summer, fall, winter, and spring inventory), then tender of delivery may occur in this manner.

Conforming Goods Goods that conform to contract specifications.

Tender of Delivery A seller's or lessor's act of placing conforming goods at the disposal of the buyer or lessee and providing whatever notification is reasonably necessary to enable the buyer or lessee to take delivery.

17–1b Place of Delivery

The UCC provides for the place of delivery under a contract only if the contract does not indicate the place where the buyer or lessee will take possession. If the contract does not indicate where the goods will be delivered, then the place for delivery will be one of the following:

1. The seller's place of business.
2. The seller's residence, if the seller has no business location [UCC 2–308(a)].
3. The location of the goods, if both parties know at the time of contracting that the goods are located somewhere other than the seller's business [UCC 2–308(b)].

Example 17.2 Jihoo and Boyd both live in Los Angeles. Jihoo contracts to sell to Boyd five shipping containers that both parties know are located in San Francisco. If nothing more is specified in the contract, the place of delivery for the shipping containers is San Francisco. Jihoo may tender delivery by giving Boyd a negotiable or nonnegotiable document of title. Alternatively, Jihoo may obtain the bailee's (warehouser's) acknowledgment that the buyer is entitled to possession.[1]

1. Unless the buyer objects, the seller may also tender delivery by instructing the bailee in writing to release the goods to the buyer without a bailee's acknowledgment of the buyer's rights [UCC 2–503(4)]. Risk of loss, however, does not pass until the buyer has a reasonable amount of time in which to present the document or to give the bailee instructions for delivery.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This

Documents of title include bills of lading, warehouse receipts, and any other documents that, in the regular course of business, entitle a person holding these documents to obtain possession of, and title to, the goods covered.

17–1c Delivery via Carrier

In many instances, circumstances or delivery terms in the contract (such as F.O.B. or F.A.S. terms) make it apparent that the parties intended the goods to be moved by a carrier. In carrier contracts, the seller fulfills the obligation to deliver the goods through either a shipment contract or a destination contract.

Shipment Contracts Recall that a shipment contract requires or authorizes the seller to ship goods by a carrier, rather than to deliver them at a particular destination [UCC 2–319, 2–509(1)(a)]. Under a shipment contract, unless otherwise agreed, the seller must do the following:

1. Put the goods into the hands of the carrier.
2. Make a contract for their transportation that is reasonable according to the nature of the goods and their value. (For instance, certain types of goods require refrigeration in transit.)
3. Obtain and promptly deliver or tender to the buyer any documents necessary to enable the buyer to obtain possession of the goods from the carrier.
4. Promptly notify the buyer that shipment has been made [UCC 2–504].

If the seller fails to make a reasonable contract for transportation or notify the buyer of the shipment, the buyer can reject the shipment, but only if the seller's failure results in a material loss or a significant delay. Example 17.3 Zigi's Organic Fruits sells strawberries to Lozier under a shipment contract. If Zigi's does not arrange for refrigerated transportation and the berries spoil during transport, a material loss to Lozier will likely result. ■ Of course, the parties can agree in their contract that a lesser amount of loss or delay will be grounds for rejection.

Destination Contracts In a destination contract, the seller agrees to deliver conforming goods to the buyer at a particular destination. The seller must give the buyer appropriate notice about the delivery and hold the goods at the buyer's disposal for a reasonable length of time. The seller must also provide the buyer with any documents of title necessary to enable the buyer to obtain delivery from the carrier [UCC 2–503].

Focus Question 1

What is the perfect tender rule? What are some important exceptions to this rule?

17–1d The Perfect Tender Rule

As previously noted, the seller or lessor has an obligation to ship or tender conforming goods. The buyer or lessee is then required to accept and pay for the goods according to the terms of the contract [UCC 2–507]. Under the common law, the seller was not necessarily obligated to deliver goods that conformed to the terms of the contract in every detail. Minor defects in performance were compensable under the substantial performance doctrine.

Perfect Tender Rule The legal right of a buyer or lessee of goods to insist on perfect tender by the seller or lessor. If the goods fail to conform to the contract, the buyer may accept the goods, reject the goods, or accept part and reject part of the goods tendered.

In contrast, the UCC adopted the perfect tender rule. The perfect tender rule states that if the goods or tender of delivery fail in any respect to conform to the contract, the buyer or lessee has the right to accept the goods, reject the entire shipment, or accept part and reject part [UCC 2–601, 2A–509].

Case Example 17.4 First Technology Capital, Inc., contracted to purchase a McDonnell Douglas DC-9-83 aircraft from Airborne, Inc. A technical summary report was attached and incorporated into the parties' contract. The report listed specifications for the plane that First Technology intended to buy, which, as it turned out, described a McDonnell Douglas MD-83 rather than the aircraft Airborne was selling. When First Technology refused to accept the DC-9-83 aircraft, Airborne sued for breach of contract.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

A federal district court in New York held in First Technology's favor and dismissed the case. The specifications listed in the contract (the technical summary report) were clear. The DC-9-83 did not comply with those specifications. Therefore, under the perfect tender rule, the buyer had a right to reject the goods.[2]

(Note that the corollary to this rule is that if the goods conform in every respect, the buyer or lessee does not have a right to reject the goods.)

In the following case, a company ordered a custom-built tow truck from a manufacturer, but when it was delivered, the truck did not function properly. The question was whether the seller's tender of a truck that did not function properly gave the buyer a right to reject the truck under the perfect tender rule.

Photo 12/Alamy

How did the perfect tender rule affect a dispute over a sales contract involving a McDonnell Douglas aircraft?

2. First Technology Capital, Inc. v. Airborne, Inc., 261 F.Supp.3d 371 (W.D.N.Y. 2017).

Case 17.1

All the Way Towing, LLC v. Bucks County International, Inc.

Superior Court of New Jersey, Appellate Division, 452N.J.Super. 565, 178A.3d 97 (2018).

Facts After extensive discussions, Bucks County International, Inc., contracted with All the Way Towing, LLC, to manufacture and sell a tow truck with particular specifications. The contract specified that the custom-made truck would be "an International 7300 4×4 with a Dynamic 801 tow body mounted." The truck was supposed to be delivered by April 15, but the first attempt at delivery occurred months later, in October. At that time, the tow truck's forks did not move correctly, and there were other significant problems. Bucks made two more attempts at delivery in October, but the towing function was not operational, and the truck spewed hydraulic fluid. The fourth attempt at delivery occurred in November. At that time, metal fell out from beneath the truck, and the wheel lift failed to close properly.

All the Way rejected the truck and, believing that Bucks would never be able to deliver a properly functioning truck, demanded return of the $10,000 deposit. When Bucks did not refund the deposit, All the Way sued. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendant, dismissing the complaint because Bucks had tendered a tow truck as specified in the contract. All the Way appealed.

Issue Does delivering a truck that meets the contract specifications but does not function properly constitute a perfect tender?

Decision No. The state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's decision and remanded the case for a trial. Because there was a factual dispute concerning whether the tow truck conformed to the contract, summary judgment was not proper.

Reason The reviewing court noted that the lower court should have considered plaintiffs' allegations that the defendant had failed to deliver a truck that adequately performed its essential functions. "If plaintiffs' allegations regarding the tow truck's apparent problems, which were identified at each of four attempted deliveries, are ultimately proven, plaintiffs would have demonstrated the tow truck was nonconforming." If the truck was nonconforming, then All the Way Towing had a right to reject it under the perfect tender rule and to pursue the remedies available under the UCC.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Bucks had completely fixed the truck by the fourth time it was tendered. Could All the Way continue to reject delivery of the truck? Why or why not?
- Legal Environment What provisions might the parties in this situation have included in their contract to protect themselves from this type of dispute?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

17–1e Exceptions to the Perfect Tender Rule

Because of the rigidity of the perfect tender rule, several exceptions to the rule have been created, some of which are discussed here.

Agreement of the Parties Exceptions to the perfect tender rule may be established by agreement. If the parties have agreed, for instance, that defective goods or parts will not be rejected if the seller or lessor is able to repair or replace them within a reasonable period of time, the perfect tender rule does not apply.

The Right to Cure The UCC does not specifically define the term cure, but it refers to the right of the seller or lessor to repair, adjust, or replace defective or nonconforming goods [UCC 2–508, 2A–513]. The seller or lessor can attempt to cure a defect when the following are true:

1. A delivery is rejected because the goods were nonconforming.
2. The time for performance has not yet expired.
3. The seller or lessor provides timely notice to the buyer or lessee of the intention to cure.
4. The cure can be made within the contract time for performance.

Know This
If goods never arrive, the buyer or seller usually has at least some recourse against the carrier. Also, a buyer normally insures the goods from the time they leave the seller's possession.

Reasonable Grounds. Even if the contract time for performance has expired, sellers or lessors can still cure if they have reasonable grounds to believe that the nonconforming tender will be acceptable to the buyer or lessee [UCC 2–508(2), 2A–513(2)]. Example 17.5 In the past, Reddy Electronics frequently allowed Topps Company to substitute gray keyboards when the silver keyboards that Reddy ordered were not available. Under a new contract for silver keyboards, Reddy rejects a shipment of gray keyboards. In this situation, Topps had reasonable grounds to believe Reddy would accept a substitute. Therefore, Topps can cure within a reasonable time even if conforming delivery will occur after the contract time for performance has ended.

A seller or lessor may tender nonconforming goods with a price allowance (discount). This may also serve as "reasonable grounds" for the seller or lessor to believe that the buyer or lessee will accept the nonconforming tender.

Limits the Right to Reject Goods. The right to cure substantially restricts the right of the buyer or lessee to reject goods. To reject, the buyer or lessee must inform the seller or lessor of the particular defect. If the defect is not disclosed, and if it is one that the seller or lessor could have cured, the buyer or lessee cannot later assert the defect as a defense. Generally, buyers and lessees must act in good faith and state specific reasons for refusing to accept goods [UCC 2–605, 2A–514].

Substitution of Carriers An agreed-on manner of delivery (such as the use of a particular carrier) may become impracticable or unavailable through no fault of either party. In that situation, if a commercially reasonable substitute is available, this substitute must be used and will constitute sufficient tender to the buyer [UCC 2–614(1)]. The seller or lessor is required to arrange for the substitute carrier and normally is responsible for any additional shipping costs (unless the contract states otherwise).

Example 17.6 A sales contract calls for a large generator to be delivered via Roadway Trucking Corporation on or before June 1. The contract terms clearly state the importance of the delivery date. The employees of Roadway Trucking go on strike. The seller must make a reasonable substitute tender, by another trucking company or perhaps by rail, if it is available. The seller normally will be responsible for any additional shipping costs.

Installment Contract A contract that requires or authorizes delivery in two or more separate lots to be accepted and paid for separately.

Installment Contracts An installment contract is a single contract that requires or authorizes delivery in two or more separate lots to be accepted and paid for separately. With an installment contract, a buyer or lessee can reject an installment only if the nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the installment and cannot be cured [UCC 2–307, 2–612(2), 2A–510(1)]. Example 17.7 A seller, Emmy's Appliances, is to deliver fifteen freezers in lots of five each. In the first lot, four of the freezers have defective cooling units that cannot be repaired. In these circumstances, the buyer can reject the entire lot. If the buyer or lessee fails to notify the seller or lessor of the rejection, however, and subsequently accepts a nonconforming installment, the contract is reinstated [UCC 2–612(3), 2A–510(2)].

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Unless the contract provides otherwise, the entire installment contract is breached only when one or more nonconforming installments substantially impair the value of the whole contract. The point to remember is that the UCC significantly alters the right of the buyer or lessee to reject the entire contract if the contract requires delivery to be made in several installments. The UCC strictly limits rejection to cases of substantial nonconformity.

Commercial Impracticability Occurrences unforeseen by either party when a contract was made may make performance commercially impracticable. When this occurs, the rule of perfect tender no longer applies. The seller or lessor must, however, notify the buyer or lessee as soon as practicable that there will be a delay or nondelivery.

The doctrine of commercial impracticability does not extend to problems that could have been foreseen, such as an increase in cost resulting from inflation. The nonoccurrence of the contingency must have been a basic assumption on which the contract was made [UCC 2–615, 2A–405].

Classic Case Example 17.8 Maple Farms, Inc., entered a contract to supply a school district in New York with milk for one school year. The contract price was the market price of milk in June, but by December, the price of raw milk had increased by 23 percent. Maple Farms stood to lose $7,350 on this contract (and more on similar contracts with other school districts).

To avoid performing the contract, Maple Farms filed a suit and claimed that the unanticipated increases in its costs made performance "impracticable." A New York trial court disagreed. Because inflation and fluctuating prices could have been foreseen, they did not render performance of this contract impracticable. The court ruled in favor of the school district.[3]

princessdlaf/E+/Getty Images

School districts often make long-term contracts for milk deliveries. Under what circumstances can a milk supplier claim commercial impracticability when it fails to deliver the milk?

Commercial Impracticability and Partial Performance Sometimes, an unforeseen event only partially affects the capacity of the seller or lessor to perform. Therefore, the seller or lessor can partially fulfill the contract but cannot tender total performance. In this situation, the seller or lessor is required to distribute any remaining goods or deliveries fairly and reasonably among the parties to whom it is contractually obligated to deliver the goods [UCC 2–615(b), 2A–405(b)]. The buyer or lessee must receive notice of the allocation and has the right to accept or reject it [UCC 2–615(c), 2A–405(c)].

Example 17.9 A Florida orange grower, Best Citrus, Inc., contracts to sell this season's crop to a number of customers, including Martin's grocery chain. Martin's contracts to purchase two thousand crates of oranges. Best Citrus has sprayed some of its orange groves with a chemical called Karmoxin. When studies show that persons who eat products sprayed with Karmoxin may develop cancer, the Department of Agriculture issues an order prohibiting the sale of these products. Best Citrus picks only those oranges not sprayed with Karmoxin, but there are not enough to meet all the contracted-for deliveries.

In this situation, Best Citrus is required to allocate its production. It notifies Martin's that it cannot deliver the full quantity specified in the contract and indicates the amount it will be able to deliver. Martin's can either accept or reject the allocation, but Best Citrus has no further contractual liability.

3. Maple Farms, Inc. v. City School District of Elmira, 76 Misc.2d 1080, 352 N.Y.S.2d 784 (1974).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Destruction of Identified Goods Sometimes, an unexpected event, such as a fire, totally destroys goods through no fault of either party and before risk passes to the buyer or lessee. In such a situation, if the goods were identified at the time the contract was formed, the parties are excused from performance [UCC 2–613, 2A–221]. If the goods are only partially destroyed, however, the buyer or lessee can inspect them and either treat the contract as void or accept the goods with a reduction of the contract price.

Example 17.10 Atlas Sporting Equipment agrees to lease to River Bicycles sixty bicycles of a particular model that has been discontinued. No other bicycles of that model are available. River specifies that it needs the bicycles to rent to tourists. Before Atlas can deliver the bicycles, they are destroyed by a fire. In this situation, Atlas is not liable to River for failing to deliver the bicycles. The goods were destroyed through no fault of either party, before the risk of loss passed to the lessee. The loss was total, so the contract is avoided. Clearly, Atlas has no obligation to tender the bicycles, and River has no obligation to make the lease payments for them.

Assurance and Cooperation If one party has "reasonable grounds" to believe that the other party will not perform as contracted, that party may in writing "demand adequate assurance of due performance" from the other party. Until such assurance is received, the doubting party may "suspend" further performance (such as payments due under the contract) without liability. What constitutes "reasonable grounds" is determined by commercial standards. If such assurances are not forthcoming within a reasonable time (not to exceed thirty days), the failure to respond may be treated as a repudiation of the contract [UCC 2–609, 2A–401].

Sometimes, the performance of one party depends on the cooperation of the other. The UCC provides an exception to the perfect tender doctrine if one party fails to cooperate. When cooperation is not forthcoming, the other party can suspend performance without liability and hold the uncooperative party in breach or proceed to perform the contract in any reasonable manner [UCC 2–311(3)].

Example 17.11 Aman is required by contract to deliver 1,200 Samsung washing machines to various locations in California on or before October 1. Farrell, the buyer, is to specify the locations for delivery. Aman repeatedly requests the delivery locations, but Farrell does not respond. The washing machines are ready for shipment on October 1, but Farrell still refuses to give Aman the delivery locations. If Aman does not ship on October 1, he cannot be held liable. Aman is excused for any resulting delay of performance because of Farrell's failure to cooperate.

17–2 Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee

The main obligation of the buyer or lessee under a sales or lease contract is to pay for the goods tendered in accordance with the contract. Once the seller or lessor has adequately tendered delivery, the buyer or lessee is obligated to accept the goods and pay for them according to the terms of the contract.

17–2a Payment

In the absence of any specific agreement, the buyer or lessee must make payment at the time and place the goods are received [UCC 2–310(a), 2A–516(1)]. When a sale is made on credit, the buyer is obligated to pay according to the specified credit terms (for instance, 60, 90, or 120 days), not when the goods are received. The credit period usually begins on the date of shipment [UCC 2–310(d)]. Under a lease contract, a lessee must make the lease payment that was specified in the contract [UCC 2A–516(1)].

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Payment can be made by any means agreed on by the parties—cash or any other method generally acceptable in the commercial world. If the seller demands cash, the seller must give the buyer reasonable time to obtain it [UCC 2–511].

17–2b Right of Inspection

Unless the parties otherwise agree, or for C.O.D. (collect on delivery) transactions, the buyer or lessee has an absolute right to inspect the goods before making payment. This right allows the buyer or lessee to verify, before making payment, that the goods tendered or delivered are what were contracted for or ordered. If the goods are not what were ordered, the buyer or lessee has no duty to pay. An opportunity for inspection is therefore a condition precedent to the right of the seller or lessor to enforce payment [UCC 2–513(1), 2A–515(1)].

Inspection can take place at any reasonable place and time and in any reasonable manner. Generally, what is reasonable is determined by custom of the trade, past practices of the parties, and the like. The buyer bears the costs of inspecting the goods (unless otherwise agreed), but if the goods are rejected because they are not conforming, the buyer can recover the costs of inspection from the seller [UCC 2–513(2)].

17–2c Acceptance

Focus Question 2

When will a buyer or lessee be deemed to have accepted the goods?

After having had a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods, the buyer or lessee can demonstrate acceptance in any of the following ways:

1. The buyer or lessee indicates (by words or conduct) to the seller or lessor that the goods are conforming or that the buyer or lessee will retain them in spite of their nonconformity [UCC 2–606(1)(a), 2A–515(1)(a)].
2. The buyer or lessee fails to reject the goods within a reasonable period of time [UCC 2–602(1), 2–606(1)(b), 2A–515(1)(b)].
3. In sales contracts, the buyer performs any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership. For instance, any use or resale of the goods—except for the limited purpose of testing or inspecting the goods—generally constitutes an acceptance [UCC 2–606(1)(c)].

Case Example 17.12 Hemacare Plus, Inc., ordered more than $660,000 in specialty pharmaceutical products from Cardinal Health 108, LLC. Cardinal supplied the products, which Hemacare used and did not reject or return. When Hemacare did not pay the invoices for the goods delivered, Cardinal filed a breach action in a federal district court. Because Hemacare had used the pharmaceutical products it received, the court found it had accepted the goods. Therefore, the court granted summary judgment to Cardinal, awarding $688,920 in damages (including interest, attorneys' fees, and costs).[4]

17–2d Partial Acceptance

If some of the goods delivered do not conform to the contract and the seller or lessor has failed to cure, the buyer or lessee can make a partial acceptance [UCC 2–601(c), 2A–509(1)]. The same is true if the nonconformity was not reasonably discoverable before acceptance. (In the latter situation, the buyer or lessee may be able to revoke the acceptance, as will be discussed later in this chapter.)

A buyer or lessee cannot accept less than a single commercial unit, however. The UCC defines a commercial unit as a unit of goods that, by commercial usage, is viewed as a "single

4. Cardinal Health 108, LLC v. Hemacare Plus, Inc., 2017 WL 114405 (S.D.Ala. 2017).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

whole" that cannot be divided without material impairment of the character of the unit, its market value, or its use [UCC 2–105(6), 2A–103(1)(c)]. A commercial unit can be a single article (such as a machine), a set of articles (such as a suite of furniture or an assortment of sizes), a quantity (such as a bale, a gross, or a carload), or any other unit treated in the trade as a single whole for purposes of sale.

17–2e Anticipatory Repudiation

What if, before the time for contract performance, one party clearly communicates to the other the intention not to perform? As discussed earlier in this text, such an action is a breach of the contract by anticipatory repudiation.

Possible Responses to Repudiation When anticipatory repudiation occurs, the nonbreaching party has a choice of two responses:

1. Treat the repudiation as a final breach by pursuing a remedy.
2. Wait to see if the repudiating party will decide to perform the contract despite the avowed intention to renege [UCC 2–610, 2A–402].

In either situation, the nonbreaching party may suspend performance.

A Repudiation May Be Retracted The UCC permits a breaching party to "retract" a repudiation (subject to some limitations). This retraction can be done by any method that clearly indicates the party's intent to perform. Once retraction is made, the rights of the repudiating party under the contract are reinstated. There can be no retraction, however, if since the time of the repudiation the other party has canceled or materially changed position or otherwise indicated that the repudiation is final [UCC 2–611, 2A–403].

Example 17.13 On April 1, Lyn, who owns a small inn, purchases a suite of furniture from Horton, proprietor of Horton's Furniture Warehouse. The contract states that "delivery must be made on or before May 1." On April 10, Horton informs Lyn that he cannot make delivery until May 10 and asks her to consent to the modified delivery date.

In this situation, Lyn has two options. She can either treat Horton's notice of late delivery as a final breach of contract and pursue a remedy or agree to the later delivery date. Suppose that Lyn does neither for two weeks. On April 24, Horton informs Lyn that he will be able to deliver the furniture by May 1 after all. In effect, Horton has retracted his repudiation, reinstating the rights and obligations of the parties under the original contract. Note that if Lyn had told Horton that she was canceling the contract after he repudiated, he would not have been able to retract his repudiation. ■

ksmanovic/Shutterstock.com

An inn owner buys new bedroom furniture, but the seller modifies the delivery date of the shipment. What are the inn owner's options?

17–3 Remedies of the Seller or Lessor

Remedies under the UCC are cumulative, meaning that the aggrieved (wronged) party is not limited to one exclusive remedy. (Of course, a party may not recover twice for the same harm.) When the buyer or lessee is in breach, the remedies available to the seller or lessor depend on the circumstances existing at the time of the breach. The most pertinent considerations are which party has possession of the goods, whether the goods are in transit, and whether the buyer or lessee has rejected or accepted the goods.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

17–3a When the Goods Are in the Possession of the Seller or Lessor

If the breach occurs before the goods have been delivered to the buyer or lessee, the seller or lessor has the right to pursue a number of remedies, which are listed below and discussed in the following subsections.

1. Cancel (rescind) the contract.
2. Withhold delivery of the goods.
3. Resell or dispose of the goods and sue to recover damages.
4. Sue to recover the purchase price or lease payments due.
5. Sue to recover damages for the buyer's nonacceptance.

Focus Question 3

What remedies are available to a seller or lessor when the buyer or lessee breaches the contract?

The Right to Cancel the Contract If the buyer or lessee breaches the contract, the seller or lessor can choose to cancel (rescind) the contract [UCC 2–703(f), 2A–523(1)(a)]. The seller must notify the buyer or lessee of the cancellation, and at that point all remaining obligations of the seller or lessor are discharged. The buyer or lessee is not discharged from all remaining obligations, however. The buyer or lessee is in breach, and the seller or lessor can pursue remedies available under the UCC for breach.

The Right to Withhold Delivery In general, sellers and lessors can withhold or discontinue performance of their obligations under sales or lease contracts when the buyers or lessees are in breach. This is true whether a buyer or lessee has wrongfully rejected or revoked acceptance of contract goods (rejection and revocation of acceptance will be discussed later), failed to make a payment, or repudiated the contract [UCC 2–703(a), 2A–523(1)(c)]. The seller or lessor can also refuse to deliver the goods to a buyer or lessee who is insolvent (unable to pay debts as they become due), unless the buyer or lessee pays in cash [UCC 2–702(1), 2A–525(1)].

Know This

A buyer or lessee breaches a contract by wrongfully rejecting the goods, wrongfully revoking acceptance, refusing to pay, or repudiating the contract.

The Right to Resell or Dispose of the Goods When a buyer or lessee breaches or repudiates the contract while the seller or lessor is still in possession of the goods, the seller or lessor can resell or dispose of the goods. Any resale of the goods must be made in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner. The seller must give the original buyer reasonable notice of the resale, unless the goods are perishable or will rapidly decline in value [UCC 2–706(2), (3)].

The seller or lessor can retain any profits made as a result of the sale or disposition and can hold the buyer or lessee liable for any loss [UCC 2–703(d), 2–706(1), 2A–523(1)(e), 2A–527(1)]. In sales transactions, the seller can recover any deficiency between the resale price and the contract price, and can also recover incidental damages, defined as the costs to the seller resulting from the breach [UCC 2–706(1), 2–710]. In lease transactions, the lessor can lease the goods to another party and recover damages from the original lessee. Damages include any unpaid lease payments up to the time the new lease begins. The lessor can also recover any deficiency between the lease payments due under the original lease and those due under the new lease, along with incidental damages [UCC 2A–527(2)].

When the goods are unfinished at the time of breach, the seller or lessor can do either of the following:

1. Cease manufacturing the goods and resell them for scrap or salvage value.
2. Complete the manufacture, resell or dispose of the goods, and hold the buyer or lessee liable for any difference between the contract price and the sale price.

In choosing between these two alternatives, the seller or lessor must exercise reasonable commercial judgment to mitigate the loss and obtain maximum value from the unfinished goods [UCC 2–704(2), 2A–524(2)].

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Right to Sue to Recover the Purchase Price or the Lease Payments Due Under the UCC, an unpaid seller or lessor can bring an action to recover the purchase price or payments due under the lease contract, plus incidental damages [UCC 2–709(1), 2A–529(1)]. If a seller or lessor is unable to resell or dispose of goods and sues for the contract price or lease payments due, the goods must be held for the buyer or lessee. The seller or lessor can resell or dispose of the goods at any time before collecting the judgment from the buyer or lessee. If the goods are resold, the net proceeds from the sale must be credited to the buyer or lessee because of the duty to mitigate damages.

Example 17.14 Canyonville Academy contracts with Stickme.com to purchase ten thousand bumper stickers with the school's name and logo on them. Stickme tenders delivery of the stickers, but Canyonville wrongfully refuses to accept them. In this situation, Stickme can bring an action for the purchase price. Stickme has delivered conforming goods, and Canyonville has refused to accept or pay for the goods. Obviously, Stickme will not likely be able to resell the stickers, so this situation falls under UCC 2–709. Stickme is required to make the bumper stickers available for Canyonville. In the unlikely event that it can find another buyer, it can sell the stickers at any time prior to collecting the judgment from Canyonville. ■

monkeybusinessimages/iStock/Getty Images

If a school orders special merchandise with its school name printed on it and then refuses the shipment of conforming goods, what can the seller do to recoup payment?

The Right to Sue to Recover Damages for the Buyer's Nonacceptance If a buyer or lessee repudiates a contract or wrongfully refuses to accept the goods, a seller or lessor can bring an action to recover the damages sustained. Ordinarily, the amount of damages equals the difference between the contract price or lease payments and the market price or lease payments at the time and place of tender of the goods, plus incidental damages [UCC 2–708(1), 2A–528(1)].

When the ordinary measure of damages is insufficient to put the seller or lessor in the same position as the buyer's or lessee's performance would have, the UCC provides an alternative. In that situation, the proper measure of damages is the lost profits of the seller or lessor, including a reasonable allowance for overhead and other expenses [UCC 2–708(2), 2A–528(2)].

17–3b When the Goods Are in Transit

If the seller or lessor has delivered the goods to a carrier or a bailee, but the buyer or lessee has not yet received them, the goods are said to be in transit. In limited situations, the seller or lessor can prevent goods in transit from being delivered to the buyer or lessee.

Effect of Insolvency and Breach If the seller or lessor learns that the buyer or lessee is insolvent, the seller or lessor can stop the carrier or bailee from delivering the goods regardless of the quantity of goods shipped. If the buyer or lessee is in breach but is not insolvent, however, the seller or lessor can stop delivery of goods in transit only if the quantity shipped is at least a carload, a truckload, a planeload, or a larger shipment [UCC 2–705(1), 2A–526(1)].

Example 17.15 Arturo orders a truckload of lumber from Timber Products, Inc., to be shipped to him six weeks later. Arturo, who owes payment to Timber Products for a past shipment, promises to pay the debt immediately and to pay for the current shipment as soon as it is received. After the lumber has been shipped, a bankruptcy court judge notifies Timber Products that Arturo has filed a petition in bankruptcy and listed Timber Products as one of his creditors. If the goods are still in transit, Timber Products can stop the carrier from delivering the lumber to Arturo. ■

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Requirements for Stopping Delivery To stop delivery, the seller or lessor must timely notify the carrier or other bailee that the goods are to be returned or held for the seller or lessor. If the carrier has sufficient time to stop delivery, it must hold and deliver the goods according to the instructions of the seller or lessor. The seller or lessor is liable to the carrier for any additional costs incurred [UCC 2–705(3), 2A–526(3)].

The seller or lessor has the right to stop delivery of the goods under UCC 2–705(2) and 2A–526(2) until the time when the following occurs:

1. The buyer or lessee obtains possession of the goods.
2. The carrier or the bailee acknowledges the rights of the buyer or lessee in the goods (by reshipping or holding the goods for the buyer or lessee, for instance).
3. A negotiable document of title covering the goods has been properly transferred to the buyer (in sales transactions only), giving the buyer ownership rights in the goods [UCC 2–702].

Once the seller or lessor reclaims the goods in transit, any remedies allowed to sellers and lessors when the goods are in their possession can be pursued.

17–3c When the Goods Are in the Possession of the Buyer or Lessee

Know This
Incidental damages include all reasonable expenses incurred because of a breach of contract.

When the buyer or lessee breaches the contract while in possession of the goods, the seller or lessor can sue. The seller or lessor can sue to recover the purchase price of the goods or the lease payments due, plus incidental damages [UCC 2–709(1), 2A–529(1)].

In some situations, a seller may also have a right to reclaim the goods from the buyer. For instance, in a sales contract, if the buyer has received the goods on credit and the seller discovers that the buyer is insolvent, the seller can demand return of the goods [UCC 2–702(2)]. Ordinarily, the demand must be made within ten days of the buyer's receipt of the goods.[5] The seller's right to reclaim the goods is subject to the rights of a good faith purchaser or other subsequent buyer in the ordinary course of business who purchases the goods from the buyer before the seller reclaims them.

A lessor may also have a right to reclaim goods. If the lessee is in default (fails to make payments that are due, for instance), the lessor may reclaim leased goods that are in the lessee's possession [UCC 2A–525(2)].

17–4 Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee

When the seller or lessor breaches the contract, the buyer or lessee has numerous remedies available under the UCC. Like the remedies available to sellers and lessors, the remedies of buyers and lessees depend on the circumstances existing at the time of the breach. Relevant factors include whether the seller has refused to deliver conforming goods or has delivered nonconforming goods.

17–4a When the Seller or Lessor Refuses to Deliver the Goods

If the seller or lessor refuses to deliver the goods, or the buyer or lessee has rightfully rejected the goods, the remedies available to the buyer or lessee include the right to:

1. Cancel (rescind) the contract.
2. Obtain goods that have been paid for if the seller or lessor is insolvent.

5. The seller can demand and reclaim the goods at any time, though, if the buyer misrepresented his or her solvency in writing within three months prior to the delivery of the goods.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This

A seller or lessor breaches a contract by wrongfully failing to deliver the goods, delivering nonconforming goods, making an improper tender of the goods, or repudiating the contract.

3. Sue to obtain specific performance if the goods are unique or damages are an inadequate remedy.
4. Buy other goods (obtain cover), and obtain damages from the seller.
5. Sue to obtain identified goods held by a third party (replevy goods).
6. Sue to obtain damages.

The Right to Cancel the Contract When a seller or lessor fails to make proper delivery or repudiates the contract, the buyer or lessee can cancel, or rescind, the contract. On notice of cancellation, the buyer or lessee is relieved of any further obligations under the contract but retains all rights to other remedies against the seller [UCC 2–711(1), 2A–508(1)(a)]. (The right to cancel the contract is also available to a buyer or lessee who has rightfully rejected goods or revoked acceptance, as will be discussed shortly.)

The Right to Obtain the Goods on Insolvency If a buyer or lessee has made a partial or full payment for goods that are in the possession of a seller or lessor who is or becomes insolvent, the buyer or lessee has a right to obtain the goods. For this right to be exercised, the goods must be identified to the contract, and the buyer or lessee must pay any remaining balance of the price to the seller or lessor [UCC 2–502, 2A–522].

The Right to Obtain Specific Performance A buyer or lessee can obtain specific performance when the goods are unique and the remedy at law is inadequate [UCC 2–716(1), 2A–521(1)]. Ordinarily, monetary damages are sufficient to place buyers or lessees in the position they would have occupied if the sellors or lessors had fully performed. When the contract is for the purchase of a particular work of art or a similarly unique item, however, monetary damages may not be sufficient. Under these circumstances, equity requires that the seller or lessor perform exactly by delivering the goods identified to the contract (a remedy of specific performance).

Spotlight Case Example 17.16 Doreen Houseman and Eric Dare together bought a house and a pedigreed dog. When the couple separated, they agreed that Dare would keep the house (and pay Houseman for her interest in it) and Houseman would keep the dog. Houseman allowed Dare to take the dog for visits. After one such visit, Dare failed to return the dog. Houseman filed a lawsuit seeking specific performance of their agreement. The court found that because pets have special, subjective value to their owners, a dog can be considered a unique good. Thus, an award of specific performance was appropriate.[6]

fotojagodka/iStock/Getty Images

Will a court consider a pedigreed dog a unique good?

The Right to Obtain Cover In certain situations, buyers and lessees can protect themselves by obtaining cover—that is, by purchasing or leasing other goods to substitute for those due under the contract. This option is available when the seller or lessor repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods, or when a buyer or lessee has rightfully rejected goods or revoked acceptance. In purchasing or leasing substitute goods, the buyer or lessee must act in good faith and without unreasonable delay [UCC 2–712, 2A–518].

After obtaining substitute goods, the buyer or lessee can recover the following from the seller or lessor:

1. The difference between the cost of cover and the contract price (or lease payments).
2. Incidental damages that resulted from the breach.
3. Consequential damages to compensate for indirect losses (such as lost profits) resulting from the breach that were reasonably foreseeable at the time of contract formation.

Cover A remedy that allows the buyer or lessee, on the seller's or lessor's breach, to obtain substitute goods from another seller or lessor.

Buyers and lessees are not required to cover, and failure to do so will not bar them from using any other remedies available under the UCC. A buyer or lessee who fails to cover, however, may not be able to collect consequential damages that could have been avoided by purchasing or leasing substitute goods.

6. Houseman v. Dare, 405 N.J.Super. 538, 966 A.2d 24 (2009).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The Right to Replevy Goods Buyers and lessees also have the right to replevy goods. Replevin [7] is an action that a buyer or lessee can use to recover specific goods from a third party, such as a bailee, who is wrongfully withholding them. Under the UCC, the buyer or lessee can replevy goods subject to the contract if the seller or lessor has repudiated or breached the contract. To maintain an action to replevy goods, buyers and lessees usually must show that they are unable to cover for the goods after a reasonable effort [UCC 2–716(3), 2A–521(3)].

Replevin An action that can be used by a buyer or lessee to recover identified goods from a third party, such as a bailee, who is wrongfully withholding them.

The Right to Recover Damages If a seller or lessor repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods, the buyer or lessee can sue for damages. For the buyer (or lessee), the measure of recovery is the difference between the contract price (or lease payments) and the market price (or lease payments) at the time the buyer (or lessee) learned of the breach. The market price or market lease payments are determined at the place where the seller or lessor was supposed to deliver the goods. The buyer or lessee can also recover incidental and consequential damages, less the expenses that were saved as a result of the breach [UCC 2–713, 2A–519].

Know This

Consequential damages compensate for a loss (such as lost profits) that is not direct but was reasonably foreseeable at the time of the breach.

Example 17.17 Jason & Fils, Inc., contracts to buy a thirty-thousand-gallon industrial tank from Burbank Equipment Corporation for $70,000. Jason & Fils hires Zach's Transport to pick up the tank, but when Zach's arrives at the pickup location, there is no tank. Jason & Fils pays Zach's $7,500 for its services and sues Burbank Equipment to recover.

In this situation, Jason & Fils is entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the market price of the tank. In addition, Jason & Fils is entitled to incidental damages of at least $7,500 for the cost of transport, as well as any consequential damages that were reasonably foreseeable. ■

vincent noel/Shutterstock

If a supplier of industrial storage tanks fails to provide a tank when and where specified in the sales contract, can the buyer recover funds paid to a transport company for its shipment?

17–4b When the Seller or Lessor Delivers Nonconforming Goods

When the seller or lessor delivers nonconforming goods, the buyer or lessee has several remedies available under the UCC. The buyer or lessee may reject the goods, revoke acceptance of the goods, or recover damages for accepted goods.

The Right to Reject the Goods If either the goods or the tender of the goods by the seller or lessor fails to conform to the contract in any respect, the buyer or lessee can reject the goods in whole or in part [UCC 2–601, 2A–509]. A buyer or lessee who rejects the goods may then obtain cover, cancel the contract, or sue for damages for breach of contract, just as if the seller or lessor had refused to deliver the goods.

Timeliness and Reason for Rejection Required. The buyer or lessee must reject the goods within a reasonable amount of time after delivery and must seasonably (timely) notify the seller or lessor [UCC 2–602(1), 2A–509(2)]. If the buyer or lessee fails to reject the goods within a reasonable amount of time, acceptance will be presumed.

When rejecting goods, the buyer or lessee must also designate specific defects that would have been apparent to the seller or lessor on reasonable inspection. Failure to do so precludes the buyer or lessee from using such defects to justify rejection or to establish breach when the seller could have cured the defects if they had been disclosed in a timely fashion [UCC 2–605, 2A–514].

---

7. Pronounced ruh-pleh-vun. Note that outside the UCC, the term replevin refers to a prejudgment process that permits the seizure of specific personal property in which a party claims a right or an interest.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Duties of Merchant Buyers and Lessees When Goods Are Rejected. What happens if a merchant buyer or lessee rightfully rejects goods and the seller or lessor has no agent or business at the place of rejection? In that situation, the merchant buyer or lessee has a good faith obligation to follow any reasonable instructions received from the seller or lessor with respect to the goods [UCC 2–603, 2A–511]. The buyer or lessee is entitled to be reimbursed for the care and cost entailed in following the instructions. The same requirements hold if the buyer or lessee rightfully revokes acceptance of the goods at some later time [UCC 2–608(3), 2A–517(5)]. (Revocation of acceptance will be discussed shortly.)

If no instructions are forthcoming and the goods are perishable or threaten to decline in value quickly, the buyer can resell the goods in good faith. The buyer can then take the appropriate reimbursement from the proceeds and a selling commission (not to exceed 10 percent of the gross proceeds) [UCC 2–603(1), (2); 2A–511(1), (2)]. If the goods are not perishable, the buyer or lessee may store them for the seller or lessor or reship them to the seller or lessor [UCC 2–604, 2A–512].

Focus Question 4

When can a buyer or lessee revoke acceptance?

Revocation of Acceptance Acceptance of the goods precludes the buyer or lessee from exercising the right of rejection, but it does not necessarily prevent the buyer or lessee from pursuing other remedies. In certain circumstances, a buyer or lessee is permitted to revoke acceptance of the goods.

Revoking Acceptance of a Lot or Commercial Unit. Acceptance of a lot or a commercial unit can be revoked if the nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the lot or unit and if one of the following factors is present:

1. Acceptance was predicated on the reasonable assumption that the nonconformity would be cured, and it was not cured within a reasonable time [UCC 2–608(1)(a), 2A–517(1)(a)].
2. The buyer or lessee did not discover the nonconformity before acceptance, either because it was difficult to discover before acceptance or because assurances made by the seller or lessor that the goods were conforming kept the buyer or lessee from inspecting the goods [UCC 2–608(1)(b), 2A–517(1)(b)].

Case Example 17.18 Kimberly Accettura purchased a recreational vehicle (RV) from Vacationland, Inc. When Accettura later returned the RV to Vacationland to get a leak fixed, the company notified her that the RV would have to be sent back to the manufacturer for repairs. Before the vehicle could be sent to the manufacturer, Accettura called Vacationland and verbally revoked her purchase. After the RV was repaired, she confirmed her earlier revocation and sued the seller for a return of the purchase price.

Vacationland countered that it had not been given a reasonable opportunity to cure the RV's defect before Accettura revoked. The Illinois Supreme Court rejected this argument, making a clear distinction between a contract in which the buyer knows about a commercial unit's nonconformity [UCC 2-608(1)] and a contract in which the buyer is unaware of the nonconformity [UCC 2-608(2)]. According to the court, the seller's ability to cure is part of the language of the first provision, but not the second. Therefore, because Accettura did not know about the leak when she purchased the RV, she had properly revoked acceptance despite not giving Vacationland time to fix the problem.[8]

welcomia/Shutterstock.com

Under the UCC, what circumstances allow a buyer to revoke the purchase of an RV that has a preexisting defect without giving the seller a chance to fix the defect?

8. Accettura v. Vacationland, Inc., 2019 IL 124285, __ N.E.3d __ (2019).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Notice of Revocation. Revocation of acceptance is not effective until notice is given to the seller or lessor. Notice must occur within a reasonable time after the buyer or lessee either discovers or should have discovered the grounds for revocation. Additionally, revocation must occur before the goods have undergone any substantial change (such as spoilage) not caused by their own defects [UCC 2–608(2), 2A–517(4)]. Once acceptance is revoked, the buyer or lessee can pursue remedies just as if the goods had been rejected.

Note that to effectively revoke acceptance, a buyer must "relinquish dominion over the goods." This requires a buyer to return the goods or at least to stop using them, unless the use is necessary to avoid substantial hardship. Case Example 17.19 Genesis Health Clubs, Inc., contracted with LED Solar & Light Company to furnish replacement lighting for its building. When Genesis experienced problems with the lights, LED Solar offered to fix or replace them or to refund the price. Genesis responded that it wanted a refund and would return all of the lights "in stages so the club would not go dark."

Genesis returned one shipment of the lights but then disputed the way that LED Solar credited its account for the lights. After that, Genesis made no additional returns. In a lawsuit between the parties, a federal district court concluded that Genesis could not recover the purchase price for the lights. A federal appellate court affirmed. Genesis had not effectively revoked acceptance because it did not return the lights (beyond the first shipment) to LED Solar and because it continued to use them.[9]

The Right to Recover Damages for Accepted Goods A buyer or lessee who has accepted nonconforming goods may also keep the goods and recover damages caused by the breach. To do so, the buyer or lessee must notify the seller or lessor of the breach within a reasonable time after the defect was or should have been discovered. Failure to give notice of the defect (breach) to the seller or lessor bars the buyer or lessee from pursuing any remedy [UCC 2–607(3), 2A–516(3)]. In addition, the parties to a sales or lease contract can insert a provision requiring the buyer or lessee to give notice of any defects in the goods within a set period.

When the goods delivered are not as promised, the measure of damages equals the difference between the value of the goods as accepted and their value if they had been delivered as warranted [UCC 2–714(2), 2A–519(4)]. The buyer or lessee is also entitled to incidental and consequential damages when appropriate [UCC 2–714(3), 2A–519(3)]. The UCC also permits the buyer or lessee, with proper notice to the seller or lessor, to deduct all or any part of the damages from the price or lease payments still due under the contract [UCC 2–717, 2A–516(1)].

Is two years after a sale of goods a reasonable time period in which to discover a defect in the goods and notify the seller of a breach? That was the question in the following Spotlight Case.

9. Genesis Health Clubs, Inc. v. LED Solar & Light Co., 639 Fed.Appx. 550 (10th Cir. 2016).

Spotlight on Baseball Cards: Case 17.2

Fitl v. Strek

Supreme Court of Nebraska, 269 Neb.51, 690 N.W.2d 605 (2005).

Facts In 1995, James Fitl attended a sports-card show in San Francisco, California, where he met Mark Strek, doing business as Star Cards of San Francisco, an exhibitor at the show. Later, on Strek's representation that a certain 1952 Mickey Mantle Topps baseball card was in near-mint condition, Fitl bought the card from Strek for $17,750. Strek delivered the card to Fitl in Omaha, Nebraska, and Fitl placed it in a safe-deposit box.

In May 1997, Fitl sent the card to Professional Sports Authenticators (PSA), a sports-card grading service. PSA told Fitl that the card was ungradable because it had been discolored and doctored. Fitl complained to Strek, who replied that Fitl should have returned the card within seven days to one month of its receipt— "a typical grace period for the unconditional return of a card." In August,

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

Fitl sent the card to ASA Accugrade, Inc. (ASA), another grading service, for a second opinion of the value. ASA also concluded that the card had been refinished and trimmed. Fitl filed a suit in a Nebraska state court against Strek, seeking damages. The court awarded Fitl $17,750, plus his court costs. Strek appealed to the Nebraska Supreme Court.

Issue Was two years after the sale of the baseball card a reasonable time to discover a defect and notify the seller of a breach?

Decision Yes. The state supreme court affirmed the decision of the lower court.

Reason Section 2–607(3)(a) of the UCC states, "Where a tender has been accepted . . . the buyer must within a reasonable time after he discovers or should have discovered any breach notify the seller of breach or be barred from any remedy." Furthermore, "What is a reasonable time for taking any action depends on the nature, purpose and circumstances of such action." The state supreme court concluded that the buyer (Fitl) had reasonably relied on the seller's (Strek's) representation that the goods were "authentic," which they were not. Fitl had given timely notice when he discovered the defects.

The court reasoned that "the policies behind the notice requirement, to allow the seller to correct a defect, to prepare for negotiation and litigation, and to protect against stale claims at a time beyond which an investigation can be completed, were not unfairly prejudiced by the lack of an earlier notice to Strek. Any problem Strek may have had with the party from whom he obtained the baseball card was a separate matter from his transaction with Fitl, and an investigation into the source of the altered card would not have minimized Fitl's damages."

©JStone/Shutterstock.com

What is a reasonable time period to discover that a purchased baseball card is not authentic?

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Fitl and Strek had included in their deal a written clause requiring Fitl to give notice of any defect in the card within seven days to one month of its receipt. Would the result have been different? Why or why not?

17–4c Provisions That Affect or Limit Remedies

The parties to a sales or lease contract can vary their respective rights and obligations by contractual agreement. For instance, a seller and buyer can expressly provide for remedies in addition to those provided in the UCC. The parties can also specify remedies in lieu of those provided in the UCC, or they can change the measure of damages. Any agreed-on remedy is in addition to those provided in the UCC unless the parties expressly agree that the remedy is exclusive of all others [UCC 2–719(1), 2A–503(1), (2)].

Exclusive Remedies If the parties state that a remedy is exclusive, then it is the sole remedy. Example 17.20 Standard Tool Company agrees to sell a pipe-cutting machine to United Pipe & Tubing Corporation. The contract limits United's remedy exclusively to repair or replacement of any defective parts. Thus, repair or replacement of defective parts is the buyer's exclusive remedy under this contract.

When circumstances cause an exclusive remedy to fail in its essential purpose, however, it is no longer exclusive, and the buyer or lessee may pursue other remedies available under the UCC [UCC 2–719(2), 2A–503(2)]. In Example 17.20, suppose that Standard Tool Company is unable to repair a defective part, and no replacement parts are available. In this situation, because the exclusive remedy failed in its essential purpose, the buyer normally will be entitled to seek other remedies provided by the UCC.

Limitations on Consequential Damages As discussed previously, consequential damages are special damages that compensate for indirect losses (such as lost profits) resulting from a breach of contract that were reasonably foreseeable. Under the UCC, parties to a contract can limit or exclude consequential damages, provided the limitation is not unconscionable.

snezhok/iStock/Getty Images

If this pipe-cutting machine has defective parts, can the buyer insist on replacement of the entire machine?

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

When the buyer or lessee is a consumer, any limitation of consequential damages for personal injuries resulting from consumer goods is prima facie (presumptively, or on its face) unconscionable. The limitation of consequential damages is not necessarily unconscionable when the loss is commercial in nature—such as lost profits and property damage [UCC 2–719(3), 2A–503(3)].

Statute of Limitations An action for breach of contract under the UCC must be commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues—that is, a buyer or lessee must file the lawsuit within four years after the breach occurs [UCC 2–725(1)]. In addition, a buyer or lessee who has accepted nonconforming goods usually must notify the breaching party of the breach within a reasonable time, or the aggrieved party is barred from pursuing any remedy [UCC 2–607(3)(a), 2A–516(3)].

The parties can agree in their contract to reduce this period to not less than one year, but cannot extend it beyond four years [UCC 2–725(1), 2A–506(1)]. A cause of action accrues for breach of warranty (discussed next) when the seller or lessor tenders delivery. This is the rule even if the aggrieved party is unaware that the cause of action has accrued [UCC 2–725(2), 2A–506(2)].

17–5 Warranties

The UCC has numerous rules governing product warranties as they occur in sales and lease contracts. Article 2 and Article 2A designate several types of warranties that can arise in a sales or lease contract, including warranties of title, express warranties, and implied warranties. If the seller or lessor breaches a warranty, the buyer or lessee can sue to recover damages.

17–5a Warranties of Title

Under the UCC, three types of title warranties—good title, no liens, and no infringements—can automatically arise in sales and lease contracts.

Good Title In most sales, sellers warrant that they have good and valid title to the goods sold and that transfer of the title is rightful [UCC 2–312(1)(a)]. If the buyer subsequently learns that the seller did not have good title to goods that were purchased, the buyer can sue the seller for breach of this warranty.

Example 17.21 Alexis steals two iPads from Camden and sells them to Emma, who does not know that they are stolen. If Camden discovers that Emma has the iPads, then he has the right to reclaim them from her. When Alexis sold Emma the iPads, Alexis automatically warranted to Emma that the title conveyed was valid and that its transfer was rightful. Because a thief has no title to stolen goods, Alexis breached the warranty of title imposed by the UCC and became liable to Emma for appropriate damages. ■

There is no warranty of good title in lease contracts because title to the goods does not pass to the lessee.

No Liens A lien is an encumbrance on (a claim against) property to satisfy a debt or protect a claim for payment of a debt. A second warranty of title shields buyers and lessees who are unaware of any lien against goods at the time the contract is made [UCC 2–312(1)(b), 2A–211(1)]. This warranty protects buyers who unknowingly purchase goods that are subject to a creditor's security interest (an interest in the goods that secures payment or performance). If a buyer knows (or has reason to know from the language in the contract) that the goods are subject to a prior claim, then the buyer cannot sue the seller for breach of warranty.[10]

Lien An encumbrance on a property to satisfy a debt or protect a claim for payment of a debt.

10. Note that a buyer in the ordinary course of business from a merchant seller generally takes the goods free of the security interest even if the buyer knows of it. For instance, when a merchant has a loan that is secured by all the inventory of the business, this does not prevent a buyer in the ordinary course from obtaining clear title to the goods.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

xbrchx/Shutterstock.com

If a person buys a used boat that has a lien on it, but the buyer knows nothing about the lien, what section of the UCC provides a remedy for the buyer if the boat is taken away to satisfy the prior claim?

Example 17.22 Henderson buys a used boat from Loring for cash. A month later, Barish proves that she has a valid security interest in the boat and that Loring, who has missed five payments, is in default. Barish then repossesses the boat from Henderson. Henderson demands his cash back from Loring. Under Section 2–312(1)(b), Henderson has legal grounds to recover from Loring. As a seller of goods, Loring warrants that the goods are delivered free from any security interest or other lien of which the buyer has no knowledge.

No Infringements A third type of title warranty is a warranty against infringement of any patent, trademark, or copyright. When the seller or lessor is a merchant, the seller or lessor automatically warrants that the buyer or lessee takes the goods free of infringements. In other words, a merchant promises that the goods delivered are free from any copyright, trademark, or patent claims of a third person [UCC 2–312(3), 2A–211(2)]. If a buyer or lessee is subsequently sued by a third party holding copyright, trademark, or patent rights in the goods, then this warranty has been breached.

17–5b Express Warranties

Express Warranty A seller's or lessor's promise as to the quality, condition, description, or performance of the goods being sold or leased.

A seller or lessor can create an express warranty by making representations concerning the quality, condition, description, or performance potential of the goods. Under UCC 2–313 and 2A–210, express warranties arise when a seller or lessor indicates any of the following:

1. That the goods conform to any affirmation (declaration that something is true) or promise of fact that the seller or lessor makes to the buyer or lessee about the goods. Such affirmations or promises are usually made during the bargaining process. Example 17.23 Vladick, a salesperson at Home Depot, tells a customer, "These drill bits will easily penetrate stainless steel—and without dulling." Vladick's statement is an express warranty.
2. That the goods conform to any description of them. Example 17.24 A label reads, "Crate contains one Kawasaki Brute Force 750 4×4i EPS ATV." A contract calls for the delivery of a "wool coat." Both statements create express warranties that the goods sold conform to the descriptions.
3. That the goods conform to any sample or model of the goods shown to the buyer or lessee. Example 17.25 Melissa orders a stainless steel 6300 Interflow juicer for $1,100 after seeing a dealer demonstrate its use at a health fair. The Interflow is shipped to her. When the juicer arrives, it is an older model, not the 6300 model. This is a breach of an express warranty because the dealer warranted that the juicer would be the same model used in the demonstration.

Express warranties can be found in a seller's or lessor's advertisement, e-mail, brochure, or other promotional materials, in addition to being made orally or set forth in a provision of a contract.

Basis of the Bargain To create an express warranty, a seller or lessor does not have to use words such as warrant or guarantee [UCC 2–313(2), 2A–210(2)]. It is only necessary that a reasonable buyer or lessee would regard the representation of fact as part of the basis of the bargain [UCC 2–313(1), 2A–210(1)]. The UCC does not define basis of the bargain, however, and it is a question of fact in each case whether a representation was made at such a time and in such a way that it induced the buyer or lessee to enter into the contract.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Statements of Opinion and Value Only statements of fact create express warranties. If the seller or lessor makes a statement about the supposed value or worth of the goods, or offers an opinion or recommendation about the goods, the seller or lessor is not creating an express warranty [UCC 2–313(2), 2A–210(2)].

Case Example 17.26 Harry's Dairy entered a contract to purchase 3,000 tons of hay from Jeff Good. Harry's Dairy stopped accepting Good's hay because of mold. After Good sued Harry's Dairy for breach of contract, Harry's Dairy countersued, professing that Good had violated an express warranty. This claim was based on a statement that Good made to one of the dairy's representatives when asked about the impact of recent weather on the product. Good said that "the hay had not been exposed to weather that would result in damage or mold to the hay." The Idaho Supreme Court dismissed Harry's Dairy's claim, holding that no express warranty existed because Good's statement was neither an "affirmation of fact" about the possibility of mold nor a "promise" that the hay would not be moldy.[11]

Opinions by Experts. Ordinarily, statements of opinion do not create warranties. If the seller or lessor is an expert, however, and gives an opinion as an expert to a layperson, then a warranty may be created. Example 17.27 Stephen is an art dealer and an expert in seventeenth-century paintings. If Stephen tells Lauren, a purchaser, that in his opinion a particular painting is by Rembrandt, Stephen has warranted the accuracy of his opinion.

Reasonable Reliance. It is not always easy to determine whether a statement constitutes an express warranty or puffery (seller's talk). The reasonableness of the buyer's or lessee's reliance appears to be the controlling criterion in many cases. For instance, a salesperson's statements that a ladder "will never break" and will "last a lifetime" are so clearly improbable that no reasonable buyer should rely on them.

A reasonable person is more likely to rely on specific statements made in an advertisement than on a statement made orally by a salesperson. Case Example 17.28 Lennox International, Inc., makes heating, ventilating, and air conditioning (HVAC) systems. T & M Solar and Air Conditioning, Inc., installs HVAC systems in California. T & M became interested in Lennox solar panel systems because Lennox advertised that the systems could run through an existing HVAC system, rather than through an electrical panel. This meant that the systems, unlike traditional solar panel systems, could be installed without modifying the electrical panels in a residence.

John Lund/Marc Romanelli/Blend Images/Getty Images

An expert art dealer claims a painting is by Rembrandt. Does his statement create an express warranty? Why or why not?

Lennox representatives repeatedly assured T & M that their systems would operate as advertised. T & M ordered and paid for six Lennox systems for customers. The systems could not be operated or installed as promised, however, and T & M ultimately had to remove them from customers' homes at its own expense. T & M sued for breach of an express warranty. A federal court found that T & M had ordered the Lennox systems precisely because they could operate through an HVAC system without modification of existing electrical panels. That was sufficient evidence of reasonable reliance to justify a trial.[12]

17–5c Implied Warranties

An express warranty is based on the seller's express promise. In contrast, an implied warranty is one that the law derives by implication or inference because of the circumstances of a sale. In an action based on breach of implied warranty, it is necessary to show that an implied warranty existed and that the breach of the warranty proximately caused[13] the damage sustained. We look here at some of the implied warranties that arise under the UCC.

Implied Warranty A warranty that arises by law because of the circumstances of a sale and not from the seller's express promise.

11. Good v. Harry's Dairy, LLC, __ P.3d. __, 2020 WL 1126649 (Idaho, 2019).
12. T & M Solar and Air Conditioning, Inc. v. Lennox International, Inc., 83 F.Supp.3d 855 (N.D.Cal. 2015).
13. Proximate, or legal, cause exists when the connection between an act and an injury is strong enough to justify imposing liability.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Implied Warranty of Merchantability A warranty that goods being sold or leased are reasonably fit for the general purpose for which they are sold or leased, are properly packaged and labeled, and are of proper quality.

Focus Question 5

What implied warranties arise under the UCC?

Implied Warranty of Merchantability Every sale or lease of goods made by a merchant who deals in goods of the kind sold or leased automatically gives rise to an implied warranty of merchantability [UCC 2–314, 2A–212]. Thus, a merchant who is in the business of selling ski equipment makes an implied warranty of merchantability every time she sells a pair of skis. A neighbor selling his skis at a garage sale does not (because he is not in the business of selling goods of this type).

Merchantable Goods. Goods that are merchantable are "reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used." They must be of at least average, fair, or medium-grade quality—quality adequate to pass without objection in the trade or market for goods of the same description. The goods must also be adequately packaged and labeled, and they must conform to the promises or affirmations of fact made on the container or label, if any. The warranty of merchantability may be breached even though the merchant did not know or could not have discovered that a product was defective (not merchantable).

Case Example 17.29 Joy Pipe, USA, L.P., is in the business of selling quality steel couplings for use in oil field drilling operations. Joy Pipe entered into a contract with Fremak Industries (a broker) to purchase grade P-110 steel made in India by ISMT Limited. When the steel arrived, Joy Pipe machined it into couplings, which it then sold to its customers.

Two companies that used these couplings in oil wells had well failures and notified Joy Pipe. Joy Pipe then discovered that the ISMT steel it had purchased was of a much lower grade than P-110, which is what caused the couplings to fail. After Joy Pipe paid another company to locate and replace the nonconforming steel, it sued ISMT for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. A jury awarded Joy Pipe nearly $3 million in damages. An appellate court affirmed, and also awarded court costs and interest. The court remanded the case back to the trial court to calculate the amount of interest.[14]

Of course, merchants are not absolute insurers against all accidents occurring in connection with their goods. For instance, a bar of soap is not unmerchantable merely because stepping on it could cause a user to slip and fall.

Merchantable Food. The UCC recognizes the serving of food or drink to be consumed on or off the premises as a sale of goods subject to the implied warranty of merchantability [UCC 2–314(1)]. "Merchantable" food means food that is fit to eat.

Courts generally determine whether food is fit to eat on the basis of consumer expectations. The courts assume that consumers should reasonably expect on occasion to find bones in fish fillets, cherry pits in cherry pie, or a nutshell in a package of shelled nuts, for example—because such substances are natural parts of the food. In contrast, consumers would not reasonably expect to find an inchworm in a can of peas or a piece of glass in a soft drink.

In the following Classic Case, the court had to determine whether a diner should reasonably expect to find a fish bone in fish chowder.

14. Joy Pipe, USA, L.P. v. ISMT Limited, 703 Fed.Appx. 253 (5th Cir. 2017).

Classic Case 17.3

Webster v. Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 347 Mass. 421, 198 N.E.2d 309 (1964).

Facts Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc., was located in Boston in an old building overlooking the ocean. Priscilla Webster, who had been born and raised in New England, went to the restaurant and ordered fish chowder. The chowder was milky in color. After three or four spoonfuls, she felt something lodged in her throat. As a result, she underwent two esophagoscopies (a procedure in which a telescope-like instrument is used to look into the throat). In the second esophagoscopy, a fish bone was found and removed. Webster filed a lawsuit against the restaurant in a Massachusetts state court for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. The jury rendered a verdict for Webster, and the restaurant appealed to the state's highest court.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

Issue Does serving fish chowder that contains a bone constitute a breach of an implied warranty of merchantability by the restaurant?

hipokrat/Getty Images

Who is liable for fish bones in seafood chowder?

Decision No. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts held that Webster could not recover against Blue Ship Tea Room, because no breach of warranty had occurred.

Reason The court, citing UCC Section 2–314, stated that "a warranty that goods shall be merchantable is implied in a contract for their sale if the seller is a merchant with respect to goods of that kind. Under this section the serving for value of food or drink to be consumed either on the premises or elsewhere is a sale. . . . Goods to be merchantable must at least be . . . fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used." The question here was whether a fish bone made the chowder unfit for eating. In the judge's opinion, "the joys of life in New England include the ready availability of fresh fish chowder. We should be prepared to cope with the hazards of fish bones, the occasional presence of which in chowders is, it seems to us, to be anticipated, and which, in the light of a hallowed tradition, do not impair their fitness or merchantability."

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? If Webster had made the chowder herself from a recipe that she had found on the Internet, could she have successfully brought an action against its author for a breach of the implied warranty of merchantability? Explain.
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This classic case, phrased in memorable language, was an early application of the UCC's implied warranty of merchantability to food products. The case established the rule that consumers should expect to occasionally find elements of food products that are natural to the product (such as fish bones in fish chowder). Courts today still apply this rule.

Implied Warranty of Fitness for a Particular Purpose The implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose arises in the sale or lease of goods when a seller or lessor (merchant or nonmerchant) knows both of the following:

1. The particular purpose for which a buyer or lessee will use the goods.
2. That the buyer or lessee is relying on the skill and judgment of the seller or lessor to select suitable goods [UCC 2–315, 2A–213].

Implied Warranty of Fitness for a Particular Purpose A warranty that goods sold or leased are fit for the particular purpose for which the buyer or lessee will use the goods.

A "particular purpose" of the buyer or lessee differs from the "ordinary purpose for which goods are used" (merchantability). Goods can be merchantable but unfit for a particular purpose. Example 17.30 Cheryl needs a gallon of paint to match the color of her living room walls—a light shade of green. She takes a sample to the local hardware store and requests a gallon of paint of that color. Instead, she is given a gallon of bright blue paint. Here, the salesperson has not breached any warranty of implied merchantability—the bright blue paint is of high quality and suitable for interior walls. The salesperson has breached an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, though, because the paint is not the right color for Cheryl's purpose (to match her living room walls).

A seller or lessor need not have actual knowledge of the buyer's or lessee's particular purpose. It is sufficient if the seller or lessor "has reason to know" the purpose. For an implied warranty to be created, however, the buyer or lessee must have relied on the skill or judgment of the seller or lessor in selecting or furnishing suitable goods. For further illustration of how courts analyze implied warranties, see this chapter's Business Law Analysis feature.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Implied Warranties

Bariven, S.A. (S.A. stands for Société Anonyme, a French business form), agreed to buy 26,000 metric tons of powdered milk for $123.5 million from Absolute Trading Corp. The powdered milk was to be delivered in shipments from China to Venezuela.

After the first three shipments, China halted dairy exports due to the presence of melamine (a chemical used in plastics and adhesives) in some products. Absolute assured Bariven that its milk was safe, and when China resumed dairy exports, Absolute delivered sixteen more shipments. Tests of samples of the milk revealed that it contained dangerous levels of melamine. Did Absolute breach any implied warranties?

Analysis: Under the UCC, merchants impliedly warrant that the goods they sell or lease are merchantable and, in certain circumstances, fit for a particular purpose. To be merchantable, goods must be "reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used." They must be at least average, fair, or medium-grade quality—quality that will pass without objection in the trade or market for the goods. For the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose to arise, the seller must know (or have reason to know) the purpose for which the buyer will use the goods and that the buyer is relying on the judgment of the seller to select suitable goods.

Result and Reasoning: Absolute Trading breached the implied warranties of merchantability and fitness for a particular purpose. Bariven agreed to buy a substantial quantity of powdered milk from Absolute that was to be delivered in shipments. Absolute assured Bariven that its milk was safe, but tests of samples from the shipments Bariven received revealed that it was contaminated. Therefore, the milk was not of a quality that would pass without objection in the market for the goods. Nor is milk contaminated with melamine "reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used." The value of the milk as food was impaired because it was potentially lethal and thus not fit to be consumed.

Absolute had reason to know the purpose for which Bariven bought the milk (for human consumption). Absolute also knew that the buyer was relying on it to provide safe milk. In view of the potential hazards and liabilities of consuming the contaminated milk, Absolute was in breach of both of these implied warranties.

Warranties Implied from Prior Dealings or Trade Custom Implied warranties can also arise (or be excluded or modified) as a result of course of dealing or usage of trade [UCC 2–314(3), 2A–212(3)]. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, when both parties to a sales or lease contract have knowledge of a well-recognized trade custom, the courts will infer that both parties intended for that trade custom to apply to their contract.

Example 17.31 Industry-wide custom is to lubricate new cars before they are delivered to buyers. If a dealer fails to lubricate a car, the dealer can be held liable to a buyer for damages resulting from the breach of an implied warranty. (This, of course, would also be negligence on the part of the dealer.)

Know This

Express and implied warranties do not necessarily displace each other. More than one warranty can cover the same goods in the same transaction.

17–5d Overlapping Warranties

Sometimes, two or more warranties are made in a single transaction. Thus, an implied warranty of merchantability, an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, or both can exist in addition to an express warranty. Example 17.32 A sales contract for a new car states that "this car engine is warranted to be free from defects for 48,000 miles or forty-eight months, whichever occurs first." This statement creates an express warranty against all defects, as well as an implied warranty that the car will be fit for normal use.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

The rule under the UCC is that express and implied warranties are construed as cumulative if they are consistent with one another [UCC 2–317, 2A–215]. If the warranties are inconsistent, courts apply the following rules to establish which warranty has priority:

1. Express warranties displace inconsistent implied warranties, except for implied warranties of fitness for a particular purpose.
2. Samples take precedence over inconsistent general descriptions.
3. Exact or technical specifications displace inconsistent samples or general descriptions.

17–5e Warranty Disclaimers

The UCC generally permits warranties to be disclaimed or limited by specific and unambiguous language, provided that the buyer or lessee is protected from surprise. Because each type of warranty is created in a different way, the manner in which a seller or lessor can disclaim warranties varies with the type of warranty.

Express Warranties A seller or lessor can disclaim all oral express warranties by including a statement in the written contract. The disclaimer must be in language that is clear and conspicuous, and is called to the buyer's or lessee's attention [UCC 2–316(1), 2A–214(1)]. This allows the seller or lessor to avoid false allegations that oral warranties were made, and it ensures that only representations made by properly authorized individuals are included in the bargain.

Note, however, that a buyer or lessee must be made aware of any warranty disclaimers or modifications at the time the contract is formed. In other words, the seller or lessor cannot modify any warranties or disclaimers made during the bargaining process without the consent of the buyer or lessee.

Implied Warranties Generally, unless circumstances indicate otherwise, the implied warranties of merchantability and fitness are disclaimed by the expressions "as is," "with all faults," or other similar phrases. Both parties must be able to clearly understand from the language used that there are no implied warranties [UCC 2–316(3)(a), 2A–214(3)(a)].

Case Example 17.33 My Custom Shop, Inc. (MCS) bought an eighteen-year-old Ford Ranger truck with 178,000 miles at auction for about $1,300. MCS made several improvements to the vehicle and sold it to Seth Kiewiz for $3,800, verbally promising to replace any malfunctioning parts that it had installed. Both the purchase contract and the "sticker" attached to the truck's window stated that the vehicle was being sold "AS IS," without any warranties. Kiewiz immediately noticed problems with the truck's engine and brakes. After MCS made several failed attempts to resolve these issues, Kiewiz demanded a full refund. MCS refused. Kiewiz sued, claiming breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. A Wisconsin appeals court held that the "AS IS" clauses were valid and, therefore, Kiewiz had no cause of action.[15]

Note that some states have laws that forbid "as is" sales. Other states do not allow disclaimers of warranties of merchantability for consumer goods.

Disclaimer of the Implied Warranty of Merchantability. To specifically disclaim an implied warranty of merchantability, a seller or lessor must mention the word merchantability [UCC 2–316(2), 2A–214(2)]. The disclaimer need not be written, but if it is, the writing must be conspicuous [UCC 2–316(2), 2A–214(4)].

Art Konovalov/Shutterstock.com

A consumer buys a used Ford Ranger truck but is dissatisfied with the vehicle's performance. How will an "AS IS" clause in the sales contract impact the buyer's ability to return the truck for a full refund?

15. Kiewiz v. My Custom Shop, Inc., 939 N.W.2d 882, 2020 WL 355376, WI App. 10 (2020).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This
Courts generally view warranty disclaimers unfavorably, especially when consumers are involved.

Under the UCC, a term or clause is conspicuous when it is written or displayed in such a way that a reasonable person would notice it. Words are conspicuous when they are in capital letters or are in a larger font size or a different color than the surrounding text.

Disclaimer of the Implied Warranty of Fitness. To specifically disclaim an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, the disclaimer must be in a writing and must be conspicuous. The word fitness does not have to be mentioned. It is sufficient if, for instance, the disclaimer states, "THERE ARE NO WARRANTIES THAT EXTEND BEYOND THE DESCRIPTION ON THE FACE HEREOF."

Buyer's or Lessee's Examination or Refusal to Inspect. If a buyer or lessee examines the goods (or a sample or model) as fully as desired, there is no implied warranty with respect to defects that a reasonable examination would reveal or defects that are found on examination [UCC 2–316(3)(b), 2A–214(2)(b)]. Therefore, no disclaimer of warranty would be necessary with respect to such defects. Also, if a buyer or lessee refuses to examine the goods at the request of the seller or lessor, there is no implied warranty with respect to reasonably evident defects.

Example 17.34 Janna buys a table at Gershwin's Home Store. No express warranties are made. Gershwin asks Janna to inspect the table before buying it, but she refuses. Had Janna inspected the table, she would have noticed that one of its legs was obviously cracked, which made it unstable. Janna takes the table home and sets a lamp on it. The table later collapses, and the lamp starts a fire that causes significant damage. Janna normally will not be able to hold Gershwin's liable for breach of the warranty of merchantability, because she refused to examine the table as Gershwin requested. Janna therefore assumed the risk that the table was defective. ■

17–5f Lemon Laws

Purchasers of defective automobiles—called "lemons"—may pursue remedies in addition to those provided by the UCC under state lemon laws. Basically, state lemon laws provide remedies to consumers who buy automobiles that repeatedly fail to meet standards of quality and performance because they are "lemons."

Although lemon laws vary by state, typically they apply to automobiles under warranty that are defective in a way that significantly affects their value or use. Lemon laws do not necessarily cover used-car purchases (unless the car is covered by a manufacturer's extended warranty) or vehicles that are leased.

Generally, the seller or manufacturer of the automobile is given a number of opportunities to remedy the defect (usually four). If the seller fails to cure the problem despite a reasonable number of attempts (as specified by state law), the buyer is entitled to a new car, replacement of defective parts, or return of all consideration paid.

Typically, buyers must submit their complaint to the arbitration program specified in the manufacturer's warranty before taking the case to court. Buyers who prevail in a lemon-law dispute may also be entitled to reimbursement of their attorneys' fees.

Practice and Review

GFI, Inc., a Hong Kong company, makes audio decoder chips, one of the essential components used in the manufacture of MP3 players. Egan Electronics contracts with GFI to buy 10,000 chips on an installment contract, with 2,500 chips to be shipped every three months, F.O.B. Hong Kong via Air Express. At the time for the first delivery, GFI delivers only 2,400 chips but explains to Egan that even though the shipment is 4 percent short, the chips are of a higher quality than those specified in the contract and are worth

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

5 percent more than the contract price. Egan accepts the shipment and pays GFI the contract price. At the time for the second shipment, GFI makes a shipment identical to the first. Egan again accepts and pays for the chips. At the time for the third shipment, GFI ships 2,400 of the same chips, but this time GFI sends them via Hong Kong Air instead of Air Express. While in transit, the chips are destroyed. When it is time for the fourth shipment, GFI again sends 2,400 chips, but this time Egan rejects the chips without explanation. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did GFI have a legitimate reason to expect that Egan would accept the fourth shipment? Why or why not?
2. Does the substitution of carriers for the third shipment constitute a breach of the contract by GFI? Explain.
3. Suppose that the silicon used for the chips becomes unavailable for a period of time and that GFI cannot manufacture enough chips to fulfill the contract but does ship as many as it can to Egan. Under what doctrine might a court release GFI from further performance of the contract?
4. Under the UCC, does Egan have a right to reject the fourth shipment? Why or why not?

Debate This

If a contract specifies a particular carrier, then the shipper must use that carrier or be in breach of the contract—no exceptions should ever be allowed.

Key Terms

conforming goods 409 cover 420 express warranty 426
implied warranty 427
implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose 429 implied warranty of merchantability 428 installment contract 412 lien 425 perfect tender rule 410 replevin 421
tender of delivery 409

Chapter Summary: Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

Obligations of the Seller or Lessor

1. Tender of delivery—The seller or lessor must tender conforming goods to the buyer or lessee. Tender must take place at a reasonable hour and in a reasonable manner.
2. Place of delivery—If the contract does not indicate where the goods are to be delivered, the place of delivery will be either the seller's place of business, the seller's residence, or the location of the goods.
3. Delivery via carrier—In carrier contracts, the seller fulfills the obligation to deliver the goods through either a shipment contract or a destination contract.
4. The perfect tender rule—If the goods or tender of delivery fail in any respect to conform to the contract, the buyer or lessee has the right to accept the goods, reject the entire shipment, or accept part and reject part [UCC 2-601, 2A-509].
5. Exceptions to the perfect tender rule—Exceptions may be established by the following:
   a. Agreement of the parties.
   b. If the seller or lessor tenders nonconforming goods prior to the performance date and the buyer or lessee rejects them, the seller or lessor may cure (repair or replace the goods) within the contract time for performance [UCC 2–508(1), 2A–513(1)]. If the seller or lessor had reasonable grounds to believe that the buyer or lessee would accept the tendered goods, on the buyer's or lessee's rejection the seller or lessor has a reasonable time to substitute conforming goods without liability [UCC 2–508(2), 2A–513(2)].

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

	c. If the agreed-on means of delivery becomes impracticable or unavailable, the seller must substitute an alternative means (such as a different carrier), if one is available [UCC 2–614(1)]. d. If a seller or lessor tenders nonconforming goods in any one installment under an installment contract, the buyer or lessee may reject the installment only if its value is substantially impaired and the nonconformity cannot be cured. The entire installment contract is breached only when one or more nonconforming installments substantially impair the value of the whole contract [UCC 2–612, 2A–510]. e. When performance becomes commercially impracticable owing to circumstances that were not foreseeable when the contract was formed, the perfect tender rule no longer holds [UCC 2–615, 2A–405].
Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee	1. Payment—On tender of delivery by the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee must pay for the goods at the time and place the goods are received, unless the sale is made on credit. Payment may be made by any method generally acceptable in the commercial world unless the seller demands cash [UCC 2–310, 2–511]. In lease contracts, the lessee must make lease payments in accordance with the contract [UCC 2A–516(1)]. 2. Right of inspection—Unless otherwise agreed, the buyer or lessee has an absolute right to inspect the goods before acceptance [UCC 2–513(1), 2A–515(1)]. 3. Acceptance—The buyer or lessee can manifest acceptance of delivered goods expressly in words or by conduct, or by failing to reject the goods after a reasonable period of time following inspection or after having had a reasonable opportunity to inspect them [UCC 2–606(1), 2A–515(1)]. A buyer will be deemed to have accepted goods on the performance of any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership [UCC 2–606(1)(c)]. 4. Partial acceptance—The buyer or lessee can make a partial acceptance if some of the goods do not conform to the contract and the seller or lessor failed to cure [UCC 2–601(c), 2A–509(1)]. 5. Anticipatory repudiation—If, before the time for performance, one party clearly indicates to the other an intention not to perform, under UCC 2–610 and 2A–402, the nonbreaching party may do the following: a. Treat the repudiation as a final breach by pursuing a remedy. b. Await performance by the repudiating party for a commercially reasonable time. c. In either situation, suspend performance. In addition, the breaching party may retract the repudiation by any method that clearly indicates the party's intent to perform.
Remedies of the Seller or Lessor	1. When the goods are in the possession of the seller or lessor—The seller or lessor may do the following: a. Cancel the contract [UCC 2–703(f), 2A–523(1)(a)]. b. Withhold delivery [UCC 2–703(a), 2A–523(1)(c)]. c. Resell or dispose of the goods [UCC 2–703(d), 2–706(1), 2A–523(1)(e), 2A–527(1)]. d. Sue to recover the purchase price or lease payments due [UCC 2–709(1), 2A–529(1)]. e. Sue to recover damages [UCC 2–708, 2A–528]. 2. When the goods are in transit—The seller or lessor may stop the carrier or bailee from delivering the goods under certain conditions [UCC 2–705, 2A–526]. 3. When the goods are in the possession of the buyer or lessee—The seller or lessor may do the following: a. Sue to recover the purchase price or lease payments due [UCC 2–709(1), 2A–529(1)]. b. Reclaim the goods. A seller may reclaim goods received by an insolvent buyer if the demand is made within ten days of the buyer's receipt (reclaiming goods excludes all other remedies) [UCC 2–702(2)]. A lessor may repossess goods if the lessee is in default [UCC 2A–525(2)].
Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee	1. When the seller or lessor refuses to deliver the goods—The buyer or lessee may do the following: a. Cancel the contract [UCC 2–711(1), 2A–508(1)(a)]. b. Recover the goods if the seller or lessor becomes insolvent and the goods are identified to the contract [UCC 2–502, 2A–522]. c. Sue to obtain specific performance (when the goods are unique and the remedy at law is inadequate) [UCC 2–716(1), 2A–521(1)]. d. Obtain cover [UCC 2–712, 2A–518]. e. Replevy the goods (if cover is unavailable) [UCC 2–716(3), 2A–521(3)]. f. Sue to recover damages [UCC 2–713, 2A–519]. 2. When the seller or lessor delivers or tenders delivery of nonconforming goods—The buyer or lessee may do the following: a. Reject the goods [UCC 2–601, 2A–509].

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

b. Revoke acceptance if the nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the unit or lot and if one of the following factors is present:

(1) Acceptance was predicated on the reasonable assumption that the nonconformity would be cured, and it was not cured within a reasonable time [UCC 2–608(1)(a), 2A–517(1)(a)].

(2) The buyer or lessee did not discover the nonconformity before acceptance, either because it was difficult to discover before acceptance or because the seller's or lessor's assurance that the goods were conforming kept the buyer or lessee from inspecting the goods [UCC 2–608(1)(b), 2A–517(1)(b)].

c. Accept the goods and recover damages [UCC 2–607, 2–714, 2–717, 2A–519].

3. Provisions that affect or limit remedies—

a. Remedies may be limited in sales or lease contracts by agreement of the parties. If the contract states that a remedy is exclusive, then that is the sole remedy unless the remedy fails in its essential purpose. Sellers and lessors can also limit the rights of buyers and lessees to consequential damages unless the limitation is unconscionable [UCC 2–719, 2A–503].

b. The UCC has a four-year statute of limitations for actions involving breach of contract. By agreement, the parties to a sales or lease contract can reduce this period to not less than one year, but they cannot extend it beyond four years [UCC 2–725(1), 2A–506(1)].

Warranties

1. Warranties of title—Under the UCC, three types of title warranties can automatically arise in sales and lease contracts.

a. In most sales, sellers warrant that they have good and valid title to the goods sold and that transfer of the title is rightful [UCC 2–312(1)(a)].

b. The seller or lessor warrants that the goods are free of any encumbrances, or liens, of which the buyer or lessee is unaware [UCC 2–312(1)(b), 2A–211(1)].

c. Sellers or lessors who are merchants warrant that buyers or lessees take the goods free of infringements [UCC 2–312(3), 2A–211(2)].

2. Express warranties—Under the UCC, an express warranty arises under the UCC when a seller or lessor provides, as part of the basis of the bargain, any of the following [UCC 2–313, 2A–210]:

a. An affirmation or promise of fact.

b. A description of the goods.

c. A sample shown as conforming to the contract goods.

3. Implied warranties—Under the UCC, an implied warranty arises by law because of the circumstances of a sale.

a. An implied warranty of merchantability occurs when a seller or lessor who deals in goods of the kind sold or leased (a merchant) warrants that the goods sold or leased are properly packaged and labeled, are of proper quality, and are reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used [UCC 2–314, 2A–212].

b. An implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose arises when the buyer's or lessee's purpose or use is expressly or impliedly known by the seller or lessor, and the buyer or lessee purchases or leases the goods in reliance on the seller's or lessor's skill and judgment [UCC 2–315, 2A–213].

c. Warranties implied from prior dealings or trade custom can arise as a result of course of dealing or usage of trade [UCC 2–314(3), 2A–212(3)].

4. Overlapping warranties—When warranties are consistent with each other, they are considered cumulative under the UCC [UCC 2–317, 2A–215]. If warranties are inconsistent, then express warranties take precedence over implied warranties, except for the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Also, samples take precedence over general descriptions, and exact or technical specifications displace inconsistent samples or general descriptions.

5. Warranty disclaimers—The effectiveness of disclaimers varies with the type of warranty.

a. Express warranties can be disclaimed if the disclaimer is written in clear language, is conspicuous, and is called to the buyer's or lessee's attention at the time the contract is formed.

b. A disclaimer of the implied warranty of merchantability must specifically mention the word merchantability. The disclaimer need not be in writing, but if it is written, it must be conspicuous.

c. A disclaimer of the implied warranty of fitness must be in writing and must be conspicuous, though it need not mention the word fitness.

d. There is no implied warranty with respect to defects that a reasonable examination would reveal or defects that are found on examination.

6. Lemon laws—State statutes may allow purchasers of defective automobiles to pursue remedies in addition to those provided by the UCC. The seller or manufacturer is given opportunities to remedy the defect. If the seller or manufacturer fails to cure the problem, the buyer is entitled to a new car, replacement of defective parts, or return of all consideration paid.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Issue Spotters

1. Country Fruit Stand orders eighty cases of peaches from Down Home Farms. Without stating a reason, Down Home untimely delivers thirty cases instead of eighty. Does Country have the right to reject the shipment? Explain. (See Obligations of the Seller or Lessor.)
2. Brite Images, Inc. (BI), agrees to sell Catalog Corporation (CC) five thousand posters of celebrities, to be delivered on May 1. On April 1, BI repudiates the contract. CC informs BI that it expects delivery. Can CC sue BI without waiting until May 1? Why or why not? (See Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee.)

—Check your answers to the Issue Spotters against the answers provided in Appendix D.

Business Scenarios and Case Problems

17–1. Remedies. Genix, Inc., has contracted to sell Larson five hundred washing machines of a certain model at list price. Genix is to ship the goods on or before December 1. Genix produces one thousand washing machines of this model but has not yet prepared Larson's shipment. On November 1, Larson repudiates the contract. Discuss the remedies available to Genix in this situation. (See Remedies of the Seller or Lessor.)

17–2. Anticipatory Repudiation. Moore contracted in writing to sell her 2010 Hyundai Santa Fe to Hammer for $16,500. Moore agreed to deliver the car on Wednesday, and Hammer promised to pay the $16,500 on the following Friday. On Tuesday, Hammer informed Moore that he would not be buying the car after all. By Friday, Hammer had changed his mind again and tendered $16,500 to Moore. Although Moore had not sold the car to another party, she refused the tender and refused to deliver. Hammer claimed that Moore had breached their contract. Moore contended that Hammer's repudiation had released her from her duty to perform under the contract. Who is correct, and why? (See Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee.)

17–3. Spotlight on Apple—Implied Warranties. Alan Vitt purchased an iBook G4 laptop computer from Apple, Inc. Shortly after the one-year warranty expired, the laptop stopped working due to a weakness in the product manufacture. Vitt sued Apple, arguing that the laptop should have lasted "at least a couple of years," which Vitt believed was a reasonable consumer expectation for a laptop. Vitt claimed that Apple's descriptions of the laptop as "durable," "rugged," "reliable," and "high performance" were affirmative statements concerning the quality and performance of the laptop, which Apple did not meet. How should the court rule? Why? [Vitt v. Apple Computer, Inc., 469 Fed.Appx. 605 (9th Cir. 2011)] (See Warranties.)

17–4. The Right of Rejection. Erb Poultry, Inc., is a distributor of fresh poultry products in Lima, Ohio. CEME, LLC, does business as Bank Shots, a restaurant in Trotwood, Ohio. CEME ordered chicken wings and "dippers" from Erb, which were delivered and for which CEME issued a check in payment. A few days later, CEME stopped payment on the check. When contacted by Erb, CEME alleged that the products were beyond their freshness date, mangled, spoiled, and the wrong sizes. CEME did not provide any evidence to support the claims or arrange to return the products. Is CEME entitled to a full refund of the amount paid for the chicken? Explain. [Erb Poultry, Inc. v. CEME, LLC, 20 N.E.3d 1228 (Ohio App. 2 Dist. 2014)] (See Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee.)

17–5. Remedies for Breach. LO Ventures, LLC, doing business as Reefpoint Brewhouse in Racine, Wisconsin, contracted with Forman Awnings and Construction, LLC, for the fabrication and installation of an awning system over an outdoor seating area. After the system was complete, Reefpoint expressed concerns about the workmanship but did not give Forman a chance to make repairs. The brewhouse used the awning for two months and then had it removed so that siding on the building could be replaced. The parties disagreed about whether cracked and broken welds observed after the removal of the system were due to shoddy workmanship. Reefpoint paid only $400 on the contract price of $8,161. Can Reefpoint rescind the contract and obtain a return of its $400? Is Forman entitled to recover the difference between Reefpoint's payment and the contract price? Discuss. [Forman Awnings and Construction, LLC v. LO Ventures, LLC, 360 Wis.2d 492, 864 N.W.2d 121 (2015)] (See Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee.)

17–6. Business Case Problem with Sample Answer—Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee. M. C. and Linda Morris own a home in Gulfport, Mississippi, that was extensively damaged in Hurricane Katrina. The Morrises contracted with Inside Outside, Inc. (IO), to rebuild their kitchen. When the new kitchen cabinets were delivered, some defects were apparent, and as installation progressed, others were revealed. IO ordered replacement parts to cure the defects. Before the parts arrived, however, the parties' relationship deteriorated, and IO offered to remove the cabinets and refund the price. The Morrises also asked to be repaid for the installation fee. IO refused but emphasized that it was willing to fulfill its contractual obligations. At this point, are the Morrises entitled to revoke their acceptance of the cabinets? Why or why not? [Morris v. Inside Outside, Inc., 185 So.3d 413 (Miss.App. 2016)] (See Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee.)

—For a sample answer to Problem 17–6, go to Appendix E.

17–7. Warranty Disclaimers. Charity Bell bought a used Toyota Avalon from Awny Gobran of Gobran Auto Sales, Inc. The odometer showed that the car had been driven 147,000 miles. Bell asked whether it had been in any accidents, and Gobran replied that it was in good condition. The parties signed a warranty disclaimer that the vehicle was sold "as is." Problems with the car arose the same day as the purchase. Gobran made a few ineffectual attempts to repair it before refusing to do more. Meanwhile, Bell obtained a vehicle history report from CARFAX, which showed that the Avalon had been damaged in an accident and that its last reported odometer reading was 237,271.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Was the "as is" disclaimer sufficient to put Bell on notice that the odometer reading could be false and that the car might have been in an accident? Can Gobran avoid any liability that might otherwise be imposed because Bell did not obtain the CARFAX report until after she bought the car? Discuss. [Gobran Auto Sales, Inc. v. Bell, 335 Ga.App. 873, 783 S.E.2d 389 (2016)] (See Warranties.)

17–8. Implied Warranties. Harold Moore bought a barrel-racing horse named Clear Boggy for $100,000 for his daughter from Betty Roper, who appraises barrel-racing horses. (Barrel racing is a rodeo event in which a horse and rider attempt to complete a cloverleaf pattern around preset barrels in the fastest time.) Clear Boggy was promoted for sale as a competitive barrel-racing horse. On inquiry, Roper represented that Clear Boggy did not have any performance issues or medical problems, and that the only medications the horse had been given were hock injections, a common treatment.

Shortly after the purchase, Clear Boggy began exhibiting significant performance problems, including nervousness, unwillingness to practice, and stalling on the first barrel during runs. Roper then disclosed that the horse had been given shoulder injections prior to the sale and had previously stalled in competition. Moore took the horse to a veterinarian and discovered that it suffered from arthritis, impinged vertebrae, front-left-foot problems, and a right-hind-leg fracture. The vet recommended, and Moore paid for, surgery to repair the hind leg fracture, but Clear Boggy remained unfit for competition. Moore also discovered that the horse had been scratched from competition prior to the sale because it was injured. Can Moore prevail in a lawsuit against Roper for breach of the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose? Why or why not? [Moore v. Roper, 2018 WL 1123868 (E.D.Okla. 2018)] (See Warranties.)

17–9. A Question of Ethics—The IDDR Approach and Buyer's Remedies. Samsung Telecommunications America, LLC, makes Galaxy phones. Daniel Norcia bought a Galaxy S4 in a Verizon store in San Francisco, California. A Verizon employee opened the box, unpacked the phone, and helped Norcia transfer his contacts to the new phone. Norcia took the phone, and its charger and headphones, and left the store. Less than a year later, he filed an action on behalf of himself and other Galaxy S4 buyers in a federal district court against Samsung, alleging that the manufacturer misrepresented the phone's storage capacity and rigged it to operate at a higher speed when it was being tested. [Norcia v. Samsung Telecommunications America, LLC, 845 F.3d 1279 (9th Cir. 2017)] (See Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee.)

1. Samsung included an arbitration provision in a brochure in the Galaxy S4 box. Would it be ethical of Samsung to assert the arbitration clause?
2. Why would corporate decision makers choose to misrepresent their product? Explain, using the Discussion and Review steps of the IDDR approach.

Critical Thinking and Writing Assignments

17–10. Business Law Writing. Suppose that you are a collector of antique cars and you need to purchase spare parts for a 1938 engine. These parts are not made anymore and are scarce. You discover that Beem has the spare parts that you need. You contract with Beem to buy the parts and agree to pay 50 percent of the purchase price in advance. You send the payment on May 1, and Beem receives it on May 2. On May 3, Beem, having found another buyer willing to pay substantially more for the parts, informs you that he will not deliver as contracted. That same day, you learn that Beem is insolvent. Write three paragraphs fully discussing any possible remedies that would enable you to take possession of the parts. (See Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee.)

17–11. Time-Limited Group Assignment—Warranties. Milan purchased saffron extract, marketed as "America's Hottest New Way to a Flat Belly," online from Dr. Chen. The website stated that recently published studies showed a significant weight loss (more than 25 percent) for people who used pure saffron extract as a supplement without diet or exercise. Dr. Chen said that the saffron suppresses appetite by increasing levels of serotonin, which reduces emotional eating. Milan took the extract as directed without any resulting weight loss. (See Warranties.)

1. The first group will determine whether Dr. Chen's website made any express warranty on the saffron extract or its effectiveness in causing weight loss.
2. The second group will discuss whether the implied warranty of merchantability applies to the purchase of weight-loss supplements.
3. The third group will decide if Dr. Chen's sale of saffron extract breached the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.
4. The fourth group will determine if current common knowledge that weight loss can only occur if one burns more calories than one consumes makes it impossible to sue any company that offers weight-loss products that require no dieting and no exercise.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Andrey_Popov/Shutterstock.com

18 Negotiable Instruments

Focus Questions

The five Focus Questions below are designed to help improve your understanding. After reading this chapter, you should be able to answer the following questions:

1. What requirements must an instrument meet to be negotiable?
2. How does the negotiation of order instruments differ from the negotiation of bearer instruments?
3. What are three basic requirements for attaining the status of a holder in due course (HDC)?
4. What is the difference between signature liability and warranty liability?
5. What four defenses can be used against an ordinary holder that are not effective against an HDC?

"It took many generations for people to feel comfortable accepting paper in lieu of gold or silver."

Alan Greenspan
1926–present
(Chair of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, 1987–2006)

Most commercial transactions would be inconceivable without negotiable instruments. A negotiable instrument is a signed writing that contains an unconditional promise or order to pay an exact amount, either on demand or at a specified future time. The promise can be made to the order of a specific person or to a bearer. Because negotiable instruments originally were (and often still are) paper documents, they are sometimes referred to as commercial paper. As indicated in the chapter-opening quotation, it took many years for paper money to be fully accepted as a substitute for gold or silver in commerce.

A negotiable instrument can function as a substitute for cash or as an extension of credit. For a negotiable instrument to operate practically as either a substitute for cash or a credit device, or both, it is essential that the instrument be easily transferable without danger of being uncollectible. This is a fundamental function of negotiable instruments.

When her bank will not loan Kyra the capital she needs to start a company, her wealthy uncle, Martin, agrees to loan her the funds. Kyra signs a promissory note for $300,000 and promises to pay back the money, with 5 percent interest, exactly two years from today's date. Because the promissory note is a negotiable instrument, it can be sold to another. Therefore, if Martin needs access to the funds before the date set for payment, he can negotiate, or transfer, the promissory note to a third party in exchange for cash. When the note becomes due, Kyra will repay the then-current holder of the note.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

18–1 Formation of Negotiable Instruments

The law governing negotiable instruments grew out of commercial necessity. In the medieval world, merchants developed their own set of rules, which eventually became known as the Lex Mercatoria (Law Merchant). The Law Merchant was later codified in England and is the forerunner of Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Article 3 imposes special requirements for the form and content of negotiable instruments. It also governs their negotiation, or transfer.

Negotiable Instrument A signed writing (record) that contains an unconditional promise or order to pay an exact sum on demand or at a specified future time to a specific person or order, or to bearer.

18–1a Types of Negotiable Instruments

The UCC specifies four types of negotiable instruments: drafts, checks, promissory notes, and certificates of deposit (CDs). These instruments, which are summarized briefly in Exhibit 18–1, are frequently divided into the two classifications that we will discuss in the following subsections: orders to pay (drafts and checks) and promises to pay (promissory notes and CDs).

Negotiable instruments may also be classified as either demand instruments or time instruments. A demand instrument is payable on demand. In other words, it is payable immediately after it is issued and for a reasonable period of time thereafter. A time instrument is payable at a future date.

Note that Section 3–104(b) of the UCC defines instrument as a "negotiable instrument."[1] For that reason, whenever the term instrument is used in this book, it refers to a negotiable instrument.

Draft Any instrument drawn on a drawee that orders the drawee to pay a certain amount of funds, usually to a third party (the payee), on demand or at a definite future time.

Drawer The party that initiates a draft (such as a check), thereby ordering the drawee to pay.

Drawee The party that is ordered to pay a draft or check. With a check, a bank or another financial institution is always the drawee.

Payee A person to whom an instrument is made payable.

Drafts and Checks (Orders to Pay) A draft is an unconditional written order that involves three parties. The party creating the draft (the drawer) orders another party (the drawee) to pay funds, usually to a third party (the payee). The most common type of draft is a check, but drafts other than checks may be used in commercial transactions.

Time Drafts versus Sight Drafts. A time draft is payable at a definite future time. A sight draft (or demand draft) is payable on sight—that is, when it is presented to the drawee (usually a bank or another financial institution) for payment. A draft can be both a time and a sight draft. Such a draft is payable at a stated time after sight (a draft that states it is payable ninety days after sight, for instance).

1. Note that all of the references to Article 3 of the UCC in this chapter are to the 1990 version of Article 3, which has been adopted by nearly every state. One-fifth of the states have adopted an amended version of Article 3, issued in 2002.

Exhibit 18–1 Basic Types of Negotiable Instruments

INSTRUMENTS	CHARACTERISTICS	PARTIES
ORDERS TO PAY:
Draft	An order by one person to another person or to bearer.	Drawer—The person who signs or makes the order to pay.
Check	A draft drawn on a bank and payable on demand. (With certain types of checks, such as cashier's checks, the bank is both the drawer and the drawee.)	Drawee—The person to whom the order to pay is made. Payee—The person to whom payment is ordered.
PROMISES TO PAY:
Promissory note	A promise by one party to pay funds to another party or to bearer.	Maker—The person who promises to pay.
Certificate of deposit	A note issued by a bank acknowledging a deposit of funds made payable to the holder of the note.	Payee—The person to whom the promise is made.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

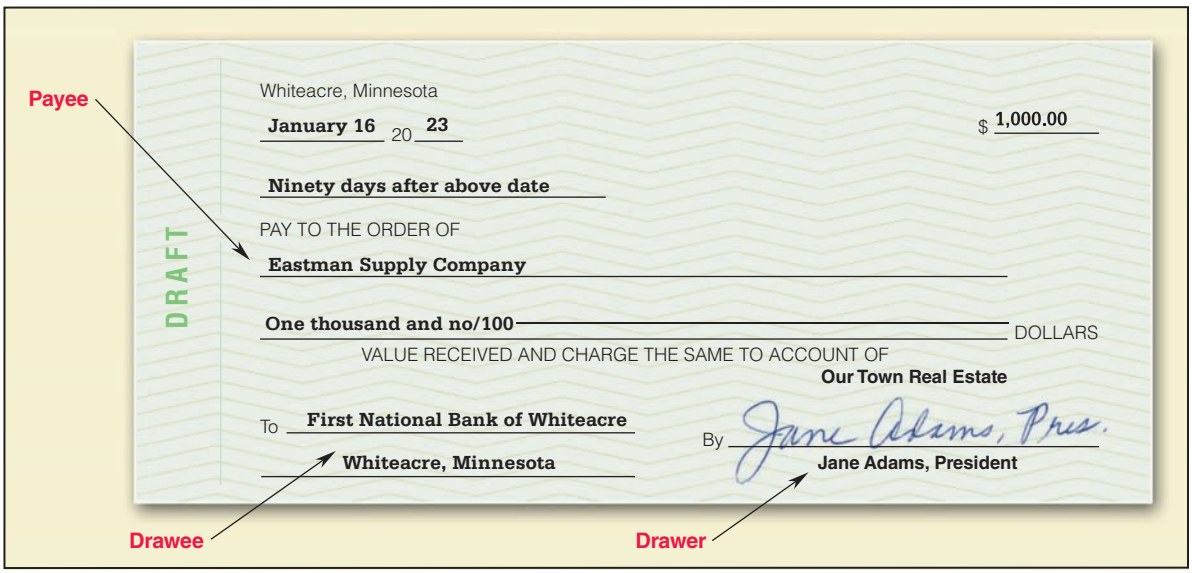
Exhibit 18–2 shows a typical time draft. For the drawee to be obligated to honor (pay) the order, the drawee must be obligated to the drawer either by agreement or through a debtor-creditor relationship. Example 18.1 On January 16, OurTown Real Estate orders $1,000 worth of office supplies from Eastman Supply Company, with payment due in ninety days. Also on January 16, OurTown sends Eastman a draft drawn on its account with the First National Bank of Whiteacre as payment. In this scenario, the drawer is OurTown, the drawee is OurTown's bank (First National Bank of Whiteacre), and the payee is Eastman Supply Company.

Acceptance In negotiable instruments law, a drawee's signed agreement to pay a draft when it is presented.

Acceptor A drawee that accepts, or promises to pay, an instrument when it is presented later for payment.

Acceptances. A drawee's written promise to pay a draft when it comes due is called an acceptance. Usually, the drawee accepts the instrument by writing the word accepted on its face, with a signature and a date. A drawee who has accepted an instrument becomes an acceptor.

A trade acceptance is a type of draft commonly used in the sale of goods. In this draft, the seller is both the drawer and the payee. The buyer to whom credit is extended is the drawee. Example 18.2 Jackson Street Bistro buys its restaurant supplies from Osaka Industries. When Jackson requests supplies, Osaka creates a draft ordering Jackson to pay Osaka for the supplies within ninety days. Jackson accepts the draft by signing its face, which obligates it to make the payment. This is a trade acceptance, and Osaka can sell it to a third party at any time before the payment is due.



When a draft orders the buyer's bank to pay, it is called a banker's acceptance. Banker's acceptances are often used in international trade.

Check A draft drawn by a drawer ordering the drawee bank or other financial institution to pay a certain amount of funds to the payee on demand.

Checks. As mentioned, the most commonly used type of draft is a check. Although fewer checks are written today and most transactions are electronic, checks are still more common than promissory notes or other types of negotiable instruments. (For a discussion of mobile payment apps, which are increasingly popular as alternatives to checks, see this chapter's Adapting the Law to the Online Environment feature.)

Checks are demand instruments because they are payable on demand. Most commonly, the writer of the check is the drawer, the bank on which the check is drawn is the drawee, and the person to whom the check is made payable is the payee. On certain types of checks, such as cashier's checks, the bank is both the drawer and the drawee. A cashier's check functions the same as cash because the bank has committed itself to paying the stated amount on demand.

Exhibit 18–2 A Typical Time Draft

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Adapting the Law to the Online Environment

Pay with Your Smartphone

Mobile payment apps allow consumers to pay for goods and services using their smartphones. The funds for these transactions usually come from a bank account or a credit or debit card, or from a software-based system for storing funds called a digital wallet.

Certain smartphone apps—in particular, Apple, Inc.'s Apple Pay—communicate wirelessly with special point-of-sale systems using near-field communication technology. A person using the smartphone holds it close to (or "waves" it at) the point-of-sale terminal and authenticates the transaction by holding a fingerprint to the phone's ID touch sensor. Along with Apple Pay, Google Pay and Samsung Pay are the leaders in this field, which is attempting to revolutionize how we make our way down a check-out line.

Digital Mistrust

In major Chinese cities, mobile payments using smartphones have come to dominate daily financial transactions. Such saturation clearly has not yet occurred in the United States. Experts point to several reasons for this. Although large retailers such as Best Buy, Costco, and McDonald's accept mobile payments, the majority of American "brick and mortar" merchants do not. Privacy concerns are also limiting use. Many consumers realize that mobile payments provide corporations with a detailed picture of where they shop, what they purchase, and how much they routinely spend.

The biggest problem, however, appears to be that Americans do not yet trust mobile payments. A survey by Pew Charitable Trusts found that respondents were significantly more worried about security breaches with mobile payment apps than with traditional credit or debit cards.[a] This situation is exacerbated by the patchwork of federal and state regulations that apply to mobile payments. These rules are different for each app, depending on whether it is linked to a credit card company, to a bank, or to a phone company, leaving gaps, ambiguities, and overlap that continue to shackle this burgeoning technology.

a. "Are Americans Embracing Mobile Payments?" www.pewtrusts.org. The Pew Charitable Trusts: October 3, 2019, Web.

Critical Thinking

The Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA)[b] is a federal law that protects consumers who transfer funds electronically. Among other safeguards, EFTA limits the liability that results from a lost or stolen electronic financial information and requires banks to provide information to consumers concerning potentially fraudulent electronic transactions. EFTA does not cover mobile payments. Should it? Why or why not?

b. Consumer Protection Act Section 902, 15 U.S.C.A Section 1693.

Promissory Notes (Promises to Pay) A promissory note is a written promise made by one person (the maker of the promise to pay) to another (usually a payee). A promissory note, which is often referred to simply as a note, can be made payable at a definite time or on demand. It can name a specific payee or merely be payable to bearer (bearer instruments will be discussed later in this chapter). Example 18.3 On April 30, Laurence and Margaret sign a writing unconditionally promising to pay "to the order of" the First National Bank of Whiteacre $3,000 (with 5 percent interest) on or before June 29. This writing is a promissory note. (See Exhibit 18–3.)

Promissory notes are used in a variety of credit transactions. Often, a promissory note will carry the name of the transaction involved. A note secured by personal property, such as an automobile, is referred to as a collateral note because property pledged as security for the satisfaction of a debt is called collateral.[2] A note payable in installments, such as installment payments for a 75-inch smart TV over a twelve-month period, is called an installment note.

Promissory Note A written promise made by one person (the maker) to pay a fixed amount of funds to another person (the payee or a subsequent holder) on demand or on a specified date.

Maker One who promises to pay a fixed amount of funds to the holder of a promissory note or a certificate of deposit (CD).

2. To minimize the risk of loss when making a loan, a creditor often requires the debtor to provide some collateral, or security, beyond a promise that the debt will be repaid. When this security takes the form of personal property (such as a motor vehicle), the creditor has an interest in the property that is known as a security interest.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 18–3 A Typical Promissory Note

A promissory note is not a debt—it is only the evidence of a debt. Case Example 18.4 The Bricourts entered an agreement with Wells Fargo Bank to finance the purchase of their home. In doing so, they signed a promissory note to repay Wells Fargo the amount borrowed. The couple failed to make their monthly payments, and Wells Fargo filed a foreclosure action against them. This action did not, however, include the original promissory note, which had been inadvertently lost or destroyed. Instead, Wells Fargo offered a copy of the original note. A Florida appeals court ruled that, given Wells Fargo's good faith efforts to find the original, a copy was sufficient for foreclosure purposes. Even when a promissory note is unavailable, the owner/lender still retains rights and may prove the existence of the note through other evidence.[3]

Certificate of Deposit (CD) A note issued by a bank in which the bank acknowledges the receipt of funds from a party and promises to repay that amount, with interest, to the party on a certain date.

Certificates of Deposit (Promises to Pay)

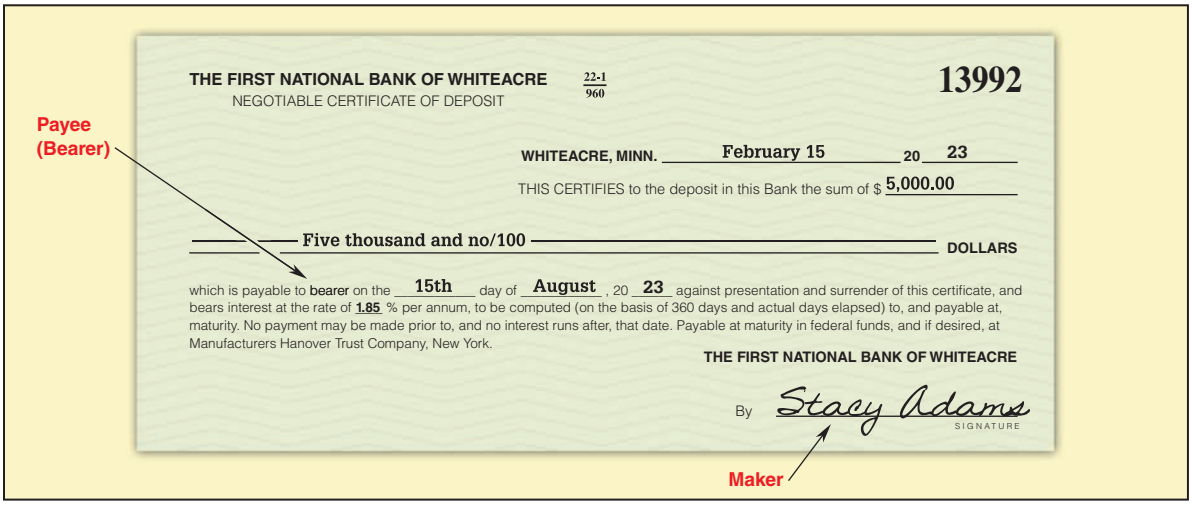
A certificate of deposit (CD) is a type of note issued when a party deposits funds with a bank that the bank promises to repay, with interest, on a certain date [UCC 3–104(j)]. The bank is the maker of the note, and the depositor is the payee. Example 18.5 On February 15, Sara deposits $5,000 with the First National Bank of Whiteacre. The bank issues a CD, in which it promises to repay the $5,000, plus 1.85 percent annual interest, on August 15. (See Exhibit 18–4.)

Because CDs are time deposits, the purchaser-payee typically is not allowed to withdraw the funds before the date of maturity. Banks usually charge a sizable penalty for early withdrawal (except in limited circumstances, such as disability or death). Certificates of deposit are often sold by savings and loan associations, commercial banks, and credit unions. Small CDs are for amounts up to $100,000.

Focus Question 1

What requirements must an instrument meet to be negotiable?

18–1b Requirements for Negotiability



For an instrument to be negotiable, it must meet the following requirements:

1. Be in writing.
2. Be signed by the maker or the drawer.
3. Be an unconditional promise or order to pay.
4. State a fixed amount of money.
5. Be payable on demand or at a definite time.
6. Be payable to order or to bearer, unless the instrument is a check.

3. Wells Fargo Bank, NA, v. Bricourt, __ So.3d. __, 2020 WL 698661 (Fla. Dis. Ct. App., 4th Dis., 2020).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Exhibit 18–4 A Sample Certificate of Deposit

Written Form Negotiable instruments must be in written form (but may be evidenced by an electronic record) [UCC 3–103(a)(6), (9)].[4] This is because negotiable instruments must possess the quality of certainty that only formal, written expression can give. The writing must have the following qualities:

1. The writing must be on material that lends itself to permanence. Instruments carved in blocks of ice or etched in sand would not qualify as negotiable instruments. The UCC nevertheless gives considerable leeway as to what can be a negotiable instrument. Courts have found checks and notes written on napkins, menus, tablecloths, shirts, and a variety of other materials to be negotiable.
2. The writing must also have portability. Although the UCC does not explicitly state this requirement, if an instrument is not movable, it obviously cannot meet the requirement that it be freely transferable. Example 18.6 Charles writes on the side of a cow, "I promise to pay $500 to the order of Jason." Technically, this would meet the requirements of a negotiable instrument—except for portability. A cow cannot easily be transferred in the ordinary course of business. Thus, the "instrument" is nonnegotiable.

Signatures For an instrument to be negotiable, it must be signed by (1) the maker, if it is a note or a certificate of deposit, or (2) the drawer, if it is a draft or a check [UCC 3–103(a)(3)]. If a person signs an instrument as an authorized agent of the maker or drawer, the maker or drawer has effectively signed the instrument.

The UCC is quite lenient with regard to what constitutes a signature. Nearly any symbol executed or adopted by a person with the intent to authenticate a written or electronic document can be a signature [UCC 1–201(37)]. A signature can be made by a device, such as a rubber stamp, or by a thumbprint. In addition, it can consist of any name, including a trade name, or a word, mark, or symbol [UCC 3–401(b)]. If necessary, parol evidence is admissible to identify the signer.

The location of the signature on the document is unimportant, although the usual place is the lower right-hand corner. A handwritten statement on the body of the instrument, such as "I, Jerome Garcia, promise to pay Elena Greer," is sufficient to act as a signature.

Karpiyon/Getty Images

Would a promise to pay written on the side of this calf be negotiable? Why or why not?

4. Under the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) and the 2002 amendments to Article 3, an electronic record may be sufficient to constitute a writing. Note, however, that the amendments to Article 3 do not expressly authorize electronic negotiable instruments.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Know This

Negotiable instruments are classified as promises to pay or orders to pay.

Unconditional Promise or Order to Pay For an instrument to be negotiable, it must contain a promise to pay or an express order. The terms of the promise or order must be included in the writing on the face of the instrument. Furthermore, these terms must be unconditional.

Promise. The UCC requires that a promise be an affirmative (express) undertaking [UCC 3–103(a)(9)]. A mere acknowledgment of a debt, such as an I.O.U., might logically imply a promise, but it is not sufficient under the UCC. If such words as "to be paid on demand" or "due on demand" are added to an I.O.U., however, the need for an express promise to pay is satisfied.[5]

Example 18.7 Tess executes a promissory note that says, "I promise to pay Alvarez $1,000 on demand for the purchase of these cases of wine." These words satisfy the promise-to-pay requirement.

Order. An order is associated with three-party instruments, such as checks, drafts, and trade acceptances. An order directs a third party to pay the instrument as drawn. In the typical check, for instance, the word "pay" (to the order of a payee) is a command to the drawee bank to pay the check when presented—thus, it is an order.

A command, such as "Pay," is mandatory in an order even if it is accompanied by courteous words, as in "Please pay" or "Kindly pay." Generally, the language used must indicate that a command or order is being given. Stating, "I wish you would pay" does not fulfill this requirement. An order may be addressed to one party or to more than one party, either jointly ("to A and B") or alternatively ("to A or B") [UCC 3–103(a)(6)].

Unconditionality of Promise or Order. Only unconditional promises or orders can be negotiable [UCC 3–106(a)]. A promise or order is conditional (and therefore not negotiable) if it states any of the following:

1. An express condition to payment.
2. That the promise or order is subject to or governed by another writing or record.
3. That the rights or obligations with respect to the promise or order are stated in another writing or record.

A mere reference to another writing, however, does not make the promise or order conditional [UCC 3–106(a)]. For instance, the words "As per contract" or "This debt arises from the sale of goods X and Y" do not render an instrument nonnegotiable. Similarly, a statement in the instrument that payment can be made only out of a particular fund or source will not render the instrument nonnegotiable [UCC 3–106(b)(ii)].

Case Example 18.8 Sam and Odalis Groome entered into two contracts to buy a pair of alpacas from Alpacas of America, LLC (AOA). To finance the purchases, the buyers signed two notes, one for $18,750 and one for $20,250. Each note included a reference to a contract, a payment schedule, and a security agreement, which provided an interest in the alpacas to secure payment. Within a few months, the Groomes stopped making payments. When AOA sued to collect the unpaid amounts, the Groomes argued that the notes were nonnegotiable because they referred to and were governed by other writings (the contracts). Ultimately, a state appellate court ruled that the Groomes' notes did contain unconditional promises to pay and thus were negotiable.[6]

Terrasprite/Getty Images

Is a note for funds to purchase alpacas negotiable?

In contrast, if the payment is to be made from a fund that does not yet exist, or is conditioned on the occurrence of some future event, the instrument will be nonnegotiable.

Example 18.9 Duffy's note promises to pay Sherman from the trust account that Duffy will establish when he receives the proceeds from his father's estate. This promise is conditional, and the note is nonnegotiable.

In the following case, the court considered the negotiability of a promissory note that included a reference to a mortgage. The makers of the note argued that this reference rendered the note nonnegotiable.

5. A certificate of deposit (CD) is an exception in this respect. A CD does not have to contain an express promise, because the bank's acknowledgment of the deposit and the other terms of the instrument clearly indicate a promise by the bank to repay the funds [UCC 3–104(j)].
6. Alpacas of America, LLC v. Groome, 179 Wash.App. 391, 317 P.3d 1103 (2014).

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Case 18.1

OneWest Bank, FSB[a] v. Nunez

District Court of Appeal of Florida, Fourth District, 41 Fla.L.Weekly. D540, 193 So.3d 13 (2016).

Facts To buy property in Hallandale, Florida, Jose and Jessica Nunez signed a promissory note and mortgage payable to Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. The note contained a reference to the mortgage and described how and under what conditions its payment could be accelerated. Countrywide transferred the note to One-West Bank. The Nunezes defaulted on the payments. OneWest filed a suit in a Florida state court to collect. The Nunezes claimed that OneWest was not entitled to enforce the note because it was not a negotiable instrument. They contended that the reference to the mortgage and the conditions for acceleration destroyed the note's negotiability. The court agreed with the Nunezes and dismissed the complaint. OneWest appealed.

Issue Is a note that refers to a mortgage unconditional?

Decision Yes. A state intermediate appellate court reversed the dismissal of OneWest's complaint. "The mention of the mortgage [and] the . . . rights of acceleration in the promissory note does not destroy the unconditional nature of the note."

Reason The reviewing court looked at Florida's version of UCC 3–106 and determined that the promissory note's reference to the mortgage did not render the note unconditional. The court pointed out that the official comments to UCC 3–106 explain that the inclusion of language regarding collateral and acceleration does not make a note conditional. In addition, the court found several cases from other jurisdictions in which courts had held that notes using exactly the same language as the Nunezes' note were negotiable. Therefore, the court concluded that the note's reference to the Nunez's mortgage and its statement concerning acceleration did not render the note conditional and nonnegotiable.

Critical Thinking

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the note in this case had stated, "The terms of the mortgage are by this reference made a part hereof." Would the result have been different?

a. The initials FSB mean Federal Savings Bank.

A Fixed Amount of Money Negotiable instruments must state with certainty a fixed amount of money to be paid at any time the instrument is payable [UCC 3–104(a)]. This requirement ensures that the value of the instrument can be determined with clarity and certainty.

The term fixed amount means an amount that is ascertainable from the face of the instrument. A demand note payable with 8 percent interest meets the requirement of a fixed amount because its amount can be determined at the time it is payable or at any time thereafter [UCC 3–104(a)].

The rate of interest may also be determined from information that is not contained in the instrument itself but is described by it, such as a formula or a source [UCC 3–112(b)]. For instance, an instrument that is payable at the legal rate of interest (a rate of interest fixed by statute) is negotiable. Mortgage notes tied to a variable rate of interest (a rate that fluctuates as a result of market conditions) are also negotiable.

The fixed amount must be payable in money. The UCC defines money as "a medium of exchange authorized or adopted by a domestic or foreign government as a part of its currency" [UCC 1–201(24)]. Gold is not a medium of exchange adopted by the U.S. government, so a note payable in gold is nonnegotiable. An instrument payable in the United States with a face amount stated in a foreign currency is negotiable, however, and can be paid in the foreign currency or in the equivalent amount of U.S. dollars [UCC 3–107].

Know This
Interest payable on an instrument normally cannot exceed the maximum limit on interest under a state's usury statute.

Payable on Demand or at a Definite Time A negotiable instrument must "be payable on demand or at a definite time" [UCC 3–104(a)(2)]. To determine the instrument's value, it is necessary to know when the maker, drawee, or acceptor is required to pay. It is also necessary to know when the obligations of secondary parties, such as indorsers,[7] will arise.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

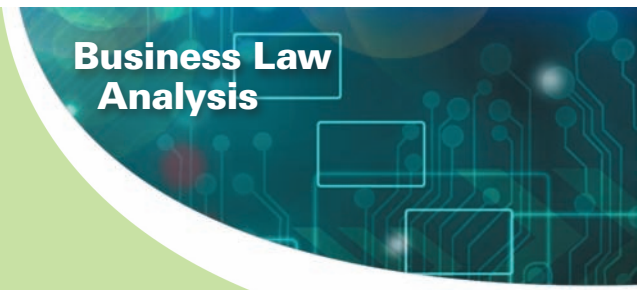
Furthermore, it is necessary to know when an instrument is due in order to calculate when the statute of limitations may apply [UCC 3–118(a)]. Finally, with an interest-bearing instrument, it is necessary to know the exact interval during which interest will accrue to determine the instrument's present value.

Presentment The act of presenting an instrument to the party liable on the instrument in order to collect payment. Presentment also occurs when a person presents an instrument to a drawee for a required acceptance.

Payable on Demand. Instruments that are payable on demand include those that contain the words "Payable at sight" or "Payable upon presentment." Presentment is a demand made by or on behalf of a person entitled to enforce an instrument to either pay or accept the instrument [UCC 3–501]. Thus, presentment occurs when a person offers the instrument to the appropriate party for payment or acceptance. Presentment can by made by any commercially reasonable means, including oral, written, or electronic communication.



The very nature of the instrument may indicate that it is payable on demand. For instance, a check, by definition, is payable on demand [UCC 3–104(f)]. If no time for payment is specified and the person responsible for payment must pay on the instrument's presentment, the instrument is payable on demand [UCC 3–108(a)]. (See the Business Law Analysis feature for further illustration.)

Spotlight Case Example 18.10 National City Bank gave Reger Development, LLC, a line of credit to finance potential development opportunities. Reger signed a promissory note requiring it to "pay this loan in full immediately upon Lender's demand." About a year later, the bank asked Reger to pay down the loan and stated that it would be reducing the amount of cash available through the line of credit. Reger sued, alleging that the bank had breached the terms of the note. The court ruled in the bank's favor. The promissory note was a demand instrument because it explicitly set forth the lender's right to demand payment at any time. Thus, National City had the right to collect payment from Reger at any time on demand.[8]

7. We should note that the UCC uses the spelling indorse (indorsement, and the like), rather than the more common spelling endorse (endorsement, and the like). We follow the UCC's spelling here and in other chapters in this text.

8. Reger Development, LLC v. National City Bank, 592 F.3d 759 (7th Cir. 2010).

Deciding If an Instrument Is Negotiable

Abby Novel signed a promissory note to her stepfather to obtain funds to manufacture and market a patented jewelry display design. The note read, "Glen Gallwitz 1-8-2016 loaned me $5,000 at 6 percent interest for a total of $10,000.00." The note did not state a time for repayment. More than seven years after Novel signed the note, Gallwitz filed a suit to recover the stated amount. Novel claimed that she did not have to pay because the note was not negotiable—it was incomplete. Is she correct?

Analysis: For an instrument to be negotiable under UCC 3–104, it must meet the following requirements: (1) be in writing, (2) be signed by the maker or the drawer, (3) be an unconditional promise or order to pay, (4) state a fixed amount of money, (5) be payable on demand or at a definite time, and (6) be payable to order or to bearer unless it is a check. When no time for payment is stated on an instrument, the instrument is payable on demand.

Result and Reasoning: Novel is not correct. All of the requirements to establish the instrument as negotiable are met: (1) the instrument is in writing, (2) it is signed by Novel, (3) there are no conditions or promises other than the unconditional promise to pay, (4) the instrument states a fixed amount—$10,000, (5) the instrument does not include a definite repayment date, which means that it is payable on demand, and (6) the instrument is payable to Gallwitz.

Therefore, the instrument is negotiable, and Novel is bound to pay it.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Payable at a Definite Time. If an instrument is not payable on demand, to be negotiable it must be payable at a definite time. An instrument is payable at a definite time if it states any of the following:

1. That it is payable on a specified date.
2. That it is payable within a definite period of time (such as thirty days) after being presented for payment.
3. That it is payable on a date or time readily ascertainable at the time the promise or order is issued [UCC 3–108(b)].

The maker or drawee in a time draft is under no obligation to pay until the specified time.

When an instrument is payable by the maker or drawer on or before a stated date, it is clearly payable at a definite time. The maker or drawer has the option of paying before the stated maturity date, but the payee can still rely on payment being made by the maturity date. Example 18.11 Ari gives Ernesto an instrument dated May 1, 2022, that indicates on its face that it is payable on or before May 1, 2023. This instrument satisfies the definite-time requirement.

In contrast, an instrument that is undated and made payable "one month after date" is clearly nonnegotiable. There is no way to determine the maturity date from the face of the instrument. If the date is uncertain, the instrument is not payable at a definite time. Example 18.12 An instrument that states, "One year after the death of my grandfather, Jerome Adams, I promise to pay $5,000 to the order of Lucy Harmon. [Signed] Jacqueline Wells," is nonnegotiable. The date on which the instrument becomes payable is uncertain.

Acceleration Clause. An acceleration clause allows a payee or other holder of a time instrument to demand payment of the entire amount due, with interest, if a certain event occurs. (A holder is any person in possession of an instrument drawn, issued, or indorsed to that person, to that person's order, to bearer, or in blank [UCC 1–201(20)].)

Example 18.13 Marta lends $1,000 to Ruth, who makes a negotiable note promising to pay $100 per month (plus interest) for ten months. The note contains an acceleration provision that permits Marta or any holder to immediately demand all the payments plus the interest owed to date if Ruth fails to pay an installment. Ruth fails to make the third payment. Marta accelerates the unpaid balance, and the note becomes due and payable in full. Ruth owes Marta the remaining principal plus any unpaid interest to that date.

Instruments that include acceleration clauses are negotiable because the exact value of the instrument can be ascertained. In addition, the instrument will be payable on a specified date if the event allowing acceleration does not occur [UCC 3–108(b)(ii)]. Thus, the specified date is the outside limit used to determine the value and negotiability of the instrument.

In the following case, a lender invoked an acceleration clause to recover the amount owed on a note. The borrower had defaulted on the payments eight years earlier. Did the lender wait too long to accelerate the debt?

Acceleration Clause A clause that allows a payee or other holder of a time instrument to demand payment of the entire amount due, with interest, if a certain event occurs, such as a default in the payment of an installment when due.

Holder Any person in possession of an instrument drawn, issued, or indorsed to that person, to that person's order, to bearer, or in blank.

Case 18.2

Collins Asset Group, LLC v. Alialy

Supreme Court of Indiana, 139 N.E.3d 712 (2020).

Facts Alkhemer Alialy executed a promissory note and mortgage to be paid in monthly installments over twenty-five years. The note contained an acceleration clause giving the holder the option to accelerate the debt after a default and to require immediate payment of the full amount owed.

After Alialy stopped making payments, the note was transferred to Collins Asset Group, LLC (CAG). Eight years later, CAG accelerated the debt, demanding payment in full.

Six months passed, and still Alialy did not pay. CAG then filed a suit in an Indiana state court to recover on the note. The court

(Continues)

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s). Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Continued

dismissed the complaint on the ground that the claim was barred by a six-year statute of limitations for a cause of action on a promissory note. A state intermediate appellate court affirmed the dismissal, finding that CAG did not accelerate the debt within six years of Alialy's initial default and thus waited too long to invoke the acceleration clause. CAG appealed.

Issue Can CAG accelerate the debt on the note and assert its claim for payment?

Decision Yes. The Indiana Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the state intermediate appellate court and remanded the case. "CAG's claim is timely."

Reason The state supreme court explained that a note accompanying a mortgage requires payment in fixed installments over a period of time extending from the note's execution to its maturity date. The note may also include an acceleration clause that gives the lender an option to "fast-forward to the note's maturity date" and demand immediate payment in full if the maker of the note fails to pay an installment.

The court identified two statutes of limitations that apply when a lender sues for payment on a note in Indiana—the state's general statute of limitations and the UCC's statute of limitations. Each statute contains a six-year limit on an action to obtain full payment of the amount owed on an unpaid note. Under either statute, there are multiple dates from which such an action can accrue. One of those dates is when a lender exercises its option to accelerate the debt.

In this case, the court held that "the two statutes provide CAG identical paths to relief. CAG brought its claim against Alialy . . . well within six years of when it accelerated the debt . . .. Thus, CAG's claim to recover the full amount owed on the note is not time-barred."

Critical Thinking

- Legal Environment What advantage does an acceleration clause in a note provide to a creditor?
- Economic Why would an investor accept a mortgage note on which the maker has already defaulted? Discuss.

Extension Clause A clause in a time instrument that allows the instrument's date of maturity to be extended into the future.

Extension Clause. The reverse of an acceleration clause is an extension clause, which allows the date of maturity to be extended into the future [UCC 3–108(b)(iii), (iv)]. If the right to extend the time of payment is given to the maker or drawer, the interval of the extension must be specified to keep the instrument negotiable. If, however, the holder can extend the time of payment, the extended maturity date need not be specified for the instrument to be negotiable.

Example 18.14 Alek's note reads, "The holder of this note at the date of maturity, January 1, 2022, can extend the time of payment until the following June 1 or later, if the holder so wishes." This note is negotiable. The length of the extension does not have to be specified, because only the holder has the option to extend. After January 1, 2022, the note is, in effect, a demand instrument.

Payable to Order or to Bearer Because one of the functions of a negotiable instrument is to serve as a substitute for cash, freedom to transfer is essential. To ensure a proper transfer, the instrument must be "payable to order or to bearer" at the time it is issued or first comes into the possession of the holder [UCC 3–104(a)(1)]. An instrument is not negotiable unless it meets this requirement.

Order Instrument A negotiable instrument that is payable "to the order of an identified person" or "to an identified person or order."

Order Instruments. An order instrument is an instrument that is payable (1) "to the order of an identified person" or (2) "to an identified person or order" [UCC 3–109(b)]. An identified person is the person "to whom the instrument is initially payable" as determined by the intent of the maker or drawer [UCC 3–110(a)]. The identified person, in turn, may transfer the instrument to whomever that person wishes. In this way, the instrument retains its transferability.

Note that with order instruments, the person specified must be identified with certainty, because the transfer of the instrument requires the indorsement, or signature, of the payee (indorsements will be discussed later in this chapter). An order instrument made "Payable to the order of my nicest cousin," for instance, is not negotiable, because it does not clearly specify the payee.

Copyright 2022 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved. May not be copied, scanned, or duplicated, in whole or in part. Due to electronic rights, some third party content may be suppressed from the eBook and/or eChapter(s).
Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. Cengage Learning reserves the right to remove additional content at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it.

Bearer Instruments. A bearer instrument is an instrument that does not designate a specific payee [UCC 3–109(a)]. The term bearer refers to a person in possession of an instrument that is payable to bearer or indorsed in blank (with a signature only, as will be discussed shortly) [UCC 1–201(5), 3–109(a), 3–109(c)]. This means that the maker or drawer agrees to pay anyone who presents the instrument for payment.

Bearer Instrument Any instrument that is not payable to a specific person, including instruments payable to bearer or to cash.

Bearer A person in possession of an instrument payable to bearer or indorsed in blank.

Any instrument containing terms such as the following is a bearer instrument:

1. "Payable to the order of bearer."
2. "Payable to Simon Reed or bearer."
3. "Payable to bearer."
4. "Payable to X" or "Payable to Captain America" (the instrument can be payable to a nonexistent person, but not to a company that does not exist).
5. "Pay to the order of cash."

Spotlight Case Example 18.15 Amine Nehme applied for credit at the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino in Las Vegas, Nevada, and was granted $500,000 in credit. He signed a marker—that is, a promise to pay a gambling debt—for $500,000. Nehme quickly lost that amount gambling. The Venetian presented the marker for payment to Nehme's bank, Bank of America, which returned it for insufficient funds. The casino's owner, Las Vegas Sands, LLC, filed a suit against Nehme for failure to pay a negotiable instrument.

The court held that the marker fit the UCC's definitions of negotiable instrument and check. It was a means for payment of $500,000 from Bank of America to the order of the Venetian. It did not state a time for payment and thus was payable on demand. It was also unconditional—that is, it stated no promise by Nehme other than the promise to pay a fixed amount of money.[9]

©nito/Shutterstock.com

Can a gambling marker be a negotiable instrument?

